Mar. Would I could leave him here,
T'were a free paſſage to Iſmenia:
I muſt now blow, as to put out the fire
Yet kindle't more. You not conſider Sir,
The great diſparitie is in their bloods,
Eſtate and fortunes: there's the rich beauty
Which this poor homelineſſe is not endow'd with;
There's difference enough.
Ant. The leaſt of all.
Equalitie is no rule in Loves Grammar:
That ſole unhappineſſe is left to Princes
To marry blood: we are free diſpoſers,
And have the power to equalize their bloods
Up to our own; wee cannot keep it back,
'Tis a due debt from us.
Mar. I Sir, had you
No Father nor Unkle, nor ſuch hinderers,
You might do with your ſelf at your pleaſure;
But as it is.
Ant. As it is; 'tis nothing:
Their powers will come too late, to give me back
The yeſterday I loſt.
Mar. Indeed, to ſay ſooth,
Your oppoſition from the other part
Is of more force; there you run the hazzard
Of every hour a life, had you ſupply;
You meet your deereſt enemy in love
With all his hate about him: 'T will be more hard
For your Iſmenia to come home to you,
Then you to go to Country Iſabell. Enter Julio.
Ant. Tuſh; 'tis not fear removes me.
Mar. No more: your Unkle.
Jul. Oh, the good hour upon you Gentlemen:
Welcome Nephew; Speak it to your friend Sir,
It may be happier receiv'd from you,
In his acceptance.
Ant. I made bold, Uncle,
To do it before; and I think he beleeves it.
Mar. 'Twas never doubted, Sir.
Jul. Here are ſports (Dons)
That you muſt look on with a loving eye;
And without Cenſure, leſſe it be giving
My country neighbours loves their yeerly offrings
That muſt not be refus'd; though 't be more pain
To the Spectator, then the painfull Actor,
'Twill abide no more teſt then the tinſell
Wee clad our Masks in for an hours wearing,
Or the Livory lace ſometimes on the cloaks
Of a great Dons Followers: I ſpeak no further:
Then our own Country, Sir.
Mar. For my part, Sir,
The more abſurd, 't ſhalbe the better welcom.
Jul. You'll find the gueſt you look for: I heard Couſen,
You were at Toledo th'other day.
Ant. Not late, Sir.
Jul. O ſie! muſt I be plainer? You chang'd the point
With Tirſo and Liſauro, two of the Stock
Of our Antagoniſts, the Belides.
Ant. A meer proffer, Sir; the prevention
Was quick with us: we had done ſomewhat elſe:
This Gentleman was ingag'd in't.
Jul. I am
The enemie to his foe for it: that wild-fire
Will crave more then fair water, to quench it
I ſuſpect. Whence it will come I know not.

Enter two or three Gentlemen.
Ant. I was about a gentle reconcilement,
But I do fear I ſhall goe back agen.
Jul. Come, come; The Sports are coming on us:
Nay, I have more gueſts to grace it: Welcome
Don Goſtanco, Girzaldo, Philippo: Seat, ſeat all. Muſick.
Cup. Love is little, and therefore I preſent him, Enter
Love is a fire, therefore you may lament him. a Cupid.
Mar. Alas poor Love, who are they that can quench him?
Jul. He 's not without thoſe members, fear him not.
Cup. Love ſhoots, therefore I bear his bow about.
And Love is blind, therefore my eyes are out. (fore.
Ma. I never heard Love give reaſon for what he did be-Enter Buſtofa (for Paris.)
Cup. Let ſuch as can ſee, ſee ſuch as cannot: behold,
Our goddeſſes all three ſtrive for the ball of gold:
And here fair Paris comes, the hopefull youth of Troy,
Queen Hecub's darling-ſon, King Priams onely joy.
Mart. Is this Paris? I ſhould have taken him for Hector rather.
Buſt. Paris at this time: Pray you hold your prating.
Ant. Paris can be angry.
Jul. Oh, at this time
You muſt pardon him; he comes as a Judge.
Mar. —Mercy on all that looks upon him, ſay I.
Buſt. The thundring ſeas whoſe watry fire waſhes the whiting-Mops, (tops.
The gentle Whale, whoſe feet ſo fell, flies ore the mountain
No roares ſo fierce, no throats ſo deep, no howls can bring ſuch fears
As Paris can, if Garden from he call his Dogs and Bears.
Mar. I, thoſe they were that I feard all this while.
Buſt. Yes Jack-an-Apes.
Mar. I thank you, good Paris.
Buſt. You may hold your peace, and ſtand further out o'th' way then:
The lines will fall where they light, (mirth,
Yes Jack-an-Apes, he hath to ſports, and faces make like Whilſt bellowing buls, the horned beaſts, do toſſe from ground to earth:
Bloud Bear there is, as Cupid blind.
Ant. That Bear would be whip'd for loſing of his eyes.
Buſt. Be whipped man may ſee,
But we preſent no ſuch content, but Nimps ſuch as they be.
Ant. Theſe are long lines.
Mar. Can you blame him, leading Buls & Bears in 'em?
Enter Shepherd ſinging, with Iſmena, Aminta, Florimell, (as Juno, Pallas, Venus,) and 3 Nymphs attending.
Buſt. Go Cupid blind, conduct the dumb, for Ladies muſt not ſpeak here:
Let ſhepherds ſing with dancing feet, and cords of muſick break here. Song. (fall,
Now Ladies fight, with heels ſo light, by lot your luck muſt
Where Paris pleaſe, to do you eaſe, and give the golden Ball. Dance.
Mar. If you plaid Paris now Antonio, where would you (beſtow it?
Ant. I prethee, Friend,
Take the full freedome of thought, but no words.
Mar. 'Proteſt there's a third, which by her habit
Should perſonate Venus, and by conſequence
Of the Story, receive the honours prize:
And were I a Paris, there it ſhould be.
Doe you note her?
Ant. No; mine eye is ſo fixed,
I cannot move it.
Cup. The dance is ended; Now to judgment Paris.

Buſt.

Buſt. Here Juno, here: but ſtay, I do eſpy
A pretty gleeke comming from Pallas eye:
Here Pallas, here: yet ſtay agen: methinks
I ſee the eye of lovely Venus winks:
Oh cloſe them both: ſhut in thoſe golden eyne,
And I will kiſſe thoſe ſweet blind cheeks of thine.
Juno is angry: yes, and Pallas frowns,
Would Paris now were gone from Ida's-downs.
They both are fair, but Venus has the Mole,
The faireſt hair, and ſweeteſt dimple hole:
To her, or her, or her, or her, or neither;
Can one man pleaſe three Ladies altogether?
No, take it Venus, toſſe it at thy pleaſure,
Thou art the lovers friend beyond his meaſure.
Jul. Paris has done what man can do, pleas'd one,
Who can do more? Enter Geraſto, (as Mar. Stay, here's another perſon. Mars)
Ger. Come lovely Venus, leave this lower Orbe,
And mount with Mars, up to his glorious Spheare.
Buſt. How now, what's he:
Flor. I'm ignorant what to do, Sir.
Ger. Thy ſilver-yoke of Doves are in the Team,
And thou ſhalt fly through Apollo's Beam:
I'le ſee thee ſeated in thy golden Throne,
And hold with Mars a ſweet conjunction. Exit.
Buſt. Ha? what follows this? has carried away my ſiſter
He never rehears'd his part with me before. (Venus:
Jul. What follows now Prince Paris?
Flor. within.—Help, help, help.
Buſt. Hue and cry, I think Sir this is Venus voice, Mine owne ſiſter Florimell.
Mar. What is there ſome Tragick-Act behind?
Buſt. No, no, altogether Comical; Mars and Venus
Are in the old conjunction it ſeems.
Mar. 'Tis very improper then, for Venus
Never cryes out when ſhe conjoynes with Mars.
Buſt. That's true indeed: they are out of their parts ſure,
It may be 'tis the Book-holders fault: Ile go ſee.— Exit.
Jul. How like you our Countrey Revells, Gentlemen?
All Gent. Oh, they commend themſelves, Sir.
Ant. Me-thinks now
Juno and Minerva ſhould take revenge on Paris,
It cannot end without it.
Mar. I did expect
Inſteed of Mars, the Storm-Gaoler Eolus,
And Juno preſſing her Deiopeia
As ſatisfaction to the bluſtring god,
To ſend his Toſſers forth.
Jul. It may ſo follow,
Lets not prejudicate the Hiſtory. Enter Buſtofa.
Buſt. Oh, oh, oh, oh.
Jul. So, here's a Paſſion towards.
Buſt. Help, help, if you be Gentlemen; my Siſter,
My Venus; ſhee's ſtolne away.
Jul. The ſtory changes from our expectation, (Mars
Buſt. Help, my father the Miller will hang me els: god
Is a bawdy Villain: he ſaid ſhe ſhould ride upon Doves:
Shee's horſs'd, ſhee's horſs'd whether ſhe will or no.
Mar. Sure I think hee's ſerious. (horſe in the breech
Buſt. She's horſs'd upon a double Gelding, and a Stone
Of her: the poor wench cries help, and I cry help, & none
Of you will help.
Jul. Speak, is it the ſhow, or doſt thou bawle?
Buſt. A pox on the Ball: my Siſter bawls, and I bawl:
Either bridle horſe and follow, or give me a halter
To hang my ſelf: I cannot run ſo faſt as a hagge.
Jul. Wie follow me, I'le fill the Countrey with purſuit
But I will find the Thief: my Houſe thus abus'd?
Buſt. 'Tis my houſe that's abus'd, the Siſter of my fleſh and blood: oh, oh. Exeunt.
1. Wench. } 'Tis time we all ſhift for our ſelves if this
2. } However I'le be gone. (be ſerious.
3. } And I. Exeunt.
Ant. You need not fright your beauties pretty ſouls,
With the leaſt pale complexion of a fear. (ſecret.
Mar. Juno has better courage: and Minerva more di-
Iſm. Alas my courage was ſo counterfeit
It might have been ſtruck from me with a feather,
Juno ne'er had ſo weak a preſenter.
Am. Sure I was ne'er the wiſer for Minerva,
That I find yet about me.
Iſm. My dwelling, Sir?
'Tis a poor Yeomans roof, ſcarce a league off,
That never ſham'd me yet.
Ant. Your gentle pardon:
I vow my erring eyes had almoſt caſt you
For one of the moſt mortal Enemies
That our Family has.
Iſm. I'me ſorry Sir,
I am ſo like your foe: 'twere fit I haſted
From your offended ſight.
Ant. Oh, miſtake not,
It was my error, and I do confeſſe it:
You'l not beleeve your welcome; nor can I ſpeak it;
But there's my friend can tell you, pray hear him.
Mar. Shall I tell her Sir? I'me glad of the employment,
Ant. A kinſwoman to that beauty.
Am. A kin to her, Sir,
But nothing to her Beauty.
Ant. Do not wrong it, 'tis not far behind her.
Am. Her kinder parts are not far off, indeed, Sir.
Mar. Let me but kiſſe you with his ardour now,
You ſhall feel how he loves you.
Iſm. Oh forbear:
'Tis not the faſhion with us, but would you
Perſwade me that he loves me?
Mar. I'le warrant you
He dies in't: and that were witnes enough on't.
Iſm. Love me Sir? can you tell me for what reaſon?
Mar. Fy, will ye aſk me that which you have about you?
Iſm. I know nothing Sir.
Mar. Let him find it then;
He conſtantly beleeves you have the thing
That he muſt love you for: ſo much is apparent,
A ſweet and lovely beauty.
Iſm. So Sir; Pray you
Show me one thing: Did he ere love before?
(I know you are his boſome-Counſellor)
Nay then I ſee your anſwer is not ready;
I'le not beleeve you if you ſtudy further.
Mar. Shall I ſpeak truth to you?
Iſm. Or ſpeak no more.
Mar. There was a ſmile thrown at him, from a Lady
Whoſe deſerts might buy him treble, and lately
He receiv'd it, and I know where he loſt it,
In this face of yours: I know his heart's within you.
Iſm. May I know her name?
Mar. In your ear you may
With vow of ſilence.
Am. Hee'l not give over Sir:
If he ſpeak for you, hee'l ſure ſpeed for you.
Ant. But that's not the anſwer to my queſtion.

Am. You

Am. You are the firſt in my virgin-conſcence
That ere ſpoke Love to her: oh, my heart!
Ant. How doe you?
Am. Nothing Sir: but would I had a better face.
How well yoor pulſe beats.
Ant. Healthfully, does it not?
Am. It thumps prettily, me thinks.
Iſm. Alack, I hear it
With much pitie: how great is your fault too,
In wrong to the good Lady?
Mar. You forget
The difficult paſſage hee has to her,
A hell of feud's between the Families.
Iſm. and that has often Love wrought by advantage
To peaceful reconcilement.
Mar. There impoſſible.
Iſm. This way 'tis worſer; 't may ſeed again in her
Unto another generation:
For where (poor Lady) is her ſatisfaction?
Mar. It comes in me; to be truth, I love her (I'll go no farther for compariſon)
As deer as hee loves you.
Iſm. How if ſhee love not?
Mar. Tuſh: be that my pains: You know not what art
I have thoſe wayes.
Iſm. Beſhrow you, you have practiſ'd upon me,
Well, ſpeed me here, and you with your Iſmenia.
Mar. Go, the condition's drawn, ready dated,
There wants but your hand to 't.
Am. Truly you have taken great pains, Sir.
Mar. A friendly part, no more (ſweet Beuty.)
Am. They are happy, Sir, have ſuch friends as you are.
But do you know you have done well in this?
How will his Allyes receive it? ſhee (though I ſay't)
Is of no better Blood then I am.
Mar. There I leave it, I 'm at fartheſt that way.
Iſm. You ſhall extend your vows no larger now.
My heart calls you mine own: and that's enough.
Reaſon, I know, would have all yet conceal'd.
I ſhall not leave you unſaluted long
Either by pen or perſon.
Ant. You may diſcourſe
With me, when you think y'are alone, I ſhall
Be preſent with you.
Iſm. Come Coſen, will you walk?
Am. Alas, I was ready long ſince: in conſcience
You would with better will yet ſtay behind.
Iſm. Oh Love, I never thought thou'dſt bin ſo blind.
Mar. You'll anſwer this Sir. Exeunt.
Ant. If ere't be ſpoke on: Enter Julio
I purpoſe not to propound the queſtion.
Jul. 'Tis true the poor knave ſaid: ſome Raviſher,
Some of Luſts Blood-hounds have ſeiz'd upon her:
The Girle is hurried, as the divell were with 'em
And help'd their ſpeed.
Mar. It may be not ſo ill, Sir.
A well prepared Lover may do as much
In hot blood as this, and perform't honeſtly.
Jul. What? ſteale away a virgin 'gainſt her will?
Mar. It may be any mans caſe; deſpiſe nothing:
And that's a thiefe of a good quality,
Moſt commonly hee brings his theft home again,
Though with a little ſhame.
Jul. There's a charge by 't
Faln upon mee: Paris (the Millers ſon)
Her brother, dares not venture home again
Till better tidings follow of his ſiſter.
Ant. Y'are the more beholding to the miſchance, Sir:
Had I gone a Boot-haling, I ſhould as ſoon
Have ſtolne him, as his ſiſter: Marry then,
To render him back in the ſame plight he is
May be coſtly: his fleſh is not maintain'd with little.
Jul. I think the poor knave will pine away,
Hee cries all to be pitied yonder.
Mar. Pray you Sir, let's go ſee him: I ſhould laugh
To ſee him cry ſure.
Jul. Well, you are merry, Sir.
Antonio, keep this charge; I have fears
Move me to lay it on you: Pray forbear
The wayes of your enemies, the Bellides.
I have reaſon for my Injunction, Sir. Exeunt.
Enter Aminta (as a Page with a Letter.)
Ant. To me, Sir? from whom?
Am. A friend, I dare vow, Sir.
Though on the enemies part: the Ladie Iſmenia.
Mar. Take heed: bluſh not too deep; let me adviſe you
In your Anſwer, 't muſt be done heedfully.
Ant. I ſhould not ſee a maſculine in peace
Out of that houſe.
Am. Alas: I am a child, Sir,
Your hates cannot laſt till I wear a ſword.
Ant. Await me for your anſwer.
Mar. Hee muſt ſee her,
To manifeſt his ſhame: 'tis my advantage;
While our blood 's under us, wee keep above:
But then we fall when we do fall in love. Exeunt.

Actus tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Julio and Franio.
Fra. My Lord, my Lord, your houſe hath injur'd me,
Rob'd me of all the joyes I had on earth.
Jul. Where wert thou brought up (fellow)?
Fra. In a Mill.
You may perceive it by my loud exclaims,
Which muſt riſe higher yet.
Jul. Obſtreperous Carle.
If thy throats tempeſt could ore-turn my houſe,
What ſatisfaction were it for thy child?
Turn thee the right way to thy journies end.
Wilt have her where ſhe is not?
Fra. Here was ſhe loſt,
And here muſt I begin my footing after;
From whence, untill I meet a pow'r to puniſh,
I will not reſt: You are not quick to grief,
Your hearing 's a dead ſenſe. Were yours the loſſe,
Had you a daughter ſtoln, perhaps be-whor'd,
(For to what other end ſhould come the thiefe)?
You'ld play the Miller then, be loud and high.
But being not a ſorrow of your own,
You have no help nor pitie for another,
Jul. Oh, thou haſt op'd a ſluce was long ſhut up,
And let a flood of grief in; a buried grief
Thy voice hath wak'd again: a grief as old
As likely t'is, thy child is; friend, I tell thee,
I did once loſe a daughter.
Fra. Did you Sir?
Beſeech you then, how did you bear her loſſe?

Jul. With thy grief trebled,
Fra. But was she stolne from you?
Jul. Yes, by devouring theeves, from whom cannot Ever returne a satisfaction:
The wild beasts had her in her swathing clothes.
Fra. Oh much good do'em with her.
Jul. Away tough churle.
Fra. Why, she was better eaten then my child,
Better by beasts then beastly men devoured,
They took away a life, no honour from her:
Those beasts might make a Saint of her, but these
Will make my child a devil: but was she, Sir,
Your onely daughter?

Enter Gillian.

Jul. I ne'r had other (Friend)
Gil. Where are you (man?) your busines lies not here,
Your daughter's in the Pownd, I have found where.
'Twill cost you deer her freedom.
Fra. I'll break it down,
And free her without pay:
Horse-locks nor chains shall hold her from me.
Jul. I'll take this relief,
I now have time to speak alone with grief. Exit.
Fra. How? my Land-lord? hee's Lord of my Lands
But not my Cattel: I'll have her again (Gil)
Gil. You are not mad upon the sudden now.
Fra. No Gil, I have been mad these five hours:
I'll sell my Mill, and buy a Roring,
I'll batter down his house, and make a Stewes on't,
Gil. Will you gather up your wits a little
And hear me? the King's neer by in progresse,
Here I have got our supplication drawn,
And there's the way to help us.
Fra. Give it me (Gil,)
I will not fear to give it to the King:
To his own hands (God blesse him) will I give it,
And he shall set the Law upon their shoulders,
And hang 'em all that had a hand in it.
Gil. Where's your Son?
Fra. He shall be hang'd in flotches:
The dogs shall eat him in Lent, there's Cats meat
And Dogs-meat enough about him. (time.
Gil. Sure the poor girle is the Counts whore by this
Fra. If she be the Counts whore, the whores Count Shall pay for it: He shall pay for a new Maiden-head.
Gil. You are so violous: this I'm resolv'd,
If she be a whore once, I'll renounce her,
You know, if every man had his right,
She's none of our child, but a meet foundling,
(And I can guesse the owner for a need too)
We have but fosterd her.
Fra. Gil, no more of that,
I'll cut your tongue out if you tell those tales.
Hark, hark, these Toasters tell us the King's coming:
Get you gone; I'll see if I can find him. Exeunt.

Enter Lisauro, Torsa, Pedro and Moncado.

Lis. Do's the King remove to day?
Ter. So saies the Harbengers,
And keeps his way on to Valentia,
There ends the progresse.
Ped. He hunts this morning Gentlemen,
And dines i'th' fields: the Court is all in readinesse.
Lis. Pedro, did you send for this Tailor? or you Moncado?
This light french-demi. launce that follows us.
Ped. No, I assure ye on my word, I am guiltlesse,
I owe him too much to be inward with him.
Mon. I am not quit I am sure: there is a reckoning
Of some four scarlet cloaks, and two lac'd suits
Hangs on the file still, like a fearful Comet Makes me keep off.
Lis. I am in too Gentlemen,
I thank his faith, for a matter of three hundred.
Ter. And I for two, what a devil makes he this way?
I do not love to see my sins before me.
Ped. 'Tis the vacation, and these things break out
To see the Court, and glory in their debtors.
Ter. What do you call him for? I never love
To remember their names that I owe money to,
'Tis not gentill, I shun 'em like the plague ever.
Lis. His name's Vertigo: hold your heads, and wonder,
A French-man, and a founder of new fashions:
The Revolutions of all shapes and habits
Run madding through his brains. Enter Vertigo.
Mon. He is very brave.
Lis. The shreds of what he steals from us believe it,
Makes him a mighty man; he comes, have at ye.
Ver. Save ye together, my sweet Gentlemen,
I have been looking——
Ter. Not for money Sir?
You know the hard time.
Ver. Pardon me sweet (Signior) (tlemen,
Good faith the least thought in my heart, your love Gen-
Your love's enough for me: Money? hang money:
Let me preserve your love.
Lis. Yes marry shall ye,
And we our credit, you would see the Court?
Mon. He shall see every place.
Ver. Shall I i'faith Gentlemen?
Ped. The Cellar, and the Buttry, and the Kitchin,
The Pastry, and the Pantry.
Ter. I, and taste too
Of every Office: and be free of all too:
That he may say when he comes home in glory,
Ver. And I will say, i'faith, and say it openly,
And say it home too: Shall I see the King also?
Lis. Shalt see him every day: shalt see the Ladies
In their French clothes: shalt ride a hunting with him,
Shalt have a Mistris too: we must fool handsomly
To keep him in belief, we honour him,
He may call on us else.
Ped. A pox upon him.
Let him call at home in's owne house for salt butter,
Ver. And when the King puts on a new suit.
Ter. Thou shalt see it first,
And defect his dublets, that thou maist be perfect.
Ver. The Wardrobe I would fain view, Gentlemen,
Fain come to see the Wardrobe.
Lis. Thou shalt see it,
And see the secret of it, dive into it:
Sleep in the Wardrobe, and have Revelations
Of fashions five yeer hence.
Ver. Ye honour me;
Ye infinitely honour me.
Ter. Any thing i'th' Court Sir,
Or within the compasse of a Courtier,
Ver. My wife shall give ye thanks.
Ter. You shall see any thing,
The privatst place, the stool, and where 'tis emptied.
Ver. Ye make me blush, ye pour your bounties, Gen-
In such abundance. tlemen,
Lis. I will show thee presently
The order that the King keeps when he comes

To

To open view; that thou maist tell thy Neighbours
Over a shoulder of mutton, thou hast seen something,
Nay, thou shalt present the King for this time.
Ver. Nay, I pray Sir,
Lis. That thou maist know what State there do's belong (to it;
Stand there I say, and put on a sad countenance,
Mingled with height; be cover'd, and reserved;
Move like the Sun, by soft degrees, and glorious,
Into your order (Gentlemen) uncover'd,
The King appears; Wee'l sport with you a while Sir,
I am sure you are merry with us all the year long (Tailor)
Move softer still, keep in that fencing leg; Monsieur, Turne to no side.

Enter Franio out of breath.

Ver. What's this that appears to him?
Lis. 'Has a petition, and he looks most lamentably,
Mistake him, and we are made.
Fra. This is the King sure,
The glorious King, I know him by his gay clothes.
Lis. Now beat your self that you may say hereafter.
Fra. I have recover'd breath, I'll speak unto him pre- (sently,
May it please your gracious majesty to consider
A poor mans case?
King. What's your will Sir?
Lis. You must accept, and read it.
Ver. The Tailor will run mad upon my life for't.
Ped. How he mumps and bridles: he will ne'er cut Ver. And what's your grief? (clothes again.
Mon. He speaks i'th' nose like his goose.
Fra. I pray you read there; I am abus'd, and frumpt Sir,
By a great man that may do ill by authority;
Poor honest men are hang'd for doing less Sir,
My child is stolne, the Count Otranto stole her;
A pretty child she is, although I say it,
A handsom mother, he means to make a whore of her,
A silken whore, his knaves have filch'd her from me;
He keeps lewd knaves, that do him beastly offices:
I kneel for Justice. Shall I have it Sir?

Enter King Philippo, and Lords.

Phil. What Pageant's this?
Lis. The King:
Tailor, stand off, here ends your apparition:
Miller, turn round, and there addresse your paper,
There, there's the King indeed.
Fra. May it please your Majesty.
Phil. Why didst thou kneel to that fellow?
Fra. In good faith Sir,
I thought he had been a King he was so gallant:
There's none here wears such gold.
Phil. So foolishly,
You have golden busines sure; because I am homely
Clad, in no glittring suit, I am not look'd on:
Ye fools that wear gay clothes love to be gap'd at,
What are you better when your end calls on you?
Will gold preserve ye from the grave? or jewells?
Get golden minds, and fling away your Trappings
Unto your bodies, minister warm rayments, Wholsom and good; glitter within and spare not:
Let my Court have rich souls, their suits I weigh not:
And what are you that took such State upon ye?
Are ye a Prince?
Lis. The Prince of Tailors, Sir,
We owe some money to him, and 't like your Majesty.
Phil. If it like him, would ye owde more, be modester,
And you less sawcy Sir: and leave this place:
Your pressing iron will make no perfect Courtier:
Go stitch at home, and cozen your poor neighbours,
Show such another pride, I'll have ye whipt for't,
And get worse clothes, these but proclaim your fellony.
And what's your paper?
Fra. I beseech you read it.
Phil. What's here? the Count Otranto task'd for a base (villany,
For stealing of a maid?
Lord. The Count Otranto?
Is not the fellow mad Sir?
Fra. No, no, my Lord,
I am in my wits, I am a labouring man,
And we have seldom leisure to run mad,
We have other businesse to employ our heads in,
We have little wit to lose too: if we complain,
And if a heavie lord lie on our shoulders,
Worse then a sack of meal, and oppresse our poverties,
We are mad straight, and whop'd, and tyde in fetters,
Able to make a horse mad as you use us,
You are mad for nothing, and no man dare proclaim it,
In you a wildnesse is a noble trick,
And cherish'd in ye, and all men must love it:
Oppressions of all sorts, sit like new clothes,
Neatly and handsomly upon your Lordships:
And if we kick when your honours spur us,
We are knaves and Jades, and ready for the Justice.
I am a true Miller.
Phil. Then thou art a wonder.
2 L. I know the man reputed for a good man
An honest and substantial fellow.
Phil. He speaks sence,
And to the point: Greatnesse begets much rudenesse.
How dare you (Sirrha) 'gainst so main a person,
A man of so much Noble note and honour,
Put up this base complaint? Must every Pesant
Upon a sawcy will affront great Lords!
All fellows (Miller?)
Fra. I have my reward, Sir,
I was told one greatnesse would protect another,
As beams support their fellowes; now I find it:
If 't please your Grace to have me hang'd, I am ready,
'Tis but a Miller, and a Thief dispatch'd:
Though I steal bread, I steal no flesh to tempt me.
I have a wife, and 't please him to have her too,
With all my heart; 't will make my charge the less Sir,
She'll hold him play a while: I have a Boy too,
He is able to instruct his Honours hogges,
Or rub his Horse-heels: when it please his Lordship
He may make him his slave too, or his bawd:
The boy is well bred, can exhort his Sister:
For me, the prison, or the Pillory,
To lose my goods, and have mine ears cropt off:
Whipt like a Topp, and have a paper stuck before me,
For abominable honestie to his owne daughter,
I can endure, Sir: the Miller has a stout heart,
Tough as his Toal-pin.
Phil. I suspect this shrewdly,
Is it his daughter that the people call
The Millers fair maid?
2 Lo. It should seem so Sir.
Phil. Be sure you be i'th' right, Sirrha.
Fra. If I be i'th' wrong Sir,
Be sure you hang me, I will ask no curtesie:
Your Grace may have a daughter, think of that Sir,
She may be fair, and she may be abused too:
A King is not exempted from these cases:
Stolne from your loving care.

Phil. I do much pity him.
Fra. But heaven forbid she should be in that venture
That mine is in at this hour: I'll assure your Grace
The Lord wants a water-mill, & means to grind with her
Would I had his stones to set, I would fit him for it.
Phil. Follow me (Miller) and let me talk with ye farther,
And keep this private all upon your loyalties:
To morrow morning, though I am now beyond him,
And the lesse lookt for, I'll break my fast with good Count.
No more, away, all to our sports, be silent. Exeunt.
Ver. What Grace shall I have now?
Lif. Choose thine owne grace,
And go to dinner when thou wilt, Vertigo,
We must needs follow the King.
Ter. You heard the sentence.
Mon. If you stay here
I'll send thee a shoulder of Venison:
Go home, go home, or if thou wilt disguise,
I'll help thee to a place to feed the dogs.
Ped. Or thou shalt be special Tailor to the Kings Mon-key,
'Tis a fine place, we cannot stay.
Ver. No money,
Nor no grace (Gentlemen?)
Ter. 'Tis too early Taylor.
The King has not broke his fast yet.
Ver. I shall look for ye
The next Terme, Gentlemen.
Ped. Thou shalt not misse us:
Prethee provide some clothes, and dost thou hear Vertigo,
Commend me to thy wife: I want some shirts too.
Ver. I have Chambers for ye all.
Lif. They are too musty,
When they are cleer wee'l come.
Ver. I must be patient
And provident, I shall never get home els. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Otrante and Florimell.

Otr. Prethee be wiser wench, thou canst not scape me,
Let me with love and gentlenesse enjoy that
That may be still preserv'd with love, and long'd for,
If violence lay rough hold, I shall hate thee,
And after I have enjoyd thy Maiden-head,
Thou wilt appear so stale and ugly to me
I shall despise thee, cast thee off.
Flor. I pray ye, Sir,
Begin it now, and open your dores to me,
I do confesse I am ugly; Let me go, Sir:
A Gipsey-girl: Why would your Lordship touch me?
Fye, 'tis not noble: I am homely bred,
Course, and unfit for you: why do you flatter me?
There be young Ladies, many that will love ye,
That will dote on ye: you are a handsome Gentleman,
What will they say when once they know your quality?
A Lord, a Miller? take your Teal-dish with ye:
You that can deal with Gudgins, and course floure,
'Tis pitie you should taste what manchet means:
Is this fit Sir, for your repute and honour?
Otr. I'll love thee still.
Flo. You cannot, there's no sympathy
Between our births, our breeding, arts, conditions,
And where these are at difference, there's no liking:
This houre it may be I seem handsom to you,
And you are taken with variety
More then with beauty: to morrow when you have enjoy'd me,
Your heate and lust asswag'd, and come to examine Out of cold and penitent condition (with,
What you have done, whom you have shar'd your love
Made partner of your bed, how it will vex ye,
How you will curse the devil that betrayd ye:
And what shall become of me then?
Otr. Wilt thou hear me?
Flo. As hastie as you were, then to enjoy me,
As precious as this beauty shew'd unto ye,
You'll kick me out of dores, you will whore and ban me:
And if I prove with child with your fair issue,
Give me a pension of five pound a yeer
To breed your heir withall, and so good speed me.
Otr. I'll keep thee like a woman.
Flo. I'll keep my self Sir,
Keep my self honest Sir; there's the brave keeping:
If you will marry me.
Otr. Alas poor Florimell.
Flo. I do confesse I am too course and base Sir
To be your wife, and it is fit you scorn me,
Yet such as I have crown'd the lives of great ones:
To be your whore, I am sure I am too worthy,
(For by my troth Sir, I am truly honest)
And that's an honour equal to your greatnes.
Otr. I'll give thee what thou wilt.
Flo. Tempt me no more then:
Give me that peace, and then you give abundance,
I know ye do but try me, ye are noble,
All these are but to try my modestie,
If you should find me easie, and once coming,
I see your eies already how they would fright me:
I see your honest heart how it would swell
And burst it self into a grief against me:
Your tongue in noble anger, now, even now Sir,
Ready to rip my loose thoughts to the bottom,
And lay my shame unto my self, wide open:
You are a noble Lord: you pity poor maids,
The people are mistaken in your courses:
You, like a father, try 'em to the uttermost,
As they do gold: you purge the drosse from them,
And make them shine.
Otr. This cunning cannot help ye:
I love ye to enjoy ye: I have stolne ye
To enjoy ye now, not to be fool'd with circumstance, Yeeld willingly, or else.
Flo. What?
Otr. I will force ye.
I will not be delay'd, a poor base wench
That I in curtesie make offer to,
Argue with me?
Flo. Do not, you will lose your labour,
Do not (my Lord) it will become ye poorly
Your curtesie may do much on my nature,
For I am kind as you are, and as tender:
If you compell, I have my strengths to fly to,
My honest thoughts, and those are guards about me:
I can cry too, and noise enough I dare make,
And I have curses, that will call down thunder,
For all I am a poor wench, heaven will hear me:
My body you may force, but my will never:
And be sure I do not live if you do force me,
Or have no tongue to tell your beastly Story,
For if I have, and if there be a Justice.
Otr. Pray ye go in here: I'll calme my self for this time.

And

And be your friend again.
Flo. I am commanded. Exit.
Otr. You cannot ſcape me, yet I muſt enjoy ye,
I'll lie with thy wit, though I miſſe thy honeſty:
Is this a wench for a Boors hungry boſom?
A morſel for a Peaſants baſe embraces?
And muſt I ſtarve, and the meat in my mouth?
I'll none of that. Enter Geraſto.
Ger. How now my Lord, how ſped ye?
Have ye done the deed?
Otr. No, pox upon't, ſhe is honeſt.
Ger. Honeſt? what's that? you take her bare deniall,
Was there ever wench brought up in a mill, and honeſt?
That were a wonder worth a Chronicle,
Is your belief ſo large? what did ſhe ſay to ye?
Otr. She ſaid her honeſty was all her dowry,
And preach'd unto me, how unfit, and homely,
Nay how diſhonourable it would ſeem in me
To act my will; popt me i'th mouth with modeſtie.
Ger. What an impudent Queen was that? that's their trick ever.
Otr. And then diſcours'd to me very learnedly
What fame and loud opinion would tell of me:
A wife ſhe touch'd at.
Ger. Out upon her Varlet.
Was ſhe ſo bold? theſe home-ſpun things are devils,
They'll tell ye a thouſand lies, if you'll beleeve 'em;
And ſtand upon their honours like great Ladies,
They'll ſpeak unhappily too: good words to cozen ye,
And outwardly ſeem Saints: they'll cry down-right alſo,
But 'tis for anger that you do not cruſh 'em.
Did ſhe not talk of being with child?
Otr. She toucht at it,
Ger. The trick of an arrant whore to milk your Lordſhip
And then a penſion nam'd?
Otr. No, no, ſhe ſcorn'd it:
I offer'd any thing, but ſhe refus'd all,
Refus'd it with a confident hate.
Ger. You thought ſo,
You ſhould have taken her then, turn'd her, and tew'd her
I'th' ſtrength of all her reſolution, flattered her,
And ſhak't her ſtubborn will: ſhe would have thank'd ye,
She would have lov'd ye infinitely, they muſt ſeem modeſt,
It is their parts: if you had plaid your part Sir.
And handled her as men do unmand Hawks,
Caſt her, and malde her up in good clean linnen:
And there have coyed her, you had caught her heart-ſtrings
Theſe tough Virginities they blow like white thornes
In Stormes and Tempeſts.
Otr. She is beyond all this,
As cold, and harden'd, as the Virgin Cryſtal.
Ger. Oh force her, force her, Sir, ſhe longs to be raviſhd
Some have no pleaſure but in violence;
To be torne in pieces is their paradiſe:
'Tis ordinary in our Country, Sir, to raviſh all
They will not give a penny for their ſport
Unleſſe they be put to it, and terribly,
And then they ſwear they'll hang the man comes neer 'em,
And ſwear it on his lips too.
Otr. No, no forcing,
I have an other courſe, and I will follow it,
I command you, and do you command your fellows,
That when you ſee her next, diſgrace, and ſcorn her,
Ile ſeem to put her out o'th' doors o'th' ſodain
And leave her to conjecture, then ſeize on her Away, be ready ſtraight.
Ger. We ſhall not fail, Sir. Exit.
Otr. Florimell.

Enter Florimell.

Flo. My Lord.
Otr. I am ſure you have now conſider'd
And like a wiſe wench weigh'd a friends diſpleaſure,
Repented your prowd thoughts, and caſt your ſcorn off.
Flo. My Lord, I am not proud, I was never beautifull.
Nor ſcorn I any thing that's juſt and honeſt.
Otr. Come, to be ſhort, can ye love yet? you told me
Kindnes would far compell ye: I am kind to ye,
And mean to exceed that way.
Flo. I told ye too, Sir,
As far as it agreed with modeſtie,
With honour, and with honeſty I would yeeld to yee:
Good my Lord, take ſome other Theam: for Love,
Alas, I never knew yet what it meant,
And on the ſudden Sir, to run through volumes
Of his moſt myſtick art, 'tis moſt impoſſible;
Nay, to begin with luſt, which is an Herieſie,
A foul one too; to learn that in my childhood?
O good my Lord.
Otr. You will not out of this ſong,
Your modeſtie, and honeſtie, is that all?
I will not force ye.
Flo. Ye are too noble, Sir.
Otr. Nor play the childiſh fool, and marry ye,
I am yet not mad.
Flo. If ye did, men would imagine.
Otr. Nor will I woo ye at that infinite price
It may be you expect.
Flo. I expect your pardon,
And a diſcharge (my Lord) that's all I look for.
Otr. No, nor fall ſick for love.
Flo. Tis a healthful year Sir.
Otr. Look ye, I'l turn ye out o'doores, and ſcorn ye,
Flo. Thank ye my Lord.
Otr. A proud ſlight Peat I found ye,
A fool (it may be too.)
Flo. An honeſt woman,
Good my Lord think me.
Otr. And a baſe I leave ye,
So fare-ye-well. Exit.
Flo. Bleſſing attend your Lordſhip;
This is hot love, that vaniſheth like vapors;
His Ague's off, his burning fits are well quench'd,
I thank heaven for't: his men, they will not force me.

Enter Geraſto, and Servants.

Ger. What doſt thou ſtay for? doſt thou not know the way,
Thou baſe unprovident whore?
Flo. Good words, pray ye Gentlemen.
1 Ser. Has my Lord ſmoak'd ye over, good wife Miller?
Is your Mill broken that you ſtand ſo uſeleſſe?
2 Ser. An impudent Queen, upon my life ſhe is unwholſome;
Some baſe diſcarded thing my Lord has found her,
He would not have turnd her off o'th' ſudden elſe.
Ger. Now againſt every ſack (my honeſt ſweet-heart)
With every Sim and Sung.
Flo. I muſt be patient.
Ger. And every greaſie gueſt, and ſweaty Raſcall
For his Royal hire between his fingers, Gentlewoman.
1 Ser. I feare thou haſt given my Lord the—— thou damn'd thing.
2 Ser. I have ſeen her in the Stewes.
Ger. The knave her father

Was

Was Bawd to her there, and kept a Tipling house,
You must even to it again: a modest function.
Flo. If ye had honesty, ye would not use me
Thus basely wretchedly, though your Lord bid ye,
But he that knows.
Ger. Away thou carted impudence,
You meat for every man: a little meal
Flung in your face, makes ye appear so proud.
Flo. This is inhumane. Let these tears perswade you
If ye be men, to use a poor girle better:
I wrong not you, I am sure I call you Gentlemen.

Enter Otrante.

Otr. What busines is here? away, are not you gone yet?
Flo. My Lord, this is no: well: although you hate me,
For what I know not: to let your people wrong me,
Wrong me maliciously, and call me
Otr. Peace,
And mark me what we say advisedly;
Mark, as you love that that you call your credit;
Yeeld now, or you are undone: your good name's perish'd
Not all the world can buy your reputation;
Tis sunk for ever else, these peoples tongues will poison ye
Though you be white as innocence, they'll taint ye,
They will speak terrible and hideous things,
And people in this age are prone to credit,
They'll let fall nothing that may brand a woman,
Consider this, and then be wise and tremble:
Yeeld yet, and yet I'll save ye.
Flo. How?
Otr. I'll show ye,
Their mouthes I'll seal up, they shall speak no more
But what is honourable and honest of ye,
And Saintlike they shall worship ye: they are mine,
And what I charge 'em Florimell.
Flo. I am ruind,
Heaven will regard me yet, they are barbarous wretches:
Let me not fall (my Lord.)
Otr. You shall not Florimell:
Mark how I'll work your peace, and how I honour ye.
Who waits there? come all in.

Enter Geraſto and Servants.

Ger. Your pleasure Sir.
Otr. Who dare say this sweet beauty is not heavenly?
This virgin, the most pure, the most untainted,
The holiest thing?
Ger. We know it (my dear Lord)
We are her slaves: and that proud impudence
That dares disparage her, this sword (my Lord.)
1 Ser. They are rascals, base, the sons of common women
That wrong this vertue, or dare owne a thought
But fair and honourable of her: when we slight her,
Hang us, or cut's in pieces: let's tug i'th' Gallies.
2 Ser. Brand us for villains.
Flo. Why sure I dream: these are all Saints.
Otr. Go, and live all her slaves.
Ger. We are proud to do it. Exeunt.
Otr. What think ye now? am not I able Florimell
Yet to preserve ye?
Flo. I am bound to your Lordship,
Ye are all honour, and good my Lord but grant me
Untill to morrow leave to weigh my Fortunes,
I'll give you a free answer, perhaps a pleasing,
Indeed I'll do the best I can to satisfie ye.
Otr. Take your good time, this kisse, till then farewell, Sweet. Exeunt.

Actus quartus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Antonio, Martine, Buſtofa.

Mar. By all means discharge your follower.
Ant. If we can get him off: Sirrha Buſtofa.
Thou must needs run back.
Buſt. But I must not unlesse you send
A Bier, or a Lictor at my back, I do not use to run
From my friends.
Ant. Well, go will serve turne: I have forgot.
Buſt. What Sir,
Ant. See if I can think on't now.
Buſt. I know what 'tis now?
Ant. A Pistolet of that.
Buſt. Done, you have forgot a device to send me away,
You are going a smocking perhaps.
Mar. His owne, due, due i'faith Antonio,
The Pistolet's his owne.
Ant. I confesse it,
There 'tis: now if you could afford out of it
A reasonable excuse to mine Uncle.
Buſt. Yes, I can:
But an excuse will not serve your turn: it must be a lie,
A full lie, 'twill do no good else: if you'll go to
The price of that?
Ant. Is a lie dearer then an excuse?
Buſt. Oh, treble; this is the price of an excuse: but a lye is two more:
Look how many foyles go to a fair fall, so many excuses to
A full lye, and lesse cannot serve your turn, let any Tailor I'th' Towne make it.
Mar. Wie, 'tis reasonable, give him his price:
Let it be large enough now.
Buſt. I'll warrant you, cover him all over.
Ant. I would have proof of one now.
Buſt. What? scale my invention before hand? you shall pardon Me for that: well, I'll commend you to your Uncle, and Tell him you'll be at home at supper with him.
Ant. By no means, I cannot come to night (man)
Buſt. I know that too, you do not know a lye when you see it.
Mar. Remember it must stretch for all night.
Buſt. I shall want stuffe, I doubt 'twill come to the other Pistolet.
Ant. Well, lay out, you shall be no loser Sir.
Buſt. It must be faced, you know, there will be a yard of dissimulation
At least (City-measure) and cut upon an ustroth or two: Lyned
With Fables, that must needs be, cold weather's coming, if it had
A galloon of hypocrisie, 't would do well: and hooked
Together with a couple of conceits,
That's necessity; well, I'll bring in my
Bill: I'll warrant you as fair a lye by that time I have done
With it, as any gentleman i'th' Town can swear too: if he Would betray his Lord and Master. Exit.
Ant. So, so, this necessary trouble's over.
Mar. I would you had bought an excuse of him
Before he went: you'll want one for Ismenia.

In

Ant. Tush, there needs none, there's no suspition yet,
And I'll be arm'd before the next encounter,
In a fast tye with my fair Isabel.

Enter Bustofa.

Mar. Yes, you'll find your errand is before you now.

Bust. Oh Gentlemen, look to your selves, ye are Men of another world else: your enemies are upon you;
The old house of the Bellides will fall upon your heads:
Signior Lisauro.

Ant. Lisauro?

Bust. And Don what call you him? he's a Gentleman:
Yet he has but a Yeomans name,
Don Tarso, Tarso, and a dozen at their heels.

Ant. Lisauro, Tarso, nor a dozen more
Shall fright me from my ground, nor shun my path,
Let 'em come on in their ablest fury.

Mar. 'Tis worthily resolved: I'll stand by you Sir,
This way, I am thy true friend.

Bust. I'll be gone Sir, that one may live to tell what's become of you.
Put up, put up, will you never learn to know a lye
From an Esop's fables? there's a taste for you now. Exit.

Enter Ismenia and Aminta,

Mar. Look Sir, what time of day is it? (now,

Ant. I know not, my eies go false, I dare not trust 'em
I prethee tell me (Martin) if thou canst,
Is that Ismenia, or Isabella.

Mar. This is the Lady, forget not Isabella.

Ant. If this face may be borrowed and lent out,
If it can shift shoulders, and take other tyres,
So, 'tis mine where ere I find it

Ism. Be sudden: Exit Aminta.
I cannot hold out long.

Mar. Beleeve't she frowns.

Ant. Let it come, she cannot frown me off on't:
How prettily it woos me to come neerer?
How do you (Lady) since yesterdaies paine?
Were you not weary? of my faith.

Ism. I think you were.

Ant. What Lady?

Ism. Weary of your faith, 'tis a burthen
That men faint under, though they bear little of it.

Mar. So, this is to the purpose.

Ant. You came home
In a fair hour I hope? Enter Aminta.

Ism. From whence Sir?

Am. Sir, there's a Gentlewoman without desires to speak with you.

Ant. They were pretty homely toyes: but your presence
Made them illustrious.

Ism. My Cosen speaks to you.

Am. A Gentlewoman Sir, Isabella
She names her self.

Mar. So, so, it hits finely now.

Ant. Name your self how you please: speak what you I'll hear you cheerfully. (please,

Ism. You are not well,
Request her in: she may have more acquaintance
With his passions, and better cure for 'em.

Am. She's nice in that (Madam) poor soul it seems She's fearfull of your displeasure.

Ism. I'll quit her
From that presently, and bring her in my self. Exit.

Mar. How carelesly do you behave your self?
When you should call all your best faculties
To councell in you: how will you answer
The breach you made with fair Ismenia?
Have you forgot the retrograde vow you took
With her, that now is come in evidence?
You'll die upon your shame, you need no more
Enemies of the house, but the Lady now:
You shall have your dispatch.

Enter Ismenia like Juno.

Ant. Give me that face,
And I am satisfied upon whose shoulders
So ere it growes: Juno deliver us
Out of this amazement: Beseech you Goddesse
Tell us of our friends, how dos Ismenia?
And how does Isabella? both in good health
I hope, as you your self are.

Ism. I am at farthest
In my counterfeit: my Antonio
I have matter against you may need pardon,
As I must crave of you.

Ant. Observe you Sir,
What evidence is come against me? what think you?
The Hydra-headed Jury will say to't?

Mar. 'Tis I am foold,
My hopes are pour'd into the bottomles tube,
Tis labour for the house of Bellides:
I must not seem so yet: but in sooth (Lady)
Did you imagine your changeable face
Hid you from me? by this hand I knew you.

Ant. I went by the face: and by these eies I Might have been deceived.

Ism. You might indeed (Antonio)
For this Gentleman did vow to Isabella,
That he it was that lov'd Ismenia,
And not Antonio?

Mar. Good, and was not that
A manifest confession that I knew you?
I else had been unjust unto my friend:
Twas well remembred, there I found you out
And speak your conscience now.

Ant. But did he so protest?

Ism. Yes, I vow to you, had Antonio
Wedded Isabella, Ismenia
Had not been lost, there had been her lover.

Ant. Why much good do you friend, take her to you:
I crave but one, here have I my wish full,
I am glad we shall be so neer Neighbours.

Mar. Take both Sir, Juno to boote: three parts in one,
S. Hilarie blesse you, now oportunitie
Beware to meet with falshood, if thou canst
Shun it, my friends faith's turning from him.

Ism. Might I not justly accuse Antonio
For a love-wanderer? you know no other
But me, for another, and confesse troth now?

Ant. Here was my guide, where ere I find this face,
I am a Lover, marry, I must not misse
This freckle then, I have the number of 'em,
Nor this dimple: not a silk from this brow,
I carry the full Idea ever with me;
If Nature can so punctually parael,
I may be cozened.

Ism. Well, all this is even:
But now, to perfect all, our love must now
Come to our Enemies hands, where neither part
Will ever give consent to't.

Ant. Most certain:
For which reason it must not be put to 'em:
Have we not prevention in our owne hands.

Shall

Shall I walk by the tree? desire the fruit,
Yet be so nice to pull till I ask leave
Of the churlish Gardner, that will deny me?
Ism. O Antonio.
Ant. 'Tis manners to fall to
When grace is said.
Ism. That holy act 's to come.
Mar. You may ope an oyster or two before grace.
Ant. Are there not double vows, as valuable
And as well spoke as any Frier utters?
Heaven has heard all.
Ism. Yes: but staves the blessing,
Till all dues be done: heaven is not serv'd by halfs.
Wee shall have ne'r a fathers blessing here,
Let us not lose the better, from above.
Ant. You take up weapons of unequal force,
It shows you cowardly: heark in your ear.
Am. Have I lost all imployment? Would this proffer
Had been made to me, though I had paid it
With a reasonable pennance.
Mar. Have I past
All thy fore-lock (Time)? I'll stretch a long arm
But I'll catch hold again: Doe but look back
Over thy shoulder, and have a pull at thee.
Ism. I hear you (Sir) nor can I hear too much
While you speak well: You know th' accustom'd place
Of our night parley: if you can ascend,
The window shall receive you. You may finde there
A corrupted Church-man to bid you welcome.
Ant. I would meet no other man.
Ism. Aminta, you hear this.
Am. With joy (Madam) 'cause it pleases you.
It may be mine own case another time:
Now you go the right way: ask the Banes out,
Put it past father, or friends, to forbid it,
And then you 're sure. Sir, your Hymen Taper
I'll light up for you: the window shall show you
The way to Sestos.
Ant. I'll venture drowning.
Mar. The Simile holds not; 'tis hanging rather:
You must ascend your Castle by a ladder;
To the foot I'll bring you.
Ant. Leave mee to climb it.
Mar. If I do turn you off?
Ant. Till night fare-well:
Then better.
Ism. Best it should be;
But peevish hatred keeps back that degree. Exeunt.
Mar. I never look'd so smooth as now I purpose:
And then beware: Knave is at worst of knave
When he smiles best, and the most seems to save. Exit.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Julio.

Jul. My mind 's unquiet; while Antonio
My Nephew's abroad, my heart is not at home,
Only my fears stay with me; bad company;
But I cannot shift 'em off. This hatred
Betwixt the House of Bellides and us,
Is not fair war: 'tis civill, but uncivill.
We are neer neighbours, were of love as neer,
Till a crosse misconstruction ('twas no more
In conscience) put us so far asunder:
I would 'twere reconcil'd; it has lasted
Too many Sun-sets, if grace might moderate:
Man should not lose so many dayes of peace
To satisfie the anger of one minute.
I could repent it heartily. I sent
The knave to attend my Antonio too, Enter Bustofa.
Yet he returns no comfort to me neither.
Bust. No: I must not.
Jul. Hah; hee's come.
Bust. I must not: 'twill breake his heart to hear it.
Jul. How? there's bad tidings: I must obscure & hear it;
He will not tell mee for breaking of my heart,
'Tis half split already.
Bust. I have spi'd him: Now to knock down a Don with a lie, a silly harmlesse lie; 'twill be valiantly done, and nobly perhaps.
Jul. I cannot hear him now.
Bust. Oh the bloody dayes that wee live in; the envious, malitious, deadly dayes that we draw breath in!
Jul. Now I hear too loud.
Bust. The children that never shall be born may rue it; for men that are slain now might have liv'd to have got children, that might have curs'd their fathers.
Jul. Oh, my posterity is ruin'd.
Bust. Oh sweet Antonio.
Jul. Oh deer Antonio.
Bust. Yet it was nobly done of both parts: When hee and Lisauro met,
Jul. Oh, death has parted 'em.
Bust. Welcome my mortall foe (sayes one), Welcome my deadly enemy (sayes th'other:) off go their doublets, they in their shirts, and their swords stark naked; here lies Antonio, here lies Lisauro: hee comes upon him with an Embroccado, that hee puts by with a punta reversa; Lisauro recoils mee two paces and some six inches back, takes his career, and then, oh.
Jul. Oh.
Bust. Runs Antonio quite thorow,
Jul. Oh villain.
Bust. Quite thorow between the arme and the body: so yet he had no hurt at that bout.
Jul. Goodnesse be praised.
Bust. But then, at next encounter, he fetches me up Lisauro; Lisauro makes out a Long at him, which he thinking to be a Passado, Antonio's foot slipping: down: oh down.
Jul. O now thou art lost.
Bust. Oh, but the quality of the thing: both Gentlemen, both Spanish Christians, yet one man to shed
Jul. Say his enemies blood.
Bust. His hair may come by divers casualties, though he never go into the field with his foe: but a man to lose nine ounces and two drams of blood at one wound, thirteen and a scruple at another, and to live till he die in cold blood: yet the Surgeon (that cur'd him) said, if Pia-mater had not been perish'd, he had bin a lives man til this day.
Jul. There hee concludes he is gone.
Bust. But all this is nothing: now I come to the point.
Jul. I the point, that's deadly: the ancient blow
Over the buckler ne'r went half so deep.
Bust. Yet pitie bids mee keep in my charitie: for mee to pull an old mans ears from his head with telling of a Tale: oh fowle Tale! No, be silent Tale. Furthermore, there is the charge of Burial; every one will cry Blacks, Blacks, that had but the least finger dipt in his blood, though ten degrees remov'd when 'twas done. Moreover,

the

the Surgeon (that made an end of him) will be paid: Sugar-plums and ſweet breads; yet I ſay, the man may recover again, and die in his bed.

Jul. What motley ſtuffe is this? Sirrha, ſpeak truth
What hath befallen my deer Antonio?
Reſtrain your pity in concealing it;
Tell mee the danger full; take off your care
Of my receiving it: kill me that way,
I'll forgive my death: what thou keepſt back from truth
Thou ſhalt ſpeak in pain; doe not look to find
A limb in his right place, a bone unbroke,
Nor ſo much fleſh unbroil'd of all that mountain
As a worm might ſup on; diſpatch, or be diſpatch'd.

Buſt. Alas Sir, I know nothing, but that Anton. is a man of Gods making to this hour, 'tis not two ſince I left him ſo.

Jul. Where didſt thou leave him? (you.

Buſt. In the ſame clothes he had on when he went from

Jul. Does he live?

Buſt. I ſaw him drink.

Jul. Is he not wounded?

Buſt. He may have a cut i'th' leg by this time; for Don Martin and he were at whole ſlaihes.

Jul. Met he not with Liſauro?

Buſt. I doe not know her.

Jul. Her? Liſauro is a man, as he is.

Buſt. I ſaw ne'r a man like him.

Jul. Didſt thou not diſcourſe a fight betwixt Ant. & Liſ.?

Buſt. I to my ſelf, I hope a man may give himſelf the lie if it pleaſe him.

Jul. Didſt thou lie then?

Buſt. As ſure as you live now.

Jul. I live the happier by it: when will he return?

Buſt. That he ſent me to tel you, within theſe ten daies at Jul. Ten daies? he's not wont to be abſent two. (fartheſt.

Buſt. Nor I think he wil not: he ſaid he would be at home to morrow; but I love to ſpeak within my compaſſe.

Jul. You ſhall ſpeak within mine Sir, now. Within there:

Enter Servants.

Take this fellow into cuſtodie, keep him ſafe
I charge you.

Buſt. Saf? do you hear? take notice what plight you find me in, if there want but a collop or a ſteak o'me, look to't.

Jul. If my nephew return not in his health to morrow,
Thou goeſt to th' Rack.

Buſt. Let me go to th' manger firſt; I had rather eat oats then hay. Exeunt. Enter Bellides with a Letter.

Bel. By your leave, Sir.

Jul. For ought I know yet, you are welcom Sir. (eaſie,

Bel. Read that, and tell me ſo: or if thy ſpectacles be not Keep thy noſe unſaddled, and ope thine ears;
I can ſpeak thee the contents, I made 'em;
'Tis a challenge, a fair one, I'll maintain 't:
I ſcorn to hire my Second to deliver 't,
I bring 't my ſelf: Doſt know me, Julio?

Jul. Bellides?

Bel. Yes: Is not thine hair on end now?

Jul. Som what amaz'd at thy raſh hardines;
How durſt thou come ſo neer thine enemie?

Bel. Durſt?
I dare come neerer: thou'rt a fool, Julio.

Jul. Take it home to thee with a knave to boot.

Bel. Knave to thy teeth again: and all that's quit:
Give me not a fool more then I give thee,
Or if thou doſt, look to hear on't again.

Jul. What an encounter's this?

Bel. A noble one:
My hand is to my words, thou haſt it there,
There I do challenge thee, if thou dar'ſt be Good friends with me; or I'll proclaim thee coward.

Jul. Be friends with thee?

Bel. I'll ſhew thee reaſons for't:
A pair of old coxcombs (now wee go together)
Such as ſhould ſtand examples of diſcretion,
The rules of Grammar to unwilling youth
To take out leſſons by; we that ſhould check
And quench the raging fire in others bloods,
We ſtrike the baſtell to deſtruction?
Read 'em the black art? and make 'em beleeve
It is divinitie? Heathens, are we not?
Speak thy conſcience, how haſt thou ſlept this month,
Since this Fiend haunted us?

Jul. Sure, ſome good Angell
Was with us both laſt night: ſpeak thou truth now,
Was it not laſt nights motion?

Bel. Doſt not think
I would not lay hold of it at firſt proffer?
Should I ne'r ſleep again?

Jul. Take not all from me;
I'll tell the doctrine of my viſion.
Say that Antonio (beſt of thy blood)
Or any one, the leaſt allyed to thee,
Should be the prey unto Liſauro's ſword,
Or any of the houſe of Bellides?

Bel. Mine was the juſt inverſion: on, on.

Jul. How would thine eys have emptied thee in ſorrow,
And left the condiment of Nature drie?
Thy hands have turn'd rebellious to the balls,
And broke the glaſſes, with thine own curſes
Have torn thy ſoul, left thee a Statue
To propagate thy next poſterity.

Bel. Yes, and thou canſer? ſo it ſaid to me,
They fight but your miſchiefs: the yong men were friends,
As is the life and blood congulate
And curded in one body; but this is yours,
An inheritance that you have gatherd for 'em,
A Legacie of blood, to kill each other Throughout your Generations. Was't not ſo?

Jul. Word for word.

Bel. Nay, I can go farther yet.

Jul. 'Tis far enough; Let us attone it here.
And in a reconciled circle fold
Our friendſhip new again.

Bel. The ſigne's in Gemini,
An auſpicious houſe, 't has joyn'd both ours again.

Jul. You cannot proclaim me coward now, Don Bellides.

Bel. No: thou 'rt a valiant fellow: ſo am I:
I'll fight with thee at this hug, to the laſt leg
I have to ſtand on, or breath or life left.

Jul. This is the ſalt unto humanity,
And keeps it ſweet.

Bel. Love! oh life ſtinks without it.
I can tell you news.

Jul. Good has long been wanting.

Bel. I do ſuſpect, and I have ſome proof on't,
(So far as a Love-Epiſtle comes to)
That Antonio (your nephew) and my daughter
Iſmenia are very good friends before us.

Jul. That were a double wall about our houſes,
Which I could wiſh were builded.

Bel. I had it
From Antonio's Intimate, Don Martin:
And yet (me thought) it was no friendly part

To show it me.
Jul. Perhaps 't was his consent:
Lovers have policies as well as Statesmen:
They look not alwaies at the mark they aime at.
Bel. Wee'll take up cudgels, and have one bowt with'em,
They shall know nothing of this union:
And till they find themselves most desperate,
Succour shall never see'em.
Jul. I'll take your part Sir.
Bel. It grows late; there's a happy day past us.
Jul. The example I hope to all behind it. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Aminta (above) with a Taper.
Am. Stand fair, light of Love, which epithite and place
Adds to thee honour, to me it would be shame,
We must be weight in love, no grain too light;
Thou art the Land-mark, but if love be blind,
(As many that can see have so reported)
What benefit canst thou be to his darkneſse?
Love is a Jewel (some say) inestimable,
But hung at the eare, deprives our owne sight,
And so it shines to others, not our selves.
I speak my skill, I have onely heard on't,
But I could wish a neerer document,
Alas, the ignorant desire to know:
Some say Love's but a toy, and with a but.
Now me thinks I should love it ne'r the worse,
A toy is harmeleſse sure, and may be plaid with,
It seldom goes without his adjunct, pretty,
A pretty toy we say, 'tis meeter to joy too.
Well, here may be a mad night yet for all this,
Here's a Priest ready, and a Lady ready:
A chamber ready, and a bed ready,
'Tis then but making unready, and that's soone done:
My Lady is my Gosen; I, my self,
Which is neerest then? My desires are mine,
Say they be hers too, is't a hanging matter?
It may be ventur'd in a worser cause,
I must go question with my conscience:
I have the word; Centinel, do thou stand,
Thou shalt not need to call, I'll be at hand. Exit.
Enter Antonio and Martin.
Ant. Are we not dog'd behind us, think'st thou friend?
Mar. I heard not one bark, Sir.
Ant. There are that bite
And bark not (man) me-thought I spy'd two fellows
That through two streets together walk'd aloof,
And wore their eies suspiciously upon us.
Mar. Your Jealousie, nothing else; or such perhaps
As are afraid as much of us, who knows
But about the like busines? but for your fears sake
I'll advise and entreat one curtesie.
Ant. What's that friend?
Mar. I will not be denyed, Sir,
Change your upper garments with me.
Ant. It needs not.
Mar. I think so too, but I will have it so,
If you dare trust me with the better Sir.
Ant. Nay then.
Mar. If there should be danger towards,
There will be the main mark I'm sure.
Ant. Here thou tak'st from me.
Mar. Tush, the General
Must be safe, how ere the Battel goes:
See you the Beacon yonder?
Ant. Yes, we are neer shore.
Enter 2. Gentlemen with weapons drawn, they set upon Martin: Antonio pursues them out in rescue of Martin.
Mar. Come, Land, land, you must clamber by the cliffe,
Here 're no staires to rise by.
Ant. I, are you there? fight and Exeunt.
Enter Aminta above, and Martin return'd again, ascends.
Am. Antonio?
Mar. Yes Ismenia.
Am. Thine owne.
Mar. Quench the light, thine eies are guides illustrious.
Am. 'Tis necessary. Exeunt.
Enter Antonio.
Mar. Your legs have sav'd your lives, who ere you are,
Friend. Martin? where art thou? not hurt I hope:
Sure I was fartheſt in the pursuit of 'em:
My pleasures are forgotten through my fears:
The lights extinct, it was discreetly done:
They could not but have notice of the broile,
And fearing that might call up company,
Have carefully prevented, and closed up:
I do commend the heed; oh, but my friend,
I fear his hurt: friend? friend? it cannot be
So mortal, that I should lose thee quite, friend?
A groan, any thing that may discover thee:
Thou art not sunk so far, but I might hear thee:
I'll lay mine ear as low as thou canst fall:
Friend, Don Martin, I must answer for thee,
'Twas in my cause thou fell'st, if thou beest downe,
Such dangers stand betwixt us and our joyes,
That should we forethink ere we undertake,
Wee'ld sit at home, and save. What a night's here!
Purpos'd for so much joy, and now dispos'd
To so much wretchednes? I shall not rest in't:
If I had all my pleasures there within,
I should not entertain'em with a smile.
Good night to you: Mine will be black and sad,
A friend cannot, a woman may be bad. Exit.

Actus Quintus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Ismenia and Aminta.
Ism. O thou false,
Am. Do your daringst, he's mine owne,
Soul and body mine, church and chamber mine,
Totally mine.
Ism. Darst thou face thy falshood?
Am. Shall I not give a welcom to my wishes
Come home so sweetly: farewell your company
Till you be calmer woman. Exit.
Ism. Oh what a heap
Of misery has one night brought with it. Ent. Ant.
Ant. Where is he? do you turn your shame from me?
You'r a blind Adultresse, you know you are.
Ism. How's that Antonio?
Ant. Till I have vengeance,
Your sin's not pardonable: I'll have him,
If hell hide him not: y'have had your last of him. Exit.
Ism. What did he speak? I understood him not,
He calld me a foul name, it was not mine,
He took me for another sure.
Bel. Hah,

Enter Bellidet.

Bel. Hah? are you there?
Where's your ſweet heart? I have found you Traytor
To my houſe: wilt league with mine enemie?
You'll ſhed his blood, you'll ſay: hah? will you ſo?
And fight with your heels upwards? No Minion,
I have a husband for you, ſince y'are ſo rankt,
And ſuch a husband as thou ſhalt like him,
Whether thou wilt or no: Antonio?

Iſm. It thunders with the ſtorm now.

Bel. And to night
I'll have it diſpatch'd: I'll make it ſure, I,
By to morrow this time thy Maiden-head
Shall not be worth a Chicken, if it were Knockt at an out-cry: go, I'll ha'ye before me:
Shough, ſhough, up to your coop, pery Hen.

Iſm. Then I'll try my wings. Exit.

Bel. I, are you good at that? ſtop, ſtop thief, ſtop there. Exit.

Scæna ſecunda.

Enter Otrante and Florimell ſinging.

1. Song.

Flo. Now having leiſure, and a happy wind,
Thou maiſt at pleaſure cauſe the ſtones to grind,
Sayles ſpread, and griſt here ready to be ground,
Fie, ſtand not idely, but let the Mill go round.

Otr. Why doſt thou ſing and dance thus? why ſo merry?
Why doſt thou look ſo wantonly upon me?
And kiſſe my hands?

Flo. If I were high enough,
I would kiſſe your lips too.

Otr. Do, this is ſome kindnes,
This taſtes of willingneſſe, nay, you may kiſſe
Still, but why o'th' ſudden now does the fitt take ye,
Unoffered, or uncompell'd? why theſe ſweet curteſies?
Even now you would have bluſh'd to death to kiſſe thus:
Prethee let me be prepar'd to meet thy kindnes,
I ſhall be unfurniſh'd elſe to hold thee play, wench:
Stay now a little, and delay your bleſſings:
If this be love, me-thinks it is too violent:
If you repent you of your ſtrictneſſe to me,
It is ſo ſudden, it wants circumſtance.

Flo. Fy, how dull? 2. Song.

How long ſhall I pine for love?
how long ſhall I ſue in vaine?
How long like the Turtle-Dove
ſhall I heavily thus complain?
Shall the ſayles of my love ſtand ſtill?
Shall the griſts of my hopes be unground?
Oh fie, oh fie, oh fie,
let the Mill, let the Mill go round.

Otr. Prethee be calme a little,
Thou mak'ſt me wonder, thou that wert ſo ſtrange,
And read ſuch pious rules to my behaviour
But yeſternight: thou that wert made of modeſtie,
Shouldſt in a few ſhort minutes turn thus deſperate.

Flo. You are too cold.

Otr. I do confeſſe I freeze now,
I am another thing all over me:
It is my part to woo, not to be courted:
Unfold this Riddle, 'tis to me a wonder,
That now o'th' inſtant ere I can expect,
Ere I can turn my thoughts, and think upon
A ſeperation of your honeſt carriage
From the deſires of youth, thus wantonly,
Thus beyond expectation.

Flo. I will tell ye,
And tell ye ſeriouſly, why I appear thus,
To hold ye no more ignorant and blinded,
I have no modeſtie, I am truly wanton:
I am that you look for Sir; now come up roundly:
If my ſtrict face and counterfeited ſtaidneſſe
Could have won on ye, I had caught ye that way, (ye.
And you ſhould ne'r have come to have known who hurt
Prethee (ſweet Count) be more familiar with me.
How ever we are open in our natures,
And apt to more deſires then you dare meet with,
Yet we affect to lay the gloſſe of good on 't:
I ſaw you toucht not at the baite of chaſtity,
And that it grew diſtaſtefull to your palate
To appear ſo holy, therefore I take my true ſhape:
Is your bed ready Sir? you ſhall quickly find me.

3. Song. On the bed Ile throw thee, throw thee downe;
Down being laid, ſhall we be afraid to try the rights that belong to love?
No, no, there Ile woo thee with a Crown, crown our deſires, kindle the fires,
when love requires we ſhould wanton prove:
We'll kiſſe, we'll ſport, we'll laugh, we'll play,
If thou com'ſt ſhort, for thee Ile ſtay,
If thou unskilfull art the ground,
Ile kindly teach, we'll have the Mill go round.

Otr. Are ye no maid?

Flo. Alas (my Lord) no certain:
I am ſorry you are ſo innocent to think ſo,
Is this an age for ſilly maids to thrive in?
It is ſo long too ſince I loſt it Sir,
That I have no belief I ever was one:
What ſhould you do with maiden-heads? you hate 'em,
They are peeviſh pettiſh things, that hold no game up,
No pleaſure neither, they are ſport for Surgeons:
I'll warrant you I'll fit you beyond Maiden-head:
A fair and eaſie way men travel right in,
And with delight, diſcourſe, and twenty pleaſures,
They enjoy their journey; mad men creep through hedges.

Otr. I am metamorphoſed: why do you appeare,
I conjure ye, beyond belief thus wanton?

Flo. Becauſe I would give ye
Pleaſure beyond belief. 4. Song.

Think me ſtill in my Fathers Mill, where I have oft been found-a Thrown on my back, on a well-fill'd ſack, while the Mill has ſtill gone round-a:
Prethee ſirrha try thy ſkill,
and again let the mill go round-a.

Otr. Then you have traded?

Flo. Traded? how ſhould I know elſe how to live Sir,
And how to ſatiſfie ſuch Lords as you are,
Our beſt gueſts, and our richeſt?

Otr. How I ſhake now?
You take no baſe men?

Flo. Any that will offer,
All manner of men, and all Religions Sir,
We touch at in our time: all States and Ages,
We exempt none. 5. Song.

The young one, the old one, the fearful, the bold one,
the Lame one, though never ſo unſound,
The Jew or the Turk, have leave for to work,
the whileſt that the Mill goes round.

Otr. You are a common thing then.
Flo. No matter since you have your private pleasure,
And have it by an Artist excellent,
Whether I am thus, or thus, your men can tell ye.
Otr. My men? Defend me, how I freeze together,
And am on ice? do I bite at such an Orange
After my men? I am preferr'd.
Flo. Why stay ye?
Why do we talk my Lord, and lose our time?
Pleasure was made for lips, and sweet embraces,
Let Lawyers use their tongues: pardon me Modestie,
This desperate way must help, or I am miserable.
Otr. She turns, and wipes her face, she weeps for certain,
Some new way now, she cannot be thus beastly,
She is too excellent fair to be thus impudent:
She knows the elements of common looseness,
The art of lewdness: that, that, that, how now, Sir.

Enter a servant.

Ser. The King (and't please your Lordship) is alighted Close at the gate.
Otr. The King?
Ser. And calls for ye Sir.
Means to break-fast here too.
Flo. Then I am happy.
Otr. Stolne so suddenly? go lock her up,
Lock her up where the Courtiers may not see her,
Lock her up closely, sirrha, in my closet.
Ser. I will (my Lord) what does she yeeld yet? Exit.
Otr. Peace:
She is either a damnd divel, or an Angel,
No noise (upon your life Dame) but all silence.

Enter King, Lords, Vertigo, Leisure, Torso.

Otr. Your Majesty heaps too much honour on me,
With such delight to view each several corner
Of a rude pile: there's no proportion in't, Sir.
Phil. Me-thinks 'tis handsom, and the rooms along
Are neat and well contriv'd: the Gallery
Stands pleasantly and sweet: what rooms are these?
Otr. They are sluttish ones.
Phil. Nay, I must see.
Otr. Pray ye do Sir,
They are lodging-chambers over a homely garden.
Phil. Fit still, and handsom; very well: and those?
Otr. Those lead to the other side o'th' house, and't like ye.
Phil. Let me see those.
Otr. Ye may, the dores are open.
What should this view mean? I am half suspicious.
Phil. This little Room?
Otr. Tis meanest place for trash Sir,
For rubbish of the house.
Phil. I would see this too:
I will see all.
Otr. I beseech your Majesty,
The savour of it, and the course appearance. (with it,
Phil. 'Tis not so bad, you would not offend your house
Come, let me see.
Otr. Faith Sir,
Phil. I'faith I will see.
Otr. My Groom has the key Sir, and 'tis ten to one Phil. But I will see it: force the lock (my Lords)
There be smithes enough to mend it: I perceive
You keep some rare things here, you would not show Sir.

Florimell discovered.

Ter. Here's a fair maid indeed.
Phil. By my faith is she
A handsom girle: come forward, do not fear wench.
I marry, here's a treasure worth concealing:
Call in the Miller.
Otr. Then I am discovered,
I confesse all before the Miller comes Sir,
'Twas but intention, from all act I am cleer yet.

Enter Franio.

Phil. Is this your daughter?
Fra. Yes, and 't please your Highnesse.
This is the shape of her, for her substance Sir,
Whether she be now honourable or dishonourable:
Whether she be a white-rose, or a canker, is the question:
I thank my Lord, he made bold with my Philly,
If she be for your pace, you had best preserve her Sir,
She is tender mouthed, let her be broken handsomly,
Maid, were you stolne?
Flo. I went not willingly,
And 't please your Grace, I was never bred so boldly.
Phil. How has he us'd ye?
Flo. Yet Sir, very nobly.
Phil. Be sure ye tell truth, and be sure (my Lord)
You have not wronged her: if ye have, I tell ye
You have lost me, and your self too: speak again (wench)
Flo. He has not wrong'd me, Sir; I am yet a maid:
By all that's white and innocent, I am Sir,
Onely I suffer'd under strong temptations
The heat of youth; but heaven deliverd me.
My Lord, I am no whore, for all I faign'd it,
And faign'd it cunningly, and made ye loath me:
'Twas time to out-do you: I had been robd else,
I had been miserable, but I forgive ye.
Phil. What recompence for this?
Otr. A great one Sir,
First a repentance, and a hearty one.
Forgive me Sweet.
Flo. I do my Lord.
Otr. I thank ye;
The next take this, and these: all I have Florimell.
Flo. No good my Lord, these often corrupt maidens:
I dare not touch at these; they are lime for Virgins;
But if you'll give me.
Otr. Any thing in my power.
Or in my purchase.
Flo. Take heed (noble Sir)
You'll make me a bold asker.
Otr. Aske me freely.
Flo. Ask you? I do ask you, and I deserve ye,
I have kept ye from a crying sin would damne ye
To Men and Time: I have preserv'd your credit,
That would have died to all posterity:
Curses of maids shall never now afflict ye,
Nor Parents bitter tears make your name barren:
If he deserves well that redeems his Country,
And as a Patriot be remembred nobly,
Nay, set the highest: may not I be worthy
To be your friend, that have preserv'd your honor?
Otr. You are, and thus I take ye: thus I seal ye Mine owne, and onely mine.
Phil. Count, she deserves ye,
And let it be my happines to give ye,
I have given a vertuous maid, now I dare say it,
'Tis more then blood; I'll pay her portion Sir,
And't shall be worthy you.
Fra. I'll sell my Mill,
I'll pay some too: I'll pay the Fidlers,
And we'll have all i'th' Country at this wedding,
Pray let me give her too, here my Lord take her,

Take

Take her with all my heart, and kisse her freely,
Would I could give you all this hand has stolne too,
In portion with her, 'twould make her a little whiter.
The wind blowes fair now, get me a young Miller.
Ver. Shee must have new clothes.
Tir. Yes.
Ver. Yes marry must she.
If't please ye (Madam) let me see the state of you body.
I'll fit you instantly.
Phil. Art not thou gone yet? (now,
Ver. And 't please your Grace, a gown, a handsome gown
An orient gown.
Phil. Nay, take thy pleasure of her.
Ver. Of cloth of Tissew I can fit ye (Madam)
My Lords, stand out o'th' light, a curious body,
The neatest body in Spain this day: w^th^ embroidred flowrs,
A clinquant Petticoat of some rich stuffe,
To catch the eye: I have a thousand fashions.
O sleeve, O sleeve: I'll study all night (Madam)
To magnifie your sleeve.
Otr. Do, superstitious Tailor,
When yee have more time.
Flo. Make me no more then woman,
And I am thine.
Otr. Sir, haply my Wardrobe with your help
May fit her instantly: will you try her?
Ver. If I fit her not, your Wardrobe cannot.
But if the fashion be not there, you marre her.
Enter Antonio, Constable, Officers.
Ant. Is my offence so great, ere I be convict,
To be torn with Rascals? If it be Law,
Let 'm be wild horses, rather then these.
Phil. What's that? (Grace.
Con. This is a man suspected of murder, if it please your Phil. It pleases me not (friend). But who suspects him?
Const. We that are your Highnes extraordinary officers,
We that have taken our oaths to maintain you in peace.
Phil. 'Twill be a great charge to you.
Const. 'Tis a great charge indeed; but then we call our neighbours to help us. This Gentleman and another were fallen out (yet that's more then I am able to say, for I heard no words between 'em, but what their weapons spoke, Clash, and Clatter) which we seeing, came with our Bils of government, and first knock'd down their weapons, and then the men.
Phil. And this you did to keep the peace?
Const. Yes, and 't like your Grace, we knock'd 'em down to keep the peace: this we laid hold on, the other we set in the stocks. That I could do by mine own power, without your Majestie. Enter Aminta.
Phil. How so, Sir?
Const. I am a Shoo-maker by my Trade.
Am. Oh my husband!
Why stands my husband as a man endanger'd?
Restore him me, as you are mercifull,
I'll answer for him.
Ant. What woman's this? what husband? hold thy bawling,
I know thee for no wife. (
Am. You married me last night.
Ant. Thou lyest: I neither was in Church nor house
Last night, nor saw I thee: a thing that was my friend,
I scorne to name now, was with Ismenia,
Like a thief, and there he violated
A sacred truft. This thou maist know (Aminta).
Am. Are not you her?
Ant. No; nor a friend of his:
Would I had kill'd him: I hope I have.
Am. That was my husband (Royall Sir) that man,
That excellent man. Enter Bellides.
Ant. That villain, that theefe.
Bel. Have I caught you Sir? well overtaken.
This is mine enemie: pardon (my Soveraigne).
Phil. Good charitie, to crave pardon for your enemie.
Bel. Mine own pardon (Sir) for my joyes rudenesse:
In what place better could I meet my foe,
And both of us so well provided too?
Hee with some black blood-thirstie crime upon him,
That (ere the horse-leech burst) will suck him dry:
I with a second accusation,
Enough to break his neck, if need should be,
And then to have even Justice self to right us:
How should I make my joyes a little civill,
They might not keep this noyse?
Ant. Here is some hope.
Should the ax be dull, the halter's preparing.
Phil. What's your accusation, Sir? We have heard the former. Enter Julio.
Bel. Mine (My Lord)? a strong one.
Jul. A false one, Sir.
At least malicious: an evidence
Of hatred and despight: He would accuse
My poor kinsman of that he never dream'd of,
Nor waking saw; the stealing of his daughter,
She whom, I know, he would not look upon.
Speak Antonio, Didst thou ever see her?
Ant. Yes Sir, I have seen her.
Bel. Ah ha, friend Julio.
Jul. He might, but how? with an unheedfull eye,
An accidentall view, as men see multitudes
That the next day dare not precisely say
They saw that face, or that amongst 'm all,
Didst thou so look on her?
Bel. Guilty, guilty:
His looks hang themselves.
Phil. Your patience (Gentleman).
I pray you tell me if I be in errour,
I may speak often when I should but hear:
This is some Show you would present us with,
And I do interrupt it: Pray you speak,
(It seems no more) Is 't any thing but a Show?
Bel. My Lord, this Gentlewoman can show you all,
So could my daughter too, if shee were here;
By this time they are both immodest enough:
Shee's fled me, and I accuse this thief for 't.
Don Martin, his own friend 's my testimony:
A practis'd night-work.
Phil. That Martin's the other
In your custodie; he was forgotten:
Fetch him hither.
Const. Wee'll bring the Stocks and all else, and't please your Grace. Enter Buttolfo and Ismenia.
Am. That man's my husband certain, in stead of this:
Both would have deceiv'd, and both begull'd.
Buf. Soh hoh, Miller, Miller, look out Miller: is there nere a Miller amongst you here, Gentlemen?
Tir. Yes Sir, here is a Miller amongst Gentlemen,
A Gentleman Miller.
Buf. I should not be far off then; there went but a pair of sheers and a bodkin between us. Will you to worke Miller? Here's a maid has a sack full of newes for you: shall your stones walk? will you grind Miller?
Phil. This your son, Frank?

Fra. My

Fra. My ungratious, my disobedient,
My unnaturall, my rebell son (my Lord).
Bust. Fie, your hopper runs over, Miller.
Fra. This villain (of my own flesh & blood) was accessary
To the stealing of my daughter.
Bust. Oh mountain,
Shalt thou call a molehill a scab upon the face
Of the earth? Though a man be a thief, shall a Miller call Him so? Oh egregious!
Jul. Remember Sirha, who you speak before.
Bust. I speak before a Miller,
A thief in grain; for he steals corn: He that steals
A wench, is a true man to him.
Phil. Can you prove that? you may help another cause that was in pleading.
Bust. I'll prove it strongly,
He that steals corn, steals the bread of the Cõmon-wealth;
He that steals a wench, steals but the flesh. (the flesh?
Phil. And how is the bread stealing more criminall then Bust. Hee that steals bread, steals that which is lawfull every day:
He that steals flesh, steals nothing from the fasting day:
Ergo, To steal the bread is the arranter theft.
Phil. This is to some purpose. (full:
Bust. Again, He that steals flesh, steals for his own belly
He that steals bread, robs the guts of others:
Ergo, The arranter theef the bread-stealer.
Again, He that steals flesh, steals once, and gives over; yes, and often payes for it: the other steals every day, without satisfaction. To conclude, Bread-stealing is the more capitall crime: for what he steals hee puts it in at the head: hee that steals flesh (as the Dutch Author sayes) puts it in at the foot, (the lower member.) Will you go as you are now, Miller?
Phil. How has this satisfied you, Don Bellides?
Bel. Nothing (my Lord,) my cause is serious.
I claim a daughter from that loving theefe there,
Ant. I would I had her for you, Sir.
Bel. Ah ha, Julio. (daughter?
Jul. How said you (Antonio)? Wish you you had his
Ant. With my soul I wish her; and my body
Shall perish, but I'll enjoy my souls wish.
I would have slain my friend for his deceit,
But I do find his own deceit hath paid him.
Jul. Will you vex my soul forth? no other choice
But where my hate is rooted? Come hither Girl,
Whose pretty maid art thou?
Ism. The child of a poor man, Sir.
Jul. The better for it. With my Soveraigns leave,
I'll wed thee to this man, will hee, nill he.
Phil. Pardon me, Sir, I'll be no Love enforcer:
I use no power of mine unto those ends.
Jul. Wilt thou have him?
Ism. Not unlesse he love me.
Ant. I do love thee: Farewell all other Beauties:
I settle here: You are Ismenia.
Ism. The same I was: better nor worse (Antonio)
Ant. I shall have your consent here, I'm sure, Sir.
Bel. With all my heart, Sir. Nay, if you accept it,
I'll do this kindnesse to mine enemie,
And give her as a Father.
Ant. Shee'll thank you as a Daughter.
Will you not, Ismenia?
Bel. How? Ismenia?
Ism. Your daughter, Sir.
Bel. Ifi Poble? Away you feeble witted things,
You thought you had caught the old ones: You wade, you wade
In shallow fords: Wee can swim, we: look here,
We made the match; we are all friends, good friends;
Thin, thin: why the fool knew all this, this fool.
Bust. Keep that to your self, Sir; What I knew I knew:
This Sack is a witnesse. Miller, this is not for your thumming. Here's gold lace: you may see her in her holliday clothes if you will; I was her ward-robe-man.

Enter Martin, Aminta, Constable, Officers.

Ant. You beguil'd me well, Sir.
Mar. Did you speak to me, Sir?
Ant. It might seem to you (Martin), your conscience
Has quick ears.
Mar. My sight was a little dim i'th' dark, indeed,
So was my feeling cozen'd; yet I'm content:
I am the better understander now,
I know my wife wants nothing of a woman;
There y'are my Junior.
Ant. You are not hurt? (see,
Mar. Not shrewdly hurt; I have good flesh to heal, you
Good round flesh: these cherries will be worth chopping,
Crack stones and all; I should not give much to boot
To ride in your new, and you in my old ones now.
Ant. You mistake the weapon: are you not hurt?
Mar. A little scratch: but I shal claw it off wel enough.

Enter Gillian.

Gill. I can no longer own what is not mine
With a free conscience: My Liege, your pardon.
Phil. For what? Who knows this woman?
Fra. I best (my Lord),
I have been acquainted with her these fortie Summers,
And as many Winters, were it Spring again;
She's like the Gout, I can get no cure for her.
Phil. Oh, your wife, Francis?
Fra. 'Tis oh my wife indeed (my Lord,)
A painfull stitch to my side; would it were pick'd out.
Phil. Well Sir, your silence.
Bust. Wil you be older and older every day then other? the longer you live the older still? Must his Majestie command your silence ere you'l hold your tongue?
Phil. Your reprehension runs into the same fault:
'Pray Sir, will you be silent.
Bust. I have told him of this before now (my Liege) but Age will have his course, and his weaknesses, Phil. Good Sir, your forbearance.
Bust. And his frailties, and his follies (as I may say) that cannot hold his tongue ere he be bidden.
Phil. Why Sirha?
Bust. But I beleeve your Majestie will not be long troubled with him: I hope that woman has something to confesse will hang 'em both.
Phil. Sirha, you'll pull your destinie upon you
If you cease not the sooner.
Bust. Nay, I have done, my Liege; yet it grieves me that I should call that man Father, that should be so shameless, that being commanded to hold his tongue.
Phil. To th' Porters Lodge with him.
Bust. I thank your Grace, I have a friend there.
Phil. Speak woman, if any interruption meet thee more,
It shall be punish'd sharply.
Gill. Good my Liege (I dare not)
Ask you the question why that old man weeps.
Phil. Who? Count Julio? I observ'd it not.
You hear the question Sir, will you give the cause?
Jul. Oh my Lord, it hardly will get passage,

It

It is a ſorrow of that greatneſſe grown,
'Leſſe it diſſolve in tears, and come by parcels.
Gill. I'll help you Sir, in the delivery,
And bring you forth a joy. You loſt a daughter. (ſorrows.
Jul. 'Twas that recounted thought brought forth theſe
Gill. Shee's found again. Know you this mantle Sir?
Jul. Hah?
Gill. Nay leave your wonder, I'll explain it to you.
This did enwrap your childe (whom ever ſince
I have call'd mine) when Nurſe Amaranta
In a remove from Mora to Corduba
Was ſeiz'd on by a fierce and hungry Bear,
She was the Ravins prey, as heaven ſo would,
He with his booty fill'd, forſook the babe:
All this was in my ſight: and ſo long I ſaw,
Untill the cruell creature left my ſight,
At which advantage I adventur'd me
To reſcue the ſweet Lamb: I did it Sir,
And ever ſince I have kept back your joy,
And made it mine: but age hath wearied me,
And bids me back reſtore unto the owner
What I unjuſtly kept theſe fourteen yeers.
Jul. Oh, thou haſt ta'n ſo many yeers from mee,
And made me young, as was her birth-day to me.
Oh (good my Liege) give my joyes a pardon,
I muſt go powre a bleſſing on my child,
Which here would be too rude and troubleſome. Exit.
Phil. Franio, you knew this before.
Buſt. Oh, oh; Item for you Miller.
Fra. I did (my Liege) I muſt confeſſe I did,
And I confeſſe, I ne'r would have confeſſ'd,
Had not that womans tongue begun to me:
We poor ones love, and would have comforts, Sir,
As well as great: this is no ſtrange fault, Sir,
There's many men keep other mens children
As though they were their own.
Buſt. It may ſtretch farther yet, I beſeech you (my Liege) let this woman be a little farther examin'd; let the words of her conſcience be ſearch'd. I would know how ſhe came by me: I am a loſt childe, if I be theirs: though I have been brought up in a mill, yet I had ever a minde (me thought) to be a greater man.
Phil. Shee will reſolve you ſure.
Gill. I, I Boy: thou art mine own fleſh and blood,
Born of mine own body.
Buſt. 'Tis very unlikely that ſuch a body ſhould bear me; There's no truſt in theſe millers. Woman, tell the truth: my father ſhall forgive thee, whatſoever he was, were hee Knight, Squire, or Captain; leſſe he ſhould not be.
Gill. Thou art mine own child, Boy.
Buſt. And was the Miller my Father?
Gill. Wouldſt thou make thy mother a whore, Knave?
Buſt. I, if ſhe make me a Baſtard. The rack muſt make her confeſſe (my Lord) I ſhall never come to know who I am elſe. I have a worſhipfull mind in mee ſure: mee thinks I do ſcorn poor folks.

Enter Otrante, Florimell and Julio, &c.

Phil. Here comes the brighteſt glory of the day:
Love yoak'd with love, the beſt equality,
Without the levell of eſtate or perſon.
Jul. You both ſhall be rewarded bountifully,
Wee'll be a-kin too; Brother and Siſter ſhall be chang'd with us ever.
Buſt. Thank you (Unkle) my ſiſter is my coſen yet at the laſt caſt: Farewell ſiſter foſter. If I had known the Civill law would have allowed it, thou hadſt had another manner of husband then thou haſt: but much good doe thee; I'll dance at thy wedding, kiſſe the Bride, and ſo.
Jul. Why, how now ſirha?
Buſt. 'Tis lawfull now, ſhe's none of my Siſter.
It was a Miller and a Lord
That had a ſcabberd and a ſword,
He put it up in the Country word
The Miller and his daughter.
Shee has a face, and ſhe can ſing,
Shee has a Grace, and ſhe can ſpring,
Shee has a place with another thing
Tradoodle.
Fra. A knaviſh Brother of yours (my Lord).
Buſt. would I were acquainted with your Tailor (Noble Brother).
Otr. You may, there he is: mine, newly entertain'd.
Ver. If you have any work for me, I can fit you Sir, I fitted the Lady.
Buſt. My Siſter (Tailor,) what fits her wil hardly fit me.
Ver. Who fits her may fit you Sir, the Tailor can do both.
Buſt. You have a true yard (Tailor.)
Ver. Ne'r a whit too long, I warrant you.
Buſt. Then (Tailor) march with me away,
I ſcorn theſe robes, I muſt be gay,
My Noble Brother, he ſhall pay
Tom Tailor. Exeunt.
Phil. Your recovered friendſhips are ſound, Gentlemen?
Bel. At heart, at heart (my Lord) the worm ſhall not Beyond many ages find a breach to enter at.
Phil. Theſe Lovers unities I will not doubt of:
How happy have you made our Progreſſe then,
To be the witneſſe of ſuch fair Accords?
Come, now we'll eat with you (my Lord Otrante,)
'Tis a charge fav'd: You muſt not grudge your gueſt,
'Tis both my Welcome, and your Wedding-Feaſt.
Exeunt.

FINIS.

THE PROPHETESSE.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Enter Charinus, Aurelia, Niger.

Char.

Ou buz into my head strange likelihoods, and fill mee full of doubts; But what proofes (Niger,) what certainties, that my most noble Brother came to his end by murther? Tel me that, assure me by some circumstance.

Niger I will Sir.
And as I tell you truth, so the gods prosper me.
I have often nam'd this Aper.

Char. True, ye have done:
and in mysterious sences I have heard ye break out o'th' sudden, and abruptly.

Niger True, Sir.
Fear of your unbeliefe, and the Times giddinesse made me I durst not then go farther. So your Grace please out of your wonted goodnesse to give credit,
I shall unfold the wonder.

Aur. Do it boldly:
you shall have both our hearty loves, and hearings.

Niger This Aper then, this too much honourd villain, (for he deserves no mention of a good man) great Sir, give ear: This most ingratefull, lightfull, above the memory of mankind mischievous, with his owne bloody hands.

Char. Take heed.

Nig. I am in, Sir;
and if I make not good my Storie,

Aur. Forward:
I see a Truth would break out: be not fearfull.

Nig. I say, this Aper, and his damn'd Ambition, cut off your Brothers hopes, his life, and fortunes:
the honourd Numerianus fell by him,
fell basely, most untimely, and most treacherously:
For in his Litter, as he bore him company,
most privately and cunningly he kill'd him;
yet still hee fils the faithfull Souldiers eare with stories of his weaknesse, of his life:
that he dare not venture to appear in open,
and shew his warlike face among the souldiers;
the tendernesse and weaknesse of his eyes,
being not able to endure the Sun yet.
Slave that he is, he gives out this infirmitie (because hee would dispatch his honour too) to arise from wantonnesse, and love of women, and thus he juggles still.

Aur. O most pernitious, most bloody, and most base! Alas, deer Brother, art thou accus'd, and after death thy memory loaden with shames and lies? Those pious tears thou daily showerdst upon my fathers Monument, (when in the Persian Expedition he fell unfortunately by a stroak of thunder) made thy defame and sins? Those wept out eyes, the fair examples of a noble Nature,
those holy drops of Love, turn'd by depravers (malitious poyson'd tongues) to thy abuses?
We must not suffer this.

Char. It shows a truth now:
and sure this Aper is not right nor honest, hee will not now come neer me.

Nig. No, he dare not:
He has an inmate here, thats call'd a conscience,
bids him keep off.

Char. My Brother honourd him, made him first Captain of his Guard, his next friend;
then to my mother (to assure him nearer)
he made him husband.

Nig. And withall ambitious:
for when he trod so nigh, his false feet itch'd Sir,
to step into the State.

Aur. If ye believe, Brother,
Aper a bloody knave (as 'tis apparant)
Let's leave disputing, and do something Noble.

Char. Sister be rul'd, I am not yet so powerfull, to meet him in the field: He has under him
the flower of all the Empire, and the strength, the Brittain and the Germain Cohorts; pray ye be patient.
Niger, how stands the Souldier to him?

Nig. In fear, more Sir, then love or honour: he has lost their fair affections,
by his most covetous and greedy griping.
Are ye desirous to do something on him,
that all the world may know ye lov'd your Brother?
and do it safely too, without an Army?

Char. Most willingly.

Nig. Then send out a Proscription, send suddenly: And to that man that executes it,
(I mean, that brings his head) add a fair payment, no common summe: then ye shall see, I fear not, (him, even from his own camp, from those men that follow follow, and flatter him, we shall find one,

and if he miſſe, one hundred that will venture it.
Aur. For his reward, it ſhall be ſo, deer Brother, ſo far I'll honour him that kils the villain:
for ſo far runs my love to my dead Brother,
let him be what he will; baſe, old, or crooked,
her ſhall have Me: Nay, which is more, I'll love him.
I will not be denyde.
Char. You ſhall not, Siſter.
But ye ſhall know, my Love ſhall go along too:
See a Proſcription drawn; And for his recompence, my Siſter, and half partner in the Empire:
and I will keep my word.
Aur. Now ye do bravely.
Nig. And though it coſt my life, I'll ſee it publiſh'd.
Char. Away then, for the buſineſſe.
Nig. I am gone, Sir:
you ſhall have all diſpatch'd to night.
Char. Be proſperous.
Aur. And let the villain fall.
Nig. Fear nothing Madam. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Delphia and Druſilla.

Dru. 'Tis true, that Diocles is courteous, and of a pleaſant nature, ſweet and temperate:
his Coſen Maximinian, proud and bloody.
Del. Yes: and miſtruſtfull too (my Girl) take heed, although he ſeem to love thee, and affect like the more Courtier, curious complement, yet have a care.
Dru. You know all my affection, and all my heart-defires is ſet on Diocles.
But (Aunt) how coldly he requites this courteſie,
how dull and heavily he looks upon me,
although I woo him ſometimes beyond modeſtie, beyond a Virgins care: how ſtill he ſlights me,
and puts me ſtill off with your Prophecie,
and the performance of your late Prediction,
that when he is Emperor, then he will marry me,
alas, what hope of that?
Del. Peace, and be patient, for though he be now a man moſt miſerable,
of no rank, nor no badge of honour on him,
bred low and poor, no eye of favour ſhining:
And though my ſure Prediction of his Riſing (which can no more faile, then the day or night do's, nay, let him be aſleep, will overtake him)
have found ſome rubs and ſtops, yet hear me Neece, and hear me with a faith, it ſhall come to him.
I'll tell thee the occaſion.
Dru. Do good Aunt:
for yet I am ignorant.
Del. Chiding him one day for being too neer, and ſparing for a Souldier, too griping, and too greedy: he made anſwer,
When I am Cæſar, then I will be liberall.
I preſently inſpir'd with holy fire,
and my Prophetick ſpirit burning in me, gave anſwer from the gods; and this it was,
Imperator eris Roma, cum Aprum grandem interfeceris:
Thou ſhalt be Emperor, O Diocles, when thou haſt kill'd a mighty Boar. From that time (as giving credit to my words) hee has imploy'd much of his life in hunting. Many Boars hideous and fierce, with his own hands he has kild too, but yet not lighted on the fatall one,
ſhould raiſe him to the Empire: Be not ſad Neece, ere long he ſhall: Come, lets go entertain him;
for by this time, I gheſſe, he comes from hunting;
And by my art, I find this very inſtant ſome great deſigne 's afoot.
Dru. The gods give good, Aunt. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Diocles, Maximinian, Geta, with a Boar.

Dio. Lay down the Boar.
Get. With all my heart; I am weary on't:
I ſhall turn Jew, if I carry many ſuch burthens.
Do you think (Maſter) to be Emperor with killing Swine? ye may be an honeſt Butcher, or allied to a ſeemly Family of Sowſe-wives.
Can you be ſuch an aſſe, my reverend Maſter, to think theſe Springs of Pork will ſhoot up Cæſars?
Max. The fool ſayes true.
Dio. Come leave your fooling, Sirha, and think of what thou ſhalt be when I am Emperor.
Get. Would it would come with thinking: for then o' my (conſcience
I ſhould be at leaſt a Senator.
Max. A Sowter:
for that's a place more fitted to thy nature,
if there could be ſuch an expectation.
Or ſay the Divel could perform this wonder,
Can ſuch a Raſcall as thou art hope for honour?
ſuch a log-carrying Lowt?
Get. Yes, and bear it too, and bear it ſwimmingly. I am not the firſt Aſſe, Sir, has born good Office, & perform'd it reverendly. (nator)
Dio. Thou being the ſon a Tiler, canſt thou hope to be a Se-Get. Thou being ſon of a Tanner, canſt thou hope to be an Emperour?
Dio. Thou ſaiſt true Geta, there's a ſkop indeed;
but yet the bold and vertuous ——
Get. Ye are right, Maſter, right as a gun: For we the vertuous,
though we be kennel-rakers, ſcabs, and ſcowndrels, wee the diſcreet and bold: and yet, now I remember it,
We Tilers may deſerve to be Senators;
and there we ſtep before you thick-skin'd Tanners,
for we are born three Stories high; no baſe ones,
none of your groundlings, Maſter.
Dio. I like thee well, thou haſt a good mind, as I have, to this Honour.
Get. As good a mind Sir, of a ſimple plaiſterer —— and when I come to execute my Office, then you ſhall ſee.
Max. What?
Get. An Officer in fury;
an Officer as he ought to be: Do you laugh at it?
Is a Senator (in hope) worth no more reverence?
By theſe hands I'll clap you by th' heels the firſt hour of it.
Max. O' my conſcience, the fellow beleeves.
Dio. I do, do Geta, for if I once be Emperor ——
Get. Then will I
(for wiſe men muſt be had to prop the Republick) not bate ye a ſingle ace of a ſound Senator.
Dio. But what ſhall we do the whilſt?
Get. Kill Swine, and ſowſe 'em, I

and

and eat 'em when we have bread.
Max. Why didſt thou run away when the Boar made toward thee? art thou not valiant?
Get. No indeed am I not; and 'tis for mine honour too:
I took a tree, 'tis true; gave way to the Monſter;
hearke what diſcretion ſayes, Let furie paſſe;
from the tooth of a mad beaſt, and the tongue of a ſlanderer preſerve thine honour.
Dio. Hee talks like a full Senator.
Go, take it up, and carry it in: 'tis a huge one;
we never kill'd ſo large a ſwine; ſo fierce too
I never met with yet.
Max. Take heed, it ſtirres again;
how nimbly the rogue runs up: he climbs like a Squirrel.
Dio. Come down ye dunce, is it not dead?
Get. I know not.
Dio. His throat is cut, and his bowels out.
Get. That's all one;
I am ſure his teeth are in: and for any thing I know,
he may have pigs of his own nature in's belly.
Dio. Come take him up I ſay, and ſee him dreſt, he is fat, and will be luſtie meat; away with him,
and get ſome of him ready for our dinner.
Get. Shall he be roſted whole,
and ſerv'd up in a Sowce-tub? a portly ſervice,
I'll run i'th' wheel my ſelf.
Max. Sirrah, leave your prating, and get ſome piece of him ready preſently,
we are weary both, and hungry.
Get. I'll about it.
What an inundation of brewiſſe ſhall I ſwim in? Exit.
Dio. Thou art ever dull and melancholy, Coſen, diſtruſtfull of my hopes.
Max. Why, can ye blame me?
Do men give credit to a Juggler?
Dio. Thou know'ſt ſhe is a Propheteſſe.
Max. A ſmall one,
and as ſmall profit to be hop'd for by her.
Dio. Thou art the ſtrangeſt man; how do's thy hurt?
the Boar came neer you Sir.
Max. A ſcratch, a ſcratch.
Dio. It akes & troubles thee, and that makes thee angry.
Max. Not at the pain, but at the practice, Unkle, the butcherly baſe cuſtome of our lives now:
Had a brave enemies ſword drawn ſo much from me,
or danger met me in the head o'th' Army,
to have bluſh'd thus in my blood, had been mine honour.
But to live baſe, like Swine-herds, and beleeve too,
to be fool'd out with tales, and old wives dreams, dreams, when they are drunk.
Dio. Certain, you much miſtake her.
Max. Miſtake her? hang her: to be made her Purveyors, to feed her old chaps: to provide her daily,
and bring in Feaſts, whilſt ſhee ſits farting at us,
and blowing out her Prophecies at both ends.
Dio. Preethee be wiſe: Doſt thou think, Maximinian, ſo great a reverence, and ſo ſtaid a knowledge —
Max. Sur-reverence, you would ſay: what truth? what knowledge?
what any thing but eating is good in her?
'Twould make a fool propheeie to be fed continually:
What do you get? your labour and your danger.
Whilſt ſhe ſits bathing in her larded fury,
inſpir'd with full deep cups, who cannot propheeie?
A Tinker, out of Ale, will give Predictions:
but who beleeves?
Dio. Shee is a holy Druid,
A woman noted for that faith, that piety,
Belov'd of heaven.
Max. Heaven knows, I do not beleeve it.
Indeed, I muſt confeſſe, they are excellent Jugglers;
their age upon ſome fools too flings a confidence.
But what grounds have they: what elements to work on?
ſhow mee but that: the ſieve and ſheers? a learned one.
I have no patience to diſpute this Queſtion,
'tis ſo ridiculous: I think the divell do's help 'em:
or rather, (mark me well) abuſe 'em (Unkle):
for they are as fit to deal with him: theſe old women,
they are as jump and ſquar'd out to his nature —
Dio. Thou haſt a perfect malice.
Max. So I would have againſt theſe purblind Prophets: for look ye Sir, old women will lie monſtrouſly; ſo will the divell,
or elſe he has had much wrong: upon my knowledge,
old women are malicious; ſo is hee:
they are proud, and covetous, revengefull, lecherous;
all which are excellent attributes of the Divell.
They would at laſt ſeem holy; ſo would hee:
and to vail over theſe villanies, they would propheeie;
he gives them leave now and then to uſe their cunnings,
which is to kill a cow, or blaſt a harveſt,
make young pigs pipe themſelves to death, choak poultry, and chafe a dairy-wench into a feaver with pumping for her butter.
But when he makes theſe Agents to raiſe Emperors, when he diſpoſes Fortune as his Servant,
and tyes her to old wives tailes ——
Dio. Goe thy wayes, thou art a learned Scholar, againſt credit.
You hear the Propheeie?
Max. Yes, and I laugh at it:
and ſo will any man can tell but twenty,
that is not blind, as you are blind and ignorant.
Do you think ſhe knows your fortune?
Dio. I do think it.
Max. I know ſhe has the name of a rare South-ſayer:
but do you in your conſcience beleeve her holy?
inſpired with ſuch prophetick fire?
Dio. Yes in my conſcience,
Max. And that you muſt upon neceſſity from her words be a Ceſar?
Dio. If I live,
Max. There's a top yet.
Dio. and follow her directions.
Max. But do not juggle with me.
Dio. In faith (Coſen,) — ſo full a truth hangs ever on her Prophecies, that how I ſhould think otherwiſe.
Max. Very well Sir:
You then beleeve (for me thinks, 'tis moſt neceſſary)
ſhe knows her own Fate?
Dio. I beleeve it certain.
Max. Dare you but be ſo wiſe to let me try it, for I ſtand doubtfull.
Dio. How?
Max. Come neerer to me;
becauſe her cunning divell ſhall not prevent me:
Cloſe, cloſe, and hear; If ſhe can turn this deſtinie,
I'll be of your faith too.
Dio. Forward, I fear not.

for if shee knows not this, sure she knows nothing.

Enter Delphia.

I am so confident ——

Max. 'Faith so am I too, that I shall make her Divels sides hum.

Dio. Shee comes here:
go take your stand.

Max. Now holly, or you howl for't. Exit.

Dio. 'Tis pity this young man should be so stubborn.
Valiant he is, and to his valour temperate,
onely distrustfull of delayes in Fortune;
I love him deerly well.

Del. Now my Son Diocles, are yee not weary of your game to day?
and are ye well?

Dio. Yes Mother, well and lustie:
onely ye make me hunt for empty shadows. (day:

Del. You must have patience, Rome was not built in one and he that hopes, must give his hopes their currents.
You have kil'd a mighty Boar.

Dio. But I am no Emperor.
Why do you fool me thus, and make me follow your flattering expectation hour by hour?
Rise early, and sleep late? to feed your appetites, forget my trade, my Arms? forsake mine honour, labour and sweat to arrive at a base memory?
oppose my self to hazzards of all sorts,
onely to win the barbarous name of Butcher?

Del. Son, you are wise.

Dio. But you are cunning, Mother:
and with that Cannon, and the faith I give ye,
ye lead me blindly to no end, no honour.
You find ye are daily fed, you take no labour,
your familie at ease, they know no Market,
and therefore to maintain this, you speak darkly, as darkly still ye nourish it, whilst I being a credulous and obsequious coxcomb, hunt daily, and sweat hourly, to find out to cleer your Mystery: kill Boar on Boar, and make your spits and pots bow with my Bounties:
yet I still poorer, further still ——

Del. Be provident, and tempt not the gods doombs; stop not the glory
they are ready to fix on ye. Ye are a fool then;
cheerfull and gratefull takers the gods love,
and such as wait their pleasures with fair hopes:
the doubtfull and distrustfull man Heaven frowns at.
What I have told you by my inspiration,
I tell ye once again, must and shall find ye.

Dio. But when? or how?

Del. Cum Aprum interfeceris.

Dio. I have kil'd many.

Del. Not the Boar they point ye:
nor must I reveal further, till you cleer it.
The lots of glorious men are wrapt in mysteries,
and so deliverd: Common and slight creatures,
that have their Ends as open as their Actions,
easie and open fortunes follow.

Max. I shall try how deep your inspiration lies hid in ye, and whether your brave spirit have a buckler
to keep this arrow off, I'll make you smoak else.

Dio. Knowing my fortune so precisely, punctually, and that it must fall without contradiction,
being a stranger of no tie unto ye,
me thinks you should be studied in your own,
in your own destiny, me thinks, most perfect,
and every hour, and every minute, Mother,
so great a care should heaven have of her Ministers;
me thinks your fortunes both waies should appear to ye,
both to avoid, and take. Can the Stars now, and all those influences you receive into ye,
or secret inspirations ye make shew of,
if an hard fortune hung, and were now ready to powr it self upon your life, deliver ye?
Can they now say, Take heed?

Del. Ha? pray ye come hither. ye,

Max. I would know that: I fear your divel wil cozen and stand as close as ye can, I shall be with ye.

Del. I find a present ill.

Dio. How?

Del. But I scorn it.

Max. Do ye so? do ye so?

Del. Yes, and laugh at it, Diocles.
Is it not strange, these wild and foolish men should dare to oppose the power of Destiny?
that power the gods shake at? Look yonder, Son,

Max. Have ye spide me? then have at ye.

Del. Do, shoot boldly.
hit mee and spare not, if thou canst.

Dio. Shoot cosen.

Max. I cannot; mine arm's dead, I have no feeling:
or if I could shoot, so strong is her arm'd vertue,
she would catch the arrow flying.

Del. Poor doubtfull people,
I pity your weak faiths.

Dio. Your mercy (Mother,) and from this hour a deity, I crown ye.

Del. No more of that.

Max. O let my prayers prevail too,
here like a tree, I dwell else: free me Mother, and greater then great Fortune, I'll adore thee.

Del. Be free again, and have more pure thoughts in ye.

Dio. Now I beleeve your words most constantly, and when I have that power ye have promisd to me.

Del. Remember then your vow: my Neice Drusila,
I mean, to marry her, and then ye prosper,

Dio. I shall forget my life else.

Del. I am a poor weak woman: to me no worship.

Enter Niger, Geta, and Souldiers.

Get. And shall he have as you say, that kils this Aper?

Del. Now mark and understand.

Nig. The Proscription's up,
i'th' Market-place 'tis up, there ye may read it,
he shall have half the Empire.

Get. A pretty Farm i' faith.

Nig. And the Emperors Sister, bright Aurelia, her to his wife.

Get. Ye say well Friend; but hark ye,
Who shall do this?

Nig. You, if ye dare.

Get. I think so:
Yet I could poyson him in a pot of Perry,
he loves that veng'ancely: But when I have done this,
may I lie with the Gentlewoman?

Nig. Lie with her? what else man?

Get. Yes Mah,
I have known a man married, that never lay with his wife.
those dancing dayes are done.

Nig. These are old Souldiers, and poor, it seems. I'll try their appetites.
'Save ye brave Souldiers.

Max. Sir,

Max. Sir, ye talkt of proſcriptions?
Nig. 'Tis true, there is one ſet up from the Emperour againſt Volutius Aper.
Dio. Aper?
Del. Now;
Now have ye found the Boar?
Dio. I have the meaning;
and bleſſed Mother.——
Nig. He has ſcorn'd his Maſter, and bloodily cut off by treachery
the noble Brother to him.
Dio. He lives here Sir, ſickly and weak.
Nig. Did you ſee him?
Max. No.
Nig. He is murthered;
ſo ye ſhall find it mentioned from the Emperour;
and honeſt faithful ſouldiers, but believe it;
for, by the gods, you will find it ſo, he is murthered;
the manner how, read in the large Proſcription.
Del. It is moſt true Son; and he cozens ye,
Aper's a villain falſe.
Dio. I thank ye Mother, and dare beleeve ye: Heark ye Sir, the recompence? as ye related.
Nig. Is as firme as faith Sir:
bring him alive or dead.
Max. You took a fit time, (him not,
the Generall being out o'th' Towne: for though we love yet had he known this firſt, you had paid for't deerly.
Dio. 'Tis Niger, now I know him: honeſt Niger,
a true ſound man, and I beleeve him conſtantly:
your buſines may be done, make no great hurry
for your owne ſafety.
Nig. No, I am gone: I thank ye. Exit.
Dio. Pray, Maximinian, pray.
Max. I'll pray and work too.
Dio. I'll to the Market place, and read the offer, and now I have found the Boar.
Del. Find your owne faith too, and remember what ye have vow'd.
Dio. O Mother.
Del. Proſper. (perours,
Get. If my Maſter, and I do do this, there's two Em-and what a ſhow will that make? how we ſhall bounce it! Exeunt.

Actus Secundus

Scæna Prima.

Enter Druſilla and Delphia.

Dru. Leave us, and not vouchſafe a parting kiſſe to her that in his hopes of greatneſſe lives, and goes along with him in all his dangers?
Del. I grant 't was moſt inhumane.
Dru. O you give it too mild a name: 't was more then barbarous, and you a partner in't.
Del. I Druſilla?
Dru. Yes:
you have blowne his ſwolne pride to that valtnes,
as he beleeves the earth is in his fadom,
this makes him quite forget his humble Being:
And can I hope that he, that onely fed with the imagin'd food of future Empire, diſdains even thoſe that gave him Means, and life,
to nouriſh ſuch deſires, when he's poſſeſt of his ambitious Ends (which muſt fall on him, or your Predictions are falſe) will ever deſcend to look on me?
Del. Were his Intents perfidious as the Seas or Windes, his heart compos'd of falſhood; yet the benefit,
the greatneſſe of the good he has from you,
(for what I have conferr'd, is thine, Druſilla) muſt make him firm, and thankful: But if all remembrance of the debts he ſtands engag'd for, finde a quick grave in his Ingratitude,
my powerful Art, that guides him to this height,
ſhall make him curſe the hour he ere was rais'd,
or ſink him to the center.
Dru. I had rather your Art could force him to return that ardour
to me, I bear to him; or give me power to moderate my paſſions: Yet I know not,
I ſhould repent your grant, though you had ſign'd it,
(ſo well I finde he's worthy of all ſervice.)
But to believe that any check to him in his main hopes, could yeeld content to me, were treaſon to true love, that knows no pleaſure,
the object that is doats on ill affected.
Del. Pretty ſimplicity; I love thee for't, and will not ſit an idle looker on,
and ſee it cozen'd: dry thy innocent eyes, and caſt off jealous fears, (yet promiſes are but lip-comforts) and but fancie aught that's poſſible in Nature, or in Art, that may advance thy comfort, and be bold to tell thy ſoul 'tis thine: therefore ſpeak freely.
Dru. You new create me. To conceal from you my virgin fondneſſe, were to hide my ſickneſſe from my phyſitian. O dear Aunt, I languiſh for want of Diocles ſight: he is the Sun that keeps my blood in a perpetual ſpring:
but in his abſence, cold benumming Winter ſeizes on all my faculties. Would you binde me (that am your ſlave already) in more fetters, and (in the place of ſervice) to adore you?
O bear me then (but 'tis impoſſible,
I fear, to be effected) where I may ſee how my Diocles breaks thorow his dangers, and in what heaps his honours flow upon him,
that I may meet him, in the height and pride of all his glories; and there (as your gift)
chalenge him, as mine own.
Del. Enjoy thy wiſhes:
this is an eaſie Boon, which, at thy yeers,
I could have given to any; but now grown perfect in all the hidden myſteries of that inimitable Art, which makes us equal even to the gods, and Natures wonders, it ſhall be done, as fits my skill and glory:
To break thorow bolts, and locks, a Scholars prize for Theeves, and Pick-locks: To paſſe thorow an Army cover'd with Night, or ſome diſguiſe, the practice of poor and needy Spies: No, my Druſilla, from Ceres I will force her winged Dragons, and in the air hung over the Tribunal;

(the

(the Muſick of the Spheres attending on us.)
There, as his good Star, thou ſhalt ſhine upon him, if he prove true, and as his Angel guard him.
But if he dare be falſe, I, in a moment will put that glorious light out, with ſuch horrour, as if the eternal Night had ſeiz'd the Sun,
or all things were return'd to the firſt Chaos,
and then appear like Furies.
Dru. I will do
what ere you ſhall command:
Del. Reſt then aſſur'd,
I am the Miſtris of my Art, and fear not. Exeunt.
Soft Muſick.

Scæna ſecunda.

Enter Aper, Camurius, Guard, a Litter covered.
Aper. Your care of your ſick Emperour, fellow-ſoul-in colours to the life, doth ſhew your love,] (diers, and zealous duty: O coutinue in it.
And though I know you long to ſee and hear him,
impute it not to pride, or melancholy,
that keeps you from your wiſhes: ſuch State-vices (too too familiar with great Princes) are ſtrangers to all the actions of the life of good Numerianus: Let your patience be the Phyſitian to his wounded eyes, (wounded with pious ſorrow for his father) which Time and your ſtrong Patience will recover, provided it prove conſtant.
1 Guard. If he counterfeit,
I will hereafter truſt a prodigal heir,
when he weeps at his fathers Funeral.
2 Guard. Or a young widow, following a bed-rid huſ(after a three yeers groaning) to the Fire. (band,
3 Guard. Note his humility, and with what ſoft mur-he does enquire his pleaſures. (mures
1 Guard. And how ſoon
he is inſtructed.
2 Guard. How he bows again too.
Aper. All your Commands (dread Ceſar) I'll impart to your moſt ready Souldier, to obey them;
ſo take your reſt in peace. It is the pleaſure of mighty Ceſar (his thanks ſtill remembred for your long patience, which a donative, fitting his State to give, ſhall quickly follow) that you continue a ſtrict Guard upon his ſacred perſon, and admit no ſtranger of any other Legion, to come neer him; you being moſt truſted by him. I receive your anſwer in your ſilence. Now Camurius, ſpeak without flattery; Hath thy Aper acted this paſſion to the life?
Cam. I would applaud him, were he ſaluted Ceſar: but I fear theſe long protracted counſels will undo us;
and 'tis beyond my reaſon, he being dead, you ſhould conceal your ſelf, or hope it can continue undiſcover'd.
Aper. That I have killed him,
yet feed theſe ignorant fools with hopes he lives,
has a main end in't. The Pannonian Gohorts, (that are my own, and ſure) are not come up,
the Germane Legions waver, and Charinus
(brother to this dead dog) hells plagues on Niger, is jealous of the murther; and, I hear,
is marching up againſt me. 'Tis not ſafe, till I have power, to juſtifie the Act, to ſhew my ſelf the Authour: be therefore careful for an hour or two (till I have fully ſounded how the Tribunes and Centurions ſtand affected) that none come neer the Litter. If I finde them firm on my part, I dare profeſſe my ſelf, and then live Aper's equal.
Cam. Does not the body begin to putrifie?
Aper. That exacts my haſte:
when, but even now, I feign'd obedience to it,
as I had ſome great buſineſſe to impart,
the ſent had almoſt choak'd me: be therefore curious!
all keep at diſtance. Exit.
Cam. I am taught my parts;
haſte you, to perfect yours.
1 Guard. I had rather meet an enemy in the field, then ſtand thus nodding like to a rug-gown'd Watch-man.
Enter Dioclet, Maximinian, Geta.
Geta. The Watch at noon?
this is a new device.
Cam. Stand.
Dio. I am arm'd againſt all danger.
Max. If I fear to follow,
a Cowards name purſue me.
Dio. Now my Fate
guide and direct me.
Cam. You are rude and ſawey, with your forbidden feet to touch this ground, ſacred to Ceſar onely, and to theſe that do attend his perſon. Speak, what are you?
Dio. What thou, nor any of thy faction are,
nor ever were: Souldiers, and honeſt men.
Cam. So blunt?
Geta. Nay, you ſhall finde he's good at the ſharp too.
Dio. No inſtruments of craft: engines of murder, that ſerve the Emperour onely with oil'd tongues, ſooth and applaud his vices, play the Bands to all his appetites; and when you have wrought ſo far upon his weakneſſe, that he's grown odious to the ſubject and himſelf, and can no further help your wicked ends,
you rid him out of the way.
Cam. Treaſon?
Dio. 'Tis truth,
and I will make it good.
Cam. Lay hands upon 'em, or kill them ſuddenly.
Geta. I am out at that;
I do not like the ſport.
Dio. What's he that is owner of any vertue worth a Roman, or does retain the memory of the Oath
he made to Ceſar, that dares lift his ſword againſt the man that (careleſſe of his life) comes to diſcover ſuch a horrid Treaſon, as when you hear 't, and underſtand how long y'ave been abus'd, will run you mad with fury?
I am no ſtranger, but (like you) a Souldier, train'd up one from my youth: and there are ſome with whom I have ſerv'd, and (not to praiſe my ſelf) muſt needs confeſſe they have ſeen Dioclet

in

in the late Britain Wars, both dare and do beyond a common man.
1 Guard. Diocles?
2 Guard. I know him,
the braveſt Souldier of the Empire.
Cam. Stand:
if thou advance an inch, thou art dead.
Dio. Die thou,
that durſt oppoſe thy ſelf againſt a Truth that will break out, though mountains cover it.
Get. I fear this is a ſucking Pigg; no Boar, he falls ſo eaſie.
Dio. Hear me, fellow Souldiers; and if I make it not apparant to you this is an act of Juſtice, and no Murther, cut me in pieces: I'll diſperſe the cloud that hath ſo long obſcur'd a bloody act nere equall'd yet: you all knew with what favours the good Numerianus ever grac't the Provoſt Aper?
Guard. True.
Dio. And that thoſe bounties ſhould have contain'd him (if he ere had learn'd the elements of Honeſtie and Truth) in loyal duty: But ambition never looks backward on deſert, but with blinde haſte boldly runs on. But I loſe time. You are here commanded by this Aper to attend the Emperours perſon; to admit no ſtranger to have acceſſe to him, or come neer his Litter, under pretence (forſooth) his eyes are ſore,
and his minde troubled: nb, my friends, you are cozen'd;
the good Numerianus now is paſt
the ſenſe of wrong or injury.
Guard. How? dead?
Dio. Let your own eyes inform you.
Get. An Emperours Cabinet?
Fough, I have known a Charnel-houſe ſmell ſweeter.
If Emperours fleſh have this favour, what will mine do,
when I am rotten?
1 Guard. Moſt unheard-of villany!
2 Guard. And with all cruelty to be reveng'd.
3 Guard. Who is the murtherer? name him, that we puniſh it in his family. (may Dio. Who but Aper?
the barbarous and moſt ingrateful Aper?
His deſperate Poniard printed on his breſt this deadly wound: hate to vow'd enemies findes a full ſatisfaction in death;
and Tyrants ſeek no farther. He (a Subject, and bound by all the Ties of love and duty) ended not ſo; but does deny his Prince (whoſe ghoſt forbad paſſage to his reſt, mourns by the Stygian ſhore) his Funeral-Rites.
Nay, weep not; let your loves ſpeak in your anger;
and, to confirm you gave no ſuffrage to the damned Plot, lend me your helping hands to wreak the Parricide: and if you finde that there is worth in Diocles to deſerve it, make him your leader.
Guard. A Diocles, a Diocles.
Dio. We'll force him from his Guards. And now, my if you have any good for me in ſtore, (Stars, ſhew it, when I have ſlain this fatal Boar.

Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Delphia and Druſilla in a Throne drawn by Dragons.

Del. Fix here, and reſt a while your Sail-ſtretch'd wings that have out-ſtript the windes: the eye of heaven durſt not behold your ſpeed, but hid it ſelf behinde the groſſeſt clouds; and the pale Moon pluckt in her ſilver horns, trembling for fear that my ſtrong Spells ſhould force her from her Sphere;
ſuch is the power of Art.
Dru. Good Aunt, where are we?
Del. Look down, Druſilla, on theſe lofty Towers, theſe ſpacious ſtreets, where every private houſe appears a Palace to receive a King:
the ſite, the wealth, the beauty of the place,
will ſoon inform thee 't is imperious Rome,
Rome, the great Miſtris of the conquer'd world.
Dru. But without Diocles, it is to me like any wilderneſſe we have paſs'd ore:
ſhall I not ſee him?
Del. Yes, and in full glory, and glut thy greedy eyes with looking on his proſperous ſucceſſe: Contain thy ſelf;
for though all things beneath us are tranſparent, the ſharpeſt ſighted, were he Eagle-ey'd, cannot diſcover us: nor will we hang idle Spectators to behold his triumph: Enter Dioclet, Maximinian, Guard, Aper, Senators, Geta, Officers, (with Litter.
but when occaſion ſhall preſent it ſelf, do ſomething to adde to it. See, he comes.
Dru. How gold-like he appears? with ſuch a grace the Giants that attempted to ſcale heaven, when they lay dead on the Phlegrean plain,
Mars did appear to Jove. Del. Forbear.
Dio. Look on this,
and when with horrour thou haſt view'd thy deed, (thy moſt accurſed deed) be thine own judge, and ſee (thy guilt conſider'd) if thou canſt perſwade thy ſelf (whom thou ſtand'ſt bound to hate) to hope or plead for mercy.
Aper. I confeſſe
my life 's a burden to me.
Dio. Thou art like thy name, a cruel Boar, whoſe ſnout hath rooted up the fruitful Vineyard of the Common-wealth;
I long have hunted for thee, and ſince now thou art in the Toyl, it is in vain to hope thou ever ſhalt break out: thou doſt deſerve
the Hangmans hook, or to be puniſhed more majorum, whipt with rods to death, or any way, that were more terrible.
Yet, ſince my future fate depends upon thee,
thus, to fulfil great Delphia's Prophecie,
Aper (thou fatal Boar) receive the honour to fall by Diocles hand. Shine clear, my Stars, that uſher'd me to taſte this common air,
in my entrance to the world, and give applauſe to this great work. Muſick.
Del. Strike Muſick from the Spheres.
Dru. O now you honour me.
Dio. Ha? in the Air?
All. Miraculous.

Max.

Max. This shews the gods approve the Person, and the Act: then if the Senate (for in their eyes I read the Souldiers love) think Diocles worthy to supply the place of dead Numerianus, as he stands his heir, in his revenge, with one consent salute him Emperour.

Senat. Long live Diocles:
Augustus, Pater Patriæ, and all Titles that are peculiar onely to the Cæsars,
we gladly throw upon him.

Guard. We confirm it, and will defend his honour with our Swords against the world: raise him to the Tribunal.

1 Sen. Fetch the Imperial Robes: and as a signe
we give him absolute power of life and death, binde this sword to his side.

2 Sen. Omit no Ceremony that may be for his honour.

Song.

Max. Still the gods
expresse that they are pleas'd with this election.

Geta. My Master is an Emperour, and I feel a Senators Itch upon me: would I could hire these fine invisible Fidlers to play to me at my instalment.

Dio. I embrace your loves,
and hope the honours that you heap upon me, shall be with strength supported. It shall be my studie to appear another Atlas, to stand firm underneath this heaven of Empire, and bear it boldly. I desire no Titles, but as I shall deserve 'em. I will keep the name I had, being a private man, onely with some small difference; I will adde to Diocles but two short syllables, and be called Diocletianus.

Geta. That is fine:
I'll follow the fashion; and when I am a Senator,
I will be no more plain Geta, but be call'd
Lord Getianus.

Dru. He ne'er thinks of me, nor of your favour. Enter Niger.

Del. If he dares prove false, these glories shall be to him as a dream,
or an inchanted banquet.

Niger. From Charinus, from great Charinus, who with joy hath heard of your proceedings, and confirms your honours:
he, with his beauteous sister, fair Aurelia, are come in person, like themselves attended to gratulate your fortune. Loud Musick.

Enter Charinus, Aurelia, Attendants.

Dio. For thy news,
Be thou in France Pro-consul: let us meet the Emperour with all honour, and embrace him.

Dru. O Aunt, I fear this Princesse doth eclipse th' opinion of my beauty, though I were my self to be the judge.

Del. Rely on me.

Char. 'Tis vertue, and not birth that makes us noble:
Great actions speak great minds, and such should govern;
and you are grac'd with both. Thus, as a Brother,
a Fellow, and Co-partner in the Empire,
I do embrace you: may we live so far from difference, or emulous Competition, that all the world may say, Although two Bodies,
we have one Minde.

Aur. When I look on the Trunk of dear Numerianus, I should wash his wounds with tears, and pay a sisters sorrow to his sad fate: but since he lives again in your most brave Revenge, I bow to you,
as to a power that gave him second life,
and will make good my promise. If you finde that there is worth in me that may deserve you, and that in being your wife, I shall not bring disquiet and dishonour to your Bed,
Although my youth and fortune should require both to be su'd and sought to, here I yeeld my self at your devotion.

Dio. O you gods,
teach me how to be thankful: you have pour'd all blessings on me, that ambitious man could ever fancie: till this happie minute,
I nere saw beauty, or believ'd there could be perfection in a woman. I shall live to serve and honour you: upon my knees
I thus receive you; and, so you vouchsafe it, this day I am doubly married; to the Empire,
and your best-self.

Del. False and perfidious villain.——

Dru. Let me fall headlong on him: O my Stars!
this I foresaw and fear'd.

Cha. Call forth a Flamen.
This knot shall now be tri'd.

Del. But I will loose it,
if Art or Hell have any strength.

Enter a Flamen. Thunder and Lightning.

Cha. Prodigious!

Max. How soon the day 's orecast?

Fla. The Signes are fatal:
Juno smiles not upon this Match, and shews too
she has her thunder.

Dio. Can there be a stop in my full fortune?

Cha. We are too violent, and I repent the haste: we first should pay our latest duty to the dead, and then proceed discreetly. Let's take up the body, and when we have plac'd his ashes in his Urn,
we'll try the gods again: for wise men say,
Marriage and Obsequies do not suit one day.

Senate exit.

Del. So, 't is deferr'd yet, in despite of falshood:
Comfort Drusilla, for he shall be thine, or wish, in vain, he were not. I will punish Ascend.
his perjury to the height. Mount up, my birds;
some Rites I am to perform to Pluto,
to perfect my designes; which once perform'd,
he shall be made obedient to thy Call,
or in his ruine I will bury all. Ascends the aire.

Actus Tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Maximinian (solus.)

Max. What powerful Star shin'd at this mans Nati-(vity?
and

and bleſs'd his homely Cradle with full glory?
what throngs of people preſſe and buz about him,
and with their humming flatteries ſing him Caſar?
ſing him aloud, and grow hoarſe with ſaluting him?
How the fierce-minded Souldier ſteals in to him, adores and courts his Honour? at his devotion their lives, their vertues and their fortunes laying?
Cherinus ſues, the Emperour intreats him,
and as a brighter flame, takes his beams from him.
The bleſs'd and bright Aurelia, ſhe doats on him,
and as the god of Love, burns incenſe to him.
All eyes live on him: Yet I am ſtill Maximinian, ſtill the ſame poor and wretched thing, his ſervant.
What have I got by this? where lies my glory?
how am I rais'd and honour'd? I have gone as far to woo this purblinde Honour, and have paſs'd as many dangerous Expeditions, as noble, and as high; nay, in his deſtinie (whilſt 't was unknown) have run as many hazards, and done as much; ſweat thorow as many perils;
onely the Hang-man of Velutius Aper
(which I miſtook) has made him Emperour, and me his ſlave.

Enter Delphia and Druſilla.

Del. Stand ſtill; he cannot ſee us, till I pleaſe: mark him well, this diſcontentment
I have forc'd into him, for thy cauſe, Druſilla.

Max. Can the gods ſee this;
ſee it with juſtice, and confer their bleſſings on him, that never flung one grain of incenſe upon their Altars? never bow'd his knee yet;
and I that have march'd foot by foot, ſtruck equally,
and whilſt he was a gleaning, have been praying, contemning his baſe covetous——

Del. Now we'll be open.

Max. Bleſſe me, and with all reverence.

Del. Stand up, Son, and wonder not at thy ungrateful Uncle:
I know thy thoughts, and I appear to eaſe 'em.

Max. O mother, did I ſtand the tenth part to ye engag'd and fetter'd, as mine Uncle does, how would I ſerve, how would I fall before ye?
the poorer powers me worſhip.

Del. Peace, and flatter not;
neceſſitie and anger draws this from ye;
of both which I will quit ye: For your Uncle
I ſpoke this Honour, and it fell upon him;
fell, to his full content: he has forgot me,
for all my care; forgot me, and his vow too:
as if a dream had vaniſh'd, ſo h' as loſt me,
and I him: let him now ſtand faſt. Come hither;
my care is now on you.

Max. O bleſſed Mother!

Del. Stand ſtill, and let me work. So now, Maximinian, go, and appear in Court, and eye Aurelia:
beleeve, what I have done, concerns ye highly.
Stand in her view, make your addreſſes to her:
ſhe is the Satyre of Honour. I'll ſay no more, but Fortune is your ſervant: go.

Max. With reverence;—— all this as holy truths. Exit.

Del. Believe, and proſper.

Dru. Yet all this cures not me; but as much credit, as much belief from Dioclefian.

Enter Geta, Lictors, and Suitors, (with Petitions.)

Del. Be not dejected; I have warn'd ye often:
the proudeſt thoughts he has, I'll humble. Who's this?
O 't is the fool and knave grown a grave Officer:
here's hot and high preferment.

Get. What's your Bill?
for Gravel for the Appian way, and Pills?
is the way rheumatick?

1 Suitor. 'T is Piles, and 't pleaſe you.

Get. Remove me thoſe Piles to Port Eſquiline, fitter the place, my friend: you ſhall be paid.

1 Suit. I thank your Worſhip.

Get. Thank me when ye have it;
thank me another way, ye are an Aſſe elſe.
I know my Office: you are for the Streets, Sir.
Lord, how ye throng! that knave has eaten Garlick;
whip him, and bring him back.

2 Suitor. I beſeech you Worſhip;
here's an old reckoning for the dung and dirt, Sir.

Get. It ſtinks like thee: Away. Yet let him tarry, his Bill ſhall quit his Breath. Give your Petitions in ſeemly ſort, and keep your hats off, decently.
For ſcowring the Water-courſes thorow the Cities?
a fine periphraſis of a kennel-raker.
Did ye ſcour all, my friend? ye had ſome buſineſſe:
who ſhall ſcour you? you are to be paid, I take it,
when Surgeons ſwear you have performed your Office.

4 Suit. Your Worſhip 's merry.

Get. We muſt be ſometimes wittie, to nick a knave; 't is as uſeful as our gravitie.
I'll take no more Petitions; I am pelter'd;
give me ſome reſt.

4 Suit. I have brought the gold (and 't pleaſe ye) about the Place ye promiſed.

Get. See him enter'd.
How does your daughter?

4 Suit. Better your Worſhip thinks of her.

Get. This is with the leaſt. But let me ſee your daughter.
'T is a good forward maid; I'll joyn her with ye.
I do beſeech ye, leave me.

Lict. Ye ſee the Edile 's buſie.

Get. And look to your Places, or I'll make ye ſmoke elſe.
Sirha, I drank a cup of wine at your houſe yeſterday;
a good ſmart wine.

Lict. Send him the piece, he likes it.

Get. And ate the beſt wilde Boar at that ſame Farmors.

2 Su. I have half left yet; your Worſhip ſhall command it.

Get. A bit will ſerve: give me ſome reſt: gods help me.
How ſhall I labour when I am a Senator?

Del. 'T is a fit place indeed. 'Save your Maſterſhip;
do you know us, Sir?

Get. Theſe women are ſtill troubleſom.
There be houſes providing for ſuch wretched wõmen,
and ſome ſmall Rents, to ſet ye a ſpinning.

Dru. Sir,
we are no Spinſters; nor, if you look upon us,
ſo wretched as you take us.

Del. Does your Mightineſſe that is a great deſtroyer of your Memorie, yet underſtand our faces?

Get. 'Pre thee keep off, woman;
it is not fit I ſhould know every creature.
Although I have been familiar with thee heretofore,
I muſt not know thee now: my place neglects thee.
Yet, becauſe I daign a glimpſe of your remembrances, give me your Suits, and wait me a month hence.

Del. Our Suits are (Sir) to ſee the Emperour, the Emperour Dioclefian, to ſpeak to him.

and not to wait on you. We have told you all, Sir.
Get. Flaugh at your ſimplicitie, poor women:
ſee the Emperour? why you are deceiv'd: now
the Emperour appears but once in ſeven yeers, and then he ſhines not on ſuch weeds as you are.
Forward, and keep your State, and keep beggers from me.
Druſ. Here is a prettie youth.
Exeunt.
Enter Diocles.

Del. He ſhall be prettie, or I will want my will, ſince ye are ſo high, Sir:
I'll raiſe ye higher, or my art ſhall fail me.
Stand cloſe, he comes.
Dio. How am I croſs'd and tortur'd?
my moſt wiſh'd happineſſe, my lovely Miſtris, that muſt make good my hopes, and link my greatneſſe, yet ſever'd from mine arms? Tell me, high heaven, how have I ſinn'd, that you ſhould ſpeak in thunder,
in horrid thunder, when my heart was ready;
to leap into her breſt? the Prieſt was ready?
the joyful virgins and the young men ready?
when Hymen ſtood with all his flames about him
bleſſing the bed? the houſe with full joy ſweating?
and expectation, like the Romane Eagle, took ſtand, and call'd all eyes? It was your Honour;
and ere you give it full, do you deſtroy it?
or was there ſome dire Star? ſome devil that did it?
ſome ſad malignant Angel to mine honour?
With you, I dare not rage.
Del. With me thou canſt not,
though it was I. Nay, look not pale and frighted;
I'll fright thee more. With me thou canſt not quarrel;
I rais'd the thunder, to rebuke thy falſhood:
look here, to her thy falſhood. Now be angry, and be as great in evil as in Empire.
Dio. Bleſſe me, ye Powers.
Del. Thou haſt full need of bleſſing.
'Twas I, that at thy great Inauguration, hung in the air unſeen: 't was I that honoured thee with various Muſicks, and ſweet ſounding airs:
't was I inſpired the ſouldiers heart with wonder,
and made him throw himſelf, with love and duty,
lowe as thy feet: 't was I that fix'd him to thee.
But why did I all this? To keep thy honeſtie, thy vow and faith, that once forgot and ſlighted Aurelia in regard, the Marriage ready,
the Prieſt and all the Ceremonies preſent.
'T was I that thundred loud; 't was I that threatned;
't was I that caſt a dark face over heaven,
and ſmote ye all with terrour.
Druſ. Yet conſider, as ye are noble, as I have deſerv'd ye;
for yet ye are free: if neither faith nor promiſe,
the deeds of elder times may be remembred, let theſe new-dropping tears; for I ſtill love ye,
theſe hands held up to heaven.
Dio. I muſt not pitie ye;
't is not wiſe in me.
Del. How? not wiſe?
Dio. Nor honourable.
A Princeſſe is my Love, and doats upon me:
a fair and lovely Princeſſe is my Miſtris.
I am an Emperour: conſider, Propheteſſe,
now my embraces are for Queens and Princeſſes,
for Ladies of high mark, for divine beauties:
to look ſo lowe as this cheap common ſweetneſſe,
would ſpeak me baſe, my names and glories nothing.
I grant I made a vow; what was I then?
as ſhe is now, of no ſort (Hope made me promiſe)
but now I am: to keep this vow, were monſtrous, a madneſſe, and a lowe inglorious fondneſſe.
Del. Take heed, proud man.
Druſ. Princes may love with Titles,
but I with Truth.
Del. Take heed; here ſtands thy deſtinie;
thy Fate here follows.
Dio. Thou doating Sorcereſſe, wouldſt have me love this Thing, that is not worthy to kneel unto my Saint? to kiſſe her ſhadow?
Great Princes are her ſlaves; ſelected beauties bow at her beck: the mighty Perſian's daughter (bright as the breaking Eaſt, as the mid-day glorious) waits her commands, and grows proud in her pleaſures.
I'll ſee her honour'd: ſome Watch I ſhall think of,
that ſhall advance ye both; mean time I'll favour ye. Exit.
Del. Mean time I'll haunt thee. Cry not (wench) be conſident, ere long, thou ſhalt more pitie him (obſerve me)
and pitie him in truth, then now thou ſeek'ſt him:
my Art and I are yet companions. Come, Girl. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Geta, Lictors.

Get. I am too merciful, I finde it (friends) of too ſoft a nature to be an Officer;
I bear too much remorſe.
1 Lict. 'T is your own fault, Sir;
for look you, One ſo newly warm in Office
ſhould lay about him blindfold, like true Juſtice, hit where it will: the more ye whip and hang, Sir, (though without cauſe; let that declare it ſelf afterward)
the more ye are admired.
Get. I think I ſhall be.—— 2 Lict. Your Worſhip is a man of a ſpare body, and prone to anger.
Get. Nay, I will be angry,
and, the beſt is, I need not ſhew my reaſon.
2 Lict. You need not, Sir, your place is without reaſon;
and what you want in growth and full proportion,
make up in rule and rigour.
Get. A rare Counſellor; inſtruct me further. Is it fit, my friends,
the Emperour my Maſter Dioclesian
ſhould now remember or the Times or Manners that call'd him plain down Dioclès?
1 Lict. He muſt not,
it ſtands not with his Royaltie.
Get. I grant ye,
I being then the Edile Getianus,
a man of Place, and Judge, it is held requiſite
I ſhould commit to my conſideration thoſe Raſcals of removed and ragged hours, that with unreverend mouthes call'd me Slave Geta?
2 Lict. You muſt forget their names; your Honour
Get. I do forget; but I'll hang their natures: (bids ye.
I will aſcend my Place, which is of Juſtice;
and Mercy, I forget thee.
Suitor. A rare Magiſtrate; another Solon ſure.
Get. Bring out the offenders.
1 Lict. There are none yet, Sir, but no doubt there will be.

But

but if you please touch some things of those natures.
Get. And am I ready, and mine anger too?
the melancholy of a Magistrate upon me,
and no offenders to execute my fury?
Ha? no offenders, knaves?
1 Lict. There are knaves indeed, Sir,
but we hope shortly to have 'em for your Worship.
Get. No men to hang or whip? are you good Officers, that provide no fuel for a Judges fury?
in this Place something must be done; this Chair, I tell ye,
when I sit down, must savour of Severitie:
therefore I warn ye all, bring me lewd people,
or likely to be lewd; twigs must be cropt too:
let me have evil persons in abundance, or make 'em evil; 't is all one, do but say so,
that I may have fit matter for a Magistrate;
and let me work. If I sit empty once more,
and lose my longing, as I am true Edile,
and as I hope to rectifie my Countrie,
you are those scabs I will scratch off from the Common-wealth:
you are those Rascals of the State I treat of,
and you shall finde and feel.—— 2 Lict. You shall have many, many notorious people.
Get. Let 'em be people, and take ye notorious to your selves. Mark me, my Lictors, and you, the rest of my Officials;
If I be angry, as my place will ask it,
and want fit matter to dispose my Authoritie,
I'll hang a hundred of ye: I'll not stay longer,
nor enquire no further into your offences:
it is sufficient that I finde no Criminals, and therefore I must make some: if I cannot,
suffer my self; for so runs my Commission.
Suitor. An admirable, zealous and true Justice.
1 Lict. I cannot hold: if there be any people,
of what degree soever, or what qualitie,
that would behold the wonderful works of Justice in a new Officer, a man conceal'd yet, let him repair, and see, and hear, and wonder at the most wise and gracious Getianus.

Enter Delphia and Drusilla.

Get. This qualifies a little. What are these?
Del. You shall not mourn still: times of recreation, to allay this sadnesse, must be sought. What's here?
a superstitious flock of sensesse people worshipping a signe in Office?
Get. Lay hold on her,
and hold her fast,
she'll slip thorow your fingers like an Eel else;
I know her tricks: hold her, I say, and binde her,
or hang her first, and then I'll tell her wherefore.
Del. What have I done?
Get. Thou hast done enough to undo thee;
thou hast presséd to the Emperours presence without my warrant,
I being his key and image.
Del. You are an image indeed, and of the coursest stuff, and the worst making that ere I look'd on yet: I'll make as good an Image of an Asse.
Get. Besides, thou art a woman of a lewd life.
Del. I am nowhere, Sir, nor no common fame has yet proclaim'd me to the people, vitious.
Get. Thou art to me a damnable lewd woman, which is as much as all the people swore it;
I know thou art a keeper of tame devils:
and whereas great and grave men of my Place can by the Laws be allow'd but one apiece, for their own services and recreations;
thou, like a traiterous quean, keepst twenty devils;
twenty in ordinary.
Del. Pray ye, Sir, be pacified,
if that be all: and if ye want a servant,
you shall have one of mine shall serve for nothing, faithful, and diligent, and a wise devil too;
think for what end.
Get. Let her alone, 't is useful;
we men of businesse must use speedie servants:
let me see your family.
Del. Think but one, he is ready.
Get. A devil for intelligence? No, no,
he will lye beyond all travellers. A State-devil?
Neither; he will undo me at mine own weapon.
For execution? he will hang me too.
I would have a handsom, pleasant and a fine she-devil,
to entertain the Ladies that come to me;
a travell'd devil too, that speaks the tongues,
and a neat carving devil.

Musick.
Enter a she-devil.

Del. Be not fearful.
Get. A prettie brown devil ifaith; may I not kisse her?
Del. Yes, and embrace her too; she is your servant.
Fear not; her lips are cool enough.
Get. She is marvellous well mounted; what 's her name?
Del. Lucifera.
Get. Come hither, Lucifera, and kisse me.
Del. Let her sit on your knee.
Get. The Chair turns: hey-boys:
pleasant ifaith, and a fine facetious devil.

Dance.

Del. She would whisper in your ear, and tell ye wonders.
Get. Come; what 's her name?
Del. Lucifera.
Get. Come, Lucie, come, speak thy minde. I am certain (burnt to ashes.

Exeunt.

I have a kinde of Glasse-house in my cod-piece.
Are these the flames of State? I am rosted over, over, and over-rosted. Is this Office?
the pleasures of Authoritie? I'll no more on't, till I can punish devils too; I'll quit it.
Some other Trade now, and some course lesse dangerous, or certainly I'll tyle again for two-pence.

Exit.

Scœna Tertia.

Enter Charinus, Aurelia, Cassana, Ambassadours, Attendants.

Aur. Never dispute with me; you cannot have her:
nor name the greatnesse of your King; I scorn him:
your knees to me are nothing; should he bow too,
it were his dutie, and my power to slight him.
Cha. She is her woman; never sue to me;
and in her power to render her, or keep her;
and she, my sister, not to be compell'd,
nor have her own snatch'd from her.
Amb. We desire not;
but for what ransom she shall please to think of;
Jewels, or Towns, or Provinces.
Aur. No ransom,
No, not your Kings own head, his crown upon it, and all the lowe ſubjections of his People.

Am. Fair Princes ſhould have tender thoughts.
Aur. Is ſhe too good to wait upon the mighty Emperours ſiſter?
What Princeſſe of that ſweetneſſe, or that excellence, ſprung from the proudeſt, and the mightieſt Monarchs,
but may be highly bleſt to be my ſervant?
Caſ. 'Tis moſt true, mighty Lady.
Aur. Has my fair uſage made you ſo much deſpiſe me and your fortune, that ye grow weary of my entertainments?
Henceforward, as ye are, I will command ye,
and as you were ordain'd my priſoner,
my ſlave, and one I may diſpoſe of any way,
no more my fair Companion: tell your King ſo:
and if he had more ſiſters, I would have 'em,
and uſe 'em as I pleaſe. You have your Anſwer.
Amb. We muſt take ſome other way: force muſt com-Enter Maximinian. (pel it. Exit.
Max. Now if thou beeſt a Propheteſſe, and canſt do things of that wonder that thy tongue delivers, canſt raiſe me too: I ſhall be bound to ſpeak thee:
I half believe, confirm the other to me,
and Monuments to all ſucceeding Ages,
of thee, and of thy piety.— Now ſhe eyes me.
Now work great power of Art: ſhe moves unto me:
how ſweet, how fair, and lovely her aſpects are?
her eyes are like bright Ioan flames ſhot thorow me.
Aur. O my fair friend, where have you been?
Max. What am I?
what does ſhe take me for? Work ſtill, work ſtrongly.
Aur. Where have you fled, my loves and my embraces?
Max. I am beyond my wits.
Aur. Can one poor Thunder, whoſe cauſes are as common as his noiſes,
make ye defer your lawful and free pleaſures?
ſtrike terrour to a Souldiers heart, a Monarchs?
Thorow all the fires of angry heaven, thorow tempeſts that ſing of nothing but deſtruction, even underneath the bolt of Jove, then ready,
and aiming dreadfully, I would ſeek you,
and flie into your arms.
Max. I ſhall be mighty,
and (which I never knew yet) I am goodly;
for certain, a moſt handſom man.
Cha. Fie, ſiſter,
what a forgetful weakneſſe is this in ye?
what a light preſence? theſe are words and offers due onely to your husband Dioclefian;
this free behaviour onely his.
Aur. 'Tis ſtrange
that onely empty Names compel Affections:
this man, ye ſee, give him what name or title, let it be nere ſo poor, nere ſo deſpis'd (brother)
this lovely man.—
Max. Though I be hang'd, I'll forward:
for (certain) I am excellent, and knew not.
Aur. This rare and ſweet young man, ſee how he looks,
Max. I'll juſtle hard, dear Uncle. (Sir,
Aur. This Thing, I ſay,
let him be what he will, or bear what fortune,
this moſt unequall'd man, this ſpring of beauty deſerves the bed of Juno.
Cha. You are not mad.
Max. I hope ſhe be; I am ſure I am little better.
Aur. O fair, ſweet man!
Cha. For ſhame refrain this impudence. (bleſſing:
Max. Would I had her alone, that I might ſeal this ſure, ſure ſhe ſhould not beg: If this continue, as I hope (heaven) it will; Uncle, I'll nick ye, I'll nick ye, by this life. Some would fear killing in the purſuit now of ſo rare a venture; Enter Dio-
I am covetous to die for ſuch a Beauty. cles.
Mine Uncle comes: now, if ſhe ſtand, I am happie.
Cha. Be right again, for honours ſake.
Dio. Fair Miſtris—
Aur. What man is this? Away. What ſawcy fellow?
dare any ſuch baſe groom preſſe to ſalute me?
Dio. Have ye forgot me (Fair) or do you jeſt with me?
I'll tell ye what I am: come, 'pray ye look lovely.
Nothing but frowns and ſcorns?
Aur. Who is this fellow?
Dio. I'll tell ye who I am: I am your husband.
Aur. Husband to me?
Dio. To you. I am Dioclefian.
Max. More of this ſport, and I am made, old mother:
effect but this thou haſt begun.
Dio. I am he (Lady)
reveng'd your brothers death; ſlew cruel Aper:
I am he the Souldier courts, the Empire honours, your Brother loves: am he (my lovely Miſtris) will make you Empreſſe of the world.
Max. Still excellent:
Now I ſee too, mine Uncle may be cozen'd.
An Emperour may ſuffer like another.
Well ſaid (old mother) hold but up this miracle.
Aur. Thou lyeſt; thou art not he: thou a brave fellow?
Cha. Is there no ſhame, no modeſtie in women?
Aur. Thou one of high and full mark?
Dio. Gods, what ails ſhe?
Aur. Generous and noble? Fie, thou lyeſt moſt baſely.
Thy face, and all aſpect upon thee, tells me thou art a poor Dalmatian ſlave, a lowe thing not worth the name of Romane: ſtand off farther.
Dio. What may this mean?
Aur. Come hither, my Endymion;
come, ſhew thy ſelf, and all eyes be bleſſed in thee.
Dio. Hah? what is this?
Aur. Thou fair Star that I live by,
look lovely on me, break into full brightneſſe:
Look, here 's a face now, of another making,
another mold; here 's a divine proportion,
eyes fit for Phœbus ſelf, to gild the world with;
and there 's a brow arch'd like the ſtate of heaven;
look how it bends, and with what radience,
as if the Synod of the gods ſate under:
look there, and wonder: now behold that fellow,
that admirable thing, cut with an ax out.
Max. Old woman, though I cannot give thee recom-yet (certainly) I'll make thy name as glorious. (pence, Dio. Is this in truth?
Cha. She is mad, and you muſt pardon her.
Dio. She hangs upon him: ſee.
Cha. Her fit is ſtrong now:
be not you paſſionate.
Dio. She kiſſes.
Cha. Let her;
't is but the fondneſſe of her fit.
Dio. I am fool'd,
and if I ſuffer this.
Cha. Pray ye (friend) be pacified, this will be off anon: ſhe goes in. Exit Aurelia.

Dio.

Dio. Sirha.
Max. What ſay you, Sir?
Dio. How dare thy lips, thy baſe lips?
Max. I am your kinſman Sir, and no ſuch baſe one:
I ſought no kiſſes, nor I had no reaſon to kick the Princeſſe from me: 'twas no manners:
I never yet compell'd her: of her courteſie what ſhee beſtows Sir, I am thankfull for.
Dio. Be gone villain.
Max. I will, and I will go off with that glory, and magnifie my fate. Exit.
Dio. Good brother leave me,
I am to my ſelf a trouble now.
Char. I am ſorry for't.
You'll find it but a woman-fit to try ye.
Dio. It may be ſo; I hope ſo.
Cha. I am aſham'd, and what I think I bluſh at. Exit.
Dio. What miſery hath my great Fortune bred me?
and how far muſt I ſuffer? Poor and low States, though they know wants and hungers, know not theſe, know not theſe killing Fates: Little contents them,
and with that little they live, Kings commanding, and ordering both their Ends and Loves. O Honour!
how geedily men ſeek thee, and once purchaſed,
how many enemies to mans peace bringſt thou?
how many griefs and ſorrows, that like ſheers,
like fatall ſheers, are ſheering off our lives ſtill?
how many ſad eccliſpes do we ſhine thorow?
Enter Delphia, Druſilla vail'd.
When I preſum'd I was bleſſ'd in this fair woman,
Del. Behold him now, and tell me how thou likeſt him.
Dio. When all my hopes were up, and Fortune dealt me even for the greateſt and the happieſt Monarch, then to be cozen'd, to be cheated baſely?
by mine owne kinſman croſs'd? O villain kinſman!
Curſe of my blood; becauſe a little younger,
a little ſmoother fac'd: O falſe, falſe woman,
falſe and forgetfull of thy faith: I'll kill him.
But can I kill her hate too? No: he wooes not,
nor worthie is of death, becauſe ſhe follows him,
becauſe ſhe courts him: Shall I kill an innocent?
O Diocles! would thou hadſt never known this,
nor ſurfeited upon this ſweet Ambition,
that now lies bitter at thy heart: O Fortune, that thou haſt none to fool and blow like bubbles,
but Kings, and their Contents!
Del. What think ye now, Girl?
Dru. Upon my life, I pity his misfortune:
See how he weeps; I cannot hold.
Del. Away fool;
he muſt weep bloody tears before thou haſt him.
How fare ye now, brave Dioclefian?
What? lazie in your loves? has too much pleaſure dull'd your moſt mighty faculties?
Dio. Art thou there?
more to torment me? Doſt thou come to mock me?
Del. I doe: and I do laugh at all thy ſuffrings.
I that have wrought 'em come to ſcorn thy wailings:
I told thee once, This is thy fate, this woman,
and as thou uſeſt her, ſo thou ſhalt proſper.
It is not in thy power to turn this deſtiny, not ſtop the torrent of thoſe miſeries
(if thou neglecteſt her ſtill) ſhall fall upon thee.
Sight that thou art diſhoneſt, falſe of faith,
proud, and doſt think no power can croſſe thy pleaſures;
thou wilt find a Fate above thee.
Dru. Good Aunt ſpeak mildly:
ſee how he looks and ſuffers.
Dio. I find and feel, woman, that I am miſerable.
Del. Thou art moſt miſerable.
Dio. That as I am the moſt, I am moſt miſerable.
But didſt thou work this?
Del. Yes, and will purſue it.
Dio. Stay there, and have ſome pity: fair Druſilla, let me perſwade thy mercy, thou haſt lov'd mee,
although I know my ſuit will ſound unjuſtly to make thy love the means, to loſe it ſelfe, have pity on me.
Dru. I will do.
Del. Peace Neece.
although this ſoftneſſe may becõme your love,
your care muſt ſcorn it. Let him ſtill contemn thee,
And ſtill I'll work: the ſame affection
he ever ſhews to thee, be it ſweet or bitter, the ſame Aurelia ſhall ſhew him; no further:
nor ſhall the wealth of all his Empire free this.
Dio. I muſt ſpeak fair. Lovely young maid, forgive me, look gently on my ſorrows: You that grieve too,
I ſee it in your eyes, and thus I meet it.
Dru. O Aunt, I am bleſſ'd.
Dio. Be not both young and cruell, again I beg it, thus.
Dru. Thus, Sir, I grant it. Enter Aurelia.
He's mine own now, Aunt.
Del. Not yet (Girl) thou art cozen'd. (ence?
Aur. O my deer Lord, how have I wrong'd your patihow wandred from the truth of my affections?
how (like a wanton fool) ſhun'd that I lov'd moſt?
but you are full of goodneſſe to forgive, Sir,
as I of griefe to beg, and ſhame to take it:
ſure I was not my ſelf, ſome ſtrange illuſion,
or what you pleaſe to pardon.
Dio. All, my Dereſt;
all, my Delight; and with more pleaſure take thee,
then if there had been no ſuch dream: for certain,
it was no more.
Aur. Now you have ſeal'd forgiveneſſe,
I take my leave; and the gods keep your goodneſſe.
Exit.
Del. You ſee how kindneſſe proſpers: be but ſo kind to marry her, and ſee then what new fortunes, new joyes, and pleaſures; far beyond this Lady, beyond her Greatneſſe too.
Dio. I'll die a dog firſt.
Now I am reconcil'd, I will enjoy her in ſpight of all thy ſpirits, and thy witchcrafts.
Del. Thou ſhalt not (fool).
Dio. I will, old doating Divels;
and wert thou any thing but air and ſpirit,
my ſword ſhould tell thee.
Del. I contemn thy threatnings, and thou ſhalt know I hold a power above thee.
Wee muſt remove Aurelia: Come, farewell fool,
when thou ſhalt ſee me next, thou ſhalt bow to me.
Dio. Look thou appear no more to croſſe my pleaſures.
Exeunt.

Actus

Actus Quartus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Chorus.

So full of matter is our Hiſtorie,
Yet mix'd, I hope with ſweet varietie,
The accidents not vulgar too, but rare,
And fit to be preſented, that there wants
Room in this narrow Stage, and time to expreſſe
In Action to the life, our Diocleſian
In his full luſtre: Yet (as the Statuarie,
That by the large ſize of Alcides foot,
Gheſſ'd at his Whole proportion) ſo We hope,
Your apprehenſive judgements will conceive
Out of the ſhadow We can only ſhew,
How fair the body was; and will be pleaſ'd,
Out of your wonted goodneſſe, to behold
As in a ſilent Mirrour, what We cannot
With fit conveniencie of time, allow'd
For ſuch Preſentments, cloath in vocall ſounds.
Yet with ſuch Art the Subject is conveigh'd,
That every Scene and paſſage ſhall be cleer
Even to the groſſeſt underſtander here.

Loud Muſick.

Dumb Shew.

Enter (at one door) Delphia, Ambaſſadors, they whiſper together; they take an oath upon her hand; She circles them (kneeling) with her Magick rod; They riſe and draw their Swords. Enter (at the other door) Diocleſian, Charinus, Maximinian, Niger, Aurelia, Caſſana, Guard; Charinus and Niger perſwading Aurelia; She offers to imbrace Maximinian; Diocles draws his ſword, keeps off Maximinian, turns to Aurelia, kneels to her, laies his ſword at her feet, ſhe ſcornfully turns away: Delphia gives a ſigne; the Ambaſſadors and Souldiers ruſh upon them, ſeiſe on Aurelia, Caſſana, Charinus, and Maximinian; Diocleſian and others offer to reſcue them; Delphia raiſes a Miſt: Exeunt Ambaſſadors and Priſoners, and the reſt diſcontented.

The ſhilfull Delphia finding by ſure proof
The preſence of Aurelia dim'd the beauty
Of her Druſilla; and in ſpight of Charms,
The Emperour her Brother, Great Charinus,
Still urg'd her to the love of Diocleſian,
Deals with the Perſian Legats, that were bound For the Ranſom of Caſſana, to remove Aurelia, Maximinian, and Charinus
Out of the ſight of Rome; but takes their oathes
(In lieu of her aſſiſtance) that they ſhall not
On any terms, when they were in their power,
Preſume to touch their lives: This yeelded to,
They lie in ambuſh for 'em. Diocleſian
Still mad for fair Aurelia, that doated
As much upon Maximinian, twice had kill'd him,
But that her frown reſtrain'd him: He purſues her
With all humilitie; but ſhe continues
Proud and diſdainfull. The ſign given by Delphia,
The Perſians break thorow, and ſeize upon
Charinus and his Siſter, with Maximinian,
And free Caſſana. For their ſpeedy reſcue,
Enraged Diocleſian draws his ſword,
And bids his Guard aſſiſt him: Then too weak
Had been all oppoſition and reſiſtance
The Perſians could have made againſt their fury,
If Delphia by her cunning had not raiſ'd
A foggie miſt, which as a clond conceal'd them,
Deceiving their Purſuers. Now be pleaſ'd,
That your Imaginations may help you
To think them ſafe in Perſia, and Diocleſian
For their diſaſters circled round with ſorrow,
Yet mindfull of the wrong. Their future fortunes
We will preſent in Action; and are bold
In that which follows, that the Moſt ſhall ſay,
'Twas well begun, but the End crown'd the Play.

Exit.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Diocles, Niger, Senators, Guard.

Dio. Talk not of comfort; I have broke my faith, and the Gods fight againſt me: and proud man, how-ever magnified, is but as duſt before the raging whirlwind of their juſtice. What is it to be great? ador'd on earth? when the immortall Powers that are above us turn all our bleſſings into horrid curſes, and laugh at our reſiſtance, or prevention of what they purpoſe? O the Furies that I feel within me! whip'd on, by their angers, for my tormentors. Could it elſe have been in Nature, that a few poor fugitive Perſians, unfriended, and unarmed too, could have rob'd me (in Rome, the worlds Metropolis, and her glory; in Rome, where I command, inviron'd round with ſuch invincible Troops that know no fear, but want of noble Enemies) of thoſe jewels I priz'd above my life, and I want power to free them, if thoſe gods I have provok'd had not given ſpirit to the undertakers, and in their deed protected 'em?

Nig. Great Ceſar, your ſafetie does confirm you are their care, and that how-ere their practices reach others, you ſtand above their malice.

1 Sen. Rome in us offers (as means to further your revenge) the lives of her beſt Citizens, and all they ſtand poſſeſſ'd of.

1 Gu. Do but lead us on with that invincible and undaunted courage which waited bravely on you, when you appear'd the Minion of Conqueſt: Married rather

to

to glorious Victory, and we will drag (though all the enemies of life conſpire againſt our undertakings) the proud Perſian out of his ſtrongeſt hold.

2. Gu. Be but your ſelf,
and do not talk but doe.

3 Gu. You have hands and ſwords,
Limbs to make up a well proportion'd Army,
that onely want in you an Head to lead us.

Dio. The gods reward your goodneſſe; and beleeve, how-ere (for ſome great ſin) I am mark'd out the object of their hate, though Jove ſtood ready to dart his three-fold thunder, on this head, it could not fright me from a fierce purſuit of my revenge: I will redeem my friends, and with my friends mine honour; at leaſt fall like to my ſelf, a Souldier.

Nig. Now we hear
Great Diocleſian ſpeak.

Dio. Draw up our Legions, and let it be your care (my much lov'd Niger)
to haſten the remove: And fellow-ſouldiers, your love to me will teach you to endure both long and tedious marches.

1 Gu. Die hee accurſ'd that thinks of reſt or ſleep, before he ſets his foot on Perſian earth.

Nig. Wee know our glory:
the dignitie of Rome, and what's above all can be urg'd, the quiet of your mind depends upon our haſt.

Dio. Remove to night:
five dayes ſhall bring me to you.

All. Happineſſe to Ceſar, and glorious victorie. Exeunt.

Dio. The cheerfulneſſe of my Souldiers gives aſſurance of good ſucceſſe abroad; if firſt I make my peace at home here. There is ſomething chides me, and ſharply tels me, that my breach of faith to Delphia and Druſilla, is the ground of my misfortunes: And I muſt remember, while I was lov'd, and in great Delphia's grace, ſhe was as my good angell, and bound Fortune to proſper my deſignes: I muſt appeaſe her:
Let others pay their knees, their vows, their prayers to weak imagin'd Powers; ſhee is my All,
and thus I do invoke her. Knowing Delphia, thou more then woman, and though thou vouchſafeſt to grace the earth with thy celeſtiall ſteps, and taſte this groſſer air, thy heavenly ſpirit hath free acceſſe to all the ſecret counſels which a full Senat of the gods determine when they conſider man: The braſſe-leav'd book of Fate lies open to thee, where thou read'ſt, and faſhioneſt the deſtinies of men at thy wiſh'd pleaſure: Look upon thy creature, and as thou twice haſt pleaſed to appear to reprehend my falſhood, now vouchſafe to ſee my lowe ſubmiſſion.

Del. What's thy will?
falſe, and unthankfull, (and in that deſerving all humane ſorrowes) dar'ſt thou hope from me relief or comfort?

Dio. Penitence does appeaſe th'incenſed Powers, and Sacrifice takes off their heavie angers; thus I tender both:
the Maſter of great Rome, and in that Lord of all the Sun gives heat and being to, thus ſues for mercy: Be but as thou were,
the Pilot to the Bark of my good fortune, and once more ſteer my Actions to the Port of glorious honour, and if I fall off hereafter from my faith to this ſweet Virgin, joyne with thoſe Powers that puniſh perjury, to make me an example, to deter others from being falſe.

Dru. Upon my ſoul
you may beleeve him: nor did he ere purpoſe to me but nobly; hee made triall how I could endure unkindneſſe; I ſee Truth triumphat in his ſorrow. Deereſt Aunt, both credit him, and help him; and on aſſurance that what I plead for, you cannot deny,
I raiſe him thus, and with this willing kiſſe
I ſeale his pardon.

Dio. O that I ere look'd beyond this abſtract of all womans goodneſſe.

Del. I am thine again; thus I confirm our league:
I know thy wiſhes, and how much thou ſufferſt in honour for thy friends: thou ſhalt repair all;
for to thy fleet I'll give a ſore-right winde to paſſe the Perſian gulf; remove all lets that may moleſt thy ſouldiers in their March that paſſe by land: and deſtiny is falſe, if thou prove not victorious: Yet remember, when thou art rais'd up to the higheſt point of humane happineſſe, ſuch as move beyond it muſt of neceſſitie deſcend. Think on't, and uſe thoſe bleſſings that the gods powre on you with moderation.

Dio. As their Oracle
I hear you, and obey you, and will follow your grave directions.

Del. You will not repent it. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Niger, Geta, Guard, Souldiers, Enſignes.

Nig. How do you like your entrance to the Warre?
when the whole Body of the Army moves,
ſhews it not gloriouſly?

Get. 'Tis a fine May-game:
but eating and drinking I think are forbad in't,
(I mean, with leaſure) wee walk on, and feed like hungry boyes that haſte to School; or as we carried fiſh to the City, dare ſtay no where,
for fear our ware ſhould ſtink.

1. Gu. That's the neceſſitie of our ſpeedy March.

Get. Sir, I doe love my eaſe, and though I hate all Seats of Judicature,
I mean in the Citie, for conveniencie,
I ſtill will be a Juſtice in the War,
and ride upon my foot-cloth. I hope a Captain (and a gown'd-Captain too) may be diſpenſ'd with.
I tell you, and do not mock me, when I was poor,
I could endure like others, cold and hunger;
but ſince I grew rich, let but my finger ake,
or feel but the leaſt pain in my great toe, unleſſe I have a Doctor, mine own Doctor,

that

that may aſſure me, I am gone.

Nig. Come, fear not;
you ſhall want nothing.

1. Gu. We will make you fight
as you were mad.

Get. Not too much of fighting, Friend:
it is thy trade, that art a common ſouldier:
We Officers, by our place, may ſhare the ſpoile,
and never ſweat for't.

2. Gu. You ſhall kil for practice but your dozen or two a day.

Get. Thou talkſt as if thou wert lowſing thy ſelf: but yet I will make danger.
If I prove one of the Worthies, ſo: However,
I'll have the fear of the gods before my eyes,
and doe no hurt, I warrant you.

Nig. Come, March on,
and humour him for our mirth.

1. Gu. 'Tis a fine peak-gooſe.

Nig. But one that fools to the Emperor, and in that,
a wiſe man and a Souldier.

1. Gu. True moralitie. Exeunt.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Coſroe, Caſſana, Perſians; and Charinus, Maximinian, Aurelia (bound) with Souldiers.

Coſ. Now by the Perſian gods, moſt truly welcom, encompaſſ'd thus with tributary kings,
I entertain you. Lend your helping hands to ſeat her by me: and thus raiſ'd, bow all,
to do her honour: O, my beſt Caſſana, Siſter, and partner of my life and Empire,
wee'll teach thee to forget with preſent pleaſures thy late captivitie: and this proud Roman, that uſ'd thee as a ſlave, and did diſdain
a Princely Ranſom, ſhall (if ſhe repine) be forc'd by various Tortures, to adore what ſhe of late contemn'd.

Caſ. All greatneſſe ever attend Coſroe: though Perſia be ſtil'd
the nurſe of pomp and pride; wee'll leave to Rome her native crueltie. For know Aurelia, a Roman Princeſſe, and a Ceſars Siſter, though now, like thee captiv'd, I can forget.
thy barbarous uſage: and though thou to me (when I was in thy power) didſt ſhew thy ſelf a moſt inſulting Tyranneſſe, I to thee may prove a gentle Miſtris.

Aur. O my Stars,
a Miſtris? can I love and owe that name to fleſh and bloud? I was borne to command, train'd up in Soveraigntie; and I, in death can quit the name of ſlave: She that ſcorns life, may mock captivitie.

Char. Rome will be Rome
when we are nothing: and her powr's the ſame which you once quak'd at.

Max. Dioclefian lives;
hear it, and tremble: Lives (thou King of Perſia)
the Maſter of his fortune, and his honour:
and though by diveliſh Arts wee were ſurpriz'd,
and made the prey of Magick and of Theft,
and not won nobly, we ſhall be redeem'd,
and by a Roman war; and every wrong
we ſuffer here, with intereſt, be return'd on the inſulting doer.

1 Per. Sure theſe Romanes are more then men.

2 Per. Their great hearts will not yeeld, they cannot bend to any adverſe Fate,
ſuch is their confidence.

Coſr. They then ſhall break.
Why, you rebellious wretches, dare you ſtill contend, when the leaſt breath, or nod of mine marks you out for the fire? or to be made the prey of wolfs or vultures? The vain name of Roman Legions, I ſlight thus, and ſcorn:
and for that boaſted bug-bear, Dioclefian
(which you preſume on) would he were the Maſter but of the ſpirit, to meet me in the field, hee ſoon ſhould find, that our immortall Squadrons,
that with full numbers ever are ſupply'd, (could it be poſſible they ſhould decay) dare front his boldeſt Troops, and ſcatter 'em, as an high towring Falcon on her Stretches, ſevers the fearfull fowl. And by the Sun,
the Moon, the Winds, the nouriſhers of life,
and by this Sword, the inſtrument of death,
ſince that you fly not humbly to our Mercy,
but yet dare hope your libertie by force;
if Dioclefian dare not attempt to free you with his ſword, all ſlavery that crueltie can find out to make you wretched, falls heavie on you.

Max. If the Sun keeps his courſe, and the earth can bear his ſouldiers march, I fear not.

Aur. Or libertie, or revenge.

Char. On that I build too. A Trumpet.

Aur. A Roman Trumpet!

Max. 'Tis: Comes it not like a pardon to a man condemn'd?

Coſr. Admit him. Enter Niger.
The purpoſe of thy coming?

Nig. My great Maſter,
the Lord of Rome, (in that all Power is ſpoken)
hoping that thou wilt prove a noble Enemie, and (in thy bold reſiſtance) worth his conqueſt, defies thee, Coſroe.

Max. There is fire in this.

Nig. And to encourage thy laborious powers to tug for Empire, dares thee to the Field, with this aſſurance, If thy ſword can win him,
or force his Legions with thy barbed horſe,
but to forſake their ground, that not alone
wing'd Victory ſhall take ſtand on thy Tent, but all the Provinces, and Kingdomes held by the Roman Garriſons in this Eaſtern world, ſhall be delivered up, and hee himſelf acknowledge thee his Soveraign. In return of this large offer, he asks onely this,
That till the doubtfull Dye of War determine who has moſt power, and ſhould command the other, thou wouldſt intreat thy Priſoners like their births,
and not their preſent Fortune: and to bring 'em (guarded) into thy Tent, with thy beſt Strengths, thy ableſt men of war, and thou thy ſelf ſworn to make good the place. And if he fail (maugre all oppoſition can be made) in his own perſon to compell his way,

and

and fetch them ſafely off, the day is thine, and hee (like theſe) thy priſoner.
Coſr. Though I receive this but as a Roman brave, I doe imbrace it, and love the ſender. Tell him, I will bring my Priſoners to the field, and without ods, againſt his ſingle force, alone defend 'em;
or elſe with equall numbers. Courage, noble Princes, and let Poſteritie record, that we this memorable day reſtor'd to Perſia, that Empire of the world, great Philips ſon raviſh'd from us, and Greece gave up to Rome.
This our ſtrong comfort, that we cannot fall
ingloriouſly, ſince we contend for all. Exeunt.
Flouriſh, Alarms.

Scæna quinta.

Enter Geta, Guard, Souldiers.

Get. I'll ſwear the peace againſt 'em, I am hurt, run for a Surgeon, or I faint.
1. Gu. Bear up man,
'tis but a ſcratch.
Get. Scoring a man ore the coxcomb is but a ſcratch with you? ——— o' your occupation, your ſcurvie ſcuffling trade: I was told before my face was bad enough; but now I look like bloody bone, and raw head, to fright children;
I am for no uſe elſe.
2. Gu. Thou ſhalt fright men.
1. Gu. You look ſo terrible now: but ſee your face in the pummell of my ſword.
Get. I die, I am gone.
Oh my ſweet phyſiognomy. Enter 3 Perſians.
2. Gu. They come.
Now fight, or die indeed.
Get. I will ſcape this way:
I cannot hold my ſword; What would you have
of a maim'd man?
1. Gu. Nay, then I have a goad to prick you forward, Oxe.
2. Gu. Fight like a man, or die lie a dog.
Get. Shall I, like Ceſar fall
among my friends? no mercy? Et tu Brute?
You ſhall not have the honour of my death,
I'll fall by the Enemie firſt.
1. Gu. O brave, brave Geta; Perſians driven off.
he plaies the divell now! Enter Niger.
Nig. Make up for honour,
the Perſians ſhrink. The paſſage is laid open, great Diocleſian, like a ſecond Mars,
his ſtrong arm govern'd by the fierce Bellona, performs more then a man: His ſhield ſtruck full of Perſian darts, which now are his defence
againſt the Enemies ſwords, ſtill leads the way.
Of all the Perſian Forces, one ſtrong Squadron, Alarm's continued.
in which Coſroe in his own perſon fights, ſtands firm, and yet unrouted: Break thorow that,
the day, and all is ours. Retreat.
All. Victory, Victory. Exeunt.
Flouriſh.

Scæna Sexta.

Enter (in Triumph with Roman Enſignes) Guard, Diocleſian, Charinus, Aurelia, Maximinian, Niger, Geta, Coſroe, Caſſana, Perſians (as Priſoners): Delphia, Druſilla, privately.

Dio. I am rewarded in the Act: your freedome to me's ten thouſand Triumphs: You Sir, ſhare in all my Glories. And unkind Aurelia, from being a Captive, ſtill command the Victor.
Nephew, remember by whoſe gift you are free;
You I afford my pitie; baſer minds
inſult on the afflicted, You ſhall know, Vertue and Courage is admir'd and lov'd in Enemies: but more of that hereafter.
Thanks to your valour; to your ſwords I owe this wreath triumphant. Nor be thou forgot my firſt poor bondman, Geta, I am glad thou art turn'd a fighter.
Get. 'Twas againſt my will;
but now I am content with't.
Char. But imagine what honours can be done to you beyond theſe, tranſcending all example; 'tis in you to will, in us to ſerve it.
Nig. Wee will have his Statue of pure gold ſet in the Capitol, and he that bows not to it as a god,
makes forfeit of his head.
Max. I burſt with envie;
and yet theſe honours, which conferr'd on me,
would make me pace on air, ſeem not to move him.
Dio. Suppoſe this done, or were it poſſible
I could riſe higher ſtill, I am a man, and all theſe Glories, Empires heap'd upon me,
confirm'd by conſtant friends, and faithfull Guards, cannot defend me from a ſhaking feaver, or bribe the uncorrupted dart of death to ſpare me one ſhort minute. Thus adorn'd in theſe triumphant Robes, my body yeelds not a greater ſhadow then it did when I liv'd both poor, and obſcure; a ſwords ſharp point enters my fleſh as far; dreams break my ſleep as when I was a private man; my Paſſions are ſtronger tyrants on me; nor is Greatneſſe a ſaving Antidote to keep me from a traitors poyſon. Shall I praiſe my fortune, or raiſe the building of my happineſſe on her uncertain favour? or preſume ſhe is my owne, and ſure, that yet was never conſtant to any? ſhould my reaſon fail me (as flattery oft doth upon it) here's an example, to ſpeak how far her ſmiles are to be truſted;
The riſing Sun, this morning, ſaw this man
the Perſian Monarch, and thoſe Subjects proud that had the honour but to kiſſe his feet;
and yet ere his diurnall progreſſe ends,
hee is the ſcorn of Fortune: But you'll ſay, that ſhee forſook him for his want of courage, but never leaves the bold. Now by my hopes of peace and quiet here, I never met a braver Enemie: and to make it good,

Coſroe, Caſſana, and the reſt, be free,
and ranſomleſſe return.
Coſr. To ſee this vertue is more to me then Empire'; and to be orecome by you, a glorious victorie.
Max. What a divell means he next?
Dio. I know that Glory is like Alcides ſhirt, if it ſtay on us till pride hath mix'd it with our blood; not can we part with it at pleaſure: when wee would uncaſe, it brings along with it both fleſh and ſinews,
and leaves us living monſters.
Max. Would it were come to my turn to put it on: I'ld run the hazzard.
Dio. No, I will not be pluck'd out by the ears out of this glorious caſtle; uncompell'd
I will ſurrender rather: Let it ſuffice,
I have touch'd the height of humane happineſſe, and here I fix Nil ultra. Hitherto
I have liv'd a ſervant to ambitious thoughts, and fading glories: what remains of life,
I dedicate to Vertue; and to keep my faith untainted, farewell Pride and Pomp, and circumſtance of glorious Majeſtie, farewell for ever. Nephew, I have noted, that you have long with ſore eyes look'd upon my flouriſhing Fortune; you ſhall have poſſeſſion of my felicitie: I deliver up my Empire, and this Jem I prix'd above it, and all things elſe that made me worth your envie, freely unto you. Gentle Sir, your ſuffrage, to ſtrengthen this: the ſouldiers love I doubt not;
his valour (Gentlemen) will deſerve your favours, which let my prayers further. All is yours.
But I have been too liberall, and giv'n that
I muſt beg back again.
Max. What am I falne from?
Dio. Nay, ſtart not: It is only the poor Grange, the Patrimony which my Father left me,
I would be Tenant to.
Max. Sir, I am yours:
I will attend you there.
Dio. No, keep the Court:
ſeek you in Rome for honour: I will labour to finde content elſwhere. Diſſwade me not, by ——, I am reſolv'd. And now Druſilla, being as poor as when I vow'd to make thee
my wife: if thy love ſince hath felt no change,
I am ready to perform it.
Dru. I ſtill lov'd your Perſon, not your Fortunes: in a cottage, being yours, I am an Empreſſe.
Del. And I'll make the change moſt happy.
Dio. Do me then the honour, to ſee my vow perform'd. You but attend my Glories to the urn; where be it eſſes, welcome my mean eſtate: and as a due,
Wiſh Reſt to me, I Honour unto you.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter CHORUS.

Cho. The War with glory ended; and Coſroe
(Acknowledging his fealtie to Charinus*)*
Diſmiſſ'd in peace, returns to Perſia:
The reſt, arriving ſafely unto Rome,
Are entertain'd with Triumphs: Maximinian,
By the grace and interceſſion of his Uncle,
Saluted Ceſar: but good Dioclefian,
Weary of Pomp and State, retires himſelf
With a ſmall Train, to a moſt private Grange
In Lumbardie; Where the glad Country ſtrives
With Rurall Sports to give him entertainment:
With which delighted, he with eaſe forgets
All ſpecious trifles, and ſecurely taſtes
The certain pleaſures of a private life.
But oh Ambition, that eats into
With venom'd teeth, true thankfulneſſe, and honour.
And to ſupport her Greatneſſe, faſhions fears,
Doubts, and preventions to decline all dangers,
Which in the place of ſafetie, prove her ruine:
All which by proof'd to ſet in Maximinian,
To whom, his confer'd Soveraignty was like
A large ſail fill'd full with a fore-right Winde,
That drowns a ſmaller Bark: and hee once falne
Into ingratitude, makes no ſtop in miſchief,
But violently runs on. Adieu Maximinian all,
Honour, and Empire, abſolute command;
Yet being ill, long great he cannot ſtand. Exit.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Maximinian and Aurelia.

Aur. Why droops my Lord, my Love, my life, my Ceſar?
how ill this dulneſſe doth comport with Greatneſſe?
Does not (with open arms) your Fortune court you?
Rome know you for her Maſter? I my ſelf confeſſe you for my Husband? love, and ſerve you?
if you contemn not theſe, and think them curſes,
I know no bleſſings that ambitious fleſh could wiſh to feel beyond 'em.
Max. Beſt Aurelia,
the parent and the nurſe to all my Glories,
'tis not that thus embracing you, I think there is a heaven beyond it, that begets theſe ſad retirements; but the fear to loſe what it is hell to part with: better to have liv'd poor and obſcure, and never ſcal'd the top of hilly Empire, then to die with fear to be thrown headlong down, almoſt as ſoon
as we have reach'd it.
Aur. Theſe are Peanick terrours you faſhion to your ſelf: Is not my Brother (your equall and copartner in the Empire) vow'd and confirm'd your friend? the ſouldier conſtant?
Hath not your Uncle Dioclefian taken his laſt farewell o'th' world? What then can ſhake ye?
Max. The thought I may be ſhaken: and aſſurance that what we doe poſſeſſe is not our own,

but

but has depending on anothers favour:
for nothing's more uncertain (my Aurelia)
then Power that ſtands not on his proper Baſis, but borrowes his foundation. I'll make plain my cauſe of doubts and fears; for what ſhould I conceal from you, that are to be familiar with my moſt private thoughts? Is not the Empire my Uncles gift? and may he not reſume it upon the leaſt diſtaſte? Does not Charinus croſſe me in my deſignes? And what is Majeſtie when 'tis divided? Does not the inſolent Souldier call my command his donative? And what can take more from our honour? No (my wiſe Aurelia,)
If I to you am more then all the world, as ſure you are to me; as wee deſire to be ſecure, wee muſt be abſolute, and know no equall: when your Brother borrows
the little ſplendor that he has from us, and we are ſerv'd for fear, not at entreaty,
we may live ſafe; but till then, we but walk with heavie burthens on a ſea of glaſſe,
and our own weight will ſink us.

Aur. Your Mother brought you into the world an Emperor: you perſwade but what I would have counſell'd: Neerneſſe of blood, reſpect of pietie, and thankfulneſſe, and all the holy dreams of vertuous fools
muſt vaniſh into nothing, when Ambition
(the maker of great minds, and nurſe of honour) puts in for Empire. On then, and forget your ſimple Uncle; think he was the Maſter (in being once an Emperor) of a Jewell, whoſe worth and uſe he knew not: For Charinus,
no more my Brother, if hee be a ſtop to what you purpoſe; hee to Me's a ſtranger, and ſo to be remov'd.

Max. Thou more then woman, thou maſculine Greatneſſe, to whoſe ſoaring ſpirit to touch the ſtars ſeems but an eaſie flight;
O how I glory in thee! thoſe great women
Antiquitie is proud of, thou but nam'd, ſhall be no more remembred: but perſever,
and thou ſhalt ſhine among thoſe leſſer lights to all poſteritie like another Phebe, and ſo ador'd as ſhe is.

Aur. Here's Charinus, his brow furrow'd with anger.

Max. Let him ſtorm,
and you ſhall hear me thunder.

Cha. He diſpoſe of my Provinces at his pleaſure? and confer thoſe honours (that are onely mine to give) upon his creatures?

Nig. Mighty Sir, aſcribe it to his aſſurance of your love and favour,
and not to pride or malice.

Cha. No, good Niger, courteſie ſhall not fool me; he ſhall know
I lent a hand to raiſe him, and defend him, while he continues good: but the ſame ſtrength
if pride make him uſurp upon my Right, ſhall ſtrike him to the Center. You are well met, Sir.

Max. As you make the Encounter: Sir, I hear, that you repine, and hold your ſelf much griev'd,
in that, without your good leave, I beſtow'd the Gallian Proconſulſhip upon a follower of mine.

Cha. 'Tis true: and wonder you durſt attempt it.

Max. Durſt, Charinus?

Cha. Durſt:
again, I ſpeak it: Think you me ſo tame, ſo leaden and unactive, to ſit down with ſuch diſhonour? But, recall your grant, and ſpeedily; or by the Roman —— thou tripſt thine own heels up, and haſt no part in Rome, or in the Empire.

Max. Thou haſt none,
but by permiſſion: Alas, poor Charinus,
thou ſhadow of an Emperor, I ſcorn thee, thee, and thy fooliſh threats: The gods appoint him
the abſolute diſpoſer of the Earth, that has the ſharpeſt ſword. I am ſure (Charinus) thou wear'ſt one without edge. When cruell Aper had kill'd Numerianus, thy Brother, (an act that would have made a trembling coward more daring then Alcides) thy baſe feare made thee wink at it: then roſe up my Uncle (for the honour of the Empire, and of Rome) againſt the Traitor, and among his Guards puniſh'd the treaſon: This bold daring act got him the Souldiers ſuffrages to be Caſar.
And howſoever his too gentle nature
allow'd thee the name only, as his gift,
I challenge the ſucceſſion.

Cha. Thou art cozen'd.
When the receiver of a courteſie cannot ſuſtain the weight it carries with it,
'tis but a Triall, not a preſent Act.
Thou haſt in a few dayes of thy ſhort Reign,
in over-weening pride, riot and luſts, ſham'd noble Diocleſian, and his gift:
nor doubt I, when it ſhall arrive unto his certain knowledge, how the Empire groanes under thy Tyranny, but hee will forſake his private life, and once again reſume his laid-by Majeſtie: or at leaſt, make choice of ſuch an Atlas as may bear this burthen, too heavie for thy ſhouldiers. To effect this, lend your aſſiſtance (Gentlemen) and then doubt not but that this muſhroom (ſprung up in a night) ſhall as ſoon wither. And for you (Aurelia) if you eſteem your honour more then tribute paid to your lothſome appetite, as a Furie flie from his looſe embraces: ſo farewell;
ere long you ſhall hear more. Exeunt.

Aur. Are you ſtruck dumb, that you make no reply?

Max. Sweet, I will doe,
and after talk: I will prevent their plots,
and turn them on their own accurſed heads.
My Uncle? good: I muſt not know the names of Pietie or Pitie. Steel my heart, deſire of Empire, and inſtruct me, that the Prince that over others would bear ſway, checks at no Let that ſtops him in his way.
Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter three Shepherds, and two Countrymen.

1 Sh. Do you think this great man will continue here?
2 Sh. Continue here? what else? hee has bought the great Farme;
a great man, with a great Inheritance,
and all the ground about it, all the woods too;
and stock'd it like an Emperor. Now, all our sports again and all our merry Gambols, our May-Ladies, our evening-daunces on the Green, our Songs,
our Holliday good cheer, our Bag-pipes now Boyes, shall make the wanton Lasses skip again,
our Sheep-shearings, and all our knacks.
3 Sh. But heark ye,
we must not call him Emperor.
1 Countr. That's all one;
he is the king of good fellowes, that's no treason;
and so I'll call him still, though I be hang'd for't.
I grant ye, he has given his honour to another man,
he cannot give his humour: he is a brave fellow, and will love us, and we'll love him. Come hither Ladon, what new Songs, and what geers?
3 Sh. Enough: I'll tell ye he comes abroad anon to view his grounds, and with the help of Thirsis, and old Egon, (if his whorson could be gon) & Amaryllis,
and some few more o'th wenches, we will meet him,
and strike him such new Springs, and such free welcoms, shall make him scorn an Empire, forget Majestie,
and make him blesse the hour he liv'd here happy.
2 Countr. And we will second ye, we honest Carters,
we lads o'th' lash, with some blunt entertainment,
our Teams to two pence, will give him some content, or wee'll bawl fearfully.
3 Sh. Hee cannot expect now his Courtly entertainments, and his rare Musicks, and Ladies to delight him with their voyces;
honest and cheerfull toyes from honest meanings, and the best hearts they have. We must be neat all:
on goes my russet jerkin with blue buttons.
1 Sh. And my green slops I was married in; my bonnet with my carnation point with silver tags, boyes:
You know where I won it.
1 Countr. Thou wilt nere be old, Alexis,
1 Sh. And I shall find some toyes that have been favors, and nose-gayes, and such knacks: for there be wenches.
3 Sh. My mantle goes on too I plaid young Paris in,
and the new garters Amaryllis sent me. (ces.
1 Coun. Yes, yes: we'll all be handsom, and wash our faNeighbour, I see a remnant of March dust that's hatch'd into your chaps: I pray ye be carefull.

and mundifie your muzzell.
2. Countr. I'll to th' Barbers,
It shall cost me I know what. Who's this?
3. Sh. Give room, neighbours,
a great man in our State: gods blesse your Worship.
2. Countr. Encrease your Mastership.
Get. Thanks, my good people:
Stand off, and know your duties: as I take it you are the labouring people of this village, and you that keep the sheep. Stand farther off yet, and mingle not with my Authoritie,
I am too mighty for your company.
3. Sh. we know it Sir; and we desire your Worship to reckon us amongst your humble servants, and that our Country Sports, Sir,——
Get. For your Sports, Sir, they may be seen, when I shall think convenient,
when out of my discretion, I shall view 'em,
and hold 'em fit for licence. Ye look upon me, and look upon me seriously, as ye knew me:
'Tis true, I have been a Rascall, as you are,
a fellow of no mention, nor no mark,
just such another piece of dust, so fashion'd:
But Time, that purifies all things of merit, has set another stamp. Come neere now,
and be not fearfull; I take off my austeritie:
and know me for the great and mighty Steward under this man of Honour: know ye for my vassals, and at my pleasure; I can dispeople ye,
can blow you and your cattell out o'th' Country:
but fear me, and have favour. Come, go along with me, and I will hear your Songs, and perhaps like 'em.
3. Sh. I hope you will, Sir.
Get. 'Tis not a thing impossible.
Perhaps I'll sing my self, the more to grace ye and if I like your wenches.
3. Sh. We'll have the best, Sir, handsom young Girls.
Get. The handsomer, the better. Enter Delphia.
'May bring your wives too, 'twill be all one charge to ye;
for I must know your Families.
Del. 'Tis well said,
'tis well said, honest friends; I know ye are hatching
some pleasurable sports for your great Landlord:
fill him with joy, and win him a friend to ye,
and make this little Grange seem a large Empire, let out with home-contents: I'll work his favour,
which daily shall be on ye.
3. Sh. Then we'll sing daily,
and make him the best Sports.
Del. Instruct 'em Geta, and be a merry man again.
Get. Will ye lend me a divell, that we may daunce awhile?
Del. I'll lend thee two,
and Bag-pipes that shall blow alone.
Get. I thank ye:
but I'll know your divels of a cooler complexion first.
Come, follow, follow; I'll go fit and see ye. Exeunt.

Enter Diocles, and Drusilla.

Del. Do; and be ready an hour hence, and bring 'em;
for in the Grove you'll find him.
Dio. Come Drusilla,
the partner of my best contents: I hope now you dare beleeve me.
Dru. Yes, and dare say to ye,
I think ye now most happie.
Dio. You say true (Sweet) for by my——, I find now by experience,
Content was never Courtier.
Dru. I pray ye walk on, Sir,
the cool shades of the Grove invite ye.
Dio. O my Deesdit!
When man hasicast off his ambitious Greatnesse, and sunk into the sweetnesse of himself;
built his foundation upon honest thoughts,
not great, but good Desires his daily servants;

how

how quietly he sleeps! how joyfully
he wakes again, and looks on his possessions, and from his willing labours feeds with pleasure?
Here hangs no Comets in the shapes of Crowns,
to shake our sweet contents: not here, Drusilla, Cares, like Eclipses, darken our endeavours:
we love here without rivals, kisse with innocence;
our thoughts as gentle as our lips; our children
the double heirs both of our forms and faiths.

Dru. I am glad ye make this right use of this sweetnesse, this sweet retirednesse.

Dio. 'T is sweet indeed (love)
and every circumstance about it, shews it.
How liberal is the spring in every place here?
the artificial Court shews but a shadow,
a painted imitation of this glory.
Smell to this flower, here Nature has her excellence:
let all the perfumes of the Empire passe this,
the carefull'st Ladies cheek shew such a colour,
they are gilded and adulterate vanities.
And here in Povertie dwells noble Nature.
What pains we take to cool our wines, to allay us,

Musick below.

and bury quick the fuming god to quench us, methinks this Crystal Well? Ha! what strange musick?
'tis underneath, sure: how it stirs and joys me?
how all the birds set on? the fields redouble their odoriferous sweets? Heark how the ecc hoes——

Enter a Spirit from the Well.

Drus. See, Sir, those flowers from out the Well, spring to your entertainment.

Enter Delphia.

Dio. Blesse me.

Dru. Be not afraid, 't is some good Angel that 's come to welcom ye.

Del. Go neer and hear, son.

Song.

Dio. O mother, thank ye, thank ye, this was your will.

Del. You shall not want delights to blesse your presence.
Now ye are honest, all the Stars shall honour ye.

Enter shepherds and dancers.

Stay, here are Countrey-shepherds; here is some sport too, and you must grace it, Sir; 't was meant to welcom ye;
a King shall never feel your joy. Sit down, son.

A dance of Shepherds and Shepherdesses; Pan leading the men, Ceres the maids.

Hold, hold, my Messenger appears: leave off, friends, leave off a while, and breathe.

Dio. What news? ye are pale, mother.

Del. No, I am careful of thy safety (son) be not affrighted, but sit still; I am with thee.

Enter Maximinian, Aurelia, Souldiers.

And now dance out your dance. Do you know that per-
Be not amaz'd, but let him shew his dreadfullest. (son.

Max. How confident he sits amongst his pleasures, and what a chearful colour shews in's face,
and yet he sees me too, the Souldiers with me.

Aur. Be speedie in your work, (you will be stopt else) and then you are an Emperour.

Max. I will about it.

Dio. My Royal Cousin, how I joy to see ye,
you, and your Royal Empresse.

Max. You are too kinde, Sir.
I come not to eat with ye, and to surfeit in these poor Clowniſh pleasures; but to tell ye
I look upon ye like my Winding-sheet, the Coffin of my Greatnesse, nay, my Grave:
for whilst you are alive——

Dio. Alive, my Cousin?

Max. I say, Alive. I am no Emperour;
I am nothing but mine own disquiet.

Dio. Stay, Sir.

Max. I cannot stay. The Souldiers doat upon ye,
I would fain spare ye; but mine own security compels me to forget you are my Uncle, compels me to forget you made me Cæsar;
for whilst you are remembred, I am buried.

Dio. Did not I make ye Emperour, dear Cousin, the free gift from my speciall grace?

Del. Fear nothing.

Dio. Did not I chuse this poverty, to raise you?
that Royal woman gave into your arms too?
blesse'd ye with her bright beauties? gave the souldier,
the souldier that hung to me, fix'd him on ye?
gave ye the worlds command?

Max. This cannot help ye.

Dio. Yet this shall ease me. Can ye be so base (Cousin)
so far from Nobleness, so far from nature, as to forget all this? to tread this Turf on?
raise to your self so foul a monument that every common foot shall kick asunder?
must my blood glue ye to your peace?

Max. It must, Uncle;
I stand too loose else, and my foot too feeble:
you gone once, and their love retir'd, I am rooted.

Dio. And cannot this removed poor state obscure me?
I do not seek for yours, nor enquire ambitiously after your growing Fortunes. Take heed, my kinsman, ungratefulnesse and blood mingled together,
will, like two furious Tides——

Max. I must sail thorow 'em:
let 'em be Tides of death, Sir, I must stem up.

Dio. Hear but this last, and wisely yet consider;
Place round about my Grange a Garison,
that if I offer to exceed my limits,
or ever in my common talk name Emperour, ever converse with any greedie souldier, or look for adoration, nay, for courtesie above the days future.—Think who has fed ye, think (Cousin) who I am. Do ye slight my misery?
Nay, then I charge thee; nay, I meet thy cruelty.

Max. This cannot serve; prepare. Now fall on, souldiers, and all the treasure that I have.

Thunder and Lightning.

Sould. The earth shakes;
we totter up and down; we cannot stand, Sir;
me thinks the mountains tremble too.

2 Sould. The flashes how thick and hot they come? we shall be burn'd all.

Del. Fall on, Souldiers:
you that sell innocent blood, fall on full bravely.

Sould. We cannot stir.

Del. You have your libertie, to have you, Lady. One of you come do it.

A hand with a Bolt appears above.

Do you stand amaz'd? Look ore thy head, Maximinian, look, to thy terrour, what over-hangs thee:
nay, it will nail thee dead; look how it threatens thee:
the Bolt for vengeance on ungrateful wretches;
the Bolt of innocent blood: read those hot characters, and spell the will of heaven. Nay, lovely Lady, you must take part too, as spur to ambition.

Are

Are ye humble? Now ſpeak; my part 's ended.
Does all your glory ſhake?

Max. Hear us, great Uncle, good and great Sir, be pitiful unto us:
belowe your feet we lay our lives: be merciful:
begin you, heaven will follow.

Aur. Oh, it ſhakes ſtill.

Max. And dreadfully it threatens. We acknowledge our baſe and foul intentions. Stand between us;
for faults confeſs'd, they ſay, are half forgiven.
We are ſorry for our ſins. Take from us, Sir, that glorious weight that made us ſwell, that poiſon'd us;
that maſſe of Majeſtie I laboured under,
(too heavie and too mighty for my manage) that my poor innocent days may turn again, and my minde, pure, may purge me of theſe curſes;
by your old love, the blood that runs between us.

The hand taken in.

Aur. By that love once ye bare to me, by that Sir, that bleſſed maid enjoys——

Dio. Riſe up, dear Couſin, and be your words your judges: I forgive ye:
great as ye are, enjoy that greatneſſe ever,
whilſt I mine own Content make mine own Empire.
Once more I give ye all; learn to deſerve it,
and live to love your Good more then your Greatneſſe.
Now ſhew your loves to entertain this Emperour, my honeſt neighbours. Geta, ſee all handſom.
Your Grace muſt pardon us, our houſe is little;
but ſuch an ample welcom as a poor man and his true love can make you and your Empreſſe.
Madam, we have no dainties.

Aur. 'Tis enough, Sir;
we ſhall enjoy the riches of your goodneſſe.

Sould. Long live the good and gracious Dioclesian.

Dio. I thank ye, Souldiers, I forgive your raſhneſſe.
And Royal Sir, long may they love and honour ye.

Drums march afar off.

What Drums are thoſe?

Del. Meet 'em, my honeſt ſon, they are thy friends, Charinus and the old Souldiers that come to reſcue thee from thy hot Couſin.
But all is well, and turn all into welcoms:
two Emperours you muſt entertain now.

Dio. O dear mother,
I have will enough, but I want room and glory. (rily,

Del. That ſhall be my care. Sound your pipes now merand all your handſom ſports. Sing 'em full welcoms.

Dio. And let 'em know, our true love breeds more ſtories and perfect joys, then Kings do, and their glories.

Exeunt.

FINIS.

THE TRAGEDIE OF BONDUCA.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Enter Bonduca, Daughters, Hengo, Nennius, Souldiers.

Bon. THe hardy Romanes? O ye gods of Britain, the rust of Arms, the blushing shame of souldiers;
are these the men that conquer by inheritance?
the Fortune-makers? these the Julians,

Enter Caratach.

that with the Sun measure the end of Nature, making the world but one Rome and one Cæsar?
Shame, how they flee! Cæsar's soft soul dwells in 'em;
their mothers got 'em sleeping, pleasure nurst 'em,
their bodies sweat with sweet oils, loves allurements, not lusty Arms. Dare they send these to seek us, these Romane Girls? Is Britain grown so wanton?
Twice we have beat 'em, Nennius, scatter'd 'em, and through their big-bon'd Germans, on whose Pikes
the honour of their actions lit in triumph, made Themes for songs to shame 'em, and a woman,
a woman beat 'em, Nennius; a weak woman,
a woman beat these Romanes.

Car. So it seems.
A man would shame to talk so.

Bon. Who's that?

Car. I.

Bon. Cousin, do you grieve my fortunes?

Car. No, Bonduca,
if I grieve, 't is the bearing of your fortunes;
you put too much winde to your sail: Discretion and hardie Valour are the twins of Honour, and nurs'd together, make a Conqueror;
divided, but a talker. 'T is a truth,
that Rome has fled before us twice, and routed;
a truth we ought to crown the gods for, Lady,
and not our tongues. A truth is none of ours, nor in our ends, more than the noble bearing;
for then it leaves to be a vertue, lady;
and we that have been Victors, beat our selves,
when we look upon our honours tamely.

Bon. My valiant Cousin, is it foul to say what liberty and honour bid us do, and what the gods allow us?

Car. No, Bonduca,
so what we say, exceed not what we do.
Ye call the Romanes fearful, fleeing Romanes, and Romane Girls, the lees of tainted pleasures;
does this become a doer? are they such?

Bon. They are no more.

Car. Where is your Conquest then?
why are your Altars crown'd with wreathes of flowers,
the beasts with gilt horns waiting for the fire?
the holy Druides composing songs of everlasting life to Victory?
Why are these triumphs, Lady? for a May-game?
for hunting a poor herd of wretched Romanes?
is it no more? shut up your Temples, Britains, and let the Husband-man redeem his heifers;
put out our holy fires; no Timbrel ring;
let's home, and sleep; for such great overthrows,
a Candle burns too bright a sacrifice,
a Glow-worms tail too full a flame. O Nennius, thou hadst a noble Uncle knew a Romane, and how to speak him, how to give him weight in both his fortunes.

Bon. By—— I think ye doat upon these Romanes, Caratach.

Car. Witnesse these wounds, I do; they were fairly given.
I love an enemy; I was born a souldier;
and he that in the head on 's Troop defies me,
bending my manly body with his sword,
I make a Mistris. Yellow-treſsed Hymen ne'er tyed a longing Virgin with more joy.

then

then I am married to that man that wounds me:
and are not all these Romane? Ten struck Battels
I sucke these honour'd scars from, and all Romane:
ten yeers of bitter nights and heavie marches,
when many a frozen storm sung thorow my Curasse, and made it doubtful whether that or I were the more stubborn metal, have I wrought thorow, and all to try these Romanes. Ten times a night
I have swom the Rivers, when the stars of Rome shot at me as I floated, and the billows tumbled their watry ruines on my shoulders, charging my batter'd sides with troops of Agues;
and still to try these Romanes, whom I found (and if I lye, my wounds be henceforth backward, and be you witnesse, gods, and all my dangers) as ready, and as full of that I brought (which was not fear nor flight) as valiant, as vigilant, as wise, to do and suffer,
ever advanced as forward as the Britains,
their sleeps as short, their hopes as high as ours,
I, and as subtil, Lady. 'T is dishonour, and, follow'd, will be impudence, Bonduca,
and grow to no belief, to taint these Romanes.
Have not I seen the Britains——

Bond. What?

Car. Dishearted,
run, run, Bonduca, not the quick rack swifter;
the virgin from the hated ravisher not half so fearful? not a flight drawn home, a round stone from a Sling, a lovers wish ere made that haste that they have. By——
I have seen these Britains, that you magnifie, run as they would have out-run time, and roaring basely for mercy, roaring: the light shadows that in a thought scur ore the fields of Corn, halted on crutches to 'em.

Bon. O ye Powers, what scandals do I suffer?

Car. Yes, Bonduca,
I have seen thee run too, and thee, Nennius;
yea, run apace, both; then when Penyus
the Romane Girl cut thorow your armed Carts, and drive 'em headlong on ye down the hill;
then when he hunted ye, like Britain Foxes, more by the sent then sight: then did I see these valiant and approved men of Britain, like boading Owls, creep into tods of Ivie,
and hoot their fears to one another nightly.

Nen. And what did you then, Caratach?

Car. I fled too,
but not so fast; your Jewel had been lost then,
young Hengo there; he trusht me, Nennius:
for when your fears out-run him, then stept I,
and in the head of all the Romane fury took him, and with my tough Belt to my back
I buckled him; behinde him, my sure Shield; and then I follow'd. If I say I fought five times in bringing off this bud of Britain,
I lye not, Nennius. Neither had ye heard me speak this, or ever seen the childe more,
but that the son of vertue, Penyus, seeing me steer thorow all these storms of danger,
my helm still in my hand, my sword my prow, turn'd to my so my face, he cri'd out nobly,
Go, Britain, bear thy Lions whelp off safely;
thy manly sword has ransom'd thee: grow strong,
and let me meet thee once again in arms;
then if thou stand'st, thou art mine. I took his offer, and here I am to honour him.

Bon. O Cousin,
from what a flight of honour hast thou checkt me;
what wouldst thou make me, Caratach?

Car. See, Lady,
the noble use of others in our losses;
does this afflict ye? Had the Romanes cri'd this,
and as we have done theirs, sung out these fortunes,
rail'd on our base condition, hooted at us, made marks as far as the earth was ours, to shew us nothing but sea could stop our flights; despis'd us, and held it equal whether banquetting or beating of the Britains were more businesse, it would have gall'd ye.

Bon. Let me think we conquer'd.

Car. Do; but so think, as we may be conquer'd:
and where we have found vertue, though in those that came to make us slaves, let 's cherish it.
There 's not a blow we gave since Julius landed,
that was of strength and worth, but like Records they file to after-ages. Our Registers, the Romanes, are for noble deeds of honour;
and shall we burn their mentions with upbraidings?

Bon. No more, I see my self: thou hast made me, Cousin, more then my fortunes durst; for they abus'd me,
and wound me up so high, I swell'd with glory:
thy temperance has cur'd that Tympany,
and given me health again, nay, more discretion.
Shall we have peace? for now I love these Romanes.

Car. Thy love and hate are both unwise ones, Lady.

Bon. Your reason?

Nen. Is not Peace the end of Arms?

Car. Not where the cause implies a general Conquest:
had we a difference with some pettie Isle,
or with our neighbours (Lady) for our Land-marks,
the taking in of some rebellious Lord,
or making a head against Commotions,
after a day of Blood, Peace might be argued:
But where we grapple for the ground we live on,
the Libertie we hold as dear as life,
the gods we worship, and next those, our Honours,
and with those swords that know no end of Battel:
those men beside themselves allow no neighbour;
those mindes that where the day is claim inheritance,
and where the sun makes ripe the fruits, their harvest, and where they march, but measure out more ground to adde to Rome, and here i' th' bowels on us;
it must not be; no, as they are our foes,
and those that must be so until we tire 'em, let 's use the peace of Honour, that 's fair dealing,
but in our ends, our swords. That hardy Romane that hopes to graft himself into my stock, must first begin his kinred under ground,
and be alli'd in ashes.

Bon. Caratach,
as thou hast nobly spoken, shall be done;
and Hengo to thy charge I here deliver:
the Romanes shall have worthy Wars.

Car. They shall.
And, little Sir, when your young bones grow stiffer, and when I see ye able in a morning to beat a dozen boys, and then to breakfast,
I'll tye ye to a sword.

Heng. And what then, Uncle?

Car.

Car. Then ye must kill, Sir, the next valiant Romane that calls ye knave.

Hengo. And must I kill but one?

Car. An hundred, boy, I hope.

Hengo. I hope five hundred.

Car. That 's a noble boy. Come, worthy Lady, let 's to our several charges, and henceforth allow an enemy both weight and worth. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Junius and Petillius, two Romane Captains.

Petill. What ailt thou, man? doft thou want meat?

Jun. No.

Petill. Clothes?

Jun. Neither. For heavens love, leave me.

Petill. Drink?

Jun. Ye tire me.

Petill. Come, 't is drink; I know 't is drink.

Jun. 'T is no drink.

Petill. I say 't is drink: for what affliction can light so heavie on a Souldier, to dry him up as thou art, but no drink? Thou shalt have drink.

Jun. Prethee, Petillius —

Petill. And by mine honour, much drink, valiant drink: never tell me, thou shalt have drink. I see, like a true friend, into thy wants: 'tis drink; and when I leave thee to a defolation, especially of that dry nature, hang me.

Jun. Why do you do this to me?

Petill. For I see, although your modestie would fain conceal it, which sits as sweetly on a Souldier, as an old side-saddle.

Jun. What do you see?

Petill. I see as far as day, that thou want'st drink. Did I not finde thee gaping like an Oyster for a new tide? thy very thoughts lie bare like a lowe ebbe? thy soul that rid in Sack, lies moor'd for want of liquor? Do but see into thy self; for by —— I do: for all thy body 's chapt, and crackt like timber for want of moisture: what thou want'st there, Junius, and if it be not drink.

Jun. You have too much on 't.

Petill. It may be a whore too, say it be: come, meecher, thou shalt have both: a pretty valiant fellow, die for a little lap and lechery? no, it shall ne'er be said in our Countrey, thou dy'dst o'th' Chin-cough. Heare, thou noble Romane, the son of her that loves a Souldier, hear what I promised for thee; thus I said, Lady, I take thy son to my companion, Lady, I love thy son, thy son loves war, the war loves danger, danger drink, drink discipline, which is society and lechery; these two beget Commanders: fear not, Lady, thy son shall lead.

Jun. 'T is a strange thing, Petillius, that so ridiculous and loose a mirth can master your affections.

Petill. Any mirth, and any way, of any subject, Junius, is better then unmanly muffinesse: what harm's in drink, in a good wholsome wench? I do beseech ye, Sir, what errour? yet it cannot out of my head handsomly, but thou wouldst fain be drunk: come, no more fooling, the General has new wine, new come over.

Jun. He must have new acquaintance for it too, for I will none, I thank ye.

Pet. None, I thank ye? a short and touchie answer. None I thank ye: ye do not scorn it, do ye?

Jun. Gods defend Sir; I owe him full more honour.

Pet. None, I thank ye: no company, no drink, no wench, I thank ye. Ye shall be worse intreated, Sir.

Jun. Petillius, as thou art honest, leave me.

Petill. None, I thank ye; a modest and a decent resolution, and well put on. Yes, I will leave ye, Junius, and leave ye to the boys, that very shortly shall all salute ye, by your new surname of Junius none I thank ye. I would starve now, hang, drown, despair, deserve the forks, lie open to all the dangerous fallies of a wench, bound to believe her tears, and wed her ashes, ere I would own thy follies. I have found ye, your lays, and out-leaps Junius, haunts, and lodges: I have view'd ye, and I have found ye by my skill to be a fool o'th' first head, Junius, and I will hunt ye: ye are in love, I know it; ye are an asse, and all the Camp shall know a peevish idle boy; your dame shall know it; a wronger of my care; your self shall know it.

Enter Corporal Judas, and four Souldiers.

Ind. A Bean? a princely diet, a full banquet, to what we compasse.

1 Sould. Fight like hogs for Acorns?

2 Sould. Venture our lives for pig-nuts?

Petill. What all these Rascals?

3 Sould. If this hold, we are starv'd.

Ind. For my part, friends, which is but twenty Beans a day, a hard world for Officers, and men of action; and those so clipt by master mouse, and rotten: for understand 'em French Beans, where the fruits are ripen'd like the people, in old tubs. For mine own part, I say, I am starv'd already, not worth another Bean, consum'd to nothing, nothing but flesh and bones left, miserable: now if this mustie provender can prick me to honourable matters of atchievement, Gentlemen, why there's the point.

4 Sould. I'll fight no more.

Petill. You'll hang then, a soveraign help for hunger. Ye eating Rascals, whose gods are Beef and Brewis, whose brave angers do execution upon these, and Chibbals: ye dogs heads i' th' porridge pot; you fight no more? does Rome depend upon your resolution for eating mouldy pie-crust?

3 Sould. Would we had it.

Ind. I may do service, Captain.

Petill. In a Fish-market. You, Corporal Curry-comb, what will your fighting profit the Common-wealth? do you hope to triumph, or dare your vamping valour, good man Cobler, clap a new ſoal to th' Kingdom? 'ſ death, ye dog-whelps

you, fight, or not fight.
Jud. Captain.
Petill. Out, ye fleſh-flyes, nothing but noyce and naſtineſſe.
Jud. Give us meat, whereby we may do.
Petill. Whereby hangs your valor?
Jud. Good bits afford good blows.
Petill. A good poſition:
how long is 't ſince thou eat'ſt laſt? wipe thy mouth,
and then tell truth.
Jud. I have not eat to th' purpoſe— (lick?
Petill. To th' purpoſe? what 's that? half a Cow, and Gar-ye Rogues, my Company eat Turf, and talk not;
timber they can digeſt, and fight upon 't; old matts, and mud with ſpoons, rare meats. Your ſhoes, dare ye cry out of hunger, and thoſe extant? (ſlaves, ſuck your Sword-hilts, ye ſlaves, if ye be valiant;
honour will make 'em march-pain: to the purpoſe?
a grievous penance. Doſt thou ſee that Gentleman, that melancholy Monſieur?
Jun. Pray ye, Petillius.
Pet. He has not eat theſe three weeks.
2 Sould. 'has drunk the more then.
3 Sould. And that 's all one.
Petill. Nor drunk nor ſlept theſe two months.
Jud. Captain, We do beſeech you as poor Souldiers, men that have ſeen good days, whoſe mortal ſtomacks may ſomtime feel afflictions.
Jun. This, Petillius, is not ſo nobly done.
Petill. 'T is common profit;
urge him to th' point, he 'll finde you out a food that needs no teeth nor ſtomack; a ſtrange formity will feed ye up as fat as hens i' th' foreheads, and make ye fight like Fichocks, to him.
Jud. Captain.
Jun. Do you long to have your throats cut?
Petill. See what metal it makes in him: two meals more of this melancholy, and there lies Caratach.
Jud. We do beſeech ye.
2 Sould. Humbly beſeech your valour.
Jun. Am I onely become your ſport, Petillius?
Jud. But to render in way of general good, in preſervation.
Jun. Out of my thoughts, ye ſlaves.
4 Sould. Or rather pitie.
3 Sould. Your warlike remedy againſt the maw-worms.
Jud. Or notable receipt to live by nothing.
Petill. Out with your Table-books.
Jun. Is this true friendſhip?
and muſt my killing griefs make others May-games?
Stand from my ſwords point, ſlaves; your poor ſtarv'd ſpican make me no oblations; elſe, O love, (rits thou proudly blind deſtruction, I would ſend thee whole Hecatombs of hearts, to bleed my ſorrows.
Jud. Alas, he lives by love, Sir, Exit Junius.
Petill. So he does, Sir, and cannot you do ſo too? All my Company are now in love, ne'er think of meat, nor talk of what Provant is: aymees, and hearty hey-hoes, are Sallets fit for Souldiers. Live by meat, by larding up your bodies? 't is lewd, and lazie, and ſhews ye meerly mortal, dull, and drives ye to fight like Camels, with baskets at your noſes.
Get ye in love; ye can whore well enough,
that all the world knows: faſt ye into Famine,
yet ye can crawl like Crabs to wenches, handſomly.
Fall but in love now, as ye ſee example,
and follow it but with all your thoughts, probatum,
there 's ſo much charge ſav'd, and your hungers ended.
Away, I hear the General: get ye in love all, Drum up to the ears in love, that I may hear afar off.
no more of theſe rude murmurings; and diſcreetly carry your ſtomacks, or I propheſie a pickel'd rope will choke ye. Jog, and talk not. Exeunt.

Enter Swetonius, Demetrius, Decius, Drum, Colours.

Swet. Demetrius, is the meſſenger diſpatch'd to Penyus, to command him to bring up the Volans Regiment?
Dem. He 's there by this time.
Swet. And are the horſe well view'd we brought from Dec. The Troops are full, and luſty. (Mona?
Swet. Good Petillius,
look to thoſe eating Rogues, that bawl for victuals, and ſtop their throats a day or two: proviſion waits but the winde to reach us.
Petill. Sir, already
I have been tampring with their ſtomacks, which I finde as deaf as Adders to delays: your clemency hath made their murmurs, mutinies, nay, rebellions:
now, and they want but Muſtard, they 're in uproars:
no oil but Candy, Lucitanian figs,
and wine from Leſtos, now can ſatiſfie 'em:
the Britiſh waters are grown dull and muddy,
the fruit diſguſtful: Orontes muſt be ſought for,
and Apples from the happie Iſles: the truth is,
they are more curious now in having nothing,
then if the ſea and land turn'd up their treaſures:
this loſt the Colonies, and gave Bonduca (with ſhame we muſt record it) time and ſtrength to look into our Fortunes; great diſcretion to follow offered Victory; and laſt, full pride to brave us to our teeth, and ſcorn our ruines.
Swet. Nay, chide not, good Petillius, I confeſſe my will to conquer Mona, and long ſtay to execute that will, let in theſe loſſes:
all ſhall be right again, and as a pine rent from Oeta by a ſweeping tempeſt, joynted again, and made a Maſt, defies thoſe angry windes that ſplit him: ſo will I, piec'd to my never-failing ſtrength and fortune,
ſteer thorow theſe ſwelling dangers, plow their prides up,
and bear like thunder through their loudeſt tempeſts:
they keep the field ſtill.
Dem. Confident and full.
Petill. In ſuch a number, one would ſwear they grew,
the hills are wooded with their partizans,
and all the valleys over-grown with darts,
as moors are with rank ruſhes: no ground left us to charge upon, no room to ſtrike: ſay fortune and our endeavours bring us in to 'em, they are ſo infinite, ſo ever-ſpringing,
we ſhall be kill'd with killing; of deſperate women, that neither fear, or ſhame ere found, the devill has rankt amongſt 'em multitudes: ſay the men fail, they 'll poiſon us with their petticoats: ſay they fail,
they have prieſts enough to pray us into nothing.

Swet. Theſe

Swet. These are imagin ations, dreams of nothings, the man that doubts or fears.
Dec. I am free of both.
Dem. The self-same I.
Petill. And I as free as any;
as careleſſe of my fleſh, of that we call life,
ſo I may loſe it nobly; as indifferent as if it were my diet. Yet, noble General, it was a wiſedom learn'd from you; I learn'd it, and worthy of a Souldiers care, moſt worthy,
to weigh with moſt deliberate circumſtance
the ends of accidents, above their offers;
how to go on and get, to ſave a Romane,
whoſe one life is more worth in way of doing,
then millions of theſe painted waſps; how viewing to finde advantage out; how, found, to follow it with counſel and diſcretion, leſt meer fortune ſhould claim the victory.
Swet. 'T is true, Petillius, and worthily remembred: the rule's certain,
their uſes no leſſe excellent: but where time cuts off occaſions, danger, time and all tend to a preſent peril, 't is required our Swords and Manhoods be beſt counſellors, our expeditions, preſidents. To win, is nothing, where reaſon, time and counſel are our Camp-maſters:
but there to bear the field, then to be conquerours,
where pale deſtruction takes us, takes us beaten,
in wants, and mutinies, our ſelves but handfuls,
and to our ſelves our own fears, needs a new way,
a ſudden and a deſperate execution:
here, how to ſave, is loſſe; to be wiſe, dangerous;
onely a preſent well-united ſtrength,
and mindes made up for all attempts, diſpatch it:
diſputing and delay here, cools the courage;
neceſſity gives time for doubts; things infinite,
according to the ſpirit they are preach'd to,
rewards like them; and names for after-ages,
muſt ſteel the Souldier; his own ſhame help to arm him;
and having forc'd his ſpirit, ere he cools,
fling him upon his enemies; ſudden and ſwift,
like Tygers amongſt Foxes, we muſt fight for 't:
Fury muſt be our Fortune; ſhame we have loſt, ſpurs ever in our ſides to prick us forward:
there is no other wiſedom nor diſcretion
due to this day of ruine, but deſtruction;
the Souldiers order firſt, and then his anger.
Dem. No doubt they dare redeem all.
Swet. Then no doubt the day muſt needs be ours. That the proud woman is infinite in number, better likes me, then if we dealt with ſquadrons: half her Army
ſhall choke themſelves, their own ſwords dig their graves.
I'll tell ye all my fears, one ſingle valour,
the vertues of the valiant Caratach
more doubts me then all Britain: he 's a Souldier ſo forg'd out, and ſo temper'd for great fortunes, ſo much man thruſt into him, ſo old in dangers,
ſo fortunate in all attempts, that his meer name fights in a thouſand men, himſelf in millions, to make him Romane. But no more. Petillius, how ſtands your charge?
Petill. Ready for all employments, to be commanded too, Sir.
Swet. 'T is well govern'd;
to morrow we'll draw out, and view the Cohorts:
i' th' mean time, all apply their Offices.
Where 's Junius?
Petill. In 's Cabbin, ſick o' th' mumps, Sir.
Swet. How?
Petill. In love, indeed in love, moſt lamentably loving, to the tune of Queen Dido.
Dec. Alas poor Gentleman.
Swet. 'T will make him fight the nobler. With what Lady?
I'll be a ſpokeſman for him.
Petill. You 'l ſcant ſpeed, Sir.
Swet. Who is 't?
Petill. The devils dam, Bonduca 's daughter, her youngeſt, crackt i' th' ring.
Swet. I am ſorry for him:
but ſure his own diſcretion will reclaim him,
he muſt deſerve our anger elſe. Good Captains, apply your ſelves in all the pleaſing forms
ye can, unto the Souldiers; fire their ſpirits, and ſet 'em fit to run this action;
mine own proviſion ſhall be ſhar'd amongſt 'em,
till more come in: tell 'em, if now they conquer,
the fat of all the kingdom lies before 'em,
their ſhames forgot, their honours infinite,
and want for ever baniſht. Two days hence, our fortunes, and our ſwords, and gods be for us. Exeunt.

Actus ſecundus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Penyus, Regulus, Macer, Druſius.
Pen. I muſt come?
Ma. So the General commands, Sir.
Pen. I muſt bring up my Regiment?
Ma. Believe, Sir,
I bring no lye.
Pen. But did he ſay, I muſt come?
Ma. So delivered.
Pen. How long is 't, Regulus, ſince I commanded in Britain here?
Reg. About five yeers, great Penyus.
Pen. The General ſome five months. Are all my actions ſo poor, and loſt, my ſervices ſo barren, that I 'm remembred in no nobler language but Muſt come up?
Ma. I do beſeech ye, Sir, weigh but the times eſtate.
Pen. Yes, good Lievtenant,
I do, and his that ſways it. Muſt come up?
Am I turn'd bare Centurion? Muſt, and ſhall, fit embaſſes to court my honour?
Ma. Sir——
Pen. Set me to lead a handful of my men againſt an hundred thouſand barbarous ſlaves that have marcht name by name with Romes beſt doers?
ſerve 'em up ſome other meat; I'l bring no food to ſtop the jaws of all thoſe hungry wolfs.
My Regiment 's mine own. I muſt, my language.
Enter Curius.
Cur. Penyus, where lies the hoſt?
Pen. Where Fate may finde 'em.
Cur. Are they ingirt?

Pen. The Battel's loſt.
Cur. So ſoon?
Pen. No; but 't is loſt, becauſe it muſt be won:
the Britains muſt be Victors. Who ere ſaw a troop of bloody Vultures hovering about a few corrupted carcaſes, let him behold the ſilly Romane hoſt,
girded with millions of fierce Britain Swains, with deaths as many as they have had hopes;
and then go thither, he that loves his ſhame;
I ſcorn my life, yet dare not loſe my name.
Cur. Do not you hold it a moſt famous end, when both our names and lives are ſacrific'd for Romes encreaſe?
Pen. Yes, Curius; but mark this too;
what glory is there, or what laſting fame can be to Rome, or us? what full example, when one is ſmother'd with a multitude,
and crowded in amongſt a nameleſſe preſſe?
Honour got out of flint, and on their heads
whoſe vertues, like the Sun, exhal'd all valours, muſt not be loſt in miſts and fogs of people,
noteleſſe, and out of name, but rude and naked:
nor can Rome task us with impoſſibilities, or bid us fight againſt a flood: we ſerve her,
that ſhe may proudly ſay ſhe has good ſouldiers, nor ſlaves to choke all hazards. Who but fools, that make no difference betwixt certain dying,
and dying well, would fling their fames and fortunes into this Britain-gulf, this quickſand-ruine, that ſinking, ſwallows us? What noble hand can finde a ſubject fit for blood there? or what ſword room for his execution? What air to cool us, but poiſon'd with their blaſting breaths and curſes,
where we lie buried quick above the ground,
and are with labouring ſweat, and breathleſſe pain,
kill'd like to ſlaves, and cannot kill again?
Dru. Penyus, mark ancient Wars, and know that then Captains weigh'd an hundred thouſand men.
Pen. Druſius, mark ancient wiſdom, and you'll finde then he gave the overthrow that ſav'd his men.
I muſt not go.
Reg. The ſouldiers are deſirous, their Eagles all drawn out, Sir.
Pen. Who drew up, Regulus?
ha? ſpeak: did you? whoſe bold will durſt attempt this?
drawn out? why, who commands, Sir? on whoſe warrant durſt they advance?
Reg. I keep mine own obedience.
Dru. 'T is like the general cauſe, their love of honour, relieving of their wants.
Pen. Without my knowledge?
am I no more? my place but at their pleaſures?
Come, who did this?
Dru. By—— Sir, I am ignorant.

Drum ſoftly within: then enter Souldiers with Drum and Colours.

Pen. What, am I grown a ſhadow? Hearke, they march.
I will know, and will be my ſelf. Stand, diſobedience;
he that advances one foot higher, dies for 't.
Run thorow the Regiment upon your duties,
and charge 'em on command: beat back again,
by—— I'll teach 'em all elſe.
Reg. We'll do our beſt.

Exeunt Druſius and Regulus.

Pen. Back; ceaſe your bawling Drums there,
I'll beat the Tubs about your brains elſe. Back:
do I ſpeak with leſſe fear then Thunder to ye?
muſt I ſtand to beſeech ye? home, home: ha?
do ye ſtare upon me? Are thoſe mindes I moulded, thoſe honeſt valiant tempers I was proud to be a fellow to, thoſe great diſcretions made your names fear'd and honour'd, turn'd to wildfires?
O gods, to diſobedience? Command, farewel;
and be ye witneſſe with me, all things ſacred,
I have no ſhare in theſe mens ſhames. March, Souldiers, and ſeek your own ſad ruines; your old Penyus dares not behold your murders.
Sould. Captain.
2 Sould. Captain.
3 Sould. Dear honour'd Captain.
Pen. Too too dear lov'd Souldiers, which made ye weary of me: and heaven yet knows,
though in your mutinies, I dare not hate you;
Take your own wills; 't is fit your long experience
ſhould now know how to rule your ſelves: I wrong ye, in wiſhing ye to ſave your lives and credits,
to keep your necks whole from the Ax hangs ore ye:
alas, I much diſhonour'd ye: go, ſeek the Britains, and ſay ye come to glut their Sacrifices;
but do not ſay I ſent ye. What ye have been,
how excellent in all parts, good, and govern'd, is onely left of my Command, for ſtory;
what now ye are, for pitie. Fare ye well.

Enter Druſius and Regulus.

Dru. Oh turn again, great Penyus; ſee the Souldier in all points apt for duty.
Reg. See his ſorrow for his diſobedience, which he ſays was haſte, and haſte (he thought) to pleaſe you with. See, Captain, the toughneſſe of his courage turn'd to water;
ſee how his manly heart melts.
Pen. Go, beat homeward, there learn to eat your little with obedience,
and henceforth ſtrive to do as I direct ye.

Exeunt Souldiers.

Ma. My anſwer, Sir.
Pen. Tell the great General,
my Companies are no fagots to fill breaches;
my ſelf no man that muſt, or ſhall, can carry:
bid him be wiſe; and where he is, he 's ſafe then;
and when he findes out poſſibilities,
he may command me. Commend me to the Captains.
Ma. All this I ſhall deliver.
Pen. Farewel, Macer. Exit Penyus.
Cur. Pray gods this breed no miſchief.
Reg. It muſt needs,
if ſtout Sweronius win; for then his anger,
beſides the Souldiers loſſe of due, and honour,
will break together on him.
Dru. He 's a brave fellow;
and but a little hide his haughtineſſe, (which is but ſometimes neither, on ſome cauſes)
he ſhews the worthieſt Romane this day living.
You may, good Curius, to the General make all things ſeem the beſt.
Cur. I ſhall endeavour:
pray for our fortunes, Gentlemen. If we fall,
this one farewel ſerves for a Funeral.
The gods make ſharp our ſwords, and ſteel our hearts;
we dare, alas, but cannot fight our parts.

Exeunt.

Scena

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Junius, Petillius and a Herald.

Petill. Let him go on: ſtay, now he talks.
Jun. Why?
why ſhould I love mine enemie? what is beauty?
of what ſtrange violence, that like the plague,
it works upon our ſpirits? blind they faign him,
I am ſure, I find it ſo.
Petill. A dog ſhall lead ye.
Jun. His fond affections blinder.
Petill. Hold ye there ſtill.
Jun. It takes away my ſleep, Petill. Alas, poor chicken.
Jun. my company, content; almoſt my faſhion.
Petill. Yes, and your weight too, if you follow it.
Jun. 'Tis ſure the plague, for no man dare come neer me without an Antidote: 'tis far worſe; Hell.
Petill. Thou art damn'd without redemption then.
Jun. The way to't ſtrew'd with fair Weſtern ſmiles, and April bluſhes, led by the brighteſt conſtellations; eyes, and ſweet proportions, envying heaven: but from thence no way to guide, no path, no wiſdome brings us.
Petill. Yes, a ſmart water, Junius.
Jun. Do I fool?
know all this, and fool ſtill? Do I know further,
that when we have enjoy'd our ends, we loſe 'em,
and all our appetites are but as dreams
wee laugh at in our ages.
Petil. Sweet Philoſopher!
Jun. Do I know on ſtill, and yet know nothing? Mer-why am I thus ridiculous? (cie gods, Petill. Motley on thee,
thou art an arrant Aſſe.
Jun. Can red and white,
an eye, a noſe, a cheek,
Petill. But one cheek, Junius?
an half-fac'd Miſtris?
Jun. with a little trim,
that wanton fools call Faſhion, thus abuſe mee?
take me beyond my reaſon? Why ſhould not I doat on my horſe well trapt, my ſword well hatch'd?
they are as handſom things, to mee more uſefull, and poſſible to rule too. Did I but love, yet 'twere excuſable, my youth would bear it;
but to love there, and that no time can give me,
mine honour dare not ask: ſhee has been raviſh'd
my nature, muſt not know; ſhe hates our Nation.
Thus to diſpoſe my ſpirit!
Petill. Stay a little,
he will declame again.
Jun. I will not love; I am a man, have reaſon, and I will uſe it: I'll no more tormenting, nor whining for a wench, there are a thouſand,
Petill. Hold thee there boy.
Jun. A thouſand will intreat me.
Petill. Ten thouſand, Junius.
Jun. I am young and luſtie, and to my faſhion valiant; can pleaſe nightly.
Petill. I'll ſwear thy back's probatum, for I have known leap at ſixteen like a ſtrong Stallion. (thee
Jun. I will be man again.
Petill. Now mark the working, the divell and the ſpirit tug for't: twenty pound
upon the divels head.
Jun. I muſt be wretched.
Petill. I knew I had won.
Jun. Nor have I ſo much power to ſhun my fortune.
Petill. I will hunt thy fortune with all the ſhapes imagination breeds, Muſick.
but I will fright thy divell: Stay, he ſings now.
Song, by Junius, and Petillius after him in mockage.
Jun. Muſt I be thus abuſ'd?
Petill. Yes mary muſt ye.
Let's follow him cloſe: oh, there he is, now read it.
Herald reads. It is the Generals command, that all ſick, perſons old and unable, retire within the Trenches; hee that fears his libertie, to leave the Field: Fools, boyes, and lovers muſt not come neer the Regiments, for fear of their infelli-ons; eſpecially thoſe Cowards they call Lovers.
Jun. Hah?
Petill. Read on.
Herald. If any common Souldier love an Enemie, hee's whip'd and made a ſlave: If any Captain; caſt, with loſſe of honours, flung out o'th' Army, and made unable ever after to bear the name of a Souldier.
Jun. The —— conſume ye all, Rogues. Exit Jun.
Petill. Let this work:
has ſomething now to chew upon; he's gone, come, ſhake no more.
Her. Well, Sir, you may command me,
but not to doe the like again for Europe:
I would have given my life for a beat two-pence.
If I ere read to lovers whilſt I live again, or come within their confines —— Petill. There's your payment, and keep this private.
Her. I am ſchool'd for talking. Exit Herald.
Enter Demetrius.
Petill. How now, Demetrius, are we drawn?
Dem. 'Tis doing:
Your Company ſtands fair; but pray ye, where's Junius?
half his command are wanting, with ſome forty that Decius leads.
Petill. Hunting for victuals:
upon my life free-booting Rogues, their ſtomacks are like a widows luſt, never ſatisfied.
Dem. I wonder how they dare ſtir, knowing the enemy
Maſter of all the Countrey.
Petill. Reſolute hungers know neither fears, nor faiths, they tread on ladders, ropes, gallowes, and overdoe all dangers.
Dem. They may be hang'd though.
Petill. There's their Joyfull ſupper, and no doubt they are ath.
Dem. But for heavens ſake, how does young Junius?
Petill. Drawing on, poor Gentleman.
Dem. What, to his end?
Petill. To th'end of all fleſh: a woman.
Dem. This love has made him a ſtout ſouldier.
Petill. O, a great one,
fit to command young gollings: but what news?
Dem. I think the meſſenger's come back from Rome, by this time, let's go know.
Petill. What will you ſay now, if he deny to come, and take exceptions at ſome half ſyllable, or ſound delivered with

with an ill accent, or ſome ſtile left out?
Dem. I cannot think he dare.
Petill. He dare ſpeak treaſon, dare ſay, what no man dares beleeve, dares doe —
but that's all one: I'll lay you my black armour to twenty crowns, he comes not.
Dem. Done.
Petill. You'll pay.
Dem. I will.
Petill. Then keep thine old uſe Penyus, be ſtubborn and vain glorious, and I thank thee.
Come let's go pray for ſix hours: moſt of us
I fear, will trouble heaven no more: two good blowes ſtruck home at two Commanders of the Britains, and my part's done.
Dem. I do not think of dying.
Petill. 'Tis poſſible we may live. But Demetrius, with what ſtrange legs, and arms, and eyes, and noſes,
let Carpenters and Copper-ſmiths conſider.
If I can keep my heart whole, and my wind-pipe, that I may drink yet like a Souldier — Dem. Come, let's have better thoughts; mine's on your Armour.
Petil. Mine's in your purſe, Sir: Let's go try the wager.
Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Judas and his four Companions (halters about their necks) Bonduca, her Daughters, Nennius following.

Bon. Come, hang 'm preſently.
Nen. What made your Rogueſhips harrying for victuals here? Are we your friends?
or doe you come for Spies? tell me directly, (for't?
Would you not willingly be hang'd now? do not ye long Jud. What ſay ye? ſhall wee hang in this vain? Hang and 'tis as good to diſpatch it merrily, (we muſt, as pull an arſe like dogs to't.
1. Soul. Any way,
ſo it be handſome.
3. Soul. I had as lief 'twere toothſom too: but all agree, and I'll not out Boyes.
4. Soul. Let's hang pleſantly.
Jud. Then pleſantly be it: Captain, the truth is,
we had as lief hang with meat in our mouthes,
as ask your pardon empty.
Bon. Theſe are brave hungers.
What ſay you to a leg of Beef now, ſirha?
Jud. Bring me acquainted with it, and I'll tell ye.
Bon. Torment 'em wenches: I muſt back; then hang Jud. We humbly thank your Grace. ('em.
1. Daugh. The Rogues laugh at us.
2. Daugh. Sirha, What think you of a wench now?
Jud. A wench, Lady?
I do beſeech your Ladiſhip, retire,
I'll tell ye preſently, ye ſee the time's ſhort;
one craſh; even to the ſetling of my conſcience.
Nen. Why, is't no more but up, boyes?
Jud. Yes, ride too Captain.
Will you but ſee my ſeat?
1. Daugh. Ye ſhall be ſet, Sir, upon a Jade ſhall ſhake ye.
Jud. Sheets, good Madam, will do it ten times better.
1. Daugh. Whips, good Souldier, which ye ſhall taſte before ye hang, to mortifie ye;
'tis pitie ye ſhould die thus deſperate. (caps.
2. Daugh. Theſe are the merry Romans, the brave mad
'tis ten to one we'll cool your reſolutions.
Bring out the whips.
Jud. Would your good Ladyſhips would exerciſe 'em too.
4. Soul. Surely Ladies,
we'ld ſhew you a ſtrange patience.
Nen. Hang 'em, Raſcals, they'l talk thus on the wheel. Enter Caratach.
Car. Now what's the matter?
What are theſe fellows? whats the crime committed,
that they wear necklaces?
Nen. They are Roman Rogues, taken a forraging.
Car. Is that all, Nennius?
Jud. Would I were fairly hang'd; this is the divell, the kill-cow Caratach.
Car. And you would hang 'em.
Nen. Are they not enemies?
1. Soul. My breech makes buttons.
1. Daugh. Are they not our tormentors?
Car. Tormentors? Flea-traps.
Pluck off your halters, fellows.
Nen. Take heed, Caratach, taint not your wiſdome.
Car. Wiſdome, Nennius?
why, who ſhall fight againſt us, make our honours,
and give a glorious day into our hands,
if we diſpatch our foes thus? what's their offence?
ſtealing a loafe or two to keep out hunger,
a piece of greazie bacon, or a pudding?
do theſe deſerve the gallows? They are hungry, poor hungry knaves, no meat at home left, ſtarv'd:
Art thou not hungry?
Jud. Monſtrous hungry.
Car. He looks like hungers ſelf: get 'em ſome victuals, and wine to cheer their hearts, quick: Hang up poor pil-
2. Soul. This is the braveſt Captain — (chers?
Nen. Caratach,
I'll leave you to your will.
Car. I'll anſwer all, Sir.
2. Daugh. Let's up, and view his entertainment of 'em.
I am glad they are ſhifted any way, their tongues elſe would ſtill have murdred us.
1. Daugh. Let's up, and ſee it. Exeunt.
Enter Hengo.
Car. Sit down poor knaves: why, where's this wine and victuals?
who waites there?
Suit. within. Sir, 'tis coming.
Hen. Who are theſe Uncle?
Car. They are Romans, Boy.
Hen. Are theſe they that vex mine Aunt ſo? can theſe fight? they look like emptie ſcabbards, all, no mettle in 'em, like men of clouts, ſet to keep crows from orchards;
why, I dare fight with theſe.
Car. That's my good chicken. And how do ye?
how do you feel your ſtomacks?
Jud. Wondrous apt, Sir,
as ſhall appear when time calls.
Car. That's wel, down with't,
a little grace will ſerve your turns: eat ſofily,

you'll

you'll choak ye knaves elſe: give 'em wine.
Jud. Not yet, Sir,
we're even a little buſie.
Hen. Can that fellow
do any thing but eat? thou fellow.
Jud. Away Boy,
away, this is no boyes play.
Hen. By ——, Uncle,
if his valour lie in's teeth, he's the moſt valiant.
Car. I am glad to hear ye talk, Sir.
Hen. Good Uncle tell me,
What's the price of a couple of cramm'd Romans?
Car. Some twenty Britains boy; theſe are good ſoldiers,
Hen. Do not the cowards eat hard too?
Car. No more, boy.
Come, I'll ſit with you too; ſit down by me, boy.
Jud. Pray bring your diſh then.
Car. Hearty knaves: More meat there.
1. Soul. That's a good hearing.
Car. Stay now and pledge me.
Jud. This little piece Sir.
Car. By —— ſquare eaters,
More meat I ſay: upon my conſcience
the poor Rogues have not eat this month: how terribly they charge upon their victuals: dare ye fight thus?
Jud. Beleeve it ſir, like devils.
Car. Wel ſaid famine,
Here's to thy General.
Jud. Moſt excellent Captain, I wil now pledge thee.
Car. And to morrow night, ſay to him,
His head is mine.
Jud. I can aſſure ye Captain,
He wil not give it for this waſhing.
Car. Wel ſaid. Daughters above.
1. Daugh. Here's a ſtrange entertainment: how the theeves drink.
2. Daug. Danger is dry, they look'd for colder liquor.
Car. Fil 'em more wine, give 'em ful bowls; which of you all now in recompence of this good, dare but give me a ſound knock in the Battell?
Jud. Delicate Captain,
to doe thee a ſufficient recompence,
I'll knock thy brains out.
Car. Do it.
Hen. Thou dar'ſt as well be damn'd: thou knock his brains out, thou skin of man? Uncle, I will not hear this.
Jud. Tie up your whelp.
Hen. Thou kill my Uncle?
Would I had but a ſword for thy ſake, thou dry'd dog.
Car. What a mettle
this little vermine caries.
Hen. Kill mine Uncle?
Car. He ſhall not, child.
Hen. He cannot: he's a Rogue, an onely eating Rogue: Kill my ſweet Uncle?
oh that I were a man.
Jud. By this wine, which I will drink to Captain Junius, (daughter who loves the Queens moſt excellent Majeſties little moſt ſweetly, and moſt fearfully, I will do it.
Hen. Uncle, I'll kill him with a great pin.
Car. No more, Boy.
I'll pledge thy Captain: To ye all, good Fellows.
2. Daugh. In love with me? that love ſhall coſt your lives all:
Come Siſter, and adviſe me; I have here a way to make an eaſie conqueſt of 'em, if fortune favour me.
Car. Let's ſee ye ſweat to morrow, blood and ſpirit, Boyes, this wine turn'd to ſterne valour.
1. Soul. Heark ye Judas,
if he ſhould hang us after all this.
Jud. Let him:
I'll hang like a Gentleman, and a Roman.
Car. Take away there,
they have enough.
Jud. Captain, wee thank you heartily for your good cheer, and if we meet to morrow, one of us payes for't.
Car. Get 'em guides, their wine Enter 2d Daughter has over maſter'd 'em. and a Servant.
2. Daugh. That hungry fellow with the red beard there, give it him, and this,
to ſee it well deliverd.
Car. Farewell, knaves; ſpeak nobly of us, keep your words to morrow,
Enter a Guide.
and doe ſomething worthy your meat. Go, guide 'em, and ſee 'em fairly onward.
Jud. Meaning me, Sir?
Serv. The ſame.
The youngeſt daughter to the Queen intreats ye to give this privately to Captain Junius, this for your pains.
Jud. I reſt her humble ſervant.
Commend me to thy Lady. Keep your files, boyes.
Serv. I muſt inſtruct ye farther.
Jud. Keep your files there.
Order, ſweet friends: faces about now.
Guide. Here Sir,
here lies your way.
Jud. 'Bleſſe the founders, I ſay.
Fairly, good ſouldiers, fairly march now: cloſe, boyes.
Exeunt.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Swetonius, Petillius, Demetrius, Decius, Macer.

Swet. Bid me be wiſe, and keep me where I am,
and ſo be ſafe: not come, becauſe commanded;
Was it not thus?
Ma. It was, Sir.
Petill. What now think ye?
Swet. Muſt come, ſo hainous to him, ſo diſtaſtefull?
Petill. Give me my money.
Dem. I confeſſe 'tis due Sir, and preſently I'll pay it.
Swet. His obedience
ſo blind at his yeers and experience, it cannot find where to be tendred?
Ma. Sir,
the Regiment was willing, and advanc'd too,
the Captains at all points ſteel'd up; their preparations full of reſolve, and confidence; Youth and fire, like the fair breaking of a glorious day,
guilded their Falanx: when the angrie Penyus
ſtept like a ſtormy cloud 'twixt them and hopes.
Swet. And ſtopt their reſolutions?
Ma. True:

Ma. True: his reason to them was ods, and ods so infinite, discretion durst not look upon.
Swet. Well Penyus,
I cannot think thee coward yet; and treacherous
I dare not think: thou hast lopt a limb off from me, and let it be thy glory, thou wast stubborn,
thy wisdome, that thou lefts thy Generall naked:
Yet ere the Sun set, I shall make thee see,
all valour dwels not in thee; all command in one experience. Thou wilt too late repent this, and wish, I must come up, had been thy blessing.
Petill. Let's force him.
Swet. No, by no means; he's a torrent
we cannot easily stemme.
Petill. I think, a Traitor.
Swet. No ill words: let his own shame first revile him.
That wine I have, see it (Demetrius) distributed amongst the souldiers, to make 'em high and lustie: when that's done,
Petillius, give the word through, that the Eagles may presently advance: no man discover,
upon his life, the enemies full strength,
but make it of no value: Decius, are your starv'd people yet come home?
Dec. I hope so.
Swet. Keep 'em in more obedience: This is no time to chide, I could be angry else, and say more to ye:
But come, let's order all: whose sword is sharpest,
and valour equall to his sword this day,
shall be my saint.
Petill. We shall be holy all then. Exeunt.

Enter Judas and his company.

Jud. Captain, Captain, I have brought 'em off again;
the drunkenest slaves.
Dec. —— confound your Rogueships;
I'll call the Generall, and have ye hang'd all.
Jud. Pray who will you command then?
Dec. For you, sirha, that are the ring-leader to these devises,
whose maw is never cramm'd, I'll have an engine.
Jud. A wench, sweet Captain.
Dec. Sweet Judas, even the Forks, where ye shall have two Lictors with two whips hammer your hide.
Jud. Captain, good words, fair words, sweet words, good Captain; if you like not us, farewell, we have imployment.
Dec. Where hast thou been?
Jud. There where you dare not be with all your valour.
Dec. Where's that?
Jud. With the best good-fellow living.
1 Soul. The king of all good-fellows.
Dec. Who's that?
Jud. Caratach.
Shake now, and say, wee have done something worthie, mark me; with Caratach: By this —— Caratach:
Do you asmuch now and you dare: sweet Caratach.
Ye talk of a good fellow, of true drinking;
wel, go thy waies, old Caratach: besides the drink Captain,
the bravest running banquet of black puddings, peeces of glorious beef.
Dec. How scapt ye hanging?
Jud. Hanging's a dogs death: we are Gentlemen, and I say still, Old Caratach.
Dec. Belike then,
you are turn'd Rebels all.
Jud. We are Roman boyes all,
and boyes of mettle: I must doe that Captain,
this day, this very day.
Dec. Away, ye Rascal.
Jud. Fair words, I say again.
Dec. What must you doe, Sir?
Jud. I must do that my heart-strings yern to do:
but my word's past.
Dec. What is it?
Jud. Why, kill Caratach,
that's all he ask'd us for our entertainment.
Dec. More then you'll pay.
Jud. Would I had sold my self unto the skin, I had not promis'd it:
for such another Caratach.
Dec. Come Fool,
have ye done your Country service?
Jud. I have brought that to Captain Junius.
Dec. How?
Jud. I think will doe all:
I cannot tell, I think so.
Dec. How? to Junius?
I'll more enquire of this: You'll fight now?
Jud. Promise:
take heed of promise, Captain.
Dec. Away, and rank then.
Jud. But hearke ye Captain, there is wine distributing,
I would fain know what share I have.
Dec. Be gone,
ye have too much.
Jud. Captain, no wine, no fighting.
there's one call'd Caratach, that has wine.
Dec. Well Sir,
if you'll be rul'd now, and doe well.
Jud. Doe excellent.
Dec. Ye shall have wine, or any thing: goe file;
I'll see ye have your share: drag out your dormise,
and stow 'em somwhere, where they may sleep handsomly,
they'l hear a hunt's up shortly.
Jud. Now I love thee:
but no more Forks nor Whips.
Dec. Deserve 'em not then:
up with your men, I'll meet ye presently;
and get 'em sober quickly.
Jud. Arm, arm, Bullyes;
all's right again and straight; and which is more,
more wine, more wine: Awake ye men of Memphis, be sober and discreet, we have much to do boyes. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Prepare there for the Sacrifice, the Queen comes.
Musick.
Enter in Solemnity, the Druids singing, the second Daughter strewing flowers: then Bonduca, Caratach, Nennius, and others.
Bond. Ye powerfull gods of Britain, hear our prayers; hear us you great Revengers, and this day take

take pitie from our ſwords, doubt from our valours, double the ſad remembrance of our wrongs in every breſt; the vengeance due to thoſe make infinite and endleſſe: on our pikes this day pale terror ſit, horrors and ruines upon our executions; claps of thunder hang on our armed carts, and fore our Troops deſpair and death; ſhame beyond theſe attend 'em.
Riſe from the duſt, ye relicks of the dead,
whoſe noble deeds our holy Druids ſing,
oh riſe, ye valiant bones, let not baſe earth oppreſſe your honours, whileſt the pride of Rome treads on your Stocks, and wipes out all your ſtories.

Nen. Thou great Tiranes, whom our ſacred Prieſts, armed with dreadfull thunder, place on high above the reſt of the immortall gods, ſend thy conſuming fires and deadly bolts,
and ſhoot 'em home; ſtick in each Roman heart
a fear fit for confuſion; blaſt their ſpirits, dwell in 'em to deſtruction; thorow their Phalanx ſtrike, as thou ſtrik'ſt a proud tree; ſhake their Bodies, make their ſtrengths totter, and their topleſſe fortunes unroot, and reel to ruine.

1. Daugh. O thou god,
thou feared god, if ever to thy juſtice inſulting wrongs, and raviſhments of women, women deriv'd from thee, their ſhames, the ſuffrings of thoſe that daily fill'd thy Sacrifice with virgin incenſe, have acceſſe, now hear me, now ſnatch thy thunder up; now on theſe Romans,
deſpiſers of thy power, of us defacers,
revenge thy ſelf: take to thy killing anger,
to make thy great work full, thy juſtice ſpoken, an utter rooting from this bleſſed Iſle of what Rome is or has been.

Bon. Give more incenſe,
the gods are deafe and drowſie; no happy flame riſes to raiſe our thoughts: Pour on.

2. Daugh. See heaven, and all you pow'rs that guide us, ſee, and ſhame
we kneel ſo long for pitie over your Altars;
ſince 'tis no light oblation that you look for,
no incenſe offring, will I hang mine eyes;
and as I wear theſe ſtones with hourly weeping,
ſo will I melt your pow'rs into compaſſion.
This tear for Proſtagus my brave Father,
ye gods, now think on Rome; this for my Mother,
and all her miſeries; yet ſee, and ſave us:
but now ye muſt be open ey'd. See, heaven,
O ſee thy ſhowrs ſtoln from thee; our diſhonours,

A ſmoak from the Altar.

O ſiſter, our diſhonours: can ye be gods,
and theſe ſins ſmother'd?

Bon. The fire takes.

Car. It does ſo,
but no flame riſes. Ceaſe your fetrfull prayers, your whinings, and your tame petitions;
the gods love courage arm'd with confidence, and prayers fit to pull them down: weak tears and troubled hearts, the dull twins of cold ſpirits, they ſit and ſmile at. Hear how I ſalute 'em:
Divine Andate, thou who hold'ſt the reins of furious Battels, and diſordred War, and proudly roll'ſt thy ſwarty chariot wheels over the heaps of wounds, and carcaſſes, ſailing through ſeas of bloud; thou ſure-ſteel'd ſternneſſe, give us this day good hearts, good enemies, good blowes o' both ſides, wounds that fear or flight can claim no ſhare in; ſteel us both with angers, and warlike executions fit thy viewing;
let Rome put on her beſt ſtrength, and thy Britain,
thy little Britain, but as great in fortune,
meet her as ſtrong as ſhee, as proud, as daring;
and then look on, thou red ey'd god: who does beſt,
reward with honour; who deſpair makes flie,
unmanne for ever, and brand with infamie:
Grant this, divine Andate, 'tis but Juſtice;
and my firſt blow thus on thy holy Altar. A flame ariſes.
I ſacrifiſe unto thee.

Bon. It flames out. Muſick.

Car. Now ſing ye Druides. Song.

Bon. 'Tis out again.

Car. H'as given us leave to fight yet; we aſk no more,
the reſt hangs in our reſolutions:
tempt him no more.

Bon. I would know further Coſen,

Car. His hidden meaning dwels in our endeavours;
our valours are our beſt gods. Cheer the ſouldier, and let him eat.

Meſſ. He's at it, Sir.

Car. Away then;
when he has done, let's march. Come, fear not Lady, this day the Roman gains no more ground here,
but what his body lies in.

Bond. Now I am confident. Exeunt.

Recorders.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Junius, Curius, Decius.

Dec. We dare not hazzard it: beſide our lives, it forfeits all our underſtandings.

Jun. Gentlemen,
Can ye forſake me in ſo juſt a ſervice,
a ſervice for the Common-wealth, for honour?
Read but the Letter; you may love too.

Dec. Read it:
if there be any ſafety in the circumſtance,
or likelihood 'tis love, we will not faile ye.
Read it good Curius.

Cur. Willingly.

Jun. Now mark it.

Cur. reads. Health to thy heart, my honourd Junius, and all thy love requited: I am thine,
thine everlaſtingly, thy love has won me,
and let it breed no doubt; our new acquaintance compels this, 'tis the gods decree to bleſſe us.
The times are dangerous to meet; yet fail not,
by all the love thou bear'ſt me I conjure thee,
without diſtruſt of danger, to come to me,
for I have purpoſ'd a delivery both of my ſelf and fortune this bleſt day into thy hands, if thou think'ſt good: to ſhew thee how infinite my love is, even my Mother ſhall be thy priſoner, the day yours without hazzard;
for I beheld your danger like a Lover,
a juſt affecter of thy faith: Thy goodneſſe,
I know, will uſe us nobly, and our marriage,
if not redeem, yet leſſen Romes Ambition.
I am weary of theſe miſeries: Uſe my Mother,

(if you intend to take her) with all honour, and let this disobedience to my parents be laid on love, not me. Bring with thee, Junius, spirits resolv'd to fetch me off, the noblest forty will serve the turn; just at the joyning of both the Battels, we will be weakly guarded; and for a guide, within this hour shall reach thee
a faithfull friend of mine: the gods, my Junius, keep thee, and me to serve thee: Young Bonvica.

Cur. This letter carries much belief, and most objections answer'd, we must have doubted.

Dec. Is that fellow come to ye for a guide yet?

Jun. Yes.

Dec. And examin'd?

Jun. Far more then that; he has felt tortures, yet he vows he knows no more then this truth.

Dec. Strange.

Cur. If she mean what she writes, as 't may be probable,
'twill be the happiest vantage we can lean to.

Jun. I'll pawn my soul she means truth.

Dec. Think an hour more,
then if your confidence grow stronger on ye,
we'll set in with ye.

Jun. Nobly done; I thank ye;
ye know the time.

Cur. We will be either ready to give ye present counsell, or joyne with ye.

Enter Swetonius, Petillius, and Demetrius, Macer.

Jun. No more as ye are Gentlemen. The Generall.

Swet. Draw out a pace, the enemy waits for us;
Are ye all ready?

Jun. All our Troops attend, Sir.

Swet. I am glad to hear you say so, Junius.
I hope ye are dispossest.

Jun. I hope so too, Sir.

Swet. Continue so. And Gentlemen, to you now;
To bid you fight is needlesse, ye are Romans, the name will fight it self; To tell ye who you go to fight against, his power, and nature, but losse of time: ye know it, know it poor, and oft have made it so. To tell ye further,
his Bodie showes more dreadfull then it has done,
to him that fears, lesse possible to deal with,
is but to stick more honour on your Actions, load ye with vertuous names, and to your memories
tie never dying time, and fortune constant.
Go on in full assurance, draw your swords as daring and as confident as Justice;
the gods of Rome fight for ye; loud Fame calls ye, pitch'd on the topless Perinine, and blows to all the under world: all Nations, the seas, and unfrequented deserts, where the snow dwels, wakens the ruin'd monuments, and there where nothing but eternall death and sleep is, informs again the dead bones. With your vertues, go on, I say, valiant and wise, rule heaven, and all the great aspects attend 'em. Do but blow upon this Enemy, who, but that we want foes, cannot deserve that name; and like a myst,
a lazie fog, before your burning valours you'll finde him flie to nothing. This is all,
We have swords, and are the sons of ancient Romans,
heirs to their endlesse valours, fight and conquer.

De. Dem. 'Tis done.

Petill. That man that loves not this day, and hugs not in his arms the noble danger,
may he die famelesse and forgot.

Swet. Sufficient,
up to your Troops, and let your drums beat thunder, march close, and sudden like a tempest: all executions done without sparkling of the Body: keep your phalanx sure lin'd, and pitch'd together; your pikes forward, and so march like a moving Port: ere this day run,
we shal have ground to add to Rome, wel won. Exeunt. March.

Scæna tertia.

Enter Caratach and Nennius.

Nen. The Roman is advanc'd from yound' hils brow, we may behold him, Caratach. A March.

Drums within at one place afar off.

Car. Let's thither,
I see the dust flie. Now I see the Body, observe 'em, Nennius; by ——— a handsome Body,
and of a few, strongly and wisely joynted:
Swetonius is a Souldier.

Nen. As I take it,
that's hee that gallops by the Regiments, viewing their preparations.

Car. Very likely,
he shews no lesse then Generall: see how bravely
the Body moves, and in the head how proudly the Captains stick like plumes: hee comes apace on;
good Nennius go, and bid my stout Leutenant bring on the first square Bodie to oppose 'em, and as he charges, open to enclose 'em:
the Queen move next with hers, and wheel about,
to gain their backs, in which I'll lead the Vantguard.
We shall have bloody crowns this day, I see by 't;
Haste thee good Nennius, I'll follow instantly.

Exit Nennius.

How close they march, as if they grew together? March.
no place but lin'd alike: sure from oppression;
they will not change this figure: we must charge 'em,
and charge 'em home at both ends, Van and Rere,

Drums in another place afar off.

they never totter else. I hear our Musick, and must attend it: Hold good sword, but this day,
and bite hard where I hound thee, and hereafter
I'll make a relique of thee, for young Souldiers to come like Pilgrimes to, and kisse for Conquests.

Exit.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Junius, Curius, and Decius.

Jun. Now is the time, the fellow stayes.

Dec. What think yee?

Cur. I think 'tis true.

Jun. Alas, if 'twere a question, if any doubt or hazzard fell into 't,
do ye think mine own discretion so self-blinde,
my care of you so naked, to run headlong?

Dec. Let's take Petillius with us.

Jun. By no means:
hee's never wise but to himself, nor courteous,
but where the end's his own: we are strong enough,
if not too many. Behind yonder hill

the

the fellow tels me she attends, weak guarded, her Mother and her Sister.
Cur. I would venture.
Jun. Wee shall not strike five blows for't: weigh the (good,
the generall good may come.
Dec. Away, I'll with ye,
but with what doubt?
Jun. Fear not, my soul for all. Exeunt.
Alarms, Drums and Trumpets in severall places afar off, as at a main Battell.

Scæna quinta.

Enter Drusus and Penyus above.
Dru. Here ye may see 'em all, Sir; from this hill the Country shews off levell.
Pen. Gods defend me,
what multitudes they are, what infinites?
the Roman power shews like a little Star hedg'd with a double halloa. Now the knell rings, Loud Shouts.
Heark how they shout to th' battell; how the air
totters and reels, and rends apieces, Drusus, with the huge vollied clamours.
Dru. Now they charge.
oh gods, of all sides, fearfully.
Pen. Little Rome,
stand but this growing Hydra one short hour,
and thou hast out-done Hercules.
Dru. The dust hides 'em,
we cannot see what follows.
Pen. They are gone, gone, swallow'd, Drusus; this eternall Sun shall never see 'em march more.
Dru. O turn this way, and see a modell of the field, some forty,
against four hundred.
Pen. Well fought, bravely follow'd;
O nobly charg'd again, charg'd home too: Drusus,
they seem to carry it: now they charge all, Loud.
close, close, I say; they follow it: ye gods,
Can there be more in men? more daring spirits?
still they make good their fortunes. Now they are gone too, for ever gone: see Drusus, at their backs
a fearfull Ambush rises. Farewell valours, excellent valours: O Rome, Where's thy wisdome?
Dru. They are gone indeed, Sir.
Pen. Look out toward the Army,
I am heavie with these slaughters.
Dru. 'Tis the same still,
cover'd with dust and fury. Enter the two Daughters, with Junius, Curius, Decius, and Souldiers.
2. Daugh. Bring 'em in,
tie 'em, and then unarm 'em.
1. Daugh. Valiant Romans,
ye are welcome to your Loves,
2. Daugh. Your death, fools.
Dec. We deserve 'em,
and women do your worst.
1. Daug. Ye need not beg it.
2. Daug. Which is kinde Junius?
Serv. This.
2 Dau. Are you my sweet heart?
It looks ill on't: how long is 't, pretty soul, since you and I first lov'd? Had we not reason to doat extreamly upon one another?
How does my Love? this is not he: my chicken could prate finely, sing a love-song.
Jun. Monster.
2. Daugh. Oh, now it courts.
Jun. Arm'd with more malice then he that got thee has the divell.
2. Daugh. Good.
Proceed, sweet Chick.
Jun. I hate thee, that's my last.
2. Daug. Nay, and ye love me, forward: No? Come let's prick our answers on our arrows points, (sister, and make 'em laugh a little. Ye damn'd Leachers, ye proud improvident fools, have we now caught ye?
are ye in th' noose? Since ye are such loving creatures, wee'l be your Cupids: Do ye see these arrows?
wee'l send 'em to your wanton livers, goats.
1. Dau. O how I'll trample on your hearts, ye villains, ambitious salt-itcht slaves: Romes master sins,
the mountain Rams topt your hot mothers.
2. Daugh. Dogs,
to whose brave Founders a salt whore gave suck;
theeves, honours hangmen, do ye grin? perdition take me for ever, if in my fell anger, Enter Caratach.
I doe not out-doe all example.
Car. Where,
where are these Ladies? ye keep noble quarter, your mother thinks ye dead or taken; upon which,
she will not move her Battell. Sure these faces
I have beheld and known, they are Roman Leaders,
How came they here?
2. Daugh. A trick Sir, that we us'd, a certain policie conducted 'em unto our snare: we have done ye no small service;
these us'd as we intend, we are for th' battell.
Car. As you intend? taken by treachery?
1. Daugh. Is't not allow'd?
Car. Those that should gild our Conquest, make up a Battell worthie of our winning,
catch'd up by craft?
2. Daugh. By any means that's lawfull.
Car. A womans wisdome in our triumphs? Out, out ye sluts, ye follies; from our swords filch our revenges basely? Arm again, Gentlemen:
Souldiers, I charge ye help 'em.
2. Daugh. By —— Uncle,
we will have vengeance for our rapes.
Car. By ——
you should have kept your legs close then: dispatch there.
1. Daugh. I will not off thus.
Car. He that stirs to execute, or she, though it be your selves, by him that got me,
shall quickly feel mine anger: one great day given us,
not to be snatch'd out of our hands but basely;
and must we shame the gods from whence we have it, with setting snares for Souldiers? I'll run away first,
be hooted at, and children call me coward,
before I set up scales for Victories:
Give 'em their swords.
2. Daug. O gods.
Car. Bear off the women unto their Mother.
2. Dau. One shot, gentle Uncle.
Car. One cut her fiddle-string: Bear 'em off I say.
1. Dau. The —— take this fortune.

Cara. Learn to ſpin, and curſe your knotted hemp: goe Gentlemen, Exeunt Daughters.
ſafely go off, up to your troops: be wiſer,
there thank me like tall Souldiers: I ſhall ſeek ye.
Exit Caratach.

Cur. A noble worth.
Dec. Well Junius.
Jun. Pray ye no more.
Cur. He bluſhes, do not load him.
Dec. Where's your love now? Drums loud again.
Jun. Puffe, there it flies: Come, let's redeem our follies.
Exeunt Junius, Curius, Decius.

Dru. Awake, Sir; yet the Roman Bodie's whole,
I ſee 'em cleer again.
Pen. Whole? 'tis not poſſible:
Druſus, they muſt be loſt.
Dru. By —— they are whole, Sir, and in brave doing; ſee, they wheel about to gain more ground.
Pen. But ſee there Druſus, ſee, ſee that huge Battell moving from the mountains, their gilt coats ſhine like Dragons ſcales, their march like a rough tumbling ſtorm; ſee them, and view 'em, and then ſee Rome no more: ſay they faile; look,
look where the armed carts ſtand; a new Army:
look how they hang like falling rocks, as murdring death rides in triumph Druſus: fell deſtruction laſhes his fiery horſe, and round about him his many thouſand wayes to let out ſoules.
Move me again when they charge, when the mountain melts under their hot wheels, and from their Ax'trees huge claps of thunder plough the ground before 'em, till then I'll dream what Rome was.
Enter Swetonius, Petillius, Demetrius, Macer.
Swet. O bravely fought; honour till now nere ſhow'd her golden face i'th' field. Like lions, Gentlemen, y' have held your heads up this day: Where's yong Junius, Curius, and Decius?
Petill. Gone to heaven, I think, Sir. (do ye?
Sw. Their worths go with 'em: breath a while: How
Pet. Wel; ſome few ſcurvie wounds, my heart's whole Dem. Would they would give us more ground. (yet.
Swet. Give? wee'll have it.
Petill. Have it? and hold it too, deſpight the divell.
Enter Junius, Decius, Curius.
Jun. Lead up to th' head, and line ſure: the Qs. Battell begins to charge like wild-fire: Where's the Generall?
Swet. Oh, they are living yet. Come, my brave ſouldiers, come, let me powr Romes bleſſing on ye; Live, live, and lead Armies all: ye bleed hard.
Jun. Beſt:
wee ſhall appear the ſterner to the foe.
Dec. More wounds, more honour.
Petill. Loſe no time.
Swet. Away then,
and ſtand this ſhock, ye have ſtood the world.
Petill. Wee'l grow to't.
Is not this better now then lowſie loving?
Jun. I am my ſelf, Petillius.
Petill. 'Tis I love thee. Exeunt Romans.
Enter Bonduca, Caratach, Daughters, Nennius.
Car. Charge 'em i'th' flanks: O ye have plaid the fool, the fool extremely, the mad fool.
Bon. Why Coſin?
Car. The woman fool. Why did you give the word unto the carts to charge down, and our people in groſſe before the Enemie? we pay for't, our own ſwords cut our throats: why? —— on't,
Why do you offer to command? the divell,
the divell, and his dam too, who bid you meddle in mens affairs? Exeunt Queen, &c.
Bond. I'll help all.
Car. Home,
home and ſpin woman, ſpin, go ſpin, ye trifle.
Open before there, or all's ruine. How, Shouts within.
now comes the tempeſt; on our ſelves, by —— Victoria within.
O woman, ſcurvie woman, beaſtly woman. Exeunt.
Dru. Victoria, Victoria.
Pen. How's that, Druſus? (Sir,
Dru. They win, they win, they win; oh look, look, look, for heavens ſake look, the Britains fly, the Britains fly. Victoria. Enter Swetonius, Souldiers, and Captains.
Swet. Soft, ſoft, purſue it ſoft; excellent Souldiers, cloſe, my brave fellows, honourable Romans:
oh cool thy mettle Junius, they are ours,
the world cannot redeem 'em: ſtern Petillius, govern the conqueſt nobly: ſoft, good Souldiers.
Enter Bonduca, Daughters, and Britains.
Bond. Shame, whither flie ye, ye unluckie Britains?
Will ye creep into your mothers wombs again? Back cowards, Hares, fearfull Hares, Doves in your angers; leave me?
leave your Queen deſolate? her hapleſſe children
Enter Caratach and Hengo.
to Roman rape again and fury?
Car. Flie, ye buzzards, ye have wings enough, ye fear: get thee gone, woman, Loud ſhout within.
ſhame tread upon thy heels: all's loſt, all's loſt, heark, heark how the Romans ring our knels. Exe. Bond. &c.
Hen. Good Uncle,
let me go too.
Car. No boy, thy fortune's mine,
I muſt not leave thee; get behind me; ſhake not,
Enter Petillius, Junius, Decius.
I'll breech ye, if ye do boy: Come, brave Romans,
all is not loſt yet.
Jun. Now I'll thank thee, Caratach. Fight. Drums.
Car. Thou art a Souldier: ſtrike home, home, have at ye.
Pen. His blows fall like huge ſledges on an anvil.
Dec. I am weary.
Pet. So am I.
Car. Send more ſwords to me.
Jun. Let's ſit and reſt. Sit down.
Dru. What think ye now?
Pen. O Druſus,
I have loſt mine honour, loſt my name,
loſt all that was my light: theſe are true Romans,
and I a Britain coward, a baſe coward;
guide me where nothing is but deſolation,
that I may never more behold the face of man, or mankind know me: O blind Fortune, haſt thou abuſ'd me thus?
Dru. Good Sir, be comforted;
it was your wiſdome rul'd ye; pray ye go home,
your day is yet to come, when this great fortune
ſhall be but foile unto it. Retreat.
Pen. Fool, fool, Coward. Exit Penyus & Druſus.
Enter Swetonius, Demetrius, Souldiers, Drums and Colours.
Swet.

Swet. Draw in, draw in: wel have ye fought, and wor-Romes noble recompence; look to your wounds, (thie
the ground is cold and hurtfull: the proud Queen has got a Fort, and there she and her Daughters defie us once again. To morrow morning wee'll seek her out, and make her know, our Fortunes stop at no stubborn walls: Come, sons of honour, true vertues heirs; thus hatch'd with Britain blood,
let's us march to rest, and set in gules like Suns.
Beat a soft march, and each one ease his neighbours.
Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Petillius, Junius, Decius, Demetrius singing.

Petill. Smooth was his cheek,
Dec. And his chin it was sleek,
Jun. With whoop, he has done wooing.
Dem. Junius was this Captains name,
A lad for a lasses viewing,
Pet. Ful black his eye, & plump his thigh.
Dec. Made up for loves pursuing:
Dem. Smooth was his cheek,
Petill. And his chin it was sleek.
Jun. With whoop, he has done wooing.

Petill. O my vex'd thief, art thou come home again?
are thy brains perfect?
Jun. Sound as bels.
Petill. Thy back-worm quiet, and cast his sting, boy?
Jun. Dead, Petillius, dead to all folly, and now my anger only.
Pet. Why, that's wel said: hang Cupid and his quiver, a drunken brawling Boy; thy honour'd saint be thy ten shillings, Junius; there's the money, and there's the ware; square dealing: this but sweats thee like a nesh nag, and makes thee look pin buttock'd;
the other runs thee whining up and down like a pig in a storm, fils thy brains full of ballads, and shews thee like a long Lent, thy brave body
turn'd to a tail of green-fish without butter.
Dec. When thou lov'st next, love a good cup of wine,
a Mistris for a King, she leaps to kisse thee,
her red and white's her own; she makes good blood, takes none away; what shee heats sleep can help,
without a groping Surgeon.
Jun. I am counsell'd, and henceforth, when I doat again, ——
Dem. Take heed,
ye had almost paid for't.
Petil. Love no more great Ladies, thou canst not step amisse then; there's no delight in 'em;
all's in the whistling of their snatcht up silks;
they're onely made for handsome view, not handling;
their bodies of so weak and wash a temper,
a rough-pac'd bed will shake 'em all to pieces;
a tough hen puls their teeth out, tyres their souls;
plena rimarum sunt, they are full of ryppet,
and take the skin off where they are tasted; shun 'em,
they live in cullisses like rotten cocks stew'd to a tenderness, that holds no tack:
Give me a thing I may crush.
Jun. Thou speak'st truly:
the Warres shall be my Mistris now.
Petil. Well chosen, for she's a bownsing lasse, she'll kisse thee at night, boy,
and break thy pate i'th' morning.
Jun. Yesterday
I found those favours infinite.
Dem. Wench good enough, but that she talks too loud.
Pet. She talks to th' purpose, which never woman did yet: shee'll hold grapling,
and he that layes on best, is her best servant:
all other loves are meer catching of dotrels, stretching of legs out onely, and trim lazinesse. Enter Here comes the Generall. Swet. Curius & Macer.
Swet. I am glad I have found ye:
Are those come in yet that pursu'd bold Caratach?
Pet. Not yet Sir, for I think they mean to lodge him;
take him I know they dare not, 'twill be dangerous.
Swet. Then haste Petillius, haste to Penyus,
I fear the strong conceit of what disgrace
h'as pull'd upon himself, will be his ruine:
I fear his souldiers fury too; haste presently,
I would not lose him for all Britain. Give him, Petillius, Petil. That that shall choak him.
Swet. all the noble counsell,
his fault forgiven too, his place, his honour,
Petill. For me, I think, as handsome.
Swet. all the comfort;
and tell the Souldier, 'twas on our command
hee drew not to the Battell.
Petil. I conceive Sir, and will doe that shall cure all.
Swet. Bring him with ye before the Queens Fort, and his Forces with him;
there you shall find us following of our Conquest:
Make haste.
Petil. The best I may. Exit.
Swet. And noble Gentlemen,
Up to your Companies: wee'll presently upon the Queens pursuit: There's nothing done till she be seiz'd; without her nothing won. Exeunt.
Short Flourish.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Caratach and Hengo.

Car. How does my Boy?
Hen. I would doe well, my heart's well;
I doe not fear.
Car. My good boy.
Hen. I know, Uncle,
we must all die; my little brother dy'd,
I saw him die, and he dy'd smiling: sure,
there's no great pain in't Uncle. But pray tell me,
Whither must we goe when we are dead?
Car. Strange questions!
why, to the blessed'st place Boy: ever sweetnesse and happinesse dwels there.
Hen. Will you come to me?
Car. Yes, my sweet boy.
Hen. Mine Aunt too, and my Cosins?
Car. All, my good childe.
Hen. No Romans, Uncle?

Car. No,

Car. No, boy.
Heng. I ſhould be loth to meet them there.
Car. No ill men,
that live by violence, and ſtrong oppreſſion,
come thither: 't is for thoſe the gods love, good men.
Heng. Why, then I care not when I go; for ſurely
I am perſwaded they love me: I never blaſphem'd 'em, Uncle, nor tranſgreſt my parents;
I always ſaid my prayers.
Car. Thou ſhalt go, then, indeed thou ſhalt.
Heng. When they pleaſe.
Car. That 's my good boy.
Art thou not weary, Hengo?
Heng. Weary, Uncle?
I have heard you ſay you have march'd all day in Armour.
Car. I have, boy.
Hengo. Am not I your kinſman?
Car. Yes.
Heng. And am not I as fully alli'd unto you in thoſe brave things, as blood?
Car. Thou art too tender.
Heng. To go upon my legs? they were made to bear me:
I can play twenty mile a day; I ſee no reaſon
but, to preſerve my Countrey and my ſelf,
I ſhould march fourty.
Car. What, wouldſt thou be living to wear a mans ſtrength?
Heng. Why a Caratach, a Romane-hater, a ſcourge ſent from heaven Drum.
to whip theſe proud theeves from our kingdom. Hearк, heark, Uncle, heark, I hear a Drum.
Enter Judas and his people to the door.
Ind. Beat ſoftly,
ſoftly, I ſay; they are here: who dare charge?
1 Sould. He
that dares be knockt o' th' head: I'll not come neer him.
Ind. Retire again, and watch then. How he ſtares!
h' as eyes would kill a dragon: mark the boy well;
if we could take or kill him. A —— on ye,
how fierce ye look? ſee how he broods the boy;
the devil dwells in 's ſcabbard. Back, I ſay, apace, apace, h' as found us. They retire.
Car. Do ye hunt us?
Heng. Uncle, good Uncle ſee, the thin ſtarv'd Raſcal, the eating Romane, ſee where he thrids the thickets:
kill him, dear Uncle, kill him; one good blow to knock his brains into his breech: ſtrike 's head off, that I may piſſe in 's face.
Car. Do ye make us Foxes?
Here, hold my charging-ſtaff, and keep the place, boy.
I am at bay, and like a bull I'll bear me.
Stand, ſtand, ye Rogues, ye Squirrels. Exit.
Heng. Now he pays 'em:
O that I had a mans ſtrength.
Enter Judas, &c.
Ind. Here 's the boy;
mine own, I thank my Fortune.
Heng. Uncle, uncle;
famine is faln upon me, uncle,
Ind. Come, Sir,
yeeld willingly, your uncle 's out of hearing;
I'll tickle your young tail elſe.
Heng. I defie thee,
thou mock-made man of mat: charge home, ſirha;
hang thee, baſe ſlave, thou ſhakeſt.
Ind. Upon my conſcience
the boy will beat me: how it looks, how bravely, how confident the worm is: a ſcabb'd boy to handle me thus? yeeld, or I cut thy head off.
Heng. Thou dar'ſt not cut my finger: here 't is, touch it.
Ind. The boy ſpeaks ſword and buckler. Prethee yeeld, come, here 's an apple; yeeld. (boy:
Heng. By —— he fears me.
I'll give you ſharper language: When, ye coward,
when come ye up?
Ind. If he ſhould beat me ——
Heng. When, Sir?
I long to kill thee; come, thou canſt not ſcape me,
I have twenty ways to charge thee; twenty deaths attend my bloody ſtaff.
Ind. Sure 't is the devil,
a dwarf, devil in a doubler.
Heng. I have kill'd a Captain, ſirha, a brave Captain, and when I have done, I have kickt him thus. Look here, ſee how I charge this ſtaff.
Ind. Moſt certain this boy will cut my throat, yet.
Enter two ſouldiers, running.
1 Sould. Flee, flee, he kills us.
2 Sould. He comes, he comes.
Ind. The devil take the hindmoſt. (Rogues.
Heng. Run, run, ye Rogues, ye precious Rogues, ye rank
A comes, a comes, a comes, a comes: that 's he, boys.
What a brave cry they make?
Enter Caratach, with a head.
Car. How does my chicken?
Heng. 'Faith, uncle, grown a Souldier, a great Souldier;
for by the vertue of your charging-ſtaff,
and a ſtrange fighting face I put upon 't,
I have outbrav'd hunger.
Car. That 's my boy, my ſweet boy.
Here, here 's a Romane 's head for thee.
Heng. Good proviſion.
Before I ſtarve, my ſweet-fac'd Gentleman,
I'll trie your favour.
Car. A right compleat ſouldier.
Come, chicken, let 's go ſeek ſome place of ſtrength
(the Countrey 's full of Scouts) to reſt a while in, thou wilt not elſe be able to endure.
The journey to my Countrey, fruits, and water,
muſt be your food a while, boy.
Heng. Any thing:
I can eat moſſe, nay, I can live on anger,
to vex theſe Romanes. Let 's be wary, Uncle.
Car. I warrant thee; come chearfully.
Heng. And boldly. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Penyus, Druſus, and Regulus.

Reg. The ſouldier ſhall not grieve ye.
Pen. Pray ye forſake me;
look not upon me, as ye love your Honours;
I am ſo cold a coward, my infection will choke your vertues like a damp elſe.
Dru. Dear Captain.
Reg. Moſt honour'd Sir.
Pen. Moſt hated, moſt abhor'd;
ſay ſo, and then ye know me, nay, ye pleaſe me.
O my dear credit, my dear credit.

Reg.

Reg. Sure
his minde is dangerous.
Drn. The good gods cure it. (breaches
Pen. My honour got thorow fire, thorow ſtubborn, thorow battels that have been as hard to win as heaven,
thorow death himſelf, in all his horrid trims,
is gone for ever, ever, ever, Gentlemen,
and now I am left to ſcornful tales and laughters, to hootings at, pointing with fingers, That 's he,
that 's the brave Gentleman forſook the barrel,
the moſt wiſe Penyus, the diſputing coward.
O my good Sword, break from my ſide, and kill me;
cut out the coward from my heart.
Reg. Ye are none.
Pen. He lyes that ſays ſo: by—— he lyes, lyes baſely, baſer then I have done. Come, ſouldiers, ſeek me,
I have robb'd ye of your vertues: Juſtice, ſeek me,
I have broke my fair obedience, loſt ſhame take me,
take me, and ſwallow me, make ballads of me;
ſhame, endleſſe ſhame: and pray do you forſake me.
Drn. What ſhall we do?
Pen. Good Gentlemen forſake me:
you were not wont to be commanded. Friends, pray do it, and do not fear; for as I am a coward
I will not hurt my ſelf: when that minde takes me,
I'll call to you, and ask your help. I dare not.

Enter Petillius.

Petill. Good morrow, Gentlemen; where's the Tribune?
Reg. There.
Drn. Whence come ye, good Petillius?
Petill. From the General.
Drn. With what, for heavens ſake?
Petill. With good counſel, Drnſus, and love, to comfort him.
Drn. Good Regulus
ſtep to the ſouldier, and allay his anger;
for he is wilde as winter.

Exeunt Drnſus and Regulus.

Petill. O, are ye there? have at ye. Sure he 's dead, it cannot be he dare out live this fortune:
he muſt die, 't is moſt neceſſary; men expect it;
and thought of life in him, goes beyond coward.
Forſake the field ſo baſely? fie upon 't:
ſo poorly to betray his worth? ſo coldly to cut all credit from the ſouldier? ſure if this man mean to live, as I ſhould think it beyond belief, he muſt retire where never the name of Rome, the voice of Arms, or Honour was known or heard of yet: he 's certain dead, or ſtrongly means it; he 's no Souldier elſe,
no Romane in him; all he has done, but outſide, fought either drunk or deſperate. Now he riſes.
How does Lord Penyus?
Pen. As ye ſee.
Petill. I am glad on 't;
continue ſo ſtill. The Lord General,
the valiant General, great Swetonius——
Pen. No more of me is ſpoken; my name 's periſh'd.
Petill. He that commanded fortune and the day by his own valour and diſcretion, when, as ſome ſay, Penyus refuſed to come,
but I believe 'em not, ſent me to ſee ye.
Pen. Ye are welcom; and pray ſee me; ſee me well, ye ſhall not ſee me long.
Petill. I hope ſo, Penyus;
the gods defend, Sir.
Pen. See me, and underſtand me? This is the leſt to fill up your triumph; he that baſely whiſtled his honour off to th' winde, that coldly ſhrunk in his politick head, when Rome like reapers ſweat blood, and ſpirit, for a glorious harveſt, and bound it up, and brought it off: that fool,
that having gold and copper offer'd him,
refus'd the wealth, and took the waſte: that ſouldier that being courted by loud fame and fortune, labour in one hand, that propounds no gods,
and in the other, glory that creats 'em,
yet durſt doubt, and be damned.
Petill. It was an errour.
Pen. A foul one, and a black one.
Petill. Yet the blackeſt may be waſht white again.
Pen. Never.
Petill. Your leave, Sir, and I beſeech ye note me; for I love ye,
and bring along all comfort: Are we gods, alli'd to no infirmities? are our natures more then mens natures? when we ſlip a little out of the way of vertue, are we loſt?
is there no medicine called Sweet mercie?
Pen. None, Petillius;
there is no mercie in mankinde can reach me,
nor is it fit it ſhould; I have ſinn'd beyond it.
Petill. Forgiveneſſe meets with all faults.
Pen. 'T is all faults,
all ſins I can commit, to be forgiven:
't is loſſe of whole man in me, my diſcretion to be ſo ſtupid, to arrive at pardon.
Petill. O but the General——
Pen. He 's a brave Gentleman, a valiant, and a loving; and I dare ſay,
he would, as far as honour durſt direct him,
make even with my fault: but 't is not honeſt, nor in his power: examples that may nouriſh neglect and diſobedience in whole bodies, and totter the eſtates and faiths of armies,
muſt not be plaid withal; nor out of pitie make a General forget his duty:
nor dare I hope more from him then is worthy.
Petill. What would ye do?
Pen. Die.
Petill. So would ſullen children, women that want their wils, ſlaves, diſobedient, that fear the law, die. Fie, great Captain; you a man to rule men, to have thouſand lives under your regiment, and let your paſſion betray your reaſon? I bring you all forgiveneſſe, the nobleſt hande commends, your place, your honour.
Pen. Prethee no more; 't is fooliſh: didſt not thou?
by—— thou didſt, I over-heard thee, there,
there where thou ſtandſt now, deliver me for raſcal, poor, dead, cold coward, miſerable, wretched,
if I out-liv'd this ruine?
Petill. I?
Pen. And thou didſt it nobly,
like a true man, a ſouldier: and I thank thee,
I thank thee, good Petillius; thus I thank thee.
Petill. Since ye are ſo juſtly made up, let me tell ye
'tis fit ye die indeed.
Pen. O how thou loveſt me! (pers Petill. For ſay he had forgiven ye; ſay the peoples whiſ-were tame again, the time run out for wonder, wh:

what muſt your own Command think, from whoſe Swords ye have taken off the edges, from whoſe valours
the due and recompence of Arms; nay, made it doubtful whether they knew obedience? muſt not theſe kill ye?
Say they are won to pardon ye, by meer miracle brought to forgive ye; what old valiant Souldier, what man that loves to fight, and fight for Rome,
will ever follow you more? dare ye know theſe ventures?
If ſo, I bring ye comfort; dare ye take it?

Pen. No, no, Petillius, no.

Petill. If your minde ſet ve ye, ye may live ſtill; but how? yet pardon me,
you may outwear all too; but when? and certain there is a mercy for each fault, if tamely
a man will take 't upon conditions.

Pen. No, by no means: I am onely thinking now, Sir,
(for I am reſolved to go) of a moſt baſe death, fitting the baſeneſſe of my fault. I'll hang.

Petill. Ye ſhall not; y'are a Gentleman I honour,
I would elſe flatter ye, and force ye live,
which is far baſer. Hanging? 't is a dogs death, an end for ſlaves.

Pen. The fitter for my baſeneſſe.

Petill. Beſides, the man that 's hang'd, preaches his end, and ſits a ſigne for all the world to gape at.

Pen. That 's true: I'll take a fitter poiſon.

Petill. No,
't is equal ill; the death of rats, and women,
lovers, and lazie boys, that fear correction.
Die like a man.

Pen. Why my ſword then.

Petill. I, if your ſword be ſharp, Sir, there 's nothing under heaven that 's like your ſword;
your ſword 's a death indeed.

Pen. It ſhall be ſharp, Sir.

Petill. Why Mithridates was an arrant aſſe to die by poiſon, if all Boſphorus could lend him ſwords: your ſword muſt do the deed:
't is ſhame to die choak'd, fame to die and bleed.

Pen. Thou haſt confirmed me: and, my good Petillius, tell me no more I may live.

Petill. 'T was my Commiſſion;
but now I ſee ye in a nobler way,
a way to make all even.

Pen. Fare-well, Captain:
be a good man, and fight well: be obedient:
command thy ſelf, and then thy men. Why ſhakeſt thou?

Petill. I do not, Sir.

Pen. I would thou hadſt, Petillius:
I would finde ſomething to forſake the world with worthy the man that dies: a kinde of earth-quake thorow all ſtern valours but mine own.

Petill. I feel now
a kinde of trembling in me.

Pen. Keep it ſtill,
as thou lov'ſt vertue, keep it.

Petill. And brave Captain,
the great and honoured Penyus.

Pen. That again:
O how it heightens me! again, Petillius.

Petill. Moſt excellent Commander.

Pen. Thoſe were mine, mine, onely mine.

Petill. They are ſtill.

Pen. Then to keep 'em for ever falling more, have at ye, heavens, ye everlaſting powers, I am yours: The work 's done, that neither fire, nor age, nor melting envie ſhall ever conquer. Carry my laſt words to the great General: kiſſe his hands, and ſay,
My ſoul I give to heaven, my fault to juſtice which I have done upon my ſelf: my vertue, if ever there was any in poor Penyus, made more, and happier, light on him. I faint.
And where there is a foe, I wiſh him fortune.
I die: lie lightly on my aſhes, gentle earth.

Petill. And on my ſin. Fare-well, great Penyus, noiſe within.

the ſouldier is in fury. Now I am glad
't is done before he comes. This way, for me, the way of toil; for thee, the way of honour. Exit.

Enter Druſus and Regulus, with ſouldiers.

Sould. Kill him, kill him, kill him.

Dru. What will ye do?

Reg. Good ſouldiers, honeſt ſouldiers.

Sould. Kill him, kill him, kill him.

Dru. Kill us firſt; we command too.

Reg. Valiant Souldiers, conſider but whoſe life ye ſeek. O Druſus, bid him be gone, he dies elſe. Shall Rome ſay (ye moſt approved ſouldiers) her dear children devoured the fathers of the fights? ſhall rage and ſtubborn fury guide thoſe ſwords to ſlaughter, to ſlaughter of their own, to Civil ruine?

Dru. O let 'em in: all 's done, all 's ended, Regulus, Penyus has found his laſt eclipſe. Come, Souldiers, come, and be hold your miſeries: come bravely, full of your mutinous and bloody angers, and here beſtow your darts. O onely Romane,
O father of the Wars.

Reg. Why ſtand ye ſtupid?
where be your killing furies? whoſe ſword now
ſhall firſt be ſheath'd in Penyus? do ye weep?
Howl out, ye wretches, ye have cauſe: howl ever.
Who ſhall now lead ye fortunate? whoſe valour preſerve ye to the glory of your Country?
who ſhall march out before ye, coy'd and courted by all the miſtriſſes of War, care, counſel, quick-ey'd experience, and victory twin'd to him?
who ſhall beget ye deeds beyond inheritance to ſpeak your names, and keep your honours living, when children fail, and time that takes all with him,
build houſes for ye to oblivion?

Dru. O ye poor deſperate fools: no more now, ſouldiers;
go home, and hang your arms up; let ruſt rot 'em;
and humble your ſtern valours to ſoft prayers;
for ye have ſunk the frame of all your vertues;
the ſun that warm'd your bloods is ſet for ever:
I'll kiſſe thy honour'd cheek. Fare well, great Penyus, thou thunder-bolt, fare-well. Take up the body;
to morrow morning to the Camp convey it.
there to receive due Ceremonies. That eye that blindes himſelf with weeping, gets moſt glory.

Exeunt with a dead march.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Sweronius, Junius, Decius, Demetrius, Curius, and Souldiers: Bonduca, two daughters, and Nennius, above. Drum and Colours.

Swet.

Swet. Bring up the Catapults and shake the wall, we will not be out-brav'd thus.
Nen. Shake the earth,
ye cannot shake our souls. Bring up your Rams, and with their armed heads, make the Fort totter, ye do but rock us into death, Exit Nennius.
Jun. See Sir,
see the Icenian Queen in all her glory from the strong battlements proudly appearing, as if she meant to give us lashes.
Dec. Yeeld, Queen.
Bond. I am unacquainted with that language, Roman.
Swet. Yeeld, honour'd Lady, and expect our mercie;
Exit Decius.
we love thy nobleness.
Bond. I thank ye, ye say well;
but mercie and love are sins in Rome and hell.
Swet. Ye cannot scape our strength, ye must yeeld, Ladie, ye must adore and fear the power of Rome.
Bond. If Rome be earthly, why should any knee with bending adoration worship her?
She's vitious; and your partiall selves confesse, aspires the height of all impietie:
therefore 'tis fitter I should reverence the thatched houses where the Britains dwell in careless mirth, where the blest household gods see nought but chaste and simple puritie.
'Tis not high power that makes a place divine,
nor that the men from gods derive their line.
But sacred thoughts in holy bosoms stor'd,
make people noble, and the place ador'd.
Swet. Beat the wall deeper.
Bond. Beat it to the center,
we will not sink one thought.
Swet. I'll make ye.
Bond. No.
2. Dau. O mother, these are fearfull hours: speak gently Enter Petillius.
to these fierce men, they will afford ye pitie.
Bond. Pitie? thou fearful girl; 'tis for those wretches that miserie makes tame. Wouldst thou live lesse?
Wast not thou born a Princesse? Can my blood, and thy brave fathers spirit, suffer in thee
so base a separation from thy self, as mercie from these Tyrants? Thou lovst lust sure, and long'st to prostitute thy youth and beautie to common slaves for bread. Say thy had mercie;
the divel a relenting conscience:
the lives of Kings rest in their Diadems, which to their bodies lively souls do give,
and ceasing to be Kings, they cease to live.
Show such another fear, and
I'll fling thee to their furie.
Swet. He is dead then?
Petill. I think so certainly; yet all my means, Sir, even to the hazzard of my life —
Swet. No more:
wee must not seem to mourn here.
Enter Decius.
Dec. There's a breach made,
is it your will we charge, Sir?
Swet. Once more mercie, mercie to all that yeeld.
Bond. I scorn to answer:
Speak to him girle; and hear thy sister.
1. Daugh. Generall, hear me, and mark me well, and look upon me directly in my face, my womans face, whose onely beautie is the hate it bears ye;
see with thy narrowest eyes, thy sharpest wishes,
into my soul, and see what there inhabits;
see if one fear, one shadow of a terrour,
one paleness dare appear but from my anger,
to lay hold on your mercies. No, ye fools, poor Fortunes fools, we were not born for triumphs, to follow your gay sports, and fill your slaves with hoots and acclamations.
Petill. Brave behaviour.
1 Daugh. The children of as great as Rome, as noble, our names before her, and our deeds her envie;
must we gild ore your Conquest, make your State,
that is not faitly strong, but fortunate?
No, no, ye Romanes, we have ways to scape ye,
to make yee poor again, indeed our prisoners,
and stick our triumphs full.
Petill. 's death, I shall love her.
1 Daugh. To torture ye with suffering, like our slaves;
to make ye curse our patience, wish the world were lost again, to win us onely, and esteem
the end of all ambitions.
Bond. Do ye wonder?
we'll make our monuments in spite of fortune,
in spight of all your Eagles wings: we'll work a pitch above ye; and from our height we'll stoop as fearlesse of your bloody fears; and fortunate, as if we prey'd on heartlesse doves.
Swet. Strange stiffnesse.
Decius, go charge the breach. Exit Decius.
Bond. Charge it home, Romane, we shall deceive thee else. Where's Nennius?
Enter Nennius.
Nen. They have made a mighty breach.
Bond. Stick in thy body, and make it good but half an hour.
Nen. I'll do it.
1 Daugh. And then be sure to die.
Nen. It shall go hard else.
Bond. Fare well with all my heart; we shall meet yonder, where few of these must come.
Nen. Gods take thee, Lady.
Exit Nennius.
Bond. Bring up the swords, and poison.
Enter one with swords, and a great cup.
2 Daugh. O my fortune!
Bond. How, how, ye whore?
2 Daugh. Good mother, nothing to offend ye.
Bond. Here, wench:
behold us, Romanes.
Swet. Mercy yet.
Bond. No talking:
puff; there goes all your pitie. Come, short prayers, and let 's dispatch the businesse: you begin,
shrink not; I'll see ye do 't.
2 Daugh. O gentle mother,
O Romanes, O my heart; I dare not.
Swet. Woman, woman, unnatural woman.
2 Daugh. O perswade her, Romanes:
alas, I am young, and would live. Noble mother, can ye kill that ye gave life? are my yeers fit for destruction?
Swet. Yeeld, and be a Queen still,

a mother, and a friend.
Bond. Ye talk: come, hold it, and put it home.
1 Daugh. Fie, ſiſter, fie, what would you live to be?
Bond. A whore ſtill.
2 Daugh. Mercie.
Swet. Hear her, thou wretched woman.
2 Daugh. Mercie, mother:
O whither will you ſend me? I was once your darling, your delight.
Bond. O gods,
fear in my family? do it, and nobly.
2 Daugh. O do not drown then.
1 Daugh. Do it, worthy ſiſter:
't is nothing, 't is a pleaſure; we'l go with ye.
2 Daugh. O if I know but whither.
1 Daugh. To the bleſſed, where we ſhall meet our father.
Swet. Woman.
Bond. Talk not.
1 Daugh. Where nothing but true joy is. (it cloſe to thee.
Bond. That 's a good wench, mine own ſweet girl; put 2 Daugh. O comfort me ſtill, for heavens ſake.
1 Daugh. Where eternal our youths are, and our beauties; where no Wars come, nor luſtful ſlaves to raviſh us.
2 Daugh. That ſteels me:
a long farewel to this world.
Bond. Good: I'll help thee.
1 Daugh. The next is mine.
Shew me a Romane Lady in all your ſtories, dare do this for her honour: they are cowards.
eat coals like compell'd Cats: your great Saint Lucrece
di'd not for honour; Tarquin topt her well, and mad ſhe could not hold him, bleſs Petill. By——
I am in love: I would give an hundred pound now but to lie with this womans behaviour. O the devil, 1 Daugh. Ye ſhall ſee me example. All your Rome, if I were proud, and lov'd ambition;
if I were luſtful, all your ways of pleaſure;
if I were greedie, all the wealth ye conquer——
Bond. Make haſte.
1 Daugh. I will. Could not intice to live but two ſhort hours this frailty: would ye learn how to die bravely, Romanes, to fling off this caſe of fleſh, loſe all your cares for ever?
live as we have done, well, and fear the gods,
hunt Honour, and not Nations with your ſwords, keep your mindes humble, your devotions high;
ſo ſhall ye learn the nobleſt part, to die.
Bond. I come, wench; to ye all Fates, hang-men; you that eaſe the aged deſtinies, and cut the threds of kingdoms, as they draw 'em: here, here 's a draught would aſk no leſſe then Cæſar
to pledge it for the glories ſake.
Cur. Great Lady.
Swet. Make up your own conditions.
Bond. So we will.
Swet. Stay.
Dem. Stay.
Swet. Be any thing.
Bond. A Saint, Sweetnes, when thou ſhalt fear, and die like a ſlave. Ye fools, ye ſhould have ti'd up death firſt, when ye conquer'd,
ye ſweat for us in vain elſe: ſee him here,
he 's ours ſtill, and our friend; laughs at your pities;
and we command him with as eaſie reins as do our enemies. I feel the poiſon.
Poor vanquiſh'd Romanes, with what matchleſſe tortures could I now rack ye? But I pitie ye, deſiring to die quiet: nay, ſo much
I hate to proſecute my victory, that I will give ye counſel ere I die.
If you will keep your Laws and Empire whole, place in your Romane fleſh a Britain ſoul.

Enter Decius.

Swet. Deſperate and ſtrange.
Dec. 'T is won, Sir, and the Britains
all put to th' ſword.
Swet. Give her fair Funeral;
ſhe was truely noble, and a Queen.
Petill. ——take it,
a love-mange grown upon me? what, a ſpirit?
Iun. I am glad of this, I have found ye.
Petill. In my belly,
O how it tumbles?
Iun. Ye good gods, I thank ye. Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Caratach upon a rock, and Hengo by him, ſleeping.

Car. Thus we afflicted Britains climb for ſafeties, and to avoid our dangers, ſeek deſtructions;
thus we awake to ſorrows. O thou woman, thou agent for adverſities, what curſes
this day belong to thy improvidence?
to Britanie by thy means, what ſad millions of widows weeping eyes? The ſtrong mans valour thou haſt betraid to fury; the childes fortune to fear, and want of friends; whoſe pieties might wipe his mournings off, and build his ſorrows a houſe of reſt by his bleſt anceſtors:
the virgins thou haſt rob'd of all their wiſhes,
blaſted their blowing hopes, turn'd their ſongs, their mirthful Marriage ſongs to Funerals,
the Land thou haſt left a wilderneſſe of wretches.
The boy begins to ſtir: thy ſafety made,
would my ſoul were in heaven.
Heng. O noble Uncle,
look out; I dream'd we were betraid.
a ſoft dead march within.
Car. No harm, boy;
't is but thy emptineſſe that breeds theſe fancies;
thou ſhalt have meat anon.
Heng. A little, Uncle, and I ſhall hold out bravely. What are thoſe?
look, Uncle, look, thoſe multitudes that march there?
they come upon us ſtealing by.
Car. I ſee 'em;
and prethee be not fearful.
Heng. Now ye hate me, would I were dead.
Car. Thou know'ſt I love thee dearly.
Heng. Did I ere ſhrink yet, Uncle? were I a man now,

I ſhould be angry with ye.

Enter Druſus, Regulus, and Souldiers, with Penyus Herſe, Drums and Colours.

Car. My ſweet chicken, ſee, they have reach'd us, and as it ſeems they bear
ſome Souldiers body, by their ſolemn geſtures, and ſad ſolemnities; it well appears too
to be of eminence. Moſt worthy Souldiers, let me intreat your knowledge to inform me what noble body that is which you bear with ſuch a ſad and ceremonious grief, as if ye meant to woo the world and nature to be in love with death? Moſt honourable excellent Romanes, by your ancient valours, as ye love fame, reſolve me.

Sould. 'T is the body of the great Captain Penyus, by himſelf made cold and ſpiritleſſe.

Car. O ſtay, ye Romanes, by the religion which you owe thoſe gods that lead ye on to Victories, by thoſe glories which made even pride a vertue in ye.

Dru. Stay:
what 's thy will, Caratach?

Car. Set down the body,
the body of the nobleſt of all Romanes,
as ye expect an offering at your graves from your friends ſorrows, ſet it down a while,
that with your griefs an enemy may mingle;
a noble enemy that loves a Souldier;
and lend a tear to vertue: even your foes,
your wild foes, as you call'd us, are yet ſtor'd with fair affections, our hearts freſh, our ſpirits, though ſometimes ſtubborn, yet when vertue dies,
ſoft and relenting as a virgins prayers.
O ſet it down.

Dru. Set down the body, ſouldiers.

Car. Thou hallowed relique, thou rich diamond cut with thine own duſt; thou for whoſe wide fame
the world appears too narrow, mans all thoughts, had they all tongues, too ſilent; thus I bow to thy moſt honour'd aſhes; though an enemy, yet friend to all thy worths: ſleep peaceably;
happineſſe crown thy ſoul, and in thy earth
ſome Lawrel fix his ſeat, there grow, and flouriſh, and make thy grave an everlaſting triumph.
Fare well all glorious Wars, now thou art gone, and honeſt Arms adieu: all noble Battels maintain'd in thirſt of honour, not of blood, fare well for ever.

Heng. Was this Romane, Uncle, ſo good a man?

Car. Thou never knew'ſt thy father.

Heng. He di'd before I was born.

Car. This worthy Romane was ſuch another piece of endleſſe honour, ſuch a brave ſoul dwelt in him: their proportions and faces were not much unlike, boy: excellent natures, ſee how it works into his eyes, mine own boy.

Heng. The multitudes of theſe men, and their fortunes, could never make me fear yet: one mans goodneſſe——

Car. O now thou pleaſeſt me: weep ſtill, my childe, as if thou ſaw'ſt me dead; with ſuch a flux or flood of ſorrow: ſtill thou pleaſeſt me.
And worthy ſouldiers, pray receive theſe pledges, theſe hatchments of our griefs, and grace us ſo much to place 'em on his Hearſe. Now if ye pleaſe, bear off the noble burden; raiſe his pile high as Olympus, making heaven to wonder to ſee a ſtar upon earth outſhining theirs.
And ever loved, ever living be thy honoured and moſt ſacred memory.

Dru. Thou haſt done honeſtly, good Caratach, and when thou di'ſt, a thouſand vertuous Romanes ſhall ſing thy ſoul to heaven. Now march on, ſouldiers.

Exeunt. A dead march.

Car. Now dry thine eyes, my boy.

Heng. Are they all gone?
I could have wept this hour yet.

Car. Come, take cheer, and raiſe thy ſpirit, childe: if but this day thou canſt bear out thy faintneſſe, the night coming I'll faſhion our eſcape.

Heng. Pray fear not me;
indeed I am very heartie.

Car. Be ſo ſtill;
his miſchiefs leſſen, that controls his ill.

Exeunt.

Scæna ſecunda.

Enter Petillius.

Petill. What do I ail, i' th' name of heaven? I did but ſee her, and ſee her die: ſhe ſtinks by this time ſtrongly, abominably ſtinks; ſhe was a woman, a thing I never car'd for: but to die ſo, ſo confidently, bravely, ſtrongly; O the devil, I have the bots, by——; ſhe ſcorn'd us, ſtrangely, all we could do, or durſt do; threatned us with ſuch a noble anger, and ſo governed with ſuch a fiery ſpirit——; the plain bots; a——upon the bots, the love-bots: hang me, hang me even out o' th' way, directly hang me. O pennie pipers, and moſt painful penners of bountiful new ballads, what a ſubject, what a ſweet ſubject for your ſilver ſounds, is crept upon ye?

Enter Junius.

Jun. Here he is; have at him. Sings.

She ſet the ſword unto her breſt,
great pitie it was to ſee,
That three drops of her life-warm blood,
run trickling down her knee.

Art thou there, bonny boy? and ifaith how doſt thou?

Petill. Well, gramercie, how doſt thou? h' as found me, ſented me out: the ſhame the devil ow'd me, h' as kept his day with. And what news, Junius?

Jun. It was an old tale ten thouſand times told,
of a young Lady was turn'd into mold,
her life was lovely, her death it was bold.

Petill. A cruel rogue; now h' as drawn purſue on me, he hunts me like a devil. No more ſinging; thou haſt got a cold: come, let's go drink ſome Sack, boy.

Jun. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

Petill. Why doſt thou laugh? what Mares neſt haſt thou found?

Jun. Ha, ha, ha.
I cannot laugh alone: Decius, Demetrius, Curius: O my ſides. Ha, ha, ha, ha, the ſtrangeſt jeſt.

Petill. Prethee no more.

Jun. The admirableſt fooling.
Petill. Thou art the prettieſt fellow.
Jun. Sirs.
Petill. Why Junius, prethee away, ſweet Junius.
Jun. Let me ſing then.
Petill. Whos, here's a ſtir now: ſing a ſong o' ſix pence, by——(if) prethee;—on't: Junius.
Jun. I muſt either ſing, or laugh.
Petill. And what's your reaſon?
Jun. What's that to you?
Petill. And I muſt whiſtle.
Jun. Do ſo.
O, I hear 'em coming.
Petill. I have a little buſineſſe.
Jun. Thou ſhalt not go, believe it: what a Gentleman of thy ſweet converſation?
Petill. Captain Junius, ſweet Captain, let me go with all celerity;
things are not always one: and do not queſtion,
nor jeer, nor gybe: none of your doleful ditties,
nor your ſweet converſation: you will finde then
I may be anger'd.
Jun. By no means, Petillius; anger a man that never knew paſſion?
'tis moſt impoſſible: a noble Captain,
a wiſe and generous Gentleman?
Pet. Tom puppie,
leave this way to abuſe me: I have found ye,
but for your mothers ſake I will forgive ye.
Your ſubtil underſtanding may diſcover (as you think) ſome trim toy to make you merry;
ſome ſtraw to tickle ye; but do not truſt to't;
y' are a young man, and may do well; be ſober;
carry your ſelf diſcreetly.
Enter Decius, Demetrius, Curius.
Jun. Yes forſooth.
Dem. How does the brave Petillius?
Jun. Monſtrous merry:
we two were talking what a kinde of thing
I was when I was in love; what a ſtrange monſter for little boys and girls to wonder at;
how like a fool I lookt,
Dec. So they do all,
like great dull ſlavering fools.
Jun. Petillius ſaw too.
Pet. No more of this; 'tis ſcurvie peace.
Jun. How naſtily,
indeed how beaſtly all I did became me?
how I forgot to blow my noſe? there he ſtands,
an honeſt and a wiſe man; if himſelf
(I dare avouch it boldly, for I know it) ſhould finde himſelf in love——
Petill. I am angry.
Jun. Surely his wiſe ſelf would hang his beaſtly ſelf, his underſtanding ſelf ſo mawl his aſſe-ſelf——
Dec. He's bound to do it; for he knows the follies, the poverties, and baſeneſſe that belongs to't,
h' as read upon the reformations long.
Petill. He has ſo.
Jun. 'T is true, and he muſt do't:
nor is it fit indeed any ſuch coward——
Petill. You'll leave prating.
Jun. Should dare come neer the Regiments, ſpecially thoſe curious puppies (for believe there are ſuch) that onely love behaviours: thoſe are dog-whelps, dwindle away, becauſe a woman dies well;
commit with paſſions onely: fornicate with the free ſpirit merely: you, Petillius, for you have long obſerv'd the world.
Petill. Doſt thou hear?
I'll beat thee damnably within theſe three hours:
go pray; may be I'll kill thee. Farewel, Jack daws. Exit.
Dec. What a ſtrange thing he's grown?
Jun. I am glad he is ſo:
and ſtranger he ſhall be, before I leave him.
Cur. Is't poſſible her meer death——
Jun. I obſerv'd him, and found him taken, infinitely taken with her bravery: I have follow'd him, and ſeen him kiſſe his ſword ſince, court his ſcabbard,
call dying, dainty deer; her brave minde, miſtris;
caſting a thouſand ways, to give thoſe forms,
that he might lie with 'em, and get old Armors:
he had got me o' th' hip once: it ſhall go hard, friends,
but he ſhall find his own coin.
Enter Macer.
Dec. How now Macer? is Judas yet come in? Enter Judas.
Mac. Yes, and has loſt moſt of his men too. Here he is.
Cur. What news?
Jud. I have lodg'd him; rouze him he that dares.
Dem. Where, Judas?
Jud. On a ſteep rock, i' th' woods, the boy too with him, and there he ſwears he will keep his Chriſtmas, Gentlemen,
but he will come away with full conditions,
bravely, and like a Britain: he paid part of us,
yet I think we fought bravely: for mine own part,
I was four ſeveral times at half ſword with him, twice ſtood his partizan: but the plain truth is,
he's a meer devil, and no man: i' th' end he ſwing'd us,
and ſwing'd us ſoundly too: he fights by With-craft:
yet for all that I ſee him lodg'd,
Jun. Take more men,
and ſcout him round. Macer, march you along.
What victuals has he?
Jud. Not a piece of Biſket, not ſo much as will ſtop a tooth; nor water,
more then they make themſelves: they lie
juſt like a brace of bear-whelps, cloſe, and crafty, ſucking their fingers for their food.
Dec. Cut off then all hope of that way: take ſufficient forces.
Jun. But uſe no foul play, on your lives: that man that does him miſchief by deceit, I'll kill him.
Macer. He ſhall have fair play, he deſerves it.
Jud. Hark ye,
what ſhould I do there then? you are brave Captains,
moſt valiant men; go up your ſelves; uſe vertue, ſee what will come on't: pray the Gentleman to come down, and be taken. Ye all know him,
I think ye have felt him too: there ye ſhall finde him, his ſword by his ſide, plums of a pound weight by him will make your chops ake: you'll finde it a more labour to win him living, then climbing of a Crowes neſt.
Dec. Away, and compaſſe him; we ſhall come up
I am ſure within theſe two hours. Watch him cloſe.
Macer. He ſhall flee thorow the air, if he eſcape us.
A ſad noiſe within.
Jun. What's this loud lamentation?
Mac. The dead body

of

of the great Penyus is new come to th' Camp Sir.
Dem. Dead!
Macer By himself, they say.
Jun. I fear'd that fortune.
Cur. Peace guide him up to heaven.
Jun. Away good Macer. Exeunt Macer and Judas.
Enter Swetonius, Druſus, Regulus, Petillius.
Swet. If thou be'ſt guilty, ſome ſullen plague thou hat'ſt moſt light upon thee:
the Regiment return on Junius, hee well deſerves it.
Petill. So.
Swet. Draw out three Companies,
yours Decius, Junius, and thou Petillius, and make up inſtantly to Caratach;
he's in the wood before ye; we ſhall follow
after due ceremony done to the dead,
the noble dead: Come, let's go burn the body.
Exeunt all but Petillius.
Petill. The Regiment given from me; diſgrac'd openly;
in love too with a trifle to abuſe me?
A merry world, a fine world: ſerv'd ſeven yeers to be an aſſe o' both ſides, ſweet Petillius, you have brought your hogs to a fine market: you are wiſe, (Sir, your honourable brain-pan full of crotchets, an underſtanding Gentleman; your projects caſt with aſſurance ever: wouldſt not thou ſow be bang'd about the pate, Petillius?
anſwer to that ſweet ſouldier; ſurely, ſurely,
I think ye would; pull'd by the noſe, kick'd; hang thee, thou art the arrant'ſt raſcall: truſt thy wiſdome with any thing of weight; the winde with feathers.
Out ye blind puppie; you command? you govern?
dig for a groat a day, or ſerve a ſwine-herd;
too noble for thy nature too. I muſt up;
but what I ſhall do there, let time diſcover. Exit.

Scæna tertia.

Enter Macer and Judas, with meat and a bottle.
Mac. Hang it o'th' ſide o'th' rock, as though the Britains ſtole hither to relieve him; who firſt ventures to fetch it off, is ours. I cannot ſee him.
Jud. He lies cloſe in a hole above, I know it, gnawing upon his anger: ha? no, 'tis not he,
Macer 'Tis but the ſhaking of the boughs.
Jud. ——— ſhake 'em,
I am ſure they ſhake me ſoundly. There.
Macer 'Tis nothing.
Jud. Make no noiſe: if he ſtir, a deadly tempeſt of huge ſtones fall upon us: 'tis done: away cloſe. Ex.
Enter Caratach.
Car. Sleep ſtil, ſleep ſweetly child, 'tis all thou feedſt on.
No gentle Britain neer; no valiant charitie to bring thee food? poor knave, thou art ſick, extreme ſick, almoſt grown wild for meat; and yet thy goodneſſe will not confeſſe, nor ſhow it. All the woods are double lin'd with ſouldiers; no way left us to make a noble ſcape: I'll ſit down by thee, and when thou wak'ſt, either get meat to ſave thee, or loſe my life i'th' purchaſe. Good gods comfort thee.
Enter Junius, Decius, Petillius, Guide.
Guide Ye are not far off now, Sir.
Jun. Draw the Companies (way.
the cloſeſt way thorow the woods; we'll keep on this Guide I will Sir: half a furlong more you'll come within the ſight o'th' Rock; keep on the left ſide, you'll be diſcoverd elſe: I'll lodge your Companies in the wilde vines beyond ye.
Dec. Do ye mark him?
Jun. Yes, and am ſorry for him.
Petill. Junius,
pray let me ſpeak two words with you.
Jun. Walk afore,
I'll overtake ye ſtraight.
Dec. I will. Exit.
Jun. Now, Captain.
Petill. You have oft told me, you have lov'd me, Junius.
Jun. Moſt ſure I told you truth then.
Petill. And that love
ſhould not deny me any honeſt thing.
Jun. It ſhall not.
Petill. Dare ye ſwear it?
I have forgot all paſſages between us that have been ill, forgiven too, forgot you.
Jun. What would this man have? By——— I do, Sir, ſo it be fit to grant ye.
Petill. 'Tis moſt honeſt.
Jun. Why, then I'll do it.
Petill. Kill mee.
Jun. How?
Petill. Pray kill me.
Jun. Kill ye?
Pet. I, kill me quickly, ſuddenly, now kill me.
Jun. On what reaſon? ye amaze me.
Pet. If ye do love me, kill me, aſk me not why;
I would be kill'd, and by you.
Jun. Mercy on me,
What ails this man? Petillius.
Petill. Pray ye diſpatch me, ye are not ſafe whilſt I live: I am dangerous, troubled extremely, even to miſchief, Junius,
an enemie to all good men: fear not, 'tis juſtice;
I ſhall kill you elſe.
Jun. Tell me but the cauſe,
and I will do it.
Petill. I am diſgrac'd, my ſervice ſlighted, and unrewarded by the Generall, my hopes left wilde and naked; beſides theſe,
I am grown ridiculous, an aſſe, a folly
I dare not truſt my ſelf with: Prethee kill me,
Jun. All theſe may be redeem'd as eaſily as you would heal your finger.
Petill. Nay ——
Jun. Stay, I'll do it,
you ſhall not need your anger: But firſt, Petillius, you ſhall unarm your ſelf; I dare not truſt
a man ſo bent to miſchief.
Petill. There's my ſword;
and do it handſomely.
Jun. yes, I will kill ye,
beleeve that certaine: but firſt i'll lay before ye the moſt extreme fool ye have plaid in this,
the honour purpoſ'd for ye, the great honour
the Generall intended ye, Petill. How?
Jun. And then I'll kill ye, becauſe ye ſhall die miſerable. Know Sir, the Regiment was given me, but till time call'd ye to do ſome worthie deed might ſtop

the

the peoples ill thoughts of ye for Lord Penyus,
I mean his death. How ſoon this time's come to ye, and haſted by Suetonius? Go, ſayes he,
Junius and Decius, and go thou Petillius;
diſtinctly, thou Petillius, and draw up,
to take ſtout Caratach; there's the deed purpoſd,
a deed to take off all faults, of all natures:
And thou Petillius; Mark it, there's the honour, and that done, all made even.

Petill. Stay.

Jun. No, I'll kill ye.
He knew thee abſolute, and full in ſouldier, daring beyond all dangers, found thee out according to the boldneſſe of thy ſpirit, a ſubject, ſuch a ſubject.

Petill. Heark ye Junius,
I will live now.

Jun. By no means. Wooed thy worth, held thee by the chin up, as thou ſankſt, and ſhew'd thee
how honour held her arms out: Come, make ready, ſince ye will die an aſſe.

Petil. Thou wilt not kill me. (gerous

Jun. By——— but I will Sir: I'll have no man dan-live to deſtroy me afterward. Beſides, you have gotten honour enough, let young men riſe now. Nay,
I do perceive too by the Generall, (which is one main cauſe ye ſhall die) how ere he carry it, ſuch a ſtrong doting on ye, that I fear,
you ſhall command in chief: how are we paid then?
Come, if you will pray, diſpatch it.

Petill. Is there no way?

Jun. Not any way to live.

Petill. I will do any thing, redeem my ſelf at any price: good Junius, let me but die upon the Rock, but offer
my life up like a Souldier.

Jun. You will ſeek then to out-doe every man.

Petill. Beleeve it Junius, you ſhall goe ſtroak by ſtroak with me.

Jun. You'll leave off too, as you are noble, and a ſouldier,
for ever theſe mad fancies.

Petill. Dare ye truſt me?
By all that's good and honeſt.

Jun. There's your ſword then, and now come on a new man: Vertue guide thee. Exeunt.

Enter Caratach and Hengo on the Rock.

Car. Courage my Boy, I have found meat: look Hengo, look where ſome bleſſed Britain, to preſerve thee, has hung a little food and drink: cheer up Boy,
do not forſake me now.

Hengo. O Uncle, Uncle,
I feel I cannot ſtay long: yet I'll fetch it,
to keep your noble life: Uncle, I am heart whole,
and would live.

Car. Thou ſhalt, long I hope.

Hen. But my head, Uncle: me thinks the Rock goes round. Enter Macer & Jud.

Macer. Mark 'em well, Judas.

Jud. Peace, as you love your life.

Hen. Do not you hear the noiſe of bels?

Car. of bels Boy? 'tis thy fancie, alas, thy bodie's full of wind.

Hengo. me thinks Sir,
they ring a ſtrange ſad knell, a preparation to ſome neer funerall of State: nay, weep not, mine owne ſweet Uncle, you will kill me ſooner.

Car. O my poor chicken.

Hen. Fie, faint-hearted Uncle:
Come, tie me in your belt, and let me down.

Car. I'll go my ſelf, Boy.

Hengo No, as ye love mee, Uncle;
I will not eat it, if I doe not fetch it;
the danger onely I deſire: pray tie me.

Car. I will, and all my care hang ore thee: come child, my valiant child.

Hengo Let me down apace, Uncle, and ye ſhall ſee how like a Daw I'll whip it from all their policies: for 'tis moſt certain a Roman train: and ye muſt hold me ſure too, you'll ſpoil all elſe. When I have brought it Uncle, wee'l be as merry——

Car. Go i'th' name of heaven Boy.

Hengo Quick, quick, Uncle, I have it. Oh.

Judas ſhoots Hengo.

Car. What aileſt thou?

Hengo O my beſt Uncle, I am ſlain.

Car. I ſee yee, and heaven direct my hand: deſtruction

Caratach kils Judas With a ſtone from the Rock, go with thy coward ſoul. How doſt thou Boy?

Oh villain, pocky villain.

Hengo O Uncle, Uncle,
oh how it pricks mee: am I preſerv'd for this?
extremely pricks me.

Car. Coward, raſcall Coward, dogs eat thy fleſh.

Hen. Oh I bleed hard: I faint too, out upon't, how ſick I am? the lean Rogue, Uncle.

Car. Look Boy,
I have laid him ſure enough.

Hengo Have ye knockt his brains out?

Car. I warrant thee for ſtirring more: cheer up, child.

Hen. Hold my ſides hard, ſtop, ſtop, oh wretched fortune, muſt we part thus? Still I grow ſicker, Uncle.

Car. Heaven look upon this noble child.

Hengo I once hop'd
I ſhould have liv'd to have met theſe bloody Romans at my ſwords point, to have reveng'd my father, to have beaten 'em: oh hold me hard. But Uncle——

Car. Thou ſhalt live ſtill I hope Boy. Shall I draw it?

Hen. Ye draw away my ſoul then. I would live a little longer; ſpare me heavens, but onely to thank you for your tender love. Good Uncle, good noble Uncle weep not.

Car. Oh my chicken,
my deer Boy, what ſhall I loſe?

Hengo Why, a child,
that muſt have died how-ever: had this ſcap'd me,
feaver or famine: I was born to die, Sir.

Car. But thus unblown, my Boy?

Heng. I goe the ſtraighter my journey to the gods: Sure I ſhall know ye when ye come, Uncle.

Car. Yes, Boy.

Hen. And I hope wee ſhall enjoy together that great bleſſedneſſe you told me of.

Car. Moſt certain, child.

Hengo I grow cold,
mine eyes are going.

Car. Lift

Car. Lift 'em up.
Hengo Pray for me;
and noble Uncle, when my bones are aſhes,
think of your little Nephew. Mercie.
Car. Mercie.
You bleſſed angels take him.
Hengo Kiſſe me: ſo.
Farewell, farewell. Dies.
Car. Farewell the hopes of Britain, thou Royall graft, Farewell for ever. Time and Death, ye have done your worſt. Fortune now ſee, now proudly pluck off thy vail, and view thy triumph: Look, look what thou haſt brought this Land to. Oh fair flower, how lovely yet thy ruines ſhow, how ſweetly even death embraces thee! The peace of heaven, the fellowſhip of all great ſouls be with thee.
Enter Petillius & Junius on the rock.
Hah? dare ye Romans? ye ſhall win me bravely.
Thou art mine. Fight.
Jun. Not yet, Sir.
Car. Breathe ye, ye poor Romans, and come up all, with all your ancient valours, like a rough winde I'll ſhake your ſouls, and ſend 'em——
Enter Swetonius, and all the Roman Captains.
Swet. Yeeld thee bold Caratach; by all ——— as I am ſouldier, as I envie thee,
I'll uſe thee like thy ſelf, the valiant Britain.
Pet. Brave ſoldier yeeld; thou ſtock of Arms and Honor, thou filler of the world with fame and glory.
Jun. Moſt worthy man, we'l woo thee, be thy priſoners.
Swet. Excellent Britain, do me but that honour, that more to me then Conqueſts, that true happineſſe,
to be my friend.
Car. O Romans, ſee what here is!
had this Boy liv'd —— Swet. For Fames ſake, for thy Swords ſake, as thou deſireſt to build thy vertues greater:
by all that's excellent in man, and honeſt ——
Car. I do beleeve: Ye have had me a brave foe; make me a noble friend, and from your goodneſſe, give this Boy honourable earth to lie in.
Swet. He ſhall have fitting Funerall.
Car. I yeeld then,
not to your blowes, but your brave courteſies.
Petil. Thus we conduct then to the arms of Peace
the wonder of the world.
Swet. Thus I embrace thee, Flouriſh.
and let it be no flattery that I tell thee,
thou art the onely Souldier.
Car. How to thank ye
I muſt hereafter finde upon your uſage.
I am for Rome?
Swet. Ye muſt.
Car. Then Rome ſhall know
the man that makes her ſpring of glory grow.
Swet. Petillius, you have ſhown much worth this day,
redeem'd much errour,
ye have my love again, preſerve it. Junius,
with you I make him equall in the Regiment.
Jun. The elder and the nobler: I'll give place, Sir.
Swet. Ye ſhew a friends ſoul.

March on, and through the Camp in every tongue.
the Vertues of great Caratach be ſung. Exeunt.

FINIS.

Cæ. Lift 'em up.

Hero. Pray for me;

and noble Uncle, when my bones are afhes,

think of your little Nephew. Mercie,

Cæ. Mercie.

You old angels take him.

Hero. Kifs me fo.

Farewell, farewell.

Cæ. Farewell the hopes of Arthur,

Royall grait. Farewell for ever. Time and Death than fall of the world with fame and glory.

Fun. Moſt worthy man, yet I won thee, by pitty.

Swo. Executors Britaines do not a honour, but more to me than Conqueſts, that can happen.

to be my friend.

Cæ. O Romans, fee what base is :

bad this Boy live?

Swo. For Fames ſake, for thy Swords ſake, the Vertues of great Caſwald be ſung. Exeunt.

THE SEA VOYAGE

Actus Primus——Scæna Prima.

A Tempeſt, Thunder and Lightning.

Enter Maſter and two Saylors.

Maſter.

LAy her aloofe, the Sea grows dangerous,
How it ſpits againſt the clouds, how it capers,
And how the fiery Element frights it back!
There be devils dancing in the aire, I think
I ſaw a Dolphin hang ith homes of the moone
Shot from a wave: hey day, hey day,
How ſhe kicks and yerks?
Down with'e main Maſt, lay her at hull,
Farle up all her Linnens, and let her ride it out.

1 Saylor. Sheele never brook it Maſter.
Shees ſo deep laden, that ſheele bulge;

Maſter. Hang her.
Can ſhe not buffet with a ſtorm a little?
How it toſſes her! ſhe reeles like a Drunkard.

2 Saylor. We have diſcovered the Land Sir,
Pray lets make in, ſhee's ſo drunke, elſe,
She may chance to caſt up all her Lading. (periſht.

1 Saylor. Sland in, ſland in, we are all loſt els, loſt and Maſter Steer her a Sear boord there.

2 Saylor. Beare in with all the Sayle we can, ſee Maſter
See, What a clap of Thunder there is,
What a face of heaven, how dredfully it looks! (prayings Maſter. Thou raſcall, thou fearfull rogue, thou haſt bin
I ſeet in thy face, thou haſt been mumbling,
When we are ſplit you ſlave; is this a time,
To diſcourage our friends with your cold orrizons?
Call up the Boatſwaine; how it ſtorms; holla.

Boatſwain. What ſhall we doe Maſter?
Caſt over all her lading? ſhe will not ſwimme
An houre elſe; Enter Albert

Maſt. The ſtorm is lowd, Franvile
We cannot heare one another, La-mure
What's the coaſt? Tibalt de pont.

Boatſw. We know not yet; ſhall we make in? Morillet.

Albert. What comfort Saylers?
I never ſaw, ſince I have known the Sea,
(Which has been this twenty yeers) ſo rude a tempeſt.
In what State are we?

Maſter. Dangerous enough Captain,
We have ſprung five leakes, and no little ones;
Still rage; beſides her ribs are open;
Her rudder almoſt ſpent; prepare your ſelves;
And have good courages, death comes but once,
And let him come in all his frights.

Albert. Is't not poſſible,
To make in toth' Land? 'tis here before us.

Morill. Here hard by Sir.

Maſter. Death is neerer Gentlemen.
Yet doe not cry, lets dye like men.

Talbot. Shal's hoyſe the Boat out, Enter Amint.
And goe all at one caſt? the more the merrier.

Maſter. You are too haſty Mounſieur,
Do ye long to be ith Fiſh-market before your time?
Hold her up there.

Amint. O miſerable Fortune,
Nothing but horrour ſounding in mine eares,
No minute to promiſe to my frighted ſoule.

Tibat. Peace woman,
We ha ſtorms enough already; no more howling.

Amint. Gentle Maſter.

Maſt. Clap this woman under hatches.

Alb. Prethee ſpeake mildly to her.

Amint. Can no help?

Maſt. None that I know.

Amint. No promiſe from your goodneſſe?

Maſt. Am I a God for heavens ſake ſtoaw this Tilb. Goe: take your gilt Prayer Booke; (woman.

And to your buſineſſe; winck and die,
There an old Haddock ſtayes for ye.

Amint. Muſt I dye here in all the frights, the terrors,
The thouſand ſeverall ſhapes, death triumphes in?
No friend to councell me?

Alb. Have Peace ſweet Miſtreſſe.

Amint. No kindreds teares upon me? Oh! my country!
No gentle hand to cloſe mine eyes?

Alb. Be comforted, heaven has the ſame
Power ſtill, and the ſame mercy.

Amint. Oh! that wave will devour me!

Maſt. Carry her down Captaine;
Or by theſe hands, I'le give no more direction,
Let the Ship ſinck or ſwimme; we ha nere better luck,
When we ha ſuch ſtoage as theſe trinkets with us,
Theſe ſweet ſin-breeders; how can heaven ſmile on us,
When ſuch a burthen of iniquity
Lies tumbling like a potion in our Ships belly? Exit.

Tib. A way with her, and if ſhe have a Prayer;
That's fit for ſuch an houre, let her ſay't quickly,
And ſeriouſly. Exit.

Alb. Come, I ſee it cleer Lady, come in,
And take ſome comfort. I'le ſtay with ye. (hope,

Amint. Where ſhould I ſtay? to what end ſhould I Am I not circled round with miſery?
Confuſions in their full heights dwell about me:
O Mounſier Albert, How am I bound to curſe ye,
If curſes could redeeme me? how to hate ye?

You forc't me from my quiet, from my friends;
Even from their Armes, that were as deere to me,
As day light is, or comfort to the wretched;
You forc't my friends from their peacefull rest,
Some your relentles sword gave their last groanes;
Would I had there been numbred;
And to fortunes never satisfied afflictions,
Ye turn'd my Brother; and those few friends I'd left
Like desperate creatures, to their own feares
And the worlds stubborn pitties: Oh merciles.
Alb. Sweet Mistresse.
Amint. And whether they are wandred to avoyd ye,
Or whether dead and no kind earth to cover 'em;
Was this a lovers part? but heaven has found ye,
And in his lowd voyce, his voyce of thunder,
And in the mutiny of his deep wonders,
He tels ye now, ye weepe too late:
Alb. Let these tears tell how I honour ye;
Ye know deer Lady, since ye were mine,
How truly I have lov'd ye, how sanctimoniously
Observ'd your honour; not one lascivious word,
Not one touch Lady; no, not a hope that might not
The unpolluted servant of your Chastity; (render me
For you I put to Sea, to seek your Brother;
Your Captain, yet your slave, that his redemption,
If he be living, where the Sunne has circuit,
May expiate your rigor, and my rashnesse.
Amint. The Storm grows greater; what shall we do?
Alb. Let's in;
And aske heavens mercy; my strong mind yet presages,
Through all these dangers, we shall see a day yet (Exit.
Shall Crown your pious hopes, and my faire wishes.

Enter Master, Saylors, Gentlemen, Boatswayne and Surgeon.

Mast. It must all over boord.
Boatsw. It cleers to Sea-ward mast.
Fling o're the lading there, and let's lighten her;
All the meat, and the Cakes, we are all gone else;
That we may finde her Leakes, and hold her up;
Yet save some little Bisket for the Lady,
Till we come to the Land.
La-m. Must my goods over too?
Why honest Master? here lies all my money;
The money I ha wrackt by usurie,
To buy new Lands and Lordships in new Countryes,
'Cause I was banisht from mine own
I ha been this tweenty yeers a raising it.
Tib. Out with it: (have it;
The devils are got together by the eares, who shall
And here they quarrell in the clouds.
La-m. I am undone Sir: (perish.
Tib. And be undone, 'tis better then we
La-m. O save one Chest of Plate.
Tib. A way with it, lustily Saylors;
It was some pawne, that he has got unjustly;
Down with it low enough, and let Crabs breed in't;
Mast. Over with the Truncks too. Enter
Alb. Take mine and spare not; Albert.
Mast. We must over with all.
Fran. Will ye throw away my Lordship
That I sold, put it into clothes and necessaries,
To goe to Sea with?
Tib. Over with it; I love to see a Lordship sincke;
Sir you left no Wood upon't to bovy it up;
You might ha sav'd it else.
Frm. I am undone for ever; (happy?
Alb. Why we are all undone; would you be only
La-m. Sir you may loose too.
Tib. Thou liest; I ha nothing but my skinne,
And my Clothes; my sword here, and my self;
Two Crowns in my Pocket; two paire of Cards;
And three false Dice: I can swime like a Fish;
Rascall, nothing to hinder me.
Boatsw. In with her of all hands. (all;
Mast. Come gentlemen, come Captain, ye must helpe
My life now for the Land,
'Tis high, and rocky, and full of perils;
Alb. How ever let's attempt it.
Mast. Then cheer lustily my hearts. Exit.

Enter Sebastian and Nieusa.

Sebast. Yes 'tis a Ship, I see it now, a tal Ship;
She has wrought lustily for her deliverance;
Heavens mercy, what a wretched day has here been?
Nieu. To still and quiet minds, that knew no misery,
It may seeme wretched, but with us 'tis ordinary;
Heaven has no Storm in store, nor earth no terror,
That can seeme new to us.
Sebast. 'Tis true Nieusa; if fortune were determin'd
To be wanton, and would wipe out the stories
Of mens miseries: yet we two living,
We could crosse her purpose; for 'tis impossible
She should cure us, we are so excellent in our afflictions;
It would be more then glory to her blindnes,
And stile her power beyond her pride, to quit us.
Nieusa. Doe they live still?
Sebast. Yes, and make to harbour:
Nieu. Most miserable men; I greive their Fortunes.
Sebast. How happy had they been, had the Sea cover'd
They leap from one calamity to another; ('em?
Had they been drown'd, they had ended all their
What showts of joy they make? (sorrows.
Nieu. Alas poor wretches, had they but once experience
Of this Island, they'd turn their tunes to waylings;
Sebast. Nay, to curses.
That ever they set foot on such calamities;
Here's nothing but rocks and barrennes,
Hunger, and cold to eat; here's no Vineyards
To cheere the heart of man, no Christall Rivers
After his labour to refresh his body,
If he be feeble; nothing to restore him,
But heavenly hopes; nature that made those remedies,
Dares not come here, nor looke on our distresses,
For fear she turn wilde like the place and barren.
Nieu. O Uncle, yet a little memory of what we were,
'Twill be a little comfort in our calamities;
When we were seated in our blessed homes,
How happy in our kindreds, in our families,
In all our Fortunes? (us;
Sebast. Curse on those French Pirates, that displanted
That flung us from that happinesse we found there;
Constrain'd us to Sea, to save our lives, honours and our
With all we had, our kinsmen and our jewels, (riches,
In hope to finde some place free from such robbers,
Where a mighty storme severd our Barkes,
That, where my wife, my daughter
And my noble Ladyes that went with her,
Virgins and loving soules, to scape those Pirates.
Nieus. They are living yet; such goodnesse cannot Sebast But never to me Cozen; (perish.
Never to me againe; what beares their Flag-staves?
Nieu. The Armes of France sure;
Nay, doe not start, we cannot be more miserable;
Death is a cordial, now, come when it will.
Sebast. They get to shore a pace, they'le flye as fast (there?
When once they find the place; what's that which swims
Ni. A strong young man Sir, with a handsome woman.

Hang-

Hanging about his Neck.
Sebaſt. That ſhewes ſome honour;
May thy brave charity what ere thou art,
Be ſpoken in a place, that may renown thee,
And not dye here.
Nicaſa. The Boat it ſeemes turn'd over,
So forced to their ſhifts, yet all are landed,
They're Pirats on my life.
Sebaſt. They will not rob us;
For none will take our miſery for riches:
Come Cozen, let's deſcend and try their pitties;
If we get off, a little hope walkes with us;
If not, we ſhall but load this wretched Iſland
With the ſame ſhadows ſtill that muſt grow ſhorter. Ex.

Enter Albert, Aminta, Tibalt, Morillat La-mure, Maſter, Franvile, Surgeon, Saylors.

Tibal. Wet come a ſhore my mates, we are ſafe arrived (yet.
Maſt. Thanks to heavens goodneſſe, no man loſt;
The Ship rides faire to, and her leakes in good plight.
Albert. The weathers turn'd more courteous;
How does my deere?
Alas, how weake ſhe is and wet?
Amint. I am glad yet, I ſcapt with life; (goodneſſe,
Which certain Noble Captain, next to heavens
I muſt thanke you for, and which is more,
Acknowledge your deer tenderneſſe, your firme love
To your unworthy Miſtreſſe, and recant to (Indeed I muſt) thoſe harſh opinions,
Thoſe cruell unkind thoughts, I heapt upon ye;
Farther then that, I muſt forget your Injuries.
So faire I am tyde, and fetred to your ſervice,
Beleeve me I will learne to love.
Albert. I thank ye Madam,
And it ſhall be my practiſe to ſerve.
What cheere companions?
Tibalt. No great cheere Sir, a peece of ſouced Bisket
And halfe a hard egge, for the Sea has taken order;
Being young and ſtrong, we ſhall not ſurfet Captaine.
For mine own part, Ile Dance till I'm dry;
Come Surgeon, out with your Gliſter-pipe,
And ſtricke a Galliard.
Alb. What a brave day again;
And what faire weather, after ſo fowle a ſtorme?
La-mure. I ant pleas'ed the Maſter, he might ha ſeen
This weather, and ha ſav'd our goods. (healths.
Alb. Never think on em, we have our lives and La-m. I muſt think on em, and think
'Twas moſt malicioufly done to undoe me.
Fran. And me to, I loſt all;
I hant another ſhirt to put upon me, nor Clothes
But theſe poor raggs; I had fifteen faire ſutes,
The worſt was cut upon Taffaty.
Tib. I am glad you ha loſt, give me thy hand,
Is thy ſkin whole? art thou not purl'd with ſcabbs?
No Ancient monuments of madam Venus?
Thou haſt a ſuit then will poſe the cunningſt Taylor,
That will never turn faſhion, nor forſake thee,
Till thy executors the wormes uncaſe thee,
They take off glorious ſutes Franvile: thou art happy,
Thou art delivered of em, here are no Brokers;
No Alchymiſts to turn 'em into Mettle;
Nor Leather'd Captaine's with Ladies to adore 'em;
Wilt thou ſee a dogfiſh riſe in one of thy brave doublets,
And tumble like a Tub to make thee merry,
Or an old Haddock riſe with thy hatcht ſword
Thou payd'ſt a hundred Crowns for?
A Mermayd in a mantle of your worſhips,
Or a Dolphin in your double ruffe?
Fran. Ye are merry, but if I take it thus,
If I be foyſted and jeer'd out of my goods.
La-mure. Nor I, I vow thee.
Nor Maſter nor mate, I ſee your cunning,
Alb. O be not angry Gentlemen.
Moril. Yes Sir we have reaſon.
And ſome friends I can make. (ſafety.
Maſt. What I did Gentlemen, was for the generall
If ye ayme at me, I am not ſo tame.
Tib. Pray take my councell Gallants.
Fight not till the Surgeon be well,
Hee's damnable Sea-ſick, and may ſpoyle all;
Beſides he has loſt his Fidleſtick, and the beſt
Box of Bores greaſe; why doe you make ſuch faces,
And hand your ſwords?
Alb. Who would ye fight with? Gentlemen?
Who has done ye wrong? for ſhame be better temper'd.
No ſooner come to give thankes for our ſafeties,
But we muſt raiſe new civill Broyles amongſt us (on us?
Inflame thoſe angry powers, to ſhower new vengeance
What can we expect for theſe unmanly murmers,
Theſe ſtrong temptations of their holy pitties,
But plagues in another kind, a fuller, ſo dreadfull,
That the ſinging ſtormes are ſlumbers to it?
Tib. Be men and rule your minds;
If you will needs fight Gentlemen,
And thinke to raiſe new riches by your valours,
Have at ye, I have little elſe to doe now
I have ſaid my Prayers; you ſay you have loſt,
And make your loſſe your quarrell,
And grumble at my Captaine here, and the Maſter, (cals,
Two worthy perſons, indeed too worthy for ſuch raſ-
Thou Galloone gallant, and Mamon you
That build on golden mountaines, thou money Maggot,
Come all draw your ſwords, ye ſay ye are miſerable.
Alb. Nay, hold good Tibalt.
Tib. Captaine, let me correct em;
I'le make ye ten times worſe, I will not leave em;
For look ye, fighting is as nouriſhing to me as eating,
I was born quarrelling.
Maſt. Pray Sir.
Tib. I will not leave em skins to cover em;
Doe ye grumble, when ye are well ye rogues?
Maſt. Noble Du-pont.
Tib. Ye have Clothes now: and ye prate.
Amin. Pray Gentlemen, for my ſake be at peace.
La-m. Let it become me to make all friends.
Fran. You have ſtopt our angers Lady.
Alb. This ſhewes noble.
Tib. 'Tis well: 'tis very well: there's halfe a Bisket,
Break't amongſt ye all, and thank my bounty,
This is clothes & Plate too; come no more quarrelling.
Amin. But hah what things are theſe, Enter
Are they humane creatures? Sebaſtian
Tib. I have heard of Sea-Calves. and Nicaſa.
Alb. They are no ſhaddows ſure, they have Leggs and Tib. They hang but lightly on though. (Armes.
Amint. How they looke, are they mens faces?
Tib. They have Horſe-Tayles growing to em,
Goodly long maines.
Amint. Alas what ſunk eyes they have!
How they are crept in, as if they had been frighted!
Sure they are wretched men.
Tib. Where are their Wardrobs?
Looke ye Franvile, here are a cople of Courtiers.
Amint. They kneele, alas poore ſoules.

Alb. What are ye? ſpeake; are ye alive,
Or wandring ſhaddows, that finde no peace on earth,
Till ye reveale ſome hidden ſecret?
Sebaſt. We are men as you are;
Onely our miſeries make us ſeem Monſters.
If ever pitty dwelt in noble hearts; (men;
Alb. We underſtand 'em too: pray marke em Gentle-
Sebaſt. Or that heaven is plea'sd with human charity;
If ever ye have heard the name of friendſhip?
Or ſuffered in your ſelves, the leaſt afflictions,
Have gentle Fathers that have bred ye tenderly,
And Mothers that have wept for your misfortunes,
Have mercy on our miſeries.
Alb. Stand up wretches;
Speak boldly, and have releaſe;
Nicuſ. If ye be Chriſtians,
And by that bleſſe'd name, bound to releeve us,
Convey us from this Iſland.
Alb. Speake; what are ye?
Seb. As you are, Gentle born; to tell ye more,
Were but to number up our own calamities,
And turn your eyes wild with perpetuall weepings;
Theſe many yeers, in this moſt wretched Iſland
We two have liv'd: the ſcorne and game of fortune;
Bleſſe your ſelves from it Noble Gentlemen;
The greateſt plagues, that humane nature ſuffers,
Are ſeated here, wildneſſe, and wants innumerable.
Alb. How came ye hither? (been.
Nicuſ. In a ſhip, as you do, and as you might have Had not heaven preſerv'd ye for ſome more noble uſe;
Wrack't deſperately; our men, and all conſum'd,
But we two; that ſtill live, and ſpin out
The thin and ragged threds of our misfortunes.
Alb. Is there no meat above?
Sebaſt. Nor meat nor quiet;
No ſummer here, to promiſe any thing;
Nor Autume, to make full the reapers hands;
The earth obdurate to the teares of heaven,
Let's nothing ſhoot but poyſoned weeds.
No Rivers, nor no pleaſant Groves, no beaſts;
All that were made for mans uſe, flye this deſart;
No aëry fowle dares makes his flight over it,
It is ſo ominous.
Serpents, and ugly things, the ſhames of nature,
Roots of malignant taſtes, foule ſtanding waters;
Sometimes we finde a fulſome Sea-root,
And that's a delicate: a Rat ſometimes,
And that we hunt like Princes in their pleaſure;
And when we take a Toad, we make a Banquet.
Amint. For heavens ſake let's aboord.
Alb. D'ee know no farther? (place inhabited;
Nicuſa. Yes, we have ſometimes ſeen the ſhaddow of a
And heard the noyſe of hunters;
And have attempted to finde it, ſo far as a River,
Deep, ſlow; and dangerous, fenced with high Rocks,
We have gone; but not able to atchieve that hazard,
Returne to our old miſeries.
If this ſad ſtory, may diſerve your pitties, (miſeries:
Alb. Ye ſhall aboord with us, we will relieve your Sebaſt. Nor will we be unthankfull for this benefit;
No Gentlemen, wee'le pay for our deliverance;
Look ye that plough the Seas for wealth and pleaſures,
That out-runne day and night with your ambitions,
Looke on thoſe heaps, they ſeeme hard ragged quarries;
Remove 'em, and view 'em fully.
Maſt. O heaven, they are Gold and Jewels.
Sebaſt. Be not too haſty, here lies another heape.
Merill. And here another
All perfect gold. (own carvers;
Alb. Stand farther off, you muſt not be your Lo-m. We have ſhares, and deep ones;
Fran. Yes Sir, wee'le maintain't: ho fellow Saylors.
Lo-m. Stand all to your freedomes;
I'le have all this.
Fran. And I this.
Tib. You ſhall be hang'd firſt.
Lo-m. My loſſes ſhall be made good.
Fran. So ſhall mine, or with my ſword I'le do't;
All that will ſhare with us, aſſiſt us.
Tib. Captain let's ſet in.
Alb. This money will undoe us, undoe us all: (nes;
Sebaſt. This Gold was the overthrow of my happi-
I had command too, when I landed here,
And lead young, high, and noble ſpirits under me, (tain,
This curſed Gold entiſing 'em, they ſet upon their Cap-
On me that ow'nd this wealth, & this poor Gentleman,
Gave us no few wounds, forc'd us from our own;
And then their civill ſwords, who ſhould be owners,
And who Lords over all, turn'd againſt their own lives,
Firſt in their rage conſum'd the Ship,
That poor part of the Ship that ſcap't the firſt wracke,
Next their lives by heaps; O be you wiſe and carefull:
Lo-m. Wee'le ha more: Sirah, come ſhow it. (of.
Fran. Or ten times worſe afflictions then thou ſpeak'ſt
Alb. Nay, and ye will be Doggs. beats 'em out.
Tib. Let me come Captaine:
This Golden age muſt have an Iron ending.
Have at the bunch. he beats 'em off. Exit.
Amint. O Albert; O Gentlemen; O friends. Exit.
Sebaſt. Come noble Nephew, if we ſtay here, we dye,
Here rides their Ship, yet all are gone toth' ſpoyle,
Let's make a quick uſe.
Nicuſ. Away deer Uncle.
Sebaſt. This Gold was our overthrow. Exit
Nicuſ. It may now be our happineſſe. Enter Tibalt and Tib. You ſhall have gold: yes, I'le cramb it int'ee; the reſt.
You ſhall be your own carvers; yes, I'le carve ye.
Merill. I am ſore, I pray heare reaſon:
Tib. I'le heare none.
Covetous baſe mindes have no reaſon;
I am hurt my ſelf; but whil'ſt I have a Legge left,
I will ſo haunt your guilded ſoules; how dee Captain?
Ye bleed apace, curſe on the cauſers ont;
Ye doe not faint?
Alb. No, no; I am not ſo happy.
Tib. D'ee howle, nay, ye deſerve it: ('em?
Baſe greedy rogues; come, ſhall we make an end of 'em,
Alb. They are our country-men, for heavens ſake ſpare
Alas, they are hurt enough: & they relent now. Amintа Amint. O Captain, Captain. above.
Alb. Whoſe voyce is that?
Tib. The Ladies. (Captain,
Amint. Look Captain, look; ye are undone: poore
We are all undone: all, all: we are all miſerable,
Mad wilfull men; ye are undone, your ſhip, your Ship.
Alb. What of her?
Amint. Shee's under Sayle and floating;
See where ſhe flies: ſee to your ſhames, you wretches:
Thoſe poor ſtarv'd things, that ſhewed you Gold. Lo-m.
1 Saylor. They have cut the Cables, and Franvile
And got her out; the tyde too has befrinded em. goes up Maſt. Where are the Saylors that kept her? to ſee the Boatſw. Here, here in the mutiny, to take up mony, Ship.
And left no creature, left the Boat a ſhoare too;
This Gold, this damn'd enticing Gold.
2 Saylor. How the wind drives her,

As if it vied to force her from our furies?
La-m. Come back good old men:
Fran. Good honeſt men, come back.
Tib. The winds againſt ye, ſpeak lowder;
La-m. Ye ſhall have all your Gold againe: they ſee us.
Tib. Hold up your hands, and kneele, (ye;
And houle ye blockheads; they'le have compaſſion on
Yes, yes, 'tis very likely: ye have deſerv'd it,
D'ee look like Doggs now?
Are your mighty courages abated?
Alb. I bleed apace Tibalt: (miſeries.
Tib. Retire Sir; and make the beſt uſe of our
They but begin now. Enter
Amint. Are ye alive ſtill? Aminta;
Alb. Yes ſweet.
Tib. Help him off Lady;
And wrap him warme, in your Armes, (ſomely.
Here's ſomething that's comfortable; off with him hand-
Il'e come to ye ſtraight: but vex theſe raſcals a little. Exit
Fran. Oh! I am hungry, & hurt, and I am weary. Albert
Tib. Here's a Peſtle of a Portigue, Sir; Aminta.
'Tis excellent meat, with ſoure ſauce;
And here's two Chaines, ſuppoſe 'em Sauſages;
Then there wants Muſtar'd.
But the fearefull Surgeon will ſupply ye preſently:
La-m. O for that Surgeon, I ſhall dye elſe.
Tib. Faith, there he lies in the ſame pickle too.
Surg. My ſalves, and all my Inſtruments are loſt;
And I am hurt, and ſtarv'd;
Good Sir, ſeeke for ſome Hearbs.
Tib. Here's Hearbe graceleſſe; will that ſerve?
Gentlemen, will ye goe to Supper!
All. Where's the meat?
Tib. Where's the meat? what a Veale voyce is there?
Fran. Would we had it Sir, or any thing elſe;
Tib. I would now cut your throat you Dogge,
But that I wo not doe you ſuch a curteſie;
To take you from the benefit of ſtarving. (dayes hence?
O! what a comfort will your worſhip have, ſome three
Yea things beneath pitty ſhall be your harbinger;
You muſt not look for down-beds here,
Nor Hangings; though I could wiſh ye ſtrong on's;
Yet here be many lightſome coole Star-chambers,
Open to every ſweet ayre, I'le aſſure ye,
Ready provided for ye, and ſo I'le leave ye;
Your firſt courſe is ſerv'd, expect the ſecond. Exit.
Fran. A vengeance on theſe Jewels.
La-m. O! this curſed Gold. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Enter Albert, Aminta.

Alb. Alas, deere ſoule ye faint.
Amint. You ſpeak the language
Which I ſhould uſe to you; heaven knows, my weaknes
Is not for what I ſuffer in my ſelfe,
But to imagine what you endure, and to what fate
Your cruell Starrs reſerve ye.
Alb. Doe not adde to my afflictions
By your tender pitties; ſure we have chang'd Sexes;
You bear calamity with a fortitude
Would become a man; I like a weake girle ſuffer.
Amint. O! but your wounds,
How fearfully they gape? and every one
To me is a Sepulchre; if I lov'd truly,
Wſe men affirm that true love can doe wonders,
This bath'd in my warme teares, would ſoon be cur'd,
And leave no orifice behind; pray give me leave
To play the Surgeon, and bind 'em up;
The raw ayre rancles 'em.
Alb. Sweet, we want meanes.
Amint. Love can ſupply all wants.
Alb. What have ye done Sweet?
Oh ſacriledge to beauty: there's no haire
Of theſe pure locks, by which the greateſt King
Would not be gladly bound, and love his Fetters.
Amint. O Albert, I offer this ſacrifice of ſervice
To the Altar of your ſtaid temperance, and ſtill adore it;
When with a violent hand you made me yours,
I curſed the doer: but now I conſider, (honour
How long I was in your power? and with what
You entertain'd me? it being ſeldome ſeen,
That youth and heat of blood could ere preſcribe
Laws to it ſelfe; your goodneſſe is the Lethe,
In which I drown your injuries, and now live
Truly to ſerve ye: how doe you Sir?
Receive you the leaſt eaſe from my ſervice?
If you doe, I am largely recompenc'd.
Alb. You good Angels,
That are ingag'd, when mans ability failes,
To reward goodneſſe: look upon this Lady
Though hunger gripes my croaking entrailes,
Yet when I kiſſe theſe rubies, me thinkes
I'm at a banquet a refreſhing banquet;
Speak my bleſſe't one are not hungry?
Amint. Indeed I could eat, to beare you com-
Alb. Bluſh unkind nature, (pany.
If thou haſt power: or being to heare
Thy ſelf, and by ſuch innocence accus'd;
Muſt Print a thouſand kinds of ſhames, upon
Thy various face: canſt thou ſupply a drunkard,
And with a prodigall hand, reach choice of wines,
Til he caſt up thy bleſſings? or a glutton,
That robbs the Elements, to ſooth his palat,
And only eats to beget Appetite,
Not to be ſatisfied? and ſuffer here
A Virgin, which the Saints would make their gueſt,
To pine for hunger? ha, if my ſence Hornet
Deceive me not, theſe notes take being within.
From the breath of men; confirme me my Aminta;
Again, this way the gentle wind conveyes it to us
Heare you nothing?
Amint. Yes, it ſeemes free hunters Muſicke;
Alb. Still 'tis lowder; and I remember the Portugals
Inform'd us, they had often heard ſuch ſounds,
But ne're could touch the ſhore from whence it came;
Follow me, my Aminta: my good genius,
Shew me the way ſtill; ſtill we are directed;
When we gaine the top of this neer riſing hill Exit.
We ſhall know further. and Enter above.
Alb. Curteous Zephyrus
On his dewie wings, carries perfumes to cheer us;
The ayre cleers too;
And now, we may diſcerne another Iſland,
And queſtionleſſe, the ſeat of fortunate men:
O that we could arrive there;
Amint. No Albert, 'tis not to be hop'd;
This envious Torrent's cruelly interpos'd;
We have no Veſſell that may tranſport us;
Nor hath nature given us wing's to flye.
Alb. Better try all hazards,
Then periſh here remedileſſe; I feele
New vigor in me, and a ſpirit that dares
More then a man, to ſerve my faire Aminta;
Theſe Armes ſhall be my oares, with which I'le ſwim;
And my zeale to ſave thy innocent ſelfe,
Like wings, ſhall beare me up above the brackiſh waves.

Amint. Well

Amin. Well ye then leave me?
Alb. Till now I nere was wretched.
My beſt Aminta, I ſweare by goodneſſe
Tis nor hope, nor feare, of my ſelfe, that invites me
To this extreames; tis to ſupply thy wants; and believe me
Though pleaſure met me in moſt raviſhing formes,
And happineſſe courted me to entertaine her,
I would nor eate nor ſleepe till I return'd
And crown'd thee with my fortunes.
Amin. O but your abſence.
Alb. Suppoſe it but a dream; and as you may,
Endeavour to take reſt; and when that ſleep
Deceives your hunger with imagin'd food,
Thinke you have ſent me for diſcovery
Of ſome moſt fortunate Continent, yet unknown,
Which you are to be Queen of.
And now ye Powers that ere heard Lovers prayers,
Or cheriſht pure affection, looke on him
That is your Votary; and make it known Againſt all ſtops, you can defend your own. Exit.

Enter Hippolita, Crocale, Juletta.

Hip. How did we loſe Clarinda? (take ſoyle,
Cro. When we beliv'd the Stag was ſpent, and would
The fight of the blacke Lake which we ſuppos'd
He choſe for his laſt refuge, frighted him more
Then we that did purſue him.
Jul. That's uſuall; for, death it ſelfe is not ſo terrible
To any beaſt of chaſe.
Hip. Since we liv'd here, we nere could force one to it.
Cro. Tis ſo dreadfull,
Birds that with their pinions cleave the Ayre
Dare not flie over it: when the Stag turn'd head,
And we even tyred with labour, Clarinda, as if
She were made of Ayre and Fire,
And had no part of earth in her, eagerly purſu'd him;
Nor need we feare her ſafety, this place yeelds not Fawnes nor Satyres, or more luſtfull men;
Here we live ſecure,
And have among our ſelves a Common-wealth,
Which in our ſelves begun, with us muſt end.
Jul. I there's the miſery.
Cro. But being alone,
Allow me freedome but to ſpeake my thoughts;
The ſtrictneſſe of our Governeſſe, that forbids us
On pain of death the ſight and uſe of men,
Is more then tyranny: for her ſelfe, ſhee's paſt
Thoſe youthfull heats, and feeles not the want
Of that which young mayds long for: and her daughter
The faire Clarinda, though in few yeeres
Improv'd in height and large proportion,
Came here ſo young,
That ſcarce remembring that ſhe had a father,
She never dreames of man; and ſhould ſhe ſee one,
In my opinion, a would appeare a ſtrange beaſt to her.
Jul. Tis not ſo with us.
Hip. For my part, I confeſſe it, I was not made
For this ſingle life; nor doe I love hunting ſo,
But that I had rather be the Chace my ſelfe.
Cro. By Venus (out upon me) I ſhould have ſworn
By Diana, I am of thy mind too wench;
And though I have tane an Oath, not alone
To deteſt, but never to thinke of man,
Every houre ſomething tels me I am forſworn;
For I confeſſe imagination helps me ſometimes,
And that's all is left for us to feed on,
We might ſtarve elſe, for if I have any pleaſure
In this life, but when I ſleep, I am a Pagan;
Then from the Courtier to the Country clown,
I have ſtrange viſions.
Jul. Viſions Crocale?
Cro. Yes, and fine viſions too;
And viſions I hope in dreames are harmleſſe,
And not forbid by our Canons; the laſt night
(Troth tis a fooliſh one, but I muſt tell it)
As I lay in my cabin betwixt ſleeping and waking,
Hip. Upon your backe?
Cro. How ſhould a young mayd lie, foole,
When ſhe would be intranc'd?
Hip. We are inſtructed; forward I prethee.
Cro. Me thought a ſweet young man
In yeeres, ſome twenty, with a downy chin,
Promiſing a future beard, and yet no red one,
Stole ſlylie to my cabin, all unbrac'd,
Tooke me in his armes, and kiſs'd me twenty times,
Yet ſtill I ſlept.
Jul. Fie; thy lips run over Crocale.
But to the reſt.
Cro. Lord, what a man is this thought I,
To doe this to a mayd!
Yet then for my life I could not wake.
The youth, a little danted, with a trembling hand
Heav'd up the clothes.
Hip. Yet ſtill you ſlept. (by my ſide,
Cro. Yfaith I did; and when, methoughts, he was warm
Thinking to catch him, I ſtretcht out both mine armes;
And when I felt him not, I ſhreekt out,
And wak'd for anger.
Hip. Twas a pretty dream. Enter Albert.
Cro. I, if it had been a true one.
Jul. But ſtay, what's here caſt oth' ſhore?
Hip. Tis a man;
Shall I ſhoot him?
Cro. No, no, tis a handſome beaſt;
Would we had more o'the breed; ſtand cloſe wenches,
And let's heare if he can ſpeake.
Alb. Doe I yet live?
Sure it is ayre I breathe; what place is this?
Sure ſomething more then humane keeps reſidence here,
For I have paſt the Stygian gulph,
And touch upon the bleſſed ſhore? tis ſo;
This is the Elizian ſhade; theſe happy ſpirits,
That here enjoy all pleaſures.
Hip. He makes towards us.
Jul. Stand, or Ile ſhoot.
Cro. Hold, he makes no reſiſtance.
Alb. Be not offended Goddeſſes, that I fall
Thus proſtrate at your feet: or if not ſuch,
But Nymphs of Dian's traine, that range theſe groves,
Which you forbid to men; vouchſafe to know
I am a man, a wicked ſinfull man; and yet not ſold
So far to impudence, as to preſume
To preſſe upon your privacies, or provoke
Your Heavenly angers; tis not for my ſelfe
I beg thus poorely, for I am already wounded,
Wounded to death, and faint; my laſt breath
Is for a Virgin comes as neere your ſelves
In all perfection, as whats mortall may Reſemble things divine. O pitty her,
And let your charity free her from that deſart,
If Heavenly charity can reach to hell,
For ſure that place comes neere it: and where ere
My ghoſt ſhall finde abode,
Eternally I ſhall powre bleſſings on ye.
Hip. By my life I can not hurt him.

Cro.

Cro. Though I loſe my head for it, nor I. Enter
I muſt pitty him and will. Clarinda.
Jul. But ſtay, Clarinda.
Cla. What new game have ye found here, ha!
What beaſt is this lies wallowing in his gore?
Cro. Keep off.
Cla. Wherefore, I pray? I nere turn'd
From a fell Lioneſſe rob'd of her whelps,
And ſhall I feare dead carrion?
Jul. O but.
Cla. But, what iſt?
Hip. It is infectious.
Cla. Has it not a name?
Cro. Yes, but ſuch a name from which
As from the divell your mother commands us flie.
Cla. Is it a man?
Cro It is.
Cla. What a brave ſhape it has in death;
How excellent would it appeare had it life!
Why ſhould it be infectious? I have heard
My mother ſay I had a father,
And was not he a man?
Cro. Queſtionleſſe Maddam.
Cla. Your fathers too were men?
Jul. Without doubt Lady.
Cla. And without ſuch it is impoſſible
We could have been.
Hip. A ſinne againſt nature to deny it.
Cla. Nor can you or I have any hope to be a mother
Without the helpe of men.
Cro. Impoſſible.
Cla. Which of you then moſt barbarous, that knew
You from a man had being, and owe to it
The name of parent, durſt preſume to kill
The likeneſſe of that thing by which you are?
Whoſe Arrowes made theſe wounds? ſpeake, or by Dian
Without diſtinction Ile let fly at ye all.
Jul. Not mine.
Hip. Nor mine.
Cro. Tis ſtrange to ſee her mov'd thus.
Reſtraine your fury Maddam; had we kild him,
We had but perform'd your mothers command.
Cla. But if ſhe command unjuſt and cruell things,
We are not to obey it.
Cro. We are innocent; ſome ſtorm did caſt
Him ſhipwrackt on the ſhore, as you ſee, wounded:
Nor durſt we be Surgeons to ſuch
Your mother doth appoint for death.
Cla. Weake excuſe; where's pity?
Where's ſoft compaſſion? cruel, and ungratefull!
Did providence offer to your charity
But one poore Subject to expreſſe it on,
And in't to ſhew our wants too; and could you
So careleſſly neglect it? (cour.
Hip. For ought I know, he's living yet;
And you may tempt your mother, by giving him ſue-
Cla. Ha, come neere I charge ye.
So, bend his body ſoftly; rub his temples;
Nay, that ſhall be my Office: how the red
Steales into his pale lips! run and fetch the ſimples
With which my mother heald my arme
When laſt I was wounded by the Bore.
Cro. Doe: but remember her to come after ye,
That ſhe may behold her daughters charity.
Cla. Now he breathes; Exit Hippolita.
The ayre paſſing through the Arabian groves
Yeelds not ſo ſweet an odour: prethee taſte it;
Taſte it good Croesle, yet I envy thee ſo great a bleſſing;
Tis not ſinne to touch theſe Rubies, is it?
Jul. Not, I thinke.
Cla. Or thus to live Camelion like?
I could reſigne my eſſence to live ever thus.
O welcome; raiſe him up Gently. Some ſoft hand Bound up theſe wounds; a womans haire. What fury
For which my ignorance does not know a name,
Is crept into my boſome? But I forget Enter Hipolita.
My pious work. Now if this juyce hath power,
Let it appeare; his eyelids ope: Prodigious!
Two Sunnes breake from theſe Orbes.
Alb. Ha, where am I? what new viſion's this?
To what Goddeſſe doe I owe this ſecond life?
Sure thou art more then mortall:
And any Sacrifice of thanks or duty
In poor and wretched man to pay, comes ſhort
Of your immortall bounty: but to ſhew
I am not unthankfull, thus in humility
I kiſſe the happy ground you have made ſacred
By bearing of your waight.
Cla. No Goddeſſe, friend: but made
Of that ſame brittle mould as you are;
One too acquainted with calamities,
And from that apt to pity. Charity ever
Findes in the act reward, and needs no Trumpet
In the receiver. O forbeare this duty;
I have a hand to meet with yours,
And lips to bid yours welcome.
Cro. I ſee, that by inſtinct.
Though a young mayd hath never ſeen a man,
Touches have tittulations, and inform her. Enter
But here's our Governeſſe; Roſella.
Now I expect a ſtorme.
Roſ. Child of my fleſh,
And not of my faire unſpotted mind,
Un-hand this monſter.
Cla. Monſter, mother?
Roſ. Yes; and every word he ſpeakes, a Syrens note,
To drowne the careleſſe hearer. Have'I not taught thee
The falſhood and the perjuries of men?
On whom, but for a woman to ſhew pity,
Is to be cruell to her ſelfe; the ſoveraignty
Proud and imperious men uſurpe upon us,
We conferre on our ſelves, and love thoſe fetters
We faſten to our freedomes. Have we, Clarinda,
Since thy fathers wrack, ſought liberty,
To loſe it un-compeld? did fortune guide,
Or rather deſtiny, our Barke, to which
We could appoint no Port, to this bleſt place,
Inhabited heretofore by warlike women,
That kept men in ſubjection? did we then
By their example, after we had loſt
All we could love in man, here plant our ſelves,
With execrable oathes never to looke
On man, but as a monſter? and wilt thou
Be the firſt preſident to infringe thoſe vows
We made to Heaven?
Cla. Heare me; and heare me with juſtice.
And as ye are delighted in the name
Of mother, heare a daughter that would be like you.
Should all women uſe this obſtinate abſtinence,
You would force upon us; in a few yeeres
The whole world would be peopled
Onely with beaſts.
Hip. We muſt and will have men.
Cro. I or wee'l ſhake off all obedience.
Roſ. Are ye mad?
Can no perſwaſion alter ye? ſuppoſe

You

You had my ſuffrage to your ſute,
Can this Shiprackt wretch ſupply them all ?
Alb. Hear me great Lady?
I have fellowes in my miſery, not far hence,
Divided only by this helliſh River,
There live a company of wretched men
Such as your charity may make your ſlaves;
Imagine all the miſeries mankind
May ſuffer under: and they groane beneath em.
Cla. But are they like to you?
Jul. Speak they your Language?
Cro. Are they able, luſty men?
Alb. They were good Ladyes;
And in their May of youth of gentle blood,
And ſuch as may deſerve ye; now cold and hunger
Hath leſſen'd their perfection: but reſtor'd
To what they were, I doubt not they'l appeare
Worthy your favours.
Jul. This is a bleſſing
We durſt not hope for.
Cla. Deere Mother, be not obdurate.
Roſ. Hear then my reſolution: and labour not
To add to what i'le grant, for 'twill be fruitleſſe,
You ſhall appear as good angels to theſe wretched men;
In a ſmall Boat wee'l paſſe o're to 'em;
And bring 'em comfort: if you like their perſons,
And they approve of yours: for wee'l force nothing;
And ſince we want ceremonies,
Each one ſhall chooſe a husband, and injoy
His company a month, but that expird
You ſhall no more come neer 'em; if you prove fruitful,
The Males yee ſhall return to them, the Females
We will reſerve our ſelves: this is the utmoſt,
Yee ſhall 'ere obtaine: as yee think fit;
Yee may diſmiſſe this ſtranger,
And prepare to morrow for the journey. Exit.
Cla. Come Sir, will ye walke?
We will ſhew ye our pleaſant Bowers,
And ſomething yee ſhall find to cheer your heart.
Alb. Excellent Lady;
Though 'twill appear a wonder one neer ſtarv'd
Should refuſe reſt and meat, I muſt not take Your noble offer: I left in yonder deſart
A Virgin almoſt pind.
Cla. Shee's not your wife?
Alb. No Lady, but my ſiſter (tis now dangerous
To ſpeak truth) to her I deeply vow'd
Not to taſt food or reſt, if fortune brought it me,
Till I bleſs'd her with my returne: now if you pleaſe
To afford me an eaſie paſſage to her,
And ſome meat for her recovery,
I ſhall live your ſlave: and thankfully
Shee ſhall ever acknowledge her life at your ſervice.
Cla. You plead ſo well, I can deny ye nothing;
I my ſelfe will ſee you furniſht;
And with the next Sun viſit and relieve thee.
Alb. Yee are all goodneſſe—— Exit.

Actus Tertius.

Enter ſeverally, Lamure, Franvile, Morillat.

Lam. Oh! what a tempeſt have I in my ſtomack?
How my empty guts cry out my wounds ake,
Would they would bleed again, that I might get Something to quench my thirſt.
Fran. O Lamure, the happineſſe my doggs had
When I kept houſe at home! they had a ſtorehouſe,
A ſtourehouſe of moſt bleſſed bones and cruſts,
Happy cruſts: Oh! how ſharp hunger pinches me! Exit
Mor. O my importunate belly I have nothing Franvile
To ſatisfie thee; I have ſought,
As far as my weake legs would carry me,
Yet can find nothing: neither meat nor water;
Nor any thing thats nouriſhing,
My bellies grown together like an empty ſachell. Enter
Lam. How now what news? Franvile.
Mor. Haſt any meat yet?
Fran. Not a bit that I can ſee;
Here be goodly quarries, but they be cruell hard
To gnaw: I ha got ſome mud, we'l eat it with ſpoons,
Very good thick mud: but it ſtinkes damnably;
Ther's old rotten trunks of Trees to,
But not a leafe nor bloſſome in all the Iſland.
Lam. How it looks?
Mor. It ſtinkes too.
Lam. It may be poyſon.
Fran. Let it be any thing;
So I can get it down: why man,
Poyſon's a princely diſh.
Mor. Haſt thou no Bisket?
No crumbs left in thy pocket: here's my dublet,
Give me but three ſmall crumbes.
Fran. Not for three Kingdoms,
If I were maſter of 'em: Oh Lamure,
But one poore joynt of Mutton: we ha ſcornd (man)
Lam. Thou ſpeakeſt of paradiſe,
Fran. Or but the ſnuffes of thoſe healths,
We have lewdly at midnight flang away.
Mor. Ah! but to lick the Glaſſes. En. Surgeon
Fran. Here comes the Surgeon: what Haſt thou diſcovered? ſmile, ſmile, and comfort us.
Sur. I am expiring;
Smile they that can: I can find nothing Gentlemen,
Here's nothing can be meate without a miracle.
O that I had my boxes and my lints now,
My ſtupes, my tents, and thoſe ſweet helps of nature,
What dainty diſhes could I make of 'em.
Mor. Haſt neer an old ſuppoſitory?
Sur. Oh would I had ſir.
Lam. Or, but the paper where ſuch a Cordiall
Potion or Pils hath bin entombd.
Fran. Or, the bleſt bladder where a cooling gliſter
Mor. Haſt thou no ſearcloths left?
Nor any old poulties?
Fran. We care not to what it hath bin miniſtred.
Sur. Sure I have none of theſe dainties Gentlemen.
Fran. Wher's the great Wen
Thou cutſt from Hugh the ſaylers ſhoulder?
That would ſerve now for a moſt Princely banquet.
Sur. I, if we had it Gentlemen.
I flung it over-board, ſlave that I was;
Lam. A moſt unprovident villaine.
Sur. If I had any thing that were but ſupple now!
I could make ſallads of your ſhoos Gentlemen,
And rare ones: any thing unctious.
Mor. I and then we might fry the ſoales 'ith Sun.
The ſoales would make a ſecond diſh.
Lam. Or, ſouce 'em in the ſalt-water,
An inner ſoale well ſouc'd. En. Aminta
Fran. Here comes the Woman;
It may be ſhe has meat and may relieve us,
Lets withdraw, and marke and then be ready,
Shee'l hide her ſhore els, and ſo cozen us.

Aminta

Amin. How weary and how hungry am I,
How feeble and how faint is all my body?
Mine eyes like spent Lamps glowing out grow heavy,
My sight forsaking me and all my spirits,
As if they heard my passing bell go for me,
Pull in their powers and give me up to destiny,
Oh! for a little water: a little little meat,
A little to relieve me ere I perish:
I had whole floods of tears awhile that norisht me,
But they are all consum'd for thee deere Albert;
For thee they are spent, for thou art dead;
Mercilesse fate hath swallowd thee.
Oh -- I grow heavy: sleep is a salve for misery;
Heaven look on me, and either take my life,
Or make me once more happy.
Lam. Shee's fast asleep already,
Why should shee have this blessing, and we wake still,
Wake to our wants?
Mor. This thing hath bin our overthrow,
And all these biting mischieves that fall on us
Are come through her means.
Fran. True we were bound yee all know,
For happy places and most fertill islands,
Where we had constant promises of all things,
Shee turn'd the Captaines minde,
And must have him go in search, I know not of who,
Nor to what end: of such a foole her brother,
And such a coxcomb her kinsman, and we must put in
She has put us in now yfaith. (every where,
Lam. Why should we consume thus, and starve,
Have nothing to relieve us;
And shee live there that bred all our miseries,
Untrosted or unsod?
Mor. I have read in stories.
Lam. Of such restoring meates,
We have examples;
Thousand examples and allow'd for excellent;
Women that have eate their Children,
Men their slaves, nay their brothers: but these are nothing;
Husbands devoured their wives (they are their chattels,)
And of a Schoolemaster that in a time of famine, Powdered up all his Schollers.
Mor. Shee's young and tydie,
In my conscience shee'l eate delicatly;
Just like young Porke a little lean,
Your opinion Surgeon.
Sur. I think shee may be made good meat.
But look we shall want Salt.
Fran. Tush, she needs no powdering,
Sur. I grant ye;
But to suck out the humorous parts: by all means,
Lets kill her in a chafe, shee'l eat the sweeter.
Lam. Lets kill her any way: and kill her quickly,
That we might be at our meat.
Sur. How if the Captaine?
Mor. Talk not of him, hee's dead, and the rest famish'd.
Wake her Surgeon, and cut her throate,
And then divide her, every man his share.
Fran. Shee wakes her selfe.
Amin. Holy and good things keep me!
What cruell dreames have I had! who are these?
O they are my friends; for heavens sake Gentlemen
Give me some food to save my life: if ye have ought to spare;
A little to relieve me: I may blesse yee; (
For weake and wretched, ready to perish
Even now I die.
Mor. You'l save a labour then;
You bred these miseries, and you shall pay for't;
We have no meat, nor where to have we know not,
Nor how to pull our selves from these afflictions,
We are starv'd too, famisht, all our hopes deluded;
Yet ere we die thus, wee'l have one deinty meale.
Amin. Shall I be with ye Gentlemen?
Lam. Yes mary shall yee: in our bellies Lady.
We love you well —
Amin. What said you sir?
Lam. Mary wee'l eat your Ladiship.
Fran. You that have buried us in this base Island,
Wee'l bury ye in a more noble Monument.
Sur. Will ye say your prayers, that I may perform
We are wondrous sharp set; come Gentlemen, (Lady?
Who are for the hinder parts?
Mor. I. Fran. I.
Lam. And I.
Sur. Be patient;
They will not fall to every mans share.
Amin. O hear me;
Hear me ye barbarous men.
Mor. Be short and pithy,
Our stomakes cannot stay a long discourse.
Sur. And be not fearfull,
For i'le kill ye daintily.
Amin. Are ye not Christians?
Lam. Why, do not Christians eat women? En. Tibalt
Amin. Eat one another? tis most impious. Master,
Sur. Come come. Saylors.
Amin. Oh, help, help, help.
Tib. The Ladies voyce! stand off slaves,
What do you intend villains?
I have strength enough left me, if you abuse this soule,
To ——
Ma. They would have ravisht her upon my life,
Speak, how was it Lady?
Amin. Forgive 'em, 'twas their hungers.
Tib. Ha, their hungers!
Ma. They would have eaten her.
Tib. O dam'd villains; speak, is it true?
Sur. I confesse an appetite.
Tib. An appetite, i'le fit ye for an appetite.
Are ye so sharp set that her flesh must serve you?
Murther's a maine good service with your worships;
Since ye would be such devils,
Why did you not begin with one another handsomly,
And spare the woman to beget more food on?
Amin. Good Sir.
Tib. You shall grow mumey rascals;
I'le make you fall to your brawnes and your buttocks,
And worry one another like keen bandoggs.
Amin. Good sir be mercifull.
Tib. You shall know what tis to be damnd Canibals.
Amin. O my best friend! Enter Albert.
Al. Alas poor heart! here,
Here's some meat and soveraigne drink to ease you,
Sit down gentle Sweet.
Amin. I am blest to see you.
Tib. Sir, not within forty foot of this food,
If you do dogs!
All. Oh, Captain Captain, Captain.
Alb. Ye shall have meat all of you.
Tib. Captain, hear me first: hark,
Tis so inhumane I would not ha the aire corrupted with Alb. O barbarous men! sit down Dupont, (it.
Good Master and honest Saylors.
Tib. But stand you off,
And waite upon our charity; i'le wait on you els, (dogs;
And touch nothing but what's flung t'ee, as if you were

If you do, i'le cut your fingers; friends
I'le spoyle your carving.
Amin. There wretches there.
Tib. Eat your meate handsomly now,
And give Heaven thanks.
Alb. There's more bread.
Tib. See they snarle like dogs;
Eat quietly you rascals, eat quietly.
Alb. There is drink too.
Tib. Come, come, i'le fill you each your cups,
Ye shal not surfet.
Amin. And what have you discovered?
Alb. Sweet, a paradise,
A paradise inhabited with Angels,
Such as you are: their pitties makt 'em angels,
They gave me these viands, and supply'd me
With these pretious drinks.
Amin. Shall not we see 'em?
Alb. Yes, they will see you
Out of their charities, having heard our story
They will come, and comfort us, come presently,
We shall no more know wants nor miseries.
Amin. Are they all women?
Alb. All, and all in love with us.
Amin. How!
Alb. Do not mistake: in love with our misfortunes,
They will cherish and relieve our men.
Tib. Do you shrug now,
And pull up your noses? you smell comfort,
See they stretch out their Legs, like dottrels,
Each like a new Saint Dennis.
Alb. Deere Mistris,
When you would name me, and the women hear,
Call me your brother, you i'le call my sister,
And pray observe this all——
Why do you change colour sweet.
Amin. Eating too much meat.
Alb. Sawce with jealousie;
Fie, fie deer saint, y'faith ye are too blame, En. Rossellia,
Are ye not here? here fixt in my heart? Clarinda,
All. Hark, hark; Crocale,
Alb. They are come, stand ready, & look nobly, Hipollita
And with all humble reverence receive 'em, Inletta.
Our lives depend upon their gentle pitties,
And death waits on their anger.
Mor. Sure they are Fairies.
Tib. Be they devils: devils of flesh and blood;
After so long a Lent, and tedious voyage
To me they are angels.
Fran. O for some Eringoes!
Lam. Potatoes, or Cantharides.
Tib. Peace you rouges that buy abilities of your 'pothe-
Had I but took the diet of green Cheese, (caries,
And Onions for a month, I could do wonders.
Ros. Are these the Jewels you run mad for?
What can you see in one of these
To whom you would vouchsafe a gentle touch?
Can nothing perswade you
To love your selves, and place your happinesse
In cold and chast enbraces of each other.
Ju. This is from the purpose.
Hip. We had your grant to have them as they were.
Cla. Tis a beauteous Creature,
And to my selfe, I do appeare deform'd,
When I consider her, and yet shee is
The strangers sister; why then should I fear?
Shee cannot prove my rivall.
Ros. When you repent,
That you refus'd my councell, may it add
To your afflictions, that you were forward;
Yet leap'd into the Gulfe of your misfortunes,
But have your wishes.
Mast. Now she makes to us.
Amin. I am instructed, but take heed Albert,
You prove not false;
Alb. Ye are your own assurance,
And so acquainted with your own perfections,
That weak doubts cannot reach you; therefore fear not.
Ros. That you are poor and miserable men,
My eyes inform me: that without our succours,
Hope cannot flatter you to dream of safety;
The present plight you are in, can resolve you
That to be mercifull, is to draw near
The Heavenly essence: whether you wilbe
Thankfull, I do not question; nor demand
What country bred you, what names, what manors;
To us it is sufficient we relieve
Such as have shapes of men: and I command you,
As we are not ambitious to know
Farther of you, that on paine of death
You presume not to enquire what we are
Or whence deriv'd.
Alb. In all things we obey you,
And thankfully we ever shall confesse
Our selves your creatures.
Ros. You speak as becomes you;
First then and willingly deliver up
Those weapons we could force from you.
Alb. We lay 'em down
Most gladly art your feet.
Tib. I have had many a combat with a tall wench;
But never was disarm'd before.
Ros. And now hear comfort,
Your wants shalbe supplied, and though it be
A debt women may challenge to be sued to,
Especially from such they may command;
We give up to you that power, and therefore Freely each make his choyce.
Fran. Then here I fix.
Mor. Nay, she is mine: I eyed her first.
Lam. This mine.
Tib. Stay good rascals;
You are too forward, sir Gallant,
You are not giving order to a Taylor
For the fashion of a new suit;
Nor are you in your warehouse, master Merchant,
Stand back and give your betters leave: your betters;
And grumble not; if ye do, as I love meat
I will so swinge the salt itch out on you.
Captaine, Master and the rest of us,
That are brothers and good fellows: we have bin
Too late by the ears: and yet smart for our follies;
To end therefore all future emulation: if you please,
To trust to my election, you shall say,
I am not partiall to my selfe; I doubt not Give content to all.
All. Agreed, agreed.
Tib. Then but observe how learned and discreetly,
I wil proceed, and as a skilfull Doctor
In all the quirks belonging to the game;
Read over your complexions: for you Captaine
Beinst first in place and therefore first to be serv'd,
I give my judgement thus, for your aspect
Y'are much inclind to melancholy: and that tels me
The fullen Saturne had predominance
At your nativity, a malignant planet,

And

And if not qualified by a ſweet conjunction
Of a ſoft and ruddy wench born under Venus,
It may prove fatall: therefore to your armes,
I give this roſe-cheekt Virgin.
Cla. To my wiſh;
Till now I never was happy.
Amin. Nor I accurs'd.
Tib. Maſter, you are old;
Yet love the game, that I perceive too,
And if not well ſpurd up, you may prove ruſty;
Therefore to help ye here's a Bradamanta,
Or I am coſend in my calculation.
Cro. A poore old man alloted to my ſhare.
Ti. Thou wouldſt have two;
Nay I think twenty: but fear not wench,
Though he be old he's tough: look on's making,
Hee'l not fayle I warant thee.
Roſ. A merry fellow,
And were not man a creature I deteſt,
I could indure his company.
Ti. Here's a fayre heard of Does before me,
And now for a barren one:
For though I like the ſport: I do not love
To Father children: like the grand ſignior,
Thus I walk in my Seraglio,
And vew 'em as I paſſe: then draw I forth
My handkercher, and having made my choyce,
I thus beſtow it.
Roſ. On me.
Ti. On you: now my choyce is made;
To it you hungry raſcals.
Alb. Excellent.
Amin. As I love goodneſſe,
It makes me ſmile ith height of all my feares.
Cla. What a ſtrong contention you may behold
Between my Mothers mirth and anger.
Ti. Nay, no coyneſſe: be miſtriſſe of your word,
I muſt and will enjoy you.
Roſ. Be adviz'd foole: alas I am old;
How canſt thou hope content from one that's fifty.
Ti. Never talke on't;
I have known good ones at threeſcore and upwards;
Beſides the weathers hot: and men
That have experience, fear feavers:
A temperate diet is the only phyſick,
Your Julips nor Gujacum prunello's,
Champhire pils, nor Goord-water,
Come not neer your old woman;
Youthfull ſtomackes are ſtill craving,
Though their be nothing left to ſtop their mouths with;
And believe me I am no frequent giver of thoſe bounties:
Laugh on: laugh on: good Gentlemen do,
I ſhall make holiday and ſleep, when you
Dig in the mines till your hearts ake.
Roſ. A mad fellow;
Well Sir, i'le give you hearing: and as I like
Your wooing and diſcourſe: but I muſt tell ye ſir,
That rich widdowes look for great ſums in preſent,
Or aſſurances of ample joynters.
Ti. That to me is eaſie,
For inſtantly i'le do it, hear me comrades.
Alb. What ſayſt thou Tibalt?
Tib. Why, that to woe a wench with empty hands
Is no good heraldy, therefore lets to the gold,
And ſhare it equally: 'twill ſpeak for us
More then a thouſand complements or cringes,
Ditties ſtolne from Patrick, or diſcourſe from Ovid,
Beſides 'twill beget us reſpect,
And if ever fortune friend us with a Barque,
Largly ſupply us with all proviſion.
Alb. Well adviſ'd, defer it not.
Ti. Are ye all contented.
All. We are.
Ti. Lets away then,
Straight wee'l returne,
And you ſhall ſee our riches. Exit.
Roſ. Since I know what wonder and amazement was,
I neer was ſo tranſported.
Cla. Why weep ye gentle mayd?
There is no danger here to ſuch as you;
Baniſh fear: for with us I dare promiſe,
You ſhall meet all courteous entertainment.
Cro. We eſteem our ſelves moſt happy in you.
Hip. And bleſſe fortune that brought you hither.
Cla. Hark in your eare;
I love you as a friend already,
Ere long you ſhall call me by a neerer name,
I wiſh your brother well: I know you apprehend me.
Amin. I to my griefe I do;
Alas good Ladies, there is nothing left me
But thanks to pay ye with. Enter Alberi, Tibalt, and the reſt with treaſure.
Clar. That's more
Then yet you ſtand ingaged for.
Roſ. So ſoon returnd!
Alb. Hear: ſee the idoll of the Lapidary.
Ti. Theſe Pearls for which the ſlaviſh Negro
Dives to the bottome of the Sea.
Lam. To get which the induſtrious Merchant
Touches at either pole.
Fran. The never-fayling purchaſe
Of Lordſhips and of honors.
Mor. The worlds Miſtris,
That can give every thing to the poſſeſſors.
Ma. For which the Saylors ſcorn tempeſtuous winds,
And ſpit defiance in the Sea.
Ti. Speak Lady: look we not lovely now?
Roſ. Yes: yes, O my Starrs
Be now for ever bleſt, that have brought
To my revenge theſe robbers; take your arrowes,
And nayle theſe monſters to the earth.
Alb. What mean ye Lady?
In what have we offended?
Roſ. O my daughter!
And you companions with me in all fortunes,
Look on theſe Caskets and theſe Jewels
Theſe were our own, when firſt we put to Sea
With good Sebaſtian: and theſe the Pyrats
That not alone depriv'd him of this treaſure,
But alſo took his life.
Cro. Part of my preſent
I well remember was mine own.
Hip. And theſe were mine.
Ju. Sure, I have worne this Jewel.
Roſ. Wherefore do ye ſtay then,
And not performe my command?
Al. O Heaven!
What cruell fate purſues us.
Ti. I am well enough ſerv'd,
That muſt be offring jointures, Jewels,
And precious ſtones more then I brought with me.
Roſ. Why, ſhoote ye not?
Cla. Heare me deere Mother;
And when the greateſt cruelty, is Juſtice,
Do not ſhew mercy: death to theſe ſtarv'd wretches
Is a reward, not puniſhment: let 'em live
To undergoe the full weight of your diſpleaſure.

And that they may have ſence to feel the torments
They have deſerv'd: allow 'm ſome ſmall pittance,
To linger out their tortures,
Roſ. Tis well counſell'd.
All. And wee'l follow it;
Heare us ſpeake.
Roſ. Peace dogs.
Bind 'em faſt: when fury hath given way to reaſon,
I will determine of their ſufferings,
Which ſhall be horrid. Vengeance, though ſlow pac'd,
At length oretakes the guilty; and the wrath
Of the incenſed powers will fall moſt ſure
On wicked men, when they are moſt ſecure. Exeunt.

Actus quartus. Scæna prima.

Enter Raymond, Sebaſtian, Nicuſa, Saylors.

1. Sayl. Heres nothing, ſir, but poverty and hunger;
No promiſe of inhabitance; neither tract of Beaſt,
Nor foot of man: we have ſearcht
All this Rocky deſart, yet cannot diſcover any aſſurance
Here is or hath been ſuch men.
2. Sayl. Not a relique of any thing they wore;
Nor marke left by 'em, either to finde reliefe,
Or to warne others from the like misfortune.
Believe it, theſe fellows are both falſe,
And to get a little ſuccour in their miſery,
Have fram'd this cunning tale.
Ray. The ſhip, I know, is French, and own'd by Pirats,
If not by Albert my arch enemy.
You told me too there was a woman with 'em.
A young and handſome woman.
Sebaſt. There was ſo ſir.
Raym. And ſuch and ſuch young gallants.
Nic. We told ye true ſir,
That they had no means to quit this Iſland.
Raym. And that amidſt their mutiny to ſave your lives
You got their ſhip.
Sebaſt. All is moſt certaine ſir.
Raym. Where are they then? where are theſe men
Or woman? we are landed where your faiths
Did aſſure us we could not miſſe their ſights.
For this news we tooke ye to our mercy,
Reliev'd ye, when the furious Sea and famine
Strove which ſhould firſt devoure ye;
Cloath'd, and cheriſht ye; us'd ye as thoſe ye ſay ye are.
Faire Gentlemen, now keep your words, (of;
And ſhew us this company, your own free pitties ſpoke
Theſe men ye left in miſery; the woman.
Men of thoſe noble breedings you pretend to.
Should ſcorn to lie, or get their food with falſhood;
Come, direct us.
Sebaſt. Alaſſe ſir, they are gone,
But by what means or providence, we know not.
2. Sayl. Was not the Captain
A fellow of a fiery, yet brave nature,
A middle ſtature, and of brown complexion?
Nic. He was ſir.
Raym. 'Twas Albert,
And my poore wretched ſiſter.
1. Sayl. Twas he certain,
I ha been at Sea with him; many times at Sea.
Raym. Come ſhew us theſe men;
Shew us preſently, and do not dally with us.
Sab. We left 'em here; what ſhould we ſay, ſir?
Here in this place.
2. Sayl. The earth cannot ſwallow 'em;
They have no wings, they cannot fly ſure.
Raym. You told us too
Of heapes of treaſure, and of ſums conceald,
That ſet their hearts a fire; we ſee no ſuch thing,
No ſuch ſign; what can ye ſay to purge ye?
What have ye done with theſe men?
Nic. We, ſir?
Raym. You ſir;
For certain I believe ye ſaw ſuch people.
Sebaſt. By all that's good,
By all that's pure and honeſt,
By all that's holy.
Raym. I dare not credit ye,
Ye have ſo abuſ'd my hope, that now I hate ye. (tain,
1. Sayl. Lets put 'em in their ragged clothes again Cap-
For certain they are knaves, lets e'en deliver 'em
To their old fruitfull Farm; here let 'em walk the Iſland.
Sebaſt. If ye do ſo, we ſhall curſe your mercies.
Nic. Rather put us to Sea again.
Raym. Not ſo.
Yet this Ile do, becauſe ye ſay ye are Chriſtians,
Though I hardly credit it: bring in the boat,
And all aboord again, but theſe two wretches;
Yet leave 'em four daies meat. If in that time.
(For I will ſearch all nookes of this ſtrange Iſland)
I can diſcover any tract of theſe men,
Alive or dead, Ile beare ye off, and honour ye;
If not, ye have found your graves; ſo farewell. Exit.
Nic. That goodnes dwels above, & knows us innocent,
Comfort our lives, and at his pleaſure quit us.
Sebaſt. Come couſin, come, old time will end our ſtory:
But no time (if we end well) ends our glory. Exit.

Enter Roſſella, Clarinda, Crocale, Hippolita, Juletta.

Roſ. Uſe 'em with all the auſterity that may be,
They are our ſlaves; turn all thoſe pitties,
Thoſe tender reluctations that ſhould become your ſex,
To ſtern anger; and when ye look upon 'em,
Looke with thoſe eyes that wept thoſe bitter ſorrows,
Thoſe cruelties ye ſufferd by their rapines.
Some five daies hence that bleſſed houre comes,
Moſt happy to me, that knit this hand to my deare huſ-
And both our hearts in mutuall bands. (bands,
That houre Ladies.
Cla. What of that houre?
Roſ. Why, on that houre daughter,
And in the height of all our celebrations,
Our deere remembrances of that deere man,
And thoſe that ſuffered with him, our faire kinſmen,
Their lives ſhall fall a ſacrifice to vengeance,
Their lives that ruind his; tis a full juſtice.
I will looke glorious in their bloods;
And the moſt Noble ſpirit of Sebaſtian,
That periſht by the pride of theſe French Pirates,
Shall ſmile in Heaven, and bleſſe the hand that kild 'em.
Looke ſtrictly all unto your priſoners;
For he that makes a ſcape beyond my vengeance,
Or entertaines a hope by your faire uſage;
Take heed, I ſay, ſhe that deceives my truſt,
Again take heed: her life, and thats but light neither;
Her life in all the tortures my ſpirit can put on.
All. We ſhall be carefull.
Roſ. Do ſo. Exit Roſſella.
Cla. Your are angry mother, and ye are old too,

For-

Forgetting what men are: but we ſhall temper ye.
How fare your priſoners, Ladies? in what forms
Do they appeare in their afflictions?
Jul. Mine fare but poorly;
For ſo I am commanded: tis none of their fault.
Cla. Of what ſort are they?
Jul. They ſay they are Gentlemen.
But they ſhew Mungrels.
Cla. How do they ſuffer?
Jul. Faith like boyes;
They are fearfull in all fortunes; when I ſmile
They kneele, and beg to have that face continued;
And like poore ſlaves, adore the ground I goe on.
When I frown, they hang their moſt dejected heads,
Like fearfull ſheephounds; ſhew 'em a cruſt of bread
They'l Saint me preſently, and skip like Apes
For a ſup of Wine. Ile whip 'em like hackneys, Saddle 'em, ride 'em, do what I will with 'em.
Cla. Tuſh, theſe are poore things.
Have they names like Chriſtians?
Jul. Very faire names: Franvile, Lamure, and Morillat;
And brag of great kindreds too. They offer very handſomely,
But that I am a foole, and dare not venture.
They are ſound too i'my conſcience,
Or very neere upon't.
Cla. Fy, away foole.
Jul. They tell me
If they might be brought before you,
They would reveale things of ſtrange conſequence.
Cla. Their baſe poore feares.
Jul. I, that makes me hate 'em too;
For if they were but manly to their ſufferance,
Sure I ſhould ſtrain a point or two.
Cla. An houre hence Ile take a view of 'em,
And heare their buſineſſe. Are your men thus too?
Cro. Mine? No gentle Maddam, mine were not caſt
In ſuch baſe molds; afflictons, tortures,
Are names and natures of delight, to my men;
All ſorts of cruelties they meet like pleaſures.
I have but two; the one they call Du-pont,
Tibalt Du-pont; the other the ſhip-maſter.
Cla. Have they not lives, and feares?
Cro. Lives they have Maddam;
But thoſe lives never linkt to ſuch companions
As feares or doubts.
Cla. Uſe 'em Nobly;
And where you finde fit ſubjects for your pitties
Let it become ye to be courteous;
My mother will not alwaies be thus rigorous.
Hip Mine are Saylors Maddam, (be when
But they ſleep ſoundly, and ſeldom trouble me, unleſſe it
They dream ſometimes of fights and tempeſts;
Then they rore and whiſtle for Cans of Wine,
And down they fling me; and in that rage,
(For they are violent fellows) they play ſuch reaks.
If they have meat, they thank me;
If none, they heartily deſire to be hangd quickly.
And this is all they care. (tels ye
Cla. Look to 'em diligently, and where your pitties
They may deſerve, give comfort.
All. We will. Exit.
Cla. Come hither, be not frighted; Enter Aminta,
Think not ye ſteale this liberty, for we give it,
Your tender innocence aſſures me, Virgin,
Ye had no ſhare in thoſe wrongs theſe men did us;
I finde ye are not hardned in ſuch miſchieves.
Your brother was miſ-led ſure, Foully miſ-led.
Amin. How much I feare theſe pities!
Cla. Certain he was, ſo much I pity him;
And for your ſake, whoſe eyes plead for him;
Nay, for his own ſake.
Amin. Ha!
Cla. For I ſee about him
Women have ſubtill eyes, and look narrowly;
Or I am much abuſd: many faire promiſes;
Nay beyond thoſe, too many ſhadowed vertues.
Amin. I think he is good.
Cla. I aſſure my ſelfe he will be;
And out of that aſſurance take this comfort,
For I perceive your feare hath much dejected ye.
I love your brother.
Amin. Maddam.
Cla. Nay, do not take it for a dreamt of favour,
That comforts in the ſleepe, and awake vaniſhes;
Indeed I love him.
Amin. Do ye indeed?
Cla. You doubt ſtill, becauſe ye feare his ſafety;
Indeed he is the ſweeteſt man I ere ſaw;
I think the beſt. Ye may heare without bluſhes,
And give me thanks, if ye pleaſe, for my curteſie.
Amin. Maddam, I ever muſt;
Yet witneſſe Heaven, they are hard pul'd from me.
Believe me, Maddam, ſo many imperfections I could find,
(Forgive me Grace for lying) and ſuch wants,
(Tis to an honeſt uſe) ſuch poverties,
Both in his main proportion, and his mind too;
There are a hundred handſomer; (I lie leudly)
Your noble uſage, Maddam, hath ſo bound me to ye,
That I muſt tell ye.
Cla. Come tell your worſt.
Amin. He is no husband for ye.
I think ye mean in that fayr way.
Cla. Ye have hit it.
Amin. I am ſure ye have hit my heart.
You will finde him dangerous, Maddam;
As fickle as the flying ayre, proud, jealous,
Soon glutted in your ſweets, and ſoon forgetfull;
I could ſay more, and tell ye I have a brother;
Another brother, that ſo far excels this,
Both in the ornaments of man, and making.
Cla. If you were not his ſiſter, I ſhould doubt ye mainly;
Doubt ye for his love, ye deale ſo cunningly.
Do not abuſe me, I have truſted ye with more then life,
With my firſt love; be carefull of me.
Amin. In what uſe, Maddam?
Cla. In this Lady,
Speak to him for me, you have power upon him;
Tell him I love him, tell him I dote on him.
It will become your tongue.
Amin. Become my grave.
O fortune, O curſed fortune.
Cla. Tell him his liberty,
And all thoſe with him; all our wealth and Jewels.
Good ſiſter, for Ile call ye ſo.
Amin. I ſhall Lady,
Even die, I hope.
Cla. Here's Meat and Wine, pray take it,
And there he lies; give him what liberty you pleaſe;
But ſtill conceald. What pleaſure you ſhall pleaſe, ſiſter.
He ſhall nere want again. Nay, ſee an you'l take it;
Why do you ſtuddy thus?
Amin. To avoyd miſchiefes, if they ſhould happen.
Cla. Goe and be happy for me.
Amin. O blind fortune;
Yet happy thus far, I ſhall live to ſee him,

In what ſtrange deſolation lives he here now?
Sure this Curtaine will reveale. Enter Albert.
Alb. Who's that? ha!
Some gentle hand, I hope, to bring me comfort.
Or if it be my death, tis ſweetly ſhaddowed.
Amin. Have ye forgot me ſir?
Alb. My Aminta?
Amin. She ſir,
That walks here up and down an empty ſhadow,
One that for ſome few houres
But wanders here, carrying her own ſad Coffin,
Seeking ſome Deſart place to lodge her greifes in.
Alb. Sweet ſorrow welcome, welcome noble griefe;
How got you this faire liberty to ſee me?
For ſorrows in your ſhape are ſtrangers to me.
Amin. I come to counſell ye.
Alb. Ye are ſtill more welcome;
For good friends in afflictions give good councels.
Pray then proceed.
Amin. Pray eate firſt, ye ſhew faint;
Here's Wine to refreſh ye too.
Alb. I thank ye deere.
Amin. Drinke again.
Alb. Here's to our loves.
How, turn and weepe!
Pray pledge it: this happineſſe we have yet left,
Our hearts are free. Not pledge it? why,
And though beneath the axe this health were holy,
Why doe ye weep thus?
Amin. I come to woe ye.
Alb. To woe me Sweet? I am woe'd and wonne already,
You know I am yours. This pretty way becomes ye.
But you would deceive my ſorrows, that's your intent.
Amin. I would I could, I ſhould not weep, but ſmile.
Do ye like your Meat and Wine?
Alb. Like it?
Amin. Do you like your liberty?
Alb. All theſe I well may like.
Amin. Then pray like her that ſent 'em.
Doe ye like wealth, and moſt unequal'd beauty?
Alb. Peace, indeed you'l make me angry.
Amin. Would I were dead that aske it,
Then ye might freely like, and I forgive ye.
Alb. What like, and who? adde not more miſery
To a man that's fruitfull in afflictions.
Who is't you would have me like?
Who ſent theſe comforts?
Amin. I muſt tell.
Alb. Be bold.
Amin. But be you temperate.
If you be bold I die. The young fair Virgin;
(Sorrow hath made me old.) O hearken,
And wiſely harke, the Governeſſe daughter:
That Star that ſtrikes this Iſland full of wonder,
That blooming ſweetneſſe.
Alb. What of her?
Amin. She ſent it: and with it,
It muſt be out, ſhe dotes on ye,
And muſt enjoy ye: elſe no joy muſt find ye.
Alb. And have you the patience to deliver this?
Amin. A ſiſter may ſay much, and modeſtly.
Alb. A Siſter?
Amin. Yes, that name undid ye;
Undid us both: had ye nam'd wife, ſhe had fear'd ye;
And fear'd the ſin ſhe followed; She had ſhun'd, yea
Her Virgin modeſty had not touch'd at ye.
But thinking you were free, hath kindled a fire,
I feare will hardly be extinguiſht.
Alb. Indeed I played the foole.
Amin. O my beſt ſir, take heed,
Take heed of lies. Truth though it trouble ſome minds,
Some wicked minds, that are both darke and dangerous:
Yet it preſerves it ſelfe, comes off pure, innocent,
And like the Sunne, though never ſo ecclipſ'd,
Muſt breake in glory. O ſir, lie no more.
Alb. Ye have read me a faire Lecture,
And put a ſpell upon my tongue for fayning.
But how will you counſell now?
Amin. Ye muſt ſtudy to forget me.
Alb. How?
Amin. Be patient.
Be wiſe and patient, it concerns ye highly.
Can ye lay by our loves? But why ſhould I doubt it?
Ye are a man, and men may ſhift affections,
Tis held no ſin. To come to the poynt,
Ye muſt loſe me; many and mighty reaſons.
Alb. Heare me Aminta,
Have you a man that loves you to, that feeds ye,
That ſends ye liberty? has this great Governeſſe
A noble ſonne too, young, and apt to catch ye?
Am I becauſe I am in bonds, and miſerable,
My health decay'd, my youth, and ſtrength halfe blaſted,
My fortune like my wayning ſelfe, for this deſpiſ'd?
Am I for this forſaken? a new love choſen,
And my affections, like my fortunes wanderers?
Take heed of lying, you that chid me for it;
And ſhew'd how deep a ſin it was, and dangerous.
Take heed, your ſelfe, you ſwore you lov'd me deerly;
No few, nor little oathes you ſwore Aminta,
Thoſe ſeal'd with no ſmall faith, I then aſſur'd my ſelfe.
O ſeek no new waies to cozen truth.
Amin. I do not.
By Love it ſelfe I love thee,
And ever muſt, nor can all deaths diſſolve it.
Alb. Why do you urge me thus then?
Amin. For your ſafety,
To preſerve your life.
Alb. My life I do confeſſe is hers,
She gives it,
And let her take it back, I yeild it.
My loves intirely thine, none ſhall touch at it;
None, my Aminta, none.
Amin. Ye have made me happy,
And now I know ye are mine. Fortune, I ſcorn thee.
Go to your reſt, and Ile ſit by ye;
Whilſt I have time Ile be your mate, and comfort ye,
For onely I am truſted: you ſhall want nothing,
Not a liberty that I can ſteal ye.
Alb. May we not celebrate our loves Aminta?
And where our wiſhes cannot meet
Amin. You are wanton,
But with cold kiſſes Ile allay that feavor;
Look for no more, and that in private too.
Believe me I ſhall bluſh elſe.
But let's conſider, we are both loſt elſe.
Alb. Let's in, and prevent fate. Exeunt.

Enter Crocale, Juletta, Tibalt, Maſter.

Tib. You do well to ayre us Ladies, we ſhal be muſty (elſe.
What are your wiſe wils now?
Cro. You are very cranck ſtill.
Tib. As cranck as a holy Fryer, fed with hayl-ſtones.
But do ye bring us out to baite, like Buls?
Maſt. Or are you weary of the charge ye are at?
Turn us abroad again, let's jog Ladies;

Wee

We are groſſe, and courſe, unfit for your ſweet pleaſures.
Tib. Knock off our ſhoos, and men's to graſſe.
Cro. You are determined
Still to be ſtubborn then: it well becomes ye.
Tib. An humour Lady that contents a priſoner.
A ſullen fit ſometimes ſerves for a ſecond courſe.
Jul. Ye may as well be kind,
And gain our favours; gain meat, and drink,
And lodging to reſt your bones.
Tib. My bones have bore me thus long,
And had their ſhare of pains, and recreations;
If they fayl now, they are no fayr companions.
Cro. Are ye thus harſh to all our ſex?
Maſt. We cannot be merry without a Fidler.
Pray ſtrike up your Tabors, Ladies.
Cro. The fools deſpiſe us.
Jul. We know ye are very hungry now.
Tib. Yes, tis very wholſome Ladies;
For we that have groſſe bodies, muſt be carefull.
Have ye no piercing ayre to ſtir our ſtomacks?
We are beholding to ye for our Ordinary.
Jul. Why ſlaves, tis in our power to hang ye.
Maſt. Very likely.
Tis in our powers then to be hang'd, and ſcorn ye.
Hanging's as ſweet to us, as dreaming to you.
Cro. Come, be more courteous.
Jul. Do, and then ye ſhal be pleas'd, and have all neceſ-Tib. Give me ſome Ratſ-bane then. (ſaries.
Cro. And why Ratſ-bane, Mounſier?
Tib. We live like vermin here, & eate up your Cheeſe,
Your mouldy Cheeſe, that none but Rats would bite at;
Therefore tis juſt that Ratſ-bane ſhould reward us.
We are unprofitable, and our Ploughs are broken;
There is no hope of Harveſt this yeere, Ladies.
Jul. Ye ſhall have all content.
Maſt. I, and we'l ſerve your uſes.
I had rather ſerve hogs, there's more delight in't;
Your greedy appetites are never ſatisfied;
Juſt like hungry Camels, ſleeping or waking
You chew the cud ſtill.
Cro. By this hand we'l ſtarve ye.
Maſt. Tis a Noble courteſie.
I had as liefe ye ſhould famiſh me, as founder me,
To be jaded to death is onely fit for a hackney.
Here be certain tarts of tar about me,
And parcels of potargo in my Jerkin,
As long as theſe laſt.
Jul. Which will not laſt ever.
Tib. Then we'l eate one another like good fellows,
A ſhoulder of his for a hanch of mine.
Jul. Tis excellent.
Tib. I will be, as we'l dreſſe it Ladies.
Cro. Why ſure ye are not men.
Maſt. Ye had beſt come ſearch us,
A Seaman is ſeldome without a ſalt Eele.
Tib. I am bad enough,
And in my nature a notorious wencher;
And yet ye make me bluſh at your immodeſty.
Tell me good Maſter, didſt ever ſee ſuch things?
Maſt. I could like 'em though they were lewdly given,
If they could ſay no; but fie on 'em,
They gape like Oyſters.
Tib. Well, ye may hang, or ſtarve us;
But your commanding impudence ſhall never feare us.
Had ye by bluſhing ſigns, ſoft cunnings, crept into us,
And ſhew'd us your neceſſities: we had met your purpo-Supply'd your wants. We are no Saints Ladies; (ſes,
I love a good wench, as I love my life,
And with my life I will maintain my love:
But ſuch a ſordid impudence Ile ſpit at.
Let's to our dens again. Come noble Maſter.
You know our minds Ladies:
This is the faith in which we'l die. Exit Tib. and Maſt.
Cro. I doe admire 'em.
Jul. They are noble fellows,
And they ſhall not want, for this.
Cro. But ſee, Clarinda comes. Enter Clarinda.
Farewell, Ile to my charge.
Cla. Bring out thoſe priſoners now,
And let me ſeee 'em, and heare their buſineſſe.
Jul. I will, Maddam. Exit.
Cla. I hope ſhe hath prevail'd upon her brother.
She has a ſweet tongue, and can deſcribe the happineſſe
My love is ready to fling on him.
And ſure he muſt be glad, and certain wonder
And bleſſe the houre that brought him to this Iſland.
I long to heare the full joy that he labours with.
Enter Juletta Marillat, Franvile, Lamure.
Mor. Bleſſe thy Divine beauty.
Fran. Mirror of ſweetneſſe.
Lam. Ever ſpringing brightneſſe. (ries.
Cla. Nay, ſtand up Gentlemen, and leave your flatte-
Mor. Shee cals us Gentlemen, ſure we ſhall have ſome Cla. I am a mortall creature, (meat now.
Worſhip Heaven, and give theſe attributes
To their Divinities. Methinks ye look but thin.
Mor. O we are ſtarv'd, immortall beauty.
Lam. We are all poor ſtarv'd knaves.
Fran. Neither liberty nor meat Lady. (men;
Mor. We were handſome men, and Gentlemen, & ſweet
And were once gracious in the eyes of beauties,
But now we look like rogues;
Like poore ſtarv'd rogues.
Cla. What would ye do if ye were to die now?
Fran. Alas we were prepar'd. If you will hang us,
Let's have a good meale or two to die with,
To put's in heart.
Mor. Or if you'l drown us,
Let's be drunk firſt, that we may die merrily,
And bleſſe the founders.
Cla. Ye ſhal not die ſo haſtily.
What dare ye do to deſerve my favour?
Lam. Put us to any ſervice.
Fran. Any bondage,
Let's but live.
Mor. Wee'l get a world of children,
For we know, ye are hainouſly provided that way;
And ye ſhal beat us when we offend ye;
Beat us abundantly, and take our meat from us. (ones:
Cla. Theſe are weak abject things, that ſhew ye poor
What's the great ſervice ye ſo oft have threatned,
If ye might ſee me, and win my favour?
Jul. That buſineſſe of diſcovery.
Mor. O, Ile tell ye Lady.
Lam. and ſo will I.
Fran. And I,
Pray let me ſpeak firſt.
Mor. Good, no confuſion.
We are before a Lady that knows manners;
And by the next, meat I ſhall eate, tis certain.
This little Gentlewoman that was taken with us
Cla. Your Captains ſiſter, ſhe you mean.
Mor. I, I, ſhe's the buſineſſe that we would open to ye.
You are couſned in her.
Lam. How, what is't you would open?
Fran. She is no ſiſter.

Mor.

Mor. Good ſirs, how quick you are.
She is no ſiſter, Madam.
Fran. She is his.
Mor. Peace I ſay.
Cla. What is ſhe?
Mor. Faith, ſweet Lady,
She is, as a man would ſay, his.
Cla. What?
Lam. His Miſtris.
Mor. Or, as ſome new tranſlators read, his.
Cla. O me!
Mor. And why he ſhould delude you thus,
Unleſſe he meant ſome villany? theſe ten weeks
He has had her at Sea for his own propes appetite.
Lam. His Cabin-mate, Ile aſſure ye.
Cla. No ſiſter, ſay ye?
Mor. No more then I am brother to your beauty.
I know not why he ſhould juggle thus.
Cla. Do not lie to me.
Mor. If ye find me lie, Lady, hang me empty.
Cla. How am I fool'd!
Away with 'em, Juletta, and feed 'em
But hark ye, with ſuch food as they have given me.
New miſery!
Fran. Nor meat, nor thanks for all this. Exit.
Cla. Make 'em more wretched.
O I could burſt! curſe and kill now,
Kill any thing I meet. Juletta, follow me,
And call the reſt along.
Iul. We follow Maddam. Exeunt.

Enter Albert and Aminta.

Amin. I muſt be gone now, elſe ſhe may ſuſpect me;
How ſhall I anſwer her?
Alb. Tell her directly.
Amin. That were too ſudden, too improvident;
Fires of this nature muſt be put out cunningly,
They'l waſte all come neere 'em elſe.
Farewell once more.
Alb. Farewell.
And keep my love entire.
Nay kiſſe me once again, me thinks we ſhould not part.
Amin. O be wiſe, ſir.
Alb. Nay, one kiſſe more.
Amin. Indeed you'r wanton; Enter Clarinda,
We may be taken too. Juletta, Crolale,
Cla. Out thou baſe woman. Hippolita.
By Heaven Ile ſhoot 'em both.
Cro. Nay ſtay, brave Lady, hold;
A ſudden death cuts of a Nobler vengeance.
Cla. Am I made Bawd to your laſcivious meetings?
Are ye grown ſo wiſe in ſin?
Shut up that villaine: and ſirra,
Now expect my utmoſt anger.
Let him there ſtarve.
Alb. I, mock at your miſchiefes. Exit.
Cla. Tie that falſe witch unto that Tree,
There let the ſavage beaſts
Gnaw of her ſweetneſſe, and Snakes
Embrace her beauties; tie her, and watch
That none relieve her.
Hip. We could wiſh ye better fortune Lady,
But dare not help ye.
Amin. Be your own friends, I thank ye.
Now onely my laſt audit, and my greateſt, Enter
O Heaven, be kind unto me, Raymond.
And if it be thy wil, preſerve.

Raym. Who is this?
Sure tis a woman; I have trod this place,
And found much footing: now I know tis peopl'd.
Ha, let me ſee! tis her face.
O Heaven! turn this way mayd.
Amin. O Raymond, O brother.
Raym. Her tongue to: tis my ſiſter; what rude hand!
Nay kiſſe me firſt, O joy!
Amin. Fly, fly deere brother,
You are loſt elſe.
Jul. A man, a man, a new man.
Raym. What are theſe? Enter Juletta,
Cro. An Enemy, an Enemy. Crocale, Clarinda.
Cla. Diſpatch him,
Take him off, ſhoot him ſtraight.
Raym. I dare not uſe my ſword, Ladies,
Againſt ſuch comely foes.
Amin. O brother brother!
Cla. Away with 'em, and in darke priſons bind 'em.
One word replyd, ye die both.
Now brave mother follow thy Noble Anger,
And Ile help thee. Exeunt.

Actus quintus, Scæna prima.

Enter Roſſella, Clarinda, Crocale, Juletta, Hippolita.

Roſ. I am deaf to all your intreaties: ſhe that moves me
For pity or compaſſion to theſe Pirates,
Digs up her fathers, or her brothers Tombe,
And ſpurns about their aſhes.
Couldſt thou remember what a father thou haſt once,
Twould ſteele thy heart againſt fooliſh pity. (braces,
By his memory, and the remembrance of his deere em-
I am taught, that in a Noble cauſe revenge is Noble;
And they ſhal fall the ſacrifices to appeaſe
His wandering Ghoſt, and my incenſed fury.
Cla. The new come priſoner to?
Roſ. Him to. Yet that we may learn
Whether they are the ſame, or neere ally'd
To thoſe that forc'd me to this cruell courſe,
Better their poore allowance, and permit 'em
To meet together and confer,
Within the diſtance of your eare; perhaps
They may diſcover ſomething that may kill Deſpaire in me, and be a means to ſave 'em
From certain ruine.
Cro. That ſhal be my charge.
Roſ. Yet to prevent
All hope of reſcue: for this new come Captain
Hath both a ſhip and men not far off from us,
Though ignorant to find the onely Port,
That can yeeld entrance to our happy Iſland,
Guard the place ſtrongly, and ere the next Sunne Ends his diurnall progreſſe, I wil be Happy in my revenge, or ſet 'em free. Exeunt.

Enter Crocale, Juletta, Hippolita. A Table furniſht.

Cro. So ſerve it plentifully,
And loſe not time to enquire the cauſe;
There is a main deſign that hangs upon this bounty.
See the Table furniſht with Wine too,
That diſcovers ſecrets which tortures cannot open:
Open the doores too of the ſeverall priſons,
And give all free entrance into this room.

Undiſ-

Undiſcover'd I can here marke all. Enter Tib. Maſt.
Here's Captain careleſſe, and the tough Ship-maſter,
The ſlaves are noſ'd like Vultures
How wilde they look.
Tib. Ha, the myſtery of this,
Some good Hobgoblin riſe and reveale.
Maſt. I am amazed at it : nor can I ſound the intent.
Tib. Is not this Bread,
Subſtantiall bread, not painted?
Maſt. But take heed,
You may be poyſoned.
Tib. I am ſure I am famiſht;
And as the wiſe man ſays,
Gripes the guts as much as any Minerall.
This may be Treacle ſent to preſerve me
After a long faſt: or be it Vipers ſpittle,
Ile run the hazzard.
Maſt. We are paſt all feare, Ile take part with ye.
Tib. Do: and now yfaith, how d'e feel your ſelfe?
I finde great eaſe in't. What's here?
Wine, and it be thy will;
Strong luſty Wine. Well, fooles may talke
Of Metridate, Cordials, and Elixars.
But from my youth this was my onely Phyſick.
Here's a colour, what Ladies cheek,
Though ceruſs'd over, comes neere it?
It ſparkles too: hangs out Diamonds.
O my ſweet heart, how I will hug thee,
Again, and again! They are poor drunkards,
And not worth thy favours,
That number thy moyſt kiſſes in theſe Chriſtals.
Maſt. But Mounſiuer,
Here are Suckets, and ſweet diſhes.
Tib. Tuſh, boys meat,
I am paſt it; here's ſtrong food fit for men:
Nectar, old lad. Miſtris of merry hearts,
Once more I am bold with you.
Maſt. Take heed (man)
Too much will breed diſtemper.
Tib. Haſt thou liv'd at Sea
The moſt part of thy life, where to be ſober
While we have Wine aboord, is capitall treaſon;
And doſt thou preach ſobriety?
Maſt. prethee forbeare,
We may offend in it; we know not for whom
It was provided.
Tib. I am ſure for me: therefore footra,
When I am full, let 'em hang me, I care not.
Maſt. This has been his temper ever. Enter Albert,
See, provoking diſhes, candid Eringoes, Aminta,
And Potatoes. Raymond,
Tib. Ile not touch 'em, I will drink; Lamure,
But not a bit on a march, Ile be an Eunuch rather. Morillat, Maſt. Who are theſe? Franvile,
Tib. Marry, who you will; ſeverally.
I keep my text here.
Alb. Raymond!
Raym. Albert!
Tib. Away, Ile be drunke alone;
Keep off rogues, or Ile belch ye into ayre;
Not a drop here.
Amin. Deere brother, put not in your eyes ſuch anger;
Thoſe looks poyſon'd with fury ſhot at him,
Reflect on me. O brother looke milder, or
The Chriſtall of his temperance
Will turn 'em on your ſelfe.
Alb. Sir, I have ſought ye long
To finde your pardon: you have ploughed the Ocean
To wreak your vengeance on me, for the rape
Of this faire virgin. Now our fortune guides us
To meet on ſuch hard terms, that we need rather
A mutuall pitty of our preſent ſtate,
Then to expoſtulate of breaches paſt,
Which cannot be made up. And though it be Far from your power to force me to confeſſe,
That I have done ye wrong, or ſuch ſubmiſſion
Failing to make my peace, to vent your anger;
You being your ſelfe ſlav'd, as I to others:
Yet for your ſiſters ſake, her bleſſed ſake,
In part of recompence of what ſhe has ſuffered
For my raſh folly; the contagion
Of my black actions catching hold upon
Her purer innocence: I crave your mercy,
And wiſh however ſeverall motives kept us
From being friends while we had hope to live,
Let death which we expect, and cannot fly from,
End all contention.
Tib. Drink upon't, 'tis a good motion;
Ratifie it in Wine, and tis authenticall.
Raym. When I conſider
The ground of our long difference, and look on
Our not to be avoyded miſeries,
It doth beget in me I know not how
A ſoft religious tenderneſſe, which tels me,
Though we have many faults to anſwer for
Upon our own account, our fathers crimes
Are in us puniſht. O Albert, the courſe
They took to leave us rich was not honeſt,
Nor can that friendſhip laſt, which vertue joyns not.
When firſt they forc'd the induſtrious Portugals,
From their Plantations in the happy Iſlands.
Cro. This is that I watch for.
Raym. And did omit no tyranny, which men
Inured to ſpoyle and miſchiefe could inflict,
On the griev'd ſufferers; when by lawleſſe rapine
They reapt the harveſt, which their labours ſowed;
And not content to force 'em from their dwelling,
But layd for 'em at Sea, to raviſh from 'em
The laſt remainder of their wealth; then, then,
After a long purſuit, each doubting other,
As guilty of the Portugals eſcape,
They did begin to quarrell, like ill men;
(Forgive me piety, that I call em ſo)
No longer love, or correſpondence holds,
Then it is cimented with prey or profit:
Then did they turn thoſe Swords they oft had bloodied
With innocent gore, upon their wretched ſelves,
And payd the forfeit of their cruelty
Shown to Sebaſtian, and his Collonie,
By being fatall Enemies to each other.
Thence grew Amintas rape, and my deſire
To be reveng'd. And now obſerve the iſſue:
As they for ſpoyle ever forgot compaſſion
To women, (who ſhould be exempted
From the extremities of a lawfull war)
We now, young able men, are faln into
The hands of women; that, againſt the ſoft
Tenderneſſe familiar to their ſex, Enter Creuſa.
Will ſhew no mercy.
Cro. None, unleſſe you ſhew us
Our long loſt husbands.
We are thoſe Potugals you talk'd of.
Raym. Stay,
I met upon the Sea in a tall ſhip
Two Portugals, famiſht almoſt to death.
Tib. Our ſhip by this Wine.

And thoſe the rogues that ſtole her,
Left us to famiſh in the barraine Iſlands.
Ray. Some ſuch tale they told me,
And ſomething of a woman, which I find,
To be my ſiſter.
Cro. Where are theſe men?
Ray. I left 'em,
Suppoſing they had deluded me with forg'd tales,
In the Iſland where they ſayd
They had liv'd many years the wretched owners
Of a huge maſſe of treaſure.
Alb. The ſame men: and that the fatall muck
We quarreld for.
Cro. They were Portugals you ſay.
Ray. So they profes'd.
Cro. They may prove ſuch men as may ſave your lives,
And ſo much I am taken with faire hope,
That I will hazard life to be reſolv'd on't:
How came you hither?
Ray. My ſhip lies by the rivers mouth,
That can convey yee to theſe wretched men,
Which you deſire to ſee.
Cro. Back to your priſons,
And pray for the ſucceſſe: if they be thoſe
Which I deſire to finde, you are ſafe;
If not, prepare to die to morrow:
For the world cannot redeem ye.
Alb. How ever, we are armd
For either fortune. Exit.
Ti. What muſt become of me now
That I am not diſmis'd?
Cro. O ſir, I purpoſe
To have your company.
Ti. Take heed wicked woman,
I am apt to miſchiefe now.
Cro. You cannot be ſo unkind,
To her that gives you liberty.
Ti. No, I ſhall be too kind, thats the devil on't;
I have had ſtore of good wine: and when I am drunk,
Joane is a Lady to me, and I ſhall
Lay about me like a Lord: I feele ſtrange motions:
Avoid me temptation.
Cro. Come ſir, i'le help yee in. Exeunt.

Enter Sebaſtian, and Nicuſa.

Nicu. VVhat may that be
That mooves upon the Lake?
Seba. Still it drawes neerer,
And now I plainly can deſcerne it.
Tis the French ſhip.
Nicu. In it a woman,
VVho ſeemes to invite us to her,
Seba. Still ſhe cals with ſignes of Love to haſten to her;
So lovely hope doth ſtill appeare:
I feele nor age nor weakneſſe.
Nicu. Though it bring death,
To us tis comfort: and deſerves a meeting.
Or els fortune tyrd with what we have ſuffer'd,
And in it overcome, as it may be,
Now ſets a period to our miſery. Exeunt.

Enter ſeverally, Raymond, Albert, Aminta. horrid Muſicke.

Ray. What dreadfull ſounds are theſe?
Amin. Infernall Muſick,
Fit for a bloody Feaſt.
Alb. It ſeemes prepar'd
To kill our courages, e're they divorſe
Our ſoules and bodies.
Ray. But they that feareleſſe fall,
Deprive them of their triumph.

An alter prepar'd.

Enter Roſſillia, Clarinda, Iulletta, Hippollita, &c.

Aminta See the furies,
In their full Trym of cruelty.
Roſ. Tis the laſt
Duty that I can pay to my dead Lord,
Set out the Altar, I my ſelfe wilbe
The Prieſt, and boldly do thoſe horrid Rites
You ſhake to think on: lead theſe Captaines neerer,
For they ſhall have the honour to fall firſt
To my Sebaſtians aſhes: and now wretches,
As I am taught already that you are,
And lately by your free confeſſion,
French pirats, and the ſons of thoſe I hate,
Even equall with the devil; here with horror,
What tis invites me to this cruell courſe,
And what you are to ſuffer; no Amazons we,
But women of Portugall, that muſt have from you Sebaſtian and Nicuſa; we are they
That groan'd beneath your fathers wrongs:
VVe are thoſe wretched women,
Their injuries purſu'd, and overtook;
And from the ſad remembrance of our loſſes
We are taught to be cruell; when we were forc'd
From that ſweet ayre we breathed in, by their rapine,
And ſought a place of being; as the Seas
And winds conſpird with their ill purpoſſes,
To load us with afflictions, in a ſtorme
That fell upon us: the two ſhips that brought us,
To ſeek new fortunes in an unknown world
Were ſevered: the one bore all the able men,
Our treaſure and our Jewels: in the other,
We women were imbarq'd: and fell upon,
After long toſſing in the troubled maine,
This pleaſant Iſland: But in few moneths,
The men that did conduct us hither died,
We long before had given our husbands loſt:
Remembring what we had ſuffred by the French,
We took a ſolemn Oath never to admit
The curs'd ſociety of men: neceſſity
Taught us thoſe arts not uſuall to our ſex:
And the fertile Earth yeelding abundance to us,
We did reſolve thus ſhapt like Amazons
To end our lives; but when you ariv'd here,
And brought as preſents to us our own Jewels;
Thoſe which were boorn in the other ſhip,
How can ye hope to ſcape our vengeance?
Amin. It boots not then to ſwear our inocence?
Alb. Or that we never forc'd it from the owners?
Ray. Or that there are a remnant of that wrack,
And not far off?
Roſ. All you affirme, I know,
Is but to win time; therefore prepare your throats,
The world ſhall not redeem ye: and that your cries
May find no entrance to our eares,
To moove pitty in any: bid lowd Muſick ſound
Their fatall Knels: if ye have prayers uſe 'em quickly,
To any power will own yea; but ha! Enter Crocale,
Who are theſe? what ſpectacles of misfortun? Sebaſtian,
Why are their looks Nicuſa,
So full of Joy and wonder? Tibalt.
Cro.

Cro. Oh! lay by
These inſtruments of death, and welcome
To your armes what you durſt never hope to imbrace:
This is Sebaſtian, this Nieuſa Maddam:
Preſerv'd by miracle: look up deer ſir,
And know your own Roſſellia: be not loſt
In wonder and amazment; or if nature
Can by inſtinct inſtruct you what it is,
To be bleſſed with the name of Father,
Freely injoy it in this faire Virgin.
Seba. Though my miſeries,
And many years of wants, I have indur'd,
May well deprave me of the memory
Of all joyes paſt: yet looking on this building,
This ruind building of a heavenly forme,
In my Roſſella; I muſt remember, I am Sebaſtian.
Roſ. O my joyes!
Seba. And here,
I ſee a perfect modell of thy ſelfe,
As thou wert when thy choyce firſt made thee mine:
Theſe cheecks and fronts though wrinkled now with (time
Which art cannot reſtore: had equall pureneſſe,
Of naturall white and red, and as much raviſhing:
Which by fayre order and ſucceſſion,
I ſee deſcend on her: and may thy vertues
Winde into her forme, and make her a perfect dower:
No part of thy ſweet goodneſſe wanting to her.
I will not now Roſſellia aske thy fortunes,
Nor trouble thee with hearing mine;
Thoſe ſhall hereafter ſerve to make glad howers
In their relation: All paſt wrongs forgot;
I am glad to ſee you Gentlemen; but moſt,
That it is in my power to ſave your Lives;
You ſav'd ours when we were neer ſtarv'd at Sea,
And I deſpaire not, for if ſhe be mine?
Roſſellia can deny Sebaſtian nothing.
Roſ. She do's give up her ſelfe,
Her power and joyes, and all, to you,
To be diſcharged of 'em as to burthenſome;
Wellcome in any ſhape.
Sabaſt. Sir in your looks,
I read your ſuite of my Clarinda: ſhe is yours:
And Lady if it be in me to confirme
Your hopes in this brave Gentleman,
Preſume I am your ſervant.
Alb. We thanke you ſir.
Amin. O Happy houre!
Alb. O my deer Aminta;
Now all our feares are ended.
Tib. Here I fix: ſhe's mettle,
Steele to the back: and will cut my leaden dagger,
If not uſ'd with diſcretion.
Cro. You are ſtill no changling.
Sabaſt. Nay,
All look cheerfully, for none ſhalbe
Denyd their lawfull wiſhes; when a while
We have here refreſht our ſelves; wee'l returne
To our ſeverall homes; and well that voyage ends,
That makes of deady enemies faythfull friends.

Exeunt

FINIS.

The double Marriage.

Actus Primus——Scæna Prima.

Enter Virolet, and Boy.

Virolet.

BOy.

Boy. Sir?

Vir. If my wife ſeek me, tell her that Deſignes of weight, too heavy for her knowledge,
Exact my privacy.

Boy. I ſhall, ſir.

Vir. Do then,
And leave me to my ſelfe.

Boy. Tis a raw morning,
And would you pleaſe to interpret that for duty
Which you may conſtrue boldneſſe, I could wiſh
To arme your ſelfe againſt it, you would uſe
More of my ſervice.

Vir. I have heate within here,
A noble heat (good boy) to keep it off,
I ſhall not freeze; deliver my excuſe, Enter Juliana.
And you have done your part.

Boy. That is prevented,
My Lady follows you.

Vir. Since I muſt be croſt then,
Let her perform that office.

Boy. I obey you. Exit.

Vir. Prethee to bed; to be thus fond's more tedious
Then if I were neglected.

Jul. Tis the fault then
Of love and duty which I would fall under,
Rather then want that care which you may challenge
As due to my obedience.

Vir. I confeſſe
This tenderneſſe argues a loving wife,
And more deſerves my hearts beſt thanks then anger.
Yet I muſt tell ye Sweet, you do exceed
In your affection, if you would ingroſſe me
To your delights alone.

Jul. I am not jealous,
If my embraces have diſtaſted you,
As I muſt grant you every way ſo worthy
That tis not in weak woman to deſerve you,
Much leſſe in miſerable me, that want
Thoſe graces ſome more fortunate are ſtor'd with.
Seek any whom you pleaſe, and I will ſtudy
With my beſt ſervice to deſerve thoſe favours,
That ſhall yeeld you contentment.

Vir. You are miſtaken.

Jul. No, I am patient ſir, and ſo good morrow;
I will not be offenſive.

Vir. Heare my reaſons.

Jul. Though in your life a widdows bed receives me,
For your ſake I muſt love it. May ſhe proſper
That ſhall ſucceed me in it, and your ardour
Laſt longer to her.

Vir. By the love I beare
Firſt to my Countries peace, next to thy ſelfe
To whom compar'd, my life I rate at nothing;
Stood here a Lady that were the choyce abſtract
Of all the beauties nature ever faſhion'd,
Or Art gave ornament to, compar'd to thee,
Thus as thou art obedient and loving,
I ſhould contemne and loath her.

Jul. I do believe ye.
How I am bleſt
In my aſſur'd beliefe? this is unfain'd;
And why this ſadneſſe then?

Vir. Why Juliana,
Believe me, theſe my ſad and dull retirements,
My often, nay almoſt continued faſts,
Sleep baniſht from my eyes, all pleaſures ſtrangers,
Have neither root nor growth from any cauſe
That may arrive at woman. Shouldſt thou be,
As chaſtity forbid, falſe to my bed,
I ſhould lament my fortune, perhaps puniſh
Thy falſhood, and then ſtudy to forget thee:
But that which like a never emptied ſpring,
Feeds high the torrent of my ſwelling griefe,
Is what my Countrey ſuffers; there's a ground
Where ſorrow may be planted, and ſpring up,
Though yeelding rage and womaniſh deſpaire,
And yet not ſhame the owner.

Jul. I do believe it true,
Yet I ſhould think my ſelfe a happy woman,
If in this generall and timely mourning,
I might or give to you, or elſe receive
A little lawfull comfort.

Vir. Thy diſcretion
In this may anſwer for me; look on Naples
The Country where we both were born and bred,
Naples the Paradiſe of Italy,
As that is of the earth; Naples, that was
The ſweet retreat of all the worthieſt Romans,
When they had ſtor'd the ſpoyles of the whole world;
This flouriſhing Kingdom, whoſe inhabitants
For wealth and bravery liv'd like petty Kings,
Made ſubject now to ſuch a tyranny,
As that faire City that receiv'd her name
From Conſtantine the great, now in the power
Of barbarous Infidels, may forget her own,
To look with pity on our miſeries,
So far in our calamities we tranſcend her.

For

For since this Arragonian tyrant Ferrand,
Ceaz'd on the government, there's nothing left us
That we can call our own, but our afflictions,
Jul. And hardly those; the Kings strange cruelty,
Equals all presidents of Tyranny.
Vir. Equall say you:
He has out gone, the worst compar'd to him;
Nor Phalaris, nor Dionisius,
Caligula, nor Nero can be mention'd;
They yet as Kings, abus'd their regall power;
This as a Marchant, all the Countries fatt,
He wholy does ingrosse unto himself;
Our Oyles he buyes at his own price, then sels them
To us, at dearer rates; our Plate and Jewels,
Under a fayn'd pretence of publique use,
He borrows; which deny'd, his Instruments force.
The rases of our horses, he takes from us;
Yet keeps them in our pastures; rapes of Matrons,
And Virgins, are too frequent; never man
Yet thank'd him for a pardon; for Religion,
It is a thing he dreames not off.
Iul. I have heard,
How true it is, I know not; that he sold
The Bishop-prick of Tarent to a Jew,
For thirteene thousand Duckets.
Vir. I was present,
And saw the money paid; the day would leave me,
Ere I could number out his impious actions;
Or what the miserable Subject suffers;
And can you entertaine in such a time,
A thought of dalliance? teares, and sighes, and groanes,
Would better now become you.
Iul. They indeed are,
The onely weapons, our poor Sex can use,
When we are injur'd, and they may become us;
But for men that were born free men, of Ranck,
That would be registred Fathers of their Country;
And to have on their Tombs in Golden Letters,
The noble stile of Tyrant killers, written; (men.
To weepe like fooles, and women and not like wise
To practise a redresse, deserves a name,
Which fits not me to give.
Vir. Thy grave reproofe:
If what thou dost desire, were possible
To be effected? might well argue it,
As wise as loving; but if you consider,
With what strong guards, this Tyrant is defended:
Ruffins, and malecontents drawne from all quarters;
That onely know, to serve his impious will;
The Citadels built by him in the neck
Of this poor City; the invincible strength,
Nature by Art assisted, gave this Castle;
And above all his feares admitting no man
To see him, but unarm'd; it being death
For any to approach him with a weapon.
You must confesse, unlesse our hands were Canons,
To batter down these walls; our weake breath mines,
To blow his Forts up; or our curses lightning,
To force a passage to him; and then blast him;
Our power is like to yours, and we like you;
Weepe our misfortunes.
Iul. Walls of Brasse resist not
A noble undertaking; nor can vice,
Raise any Bulwrack, to make good the place,
Where vertue seekes to enter; then to fall
In such a brave attempt, were such an honour;
That Brutus, did he live again would envy.
Were my dead Father in you, and my Brothers;
Nay, all the Ancestors I am deriv'd from;
As you, in being what you are, are all these.
I had rather weare a mourning Garment for you,
And should be more proud of my widdow-hood;
You dying for the freedome of this Country;
Then if I were assur'd, I should injoy
A perpetuity of life and pleasure,
With you the Tyrant living.
Vir. Till this minute,
I never heard thee speake; O more then woman!
And more to be belov'd; can I finde out
A Cabinet, to lock a secret in,
Of equall trust to thee? all doubts, and feares,
That scandalize your sex, be farre from me;
Thou shalt pertake my neer and dearest councels,
And further them with thine.
Iul. I will be faithfull. (to us,
Vir. Know then this day, stand heaven propitious
Our liberty begins.
Iul. In Ferrands death?
Vir. 'Tis plotted love, and strongly, and beleeve it,
For nothing else could doe it; 'twas the thought,
How to proceed in this designe and end it,
That made strange my embraces.
Iul. Curs'd be she,
That's so indulgent to her own delights,
That for their satisfaction, would give
A stop to such a glorious enterprize:
For me, I would not for the world, I had been Guilty of such a crime; goe on and prosper.
Goe on my dearest Lord, I love your Honour
Above my life; nay, yours; my Prayers go with you;
Which I will strengthen with my teares: the wrongs
Of this poor Country, edge your sword; O may it
Peirce deep into this Tyrants heart, and then
When you return bath'd in his guilty bloud,
I'le wash you cleane with fountaines of true joy.
But who are your assistants? though I am
So covetous of your glory, that I could wish
You had no sharer in it. Knock.
Vir. Be not curious.
They come, how ever you command my bosome,
To them I would not have you seene.
Iul. I am gon Sir,
Be confident; and may my resolution
Be present with you. Exit.
Vir. Such a Masculine spirit,
With more then womans vertues, were a dower
To waigh down a Kings fortune.
Briss. Good day to you. Enter Brissonet
Cam. You are an early stirrer. Camille, Ronvert.
Vir. What new face,
Bring you along?
Ron. If I stand doubted Sir?
As by your looks I guesse it: you much injure
A man that loves, and truly loves this Country,
With as much zeale as you doe; one that hates
The Prince by whom it suffers, and as deadly;
One, that dares step as farre to gaine my freedome,
As any he that breathes; that weares a sword
As sharp as any's.
Cam. Nay, no more comparisons.
Ron. What you but whisper, I dare speake aloud,
Stood the King by; have meanes to put in act too,
What you but coldly plot; if this deserve then Suspition in the best, the boldest, wisest?
Pursue your own intents, il'e follow mine;
And if I not out-strip you—

Briſſ. Be aſſur'd Sir,
A conſcience like this can never be allide
To treachery.
Cam. Who durſt ſpeake ſo much,
But one that is like us a ſufferer,
And ſtands as we affected?
Vir. You are cozend
And all undone, every Intelligencer
Speakes treaſon with like licence; is not this Romvere, that hath for many yeeres been train'd
In Ferrands Schoole, a man in truſt and favour, Rewarded too and highly?
Cam. Grant all this,
The thought of what he was, being as he is now;
A man diſgrac'd, and with contempt thrown off;
Will ſpurre him to revenge, as ſwift as they,
That never were in favour.
Vir. Poore and childiſh.
Briſſ. His regiment is caſt, that is moſt certain;
And his command in the Caſtle given away.
Cam. That on my knowledge.
Vir. Groſſer ſtill, what ſhepheard
Would yeeld the poor remainder of his flock,
To a known wolfe, though he put on the habit,
Of a moſt faithfull dogge, and barke like one?
As this but onely talkes.
Cam. Yes, he has meanes too.
Virol. I know it to my griefe, weake men I know it;
To make his peace, if there were any warre
Between him and his Maſter, betraying
Our innocent lives.
Ren. You are too ſuſpitious;
And I have born too much, beyon'd my temper,
Take your own wayes, I'le leave you.
Vir. You may ſtay now;
You have enough, and all indeed you ſiſht for;
But one word Gentlemen: have you diſcover'd
To him alone our plot?
Briſſ. To him and others, that are at his devotion.
Vir. Worſe and worſe:
For were he onely conſcious of our purpoſe,
Though with the breach of Hoſpitable lawes,
In my own houſe, ide ſilence him for ever:
But what is paſt my help, is paſt my care,
I have a life to looſe.
Cam. Have better hopes. (further'd
Ren. And when you know, with what charge I have Your noble undertaking, you will ſweare me
Another man; the guards I have corrupted:
And of the choyce of all our nobleſt youths,
Attir'd like virgins; ſuch as Hermits would Welcome to their ſad cells, prepar'd a Maske;
As done for the Kings pleaſure.
Vir. For his ſafety
I rather feare; and as a pageant to Uſher our ruine.
Ren. We as Torch-bearers
Will waite on theſe, but with ſuch art and cunning;
I have convei'd ſharp poniards in the Wax, (guards
That we may paſſe, though ſearch't through all his Without ſuſpition, and in all his glory,
Oppreſſe him, and with ſafety.
Cam. 'Tis moſt ſtrange.
Vir. To be effected.
Ren. You are doubtfull ſtill.
Briſſ. But we reſolv'd to follow him, and if you
Deſiſt now Virolet, we will ſay 'tis feare,
Rather then providence. Exeunt.

Cam. And ſo we leave you, Enter Julian.
Iul. To your wiſe doubts, and to my better councels;
Oh! pardon me my Lord, and truſt me too;
Let me not like Caſſandra propheſie truths,
And never be beleiv'd, before the miſchiefe!
I have heard all; know this Romvere a villaine;
A villaine that hath tempted me, and plotted
This for your ruine, onely to make way
To his hopes in my embraces; at more leiſure
I will acquaint you, wherefore I conceil'd it
To this laſt minute; if you ſtay you are loſt,
And all prevention too late. I know,
And 'tis to me known onely, a darke cave
Within this houſe, a part of my poor dower,
Where you may lye conceal'd, as in the center,
Till this rough blaſt be ore: where there is ayre,
More then to keep in life; Ferrand will find you,
So curious his feares are.
Vir. 'Tis better fall
Then hide my head, now 'twas thine own advice,
My friends ingag'd too.
Iul. You ſtand further bound,
Then to weake men that have betray'd themſelves,
Or to my Councell, though then juſt and loyall:
Your phantie hath been good, but not your judgement,
In choyce of ſuch to ſide you; wil you leape
From a ſteep Tower, becauſe a deſperate foole
Does it, and truſts the wind to ſave his hazard?
There's more expected from you; all mens eyes are fixt
On Virolet, to help not hurt them;
Make good their hopes and ours, you have ſworn often,
That you dare credit me; and allow'd me wiſe
Although a woman; even Kings in great Actions,
Waite opportunity and ſo muſt you Sir,
Or looſe your underſtanding.
Vir. Thou art conſtant;
I am uncertain foole, a moſt blinde foole;
Be thou my guide.
Iul. I. I faile to direct you,
For torment or reward, when I am wretched,
May conſtancy forſake me.
Vir. I've my ſafety.

Enter Caſtruchio, and Villio.

Vil. Why are you rapt thus?
Caſt. Peace, thou art a foole.
Vil. But if I were a flatterer like your worſhip,
I ſhould be wiſe and rich too;
There are few elſe that proſper, bandes excepted,
They hold an equall place there.
Caſt. A ſhrew'd knave;
But O the King, the happy King!
Vil. Why happy?
In bearing a great burthen.
Caſt. What beares he,
That's born on Princes ſhoulders?
Vil. A Crownes waight,
Which ſets more heavy on his head, then the ore
Slaves digge out of the Mines, of which 'tis made.
Caſt. Thou worthily art his fool, to think that heavy
That carryes him in the ayre; the reverence due
To that moſt ſacred Gold, makes him ador'd,
His Foot-ſteps kiſt, his ſmiles to raiſe a begger
To a Lords fortune; and when he but frownes,
The City quakes.
Vil. Or the poor Cuckolds in it,
Cox-combs I ſhould ſay, I am of a foole.

Crown

Vil. Grown a Philoſopher, to heare this paralite.
Caſt. The delicates he is ſerv'd with ſee and envy,
Vil. I had rather have an Onyon with a ſtomack,
Then theſe without one.
Caſt. The Celeſtiall Muſick, ſtill
Such as the motion of the eternall ſpheares Muſick.
Yeelds Iove, when he drinkes Nectar.
Vil. Here's a fine knave, yet hath to many fellowes.
Caſt. Then the beauties,
That with variety of choyce embraces, theſe paſſe o're.
Renew his age.
Vil. Help him to croutch rather, (that way.
And the French Cringe, they are excellent Surgeons
Caſt. O Majeſty! let others think of heaven,
While I contemplate thee.
Vil. This is not Atheiſme, but Court obſervance.
Caſt. Now the God appears, uſher'd with earth-quakes.
Vil. Baſe Idolatry. Flouriſh. Enter Ferrand,
Fer. Theſe meates are poyſoned, hang Guard,
The Cookes; no note more, on women,
Forfeit of your fingers; doe you Servants.
Envy me a minutes ſlumber, what are theſe?
1. Gu. The Ladies appointed by your Majeſty.
Fer. To the purpoſe, for what appointed?
1. Gu. For your graces pleaſure.
Fer. To ſucke away the little bloud is left me,
By my continuall cares; I am not apt now,
Injoy them firſt, taſte of my dyet once;
And your turne ſerv'd, for fifty Crownes a peece
Their Husbands may redeem them.
Wo. Great Sir, mercy.
Fer. I am deafe, why ſtare you? is what we command
To be diſputed? who's this? bring you the dead
T'upbrai'd me to my face?
Caſt. Hold Emperour;
Hold mighteſt of Kings, I am thy vaſſell,
Thy Foot-ſtool, that durſt not preſume to look
On thy offended face.
Fer. Caſtruchio riſe.
Caſt. Let not the lightning of thy eye conſume me,
Nor heare that Muſicall tongue, in dreadfull thunder,
That ſpeakes all mercy.
Vir. Here's no flattering rogue.
Caſt. Ferrand, that is the Father of his people,
The glory of mankinde.
Fer. No more, no word more;
And while I tell my troubles to my ſelfe,
Be Statues without motion or voyce,
Though to be flatter'd, is an itch to greatneſſe,
It now offends me.
Vil. Here's the happy man;
But ſpeake who dares.
Fer. When I was innocent;
I yet remember, I could eat and ſleepe,
Walke unaffrighted, but now terrible to others:
My guards cannot keepe feare from me
It ſtill purſues me; Oh! my wounded conſcience,
The Bed I would reſt in, is ſtuft with thornes;
The grounds ſtrow'd o're with adders, and with aſpicks
Where ere I ſet my foot, but I am in,
And what was got with cruelty, with blood,
Muſt be defended, though this lifes a hell,
I feare a worſe hereafter. ha!
Ron. My Lord. Enter Ronvere and guard.
Fer. Welcome Ronvere, welcome my golden plummet
With which I ſound mine enemies depthes and angers, Haſt thou diſcover'd.
Ron. All as you could wiſh Sir,
The Plot, and the contrivers; was made one
Of the conſpiracie.
Fer. Is Virolet in?
Ron. The head of all, he onely ſcented me:
And from his feare, that I plaid falſe is fled;
The reſt I have in fetters
Fer Death and hell.
Next to my mortall foe the pyrat Seſſa,
I aym'd at him; he's vertuous, and wiſe,
A lover of his freedome and his countries
Dangerous to ſuch as govern by the ſword,
And ſo to me: no tract which way he went,
No meanes to overtake him?
Ron. Ther's ſome hope left;
But with a rough hand, to be ſeaſ'd upon.
Fer. What is't?
Ron. If any know, or where he is,
Or which way he is fled, it is his wife;
Her with his Father I have apprehended,
And brought among the reſt.
Fer. 'Twas wiſely order'd,
Go fetch them in, and let my executioners Exit Ronvere.
Appeare in horrour with the racke.
Vil. I take it ſigneur, this is no time for you to flatter,
Or me to foole in.
Caſt. Thou art wiſe in this, let's off, it is unſafe to be
When he begins to thunder. (nere Jove, Vil. Good morality. Exit.
Fer. I that have peirc'd into the hearts of men;
Forc'd them to lay open with my lookes,
Secrets whoſe leaſt diſcovery was death,
Will rend for what concernes my life, the fortreſſe,
Of a weake womans faith. Enter Ronvere, guard,
Ca. What ere we ſuffer, Executioners with a
The waight, that loads a Traytors Rack, Camille,
Heart lit ever, heavy on thine. Briſſonet Pandulfo, Juliana.
Briſſ As we are caught by thee,
Fall thou by others.
Ron. Piſh poor fools, your curſes will Never reach me.
Iul. Now by my Virolets life;
Father, this is a glorious ſtage of murther.
Here are five properties too, and ſuch ſpectators,
As will expect good action, to the life;
Let us performe our parts, and we ſhall live,
When theſe are rotten, would we might begin once;
Are you the Maſter of the company?
Troth you are tedious now.
Fer. She does deride me.
Iul. Thee and thy Power, if one poor ſyllable
Could win me, an aſſurance of thy favour,
I would not ſpeake it, I deſire to be
The great example of thy cruelty,
To whet which one, know Ferrand, I alone
Can make diſcovery, where my Virolet is,
Whoſe life, I know thou aym'ſt at, but if tortures
Compell me to't, may hope of heaven for ſake me;
I dare thy worſt.
Fer. Are we contemn'd.
Iul. Thou art,
Thou and thy Miniſters, my life is thine;
But in the death, the Victory ſhall be mine.
Pand. We have ſuch a Miſtreſſe here to teach us courage,
That cowards might learn from her.
Fer. You are ſlow; put on the rack.
Begin the Scene thou miſerable foole
For ſo I'le make thee.
Jul. 'Tis not in thy reach;

I am happy in my ſufferings, thou moſt wretched.
Fer. So brave! Ile tame you yet, pluck hard villains;
Is ſhe inſenſible? no ſigh nor groan? or is ſhe dead?
Jul. No tyrant, though I ſuffer
More then a woman, beyond fleſh and blood;
Tis in a cauſe ſo honourable, that I ſcorn
With any ſign that may expreſſe a ſorrow
To ſhew I do repent.
Fer. Confeſſe yet,
And thou ſhal be ſafe.
Jul. Tis wrapt up in my ſoule,
From whence thou canſt not force it.
Fer. I will be
Ten daies a killing thee.
Jul. Be twenty thouſand,
My glory lives the longer.
Ron. Tis a miracle,
She tires th'executioners,
And me.
Fer. Unlooſe her, I am conquer'd, I muſt take
Some other way; reach her my chaire, in honour
Of her invincible fortitude.
Ron. Will you not
Diſpatch the reſt?
Fer. When I ſeem merciſull,
Aſſure thy ſelfe Romere, I am moſt cruell.
Thou wonder of thy ſex, and of this Nation,
That haſt chang'd my ſeverity to mercy,
Not to thy ſelfe alone, but to thy people,
In which I do include theſe men, my enemies:
Unbind them.
Pand. This is ſtrange.
Fer. For your intent
Againſt my life, which you dare not deny,
I onely aske one ſervice.
Cam. Above hope.
Fer. There rides a Pyrate neer, the Duke of Seſſe,
My enemy and this Countries, that in bonds
Holds my deere friend Aſcanio: free this friend,
Or bring the Pyrats head; beſides your pardon,
And honour of the action, your reward
Is forty thouſand Ducates. And becauſe
I know that Virolet is as bold as wiſe,
Be he your Generall, as pledge of your faith,
That you wil undertake it: let this old man,
And this moſt conſtant Matron ſtay with me;
Of whom, as of my ſelfe, I wil be carefull;
She ſhall direct you where her husband is.
Make choice of any ſhip you think moſt uſeful.
They are rig'd for you.

Exeunt Guard, with Juliana and Pand.

Briſ. We with joy accept it.
Cam. And wil proclaim King Ferrant merciſull.

Exeunt.

Ron. The myſterie of this, my Lord? or are you
Chang'd in your nature?
Fer. Ile make thee private to it.
The lives of theſe weake men, and deſperate woman,
Would no way have ſecur'd me, had I took them;
Tis Virolet I aime at; he has power,
And knows to hurt. If they encounter Seſſe,
And he prove conquerour, I am aſſur'd
They'l finde no mercy: if that they prove victors,
I ſhall recover with my friend; his head
I moſt deſire of all men.
Ron. Now I have it.
Fer. Ile make thee underſtand the drift of all.
So we ſtand ſure, thus much for thoſe that fall. Exeunt.

Actus ſecundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Boteſwain and Gunner.

Botſ. Ley here before the wind; up with her Canvaſe
And let her work, the wind begins to whiſtle;
Clap all her ſtreamers on, and let her dance,
As if ſhe were the Minion of the Ocean.
Let her beſtride the billows till they rore,
And curle their wanton heads. Ho, below there:
Ho, ho, within.
Ley her North-eaſt, and thruſt her miſſen out,
The day grows faire and cleare, and the wind Courts us.
O for a luſty ſaile now, to give chaſe to.
Gun. A ſtubborn Barke, that wo'd but bear up to us,
And change a broadſide bravely.
Botſ. Where's the Duke?
Gun. I have not ſeen him ſtir to day.
Botſ. O Gunner,
What bravery dwels in his age, and what valour?
And to his friends, what gentleneſſe and bounty?
How long have we been inhabitants at Sea here?
Gun. Some fourteen yeers.
Botſ. By fourteen lives I ſwear then,
This Element never nouriſht ſuch a Pirate;
So great, ſo fearleſſe, and ſo fortunate,
So patient in his want, in Act ſo valiant.
How many ſaile of wel man'd ſhips before us,
As the Bonuto does the flying fiſh,
Have we purſued and ſcowerd, that to outſtrip us,
They have been fain to hang their very ſhirts on?
What Gallies have we bang'd, and ſunke, and taken;
Whoſe onely fraughts were fire, and ſtern defiance?
And nothing ſpoke but Bullet in all theſe.
How like old Neptune have I ſeen our Generall
Standing ith' Poope, and toſſing his ſteel Trident, Commanding both the Sea and Winds to ſerve him?
Gun. His daughter too, which is the honour, Boteſwain,
Of all her ſex; that Martiall mayd.
Botſ. A brave wench.
Gun. How oftentimes, a fight being new begun,
Has ſhe leap'd down, and took my Linſtock from me,
And crying, now fly right, fir'd all my chaſers?
Then like the Image of the warlike Goddeſſe,
Her Target brac'd upon her arme, her Sword drawn,
And anger in her eyes, leap'd up again,
And bravely hal'd the Barke. I have wondred Boteſwain,
That in a body made ſo delicate,
So ſoft for ſweet embraces, ſo much fire,
And manly ſoule, not ſtarting at a danger.
Botſ. Her Noble father got her in his fury,
And ſo ſhe proves a ſouldier.
Gun. This to I wonder at,
Taking ſo many ſtrangers as he does,
He uſes them with that reſpect and coolneſſe,
Not making prize, but onely borrowing
What may ſupply his want: nor that for nothing;
But renders back what they may ſtand in need of,
Aud then parts lovingly: Where, if he take
His Countreyman, that ſhould be neereſt to him,
And ſtand moſt free from danger, he ſure pays for'e:
He drownes or hangs the men, ranſacks the Barke,
Then gives her up a Bonfire to his fortune.
Botſ. The wrongs he has receiv'd from that dull Country,
That's all I know has purchas'd all his cruelty.

We fare the better; cheerly, cheerly boys,
The ſhip runs merrily, my Captain's melancholy,
And nothing cures that in him but a Sea-fight:
I hope to meet a faire boy, and a right one.
Gun. That's my hope too; I am ready for the paſtime.
Botſ. Th mean time let's beſtow a ſong upon him,
To ſhake him from his dumps, and bid good day to him.
Ho, in the hold. Enter a Boy.
Boy. Here, here.
Botſ. To th' main top boy.
And thou kenſt a ſhip that dares deſie us,
Here's Gold.
Boy. I am gon. Exit Boy.
Botſ. Come firs, a queint Levet. Trump. a levet.
To waken our brave Generall. Then to our labour.
Enter Duke of Seſſe above and his daughter Martia like an Amazon.
Seſſ. I thank you loving mates; I thank you all.
There's to prolong your mirth, & good morrow to you.
Daugh. Take this from me, you'r honeſt valiant friends;
And ſuch we muſt make much of. Not a ſayle ſtirring?
Gun. Not any within ken yet.
Botſ. Without doubt Lady,
The wind ſtanding ſo faire and full upon us,
We ſhal have ſport anon. But noble Generall,
Why are you ſtill ſo ſad? you take our edge off;
You make us dull, and ſpirit-leſſe.
Seſſ. Ile tell ye,
Becauſe I wil provoke you to be fortunate;
For when you know my cauſe, twill double arme you.
This woman never knew it yet, my daughter,
Some diſcontents ſhe has.
Daugh. Pray ſir go forward.
Seſ. Theſe fourteen yeeres, I have ſtood it here at Sea,
Where the moſt curious thought could never find it.
Botſ. Call up the Maſter, and all the Mates.
Enter below the Maſter and Saylers.
Seſ. Good morrow.
Maſt. Good morrow to our Generall, a good one,
And to that Noble Lady all good wiſhes.
Daugh. I thank you Maſter.
Seſſ. Mark me, thus it is then;
Which I did never think to have diſcovered,
Till full revenge had wooed me; but to ſatisfie
My faithfull friends, thus I caſt off my burden.
In that ſhort time I was a Courtier,
And followed that moſt hated of all Princes,
Ferrant the full example of all miſchiefes,
Compel'd to follow to my ſoule a ſtranger,
It was my chance one day to play at Cheſſe
For ſome few Crowns, with a mynion of this Kings,
A mean poor man, that onely ſerv'd his pleaſures;
Removing of a Rook, we grew to words;
From this to hotter anger: to be ſhort,
I got a blow.
Daugh. How, how my Noble father?
Seſ. A blow my girle, which I had ſoon repayd,
And ſunk the ſlave for ever, had not odds
Thruſt in betwixt us. I went away diſgrac'd—
Daugh. For honours ſake not ſo ſir.
Seſ. For that time, wench;
But calld upon him, like a Gentleman,
By many private friends; knockt at his valour,
Courted his honour hourely to repaire me;
And tho he were a thing my thoughts made ſleight on,
And onely worth the fury of my footman,
Still I purſued him Nobly.
Daugh. Did he eſcape you?
My old brave father, could you ſit down ſo coldly?
Seſ. Have patience, and know all. Purſued him fairly,
Till I was laught at, ſcorn'd, my wrongs made maygames.
By him unjuſtly wrong'd, ſhould be all juſtice,
The ſlave protected; yet at length I found him,
Found him, when he ſuppos'd all had been buried;
And what I had received durſt not be queſtioned;
And then he fell, under my Sword he fell,
For ever ſunk; his poore life, like the ayre,
Blown in an empty bubble, burſt, and left him,
No Noble wind of memory to raiſe him.
But then began my miſery, I fled;
The Kings frowns following, and my friends diſpaires;
No hand that durſt relieve: my Country fearfull,
Baſely and weakly fearfull of a tyrant;
Which made his bad wil worſe, ſtood ſtill and wondred,
Their vertues bedrid in e'm; then my girle,
A little one, I ſnatch'd thee from thy nurſe,
The modell of thy fathers miſeries:
And ſome ſmall wealth was fit for preſent carriage,
And got to Sea; where I profeſt my anger,
And wil do, whilſt that baſe ungrateful Countrey,
And that bad King, have blood or means to quench me.
Now ye know all.
Maſt. We know all, and admire all;
Go on and do all ſtill, and ſtill be fortunate.
Daught. Had you done leſſe, or loſt this Noble anger,
You had been worthy then mens empty pities,
And not their wonders. Go on, and uſe your juſtice;
And uſe it ſtill with that fell violence
It firſt appeared to you; if you go leſſe,
Or take a doting mercy to protection,
The honour of a father I diſclaim in you,
Call back all duty, and will be prowder of
The infamous and baſe name of a whore,
Then daughter to a great Duke and a coward.
Seſſ. Mine own ſweet Martia, no; thou knowſt my nature,
It cannot, muſt not be.
Daugh. I hope it ſhal not.
But why ſir, do you keep alive ſtill young Aſcanio,
Prince of Roſſana, King Ferrants moſt belov'd one,
You took two moneths agoe?
Why is not he flung overboord, or hang'd?
Seſ. Ile tell thee girle:
It were a mercy in my nature now,
So ſoon to break the bed of his afflictions;
I am not ſo far reconcil'd yet to him
To let him die, that were a benefit.
Beſides, I keep him as a bayt and dyet,
To draw on more, and neerer to the King,
I look each hour to heare of his Armados,
And a hot welcome they ſhall have.
Daugh. But hark you?
If you were overſwayed with odds—
Seſ. I find you:
I would not yield; no girle, no hope of yeelding,
Nor fling my ſelf one houre into their mercies,
And give the tyrant hope to gain his Kingdom.
No, I can ſink wench, and make ſhift to die;
A thouſand doores are open, I ſhal hit one.
I am no niggard of my life, ſo it goe Nobly:
All waies are equall and all houres; I care not.
Daugh. Now you ſpeak like my father.
Maſt. Noble General,
If by our means they inherit ought but bangs,
The mercy of the main yard light upon us.
No, we can ſinke too ſir, and ſinke low enough,
To poſe their cruelties, to follow us:

And

And he that thinks of life, if the world go that way,
A thousand cowards ſuck his bones.
Gun. Let the worſt come,
I can unbreech a Canon, and without much help
Turn her into the Keele; and when ſhe has ſplit it,
Every man knows his way, his own prayers,
And ſo good night I think.
Maſt. We have liv'd all with you, Boy a top.
And will die with you Generall.
Seſſ. I thank you Gentlemen.
Boy above. A Sayle, a Sayle.
Maſt. A cheerfull ſound.
Boy. A Sayle.
Botſ. Of whence? of whence boy?
Boy. A luſty ſayle.
Daugh. Look right, and look again.
Boy. She plows the Sea before her,
And fomes i'th mouth.
Botſ. Of whence?
Boy. I ken not yet ſir.
Seſſ. O may ſhe prove of Naples.
Maſt. Prove the Divell,
We'l ſpit out fire as thick as ſhe.
Boy. Hoy.
Maſt. Brave boy.
Boy. Of Naples, Naples, I think of Naples, Maſter, Me thinks I ſee the Armes.
Maſt. Up, up another,
And give more certain ſignes. Exit Saylor.
Seſſ. All to your buſineſſe,
And ſtand but right and tru-
Botſ. Hang him that halts now.
Boy. Sh'as us in chaſe.
Maſt. We'l ſpare her our main top-ſaile,
He ſhall not look us long, we are no ſtarters.
Down with the fore-ſaile too, we'l ſpoom before her.
Mart. Gunner, good noble Gunner, for my honour
Load me but theſe two Minions in the chape there;
And load 'em right, that they may bid faire welcome,
And be thine eye and level as thy heart is.
Gun. Madam, Ile ſcratch 'em out, Ile piſſe 'em out elſe.
Seſſ. Of whence now?
Sayl. Of Naples, Naples, Naples.
I ſee her top ſlag how ſhe quarters Naples.
I heare her Trumpets.
Seſſ. Down, ſhe's welcome to us. Exit Maſt. Botſ.
Every man to his charge, man her i'th bowe wel. Gun.
And place your rakers right, daughter be ſparing. Sayl.
Mart. I ſweare Ile be above ſir, in the thickeſt,
And where moſt danger is, Ile ſeek for honour.
They have begun, harke how their Trumpets call us.
Harke how the wide mouth'd Cannons ſing amongſt us.
Hear's how they ſaile; out of our ſhels for ſhame ſir.
Seſſ. Now fortune and my cauſe.
Mart. Be bold and conquer. Exit.
Charge Trumpets and ſhot within.
Enter Maſter, and Boteſwain.
Maſt. They'l board us once again, they're tuffe & valiant.
Boteſ. Twice we have blown 'em into th'ayre like fea-
And made 'em dance. (thers.
Maſt. Good boys, fight bravely, manly. Enter
They come on yet; clap in her ſtern, & yoke 'em. Gunner.
Gun. You ſhall not need, I have proviſion for 'em;
Let 'em boord once again, the next is ours.
Stand bravely to your Pikes, away, be valiant.
I have a ſecond courſe of ſervice for 'em,
Shall make the bowels of their Barke ake, hoy
The Duke fights like a Dragon. Who dares be idle. Exit.
Charge, Trumpets, pieces goe off.
Enter Maſter, Boteſwaine following.
Maſt. Down with 'em, ſtow 'em in. (the Sea.
Botſ. Cut their throats, tis brotherhood to fling 'em into
The Duke is hurt, ſo is his lovely daughter Martia.
We have the day yet. Enter Gunner. (yet flew.
Gun. Pox fire 'em, they have ſmok'd us, never ſuch plumbs Botſ. They have rent the ſhip, & bor'd a hundred holes,
She ſwims ſtill luſtily.
Maſt. She made a brave fight, and ſhe ſhall be cur'd,
And make a braver yet.
Gun. Bring us ſome Cans up, I am hot as fire. Enter Boy
Boteſ. I am ſure I am none o'th cooleſt. with 3 Cans.
Gun. My Cannons rung like Bels. Here's to my Miſtris.
The dainty Sweet braſſe Minion, ſplit their fore-maſt,
She never failed. (men.
Maſt. Ye did all well, and truly, like faithfull honeſt Boteſ. But is ſhe rich Maſter? Trumpet flouriſh.
Enter Seſſe, Martia, Virolet, Saylors.
Maſt. Rich for my Captains purpoſe howſoever,
And we are his. How bravely now he ſhows,
Heated in blood and anger? how do you ſir?
Not wounded mortally I hope?
Seſſ. No Maſter, but onely weare the livery of fury.
I am hurt, and deep.
Maſt. My Miſtris too?
Mart. A ſcratch man,
My needle would ha done as much good ſir,
Be provident and careſull.
Seſſ. Prethee peace girle,
This wound is not the firſt blood I have bluſht in,
Ye fought all like tall men, my thanks among ye,
That ſpeaks not what my purſe means, but my tongue,
ſouldiers.
Now ſir, to you that ſought me out, that found me,
That found me what I am, the Tyrants Tyrant;
You that were imp'd the weak arme to his folly,
You are welcome to your death.
Vir. I do expect it,
And therefore need no complement, but waite it.
Seſſ. Thou bor'ſt the face once of a Noble Gentleman,
Rankt in the firſt file of the vertuous,
By every hopefull ſpirit, ſhewed and pointed,
Thy Countries love; one that advanc'd her honour,
Not taynted with the baſe and ſervile uſes
The Tyrant ties mens ſoules too. Tell me Virolet,
If ſhame have not forſook thee, with thy credit.
Vir. No more of theſe Racks; what I am I am.
I hope not to go free with poore confeſſions;
Nor if I ſhow ill, will I ſeem a monſter,
By making my mind priſoner; do your worſt.
When I came out to deale with you, I caſt it,
Onely thoſe baſe inflictions fit for ſlaves,
Becauſe I am a Gentleman.
Seſſ. Thou art none.
Thou waſt while thou ſtoodſt good, th'art now a villain
And agent for the divell.
Vir. That tongue lies.
Give me my Sword again, and ſtand all arm'd;
Ile prove it on ye all, I am a Gentleman,
A man as faire in honour; rate your priſoners;
How poore and like a Pedagogue it ſhews?
How far from Nobleneſſe? tis fair, you may kil's;
But to defame your victory with foule language.
Seſ. Go, fling him overboord; Ile teach you ſirra.
Vir. You cannot teach me to die. I could kill you now
With patience, in deſpiſing all your cruelties.

And make you choke with anger.
Sef. Away I say.
Mar. Stay sir, h'as given you such bold language,
I am not reconcil'd to him yet, and therefore
He shall not have his wish observ'd so neerly,
To die when he please; I beseech you stay sir.
Sef. Do with him what thou wilt.
Mar. Carry him to th'Bilboes,
And clap him fast there, with the Prince.
Viro. Do Lady,
For any death you give, I am bound to blesse you.
Exit Virolet, and Saylors.
Mar. Now to your Cabin, sir; pray lean upon me,
And take your rest, the Surgeons waite all for you.
Sef. Thou makest me blush to see thee bear thy fortuns;
Why, sure I have no hurt, I have not fought sure?
Mast. You bleed apace, Sir.
Mart. Ye grow cold too.
Sef. I must be ruld, no leaning,
My deepest wounds scorn Crutches.
All. A brave Generall. Flor. Trumpets, Cornets.
Exeunt omnes.

Enter two Saylors.

1 Sayl. Will they not moore her?
2 Sayl. Not till we come to the Fort,
This is too weak a place for our defences,
The Carpenters are hard at worke; she swims well,
And may hold out another fight. The ship we took Burns there to give us light.
1 Sayl. She made a brave fight.
2 Sayl. She put us all in feare.
1 Sayl. Beshrew my heart did she.
Her men are gone to Candy, they are pepper'd,
All but this prisoner.
2 Sayl. Sure he's a brave fellow.
1 Say. A stubborn knave, but we have pul'd his bravery.
He discovers Virolet and Ascanio in the Bilboes.
Look how he looks now: come let's go serve his dyet,
Which is but bread and water.
2 Sayl. He'l grow fat on't. Exeunt Saylors.
Ascan. I must confesse I have endured much misery, even almost to the ruine of my spirit,
But ten times more grows my affliction,
To finde my friend here.
Viro. Had we serv'd our Countrey,
Or honesties, as we have serv'd our follies,
We had not been here now?
Ascan. Tis to true Virolet.
Viro. And yet my end in ventring for your safety,
Pointed at more then Ferrants will, a base one;
Some service for mine own, some for my Nation,
Some for my friend; but I am rightly payd,
That durst adventure such a Noble office,
From the most treacherous command of mischiefe,
You know him now?
Ascan. And when I neerer knew him,
Then when I waited, Heaven be witnesse with me,
(And if I lie my miseries still load me)
With what teares I have woed him, with what prayers,
What weight of reasons I have layd, what dangers;
Then, when the peoples curses flew like storms;
And every tongue was whetted to defame him,
To leave his doubts, his tyrannies, his slaughters,
His fell oppressions. I know I was hated too.
Viro. And all mankind that knew him: these confessions
Do no good to the world, to Heaven they may.
Let's study to die well, we have liv'd like coxcombs.
Ascan. That my mis-fortune, should lose you too.
Viro. Yes;
And not onely me, but many more, and better:
For my life, tis not this; or might I save yours,
And some brave friends I have engag'd, let me go;
It were the meritorious death I wish for,
But we must hang or drown like whelps.
Ascan. No remedy.
Viro. On my part I expect none. I know the man,
And know he has been netled to the quick too,
I know his nature.
Ascan. A most cruell nature.
Vir. His wrongs have bred him up. I cannot blame him.
Ascan. He has a daughter too, the greatest scorner,
And most insulter upon misery. (men:
Viro. For those, they are toyes to laugh at, not to lead
A womans mirth or anger, like a meteor
Glides and is gone, and leaves no crack behind it;
Our miseries would seem like masters to us,
And shake our manly spirits into feavors,
If we respected those; the more they glory,
And raise insulting Trophies on our ruines;
The more our vertues shine in patience.
Sweet Prince, the name of death was never terrible
To him that knew to live; nor the loud torrent
Of all afflictions, singing as they swim,
A gall of heart, but to a guilty conscience:
Whilst we stand faire, but by a two-edg'd storm,
We find untimely fals, like early Roses;
But to the earth, we beare our native sweetnesse.
Ascan. Good sir go on.
Viro. When we are little children,
And cry and fret for every toy comes crosse us;
How sweetly do we shew, when sleep steales on us?
When we grow great, but our affections greater,
And struggle with this stubborn twin, born with us;
And tug and pull, yet still we finde a Giant:
Had we not then the priviledge to sleep,
Our everlasting sleep? he would make us ideots;
The memory and monuments of good men
Are more then lives, and tho their Tombs want tongues,
Yet have they eyes, that daily sweat their losses;
And such a teare from stone, no time can value.
To die both young and good, are natures curses,
As the world says; ask truth, they are bountious blessings:
For then we reach at Heaven, in our full vertues,
And fix our selves new Stars, crown'd with our goodnes.
Asc. You have double arm'd me. Strange Musick
Hark, what noyse is this? within, Hoboys.
What horrid noyse is the Sea pleas'd to sing,
A hideous Dirg to our deliverance?
Viro. Stand fast now. Within strange cries, horrid
Asc. I am fixt. noyse, Trumpets.
Viro. We feare ye not. Enter Martia
Let death appear in all shapes, we smile on him.
Asc. The Lady now.
Viro. The face oth' Maske is alter'd.
Asc. What will she doe?
Viro. Do what she can, I care not.
Asc. She looks on you sir.
Viro. Rather she looks through me,
But yet she stirs me not.
Mart. Poore wretched slaves,
Why do you live? or if ye hope for mercy,
Why do not you houle out, and fill the hold
With lamentations, cries, and base submissions,
Worthy our scorn?
Viro. Madam, you are mistaken;
We are no slaves to you, but to blind fortune;

And

And if she had her eyes, and durst be certain,
Certain our friend, I would not bow unto her;
I would not cry, nor aske so base a mercy:
If you see any thing, in our appearance,
Worthy your sexes softnes and your own glory?
Do it for that; and let that good reward it:
We cannot beg.
Mart. Ile make you beg, and bow too.
Viro. Madam for what?
Mart. For life; and when you hope it,
Then will I laugh and triumph on your baseneſſe.
Aſc. Madam tis true, there may be ſuch a favour,
And we may aske it too; aske it with honour;
And thanke you for that favour, nobly thank you,
Tho it be death; but when we beg a baſe life,
And beg it of your ſcorn—
Viro. Y'are couzened woman,
Your handſomneſſe may do much, but not this way;
But for your glorious hate—
Mart. Are ye ſo ſtubborn?
Death, I will make you bow.
Vir. It muſt be in your bed then;
There you may worke me to humility.
Mart. Why, I can kill thee.
Viro. If you do it handſomely;
It may be I can thank you, elſe—Mart. So glorious?
Aſca. Her cruelty now workes.
Mart. Yet woot thou?
Virt. No.
Mart. Wilt thou for life ſake?
Viro. No, I know your ſubtilty.
Mart. For honour ſake?
Viro. I will not be a Pageant,
My mind was ever firm, and ſo Ile loſe it.
Mart. Ile ſtarve thee to it.
Viro. Ile ſtarve my ſelfe, and croſſe it.
Mart. Ile lay thee on ſuch miſeries—
Viro. Ile weare 'em,
And with that wantonneſſe, you do your Bracelets.
Mart. Ile be a moneth a killing thee.
Viro. Poore Lady,
Ile be a moneth a dying then: what's that?
There's many a Callenture outdoes your cruelty.
Mart. How might I do, in killing of his body,
To ſave his Noble mind? Who waites there?
Enter a Saylor with a rich Cap and Mantle.
Sayl. Maddam. (you,
Mart. Unbolt this man, and leave thoſe things behind
And ſo away. Now put 'em on. Uunbolt him. Exit Sailor.
Viro. To what end?
Mart. To my end, to my will.
Viro. I will.
Mart. I thank you.
Viro. Nay, now you thank me, Ile do more. Ile tell ye,
I am a ſervant to your curteſie,
And ſo far will be wooed: but if this triumph
Be onely aym'd, to make your miſchiefe glorious;
Lady, y'ave put a richer ſhroud upon me,
Which my ſtrong mind ſhall ſuffer in.
Mart. Come hither,
And all thy bravery put into thy carriage,
For I admire thee.
Viro. Whither will this woman?
Aſc. Take heed my friend.
Mart. Look as thou ſcorndſt my cruelty:
I know thou doeſt.
Vir. I never fear'd, nor flatter'd.
Mart. No if thou hadſt, thou hadſt died, & I had gloried.
I ſuffer now, and thou which art my priſoner,
Haſt Nobly won the free power to deſpiſe me.
I love thee, and admire thee for thy Nobleneſſe;
And for thy manly ſufferance, am thy ſervant.
Vir. Good Lady, mock me not.
Mart. By Heaven I love thee;
And by the ſoule of love, am one piece with thee.
Thy mind, thy mind; thy brave, thy manly mind:
That like a Rock ſtands all the ſtorms of fortune,
And beats 'em roaring back they cannot reach thee:
That lovely mind I dote on, not the body;
That mind has rob'd me of my liberty:
That mind has darken'd all my bravery,
And into poor deſpiſ'd things, turn'd my angers.
Receive me to your love ſir, and inſtruct me;
Receive me to your bed, and marry me:
Ile wait upon you, bleſſe the houre I knew you.
Viro. Is this a new way?
Mart. If you doubt my faith,
Firſt take your liberty; Ile make it perfect,
Or any thing within my power.
Viro. I love you;
But how to recompence your love with marriage?
Alas, I have a wife.
Mart. Dearer then I am?
That will adventure ſo much for your ſafety?
Forget her fathers wrongs, quit her own honour,
Pull on her for a ſtrangers ſake, all curſes?
Vir. Shall this Prince have his freedom too?
Elſe all I love is gone, all my friends periſh.
Mart. He ſhall.
Vir. What ſhall I do?
Mart. If thou deſpiſe my curteſie,
When I am dead, for griefe I am forſaken,
And no ſoft hand left to aſſwage your ſorrows;
Too late, but too true, curſe your own cruelties.
Aſcan. Be wiſe; if ſhe be true, no thred is left elſe,
To guide us from this laborinth of miſchiefe;
Nor no way for our friends.
Viro. Thus then, I take you:
I bind ye to my life, my love.
Mart. I take you,
And with the like bond tye my heart your ſervant;
W'are now almoſt at Harbour, within this houre,
In the dead watch, Ile have the long boat ready;
And when I give the word, be ſure you enter,
Ile ſee ye furniſht both immediately,
And like your ſelfe; ſome truſty man ſhall wait you,
The watch Ile make mine own; onely my love
Requires a ſtronger vow, which Ile adminiſter
Before we go.
Viro. Ile take it to confirm you.
Mart. Go in, there are the Keys, unlock his fetters,
And arme ye Nobly both; Ile be with you preſently,
And ſo this loving kiſſe.
Aſcan. Be conſtant Lady. Exeunt omnes.

Enter the Duke of Seſſe by Torchlight, Maſter and Surgeon, with him.

Surg. You grow ſo angry ſir, your wound goes back-Seſſ. I am angry at the time, at none of you, (ward.
That ſends but one poor ſubject for revenge;
I would have all the Court, and all the villany,
Was ever practiz'd under that foule Ferrand
Tyrant, and all to quench my wrath.
Maſt. Be patient,

Your

Your grace may find occaſion every houre,
For certaine they will ſeeke you,to ſatisfy,
And to the full, your anger.
Seſ. Death, they dare not:
They know that I command death, feed his hunger,
And when I let him looſe—
Sur. You'l never heale ſir,
If theſe extreames dwell in you, you are old,
And burn your ſpirits out with this wild angers.
Seſ. Thou lieſt,I am not old,I am as luſty
And full of manly heat as them,or thou art.
Maſt. No more of that.
Seſ. And dare ſeek out a danger;
And hold him at the ſwords point,when thou trembleſt
And creepeſt into thy box of ſalves to ſave thee.
O Maſter,I have had a dreadfull dream to night!
Me-thought the ſhip was all on fire, and my lov'd Daughter,
To ſave her life, leapt into th' Sea; where ſuddainly
A ſtranger ſnatch'd her up, and ſwom away with her.
Maſt. 'Twas but the heate o'th fight ſir. Boate ſwain within & Sailor.
Boat. Look out,what's that?
Sail. The long bote as I live.
Bote. Ho,there,ith long Bote. She claps on all her Oares.
Seſ. What noiſe is that? Hoy.
Maſt. I hear ſir— Exit Maſter.
Boat. The devill or his dam;haile her agen boyes.
Sail. The long boate,ho,the long boate.
Seſ. Why,the long boate?
Where is the long Boate?
Boat. She is ſtolne off. En. Maſter.
Seſ. Who ſtole her?
O my prophetique ſoule!
Maſt. Your daughter's gone ſir;
The priſoners,and ſix Saylors, rogues.
Seſ. Miſchief, ſix thouſand plagues ſalo with 'em;
They'r in her yet,make out.
Maſt. We have ne'r a Boate. En. Gunner.
Gun. Who knew of this trick?
Seſ. Weigh Anchors and away.
Boat. We ha' no winde ſir,
They'l beate us with their Oares.
Seſ. Then ſinke 'em Gunner,
O ſink 'em,ſink 'em,ſink 'em,claw 'em Gunner;
As ever thou haſt lov'd me.
Gun. I'le do reaſon,
But i'le be hangd before I hurt the Lady. Exit Gun.
Seſ. Who knew of this? Trump. a peece or Maſt. We ſtand all clear. two go off.
Seſ. What divel
Put this baſe trick into her tayle? my daughter,
And run away with rogues! I hope ſhe's ſunk, A peece
Or torne to pieces with the ſhot; rots find her, or two.
The leproſy of whore, ſtick ever to her, En. Gunner.
O ſhe has ruind my revenge.
Gun. She is gone ſir,
I cannot reach her with my ſhot.
Seſ. Riſe winds, blow till you burſt the aire,
Blow till ye burſt the aire, and ſwell the Seas,
That they may ſink the ſtarres,O dance her,dance her;
Shes impudently wanton, dance her,dance her,
Mount her upon your ſurges,coole her,coole her
She runs hot like a whore,coole her,coole her;
O now a ſhot to ſink her;come,cut Cables;
I will away, and where ſhe ſets her foote
Although it be in Ferrants court,ile follow her,
And ſuch a fathers vengeance ſhall ſhe ſuffer—
Dare any man ſtand by me?
Maſt. All, all.
Boats. All ſir.
Gun. And the ſame cup you taſte.
Seſ. Cut Cables then;
For I ſhall never ſleep, nor know what peace is,
Till I have pluckt her heart out;
All within. O maine there. Exeunt.

Actus tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter Ferrant, Romvere, Caſtruchio, Villo, and Guard.

Rom. You are too gentle ſir. Floriſh cornets.
Fer. You are too careleſſe:
The creatures I have made,no way regard me:
VVhy ſhould I give you names,titles of honour
Rob families, to fill your private houſes
For your advancement, draw all curſes on me,
VVake tedious winter nights, to make them happy
That for me break no ſlumber?
Rom. VVhat we can,
VVe dare doe
Fer. VVhy is your Soveraignes life then
(In which you live, and in whoſe fall your honours,
Your wealth,your pomp,your pride and all muſt ſuffer)
No better guarded? O my cruell Stars,
That marke me out a King,raiſing me on
This pinnacle of greatneſſe, only to be
The neerer blaſting!
Vil. VVhat think you now Caſtruchio?
Is not this a merry life?
Caſt. Still thou art couzend;
It is a glorious royall diſcontentment;
How bravely it becomes him!
Fer. To be made
The common butt, for every ſlave to ſhoot at;
No peace,no reſt I take, but their alarams
Beat at my heart: why do I live, or ſeek then,
To adde a day more to theſe glorious troubles?
Or to what end when all I can arrive at,
Is but the ſumming up of feares and ſorrowes,
VVhat power has my command,when from my boſom
Aſcanio my moſt dear,and lov'd Aſcanio,
Was ſnatch'd,ſpite of my wil,ſpite of my ſuccor,
And by mine own proud ſlave reteind moſt miſerable;
And ſtill that villains lives to nip my pleaſures,
It being not within my power to reach him.
Rom. Time may reſtore all this; and would you hear VVhoſe counſell never falld you.
Fer. Tell me no more,
I faint beneath the burthen of my cares,
And yeild my ſelfe moſt wretched.
Rom. On my Knees
I beg it might ſir, vouchſafe me hearing.
Fer. Speak,ſpeak,and I thus low,ſuch is my fortune,
VVill hear what thou canſt ſay.
Vil. Look but on this,
Has not a man that has but means to keep
A Hawk,a Grayhound,and a hunting Nag,
More pleaſure then this King?
Caſt. A dull foole ſtill,
Make me a King,and let me ſcratch with care,
And ſee who'l have the better; give me rule,
Command,obedience,pleaſure of a King,
And let the devil rore; The greateſt corroſive
A King can have, is of more pretious tickling,
And handled to the height more dear delight,

Then

Then other mens whole lives, let 'em be safe too.
Vil. Think of the mutinous people.
Cast. Hang the people,
Give me the pleasure, let me do all, save all,
Enjoy their wives and states at my discretion,
And peg 'em when I please, let the slaves mumble.
Vil. But say they should be vex'd, and rise against thee?
Cast. Let 'em rise, let 'em rise: give me the bridle here,
And see if they can crack my girths: ah Villio,
Under the Sun, there's nothing so voluptuous
As riding of this monster, till he founder.
Fer. Who's that so lowd?
Cast. I am dumb: is not this rare?
Kings looks make Pythagoreans; is not this
A happinesse Villio?
Vil. Yes, to put to silence
A fawning sycophant.
Fer. Thou speak'st truth in all,
And mercy is a vice, when there needs rigour,
Which I with all severity will practise;
And since as subjects they pay not obedience,
They shall be forc'd as slaves: I wil remove
Their meanes to hurt, and with the means, my fears:
Goe you the fatall executioners
Of my commands, and in our name proclame,
That from this houre I do forbid all meetings,
All private conferences in the City:
To feast a neighbour shall be death; to talke,
As they meete in the streetes, to hold discourse,
By writing, nay by signes; see this perform'd,
And I wil call your cruelty, to those
That dare repine at this, to me true service.
1 Gard. This makes for us.
2. Gard. I now we have imployments,
If we grow not rich 'twere fit we should be beggers.
Fer. Romvere. Exit Guard.
Ron. My Lord.
Cast. Thou enemy to Majesty?
What think'st thou of a Kingdome?
Vil. As of a man
That hath power to doe ill.
Cast. Of a thing rather
That does divide an Empire with the Gods;
Observe but with how little breath he shakes
A populous City, which would stand unmov'd
Against a whirlewind.
Vil. Then you make him more
Then him that rules the winds.
Cast. For me I doe confesse it,
Were I offerd to be any thing on Earth,
I would be mighty Tercant.
Fer. Ha? who names me?
Deliver thy thoughts slave, thy thoughts, and truly,
Or be no more.
Cast. They rather will deserve.
Your favour then your fury; I admire,
(As who does not, that is a loyall subject?)
Your wisdom, power, your perfect happinesse,
The most blest of mankind.
Fer. Didst thou but feele
The weighty sorrowes, that sit on a Crown,
Tho thou shouldst find one in the streets Castrucio,
Thou wouldst not think it worth the taking up;
But since thou art enamour'd of my fortune,
Thou shalt ere long taste of it.
Cast. But one day,
And then let me expire.
Fer. Goe to my wardrop,
And of the richest things I wear, cull out,
What thou thinkst fit: do you attend him first.
Vil. I warrant you, I shall be at his elbow,
The foole wil never leave him. Exit Cast. Villio.
Cast. Made for ever. A shout within.
Fer. What shout is that? draw up Guards.
Ron. Those rather Enter Virolet, Ascanio, and a servant.
Speake joy then danger.
Bring her to my house,
I would not have her seen here.
Fer. My Ascanio!
The most desir'd of all the men, let me die
In these embraces; how were thou redeem'd?
Asc. Sir, this is my preserver.
Fer. At more leasure,
I will inquire the manner, and the meanes,
I cannot spare so much time now from my
More strickt embraces: Virolet, welcome too,
This service weighes down your entended treason;
You long have bin mine enemy, learn now
To be my friend and loyall, I aske no more,
And live as free as Ferrant; let him have
The forty thousand crowns I gladly promis'd,
For my Ascanios freedom, and deliver
His Father, and his wife to him in safety, Something hath passed which I am sorry for,
But 'twill not now be help'd; come my Ascanio,
And reap the harvest of my winter travels. Florish
My best Ascanio, my most lov'd Ascanio. Cornets.
Viro. My Lord, all former passages forgot, Exit Fer.
I am become a suitor. Ascanio.
Ron. To me Virolet?
Virol. To you, yet will not beg the courtesie,
But largely pay you for it.
Ron. To the purpose.
Virol. The forty thousand crownes the King hath given me;
I will bestow on you, if by your meanes
I may have liberty for a divorce
Between me and my wife.
Ron. Your Julicana?
That for you hath indur'd so much, so nobly?
Virol. The more my sorrow; but it must be so.
Ron I will not hinder it: without a bribe,
For mine own ends, I would have further'd this.
I will use all my power.
Virol. 'Tis all I aske:
Oh my curs'd fate, that ever man should hate
Himselfe for being belov'd, or be compeld
To cast away a Jewell, Kings would buy,
Tho with the losse of Crown and Monarchy! Exeunt.
Enter Sese, Master, Boatswaine, Gunner.
Ses. How do I look?
Mast. You are so strangely alterd,
We scarce can know you, so young againe, and utterly
From that you were, figure, or any favour;
Your friends cannot discern you.
Ses. I have none,
None but my faire revenge, and let that know me;
You are finely alterd too.
Boats. To please your humour,
But we may passe without disguise, our living
Was never in their element.
Gun. This Jew sure,
That alter'd you, is a made knave.
Ses. O! a most excellent fellow,
Gun. How he has mew'd your head, has rub'd the snow
And rum your beard into a peak of twenty! (off,
Boat. Stopt all the crannies in your face.

Mast

Maſt. Moſt rarely.
Boat. And now you look as plump, your eyes as ſparkling,
As if you were to leap into a Ladies ſaddle.
Has he not ſet your noſe awry?
Seſ. The better.
Boat. I think it be the better, but tis awry ſure;
North and by East, I ther's the point it ſtands in;
Now halfe a point to th'Southward.
Seſ. I could laugh,
But that my buſineſſe requires no mirth now;
Thou art a merry fellow.
Boat. I would the Jew ſir,
Could ſteer my head right, for I have ſuch a ſwimming
Ever ſince I went to Sea firſt.
Maſt. Take wine and purg it.
Boate. I have had a thouſand pils of Sack, a thouſand;
A thouſand pottle pils.
Gun. Take more.
Boate. Good Doctor,
Your patient is eaſily perſwaded.
Maſt. The next faire open weather
Me thinks this Jew,
If he were truly known to founder'd Courtiers,
And decaied Ladies, that have loſt their fleeces
On every buſh, he might pick a pretty living.
Boate. The beſt of all our gallants, now be glad of him;
For if you marke their marches, they are tender,
Soft, ſoft, and tender; then but obſerve their bodies,
And you ſhall find 'em cemented by a Surgeon,
Or ſome Phyſitian for a year or two,
And then toth'tub again, for a new pickle.
This Jew might live a Gentile here.
Seſ. What are theſe?
Stand cloſe and marke?
Boat. Theſe are no men, th'are motions.
Seſ. What ſad and ruthfull faces!
Boate. How they duck!
This ſenceleſſe, ſilent courteſie me thinks,
Shewes like two Turkes, ſaluting one another,
Upon two French porters backs.
Seſ. They are my Countrymen,
And this, ſome forc'd infliction from the tyrant;
What are you? why is this? why move thus ſilent
As if you were wandring ſhadowes? why ſo ſad?
Your tongues ſeald up; are yee of ſeverall Countries?
You underſtand not one another?
Gun. That's an Engliſh man,
He lookes as though he had loſt his dog.
Seſ. Your habits
Shew ye all Neapolitanes, and your faces
Deliver you oppreſſed things: ſpeak boldly:
Do you groan, and labor under this ſtiffe yoak?
Maſt. They ſhake their heads and weep.
Seſ. O miſery!
Give plenteous ſorrow, and no tongues to ſhew 'em!
This is a ſtudied cruelty.
1. Citi. Be gon ſir,
It ſeemes you are a ſtranger and your ſelfe;
2. Citi. You wonder here at us, as much we wonder
To hear you ſpeak ſo openly, and boldly,
The Kings command being publiſht to the contrary;
Tis death here, above two to talk together;
And that muſt be but common ſalutation neither,
Short and ſo part.
Boate. How ſhould a man buy muſtard,
If he be forc'd to ſtay the making of it?
Within 1. Cleare all the ſtreetes before the King:
1. Cit. Get off Sir,
And ſhift as we muſt do. Exeunt Citizens
Seſ. I'le ſee his glory.
Maſt. Stand faſt now and like men, Flouriſh colours.
Caſt. Begin the game ſir, Enter Caſtruccio like
And pluck me down, the Row the King, in the
Of houſes there. midſt of a guard. Villio.
They hide the view oth' hill; and ſink thoſe merchants,
Their ſhips are foule and ſtinke.
Maſt. This is a ſweete youth.
Caſt. All that are taken in aſſemblies, their houſes and their wives, their wealthes are forfeit,
Their lives at your devotion. Villaines, Knaves,
I'le make you bow & ſhake, i'le make you kneele Rogues.
How brave tis to be a King?
Gun. Here's fine tumbling.
Caſt. No man ſhall ſit i'th' temple neer another.
Boate. Nor lie with his own wife.
Caſt. All upon paine
Of preſent death, forget to write.
Boate. That's excellent,
Carriers and foot-Poſts, wil be arrant Rebels.
Caſt. No Character, or ſtamp that may deliver
This mans intention, to that man i'th' Country.
Gun. Nay, an you cut off, after my hearty commenda-
Your friend and Oliver. No more. (tions
Caſt. No man ſmile,
And wear a face of mirth; that fellowes comming,
And hides a double heart, he's your prize, ſmoke him.

Enter Virolet, Romero, Aſcanio, and Martia, Paſſing over.

Seſ. What baſe abuſe is this? Ha? tis her face ſure,
My priſoners with her too? by heaven wild whore
Now is my time.
Maſt. Do what you will.
Seſ. Stay hold yet,
My Country ſhall be ſerv'd firſt, let her go,
Wee'l have an hour for her to make her tremble.
Now ſhew your ſelves, and bleſſe you with your valors.
Guard Here's a whole plump of Rogues. Virolet and they
Seſ. Now for your Country. off againe.
Caſt. Away with 'em and hang 'em; no, no mercy,
I ſay no mercy.
Seſ. Be it ſo upon 'em.
Guard. Treaſon, treaſon, treaſon.
Boate. Cut the ſlaves to giggets.
Gun. Down with the bul-beefes.
Seſ. Hold, hold, I command you——look here
Caſt. A miſerable thing I am no King ſir.
Seſ. Sirra, your fooles face has preſerv'd your life.
Wear no more Kings coates, you have ſcap'd a ſcouring.
Boate. I'ſt not the King.
Seſ. No, tis a prating Raſcall,
The puppy makes him mirth.
Caſt. Yes ſir, I am a puppy.
Boate. I beſeech you let me hang him,
I'le do't in my belt ſtraight.
Caſt. As you are honorable,
It is enough you may hang me.
Gun. I'le hang a ſquib at's taile
That ſhall blow both his buttocks, like a petar.
Caſt. Do any thing.
But do not kill me Gentlemen. Enter Citizen.
Boate. Lets ſeize him, and have him fiye blowen.
Cit. Away, and ſave your lives.
The King himſelfe is coming on; if you ſtay,
You are loſt for ever; let not ſo much nobleneſſe
Willfully periſh.

Seſ.

Sess. How neer?
2. Citiz. He's here behind you. Ex. Sess. Boat sw.
Sess. We thank you. vanish. Saylers, Citizens.

Enter Ferand. Ronvere. Florish Cornets.

Fer. Double the Guards and take in men that dare,
These slaves are frighted; where are the proud Rebels,
To what protection fled, what villain leads 'em?
Under our nose disturb our rest?
Ronver. We shall heare,
For such a search I have sent, to hunt the Traytors.
Fer. Yet better men I say, we stand too open:
How now Castruchio? how do you like our glory?
Cast. I must confesse, 'twas somewhat more then my
This open glory agrees not with my body, (match Sir;
But, if it were ith' Castle, or some strength,
Where I might have my swing.
Vil. You have been swing'd brother;
How these delights have tickled you? you itch yet;
Will you walke out again in pomp?
Cast. Good Foole.
Vil. These rogues must be rebuked, they are too sawcy,
These peremptory Knaves. Will you walk out Sir,
And take the remnant of your Coronation?
The people stay to see it.
Fer. Do not vex him;
Ha's griefe enough in's bones; you shall to th' Citadell,
And like my selfe command, there use your pleasure,
But take heed to your person.
Vil. The more danger;
Still the more honour Brother.
Cast. If I reign not then,
And like a King, and thou shalt know it fool,
And thou shalt feel it foole.
Vil. Fooles still are freemen,
I'le sue for a protection, till thy reigne's out.
Fer. The people have abus'd the liberty
I late allowed, I now proclaime it straighter;
No men shall walk together, nor salute;
For they that doe shall dye.
Ronver. You hit the right Sir;
That liberty cut off, you are free from practise.
Fer. Renew my guards.
Ronver. I shall.
Fer. And keep strict watches;
One houre of joy I aske.
Ronver. You shall have many. Exeunt. Flor. Cor.

Pandulfo, and Iuliana, led by two of the guard, as not yet fully recover'd.

1. Guard.
You are now at liberty, in your own house Lady,
And here our charge takes end.
Pandul. 'Tis now a Custome.
We must even wooe those men deserve worst of us,
And so we thanke your labours; there's to drinke,
For that, and mischiefe are your occupations;
And to meane well to no man, you Chief'st harvests.
2. Gard. You give liberally; we hope Sir, er't be long,
To be oftner acquainted with your bounty,
And so we leave you.
Pand. Doe, for I dote not on ye;
Iul. But where's my Husband? what should I do here?
Or what share have I in this joy, cal'd liberty,
Without his company? Why did you flatter me,
And tell me he was return'd, his service honour'd?
1. Gard. He is so, and stands high in the Kings favour;
His friends redeem'd, and his own liberty,
From which yours is deriv'd, confirm'd; his service,
To his own wish rewarded: so fare-well Lady. Ex. Guard.
Pand. Go persecute the good, and hunt ye hell-hounds;
Ye Leeches of the time, suck till ye burst slaves;
How does my girle?
Iul. Weake yet, but full of comfort;
Pand. Sit down, and take some rest;
Iul. My heart's whole Father;
That joyes, and leaps, to heare my Viralt,
My Deer, my life, has conquer'd his afflictions.
Pand. Those rude hands, and that bloody will that
That durst upon thy tender body Print (did this,
These Characters of cruelty; heare me heaven.
Iul. O Sir be sparing.
Pand. I'le speake it, tho I burst;
And tho the ayre had eares, and serv'd the Tyrant,
Out it should goe: O heare me thou great Justice;
The miseries, that waite upon their mischiefs,
Let them be numberlesse, and no eye pitty
Them when their soules are loaden, and in labour, (ror,
And wounded through, and through, with guilt & hor-
As mine is now with griefe; let men laugh at 'em (em;
Then, when their monstrous sins, like earth-quaks, shake
And those eyes, that forgot heaven would look upward,
The bloody 'larms, of the conscience beating,
Let mercy flye, and day strook into darkenesse,
Leave their blind soules, to hunt out their own horrors.
Iul. Enough, enough, we must forget deare Father;
For then we are glorious formes of heaven; and live,
When we can suffer, and as soon forgive.
But where's my Lord? me thinkes I have seen this house;
And have been in't before.
Pand. Thine own house jewell.
Iul. Mine, without him? or his, without my company?
I thinke it cannot be; it was not wont Father. (heaven)
Pand. Some businesse with the King (let it be good Reteines him sure. Enter Boy.
Iul. It must be good and noble,
For all men that he treats with taste of vertue;
His words and actions are his own; and Honour's
Not bought, nor compel'd from him.
Pand. Here's the Boy.
He can confirme us more, how sad the child looks?
Come hither Lucio; how, and where's thy Master?
Iul. Speak gentle Boy.
Pand. Is he return'd in safety?
Iul. If not, and that thou knowest is miserable,
Our hopes and happinesse declin'd for ever;
Study a sorrow, excellent as thy Master,
Then if thou canst live, leave us.
Lucio. Noble Madam,
My Lord is safe return'd, safe to his friends, and fortune,
Safe to his Country, entertain'd with honour,
Is here within the house.
Iul. Doe not mock me.
Lucio. But such a melancholy hangs on his mind,
And in his eyes inhabit such sad shadowes;
But what the cause is—
Pand. Goe tell him we are here Boy;
There must be no cause now.
Iul. Hast thou forgot me?
Lucio. No, noblest Lady.
Iul. Tell him I am here,
Tell him his wife is here, sound my name to him,
And thou shalt see him start; speake Iuliana,

And like the Sunne that labors through a tempeſt,
How ſuddainly he will diſperſe his ſadneſſe?
Pand. Goe I command thee inſtantly,
And charge him on his duty.
Iul. On his Love Boy:
I would faine goe to him.
Pand. Away, away, you are fooliſh.
Iul. Beare all my ſervice ſweet Boy.
Pand. Art thou here ſtill?
Jul. And tell him what thou wilt that ſhall become Pand. Ith' houſe, and know we are here. Ex. Boy. (thee.
Iul. No, no, he did not;
I warrant you he did not: could you think
His Love had leſſe then wings, had he but ſeen me,
His ſtrong affection any thing but fire
Conſuming all weak lets, and rubs before it,
Till he had met my flame, and made one body?
If ever heavens high bleſſings met in one man,
And there erected to their holy uſes,
A ſacred mind, fit for their ſervices,
Built all of poliſht honour, 'twas in this man:
Miſdoubt him not.
Pand. I know he's truly noble;
But why this ſadneſſe, when the generall cauſe
Requires a Jubile of joy?
Jul. I know not. Enter Virolet, and Boy.
Pand. Pray heaven you find it not.
Jul I hope I ſhall not:
O here he comes, and with him all my happineſſe;
He ſtaies and thinks, we may be too unmannerly,
Pray give him leave. they ſtand off.
Pand. I doe not like this ſadneſſe.
Vir. O hard condition of my miſery!
Unheard of plagues! when to behold that woman,
That chaſte and vertuous woman, that preſerv'd me,
That pious wife, wedded to my afflictions,
Muſt be more terrible then all my dangers.
O fortune, thou haſt rob'd men of my making,
The noble building of a man, demoliſht,
And flung me headlong, on a ſin ſo baſe
Man and mankind contemn, even beaſts abhor it,
A ſin more dull then drinke, a ſhame beyond it;
So foule, and farre from faith, I dare not name it,
But it will cry it ſelf out, loud ingratitude.
Your bleſſing Sir.
Pand. You have it in abundance;
So is our joy, to ſee you ſafe.
Vir. My Deere one;
Iul. H'as not forgot me yet: O take me to you Sir.
Vir. Muſt this be added to increaſe my miſery,
That ſhe muſt weep for joy, and looſe that goodneſſe?
My Iuliana, even the beſt of women,
Of wives the perfecteſt, let me ſpeak this,
And with a modeſty declare thy vertues,
Chaſter then Chriſtall, on the Scythian Clifts
The more the proud winds Court, the more the purer.
Sweeter in thy obedience, then a ſacrifice;
And in thy mind a Saint, that even yet living,
Produceſt miracles, and women daily
With crooked and tame ſoules creep to thy goodneſſe,
Which having toucht at, they become examples.
The fortitude of all their ſex, is Fable
Compar'd to thine; and they that fill'd up glory,
And admiration, in the age behind us,
Out of their celebrated urns, are ſtarted,
To ſtare upon the greatneſſe of thy ſpirit;
Wondring what new Martyr heaven has begot,
To fill the times with truth, and eaſe their ſtories;
Being all theſe, and excellent in beauty,
(For noble things dwell in the nobleſt buildings)
Thou haſt undone thy husband, made him wretch'ed,
A miſerable man, my Iuliana,
Thou haſt made thy Virolet.
Iul. Now goodneſſe keep me;
Oh! my dear Lord.
Pand. She wrong you? what's the meaning?
Weep not, but ſpeake, I charge you on obedience;
Your Father charges you, ſhe make you miſerable?
That you your ſelf confeſſe.
Vir. I doe, that kils me;
And far leſſe I have ſpoke her, then her merit.
Iul. It is ſome ſinne of weakneſſe, or of Ignorance?
For ſure my Will—
Vir. No, 'tis a ſinne of excellence:
Forgive me heaven, that I prophane thy bleſſings:
Sit ſtill; I'le ſhew you all. Exit Virolet.
Pand. What meanes this madneſſe?
For ſure there is no taſte of right man in it;
Greives he our liberty, our preſervation?
Or has the greatneſſe of the deed he has done,
Made him forget, for whom, and how he did it,
And looking down upon us, ſcorne the benefit
Well Virolet if thou beeſt proud, or treacherous
Iul. He cannot Sir, he cannot; he will ſhew us,
And with that reaſon ground his words.
Pand. He comes. Enter Virolet, Martia, Rower.
What Maſque is this? what admirable beauty?
Pray heaven his heart be true.
Iul. A goodly woman. (ſtrery,
Vir. Tell me my Dear; and tell me without flat-
As you are nobly honeſt, ſpeak the truth;
What thinke you of this Lady?
Iul. She is moſt exceellent.
Vir. Might not this beauty tell me that it's a ſweet one,
Without more ſetting off, as now it is,
Thanking no greater Miſtreſſe then meer nature?
Stagger a conſtant heart?
Pand. She is full of wonder,
But yet; yet Virolet.
Vir. Pray; by your leave Sir.
Iul. She would amaze:
Vir. O! would ſhe ſo? I thanke you;
Say, to this beauty, ſhe have all additions,
Wealth, noble birth.
Pand. O hold there.
Vir. All vertues,
A mind, as full of Candor as the truth is,
I, and a loving Lady.
Iul. She muſt needs
(I am bound in conſcience to confeſſe) deſerve much.
Vir. Nay, ſay beyond all theſe, ſhe be ſo pious,
That even on ſlaves condemn'd ſhe ſhowre her benefits,
And melt their ſtubborn Bolts with her ſoft pitty,
What thinke you then?
Pand. For ſuch a noble office,
At theſe yeares, I ſhould dote my ſelf; take heed Boy,
Jul. If you be he, that have received theſe bleſſings,
And this the Lady: love her, honour her;
You cannot doe too much, to ſhew your gratitude,
Your greateſt ſervice will ſhew off too ſlender.
Vir. This is the Lady; Lady of this bounty,
That wealth, that noble name, that all I ſpoke of:
The Prince Aſcains and my ſelfe, the ſlaves
Redeem'd, brought home, ſtill guarded by her goodnes,
And of our liberties you taſte the ſweetnes;
Even you ſhe has preſerv'd too, lengthen'd your lives.

Iul. And

Iul. And what reward doe you purpoſe? it muſt be a
If love will do it we'll all, ſo love her, ſerve her. (maine Vir. It muſt be my love. (one;
Iul. Ha!
Vir. Mine, my onely love,
My everlaſting love:
Pand. How?
Vir. Pray have patience.
The recompence ſhe ask'd, and I have render'd.
Was to become her husband: then I vowed it,
And ſince I have made it good.
Pand. Thou durſt not.
Virol. Done Sir. (with me,
Iul. Be what you pleaſe, his happineſſe yet ſtayes
You have been mine; Oh my unhappy fortune.
Pand. Nay, break and dye;
Iul. It cannot yet: I muſt live;
Till I ſee this man, bleſt in his new love,
And then:
Pand. What haſt thou done? thou baſe one tell me,
Thou barren thing of honeſty, and honour;
What haſt thou wrought? Is not this ſhe, looke on her,
Look on her, with the eyes of gratitude,
And whipe thy falſe teares off; Is not this ſhe,
That three times on the Rack, to guard thy ſafety,
When thou ſtood'ſt loſt, and naked to the Tyrant;
Thy aged Father here, that ſhames to know thee Tirant,
Ingag'd ith' jawes of danger; was not this ſhe,
That then gave up her body to the torture?
That tender body, that the wind ſings through;
And three times, when her ſinewes, crack'd & torter'd,
The beauties of her body turn'd to ruines,
Even then, within her patient heart, ſhe lock'd thee;
Then hid thee from the Tyrant; then preſerv'd thee;
And canſt thou be that ſlave?
Mirtia. This was but duty;
She did it for her Husband, and ſhe ought it;
She has had the pleaſure of him, many an houre;
And if one minutes paine cannot be ſuffer'd;
Mine was above all theſe, a nobler venter,
I ſpeake it boldly, for I loſt a Father.
He has one ſtill; I left my friends, he has many;
Expos'd my life, and honour to a cruelty,
That if it had ſeiz'd on me, racks and tortures;
Alas, they are Triumphs to it: and had it hit,
For this mans love, it ſhould have ſhewed a triumph,
Twiſe loſt, I freed him; Roſſana loſt before him,
His fortunes with him; and his friends behind him:
Twiſe was I rack'd my ſelfe for his deliverance,
In honour firſt and name, which was a torture
The Hang-man never heard of; next at Sea,
In our eſcape, where the proud waves took pleaſure
To toſſe my little Boat up like a Bubble,
Then like meteor in the ayre he hung,
Then catcht, and hug him in the depth of darkneſſe;
The Canon from my incenſed Fathers Ship,
Ringing our Knell, and ſtill as we peep'd upward,
Beating the raging ſurge, with fire and Bullet,
And I ſtood fixt for this mans ſake, and ſcorn'd it;
Compare but this:
Vir. 'Tis too true; O my fortune!
That I muſt equally be bound to either:
Iul. You have the better, and the nobler Lady;
And now I am forc'd, a lover of her goodneſſe.
And ſo far have you wrought for his deliverance,
That is my Lord, ſo lovingly and nobly,
That now me thinks I ſtagger in my Title.
But how with honeſty? for I am poor Lady,
In all my dutious ſervice but your ſhadow,
Yet would be juſt; how with faire fame and credit,
I may goe off; I would not be a ſtrumpet:
O my dear Sir you know:
Vir. O truth, thou knoweſt too.
Iul. Nor have the world ſuſpect, I fell to miſchiefe.
Law. Take you no care for that, here's that has don it;
A faire divorce, 'tis honeſt too.
Pand. The devill,
Honeſt to put her off.
Law. Moſt honeſt Sir,
And in this point, moſt ſtrong.
Pand. The cauſe, the cauſe Sir?
Law. A juſt cauſe too.
Pand. As any is in hell, Lawyer.
Law. For barrenneſſe, ſhe never brought him children.
Pa. Why art not thou divorc'd? thou canſt not get 'em;
Thy neigbours, thy rank neighbours: O baſe jugling,
Is ſhe not young?
Iul. Women at more yeares Sir,
Have met that bleſſing; 'tis in heavens high power.
Law. You never can have any:
Pand. Why quick Lawyer?
My Philoſophicall Lawyer.
Law. The Rack has ſpoil'd her
The diſtentions of thoſe parts, hath ſtopt all fruitfulnes.
Pand. O I could curſe.
Iul. And am I grown ſo miſerable,
That mine own pitty muſt make me wretched?
No cauſe againſt me, but my love and duty?
Farewell Sir, like obedience, thus I leave you,
My long farewell: I doe not grudge, I grieve Sir,
And if that be offenſive, I can dye,
And then you fairely free: good Lady love him;
You have a noble, and an honeſt Gentleman,
I ever found him ſo, the world has ſpoke him;
And let it be your part ſtill to deſerve him:
Love him no leſſe then I have done; and ſerve him,
And heaven ſhall bleſſe you; you ſhall bleſſe my aſhes;
I give you up the houſe; the name of wife,
Honour, and all reſpect I borrowed from him,
And to my grave I turn: one farewell more;
Nothing divide your Loves, not want of Children,
Which I ſhall pray againſt, and make you fruitfull;
Grow like two equall flames, riſe high and glorious;
And in your honor'd age, burn out together:
To all I know, farewell.
Ronver. Be not ſo grie'vd Lady;
A nobler fortune.
Iul. Away thou paraſite.
Diſturbe not my ſad thoughts; I hate thy greatneſſe.
Ron. I hate not you; I am glad ſhe's off theſe hinges, Come, let's purſue. Exit Ronver. and Law.
Pand. If I had breath to curſe thee;
Or could my great heart utter; farewell villaine,
Thy houſe, nor face agen. Exit Pand.
Mar. Let 'em all goe.
And now let us rejoyce; now freely take me,
And now embrace me Virolet; give the rites
Of a brave Husband to his love.
Vir. I'le take my leave too.
Mar. How, take you leave too?
Vir. The houſe is furniſh'd for you;
You are Miſtreſſe, may command.
Mar. Will you to bed Sir?
Vir. As ſoone to hell, to any thing I hate moſt;
You muſt excuſe me, I have kept my word.
You are my wife, you now enjoy my fortune,

Which I have done to recompence your bounty:
But to yeeld up those chaste delights and pleasures,
Which are not mine, but my first vowes.
Mar. You jeast.
Vir. You will not find it so, to give you those;
I have divorc'd, and lost with Iuliana,
And all fires of that nature.
Mar. Are you a Husband;
Vir. To question hers, and satisfie your flames,
That held an equall beauty, equall bounty. (bearance,
Vir. Good heaven forgive; no, no, the strict for-
Of all those joyes, like a full sacrifice,
I offer to the suffrings of my first love;
Honour, and wealth, attendance, state, all duty,
Shall waite upon your will, to make you happy;
But my afflicted mind, you must give leave Lady;
My weary Trunk must wander.
Mari. Not enjoy me?
Goe from me too?
Vir. For ever thus I leave you;
And how so e're I fare, live you still happy. Exit Virol.
Mar. Since I am scorn'd, I'le hate thee, scorn thy gifts
Thou miserable fool, thou fool to pitty; (too;
And such a rude, demolisht thing, I'le leave thee,
In my revenge: for foolish love, farewell now,
And anger, and the spite of woman enter,
That all the world shall say, that read this story,
My hate, and not my love, begot my glory.
Exit Martia.

Actus quartus Scæna prima.

Enter Sess. Boatswaine, Master, Gunner.

Sess.
He that feares death, or tortures, let him leave me.
The stops that we have met with, Crown our Conquest:
Common attempts are fit for common men;
The rare, the rarest spirits. Can we be daunted?
We that have smil'd at Sea at certain ruines,
Which men on shore; but hazarded would shake at
We that have liv'd free, in despite of fortune,
Laught at the out-stretch'd Arme of Tyranny,
As still too short to reach us, shall we faint now?
No my brave mates, I know your fiery temper,
And that you can, and dare, as much as men:
Calamity, that severs worldly friendships,
Could ne'r divide us, you are still the same;
The constant followers of my banisht fortunes;
The Instruments of my revenge; the hands
By which I work, and fashion all my projects.
Mast. And such we will be ever.
Gun. 'Slitt Sir, Cramme me
Into a Canons mouth, and shoot me at Proud Ferrands head; may onely he fall with me,
My life I rate at nothing.
Boatsw. Could I but get,
Within my swords length of him; and if then
He scape me, may th'account of all his sinnes
Be added unto mine.
Mast. 'Tis not to dye Sir,
But to dye unreveng'd, that staggers me:
For were your ends serv'd, and our Country free,
We would fall willing sacrifices.
Sess. To rise up,
Most glorious Martyrs.
Boats. But the reason why
We weare these shapes?
Sess. Onely to get accesse:
Like honest men, we never shall approach him,
Such are his feares, but thus attir'd like Switzers,
And fashioning our language to our habits;
Bold, bloody, desperate, we may be admitted
Among his guard. But if this faile, I'le try
A thousand others, out doe Proteus
In various shapes, but I will reach his heart.
And seale my anger on't. Enter Romero and the Guard.
Mast. The Lord Romero.
Boats. Shall we begin with him?
Sess. He is not ripe yet,
Nor fit to fall: as you see me begin,
Withall care imitate.
Gun. We are instructed.
Boats. Would we were at it once.
Rom. Keepe a strict watch,
And let the guards be doubled, this last night
The King had fearefull dreames.
Sess. 'Tis a good Omen
To our attempts.
Romer. What men are these? What seek you?
Sess. Imployment.
Romer. Of what nature?
Sess. We are Souldiers;
We have seen townes and Churches set on fire;
The Kennels runing blood, coy virgins ravish'd;
The Altars ransack'd, and the holy reliques,
Yea, and the Saints themselves, made lawfull spoyles,
Unto the Conquerors: but these good dayes are past,
And we made Beggars, by this idle Peace,
For want of action. I am Sir no stranger
To the Government of this state, I know the King
Needs men, that one'y dare what he commands,
And search no further: 'tis the profession
Of all our Nation, to serve faithfully,
Where th'are best payed: and if you entertaine us,
I doe not know the thing you can command,
Which we'le not put in act.
Romer. A goodly Parsonage.
Mast. And if you have an Enemy, or so
That you would have dispatch'd.
Gun. They are here, can fit you.
Boats. Or if there be an Itch, though to a man,
Sess. You shall tye
Our consciences in your purse-strings.
Romer. Gentlemen,
I like your freedome: I am now in haste,
But waite for my return. I like the Rascals,
They may be usefull.
Ses. We'l attend you Sir:
Romer. Doe; and be confident of entertainment;
I hope ye will deserve it. Exit Romer. and Guard.
Ses. O, no doubt Sir:
Thus farre we are prosperous; we'l be his guard,
Till Tyranny and pride finde full reward: Exeunt.

Enter Pandulfo, and Juliana.

Pand. My blessing? no; a Fathers heavy curse,
Pursue, and overtake him.
Jul. Gentle Sir.
Pand. My name, and Family, end in my self
Rather then live in him.
Iul. Deare Sir forbeare,
A fathers curses hit far off, and kill too,

And

And like a murthering-piece aymes not at one;
But all that ſtand within the dangerous level.
Some bullet may return upon your ſelfe too,
Though againſt nature, if you ſtill go on
In this unnaturall courſe.
Pand. Thou art not made
Of that ſame ſtuffe as other women are:
Thy injuries would teach patience to blaſpheme;
Yet ſtill thou art a Dove.
Jul. I know not malice, but like an innocent, ſuffer.
Pand. More miraculous!
Ile have a women Chronicled, and for goodneſſe,
Which is the greateſt wonder. Let me ſee,
I have no ſonne to inherit after me;
Him I diſclaime.
What then? Ile make thy vertues my fole heire;
Thy ſtory Ile have written, and in Gold too;
In proſe and verſe, and by the ableſt doers:
A word or two of a kind ſtep-father
Ile have put in, good Kings and Queens ſhal buy it.
And if the actions of ill great women,
And of the modern times too, are remembred,
That have undone their husbands, and their families,
What will our ſtory do? It ſhal be ſo,
And I wil ſtreight about it. Exit Pand.

Enter Boy.

Jul. Such as love
Goodneſſe for glory, have it for reward;
I love mine for it ſelfe: let innocence
Be written on my Tomb, though we're ſo humble,
Tis all I am ambitious of. But I
Forget my vows.
Boy. 'Fore me, you are not modeſt,
Nor is this Court like. Would you take it wel,
If ſhe ſhould rudely preſſe into your Cloſet,
When from your ſeveral Boxes you chooſe paint,
To make a this daies face with?
Jul. What's the matter?
Boy. Pray know her pleaſure firſt.
Jul. To whom ſpeak you Boy?
Boy. Your Ladiſhips pardon. That proud Lady theiſe,
That ſtole away my Lord from your embraces, (Wrinckes at two and twenty on her cheekes for't,
Or Mercury unallayed, make bliſters on it)
Would force a viſit.
Jul. And dare you deny her,
Or any elſe that I call mine? No more,
Attend her with all reverence and reſpect;
The want in you of manners, my Lord may Conſtrue in me for malice. I wil teach you
How to eſteem and love the beauty he dotes on;
Prepare a banquet. Exeunt Martia and Boy.
Madam, thus my duty
Stoops to the favour you vouchſafe your ſervant,
In honouring her houſe.
Mart. Is this in ſcorn?
Jul. No by the life of Virolet: give me leave
To ſweare by him, as by a Saint I worſhip,
But as I know no further, my heart ſpeaks that My ſervants have been rude, and this boy (doting Upon my ſorrows) hath forgot his duty:
In which, that you may think I have no ſhare,
Sirra, upon your knees, deſire her pardon.
Boy. I dare not diſobey you.
Mart. Prethee riſe,
My anger never looks ſo low: I thank you.
And wil deſerve it, If we may be private,
I come to ſee and ſpeak with you.
Jul. Be gone. Exit Boy.
Good Madam ſit.
Mart. I rob you of your place then.
Jul. You have deſerv'd a better, in my bed;
Make uſe of this too: Now your pleaſure Lady.
If in your breaſt there be a worthy pitty,
That brings you for my comfort, you do nobly:
But if you come to triumph in your conqueſt,
Or tread on my calamities, 'twil wrong
Your other excellencies. Let it ſuffice,
That you alone enjoy the beſt of men,
And that I am forſaken.
Mart. He the beſt?
The ſcum and ſhame of mankind.
Jul. Virolet, Lady?
Mart. Bleſt in him? I would my youth had choſen
Conſuming feavers, bed-rid age
For my companions, rather then a thing
To lay whoſe baſeneſſe open, would even poyſon
The tongue that ſpeaks it.
Jul. Certainly from you
At no part he deſerves this; and I tell you,
Durſt I pretend but the leaſt title to him,
I ſhould not hear this.
Mart. He's an impudent villaine,
Or a malicious wretch: to you ungratefull;
To me, beyond expreſſion barbarous.
I more then hate him; from you, he deſerves
A death moſt horrid: from me, to die for ever,
And know no end of torments. Would you have comfort?
Would you waſh off the ſtain that ſticks upon you,
In being refuſ'd? Would you redeem your fame,
Shipwrack'd in his baſe wrongs? if you deſire this,
It is not to be done with laviſh ſuffering,
But by a Noble anger, making way
To a moſt brave revenge, we may call juſtice;
Our injuries are equal; joyn with me then,
And ſhare the honour.
Jul. I ſcarce underſtand you,
And know I ſhal be moſt unapt to learn
To hate the man I ſtil muſt love and honour.
Mar. This fooliſh dotage in ſoft-hearted women,
Makes proud men inſolent: but take your way,
Ile run another courſe.
Jul. As you are noble,
Deliver his offence.
Mart. He has denied
The rites due to a wife.
Jul. O me moſt happy,
How largely am I payd for all my ſufferings?
Moſt honeſt Virolet, thou juſt performer
Of all thy promiſes: I call to mind now,
When I was happy in thoſe joyes you ſpeak of,
In a chaſt bed, and warranted by Law too,
He oft would ſwear, that if he ſhould ſurvive me,
(Which then I knew he wiſht not) never woman
Should taſte of his imbraces; this one act
Makes me again his debtor.
Mart. And was this
The cauſe my youth and beauty were contemn'd?
If I ſit down here! wel —
Jul. I dare thy worſt,
Plot what thou canſt, my piety ſhal guard him
Againſt thy malice. Leave my houſe and quickly,
Thou wilt infect theſe innocent walls. By vertue
I wil inform him of thy bloody purpoſe,
And turn it on thine own accurſed head;
Believ't I wil. Exit Juliana.

Mart.

Mart. But tis not in thy power
To hinder what I have decreed againſt him.
Ile ſet my ſelfe to ſale, and live a ſtrumpet;
Forget my birth, my father, and his honour,
Rather then want an inſtrument to help me Enter
In my revenge. The Captain of the guard; Ronvere.
Bleſt opportunity courts me.

Ron. Sad and troubled?
How brave her anger ſhews? how it ſets off
Her naturall beauty? under what happy ſtar
Was Virolet born, to be belov'd and ſought to,
By two incomparable women? Nobleſt Lady,
I have heard your wrongs and pity them: and if
The ſervice of my life could give me hope
To gain your favour, I ſhould be moſt proud
To be commanded.

Mart. Tis in you, my Lord,
To make me your glad ſervant.

Ron. Name the means.

Mar. Tis not preferment, Jewels, Gold, or Courtſhip.
He that deſires to reap the harveſt of
My youth and beauty, muſt begin in blood,
And right my wrongs.

Ron. I apprehend you Madam,
And reſt aſſur'd tis done; I am provided
Of inſtruments to fit you: To the King,
Ile inſtantly preſent you; if I faile,
He ſhal make good your aymes: he's leſſe then man,
That to atchieve your favour, would not doe
Deeds, friends would fear to put their agents to. Exeunt.

Enter Virolet Reading.

Vir. Quod invitus facis, non eſt ſcelus. Tis an axiome,
Now whether willingly I have departed
With that I lov'd: with that, above her life
Lov'd me again, crownd me a happy husband,
Was full of children: her afflictions
That I begot, that when our age muſt periſh,
And all our painted frailties turn to aſhes,
Then ſhal they ſtand and propagate our honors.
Whether this done, and taking to protection
A new ſtrange beauty, it was a uſeful one:
How to my luſt? if it be ſo, I am ſinful;
And guilty of that crime I would fling from me.
Was there not in it this fair courſe of vertue?
This pious courſe, to ſave my friends, my Countrey,
That even then had put on a mourning garment,
And wept the deſolation of her children?
Her nobleſt children? Did not ſhe thruſt me on,
And to my duty clapt the ſpur of honour?
Was there a way, without this woman, left me
To bring 'em off? the marrying of this woman?
If not, why am I ſtung thus? why tormented?
Or had there been a wild deſire joyn'd with it,
How eaſily, both theſe, and all their beauties
Might I have made mine own? why am I toucht thus,
Having perform'd the great redemption,
Both of my friends and family? fairly done it?
Without baſe and laſcivious ends: O Heaven,
Why am I ſtill at war thus? why this a miſchiefe,
That honeſty and honour had propounded,
I, and abſolv'd my tender wil, and chid me,
Nay then unwillingly ſtung me on.

Enter Juliana, and the Boy.

Boy. He's here Madam;
This is the melancholy walk he lives in,
And chooſes ever to encreaſe his ſadneſſe.

Jul. Stand by,

Vir. Tis ſhe: how I ſhake now and tremble?
The vertues of that mind are torments to me.

Jul. Sir, if my hated face ſhal ſtir your anger,
Or this forbidden path I tread in vex you;
My love, and faire obedience left behind me,
Your pardon asked, I ſhal return and bleſſe you.

Vir. Pray ſtay a little, I delight to ſee you;
May not we yet, though fortune have divided us,
And ſet an envious ſtop between our pleaſures,
Look thus one at another? ſigh and weep thus?
And read in one anothers eyes, the Legends,
And wonders of our old loves? be not fearful,
Though you be now a Saint, I may adore you:
May I not take this hand, and on it ſacrifice
The ſorrows of my heart? white ſeale of vertue.

Jul. My Lord, you wrong your wedlock.

Vir. Were ſhe here,
And with her all ſevere eyes to behold us,
We might do this; I might name Julian,
And to the reverence of that name, bow thus:
I might ſigh Juliana, ſhe was mine once;
But I too weak a guard for that great Treaſure—
And whilſt ſhe has a name, believe me Lady,
This broken heart ſhal never want a ſorrow.

Jul. Forget her ſir, your honour now commands you.
You are anothers, keep thoſe griefes for her,
She richly can reward 'em. I would have ſpoken with you

Vir. What is your wil? for nothing you can aske,
So ful of goodneſſe are your words and meanings,
Muſt be denied: ſpeak boldly.

Jul. I thank you ſir. I come not
To beg, or flatter, onely to be believ'd,
That I deſire: for I ſhal tell a ſtory,
So far from ſeeming truth, yet a moſt true one;
So horrible in nature, and ſo horrid;
So beyond wickedneſſe, that when you heare it,
It muſt appeare the practice of another,
The caſt & malice of ſome one you have wrongd much;
And me, you may imagine me accus'd to,
Unleſſe you call to mind my daily ſufferings;
The infinite obedience I have born you,
That hates all name and nature of revenge.
My love, that nothing but my death can ſever,
Rather then hers I ſpeak of.

Vir. Juliana,
To make a doubt of what you ſhall deliver,
After my full experience of your vertues,
Were to diſtruſt a providence; to think you can lie,
Or being wrong'd, ſeek after foule repairings,
To forge a Creed againſt my faith.

Jul. I muſt do ſo, for it concernes your life ſir;
And if that word may ſtir you, heare and proſper:
I ſhould be dumb elſe, were not you at ſtake here.

Vir. What new friend have I found, that dares deliver
This loden Trunke from his afflictions?
What pitying hand, of all that feeles my miſeries,
Brings ſuch a benefit?

Jul. Be wiſe and manly,
And with your honour fall, when Heaven ſhall call you,
Not by a Helliſh miſchiefe.

Vir. Speak my bleſt one,
How weak and poor I am, now ſhe is from me?

Jul. Your wife.

Viro. How's that?

Jul. Your wife.

Vir. Be tender of her, I ſhal believe elſe—

Jul. I muſt be true: your eare, ſir;

For

For tis so horrible, if the ayre catch it,
Into a thousand plagues, a thousand monsters,
It will disperse it selfe, and fright resistance,
Viro. She seeke my life with you? make you her agent?
Another love? O speake but truth.
Jul. Be patient,
Deare as I love you, else I leave you wretched.
Vir. Forward, tis well, it shal be welcome to me;
I have liv'd too long, numbred too many daies,
Yet never found the benefit of living;
Now when I come to reap it with my service,
And hunt for that my youth and honour aimes at,
The Sunne sets on my fortune red and bloody,
And everlasting night begins to close me.
Tis time to die. Enter Martia and Romero.
Jul. She comes her selfe.
Rom. Believe Lady,
And on this Angel hand, your servant seales it,
You shal be Mistris of your whole desires,
And what ye shal command.
Mart. Ha' mynion,
My precious dame, are you there? nay go forward,
Make your complaints, and poure out your faind pities,
Slave, like to him you serve: I am the same still,
And what I purpose, let the world take witnesse,
Shal be so finisht, and to such example,
Spite of your poore preventions; my deare Gentleman,
My honourable man, are you there too?
You and your hot desire? Yout mercy sir,
I had forgot your greatnesse.
Jul. Tis not wel Lady. (rately
Mart. Lord, how I hate this fellow now; how despe-
My stomack stands against him, this base fellow,
This gelded foole!
Jul. Did you never heare of modesty?
Mart. Yes, when I heard of you and so believ'd it,
Thou bloodlesse, brainlesse foole.
Vir. How?
Mart. Thou despis'd foole,
Thou onely sign of man, how I contemn thee!
Thou woven worthy in a piece of Arras,
Fit onely to enjoy a wall; thou beast
Beaten to use; Have I preserv'd a beauty,
A youth, a love, to have my wishes blasted?
My dotings, and the joyes I came to offer,
Must they be lost, and slighted by a dormouse?
Jul. Use more respect; and woman, twill become you;
At least, lesse tongue.
Mart. Ile use all violence,
Let him look for't.
Jul. Dare you staine those beauties,
Those Heavenly stamps, that raise men up to wonder,
With harsh and crooked motions? are you she
That overdid all ages, with your honour;
And in a little houre dare lose this triumph?
Is not this man your husband?
Mart. He's my halter;
Which (having fired my pardon) I fling off thus,
And with him all I brought him, but my anger,
Which I will nourish to the desolation,
Not onely of his folly, but his friends,
And his whole name.
Vir. Tis wel, I have deserv'd it.
And if I were a woman, I would raile too.
Mart. Nature here promis'd thee a thing so Noble.
Take back your love, your vow, I give it freely,
I poorly scorn it; graze now where you please:
That that the dulnesse of thy soule neglected,
Kings sue for now. And mark me, Virolet;
Thou image of a man, observe my words well.
At such a bloody rate Ile sell this beauty,
This handsomnesse thou scornst, and slightst away,
Thy proud ungrateful life shal shake at: take your house;
The petty things you left me give another;
And last, take home your trinket: fare you wel, sir.
Rom. You have spoke like your selfe;
Y'are a brave Lady. Exeunt Romero and Martia.
Jul. Why do you smile, sir?
Vir. O my Juliana,
The happinesse this womans scorn has given me,
Makes me a man again; proclaimes it selfe,
In such a generall joy, through all my miseries,
That now methinks —
Jul. Looke to your selfe deere sir,
And trifle not with danger, that attends you;
Be joyfull when y'are free.
Vir. Did you not heare her?
She gave me back my vow, my love, my freedom;
I am free, free as aire; and though to morrow
Her bloody wil meet with my life, and sink it,
And in her execution teare me peecemeale:
Yet have I time once more to meet my wishes,
Once more to embrace my best, my noblest, truest;
And time that's warranted.
Jul. Good sir, forbeare it:
Though I confesse, equall with your desires
My wishes rise, as covetous of your love,
And to as warm alarams spur my wil to:
Yet pardon me, the Seal oth' Church dividing us;
And hanging like a threatning flame between us;
We must not meet, I dare not.
Vir. That poore disjoynting
That onely strong necessity thrust on you;
Not crime, nor studied cause of mine: how sweetly,
And nobly I wil bind again and cherish;
How I wil recompence one deare imbrace now,
One free affection! how I burn to meet it!
Looke now upon me.
Jul. I behold you willingly,
And willingly would yield, but for my credit.
The love you first had was preserv'd with honour,
The last shal not cry whore; you shal not purchase
From me a pleasure, that have equally
Lov'd your faire fame as you, at such a rate:
Your honesty and vertue must be banquerout,
If I had lov'd your lust, and not your lustre;
The glorious lustre of your matchlesse goodnesse,
I would compel you now to be! — forgive me,
Forgive me sir; how fondly stil I love you!
Yet Nobly too; make the way straight before me,
And let but holy Hymen once more guide me,
Under the Ax, upon the Rack again,
Even in the bed of all afflictions,
Where nothing sings our Nuptials but dire sorrows,
With all my youth and pleasure Ile imbrace you,
Make tyranny and death stand stil affrighted,
And at our meeting soules amaze our mischiefes;
Til when, high Heaven defend you, and peace guide you.
Be wise and manly, make your fate your own,
By being master of a providence,
That may controle it.
Vir. Stay a little with me,
My thoughts have child themselves: may I not kisse you?
Upon my truth I am honest.
Jul. I believe ye;
But yet what that may raise in both our fancies,

What

What iſſues ſuch warm parents breed.
Vir. I obey you,
And take my leave as from the Saint that keeps me.
I will be right again, and once more happy
In thy unimitable love.
Jul. Ile pray for ye,
And when you fall I have not long to follow. Exeunt.

Enter Seſſe, Maſter, Boteſwaine, and Gunner, at one doore: Martia and Ronvere, at another.

Seſ. Now we have got free credit with the Captaine.
Maſt. Soft, ſoft, he's here again: Is not that Lady —
Or have I loſt mine eyes? a ſalt rhume ſeizes 'em;
But I ſhould know that face.
Botſ. Make him not madder,
Let him forget the woman; ſteere a lar boord.
Maſt. He wil not kill her.
Botſ. Any thing he meets;
He's like a Hornet now, he hums, and buzzes;
Nothing but blood and horror.
Maſt. I would ſave the Lady,
For ſuch another Lady.
Botſ. There's the point;
Aud you know there want women of her mettle.
Maſt. Tis true, they bring ſuch children now,
Such demilances,
Their fathers ſocks wil make them Chriſtning clothes.
Gun. No more, they view us.
Seſ. You ſhal play a while,
And ſun your ſelfe in this felicity,
You ſhal you glorious whore; I know you ſtill.
But I ſhal pick an houre when moſt ſecurely —
I ſay no more.
Ron. Do you ſee thoſe? thoſe are they Shall act your will; come hither my good fellows:
You are now the Kings. Are they not goodly fellows?
Mart. They have bone enough, if they have ſtout heart (to it.
Maſt. Still the old wench.
Seſſ. Pray Captaine, let me aske you
What Noble Lady's that? tis a rude queſtion,
But I deſire to know.
Ron. She is for the King, ſir;
Let that ſuffice for anſwer.
Seſſ. Is ſhe ſo ſir?
In good time may ſhe curſe it.
Muſt I breed hackneys for his grace?
Ron. What wouldſt thou do
To merit ſuch a Ladies favour?
Seſſ. Any thing.
Ron. That can ſupply thy wants, and raiſe thy fortuns?
Seſ. Let her command, and ſee what I dare execute.
I keep my conſcience here; if any man
Oppoſe her wil, and ſhe would have him humbled,
Whole families between her and her wiſhes —
Maſt. We have ſeen bleeding throats ſir, Cities ſackt,
And infants ſtuck upon their Pikes.
Boteſ. Houſes a fire, and handſome mothers weeping.
Seſ. Which we have heaped upon the pile like ſacrifices.
Churches and Altars, Prieſts and all devotions,
Tumbled together into one rude Chaos.
Gun. We know no feare ſir, but want of imployment.
Seſſ. Nor other faith but what our purſes preach.
To gain our ends we can do any thing,
And turn our ſoules into a thouſand figures;
But when we come to do —
Mart. I like theſe fellowes.
Ron. Be ready and waite here within this houre
Ile ſhew you to the King, and he ſhall like ye:
And if you can deviſe ſome entertainment
To fill his mirth, ſuch as your Countrey uſes,
Preſent it, and Ile ſee it grac'd.
After this Comicke Scene we ſhall imploy you,
For one muſt die.
Seſſ. What is he ſir? ſpeak boldly,
For we dare boldly do.
Ron. This Ladies husband;
His name is Virolet.
Seſ. We ſhall diſpatch it. Exit Martia, Ronvere.
O damned, damned thing: a baſe whore firſt,
And then a murtherer; Ile look to you.
Botſ. Can ſhe be grown ſo ſtrange?
Seſ. She has an itch;
Ile ſcratch you my deare daughter, Ile ſo claw you;
Ile curry your hot hide; married and honour'd?
And turn thoſe holy bleſſings into brothels?
Your beauty into blood? Ile hunt your hotheſſe.
Ile hunt you like a traine.
Maſt. We did all pity her.
Seſ. Hang her, ſhe is not worth mans memory;
She's falſe and baſe, and let her fright all ſtories.
Wel, though thou beeſt mine enemy, Ile right thee,
And right thee Nobly.
Botſ. Faith ſir, ſince ſhe muſt goe,
Let's ſpare as few as may be.
Seſ. We'l take all,
And like a torrent ſweep the ſlaves before us.
You dare endure the worſt?
Maſt. You know our hearts ſir,
And they ſhal bleed the laſt, erſt we ſtart from ye.
Gun. We can but die, and ere we come to that,
We ſhal pick out ſome few examples for us.
Seſ. Then wait the firſt occaſion, and like Curtius,
Ile leap the gulph before you, fearleſſe leap it:
Then follow me like men, and if our vertues
May boy our Countrey up, and ſet her ſhining
In her firſt ſtate; our fair revenges taken,
We have our Noble ends, or elſe our aſhes. Exeunt.

Actus quintus, Scæna prima.

Enter Aſcanio and Martia above.

Mart. As you are Noble, keep me from diſcovery,
And let me onely run a ſtrangers fortune;
For when the King ſhall find I am his daughter
He ever holds moſt ominous, and hates moſt:
With what eyes can he look, how entertain me,
But with his feares and cruelties?
Aſc. I have found you,
Suſpect not. I am bound to what you like beſt,
What you intend. I dare not be ſo curious
To queſtion now; and what you are, lies hid here.
Enter Ferand and Ronvere above.
The King comes, make your fortune, I ſhall joy in't.
Ron. All things are ready ſir to make you merry,
And ſuch a King you ſhall behold him now.
Fer. I long for't,
For I have need of mirth.
Ron. The Lady ſir.
Fer. Now as I am a King, a ſprightly beauty,
A goodly ſweet aſpect! my thanks Ronvere,
My beſt thanks; on your lips I ſeale your wiſhes,
Be what you can imagine mine, and happy.

And

And now ſit downe and ſmile; come my Aſcanio;
And let this Monarch enter. Enter Seſſ. and Mr. Boriſw.
Rover. Theſe are the Switzers. Gunner, and Saylers.
I told your grace of.
Fer. Goodly promiſing fellowes,
With faces to keep fooles in awe, I like 'em;
Goe guard the preſence well, and doe your duties,
To morrow I ſhall take a further view:
Seſſ. You ſhall Sir,
Or I ſhall looſe my will; how the whore's mounted?
How ſhe ſits thron'd? thou blaſing muddy meteor,
That frighteſt the underworld, with luſtfull flaſhes,
How I ſhall daſh thy flames? away, no word more:
Ex. Seſſ. and his company. Floriſh Cor.

Enter Villi, Caſtruchio, Doctor, and a guard.

Fer. Now, here he comes in glory, be merry Maſters, meat
A Banquet too? conveyed away.
Ron. O, he muſt ſit in State Sir!
Aſca. How rarely he is uſher'd? can he thinke now
He is a King indeed?
Ron. Mark but his countenance.
Caſt. Let me have pleaſures infinite, and to the height,
And women in abundance, many women, Enter Ladies.
I will diſport my grace,
Stand there and long for me.
What have ye brought me here? is this a Feaſt
Fit for a Prince? a mighty Prince? are theſe things,
Theſe preparations, ha?
Doct. May it pleaſe your grace? (Marchpanes, Caſt. It does not pleaſe my grace: where are the
The Cuſtards double royall, and the ſubtleties?
Why, what weak things are you to ſerve a Prince thus?
Where be the delicates oth' earth and ayre?
The hidden ſecrets of the Sea? am I a Plow-man,
You pop me up with porridge? hang the Cooks.
Fer. O moſt Kingly:
What a majeſtique anger.
Caſt. Give me ſome wine.
Aſca. He cooles agen now.
Caſt. Foole, where are my Players?
Let me have all in pomp; let 'em play ſome love matter,
To make the Ladies itch, I'le be with you anon Ladies;
You black eyes, I'le be with you
Give me ſome wine I ſay,
And let me have a Maſque of Cuckolds enter:
Of mine own Cuckolds,
And let 'em come in, peeping and rejoycing.
Juſt as I kiſſe their wives, and ſomewhat glorying.
Some wine I ſay, then for an excellent night-peece,
To ſhew my glory to my loves, and minions:
I will have ſome great Caſtle burnt.
Vil. Harke you brother:
If that be to pleaſe theſe Ladies, tenne to one
The fire firſt takes upon your own, look to that;
Then you may ſhew a night peece.
Caſt. Where's this wine?
Why ſhall I choak? doe yee long all to be tortur'd?
Doct. Here Sir.
Caſt. Why, what is this; why Doctor,
Wine and water Sir.
Doct. 'Tis Soveraign for your heat, you muſt endure it.
Vil. Moſt excellent to coole your nigh-peece Sir.
Doct. You are of a high and cholericke complexion,
And you muſt have allayes.
Caſt. Shall I have no cheere wine then?
Doct. Not for a world: I tender your deare life Sir;
And he is no faithfull Subject——
Vil. No, by no meanes:
Of this you may drinke; and never hang, nor quarter,
Nor never whip the fool, this liquors mercifull.
Caſt. I will ſit down and eat then: Kings when th'are
May eat I hope. (hungry,
Doct. Yes, but they eat diſcreetly.
Caſt. Come, taſte this diſh, and cut me liberally;
I like ſauce well.
Doct. Fie 'tis too hot Sir:
Too deeply ſeaſon'd with the ſpice, away with 't,
You muſt acquaint your ſtomack with thoſe diets
Are temperately nouriſhing.
Caſt. But pray ſtay Doctor,
And let me have my meat agen.
Doct. By no meanes:
I have a charge concerns my life.
Caſt. No meat neither;
Doe Kings never eat Doctor?
Doct. Very little Sir.
And that too very choice.
Vil. Your King never ſleeps Brother,
He muſt not ſleep, his cares ſtill keep him waking.
Now he that eats and drinkes much, is a dormouſe;
The third part of a water, is a weeks diet.
Caſt. Appoint me ſomething then.
Doct. There.
Caſt. This I feel good,
But it melts too ſuddainly; yet, how, that gone too!
Ye are not mad! I charge you: take away.
Doct. For your health Sir,
A little quickens nature, much depreſſes.
Caſt. Eat nothing for my health? that's a new dyet;
Let me have ſomething, ſomething has ſome ſavour.
Why thou uncourteous Doctor, ſhall I hang thee?
Doct. 'Tis better Sir, then I ſhould let you ſurfet;
My death were nothing.
Vil. To looſe a King, were terrible. (monies.
Caſt. Nay, then I'le carve my ſelf, I'le ſtay no cere-
This is a Partridge Pye, I am ſure that's nouriſhing,
Or Galen is an Aſſe: 'tis rarely ſeaſon'd:
Ha Doctor have I hit right? a mark, a mark there?
Vil. What ailes thy grace?
Caſt. Retrive thoſe Partridges.
Or as I am a King——
Doct. Pray Sir be patient,
They are flowen too farre.
Vil. Theſe are breath'd pyes an't pleaſe you,
And your hawkes are ſuch Buzzards.
Caſt. A King and have nothing,
Nor can have nothing!
Vil. What think you of pudding?
A pudding Royall?
Caſt. To be royally ſtarv'd,
Whip me this foole to death; he is a blockhead. (King:
Vil. Let 'em think they whip me, as we think you a
'Twill be enough. (away,
Caſt. As for you dainty Doctor, the Table taken
All gone, all ſnatch'd away, and I unſatisfied,
Without my wits being a King and hungry?
Suffer but this thy treaſon? I tell thee Doctor,
I tell it thee, in earneſt, and in anger,
I am damnably hungry, my very grace is hungry.
Vil. A hungry grace is fitteſt to no meale Sir.
Doct. Some two houres hence, you ſhall ſee more: but You muſt retaine a ſtrict and excellent dyet. (ſtill Sir,
Vil. It ſharpens you, and makes your wit ſo poynant,
Your very words will kill.

Doct. A bit of Marmalade
No bigger then a Peaſe.
Vil. And that well butter'd,
The ayre thrice purified, and three times ſpirited,
Becomes a King: your rare conſerve of nothing
Breeds no offence.
Caſt. Am I turn'd King Camelion,
And keep my Court ith' ayr?
Fer. They vex him cruelly.
Aſca. In two dayes more they'l ſtarve him.
Fer. Now the women, there's no food left but they.
Aſca. They'l prove ſmall nouriſhment.
Yet h'as another ſtomack and a great one,
I ſee by his eye.
Caſt. I'le have mine own power here;
Mine own Authority; I need no tutor.
Doctor this is no dyet.
Doct. It may be Sir
Vil. Birlady, it may turne to a dry dyet;
And how thy grace, will ward that—
Caſt. Stand off Doctor;
And talke to thoſe that want faith,
Fer. Hot and mighty.
Aſca. He will coole apace, no doubt.
Caſt. Faire, plump, and red,
A forehead high; an eye revives the dead;
A lip like ripeſt fruit, inviting ſtill.
Vil. But O, the ruſhy well, below the hill,
Take heed of that, for though it never faile
Take heed I ſay, for thereby hangs a taile.
Caſt. I'le get ye all with Childe.
Vil. With one Childe Brother,
So many men in a Blew Coat.
Caſt. Had I fed well.
And drunk good ſtore of wine, ye had been bleſt all,
Bleſt all with double Births; come kiſſe me greedily,
And think no more upon your fooliſh Husbands,
They are tranſitory things: a Kings fame meets you, Doct. Vaniſh away. Ex. Women.
Caſt. How, they gone too? my guard there:
Take me this deviſh Doctor, and that foole there,
And ſow 'em in a ſack; bring back the women,
The lovely women, drown theſe rogues or hang 'em.
Aſca. He is in earneſt Sir.
Fer. In ſerious earneſt, Enter Seſſ. Maſter,
I muſt needs take him off. Boatſw. Gunner
Seſſ. Now, now be free. and Saylors.
Now liberty, now Country-men, ſhake from ye
The Tyrants yoake.
All Liberty, liberty, liberty.
Guard. Treaſon, treaſon, treaſon.
Fer. We are betrayed, fly to the town, cry treaſon,
And raiſe our faithfull friends; O my Aſcanio.
Aſca. Make haſte, we have way enough.
Guard. Treaſon, treaſon. Ex. Fer. Aſca. and guard.
Seſſ. Spare none, put all to th' ſword: a vengeance ſhake thee;
Art thou turn'd King againe?
Caſt. I am a raſcall:
Spare me but this time, if ever I ſee King more,
Or once beleeve in King.
Seſſ. The ports are ours.
The treaſure and the port, fight bravely Gentlemen;
Cry to the Town, cry liberty and honour;
Waken their perſecuted ſoules, cry loudly, One of crying
We'l ſhare the wealth among ye. Liberty and Caſt. Doe you heare Captaine? freedome.
If ever you heare me, name a King.
Seſſ. You ſhall not.
Caſt. Or though I live under one, obey him.
Gun. This rogue againe.
Seſſ. Away with him good Gunner.
Caſt. Why look ye Sir? I'le put you to no charge;
I'le never eat.
Gun. I'le take a courſe, you ſhall not.
Come, no more words. Enter Boatſw.
Caſt. Say nothing when you kill me.
Seſſ. He's taken to the Towers ſtrength;
Now ſtand ſure Gentlemen.
We have him in a pen, he cannot ſcape us,
The reſt oth' Caſtle's ours; liberty, liberty:
What is this City up?
Boatſw. They are up and glorious,
And rouling like a ſtorm they come; their Tents
Ring nothing but liberty and freedome.
The women are in Arms too.
Seſſ. Let 'em come all.
Honour and liberty.
All. Honour and liberty. Exeunt.

Enter Iuliana.

Jul. This womans threats, her eyes, even red with fury
Which like prodigious meteors, foretold
Aſſur'd deſtruction, are ſtill before me.
Beſides I know ſuch natures unacquainted
With any meane, or in their love, or hatred,
And ſhe that dar'd all dangers to poſſeſſe him,
Will check at nothing, to revenge the loſſe
Of what ſhe held ſo deare, I firſt diſcover'd
Her bloody purpoſes, which ſhe made good.
And openly profeſs'd 'em; that in me
Was but a cold affection, charity
Commands ſo much to all; for Virolet
Me thinks I ſhould forget my Sexes weakneſſe,
Riſe up, and dare beyond a womans ſtrength:
Then doe, not counſell: he is too ſecure,
And in my judgement, 'twere a greater ſervice
To free him from a deadly Enemy,
Then to get him a friend. I undertooke too,
To croſſe her plots, oppos'd my piety,
Againſt her malice; and ſhall vertue ſuffer?
No Martia, wer't thou here equally armed,
I have a cauſe, ſpite of thy maſculine breeding,
That would aſſure the victory: my angell
Direct and help me. Enter Virolet, like Romero.
Vir. The State in Combuſtion,
Part of the Cittadell forc'd, the treaſure ſeiz'd on;
The guards corrupted, arme themſelves againſt
Their late protected Maſter; Ferrant fled too;
And with ſmall ſtrength, into the Caſtles Tower,
The onely Aventine, that now is left him?
And yet the undertakers, nay, performers,
Of ſuch a brave and glorious enterprize,
Are yet unknown: they did proceed like men,
I like a childe; and had I never truſted
So deep a practiſe unto ſhallow fools,
Beſides my ſoules peace, in my Iuliana,
The honour of this action had been mine,
In which, accurs'd, I now can claime no ſhare.
Iul. Romero! 'tis he, a thing, next to the devill
I moſt deteſt, and like him terrible;
Martia's right hand, the Inſtrument I feare too,
That is to put her bloody will into act.
Have I not will enough, and cauſe too mighty?
Weake womens fear, fly from me.

Vir. Sure

Vir. Sure this habit,
This likeneſſe to Romvere which I have ſtudied,
Either admits me ſafe to my deſigne,
Which I too cowardly have halted after,
And ſuffer'd to be raviſh't from my glory;
Or ſincks me and my miſeries together;
Either concludes me happy.
Iul. He ſtands muſing,
Some miſchiefe is now hatching:
In the full meditation, of his wickneſſe,
I'le ſink his curſed ſoule: guid my hand heaven,
And to my tender arm give ſtrength and fortun,
That I may doe a pious deed all ages
Shall bleſſe my name for; all remembrance Crown me.
Vir. It ſhall be ſo.
Jul. It ſhall not, take that token,
And beare it the luſtfull Arms of Martia,
Tell her, for Virolets deare ſake, I ſent it.
vir. O I am happy, let me ſee thee,
That I may bleſſe the hand that gave me liberty,
O courteous hand, nay, thou haſt done moſt nobly,
And heaven has guided thee, 'twas their great juſtice;
O bleſſed wound, that I could come to kiſſe thee!
How beautifull, and ſweet thou ſheweſt!
Jul. Oh!
Vir. Sighe not,
Nor weep not Deare, ſhed not thoſe ſoveraign Balſoms
Into my blood; which muſt recover me;
Then I ſhall live again, to doe a miſchiefe,
Againſt the mightineſſe of love and vertue,
Some baſe unhallowed hand ſhall rob thy right off.
Help me, I faint: ſo.
Iul. O unhappy wench!
How has my zeale abus'd me; you that guard vertue,
Were ye aſleep? or doe you laugh at innocence?
You ſuffer'd this miſtake? O my deare Virolet!
An everlaſting curſe follow that forme
I ſtrook thee in his name ever blaſted;
For his accurſed ſhadow has betrayed
The ſweetneſſe of all youth, the nobleneſſe,
The honour, and the valor; wither'd for ever
The beauty and the bravery of all mankind:
O my dull, devils eyes.
Vir. I doe forgive you,
By this, and this I doe; I know you were cozend;
The ſhadow of Romvere, I know you aym'd at,
And not at me; but 'twas moſt neceſſary,
I ſhould be ſtruk, ſome hand above directed you,
For Juliana could not ſhew her juſtice
Without depriving high heaven of his glory,
Or any ſubject fit for her, but Virolet;
Forgive me too, and take my laſt breath ſweet one,
This the new marriage of our ſoules together;
Thinke of me Iuliana, but not often,
For feare my faults ſhould burthen your affections,
Pray for me, for I faint.
Vir. O ſtay a little,
A little little Sir.
Iul. Fye Iuliana
Iul. Shall I outlive the vertue, I have murderd?
Vir. Hold, or thou hateſt my peace: give me the dag-
On your obedience, and your love, deliver it. (ger;
If you doe thus, we ſhall not meet in heaven ſweet;
No guilty blood comes there; kill your intentions,
And then you conquer: there where I am going,
Would you not meet me Deare?
Jul. Yes.
Vir. And ſtill love me?
Iul. And ſtill behold you.
Vir. Live then till heaven cals you,
Then ripe and full of ſweetneſſe you riſe Sainted,
Then I that went before you to prepare,
Shall meet and welcome you, and daily court you
With Hymnes of holy Love—— I goe out,
Give me your hand, farewell, in peace farewell,
Remember me, farewell. dyes.
Iul. Sleep you ſweet glaſſes,
An everlaſting ſlumber Crown thoſe Chriſtals,
All my delight adue, farewell, Deare Virolet,
Deare, Deare, moſt Deare; O I can weep no more,
My body now is fire, and all conſuming,
Here will I ſit, forget the world, and all things,
And onely waite what heaven ſhall turne me to,
For now me thinkes, I ſhould not live, She ſits down.

Enter Pandulfo.

Pand. O my ſweet daughter,
The worke is finiſht now, I promis'd thee:
Here are thy vertues ſhewed, here regiſter'd,
And here ſhall live for ever.
Iul. Blot it, burne it,
I have no vertue, hatefull I am as hell is.
Pand. Is not this Virolet?
Vir. Aske no more queſtions,
Miſtaking him, I kil'd him.
Pand. O my Sonne,
Nature turnes to my heart again, my deare Sonne,
Sonne of my age, would'ſt thou goe out ſo quickly?
So poorly take thy leave, and never ſee me?
Was this a kind ſtroake daughter? could you love him?
Honour his Father, and ſo deadly ſtrike him?
O wither'd timeleſſe youth, are all thy promiſes,
Thy goodly growth of Honors come to this?
Doe I halt ſtill ith' world, and trouble nature,
When her maine pieces founder, and faile daily?

Enter Boy, and three Servants.

Boy he does weep certain: what bodies that lies by him?
How doe you Sir?
Pand. O look there Lucio,
Thy Maſter, thy beſt Maſter.
Boy. Woe is me.
They have kill'd him, ſlaine him baſely, O my Maſter, Pand. Well daughter well; what heart you had to do (this;
I know he did you wrong; but 'twas his fortune,
And not his fault, for my ſake that have lov'd you,
But I ſee now, you ſcorne me too.
Boy. O Miſtriſſe?
Can you ſit there, and his cold body breathleſſe?
Baſely upon the earth?
Pand. Let her alone Boy,
She glories in his end.
Boy. You ſhall not ſit here,
And ſuffer him you loved- ha; good Sir come hither,
Come hither quickly, heave her up; O heaven Sir,
O God, my heart, ſhe's cold; cold and ſtiffe too.
Siffe as a ſtake, ſhe's dead.
Pand. She's gone, ne're bend her.
I know her heart, ſhe could not want his company:
Bleſſing goe with thy ſoule, ſweet Angels ſhadow it;
O, that I were the third now, what a happineſſe?
But I muſt live, to ſee you layed in earth both,
Then build a Chapell to your memories,
Where all my wealth ſhall faſhion out your ſtoryes.

Then digge a little grave beſides, and all's done.
How ſweet ſhe looks, her eyes are open ſmiling,
I thought ſhe had been alive, you are my charge Sir,
And amongſt you, I'le ſee his goods diſtributed.
Take up the bodies, mourn in heart my friends,
You have loſt two Noble ſuccors; follow me,
And thou ſad Country, weepe this miſery. Exeunt.

Enter Seſſ. Boatſwaine, Maſter, Gunner, Citizens, and Souldiers, as many as may be.

Seſſ. Keep the Ports ſtrongly mand, and let none enter,
But ſuch as are known Patriots.
All. Liberty, liberty.
Seſſ. 'Tis a ſubſtantiall thing, and not a word
You men of Naples, which if once taken from us,
All other bleſſings leave us; 'tis a Jewell
Worth purchaſing, at the dear rate of life,
And ſo to be defended. O remember
What you have ſuffer'd, ſince you parted with it;
And if again you wiſh not to be ſlaves,
And properties to Ferrands pride and luſt,
Take noble courage, and make perfect what
Is happily begun.
1. Cit. Our great preſerver,
You have infranchis'd us, from wretched bondage.
2. Cit. And might be known, to whom we owe our free-
We to the death would follow him. (dome,
3. Cit. Make him King,
The Tyrant once remov'd.
Seſſ. That's not my end.
'Twas not ambition that brought me hither,
With theſe my faithfull friends, nor hope of ſpoile;
For when we did poſſeſſe the Tyrants treaſure,
By force extorted from you, and employed
To load you with moſt miſerable thraldome,
We did not make it ours, but with it purchas'd
The help of theſe, to get you liberty,
That for the ſame price kept you in ſubjection.
Nor are we Switzers, worthy Country-men,
But Neapolitans; now eye me well:
And tho the reverend Emblems of mine age,
My Silver locks are ſhorne, my beard cut off,
Partaking yet of an adulterate Colour;
Tho 14. yeares you have not ſeen this face,
You may remember it, and call to mind,
There was a Duke of Seſſ, A much wrong'd Prince,
Wrong'd by this Tyrant Ferrand.
1. Cit. Now I know him.
2. Cit. 'Tis he, long live the Duke of Seſſ.
Seſſ. I thank you.
The injuries I receiv'd, I muſt confeſſe,
Made me forget the love I owed this Country,
For which I hope, I have given ſatisfaction,
In being the firſt that ſtir'd, to give it freedome;
And with your loves and furtherance, will call back,
Long baniſht peace, and plenty, to this people;
2. Cit. Lead where you pleaſe, we'l follow.
1. Cit. Dare all dangers.

Enter Pandulf, the Bodies of Virolet, and Iuliana, upon a Hearſe.

Seſ. What ſolemne funeral's this?
Pand. There reſt a while,
And if't be poſſible there can be added
Wings to your ſwift deſire of juſt revenge,
Hear, (if my teares will give way to my words)
In briefe a moſt ſad ſtory.
Seſ. Speake, what are they?
I know thee well Pandulfo.
Pand. My beſt Lord?
As farre as ſorrow will give leave, moſt welcome;
This Virolet was, and but a Sonne of mine,
I might ſay, the moſt hopefull of our Gentry;
And though unfortunate, never Ignoble:
But I'le ſpeake him no further. Look on this,
This face, that in a Savage would move pitty,
The wonder of her Sex; and having ſaid
'Tis Iuliana, Eloquence will want words
To ſet out her deſervings; this bleſt Lady
That did indure the Rack, to ſave her Husband,
That Husband, who, in being forc'd to leave her,
Indur'd a thouſand tortures; By what practiſe,
I know not, (but 'twas ſure a cunning one)
Are made, the laſt I hope, but ſad examples
Of Ferrands Tyranny. Convey the bodies hence.
Seſ. Expreſſe your ſorrow
In your revenge, not teares, my worthy Souldiers:
That fertile earth, that teem'd ſo many children,
To feed his cruelty, in her wounded wombe,
Can hardly now receive 'em.
Boatſw. We are cold,
Cold walls ſhall not keep him from us. (onely for a Gun. Were he cover'd with mountaines, and roome
Bullet to be ſent levell at him, I would ſpeed him.
Mr. Let's ſcale this petty Towre; at Sea we are Falcons,
And fly unto the maine top in a moment.
What then can ſtop us here?
1 Cit. We'l teare him peece-meale.
2 Cit. Or eat a paſſage to him.
Seſ. Let diſcretion
Direct your anger; that's a victory,
Which is got with leaſt loſſe, let us make ours ſuch:
And therefore friends, while we hold parly here,
Raiſe your ſealado, on the other ſide,
But enter'd weake, your ſuffrings. Ex. Saylors and 1 Cit. In our wrongs. Souldiers.
There was no meane.
2 Cit. Nor in our full revenge
Will we know any.
Seſſ. Be appeas'd good man,
No ſorrow can redeem them from deaths Priſon;
What his inevitable hand hath ſeiz'd on,
The world cannot recover. All the comfort
That I can give to you, is to ſee vengeance
Pour'd dreadfully upon the Authors head,
Of which their aſhes may be ſenſible,
That have ſalne by him. ſound a parly.

Enter Ferrand, Martia, Aſcanio, and Romvere, above.

Pand. They appeare.
Fer. 'Tis not that we eſteme rebellious Traytors
Worthy an anſwer to their proudeſt Sommons
That we vouchſafe our preſence; or to exchange
One ſyllable with 'em: but to let ſuch know,
Though Circled round with treaſon, all points bent
As to their Center at my heart, 'tis free,
Free from feare villaines, and in this weake Tower
Ferrand commands as abſolute, as when
He trod upon your necks, and as much ſcornes you.
And when the Sunne of Majeſty ſhall breake through
The clouds of your rebellion, every beame

In-

Inſtead of comfortable heate, ſhall ſend
Conſuming plagues among you; and you call
That government which you term'd tyrannous
Hereafter, gentle.
Sef. Flatter not thy ſelfe
With theſe deluding hopes, thou cruell beaſt,
Thou art ith' toyle, and the glad Huntſmam prouder,
By whom thou art taken, of his prey, then if (Like thee) he ſhould command, and ſpoile his Forreſt.
Fer. What art thou?
Sef. To thy horror, Duke of Seſſe.
Fer. The Divel.
Seſſ. Reſerv'd for thy damnation.
Fer. Why ſhakes my love?
Mart. O I am loſt for ever;
Mountains divide me from him; ſome kind hand
Prevent our fearfull meeting: Or lead me
To the ſteep rock, whoſe rugged brows are bent
Upon the ſwelling main; there let me hide me:
And as our bodies then ſhall be divided,
May our ſoules never meet.
Fer. Whence grows this, Sweeteſt?
Mar. There are a thouſand furies in his looks;
And in his deadly ſilence more loud horror,
Then when in Hell the tortur'd and tormentors
Contend whoſe ſhreeks are greater. Wretched me!
It is my father.
Sef. Yes, and I wil own her, Sir,
Till my revenge. It is my daughter, Ferrand;
My daughter, thou haſt whor'd.
Fer. I triumph in it:
To know ſhe's thine, affords me more true pleaſure,
Then the act gave me, When even at the height,
I crack'd her Virgin zone, Her ſhame dwell on thee,
And all thy family; may they never know
A female iſſue, but a whore, Aſcanio.
Ronvere, look cheerfully; be thou a man too,
And learn of me to die. That we might fall,
And in our ruines ſwallow up this Kingdom,
Nay the whol world, and make a ſecond Chaos.
And if from thence a new beginning riſe,
Be it recorded this did end with us;
And from our duſt hath embryon.
Ron. I liv'd with you,
And wil die with you; your example makes me
Equally bold.
Aſc. And I reſolv'd to beare
What ere my fate appoints me.
Sef. They are ours,
Now to the ſpoyle.
Botſ. Pity the Lady; to all elſe be deaſt. Exeunt.
Within, [Kill, kill, kill. Alarum, Flo. Trumpets.
Retreat.

Enter Seſſe with Ferrands head, the Citizens, Maſter, Boteſwain, Gunner, Souldiers, bringing in Aſcanio and Martia.

Sef. Cruell beginnings meet with cruell ends;
And the beſt ſacrifice to Heaven for peace,
Is tyrants blood: and thoſe that ſtuck faſt to him,
Fleſh'd inſtruments in his commands to mitchiefe,
With him diſpatch'd.
Botſ. They are all cut off.
Sef. Tis well.
All. Thanks to the Duke of Seſſe.
Sef. Pay that to Heaven,
And for a generall joy, give generall thanks:
For bleſſings nere deſcend from Heaven, but when
A gratefull Sacrifice aſcends from men.
To your devotion; leave me; there's a Scene,
Which I would act alone; yet you may ſtay,
For wanting juſt ſpectators, twill be nothing.
The reſt forbeare me.
Citizens. Liberty liberty, liberty.
Mar. I would I were as far beneath the Centre,
As now I ſtand above it; how I tremble!
Thrice happy they that dyed; I dying live
To ſtand the whirlwind of a fathers fury.
Now it moves toward me.
Sef. Thou, I want a name,
By which to ſtile thee: All articulate ſounds
That do expreſſe the miſchiefe of vile woman,
That are, or have been, or ſhall be, are weak
To ſpeak thee to the height. Witch, parricide;
For thou, in taking leave of modeſty,
Haſt kild thy father, and his honour loſt;
He's but a walking ſhadow, to torment thee.
To leave, and rob thy father; then ſet free
His foes, whoſe ſlavery he did prefer
Above all treaſure, was a ſtrong defeazance
To cut off, even the ſureſt bonds of mercy.
After all this, having given up thy ſelfe,
Like to a ſenſuall beaſt, a ſlave to luſt,
To play the whore, and then (high Heaven it racks me)
To finde out none to quench thy appetite,
But the moſt cruell King, whom next to Hell,
Thy father hated; and whoſe black imbraces
Thou ſhouldſt have fled from, as the whips of furies;
What canſt thou look for?

Enter Pandulph, and bodies borne on the Herſe;

Mart. Death; and tis not in you
To hurt me further: my old reſolution,
Take now the place of feare; in this I liv'd,
In this Ile die, your daughter.
Pand. Look but here;
You had, I know, a guilty hand in this;
Repent it Lady.
Mart. Juliana dead?
And Virolet?
Pand. by her unwilling hand.
Mart. Fates you are equall. What can now fall on me,
That I wil ſhrink at? now unmov'd I dare
Look on your anger, and not bend a knee
To aske your pardon: let your rage run higher
Then billows rais'd up by a violent Tempeſt,
And be as that is, deafe to all intreaties:
They are dead, and I prepar'd; for in their fall
All my deſires are ſum'd up.
Sef. Impudent too?
Die in it wretch.
Botſ. Stay ſir. Botſw. kils her.
Sef. How dar'ſt thou villaine,
Snatch from my ſword the honour of my juſtice?
Botſ. I never did you better ſervice ſir,
Yet have been ever faithfull. I confeſſe
That ſhe deſerv'd to die; but by whoſe hand?
Not by a fathers. Double all her guilt,
It could not make you innocent, had you done it.
In me tis murder, in you twere a crime
Heaven could not pardon. Witneſſe that I love you,
And in that love I did it.
Sef. Thou art Noble;

I thank thee for't; the thought of her die with her.
Ascan. My turn is next: since she could finde no mercy,
What am I to expect?
Cit. With one voyce, sir,
The Citizens salute you, with the stile
Of King of Naples.
Ses. I must be excus'd,
The burden is too heavy for my shoulder,
Bestow it where tis due. Stand forth Ascanio,
It does belong to you; live long and weare it,
And warn'd by the example of your Unkle,
Learn that you are to govern men, not beasts:
And that it is a most improvident head,
That strives to hurt the limbs that do support it.
Give buriall to the dead; for me, and mine,
We wil again to Sea, and never know,
The place, which in my birth first gave me woe. Exeunt.
Flor. Trumpets.

FINIS.

The

THE PILGRIM.

Actus Primus——Scæna Prima.

Enter Alphonſo, Curio, Seberto.

Curio.

Signor Alphonſo, ye are too rugged to her,
Believe too full of harſhneſſe.

Al. Yes, it ſeemes ſo.

Seb. A father of ſo ſweet a child, ſo happy,
(Fy Sir) ſo excellent in all endowments,
In bleſſedneſſe of beauty, ſuch a mirror.

Alp. She is a foole, away.

Seb. Can ye be angry?
Can any wind blow rough, upon a bloſſom
So faire, and tender? Can a Fathers nature,
A noble Fathers too?

Al. All this is but prating:
Let her be rul'd; let her obſerve my humor,
With my eyes let her ſee; with my eares liſten;
I am her Father: I begot her, bred her,
And I will make her.

Cur. No doubt ye may compell her,
But what a miſcelvous, unhappy fortune
May wayt upon this wil of yours, as commonly
Such forcings ever end in hates, and ruines.

Al. Is't not a man I wiſh her to? a ſtrong man?
What can ſhe have? what could ſhe have? a Gentleman?
A yong man? and an able-man? a rich man?
A handſome man? a valiant man? do you marke me?
None of your peeced-companions, your pin'd-Gallants,
That ſiie to fitters, with every flaw of weather:
None of your impt bravados: what can ſhe ask more?
Is not a mettal'd-man fit for a woman?
A ſtrong chindman? i'le not be foold, nor flurted.

Seb. I grant ye Rodorgio is all theſe
And a brave Gentleman: muſt it therefore follow
Upon neceſſity ſhe muſt doate upon him?
Will ye allow no liberty in chooſing?

Cur. Alas ſhe is tender yet.

Al. Enough enough, enough Sir:
She is mallinble; ſhee'l endure the hammer,
And why not that ſtrong workeman that ſtrikes deepeſt?
Let me know that? ſhe is fifteen, with the vantage,
And if ſhe be not ready now for mannage——

Seb. You know he is a baniſh'd man: an out-Law;
And how he lives? his nature rough, and bloody
By cuſtomary rapines: now, her ſweet humor
That is as eaſy as a calme, and peacefull,
All her affections, like the dewes on Roſes,
Faire as the flowers themſelves: as ſweet, and gentle:
How would you have theſe meet?

Al. A bed, a bed ſir:
Let her be the faireſt Roſe, and the ſweeteſt,
Yet I know this faire roſe muſt have her prickles:
I grant ye Rodorigo is an out-Law,
An eaſie compoſition cals him in again,
He is a valiant man, and he is a rich man,
And loves the foole: a little rough by cuſtome:
Shee'l like him ten times better. Shee'l doat upon him,
If ere they come to grapling, run mad for him,
But there is an other in the wind, ſome caſtrell
That hovers over her, and dares her dayly,
Some flickring ſlave.

Cur. I dare not think ſo poorely.

Al. Something there is, and muſt be: but I ſhall ſente it
And hunt it narrowly.

Seb. I never ſaw her yet
Make offer at the leaſt glance of affection,
But ſtill ſo modeſt, wiſe.

Al. They are wiſe to gull us,
There was a fellow, old Ferandos ſon,
I muſt confeſſe handſome, but my enemy,
And the whole family, I hate yong Pedro:
That fellow I have ſeen her gaze upon,
And turn, and gaze again, and make ſuch offers
As if ſhe would ſhoot her eyes like meteors at him:
But that cauſe ſtands removed.

Cur. You need not doubt him,
For long ſince as 'twas thought on a griev'd conſcience,
He left his father, and his friends: more pitty:
For truth reports he was a noble Gentleman.

Al. Let him be what he wil: he was a begger,
And there i'le leave him.

Seb. The more the Court muſt anſwer;
But certainly I think, though ſhe might favour him,
And love his goodneſſe, as he was an honeſt man:
She never with looſe eyes ſtuck on his perſon.

Al. She is ſo full of conſcience too, and charity,
And outward holineſſe, ſhe will undoe me:
Relieves more beggers, then an hoſpitall; Enter Alinda, and
And all poor rogues, that can but ſay their prayers, Juletta.
And tune their pipes to Lamentations,
She thinks ſhe is bound to dance to: good morrow to you,
And that's as ye deſerve too: you know my mind,
And ſtuddy to obſerve it: doe it cheerfully,
And readily, and home.

Alin. I ſhall obey ye.
But noble ſir.

Al. Come, come, away with your flatteries,
And your fine phraſes,

Cur.

Cur. Pray ye be gentle to her:
Al. I know 'em; and know your feates: if you will find Noble and loving, seek me in your duty, (me
You know I am too indulgent.
Seb. Alas poor Lady, (you
Al. To your devotions: I take no good thing from Come Gentlemen; leave pittying, and moaning of her,
And praysing of her vertues: and her whym-whams,
It makes her proud, and sturdy:
Seb. Cur. Good houres wait on ye. Exeunt
Alin. I thank ye Gentlemen: I want such comforts:
I would thank you too father: but your cruelty
Hath almost made me senseless of my duty,
Yet still I must know: would I had known nothing;
What Poor attend my charity to day, wench?
Jul. Of all sorte, Madam; your open handed bounty
Makes 'em flock every houre: some worth your pitty,
But others that have made a trade of begging.
Alin. Wench, if they ask it truly, I must give it:
It takes away the holy use of charity
To examine wants.
Jul. I would you would be merry:
A cheerfull-giving hand, as I think, Madam,
Requires a heart as cheerfull.
Alin. Alas Iuletta,
What is there to be merry at? what joy now,
Unlesse we foole our own afflictions,
And make them shew ridiculous?
Jul. Sure Madam,
You could not seeme thus serious, if you were married,
Thus sad, and full of thoughts.
Alin. Married? to whom, wench?
Thou think'st if there be a yong handsome fellow
As those are plentifull, our cares are quenched then.
Iul. Madam, I think a lusty handsome fellow
If he be kind, and loving, and a right one,
Is even as good a pill, to purge this melancholy,
As ever Galen gave, I am sure more naturall:
And merrier for the heart, then Wine and Saffron:
Madam, wanton youth is such a Cataplasme.
Alin. Who has bin thy tutor wench?
Jul. Even my own thoughts, Lady:
For though I be bard the liberty of talking,
Yet I can think unhappily, and as near the mark, Madam,
'Faith, marry, and be merry.
Alin. Who wil have me?
Who wil be troubled with a tettish Girle?
It may be proud, and to that vice expencefull?
Who can assure himselfe, I shall live honest?
Jul. Let every man take his fortune:
Alin. And o' my conscience
If once I grow to breeding, a whole King dome
Wil not containe my stock.
Jul. The more the merrier:
'Tis brave to be a mother of new Nations.
Alin. Why, I should bury a hundred husbands.
Iul. Tis no matter:
As long as ye leave sufficient men to stock ye.
Alm. Is this thy mirth? are these the joyes of marriage?
Away light-headed foole; are these contentments?
If I could finde a man.
Jul. You may a thousand.
Alin. Meere men I know I may: and there a woman
Has liberty, (at least shee'l venture for it,)
To be a monster and become the time too;
But to enjoy a man, from whose example
(As from a compasse) we may steer our fortunes,
Our actions, and our age; and safe arive at
A memory that shall become our ashes,
Such things are few, and far to seek; to finde one
That can but rightly mannage the wild beast, woman,
And sweetly govern with her. But no more of this,
Tis not for thy discourse: Lets in, and see (wench,
What poor afflicted wait our charity. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter a Porter, 4. Beggers, Pedro, and a Pilgrime.

Por. Stand off, and keep your Rancks: twenty foot fur-
There louse your selves with reason, & discretion. (ther:
The Sun shines warm: the farther still the better,
Your beasts wil bolt anon, and then tis dangerous.
1. Beg. Heaven blesse our Mistris.
Por. Does the crack go that way?
'Twil be o'th o'ther side anon.
2. Pray ye friend.
Por. Your friend? and why your friend? why, goodman
What dost thou see within me, or without me, (turncoat
Or what itch dost thou know upon me, tell me,
That I should be thy friend? what do I look like
Any of thy acquaintance hoong in Gibbets?
Hast thou any Friends, Kindred, or Allianee,
Or any higher ambition, then an almes-basket?
2. Beg. I would be your worships friend.
Por. So ye shall Sirra,
When I quarter the same louse with ye.
3. Tis twelve o' clock.
Por. Tis ever so with thee, when thou hast done scratch-
For that provokes thy stomach to ring noon; (ing,
O the infinite Seas of porridge thou hast swallowd!
And yet thou look'st as if they had bin but Glisters;
Thou feed'st abundance; thou hadst need of sustenance;
Almes do you call it to relieve these Rascals? Enter Al-
Nothing but a generall rot of sheep can satisfie 'em. phonso
Al Did not I tel you, how she would undo me? Curio,
What Marts of Rogues, and Beggers? Seberto.
Seb. Tis charity
Methinks, you are bound to love her for——
Al. Yes, I warrant ye,
If men could sale to heaven in porridge pots,
With masts of Beef, and Mutton, what a voyage should I
What are all these? (make?
1. Poore people, and 't like your worship.
2. Wretched poor people.
3. Very hungry people.
Al. And very Lousy.
4. Yes forsooth, so, so.
Por. I'le undertake five hundred head about 'em,
And that's no needy Grasier.
Al What are you?
Pil. Strangers that come to wonder at your charity,
Yet people poore enough to beg a blessing.
Cur. Use them with favour, sir, their shews are reverent,
It seemes ye are holy Pilgrimes?
Pil. Ye ghesse right sir,
And bound far off, to offer our devotions.
Al. What make ye this way? we keep no Reliques here,
Nor holy Shrines.
Pil. The holiest we ere heard of;
Ye keep a living monument of goodnesse,
A Daughter of that pious excellence,
The very Shrines of Saints sinck at her vertues,
And swear they cannot hold pace with her pieties,
We come to see this Lady: not with prophane eyes,
Nor wanton bloods, to doat upon her beauties,
But through our tedious wayes to beg her blessings.

Al.

Al. This is a new way of begging, and a neat one,
And this cries money for reward: good ſtore too;
Theſe commendations beg not with bag, and bottle;
Well, well, the fainting of this woman (Gentlemen)
I know what it muſt come too: theſe women ſaints
Are plaguy heavy ſaints: they out-waigh a he-ſaint
Three thouſand thick; I know: I feele.
Seb. Ye are more afraid then hurt ſir.
Al. Have you your commendations ready too?
He bowes, and nods.
Cur. A handſome well built perſon.
Al. What Country-craver are you? nothing but moti- (on?
A puppet-Pilgrim?
Pil. Hee's a ſtranger ſir;
This foure dayes I have traveld in his company,
But little of his buſines, or his Language
As yet, I have underſtood.
Seb. Both yong, and handſome,
Only the Sun has bin too ſaucy with him. (bleſſing
Al. Would ye have money ſir, or meat? what kind of Does your devotion looke for? Still more ducking?
Be there any ſaints, that underſtand by ſignes only?
More motion yet? this is the prettieſt Pilgrim,
The pinck of pilgrims: ile be for ye ſir;
Do ye diſcourſe with ſignes? ye 'are hartly wel come:
A poor viaticum; very good gold ſir;
But holy men affect a better treaſure.
I kept it for your goodnes, but neertheleſſe
Since it can prove but burthenſome to your holines,
And you affect light prayer, fit for carriage,
I'le put this up againe.
Cur. Ye are too unreverent.
Al. Ye talk too broad; muſt I give way, and wealth too
To every toy, that carries a grave ſeeming?
Muſt my good angels wait on him? if the proud hilding
Would yeild but to my wil, and know her duty
I knew what I would ſuffer.
Seb. Good ſir, be patient,
The wrongs ye do theſe men, may light on you,
Too heavy too: and then you wil wiſh you had ſaid leſſe;
A comly and ſweet uſage becomes ſtrangers.
Al. We ſhall have half the Kingdom ſtrangers ſhortly,
And this fond prodigality be ſufferd;
But I muſt be an aſſe, ſee 'hem relieved, ſirah;
If I were yong again, I would ſooner get beare whelps,
And ſafer too, them any of theſe She-ſaints,
But I will break her,
Cur. Such a face for certain.
Seb. Me thinks I have ſeen it too: but we are cozend;
But fair befall thee Pilgrim, thou look'ſt lovely. Exit
Por. Will ye troop up, ye porridge Regiment? Enter
Captain Poors quarter wil ye move? Alinda
Alin. Ye dull Knave, Iuletta.
Are not theſe wretches ſerved yet?
Beg. Bleſſe my Miſtris.
Alin. Do you make ſport ſir, with their miſeries?
Ye drouſie rogue.
Por. They are too high fed, Madam,
Their ſtomacks are a'ſleep yet.
Alin. Serve 'hem plentifully,
Or i'le ſerve you out next: even out o' dores, ſirah;
And ſerve 'em quickly too.
Beg. Heaven bleſſe the Lady.
Alin. Bleſſe the good end I meane it for.
Iul. I would I knew it:
If it be for any mans ſake, I'le cry amen too,
Well Madam, ye have even as pretty a port of pentioners.
Alin. Vain-glory would ſeek more, and handſomer. Ex.

But I appeale to vertue what my end is; Beggers
What men are theſe?
Iul. It ſeems they are holy Pilgrims:
That handſome youth ſhould ſuffer ſuch a pennance,
Would I were even the ſaint they make their vowes too,
How eaſily I would grant.
Pil. Heavens grace in-wheele ye:
And all good thoughts, and prayers dwell about ye,
Abundance be your friend; and holy charity
Be ever at your hand' to crown ye glorious.
Alin. I thank ye ſir, peace guid your travels too,
And what you wiſh for moſt, end all your trobles;
Remember me by this: and in your prayers
When your ſtrong heart melts, mediate my poor fortunes.
Pil. All my devotions wait upon your ſervice.
Alin. Are ye of this Country, ſir?
Pil. Yes, worthieſt Lady,
But far off bred: my fortunes farther from me.
Alin. Gentle, I dare believe.
Pil. I have liv'd freer.
Alin. I am no inquiſitor, that were too curious:
What ever vow, or pennance puls ye on ſir;
Conſcience, or love, or ſtubborn diſobedience,
The ſaint ye kneel too, hear, and eaſe your travels.
Pil. Yours neer begin: and thus I ſeal my prayers. Ex.
Alin. How conſtantly this man looks? how he ſighes?
Some great affliction hatches his devotions,
Right holy ſir: how yong, and ſweet he ſuffers?
Iul. Would I might ſuffer with him.
Alin. He turns from us:
Alas he weeps too: ſomething preſſes him
He would reveale, but dare not; ſir, be comforted,
Ye come for that: and take it: if it be want, ſir,
To me yee appear ſo worthy of relieving,
I am your ſteward: ſpeak, and take: he's dumb ſtill:
Now as I have a faith this man ſo ſtirs me,
His modeſty makes me affraid I have treſpaſſed.
Iul. Would he would ſtir me too: I like his ſhape well,
Alin. May be he would ſpeak alone: go off Iuletta,
Afflicted hearts fear their own motions,
Be not far off.
Iul. Would I were neerer to him,
A yong ſmug handſome holines has no fellow. Exit
Alin. Why do you grieve? do you find your pennance Orare the vowes ye have made, too mighty for ye? (ſharp?
Do's not the world allure ye to look back
And ſorrow for the ſweet time ye have loſt?
Ye are yong, and fair; be not deluded, ſir;
A manly made up heart contemnes theſe ſhadows,
And yours appeares no leſſe: greifes for your fears,
For houres ill-ſpent, for wrongs don raſh, and rudely,
For fowle contempts for faiths ill violated,
Become fears well: I dare not taſk your Goodnes;
And then a ſorrow ſhewes in his true glory
When the whole heart is excellently ſorry.
I pray ye be comforted.
Ped. I am, deer Lady,
And ſuch a comfort ye have caſt upon me,
That though I ſtruggle with mine own calamities
Too mighty, and too many for my mannage,
And though, like angry waves, they curld upon me
Contending proudly who ſhould firſt devour me,
Yet I would ſtem their dangers.
Alin. He ſpeaks nobly:
What do ye want?
Ped. All that can make me happy:
I want my ſelfe.
Alin. Your ſelf? who rob'd ye Pilgrim?

Why does he look ſo conſtantly upon me?
I want my ſelfe: indeed, you holy wounderers
Are ſaid to ſeek much: but to ſeek your ſelves.
Ped. I ſeek my ſelf; and am but my ſelfs-ſhadow:
Have loſt my ſelf; and now am not ſo noble.
Alin. I ſeek my ſelf: ſomething I yet remember
That bears that Motto; 'tis not he: he is yonger,
And far more tender: for that ſelf-ſake (Pilgrim)
Be who it will, take this.
Ped. Your hand I dare take,
That be far from me, Lady, thus I kiſſe it,
And thus I bleſſe it too; be conſtant fair ſtill:
Be good, and live to be a great example. Exit.
Alin. One word more (Pilgrim) has amazd me ſtrangly,
Be conſtant faire ſtill: tis the poſie here:
And here without, Be good: he wept to ſee me Enter Iuletta
Juletta:
Iul. Madam.
Alin. Take this Key, and fetch me
The Marygold Jewell that lies in my little Cabinet:
I think tis that: what eyes had I, to miſſe him?
O' me, what thoughts? he had no beard then, and
As I remember well, he was more ruddy. Ex Iuletta
If this be he, he has a manly face yet
A goodly ſhape.
Iul. Here Madam?
Alin. Let me ſee it:
Tis ſo, too true: It muſt be he, or nothing,
He ſpak the words juſt as they ſtand engraved here:
I ſeek my ſelf, and am but my ſelfes-ſhadow:
Alas poor man: didſt thou not meet him, Iuletta?
The Pilgrim wench?
Iul. He went by long ago, Madam.
Alin. I forgot to give him ſomething.
Iul. 'Twas ill done Lady:
For, o' my troth, he is the handſomeſt man
I ſaw this many a day: would he had all my wealth,
And me to boote: what ayles ſhe to grow ſullen?
Alin. Come, I forgot; but I will recompence it. Exeunt

Actus Secundus. Scæna Prima.

Enter Alphonſo, Curio, Seberto, Iuletta, Porter, and ſervants.

Al. Can ſhe ſlip through a cat-hole? tell me that: re-
Can ſhe fly ith ayre? is ſhe a thing inviſible? (ſolve me;
Gon, and none know it?
Seb. Ye amaz your ſervants. (ing,
Al. Some pelting rogue has watch'd her houre of itch-
And clawd her; clawd her: do you mark me, clawd her;
Some that I foſter up.
Cur. They are all here, ſir.
Al. Let 'em be where they will, they are arrant raſcals;
And by this hand i'le hang 'em all.
Seb. Deale calmely:
You will not give 'em time to anſwer ye.
Al. I'le choak 'hem: famiſh 'em: what ſay you wag-taile?
You knew her mind: you were of councell with her,
Tell me: and tell me true.
Cur. Aske with diſcretion.
Al. Diſcretion? hang diſcretion, hang ye all:
Let me know where ſhe is.
Iul. Would you know o' me ſir?
Al. O' thee ſir: I, o' thee ſir: what art thou ſir?
Iul. Hir woman ſir, and't like your worſhip, ſir.
Al. Her band, her fidle-ſtick.
Her Lady-fayry, to oyl the dores o' nights,
That they may open with diſcretion,
Her Gin, her Nut-crack,
Iul. Tis very well ſir.
Al. Thou lieſt; tis damnal le ill, tis moſt abhomina-
Will ye confes (Thing) (able:
Iul. Say I were gulty, ſir?
I would be hangd before I would confeſſe:
Is this a World to confeſſe in?
Cur. Deale directly.
Iul. Yes, if my matter lie direct before me:
But when I am forc'd, and ferryted.
Al. Tell me the truth,
And as I live, i'le give thee a new petticote.
Jul. And you would give me ten, I would not tell ye, Truths bear a greater price, then you are aware of.
Seb. Deale modeſtly.
Iul. I doe not pluck my cloths up.
Al. What ſay you ſirha? you? or you? are ye dumb all?
Por. I ſaw her laſt night, and't ſhall like your worſhip
When I ſerv'd in her Livery.
Al. What's that, ſirha?
Por. Her Chamber pot, and't pleaſe ye.
Seb. A new Livery.
Al. Where lay ſhe? who lay with her?
Por. In truth not I ſir:
I lay with my fellow Fredrick, in the flea-chamber
And't like your worſhip, we are almoſt worried.
Iul. I left her by her ſelf, in her own cloſet,
And there I thought ſhe had ſlept.
Al. Why lay you from her?
Iu. It was her will I ſhould: ſhe is my Miſtris,
And my part is obedience.
Al. Were all the dores lockt?
Por. All mine.
Ser. And mine: ſhe could not get out thoſe wayes
Unles ſhe lept the wals: and thoſe are higher
Then any womans courage dare aſpire at.
Al. Come, you muſt know.
Cur. Conceale it not, but deale plaine.
Iul. If I did know, and her truſt lay upon me,
Not all your angers, nor your flatteries
Should make me ſpeak, but having no more intereſt
Then I may well deliver to the aire,
I'le tell ye what I know: and tell it liberally,
I think ſhe is gon, becauſe we cannot find her;
I think ſhe is weary of your tyranny,
And therefore gon: may be ſhe is in love:
May be in love, where you ſhow no great liking,
And therefore gon: May be, ſome point of conſcience,
Or vowd devotion.
Al. Theſe are nothing, minion;
You that can aime at theſe, muſt know the truth too.
Iul. Any more truth then this if I know, hang me,
Or where to ſearch for it, if I make a lie
To gaine your love, and envy my beſt Miſtris,
Pin me againſt a wall, with my heel's upwards.
Al. Out of my dores.
Iul. That's all my poor petition:
For if your houſe were gold, and ſhe not in it,
Sir, I ſhould count it but a cage to whiſtle in.
Al. Whore, if ſhe be above ground, I wil have her.
Iul. I would live in a cole-pit, then, were I your (daughter.
Seb. Certaine ſhe dos not know Sir.
Al. Hang her, hang her:
She knowes too much: ſearch all the houſe; all corners,
and

And where tis poſſible ſhe may goe out, Ex. ſervants.
If I do finde your tricks.
Jul. Reward me for 'hem.
Or if I had ſuch tricks, you could diſcover
So weak, and ſleightly woven, you might look through,
All the young Girles ſhould hoot me out oth' Pariſh.
You are my Maſter, but ye owne an anger
Becomes a School-boy, that hath loſt his Apples;
Will ye force things into our knowledges?
Al. Come hither Julietta; thou didſt love me.
Jul. And do ſtill:
You are my Ladies father, and I reverence ye.
Al. Thou wouldſt have pleas'd my humor.
Jul. Any good way,
That carried not ſuſpition in't: or flattery,
Or faile of truſt.
Al. Come, come, thou wouldſt have.—
Jul. Stay ſir.
Al. And thou haſt felt my bounty for't, and ſhalt doe.
Doſt thou want Clothes or Money?
Jul. Both.
Al. Shalt have both.
Jul. But not this way: I had rather be an Adamite
And bring Fig-leaves into faſhion again.
If you were young ſir,
Handſome, and fitted to a womans appetite;
And I a giddy-headed girle, that car'd for nothing,
Much might be done; then you might fumble with me,
And thinke to grope out matters of ſome moment,
Which now you will put too ſhort for:
For what you have ſeen hitherto,
And know by me, has been but honeſt ſervice,
Which I dare pin ith' market-place to anſwer;
And let the world, the fleſh and divell examine it,
And come you in too, I dare ſtand your ſtricteſt.
And ſo much good may doe you, with your dreames of Al. This is moſt monſtrous. (curteſie.

Enter Porter and Servants.

Seb. Sure ſhe do's not know ſir:
She durſt not be ſo confident and guilty. (covered?
Al. How now; what newes? what hopes and ſteps diſ-Speake any thing thats good, that tends to th' matter;
Doe you ſtand ſtaring ſtill?
1 Ser. We are no Gods ſir,
To ſay ſhe is here, or there: and what ſhe is doing;
But we have ſearch'd.
Por. I am ſure ſhe is not ith' Cellar;
For looke you ſir, if ſhe had been ith' Cellar—
Al. I am ſure thou haſt been there.
Por. As I carried the matter,
For I ſearch'd every piece of Wine; yes ſure ſir,
And every little Tereſſe that could but teſtifie:
And I drew hard to bolt her out.
Al. Away with him;
Fling him ith' Haymow, let him lie a mellowing;
He ſtinks of Muskadel like an Engliſh Chriſtmas:
Are theſe your cares? your ſervices?
2 Ser. Pray ye heare ſir,
We have found where ſhe went out; her very footing.
Al. Where, where? goe on.
Cur. Obſerve then wth more ſlaiedneſſe.
2 Ser. Searching the garden: at the little Poſterne
That opens to the Parke, we firſt diſcovered it.
Al. A little foot?
1 Ser. It muſt be hers, or none ſir.
Al. How far beyond that?
2 Ser. To the Parke it leads us,
But there the ground being hard, we could not marke it.
Al. She alwaies kept that Key: I was a coxcomb,
A foole, an aſſe, to give a girle that liberty:
Saddle my Horſes, rogues, ye drunken varlets:
Your precious diligence lies in Pint-pots,
Your brains in Butts, my horſes, ye pin-buttocks.
You'l beare me company?
Seb. We dare not leave ye,
Unleſſe we found a quieter ſoule within ye.
Cur. If we may do the Lady any ſervice,
Sweet, gentle ſoule.
Al. I ſay againe, my horſes:
Are ye ſo hot? have ye your private pilgrimages?
Muſt ye be Jumping-Jone? Ile wander with ye:
Ile jump ye, and Ile joggle ye; my horſes;
And keep me this young Lirry-poope within dores,
I will diſcover, dame.
Jul. 'Tis fit you ſhould ſir,
If ye knew what: Well Love, if thou bee'ſt with her,
Or what power elſe that armes her reſolution,
Conduct her faire, and keepe her from this mad man,
Direct her to her wiſhes: dwell about her
That no diſhonourable end ore-take her,
Danger, or want: and let me try my fortune.
Al. You know the place we meet in?
Seb. We ſhall hit it.
Al. And as ye are honeſt Gentlemen, endeavour.
Cur. We'l ſearch the beſt we can: if ſhe light in our
Al. Tie her to th' horſe taile. (hands.
Seb. We know how to uſe her,
But not your way, for all your ſtate.
Al. Make haſte there:
And get you in, and looke to th' houſe. If you ſtir out,
Or ſet o' foot any new motion this way, (Damſell,
When I come home, (which ſhall be ſuddenly)
You know my mind: if you doe play the raſcall,
I have my eyes and eares in ſundry places,
If ye doe prance.
Jul. I ſhall doe that, that's fit, ſir:
And fit to croſſe your fooleries; Ile faile elſe.
And ſo Ile to my chamber. Exit.
Al. To your prayers,
And leave your ſtubborne tricks: She is not far yet,
She cannot be; and we dividing ſuddenly.
Cur. Keep her from thy hands, I beſeech.
Al. Our horſes;
Come cheerfully. Ile teach her to run gadding. Exit.

Scena ſecunda.

Enter Roderigo, and foure Out-lawes.

1 Out-l. Captaine, y'are not merry.
Rod. We get nothing,
We have no ſport; whoring, and drinking ſpoiles us,
We keep no guards.
2. There come no paſſengers,
Merchants, nor Gentlemen, nor whoſoever,
But we have Tribute.
Rod. And whilſt we ſpend that idlely,
We let thoſe paſſe that carry the beſt purchaſe.
Ile have all ſearch'd & brought in; Rogues, and Beggars,
Have got the tricke now to become Banck-maſters.
Ile have none ſcape: onely my friends, and neighbours,
That may deliver to the King my innocence;
Thoſe I would have regarded; tis policy.
But otherwiſe nor gravities, nor ſhadows,
Appeare they how they will, that may have purſes,
For they ſhall pay.
3. Ye ſpeake now like a Captaine.

And if we ſpare, flea us, and coyn our Caſſoks;
Will ye looke blith?
Rod. You heare no preparation
The King intends againſt us yet?
4. Not a word ſir.
Good man, he's troubled with matter of more moment,
Hummings of higher nature vex his braines, ſir;
Doe not we ſee his garriſons?
Rod. Who are out now? (ring
4. Good fellows ſir, that if there be any purchaſe ſtir-
Will ſtrike it dead; Jaques and Loper, Lads
That know their quarters, as they know their knapſaks;
And will not off.
Rod. Where is the boy ye brought me?
A pretty lad, and of a quicke capacity,
And bred up neatly.
1. He's within at meat, ſir,
The knave is hungry: yet he ſeaſons all
He eates or drinkes with many teares and ſighings,
The ſaddeſt appetite I ever look'd on;
The boy is young, tis feare and want of company
He knows and loves: uſe him not rough, nor harſhly,
He will be quickly bold; Ile entertaine him:
I want a pretty Boy to waite upon me,
And when I am ſad or ſleepy, to prate to me;
Beſides there's ſomething in his face, I like well.
And ſtill the more I looke, more like; let him want no-
And uſe him gently, all. (thing,
2. Here's a ſmall Box, ſir,
We tooke about him, which he griev'd to part with,
May be ſome wealth.
Rod. Alas, ſome little money
The poore knave carried to defray his lodgings,
Ile give it him againe, and adde unto it.
'Twere ſin to open ſuch a petty purchaſe.
Enter Loper and Jaques, with Pedro. (diers?
How now, who is this? what have you brought me Soul-
Lop. We know not wel what: a ſtrange ſtaving fellow,
Sullen enough I am ſure.
Rod. Where tooke ye him?
Jaq. Upon the skirt o'th wood, veiwing, and gaping,
And ſometime ſtanding ſtill, as if he had meant
To view the beſt acceſſes to our quarters;
Money he has enough: and when we threatned him,
He ſmil'd, and yeilded; but not one word utter'd.
Lop. His habit ſaies he's holy: if his heart
Keep that proportion too, 'tis beſt ye free him,
We keep his Wallet here: I am ſure tis heavy.
Rod. Pilgrime: come hither ſir; Are you a Pilgrime?
A piece of pretty holineſſe: doe you ſhrinke ſir?
A ſnug young Saint. What Countrey were you born in?
Ye have a Spaniſh face: In a dumb Province?
And had your mother too this excellent vertue?
No tongue do you ſay? ſure ſhe was a matchleſſe woman;
What a fine family is this man ſprung from!
Certaine he was begotten in a calme,
When all was huſht: the Midwife was dumb Midnight;
Are ye ſeal'd up? or doe you ſcorne to anſwer?
Ye are in my hands, and I have medicines for ye
Can make ye ſpeake: pull off his Bonnet, Souldiers;
Ye have a ſpeaking face.
Lop. I am ſure a handſome:
This Pilgrime cannot want She-Saints to pray to.
Rod. Stand neerer: ha?
Ped. Come, do your worſt, I am ready.
Rod. Is your tongue found? go off, and let me talk with An keepe your watches round. (him;
All. We are ready Captaine.

Rod. So; now what are ye?
Ped. Am I?
My habit ſhewes me what I am.
Rod. Thy heart
A deſperate foole, and ſo thy fate ſhall tell thee;
What devill brought thee hither? for I know thee.
Ped. I know thou doſt: and ſince it is my fortune
To light into thy fingers; I muſt thinke too
The moſt malicious of all devils brought me,
Yet ſome men ſay thou art Noble.
Rod. Not to thee,
That were a benefit to mocke the giver:
Thy father hates my friends, and family,
And thou haſt been the heire of all this malice.
Can two ſuch ſtormes meet then, and part with kiſſing?
Ped. You have the mightier hand.
Rod And ſo Ile uſe it.
Ped. I cannot hinder ye: leſſe can I beg
Submiſſive at his knees that knows not honour;
That bears the ſtamp of man, and not his nature;
Ye may doe what ye pleaſe.
Rod. I will doe all. (ruine,
Ped. And when you have done all, which is my poore
(For farther your baſe malice cannot venture)
Diſhonours ſelfe will cry you out a coward.
Hadſt thou been brave, and noble and an Enemy,
Thou wouldſt have ſought me whilſt I carried Armes,
Whilſt my good Sword was my profeſſion,
And then have cried out Pedro, I defie thee;
Then ſtuck Alphonſo's quarrell on the point,
The mercenary anger thou ſerv'ſt under
To get his daughter. Then thou ſhouldſt have brav'd me,
And arm'd with all thy families hate upon me,
Done ſomething worthy feat: Now poore and baſely
Thou ſetſt Toyles to betray me; and like the Peſant,
That dares not meet the Lyon in the face,
Digſt crafty pit-fals: Thou ſham'ſt the Spaniſh honour:
Thou haſt neither poynt of man, nor conſcience in thee.
Rod. Sir, ſir, y'are brave; ye plead now in a Sanctuary;
You think your Pilgrimes bulwarke can defend ye:
You will not finde it ſo.
Ped. I looke not for't.
The more unhallowed ſoule haſt thou to offer it. (peſt,
Rod. When you were braveſt, ſir, and your Sword ſhar-
I durſt affront ye: when the Court Sunne guilded ye,
And every cry was the young hopefull Pedro,
Alonſos ſprightly ſonne; then durſt I meet ye,
When you were Maſter of this fame, and faſhion,
And all your glories in the full Meridian,
The Kings proof-favour buckled on your body;
Had we then come to competition,
Which I have often ſought.
Ped. And I deſired too. (ſleight it,
Rod. You ſhould have ſeen this Sword, how ere you
And felt it too; ſharper then ſorrow felt it,
In execution quicker then thy ſcornes;
Thou ſhouldſt have ſeen all this, and ſhrunke to ſee it.
Then like a Gentleman I would have us'd thee,
And given thee the faire fortune of thy being,
Then with a Souldiers Arme I had honour'd thee;
But ſince thou ſtealſt upon me like a Spie,
And thiefe-like thinkſt that holy caſe ſhall carry thee
Through all my purpoſes, and ſo betray me,
Baſe as you act, thy end be, and I forget thee.
Ped. What poore evaſions thou buildſt on, to abuſe me?
The goodneſſe of a man nere taught theſe principles.
I come a Spie? durſt any Noble ſpirit
Put on this habit, to become a Traitor?

Even

Even in an Enemy ſhew me this antipathy
Where there is Chriſtian faith, and this not reverenced:
I come a Spie? no Roderigo, no,
A hater of thy perſon, a maligner?
So far from that, I brought no malice with me,
But rather when I meet thee, teares to ſoften thee;
When I put on this habit, I put off
All fires, all angers, all thoſe ſtarts of youth
That clapt too ranke a biaſſe to my being,
And drew me from the right marke all ſhould aime at;
In ſtead of ſtubborne ſteele, I put on prayers;
For raſh and haſty heats, a ſweet repentance:
Long weary ſteps, and vows, for my vain-glories.
O Roderigo.

Rod. If thy tongue could ſave thee,
Prating be thy baile, thou haſt a rare benefit.
Souldiers, come out, and bring a halter with ye;
Ile forgive your holy habit ſir, but Ile hang you.

Enter Outlawes, Leper, Jaques.

1 Out-l. Wherefore this halter Captaine?

Rod. For this traytor.
Go, put it on him, and then tie him up:

1. Do you want a Band ſir? this is a courſe wearing,
Twill ſit but ſcurvily upon this collar;
But patience is as good as a French Pickadell.

Lep. What's his fault, Captaine?

Rod. Tis my will he periſh,
And thats his fault.

Ped. A Captaine of good government.
Come Souldiers, come, ye are roughly bred, and bloody,
Shew your obedience, and the joy ye take
In executing impious commands;
Ye have a Captaine ſeales your liberall pardons,
Be no more Chriſtians, put religion by,
Twill make ye cowards: feele no tenderneſſe,
Nor let a thing call'd conſcience trouble ye;
Alaſſe, twill breed delay. Beare no reſpect
To what I ſeem: were I a Saint indeed,
Why ſhould that ſtagger ye? you know not holineſſe:
To be excellent in evill, is your goodneſſe;
And be ſo, twill become ye: have no hearts,
For feare you ſhould repent: that will be dangerous:
For if there be a knocking there, a pricking,
And that pulſe beate backe to your conſiderations,
How ye have laid a ſtiffe hand on Religion—

Rod. Truſſe him I ſay.

Ped. And violated faith,

Rod. heare him not prate.

Ped. Why, what a thing will this be?
What ſtrange confuſion then will breed among ye?

Rod. Will none of ye obey?

Ped. What devils vex ye?
The feares ye live in and the hourely dangers
Will be delights to theſe: thoſe have their ends,
But theſe outlive all time, and all repentance:
And if it creep into your conſcience once,
Be ſure ye locke that cloſe.

Rod. Why ſtand ye gazing?

Ped. Farewell ſleep, peace, all that are humane comforts,
Better ye had been Trees, or Stones, and happier;
For thoſe die here, and ſeeke no further being,
Nor hopes, nor punishments.

Rod. Rots take ye Raſcals.

Jaq. What would you have us do?

Rod. Diſpatch the prater.

Jaq. And have religious blood hang on our conſcien-
We are bad enough already: ſins enough (ces?
To make our graves even loath us.

Rod. No man love me?

Lep. Although I be a thiefe, I am no hanghan;
They are two mens trades, and let another execute.
Lay violent hands on holy things?

Rod. Baſe Cowards,
Put to your powers, ye Raſcals, I command ye.
Holy, or unholy, if I ſay it,
Ile have it done.

1 Out-l. If I do't, let me ſtarve for't.

2. Or I.

3. Or I: we will obey things handſome,
And bad enough, and over doe obedience:
But to be made ſuch inſtruments of miſchiefe.

Jaq. I have done as many villanies as another,
And with as little reluctation,
Let me come cleare of theſe, and wipe that ſcore off.
Put me upon a felt and known perdition?

Rod. Have ye conſpir'd, ye ſlaves?

Ped How vildly this ſhowes,
In one that would command anothers temper,
And beare no bound in's own?

Rod. Am I thus jaded?

Ped. Is it my life thou long'ſt for Roderigo?
And can no ſacrifice appeaſe thy malice,
But my blood ſpilt? doe it thy ſelfe, diſpatch it;
And as thou takſt the whole revenge unto thee,
Take the whole ſin upon thee; and be mighty,
Mighty in evill, as thou art in anger:
And let not theſe poore wretches houle for thy ſake.
Thoſe things that in thine owne glaſſe ſeeme moſt monſtrous,
Wouldſt thou abuſe their weak ſights with, for amiable?
Is it, thou thinkſt to feare me with thy terrors,
And into weake condition draw my vertue?
If I were now to learn to die I would ſue to thee:
Or did I feare death, then I would make thee glorious.
But knowing what, and how far I can ſuffer;
And all my whole life being but deaths preface,
My ſleep but at next doore.

Rod. Are ye ſo valiant?
Ile make ye feele: Ile make ye know, and feele too;
And Raſcals, you ſhall tremble. Keepe him here,
And keep him ſafe too: if he ſcape your guards—

Ped. Feare not, I will not.

Rod. As I live, ye die for't;
I will not be thus baffled. Exit.

Ja. What a divel have ye done, Pilgrim? or what miſchief
Have you conſpir'd, that he ſhould rage and rave thus?
Have you kild his father, or his mother? or ſtrangled any of his kindred?

Lep. Has he no ſiſters? have you not been bouncing
About their belly-pieces?

Jaq. Why ſhould that be dangerous
Or any way deſerve death? is it not naturall?
Bar us the Chriſtian liberty of women,
And build us up with brick, take away our free-ſtone.

1 Out. Becauſe thou art holier then he, upon my conſci-
He dos not envy thee: that's not his quarrell; (ence
For, look you, that might be cõpounded without praiers.

Lep. Nor that thou ſeemſt an honeſter man: for here
We have no trading with ſuch Tinſell-ſtuffe;
To be an excellent thiefe, is all we aime at. (run us?
Wilt thou take a ſpit and ſtride, and ſee if thou canſt out-

Ped. I ſcorn to ſhift his fury, keepe your obedience;
For though your government admit no preſident,
Keep your ſelves carefull in't.

Jaq. Thou will be hang'd then.

Ped. I cannot die with fewer faults upon me.

2 Out-l.

2 Out-l. Tis ten to one he wil ſhoot him: for the devil's (in him
If he hang him himſelfe.
Lop. He has too proud a nature:
He will compell ſome one.
Jaq. I am confident.
Lop. And ſo are all I thinke.
Ped. Be not moleſted,
If I muſt die, let it not trouble you;
It ſtirs not me: It is the end I was born for.
Onely this honeſt office I deſire ye,
(If there be curteſie in men of your breed)
To ſee me buried; not to let his fury
Expoſe my body to the open violence
Of beaſts, and fowles: ſo far I urge humanity.

Enter Roderigo, Alinda.

Jaq. He ſhall not deny us that: we'l ſee ye under ground
And give ye a volley of as good cups of Sacke,
For that's our Diſcipline.
Lop. He comes againe,
As high in rage as ever; the boy with him.
1 Out-l. Will he compell the child?
Lop. He is bent to doe it,
And muſt have ſome body.
Rod. If thou lov'ſt me doe it:
Love me, or love me not, I ſay thou ſhalt doe it:
Stare not, nor ſtagger, ſirra; if ye deny me,
Doe you ſee this Rogue?
Alin. What would ye have me doe ſir?
Heavens goodneſſe bleſſe me.
Rod. Doe? why hang a Raſcall,
That would hang me.
Alin. I am a boy, and weake, ſir.
Rod. Thou art ſtrong enough to tie him to a Bough,
And turn him off: come, thou ſhalt be my Jewell,
And Ile allow thee horſe, and all thy pleaſures,
And twenty gallant things: Ile teach thee armes too;
Make thee mine heire.
Alin. Let me inherit death firſt.
Rod. Make me not angry, ſirha.
Alin. Which is the man, ſir?
Ile pluck up the beſt heart I can yet.
Rod. Feare not,
It is my will: That in the Pilgrimes coate there,
That devill in the Saints skin.
Alin. Guard me goodneſſe.
Rod. Diſpatch him preſently.
Ped. I wait your worſt, ſir.
Jaq. will the boy doe it? is the rogue ſo confident?
So young, ſo deep in blood?
Lop. He ſhakes, and trembles.
Ped. Doſt thou ſeeke more coles ſtill to fear thy conſci- (ence, Worke ſacred innocence, to be a devill? (ence,
Doe it thy ſelfe for ſhame, thou beſt becomſt it.
Rod. Sirha, I ſcorn my finger ſhould be filde with thee;
And yet Ile have it done: this child ſhall ſtrangle thee,
A crying Girle, if ſhe were here ſhould maſter thee.
Ali. How ſhould I ſave him? how my ſelf from violence?
Ped. Leave your tongue-valour, & diſpatch your hate, ſir;
The patience of my death, ſhall more torment thee,
(Thou painted honour, thou baſe man made backward)
Then all my life has fear'd thee.
Rod. Gag him, ſirha.
Jaq. The Boy looks cheerfully now: ſure he will do it.
Lop. He will mall him elſe.
Alin. Are ye prepar'd to die, ſir?
Ped. Yes boy, and ready; prethee to thy buſineſſe.
Alin. Why are ye then ſo angry? ſo perplext, ſir?
Patience wins Heaven, and not the heat of paſſion.
Why doe you rayle?
Lop. The boy's a pretty Prieſt.
Ped. I thank ye gentle child, you teach me truely.
Alin. You ſeem to feare too.
Ped. Thou ſeeſt more, then I feel, boy.
Alin. You tremble ſure.
Ped. No ſure boy, tis thy tenderneſſe:
Prethee make haſte, and let that gulph be ſatisfied.
Alin. Are ye ſo willing to goe to it?
Ped. Moſt willing:
I would not borrow from his curteſie
One houre of life, to gaine an age of glory.
Alin. And is your reckoning ſtraight ſir?
Ped. As ſtraight as truth, boy:
I cannot go more joyfully to a wedding.
Alin. Then to your prayers: Ile diſpatch ye preſently.
Now guid my tongue, thou bleſſedneſſe.
Rod. A good boy. (me.
Alin. But harke ye ſir, one word; and pray ye reſolve
Let me ſpeake privately.
Rod. What wouldſt thou have child?
Alin. Shall this man die?
Rod. Why doſt thou make that queſtion?
Alin. Pray ye be not angry: if he muſt, Ile doe it.
But muſt he now?
Rod. What elſe? who dare reprieve him?
Alin. Pray ye thinke againe; and as your injuries
Are great, and full, you ſuffer from this fellow,
Doe not ye purpoſe ſo to ſuit your vengeance?
Rod. I doe, and muſt.
Alin. You cannot if he die now.
Rod. Cannot?
Alin. No, cannot: be not vext, you'l finde it.
I have conſidered, and I know it certaine,
Ye ſuffer below him: loſe all your angers.
Rod. Why my beſt boy?
Alin. I love, and tender ye,
I would not tell ye elſe. Is that revenge,
To ſleight your cauſe, and Saint your enemy,
Clap the Doves wings of downy peace unto him,
And let him ſoare to Heaven, whilſt you are ſighing?
Is this revenge?
Rod. I would have him die.
Alin. Prepar'd thus?
The bleſſing of a father never reach'd it:
His contemplation now ſcornes ye, contemnes ye,
And all the tortors ye can uſe. Let him die thus;
And theſe that know and love revenge will laugh at ye:
Here lies the honour of a wel-bred anger,
To make his enemy ſhake and tremble under him;
Doubt: nay, almoſt deſpaire, and then confound him.
This man ye rocke aſleep, and all your rages
Are Requ'ems to his parting ſoule, meere Anthems.
Rod. Indeed he is ſtrongly built.
Alin. You cannot ſhake him;
And the more waight ye put on his foundation,
Now as he ſtands, ye fixe him ſtill the ſtronger;
If ye love him, honour him, would heape upon him
Friendſhips and benefits beyond example,
Hope him a Star in Heaven, and there would ſtick him;
Now take his life.
Rod. I had rather take mine own, Boy.
Alin. Ile eaſe him preſently.
Rod. Stay, be not haſty.
Alin. Bleſſe my tongue ſtill.
Lop. What has the boy done to him?
How dull, and ſtill he lookes?
Alin. You are a wiſe man.

And long have buckled with the worlds extremities,
A valiant man, and no doubt know both fortunes,
And would ye work your Maſter-peece thus madly,
Take the bare name of honour, that will pitty ye(grim?
When the world knows ye have prey'd on a poor Pil-Rod. The Boy has ſtaggard me: what would'ſt thou have Alin. Have ye? do you not feel Sir? do's it not ſtir ye? (me?
Doe you aske a child? I would have ye do moſt bravely,
Becauſe I moſt affect ye: like your ſelfe Sir,
Scorn him, and let him goe; ſeem to contemne him,
And now ye have made him ſhake, ſeale him his pardon,
When he appears a ſubject fit for Anger,
And fit for you, his pious Armour off,
His hopes no higher then your ſword may reach at
Then ſtrike, and then ye know revenge; then take it.
I hope I have turn'd his mind.
Rod. Let the foole goe there,
I ſcorn to let looſe ſo baſe an anger
May light on thee: See me no more, but quit me;
And when we meet again.
Ped. I'le thank ye Captaine. Exit.
Alin. Why this was like your ſelfe: but which way Shall we ne're happy meet? (goes he?
Rod. I am drowſie; Boy,
Goe with me, and diſcourſe: I like thy company
O Child! I love thy Tongue.
Alin. I ſhall waite on ye. Exit.
Lo. The Boy has don't: a Plaguey witty Raſcall.
And I ſhall love him terribly.
Iaq. 'Twas he moſt certaine,
For if ye marke, how earneſt he was with him,
And how he labour'd him.
Lop. A cuning villaine,
But a good Rogue; 'This Boy will make's all honeſt.
1. Outl. I ſcarce beleeve that: but I like the Boy well
Come, let's to Supper; then upon our watches.
Lop. This Pilgrim ſcap'd a joyfull one.
Iaq. Let's Drink round,
To the Boyes health, and then about our buſineſſe.
Exeunt

Actus Tertius. Scena prima.

Enter Roderigo, Iaques, Loper, and three Out-Lawes.

Rod. None of you know her?
Iaq. Alas Sir, we never ſaw her:
Nor ever heard of her, but from your report.
Rod. No happy eye?
Lop. I doe not think 'tis ſhe, Sir,
Me thinks a woman dares not.
Rod. Thou ſpeak'ſt poorely,
What dares not woman, when ſhe is provok'd?
Or what ſeemes dangerous to Love, or fury?
That it is ſhe, this has confirm'd me certain,
Theſe Jewels here, a part of which I ſent her,
And though unwilling, yet her Father wrought her
To take, and weare.
Lop. A wench, and we not know it?
And among us? where were our underſtandings?
I could have gheſſ'd unhappily: have had ſome feeling
In ſuch a matter: Here are as pretty fellowes,
At the diſcovery of ſuch a Jigambob:
A handſome wench too? ſure we have loſt our faculties,
We have no motions: what ſhould ſhe doe here, Sir?
Rod. That's it that troubles me: O that baſe Raſcall!
There lies the miſery: how cunningly ſhe quit him,
And how ſhe urg'd? had ye been conſtant to me,
I ne're had ſuffer'd this.
1. Outl. Ye might have hang'd him:
And would he had been hang'd, that's all we care for't:
So our hands had not don't.
Rod She is gone again too, (me;
And what care have ye for that? gone, and contemn'd
Maſter'd my will, and power, and now laughs at me.
Lop. The devill that brought her hither, Sir I thinke
Has carryed her back again inviſible,
For we ne're knew, nor heard of her departure.
Iaq. No living thing came this night through our (watches
She went with you:
Rod. Was by me till I ſlept,
But when I wak'd, and call'd: O my dull pate here,
If I had open'd this when it was given me,
This Roguy Box. Enter Al-
Lop. We could but give it ye. phonſo, and 2 Outlaw.
Rod Pilgrime? a Pox O Pilgrimes there the game goes,
There's all my fortune fled; I know it, I feele it.
Al. Bring me unto thy Captain: where's thy Captain?
I am founder'd, melted, ſome fairy thing or other
Has led me dauncing; the devill has haunted me
Ith' likeneſſe of a voyce: give me thy Captaine.
2. Outl. He's here Sir, there he ſtands.
Al. How do'ſt thou Captain?
I have been fool'd and jaded, made a dogge bolt.
My daughters runne away: I have been haunted too,
I have loſt my horſe; I am hungry, & out of my wits alſo.
Rod. Come in; I'le tell you what I know: ſtrange things
And take your eaſe; I'le follow her recovery,
Theſe ſhall be yours the whil'ſt, and do ye ſervice. (too.
Al. Let me have drinke enough: I am almoſt choak'd
Rod. You ſhall have any thing; what think you now, Iaq. I think a woman, is a woman that's (Souldiers?
any thing.
The next we take, we'l ſearch a little neerer,
We'l not be boyed again with a paire of breeches. Exeunt.

Scena ſecunda.

Enter Iuletta.

Iul. He's gone in here: This is Roderigo's quarter,
And i'le be with him ſoone: I'le ſtartle him,
A little better then I have done: All this long night
I have led him out o'th way, to try his patience, (againe,
And made him ſweare, and curſe; and pray, and ſweare
And cry for anger; I made him leave his horſe too,
Where he can never find him more; whiſtled to him,
And then he would run through thick & thin, to reach
And down in this ditch; up again, and ſhake him, (me,
And ſwear ſome certaine bleſſings; then into that buſh
Pop goes his pate, and all his face is comb'd over,
And I ſit laughing: a hundred tricks, I have ſerv'd him:
And I will double em, before I leave him;
I'le teach his anger to diſpute with women,
But all this time, I cannot meet my Miſtreſſe,
I cannot come to comfort her; that grieves me,
For ſure ſhe is much afflicted: till I doe,
I'le haunt thy Ghoſt Alphonſo; I'le keep thee waking,
Yes, I muſt get a Drum: I am villanous weary,
And yet i'le trot about theſe villages
Till I have got my will, and then have at ye.
I'le make your anger drop out at your elbowes ere I leave (ye. Exit.

Scena

Scena Tertia.

Enter Seberto, and Curio.

Seb. 'Tis ſtrange, in all the circuit we have ridden,
We cannot croſſe her: no way light upon her:
Cur. I doe not think ſhe is gone thus far, or this way,
For certain if ſhe had, we ſhould have reach'd her (thing.
Made ſome diſcovery: heard ſome news; we have ſeen no-
Seb. Nor paſſe by any body that could promiſe any
She is certainly diſguiſ'd, her modeſty (thing.
Durſt never venture elſe.
Cur. Let her take any ſhape,
And let me ſee it once, I can diſtinguiſh it.
Seb. So ſhould I think too: has not her father found her?
Cur. No, i'le be hang'd then; he has no patience
Unleſſe ſhe light in's teeth, to looke about him.
He gueſſes now, and chafes and frets like Tinſell.
Seb. Let him goe on, he cannot live without it.
But keep her from him, heaven: where are we Curio?
Cur. In a wood I think, hang me if I know elſe.
And yet I have ridden all theſe Coaſts, at all houres,
And had and aime.
Seb. I would we had a guid,
Cur. And if I be not much awry Seberto,
Not far off ſhould be Rodorigo's quarter,
For in this Faſtwes if I be not cozen'd,
He and his Out-laws live.
Seb. This is the place then Enter Alinda.
We appointed him to meet in.
Cur. Yes, I thinke ſo: (that there?
Seb. Would we could meet ſome living thing: what's Cur. A Boy, I think, ſtay; why may not he direct us.
Alin. I am hungry, and I am weary, and I cannot find Keep my wits heaven, I feele 'em wavering, (him.
O God my head.
Seb. Boy, doſt thou heare, thou ſtripling?
Alin. Now they will teare me, torture me, now Ro-
Will hang him without mercy; ha: (derigo
Cur. Come hither.
A very pretty Boy: what place is this, child?
And whether doſt thou travell? how he ſtares!
Some ſtubborn Maſter has abu'd the Boy,
And beaten him: how he complaines! whether goeſt Alin. I goe to Segonia Sir, to my ſick Mother, (thou?
I have been taken here by drunken theeves,
And (O my bones;) I have been beaten Sir.
Miſ-us'd, & rob'd: extreamly beaten Gentlemen,
O God, my ſide!
Seb. What beaſts would uſe a Boy thus?
Look up, and be of good cheer:
Alin. O, I cannot.
My back, my back, my back.
Cur. What theeves?
Alin. I know not.
But they call the Captaine Rodorigo.
Cur. Look ye,
I know we were there abouts;
Seb. Do'ſt thou want any thing?
Alin. Nothing but eaſe, but eaſe, Sir.
Cur. There's ſome mony,
And get thee to thy Mother.
Alin. I thank ye Gentlemen:
Seb. This was extreamely foule, to vex a Child thus.
Come, let's along, we cannot looſe our way now. Ex.
Alin. Though ye are honeſt men, I feare your fingers,
And glad I am got off; O how I tremble!
Send me but once within his armes dear Fortune,
And then come all the world: what ſhall I do now?
'Tis almoſt night again, and where to lodge me, Enter
Or get me meat, or any thing, I know not. Iuletta.
Theſe wild woods, and the fancies I have in me,
Will run me mad.
Iul. Boy, Boy:
Alin. More ſet to take me?
Iul. Do'ſt thou heare Boy; thou pointer.
Alin. 'Tis a Boy too,
A Lacky Boy: I need not feare his feirceneſſe.
Iul. Canſt thou beat a Drum?
Alin. A Drum?
Iul. This thing, a drum here. (grumble?
Didſt thou never ſee a Drum: Canſt thou make this Alin. Iulettas face, and tongue; Is ſhe run mad too?
Here may be double craft: I have no skill in't.
Iul. I'le give thee a Royall but to goe along with me.
Alin. I care not for thy Royall, I have other buſineſſe,
Drum to thy ſelfe, and daunce to it.
Iul. Sirha, Sirha. (heare me?
Thou ſcurvy Sitha; thou ſnotty-nos'd ſcab, do'ſt thou
If I lay downe my Drum. Enter Rodorigo,
Alin. Here comes more Company, and two Outlaw.
I feare a plot, heaven ſend me fairely from it. Exit.
Iul. Baſto; who's here?
Lop. Captain, do you need me Father? (now.
Rod. No not a foot: give me the gowne: the ſword
Iul. This is the devill theef, and if he take me,
Woe be to my Gally-gaſkins.
Lop. Certaine Sir,
She will take her patches of, and change her habit.
Rod. Let her do what ſhe pleaſe: No, no Alinda
You cannot cozen me againe in a Boyes figure,
Nor hide the beauty of that face in patches,
But I ſhall know it.
Iul. A Boy his face in patches? (Anger,
Rod. Nor ſhall your tongue againe bewitch mine
If ſhe be found ith' woods, ſend me word preſently,
And i'le returne; ſhe cannot be farre gone yet,
If ſhe be not, expect me, when ye ſee me,
Uſe all your ſervice to my friend Alphonſo,
And have a care to your buſineſſe: farewell,
No more, farewell. Exeunt.
Iul. I am heartily glad thou art gone yet.
This Boy in patches, was the Boy came by me,
The very ſame, how haſtily it ſhifted?
What a mopp'-eyed aſſe was I, I could not know her,
This muſt be ſhe, this is ſhe, now I remember her,
How loth ſhe was to talk too, how ſhe fear'd me?
I could now piſſe mine eyes out for meer anger:
I'le follow her, but who ſhall vex her father then?
One flurt at him, and then I am for the voyage,
If I can croſſe the Captain too: Come Tabor. Exit.

Scena quarta.

Enter Iaques, and 1 Out-Law.

Iaq. Are they all ſet?
1 Outl. All, and each quarter quiet.
Iaq. Is the old man aſleep?
1 Outl. An houre ago Sir.
Iaq. We muſt be very carefull in his abſence,
And very watchfull.
1 Outl. It concerns us nearely,
He will not be long from us.
Iaq. No, he cannot,

1 Out-l. A little heate of love, which he muſt wander out. Drum a far off.
And then again: harke.
Jaq. What?
1 Out-l. Tis not the wind ſure:
That's ſtill and calme; no noyſe, nor flux of waters.
Jaq. I heare a Drum, I thinke.
1 Out-l. That that;
It beats againe now.
Jaq. Now it comes neerer: ſure we are ſurprized, ſir;
Some from the Kings command: we are loſt, we are dead all.
1 Out-l. Hark, hark, a charge now: my Captaine has betray'd us.
And left us to this ruine, run away from us..
Enter two Out-lawes.
Lop. Another beates o'that ſide.
2 Out-l. Fly, flie, Jaques,
We are taken in a toyle: ſnapt in a pitfall;
Methinks I feele a Sword already ſhave me.
3 Out-l A thouſand horſe and foot, a thouſand pioners,
If we get underground, to fetch us out againe;
And every one an Axe to cut the woods downe.
Lop. This is the diſmalſt night--- Exit.
Enter Alphonſo.
Alp. Where's my nag now?
And what make I here to be hang'd? What devill brought me into this danger? Is there nere a hole?
That I may creep in deep enough, and die quickly?
Nere an old ditch to choke in? I ſhall be taken
For their Commander now, their Generall,
And have a commanding Gallows ſet up for me
As high as a May-pole; and naſty Songs made on me,
Be printed with a Pint-pot and a dagger.
They are all kill'd by this time: Can I pray?
Let me ſee that firſt: I have too much feare to be faithfull.
Where's all my State now? I muſt go hunt for daughters;
Daughters, and damſels of the Lake, damned daughters.
A hundred Crownes for a good tod of Hay,
Or a fine hollow Tree, that would containe me;
I heare 'em comming: I feele the nooze about me.
Enter Seberto, Curio, Outlaws, Jaques.
Seb. Why do you fear, and fly? here are no Souldiers;
None from the King to vex ye.
1 Outl. The Drum, the Drum, ſir.
Cur. I never ſaw ſuch Pigeon-hearted people:
What Drum? what danger? who's that that ſhakes behind there:
Mercy upon me ſir, why are ye fear'd, thus?
Alp. Are we all kill'd, no mercy to be hoped for?
Am I not ſhot do you think?
Seb. You are ſtrangely frighted,
Shot with a fiddle ſtick: who's here to ſhoot ye?
A Drum we ſaw indeed, a boy was beating it,
And hunting Squirrels by Moon-light.
Lop. Nothing elſe, ſir?
Cur. Not any thing: no other perſon ſtirring.
Alp. O that I had that boy: this is that Devill,
That fairy rogue, that haunted me laſt night;
H'as ſleeves like Dragons wings.
Seb. A little Foot-boy.
Alp. Come, let's go in, and let me get my clothes on;
If ere I ſtay here more to be thus martyr'd -
Did ye not meet the wench?
Seb. No ſure, we met her not.
Alp. She has been here in boyes apparrell, Gentlemen,
A gallant thing, and famous for a Gentlewoman,
And all her face patcht over for diſcovery:
A pilgrime too, and thereby hangs a circumſtance,
That ſhe hath playd her maſter-prize, a rare one.
I came too ſhort.
Cur. Such a young boy we met ſir.
Alp. In a gray hat.
Cur. The ſame: his face all patcht too.
Alp. Twas ſhe, a rot run with her; ſhe: that ranck ſhe;
Walk in, Ile tell ye all: and then we'l part again,
But get ſome ſtore of Wine: this fright ſits here yet. Ex.
Enter Juletta.
Jul. What a fright I have put 'em in; what a brave hurry.
If this doe bolt him, Ile be with him againe
With a new part, was never play'd; Ile ferk him.
As he hunts her, ſo ile hunt him: Ile claw him.
Now will I ſee if I can croſſe her footing:
Yet ſtill ile watch his water, he ſhall pay for't;
And when he thinks moſt malice, and meanes worſe,
Ile make him know the Mare's the better Horſe. Exit.

Scena quinta.

Enter Pedro, and a Gentleman.

Gent. Ye are a ſtranger ſir, and for humanity,
Being come within our walls, I would ſhew you ſome-
Ye have ſeen the Caſtle? (thing.
Ped. Yes ſir, tis a ſtrong one,
And well maintain'd.
Gent. Why are you ſtill thus ſad, ſir?
How doe ye like the walkes?
Ped. They are very pleaſant;
Your Town ſtands coole and ſweet.
Gent. But that I would not Affect you with more ſadneſſe, I could ſhew ye
A place worth view.
Ped. Showes ſeldome alter me ſir;
Pray ye ſpeake it, and then ſhew it.
Gen. Tis a houſe here
Where people of all ſorts, that have been viſited
With lunacies and follies waite their cures,
Their's fancies of a thouſand ſtamps and faſhions,
Like flies in ſeverall ſhapes buze round about ye,
And twice as many geſtures; ſome of pitty,
That it would make ye melt to ſee their paſſions:
And ſome as light againe, that would content ye.
But I ſee ſir, your temper is too modeſt,
Too much inclin'd to contemplation,
To meet with theſe?
Ped. You could not pleaſe me better;
And I beſeech you ſir, doe me the honour
To let me waite upon ye.
Gent. Since ye are willing,
To me it ſhall be a pleaſure to conduct ye.
Ped. I never had ſuch a mind yet to ſee miſery. Exeunt.

Scena ſexta.

Enter two Keepers.

1 Keep. Carry mad Beſſe ſome meat, ſhe roares like Thunder;
And tie the Parſon ſhort, the Moone's ith full,
H'as a thouſand Pigs in's braines: Who lookes to the Prentize?
Keep him from women, he thinks h'as loſt his Miſtris,
And talke of no ſilke ſtuffes, 'twill runne him horn mad.
2 Keep. The Juſtice keeps ſuch a ſtirre yonder with his Charges,
And ſuch a coyle with warrants,

1 K. Take away his Statutes;
The divell has poſſeſt him in the likeneſſe
Of penall Lawes: keep him from Aquavite,
For if that ſpirit creep into his corum,
He will commit us all: how is it with the Scholler?
2 K. For any thing I ſee, he's in his right wits.
1 K. Thou art an aſſe; in's right wits, goodman coxcomb?
As though any man durſt be in's right wits, and be here.
It is as much as we dare be that keep 'em.

Enter Engliſh madman.

Engl. Give me ſome drink.
1 K. O, there's the Engliſh man.
Engl. Fill me a thouſand pots, and froth 'em, froth 'em.
Down o' your knees, ye rogues, and pledge me roundly;
One, two, three, and foure; we ſhall be all merry within this houre.
To the great Turke.
1 K. Peace, peace, thou Heathen drunkard; 'em;
Theſe Engliſh are ſo Malt-mad, there's no medling with
When they have a fruitfull yeere of Barly there,
All the whole Iſland's thus.
Engl. A Snuff, a ſnuff, a ſnuff.
A lewd notorious ſnuff: giv't him againe, boy.

Enter Shee-fool.

Fool. God-ye-good even, Goſſer.
2 K. Who let the Foole looſe?
1 K. If any of the mad-men take her, ſhe is pepper'd,
They'l bounce her loynes.
Foole. Will ye walke into the cole houſe?
1 K. She is as leacherous too as a ſhe-ferret.
2 K. Who a vengeance looks to her? go in Kate,
Ile give thee a fine Apple.
Foole. Will ye buſſe me?
And tickle me, and make me laugh?
1 K. Ile whip ye.
Engl. Foole, foole, come up to me foole.
Foole. Are ye peeping?
Engl. Ile get thee with five fooles.
Foole. O fine, O dainty.
Engl. And thou ſhalt lie in in a horſe-cloth, like a Lady Foole. And ſhall I have a Coach?
Engl. Drawn with foure Turkeys,
And they ſhall tread thee too.
Foole. We ſhall have egges then;
And ſhall I ſit upon 'em?
Engl. I, I, and they ſhall be all addle,
And make an admirable Tanzey for the divell.
Come, come away, I am taken with thy love foole,
And will mightily belabour thee.
1 K. How the foole bridles? how ſhe twitters at him?
Theſe Engliſhmen would ſtagger a wiſe-woman.
If we ſhould ſuffer her to have her will now, (here,
We ſhould have all the women in Spaine as mad as ſhe
2 K. They would ſtrive who ſhould be moſt fool: away with her.

Enter Maſter, three Gentlemen, a mad Scholler, and Pedro.

Foole. Pray ye ſtay a little: lets heare him ſing, h'as a fine breaſt.
1 K. Here comes my Maſter; to the ſpit ye whore,
And ſtir no more abroad, but tend your buſineſſe;
Your ſhall have no more ſops ith' pan elſe, nor no por-Beſides, Ile whip your breech. (rige:
Foole. Ile goe in preſently.
1 Gent. Ile aſſure ye ſir, the Cardinal's angry with ye
For keeping this young man.
Maſt. I am heartily ſorry.
If ye allow him ſound, pray ye take him with ye.
1 Gent. This is the place, and now obſerve their humors:
2 Gent. We can find nothing in him light, nor tainted;
No ſtartings, nor no rubs, in all his anſwers,
In all his Letters nothing but diſcretion,
Learning, and handſome ſtile.
Maſt. Be not deceived ſir,
Marke but his looke.
1 Gent. His griefe, and his impriſonment
May ſtamp that there.
Maſt. Pray talke with him again then. (enough,
2 Gent. That will be needleſſe, we have tride him long
And if he had a taint we ſhould have met with't.
Yet to diſcharge your care —
Ped. A ſober youth:
Pity ſo heavy a croſſe ſhould light upon him.
2 Gent. You finde no ſickneſſe?
Schol. None ſir, I thank Heaven,
Nor nothing that diverts my underſtanding.
1 Gent. Doe you ſleep a nights?
Schol. As ſound, and ſweet, as any man:
2 Gent. Have ye no fearfull dreams?
Schol. Sometimes, as all have
That go to bed with raw and windy ſtomacks;
Elſe, I am all one piece.
1 Gent. Is there no unkindneſſe
You have conceiv'd from any friend or parent?
Or ſcorne from what ye lov'd?
Schol. No, truely ſir:
I never yet was maſter of a faith
So poore, and weake, to doubt my friend or kindred,
And what love is, unleſſe it lie in learning
I thinke I am ignorant.
2 Gent. This man is perfect,
A civiller diſcourſer I nere talk'd with.
Maſt. You'l finde it otherwiſe.
2 Gent. I muſt tell ye true ſir,
I thinke ye keep him here to teach him madneſſe.
Here's his diſcharge from my Lord Cardinall;
And come ſir, goe with us.
Schol. I am bound unto ye,
And farewell Maſter.
Maſt. Farewell Stephano,
Alas poore man.
1 Gent. What ſtaws, and whirles of weather,
Or rather ſtorms have been aloft theſe three daies;
How darke, and hot, and full of mutiny!
And ſtill grows lowder.
Maſt. It has been ſtubborn weather. (ling.
2 Gent. Strange work at Sea, I fear me there's old tum-
1 Gent. Bleſſe my old ankles Barke, I have a venture.
2 Gent. And I more then I would wiſh to loſe.
Scho. Doe you feare?
2 Gent. Ha! how he lookes?
Maſt. Nay, marke him better Gentlemen.
2 Gent. Mercy upon me: how his eyes are altered?
Maſt. Now tell me how ye like him: whether now
He be that perfect man ye credited?
Scho. Doe's the Sea ſtagger ye?
Maſt. Now ye have hit the nick.
Scho. Doe ye feare the billowes?
1 Gent. What ailes him? who has ſtir'd him?
Scho. Be not ſhaken,
Nor let the ſinging of the ſtorm ſhoot through ye,
Let it blow on, blow on: let the clouds wraſtle,
And let the vapours of the earth turn mutinous,
The Sea in hideous mountaines riſe and tumble
Upon a Dolphins back, Ile make all tremble,
For I am Neptune.

Maſt.

Mast. Now what think ye of him?
2 Gent. Alas poore man.
Scho. Your Barke shall plough through all,
And not a Surge so saucy to disturbe her.
Ile see her safe, my power shall saile before her.

Down ye angry waters all,
Te loud whistling whirlwinds fall;
Down ye proud Waves, ye stormes cease;
I command ye, be at peace.
Fright not with your churlish Notes,
Nor bruise the Keele of Bark, that flotes:
No devouring Fish come nigh,
Nor Monster in my Empery.
Once shew his head, or terror bring;
But let the weary Saylor sing:
Amphitrite with white armes
Strike my Lute, Ile sing Charmes.

Mast. He must have Musicke now: I must observe him.
His fit will grow to full else. Musick, Song.
2 Gent. I must pitty him.
Mast. Now he will in himselfe most quietly,
And clean forget all, as he had done nothing.
1 Gent. We are sorry, sir: and we have seen a wonder;
From this houre we'l believe, and so we'l leave ye. Exit.
Ped. This was a strange fit.
Mast. Did ye marke him sir?
Ped. He might have cozen'd me with his behaviour.
Mast. Many have sworn him right, and I have thought Yet on a sudden, from some word, or other, (so:
When no man could expect a fit, he has flown out:
I dare not give him will.
Enter Alinda.
Ped. Pray Heaven recover him.
Alin. Must I come in too?
Mast. No, my pretty Lad;
Keep in thy chamber Boy: 'shalt have thy supper.
Ped. I pray ye what is he sir?
Mast. A strange boy, that last night
Was found i'th' Town, a little craz'd, distracted,
And so sent hither.
Ped. How the pretty knave looks,
And playes, and peepes upon me! sure such eyes
I have seen, and lov'd: what fair hands? certainly—Mast. Good sir, you'l make him worse.
Ped. I pray believe not.
Alas, why should I hurt him? how he 'smiles?
The very shape, and swetnesse of Alinda:
Let me look once againe: were it in such clothes
As when I saw her last; this must be she.
How tenderly it stroakes me?
Mast. Pray ye be mild sir;
I must attend elsewhere. Exit.
Ped. Pray ye be secure sir;
What would ye say? how my heart beates and trembles?
He holds me hard by th' hand; O my life, her flesh too!
I know not what to think: her teares, her true ones;
Pure orient teares: Hark, doe you know me little one?
Alin. O Pedro Pedro!
Ped. O my soule!
Gent. What fit's this?
The Pilgrimes off the hooks too.
Alin. Let me hold thee,
And now come all the world, and all that hate me.
Ped. Be wise, and not discovered: O how I love ye!
How doe ye now?
Alin. I have been miserable;
But your most vertuous eyes have cur'd me, Pedro:
Pray ye thinke it no immodesty, I kisse ye;
My head's wild still.
Ped. Be not so full of passion,
Nor do not hang so greedily upon me;
Twill be ill taken.
Alin. Are ye weary of me?
I will hang here eternally, kisse ever,
And weep away for joy.
Enter Master.
Mast. I told ye sir,
What ye would doe: for shame doe not afflict him;
You have drawn his fit upon him fearfully:
Either depart, and presently; Ile force ye else.
Who waits within?
Enter two Keepers to fetch 'em off.
Ped. Alas good sir.
This is the way never to hope recovery. (nour.
Stay but one minute more, Ile complaine to the Gover-
Bring in the boy: doe you see how he swels, and teares himselfe?
Is this your cure? Be gon; if the boy miscarry
Let me nere find you more, for ile so hamper ye—
Gent. You were too blame: too rash.
Ped. Farewell for ever. Exeunt.

Actus quartus, Scena prima.

Enter Alphonso, Gent. Juletta.

Gent. You are now within a mile oth' Towne sir: if my businesse
Would give me leave, I would turne and waite upon ye;
But for such Gentlemen as you enquire of,
Certaine, I saw none such: But for the boy ye spoke of,
I will not say tis he, but such a one;
Just of that height.
Alph. In such clothes?
Gent. I much mistake else,
Was sent in th'other night, a little maddish,
And where such people waite their cures.
Alp. I understand ye.
Gent. There you may quickly know.
Alp. I thanke ye sir.
Jul. So doe I to: and if there be such a place,
I aske no more; but you shall heare more of me.
She may be there, and you may play the tyrant;
Ile see what I can doe: I am almost foundred
In following him; and yet Ile never leave him,
Ile crawle of all foure first; my cause is meritorious,
And come what can come.
Gent. All you have told me is certaine;
Complexion, and all else.
Alph. It may be she then;
And ile so fumble her: Is she growne mad now?
Is her blood set so high? ile have her madded,
Ile have her worm'd.
Jul. Marke but the end, old Master,
If thou beest not sicke oth' Boes within these five hours,
And kickst and roar'st; Ile make ye fart fire, Signior,
Enter Alinda, as a foole.
Gent. Here's one oth' house, a foole, an idiot sir;
May be she is going home; she'l be a guide to ye:
And so I kisse your hand. Exit.
Alph. I am your servant.
Alin. O now I am lost, lost, lost, Lord, how I tremble!

My father, arm'd in all his hates and angers;
This is more misery then I have scap'd yet.
Alp. Foole, foole.
Alin. He knows me not; will ye give me two-pence?
And gaffer, here's a Crow-flower, and a Dazie;
I have some pie in my pocket too.
Alp. This is an arrant foole,
An ignorant thing.
Alin. Believe so, and I am happy.
Alp. Dost thou dwell in Sigonia, foole?
Alin. No no, I dwell in Heaven.
And I have a fine little house, made of Marmalad.
And I am a lone woman, and I spin for Saint Peter;
I have a hundred little children, and they sing Psalmes with me.
Alp. Tis pity this pretty thing should want understanding.
But why doe I stand talking with a coxcombe?
If I doe finde her, if I light upon her,
Ile say no more. Is this the way to th' Town, foole?
Alin. You must goe over the top of that high steeple, Alp. A plague o' your fooles face. (Gaffer.
Jul. No, take her counsell. (over,
Alin. And then you shall come to a River twenty mile
And twenty mile & ten: and then you must pray, Gaffer;
And still you must pray, and pray.
Alp. Pray Heaven deliver me
From such an asse, as thou art.
Alin. Amen, sweet Gaffer.
And fling a sop of Suger-cake into it;
And then you must leap in naked.
Jul. Would he would believe her.
Alin. And sink seven daies together, can ye sinck gaffer?
Alp. Yes coxcombe, yes; prethee farewell: a pox on
A plague o' that foole too, that set me upon thee. (thee.
Alin. And then Ile bring you a sup of Milke shal serve
I am going to get Apples. (ye:
Alp. Go to th' devill:
Was ever man tormented with a puppy thus?
Thou tell me news? thou be a guide?
Alin. And then Nunkle---
Alp. Prethee keepe on thy way (good Nannt) I could rayle now
These ten houres at mine owne improvidence:
Get Apples, and be choak'd: farewell. Exit.
Alin. Farewell Nuncle.
Jul. I rejoyce in any thing that vexes him;
And I shall love this foole extreamly for't:
Could I but see my Mistris now, to tell her
How I have truely, honestly wrought for her,
How I have worne my selfe away, to serve her.
Foole, there's a Royall for the sport thou mad'st me,
In crossing that old foole, that parted from thee.
Alin. Thou art honest sure; but yet thou must not see
I thanke ye little Gentleman: Heaven blesse ye (me:
And ile pray for ye too: pray ye keep this Nutmeg,
Twas sent me from the Lady of the Mountaine.
A golden Lady.
Jul. How prettily it prattles.
Alin. Tis very good to rub your understanding:
And so good night: the Moone's up.
Jul. Pretty innocent.
Alin. Now fortune, if thou dar'st do good, protect me.
Exit.
Jul. Ile follow him to yond Towne: he shall not scape me:
Stay, I must counterfeit a Letter by the way first, (else,
And one that must carry some credit with it: I am wide
And all this to no purpose that I ayme at.
A Letter must be had, and neatly handled:
And then if Goodwife fortune doe not faile me,
Have at his skirts: I shall worse anger him
Then ever I have done, and worse torment him.
It do's me good to thinke how I shall conjure him.
And crucifie his crabbednesse: he's my Master,
But that's all one: Ile lay that on the left hand.
He would now persecute my harmlesse Mistris,
A fault without forgivenesse, as I take it;
And under that bold banner flies my vengeance,
A meritorious war, and so Ile make it.
I'th' name of Innocence, what's this the foole gave me?
She said twas good to rub my understanding.
What strange concealment? Bread or Cheese, or a Chest-nut?
Ha! tis a Ring: a pretty Ring, a right one:
A ring I know too! the very same Ring:
O admirable Blockhead! O base eyes!
A Ring my Mistris tooke from me, and wore it;
I know it by the Posie: Prick me, and heale me.
None could deliver this, but she her selfe too:
Am I twice sand-blind? twice so neer the blessing
I would arive at? and block-like never know it?
I am veng'ance angry, but that shal light on thee,
And heavily, and quickly, I pronounce it:
There are so many crosse waies, there's no following her:
And yet I must not now: I hope she is right still,
For all her outward shew, for sure she knew me;
And in that hope, some few houres Ile forget her. Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Roderigo.

Rod. She is not to be recovered, which I vex at;
And he beyond my veng'ance, which torments me:
O! I am fool'd and sleighted, made a Rascall;
My hopes are flatterd, as my present fortunes:
Why should I wander thus and play the coxcomes?
Tire out my peace and pleasure for a Girle?
A Girle that scorns me too? a thing that hates me?
And considered at the best, is but a short breakfast
For a hot appetite: why should I walke, and walke thus,
And fret my selfe, and travell like a Carrier, (me,
And peep, and watch? want Meat, and Wine, to cherish
When thousand women may be had, ten thousand,
And thank me too, and I sit still: well, trim Beauty
And Chastity, and all that seem to ruin me,
Let me not take ye; let me not come neer ye,
For Ile so trim ye: Ile so buffell with ye;
Tis not the name of Virgin shall redeem ye,
Ile change that property: nor teares, nor angers:
I beare a hate about me scorns those follies.
To finde this villaine too, for there's my main prize;
And if he snap me then.

Enter Alinda.

Alin. Is not that Pedro?
Tis he, tis he: O!
Rod. What art thou?
Alin. Ha? now, now, now,
O now most miserable.
Rod. What a' devill art thou?
Alin. No end of my mis-fortunes, Heaven?
Rod. What Anticke?
Speake Puppet, speake.
Alin. That habit to betray me?
Ye holy Saints, can ye see this?

Rod.

Rod. It danceth:
The devill in a fooles Coat, is he turn'd Innocent?
What mops, and mowes it makes: heigh, how it frisketh,
Is't it not a Faiery? or some small hobgoblin?
It has a mortall face, and I have a great mind to it,
But if it should prove the devill then.
Alin. Come hither.
Rod. I think 'twill ravish me,
It is a handsome thing, but horribly Sun-burnt,
What's that it points at?
Alin. Do'st thou see that Starre there,
That, just above the Sunne;
Prethe goe thither, and light me this Tobacco,
And stop it with the hornes o'th' Moone.
Rod. The thing's mad,
Abhominably mad, her braines are butter'd,
Goe sleep, foole, sleep.
Alin. Thou canst not sleep so sweetly:
For so I can say my Prayers, and then slumber.
I am not proud, nor full of wine,
This little Flowre will make me fine:
Cruell in heart, for I shall crie,
If I see a Sparrow dye:
I am not watchfull to doe ill,
Nor glorious to pursue it still:
Nor pittilesse to those that weepe;
Such as are, bid them goe sleep.
Doe, doe, do, and see if they can.
Rod. It said true.
I feele it sinke into me forcibly.
Sure 'tis a kind of Sibill, some mad Prophet.
I feel my wildnesse bound, and fetter'd in me.
Alin. Give me your hand, and i'le tell you what's Rod. Here: prethee speake. (your fortune.
Alin. Fie, fie, fie, fie, fie.
Wash your hands, and pare your Nailes, and look finely
You shall never kisse the Kings daughter else.
Rod. I wash 'em daily.
Alin. But still you fowle 'em faster.
Rod. This goes neerer.
Alin. You'll have two wives.
Rod. Two wives?
Alin. I two fine gentle-women.
Make much of 'em: for they'l stick close to you Sir.
And these two, in two dayes.
Rod. That's a fine Riddle.
Alin. To day you shall wed sorrow,
And repentance will come to morrow.
Rod. Sure she's inspired.
Alin. I'le sing ye a fine Song Sir.
He call'd down his merry men all
By one, by two, by three,
William would faine have been the first,
But now the last is he.
Rod. This the meer Chronicle of my mis-haps. (yonder, Alin. I'le bid you good ev'n: for my Boat staies for me
And I must Sup with the Moone to night in the Mediterraneum. Exit.
Rod. When fools, and mad-folks shall be tutors to me,
And feele my sores, yet I unsensible;
Sure it was set by Providence upon me
To steer my heart right: I am wondrous weary.
My thoughts too, which adde more burthen to me:
I have been ill, and (which is worse) pursu'd it,
And still runne on: I must thinke better, nobler,
And be another thing, or not at all. (Enter foure
Still I grow heavier, heavier heaven defend me: Pesants.
I'le lye down, and take rest: and goodnes guard me.

Pes. 1 We have scap'd to day well: certain, if the Out-laws
Had known we had been stirring, we had paid for't,
2 Plague on 'em, they have rob'd me thrice,
3 And me five times:
Beside they made my daughter one of us too
An arrant Drum: O, they are the lewdest Rascals,
The Captaine such a damn'd peece of iniquitie:
But we are farre enough of on 'em, that's the best on't,
They cannot heare.
4 They'le come to me familiarly
And eat up all I have: drinke up my wine too,
And if there be a Servant that content 'em,
Let her keele hold, they'll give her Stowage enough:
We have no Children now, but Theeves, and Outlawes.
The very Brats in their Mothers bellies have their (qualities.
They'll steale into the world.
1 Would we had some of 'em here,
2 I, O' that condition we could Master 'em,
They are sturdy knaves.
3 A devill take their sturdinesse, (our States,
We can neither keep our wives from 'em, nor
We pay the Rent, and they possesse the benefit.
1 What's this lies here? is it drunk, or sober?
It sleeps, and soundly too.
2 'Tis an old woman
That keepes sheepe here abouts: it turns, and stretches.
4 Do's she keep sheep with a sword?
3 It has a Beard too.
1 Peace, peace: It is the devill Roderigo,
Peace of all hands, and looke.
2 'Tis he
3 Speake softly,
4 Now we may hit him.
3 Stay, stay: let's be provident.
1 Kill him, and wake him then.
4 Let me come to him,
Ev'n one blow at his pate, if ere he wake more.
3 So, so, so, lay that by.
2 I must needs kill him.
It stands with my reputation
3 Stand off, I say:
And let us some way make him sure; then torture him.
To kill him presently, has no pleasure in't.
Has been tormented of us, at least this twelve moneth.
Rod. Oh me!
All. He comes: he comes.
4 Has he no Guns about him?
3 Softly again: no, no: take that hand easily,
And tye it fast there: that to th' other bough there.
Fast, fast, and easie least he wake.
2 Have we got ye?
This was a benefit we never aym'd at.
3 Out with your knives, and let's carve this Cock-Daintily carve him. (theefe,
1 I would he had been used thus
Ten year agoe; we might have thought we had children.
3 O, that Sir Nicholas now our Priest were here.
What a sweet Homily would he say over him,
For ringing all in with his wife in the Bell-frey?
He would stand up stiffe girt: Now pounce him lightly,
And as he rores, and rages, let's goe deeper:
Come neere: you are dym ey'd: on with your spectacles.
Rod. O, what torments me thus? what slaves, what O spare me, doe not murther me. (villaines?
3 We'll but tickle ye,
You have tickled us at all points.
4 Where are his Emblemes? Enter Pedro
Rod. As ye are men, and Christians

2. Yes we hear ye,
And you ſhall here of us too.
Rod. Oh no mercy.
Ped. What noyſe is this? what rore? I cannot find her,
She is got free again: but where, or which way?
Rod. O' villains, beaſts.
Pedro. Murdring a man, ye raſcals?
Ye inhumane ſlaves, off, off, and leave this cruelty,
Or as I am a Gentleman: do ye brave me?
Then have among ye all, ye ſlaves, ye cowards,
Take up that ſword, and ſtand: ſtay ye baſe raſcals,
Ye cut-throate rogues.
All. Away, away. Exeunt Peſ.
Ped. Ye dog-whelps:
Rod. O' I am now more wretched far, then ever.
Ped. A violence to that habit? ha? Roderigo,
What makes he here, thus lad? is it repentance,
Or only a fair ſhew to guid his miſchiefes?
Rod. This benefit has made me ſhame to ſee him,
To know him, bluſh?
Ped. You are not much hurt?
Rod. No Sir;
All I can call a hurt, ſticks in my conſcience,
That pricks, and tortuers me.
Ped. Have ye conſiderd
The nature of theſe men, and how they us'd ye?
Was it fair play? did it appear to you handſom?
Rod. I dare not ſpeak: or if I do, tis noth ing
Can bring me off, or juſtifie me.
Ped. Was it noble
To be o're-layd with odds, and violence?
Manly, or brave in theſe thus to oppreſſe ye?
Do you bluſh at this, in ſuch as are meer rudenes,
That have ſtopt ſoules, that never knew things gentle?
And dare you glorifie worſe in your ſelf ſir?
Ye uſ'd me with much honour, and I thank ye,
In this I have requited ſome: ye know me:
Come turne not back, ye muſt, and ye ſhall know me;
Had I bin over ſeaſond with baſe anger,
And ſuited all occaſions to my miſchiefes,
Bore no reſpect to Honeſty, Religion,
No faith, no common tie of man, humanity,
Had I had in me, but given reines, and licence
To a tempeſtuous will, as wild as winter,
This day, know Roderigo, I had ſet
As ſmall a price upon thy life, and fortunes,
As thou didſt lately on mine innocence;
But I reſerve thee to a nobler ſervice.
Rod. I thank ye, and i'le ſtuddy more to honour ye:
You have the nobler ſoule, I muſt confeſſe it,
And are the greater maſter of your goodnes.
Though it be impoſſible I ſhould now recover,
And my rude will grow handſome in an inſtant,
Yet touching but the purenes of your mettle,
Something ſhall ſhew like gold, at leaſt ſhall gliſter,
That men may hope, although the mine be rugged,
Stony, and hard to work: yet time, and honour
Shall find and bring forth that, that's rich and worthy.
Ped I'le trie that: and to 'th purpoſe: ye told me ſir
In noble emulation, ſo I take it;
I'le put your hatred far off, and forget it,
You had a faire deſire to try my valour:
You ſeemd to court me to it; you have found a time,
A weapon in your hand, an equall enemy,
That, as he puts this off, puts of all injuries,
And only now for honors ſake defies ye:
Now, as you are a man, I know you are valiant,
As you are gentle bred, a ſouldier faſhioned.
Rod. His vertue ſtartles me. I dare fight Pedro.
Ped. And as you have a Miſtris that you honor,
Mark me, a Miſtris.
Rod. Ha?
Ped. A handſome Miſtris,
As you dare hold your ſelf deſerving of her.
Rod. Deſerving? what a word was that to fire me?
Ped. I could compell ye now without this circumſtance,
But i'le deale free, and fairely, like a Gentleman:
As ye are worthy of the name ye carry,
A daring man.
Rod. O that I durſt not ſuffer:
For all I dare do now, implies but pennance.
Ped. Now do me noble right.
Rod. I'le ſatisfy ye:
But not by th' word: pray ye hear me, and allow me;
I have bin rude: but ſhall I be a monſter,
And teach my ſword to hurt that that preſerved me?
Though I be rough by nature, ſhall my name
Inherit that eternall ſtaine of barbarous?
Give me an enemy, a thing that hates ye,
That never heard of yet, nor felt your goodnes,
That is one main antipathy to ſweetnes;
And ſet me on, you cannot hold me coward:
If I have ever err'd, 'th as in hazard:
The temper of my ſword ſtarts at your vertue,
And will flie off, nay it will weep to light ye;
Things excellently mingled, and of pure nature,
Hold ſacred love, and peace with one another.
See how it turnes.
Ped This is a ſtrange converſion:
And can ye faile your Miſtris? can ye grow cold
In ſuch a caſe?
Rod. Thoſe heats that they adde to us,
(O noble Pedro) let us feele 'em rightly,
And rightly but conſider how they move us.
Ped. Is not their honour ours?
Rod. If they be vertuous;
And then the ſword ads nothing to their luſtre,
But rather cals in queſtion what's not doubted:
If they be not: the beſt ſwords, and beſt valours
Can never fight 'em up to fame again:
No, not a Chriſtian war, and that's held pious.
Ped. How bravely now he is tempered? I muſt fight,
And rather make it honorable, then angry,
I would not taske thoſe ſins to me committed.
Rod. You cannot ſir: you have caſt thoſe by; decarded 'em,
And in a noble mind, ſo low and looſely
To look back, and collect ſuch lumps, and lick 'em
Into new horrid formes agen.
Ped. Still braver.
Rod. To fight, becauſe I dare, were worſe, and weaker
Then if I had a woman in my cauſe, ſir,
And more proclaim'd me foole; yet I muſt confeſſe
I have bin covetous of all occaſions,
And this I have taken upon truſt, for noble,
The more ſhame mine; deviſe a way to fight thus,
That like the wounded aire no blood may iſſue,
Nor where this ſword ſhall enter, no loſt ſpirit,
And ſet me on: I would not ſcar that body,
That vertuous, valiant body, nor deface it
To make the Kingdom mine: if one muſt bleed,
Let me be both the ſacrifice, and altar,
And you the Prieſt: I have deſerv'd to ſuffer.
Ped. The noble Roderigo, now I call ye,
And thus my love ſhall ever count, and hold ye,
I am your ſervant ſir: and now this habit,
Devotion, not diſtruſt ſhall put upon me,

I'le

I'le wait upon your fortunes, that's my way now,
And where you grieve, or joy, I'le be a partner.
Ped. I thank ye sir, I shall be too proud of ye,
O I could tell ye strange things.
Rod. I ghesse at 'em,
And I could curse my self, I made 'em stranger;
Yet my mind sayes, you are not far from happines.
Ped. It shall be welcome; come, lets keep us thus still,
And be as we appear: Heavens hand may blesse us. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Alphonso, Master and Keepers.

Mast. Yes sir, here be such people: but how pleasing,
They will appear to you.
Alp. Pray let me see 'm,
I come to that end: pray let me see 'em all. (ward
Mast. They will confound ye sir, like bels rung back-
They are nothing but confusion, and meer noyses.
Alp. May be I love a noyse: but hark ye sir,
Have ye no boyes, handsome yong boyes?
Mast. Yes one sir,
A very handsome boy.
Alp Long here?
Mast. But two dayes;
A little crazed: but much hope of recovery.
Alp. I that boy, let me see: may be I know him;
That boy, I say: this is the boy he told me of,
And it must needs be she: that boy I beseech ye sir,
That boy I come to see.
Mast. And ye shall see him:
Or any els, but pray be not too violent.
Alp. I know what to do, I warrant ye: I am for all fan-
I can talk to 'em, and dispute. (cies:
1 Keep. As madly:
For they be very madde sir.
Alp. Let 'em be horne mad.
1. Keep. We have few Citizens: they have bedlames of
And are mad at their own charges. (their own sir,
Alp. Who lies here?
Mast. Pray ye do not disturb 'em sir, here lie such youths
Will make you start if they but dance their trenchmores.
Fetch out the boy, sirha: hark. Shake Irons within.
Alp. Heigh boyes. Engl. mad-m.
Eng. Bowtee, Scholler, Parson.
Clap her o'th Star-bord: bounce: top the can, Jenkin.
Scho. Dead ye dog, dead: do ye quarrel in my Kingdom?
Give me my trident.
Eng. Bowtee, 'twixt wind and water,
Loaden with Mackrels: O brave meat.
Scho. My Sea horses.
I'le charge the Northern wind, and break his bladder.
Par. I'le sell my bels, before I be out-brav'd thus.
Alp. What's he? what's he?
Mast. A parson sir, a parson,
That run madde for tythe Gollings.
Alp. Green sawce cure him.
Par. I'le curse ye all, i'le excommunicate ye:
Thou English heretique, give me the tenth por.
Eng. Sue me, i'le drink up all, bownce I say once more,
O, have I split your mizen? blow, blow thou West wind,
Blow till thou rive, and make the Sea run roaring.
I'le hisse it down againe with a bottle of Ale.
Scho. Triton, why Triton.
Eng. Tritons drunk with methegline.
Scho. Strike, strike the surges, strike.
Eng. Drink, drink, tis day light;
Drink, didle, didle, didle, drink, Parson, proud Parson:
A pigs tayle in thy teeth, and I defie thee.
Par. Give me some porridge, or i'le damne thee English.
Alp. How comes this English madde man here?
Mast. Alas thats no question:
They are mad every where sir;
Their fits are coole now: let 'em rest. Enter Keepers
Alp. Madde Gallants: and fleet-foole.
Most admirable mad: I love their faces.
1. K. Ye stinking whore: who knew of this? who lookd Pox take him, he was sleepy when I left him, (to him?
2. K. Certain he made the foole drunk.
Mast. How now who's this here?
Where is the boy?
1. Keep. The boy sir?
Mast. I the boy, sir.
1. K. Here's all the boyes we founde.
Mast. These are his cloths.
But wher's the boy?
She-f. The boy is gone a maying,
Hee'l bring me home a Cuckowes nest; do ye hear Ma-
I put my cloths off, and I dizend him, (ster
And pind a plumb in's forehead, and a feather,
And buss'd him twice, and bid him go seek his fortune:
He gave me this fine money, and fine wine too,
And bid me sop: and gave me these trim cloths too,
And put 'em on.
Alp. Is this the boy you would shew?
She-f. I'le give you two pence Master.
Alp. Am I foold of all sidies?
I met a foole i'th woods, they said she dwelt here,
In a long pied coat.
Mast. That was the very boy, sir.
She-f. I, I, I, I gave him leave to play forsooth,
Hee'l come again to morrow, and bring pescods.
Mast. I'le bring your bones.
Alp. Pox o' your fooles, and bedlams,
Plague o' your owls and apes.
Mast. Pray ye sir, be tamer,
We cannot help this presently: but we shal know;
I'le recompence your cares too.
Alp. Know me a pudding.
You juggle, and ye fidle: fart upon ye:
I am abused.
Mast. Pray ye sir. Welch mad-
Alp. And I will be abused sir, man.
And you shall know I am abused.
Wel. Whaw, Mr. Keeper.
Alp. Pox o' thy whawes, and thy whyms,
Pox o' thy urship.
Wel. Give me some Ceeze, and Onions: give me some
I have — in my bellies: give me abundance, (wash-brew,
Pendragon was a Shentleman, marg you sir,
And the Organs at Rixum were made by revelations,
There is a spirit blowes, and blowes the bellowes,
And then they sing.
Alp. What Moon-calf's this? what dreame?
Mast. Pray ye sir observe him,
He is a mountaineere, a man of Gotcland.
Wel. I will beate thy face as black as a blew-clout,
I will leave no more sheet in thine eyes.
Mast. He will not hurt ye.
Wel. Give me a great deale of guns: thou art the devils,
I know thee by thy tayles: poor Owen, hungry,
I will pig thy bums full of bullets.
Alp. This is the rarest rascall,
He speakes as if he had butter-milk in's mouth,
Is this any thing a kin to th' English?

Maſt. The elder brother, ſir,
He run mad becauſe a rat eate up's cheeſe.
Alp. H'ad a great deale of reaſon ſir.
Wel. Baſilus manus, is for an old codpice, mark ye,
I will borrow thy urſhips whore, to ſeale a Letter.
Maſt. Now he growes villanous.
Alp. Me thinks he's beſt now.
Maſt. Away with him.
Alp. He ſhall not.
Maſt. Sir, he muſt.
Wel. I will ſing, and dance:
Do any thing.
Alp. Wilt thou declaime in greek?
Maſt. Away with the foole,
And whip her ſoundly ſirah.
Sbe-f. I'le tell no more tales. Exit
Alp. Or wilt thou fly i'th ayre?
Eng. Do, and i'le catch thee,
And like a wiſp of hay, i'le whirle, and whirle thee,
And puffe thee up; and puff thee up.
Sch. I'le ſave thee,
And thou ſhalt fall into the Sea, ſoft, ſoftly. (men.
Wel. I'le get upon a mountaine and call my Country-
Maſt. They all grow wild: away with him for heaven
Sir, ye are much too blame. (ſake,
Alp. No, no, tis brave ſir,
Ye have cozend me; i'le make you madde.
Maſt. In with him,
And lock him faſt.
Alp. I'le ſee him in his lodging. Exit
Maſt. What meanes this Gentleman? Enter Julietta
Jul. He's in: have at him,
Are you the Maſter, ſir?
Maſt. What would you with him?
Iul. I have a buſines from the Duke of Medina,
Is there not an old Gentleman come lately in?
Maſt. Yes, and a wild one too; But not a priſoner.
Iul. Did you obſerve him well? tis like he may be.
Maſt. I have ſeen younger men of better temper.
Jul. You have hit the cauſe I come for: ther's a letter
Pray ye peruſe it well: I ſhall be wi' ye;
And ſodainly, I fear not: finley, daintely,
I ſhall ſo feed your fierce vexation,
And raiſe your worſhips ſtormes: I ſhall ſo niggle ye,
And juggle ye, and fiddle ye, and firck ye:
I'le make ye curſe the houre yet vext a woman;
I'le make ye ſhake, when our ſex, are but ſounded:
For the Lords ſake, we ſhall have him at; I long to ſee it
As much as for my wedding night: I gape after it.
Maſt. This Letter ſayes the Gentleman is lunatique
I half ſuſpected it.
Iul. Tis very true ſir,
And ſuch prancks he has plaid.
Maſt. He's ſome great man,
The Duke commands me with ſuch care to look to him,
And if he grow too violent, to correct him,
To uſe the ſpeedieſt meanes for his recovery,
And thoſe he muſt finde ſharpe.
Iul. The better for him:
Maſt. How got ye him hither?
Iul. With a train, I told him:
He's in love with a boy, there lies his mellancholly.
Maſt. Hither he came to ſeek one.
Iul. Yes, I ſent him,
Now had we dealt by force, we had never brought him.
Maſt. Here was a boy.
Iul. He ſaw him not?
Maſt. He was gon firſt.
Jul. It is the better; looke you to your charge well:
Ile ſee him lodged, for ſo the duke commanded me
He will be very rough.
Maſt. We are uſd to that ſir,
And we as rough as he, if he give occaſion.
Iul. You will find him gainfull, but be ſure ye curb him,
And get him if ye can fairely to his lodging, Enter
I am afraid ye will not. Alphonſo
Maſt. We muſt ſweat then.
Alp. What doſt thou talk to me of noyſes? i'le have more I'le have all looſe, and all ſtall play their prizes; (noyſe Thy Maſter has let looſe the boy I lookt for Baſely convaid him hence.
Keep. Will ye go out ſir?
Alp. I will not out: I will have all out with me, Shake
I'le have thy Maſter in; he's only madde here. Irons
And rogues, ile have ye all whipt: heigh mad boyes, mad
Iul. Do you perceive him now? (boyes.
Maſt. Tis too apparant.
Iul. I am glad ſhe is gon: he raves thus.
Maſt. Do you hear ſir,
Pray will ye make leſſe ſtir, and ſee your chamber,
Call in more help; and make the cloſſet ready. (at ye.
Keep. I thought he was mad: ile have one long laſh
Alp. My chamber? where my chamber: why my chamber Wher's the young boy?
Maſt. Nay pray ye ſir be more modeſt
For your own credit ſake: the people ſee ye,
And I would uſe ye with the beſt.
Alp. Beſt, hang ye
What doſt thou think me madde?
Maſt. Pray, and be civill,
Heaven may deliver ye.
Alp. Into a rogues hands.
Maſt. You do but draw more miſery upon ye,
And adde to your diſeaſe.
Alp. Get from me.
Maſt. No ſir,
You muſt not be left ſo: bear your ſelf civilly,
And twill be better for ye: ſwell not, nor chafe not.
Alp. I am a Gentleman, and a neighbour, raſcall.
Maſt. A great deale the more pity: I have heard of ye.
Iul. Excellent Maſter.
Maſt. The Duke is very tender too.
Alp. Am I lunatique? am I run madde?
What doſt thou talk to me of Dukes, and Devils,
Why do the people gape ſo?
Maſt. Do not anger 'em,
But go in quietly, and ſlip in ſoftly
They will ſo tew ye, els, I am commanded ſir.
Alp. Why, prethee why?
Maſt. Ye are dog-mad: you perceive it not Very far madde: and whips wil ſcant recover ye.
Alp. Ha: whips?
Maſt. I whips, and ſore whips, and ye were a Lord ſir,
If ye be ſtubborne here;
Alp. Whips? what am I grown.
Iul. O I could burſt: hold, hold, hold, hold o both ends,
How he lookes, pray heaven, he be not madde indeed.
Alp. I do not perceive I am ſo; but if you think it,
Nor i'le be hangd if't be ſo.
Maſt. Do you ſee this ſir? Irons brought in
Down with that devill in ye.
Alp. Indeed I am angry,
But ile containe my ſelfe: O I could burſt now,
And teare my ſelfe, but theſe rogues will torment me,
Madde in mine old dayes? make mine owne afflictions?

Maſt.

Mast. What doe you mutter sir?
Alph. Nothing, sir, nothing;
I will goe in, and quietly, most civilly:
And good sir, let none of your tormentors come about me,
You have a gentle face; they look like Dragons.
Mast. Be civill and be safe: come, for these two daies
Ye must eate nothing neither: twill ease your fits sir.
Alph. I will starve me sir; but I must beare it joyfully.
I may sleepe?
Mast. Yes, a little: go in with these men.
Alph. O miserable me! Exit.
Mast. Ile follow presently.
You see tis done sir.
Jul. Ye have done it handsomely,
And ile inform the Duke so: Pray ye attend him,
Let him want nothing, but his will.
Mast. He shall not,
And if he be rebellious ---
Jul. Never spare him:
H'as flesh, and hide enough, he loves a whipping.
Mast. My service to his Grace. Exit.
Jul. I shall commend it.
So, thou art fast: I must goe get some fresh roome
To laugh, and caper in: O how it tickles me!
O how it tumbles me with joy! thy mouths stopt:
Now if I can doe my Mistris good, I am Sainted. Exit.

Actus Quintus. Scæna prima.

Enter Sebert, Curio.

Seb. Now, o' my conscience, we have lost him utterly,
He's not gon home: we heard from thence this morning,
And since our parting last at Roderigo's,
You know what ground we have travel'd.
Cur. He's asleep sure:
For if he had been awake, we should have met with him:
'Faith let's turn back, we have but a fruitlesse journey;
And to hope further of Alindas recovery,
(For sure she'l rather perish then returne)
Is but to seeke a Moth i'th Sunne.
Seb. We'l on sure;
Something we'l know, some cause of all this fooling,
Make some discovery.
Cur. Which way shall we cast then,
For all the Champion Country, and the villages,
And all those sides?
Seb. We'l crosse these woods awhile then:
Here if we faile, we'l gallop to Segonia.
And if we light of no news there, heare nothing;
We'l even turn fairly home, and coast the other side.
Cur. He may be sicke, or faln into some danger;
He has no guide, nor no man to attend him.
Seb. He's well enough, he has a travel'd body,
And though he be old, he's tough, and will endure well;
But he is so violent to finde her out,
That his anger leads him a thousand wild-goose chases:
Ile warrant he is well.
Cur. Shall we part company?
Seb. By no means, no: that were a sullen businesse:
No pleasure in our journey: Come, let's crosse here first,
And where we finde the paths, let them direct us. Exeunt.

Scæna secunda.

Enter Juletta, Alinda.

Jul. Why are you still so fearfull of me, Lady?
So doubtfull of my faith, and honest service?
To hide your selfe from me, to fly my company?
Am I not yours? all yours? by this light you shake still;
Do ye suspect me false? did I ever faile ye?
Doe you think I am corrupted? base? and treacherous?
Lord, how ye look! Is not my life tyde to ye?
And all the power I have to serve, and honour ye?
Still do ye doubt? still am I terrible?
I will not trouble ye; good Heaven preserve ye,
And send ye what ye wish: I will not see ye,
Nor once remember I had such a Mistris.
I will not speak of ye, nor name Alinda,
For feare you should suspect I would betray ye:
Goodnesse and peace conduct ye.
Alin. Prethee pardon me,
I know thou art truly faithfull: and thou art welcome,
A welcome partner to my miseries;
Thou knowst I love thee too.
Jul. I have thought so, Lady.
Alin. Alas, my feares have so distracted me
I durst not trust my selfe.
Jul. Come, pray ye think better,
And cast those by: at least consider, Lady,
How to prevent 'em: pray ye put off this fooles coate;
Though it have kept ye secret for a season,
Tis known now, and will betray ye; your arch enemy
Roderigo is abroad: many are looking for ye.
Alin. I know it: and those many I have cozen'd:
Jul. You cannot still thus.
Alin. I have no meanes to shift it.
Jul. I have: and shift you too. I lay last night
At a poore widows house here in the Thicket,
Whether I will conduct ye, and new shape ye,
My selfe too to attend ye.
Alin. What meanes hast thou?
For mine are gone.
Jul. Feare not, enough to serve ye;
I came not out so empty.
Alin. Prethee tell me,
(For thou hast stroke a kind of comfort through me,)
When saw'st thou Roderigo?
Jul. Even this morning,
And in these woods: take heed, h'as got a new shape.
Alin. The habit of a Pilgrime? yes, I know it,
And I hope shall prevent it; was he alone?
Jul. No Madam, and which made me wonder mightily,
He was in company with that handsome Pilgrime,
That sad sweet man.
Alin. That I forgot to give to?
Jul. The same, the very same, that you so pitied,
A man as fit to suit his villanies.
Alin. And did they walke together?
Jul. Wondrous civilly.
Alin. Talke, and discourse?
Jul. I thinke so, for I see 'em
Make many stands, and then embrace each other.
Alin. The Pilgrime is betraid, a Judas dwels with him,
A Simon, that will seem a Saint to choake him.
Canst thou but shew me this?
Jul. Lord how she trembles!
Not thus, for all the world, ye are undone then;
But let's retire, and alter, then we'l walke free,
And then ile shew ye any thing.
Alin. Come, good wench,
And speedily: for I have strang faiths working,
As strange feares too, ile tell thee all my life then.
Jul. Come quick, ile conduct ye, and still serve ye,

And doe not feare; hang feare, it ſpoiles all projects.
This way; Ile be your guide. Exeunt.

Scena tertia.

Enter Governour, Verdugo, Citizens.

Gov. Uſe all your ſports,
All your ſolemnities; tis the Kings day to morrow.
His birth day, and his marriage, a glad day,
A day we ought to honour, all.
1 Cit. We will ſir,
And make Segonia ring with our rejoycings.
Gov. Be ſumptuous, but not riotous; be bounteous,
But not in drunken Bacchanals: free to all ſtrangers,
Eaſie, and ſweet in all your entertainments,
For tis a Royall day admits no rudeneſſe.
2 Cit. Your Lordſhip will do us the honour to be here
And grace the day? (your ſelfe,
Gov. Tis a maine part of my ſervice. (deration

The miſeries we have ſuffered by theſe Out-lawes,
The loſſes, howrly feares; the rude abuſes
Strangers that travell to us are daily loaden with
Our daughters, and our wives complaints.
Gov. I am ſorry for't,
And have Commiſſion from the King to eaſe it:
You ſhall not be long vext.
1 Cit. Had we not walls, ſir,
And thoſe continually man'd too with our watches,
We ſhould not have a bit of meat to feed us.
And yet they are our friends, and we muſt think ſo,
And entertaine 'em ſo ſometimes, and feaſt 'em,
And ſend 'em loden home too, we are loſt elſe.
2 Cit. They'l come to Church amongſt us, as we hope Chriſtians,
When all their zeale is but to ſteale the Chalices;
At this good time now, if your Lordſhip were not here,
To awe their violence with your authority,
They would play ſuch gambals.
Gov. Are they grown ſo heady? (Bonfires;

Then, like the drunken Centaures, have at the faireſt,
Nay, have at all: fourſcore and ten's a Goddeſſe,
Whilſt we, like fooles, ſtand ſhaking in our cellars.
Gov. Are they ſo fierce upon ſo little ſufferance?
Ile give 'em ſuch a purge, and ſuddenly.
Verdugo, after this ſolemnity is over
Call on me for a charge of men, of good men,
To ſee what houſe theſe knaves keep: of good ſouldiers,
As ſturdy as themſelves: that dare diſpute with 'em,
Dare walk the woods as well as they, as fearleſſe,
But with a better faith belabour 'em;
Ile know what claim they have to their poſſeſſion.
Tis pity of their Captaine Roderigo,
A wel-bred Gentleman, and a good ſouldier,
And one his Majeſty has ſome little reaſon
To thank, for ſundry ſervices, and faire ones;
That long neglect bred this, I am ſorry for him.
Ver. The hope of his eſtate keeps backe his pardon,
There's divers waſpes, that buz about that honey-bon,
And long to lick themſelves full.
Gov. True Verdugo,
Would he had but the patience to diſcerne it,
And policy to wipe their lips.
Verd. To fetch him in ſir,
By violence, he being now no infant,
Will aske ſome bloody crowns. I know his people.
Are of his owne choice men, that will not totter,
Nor blench much at a Bullet. I know his order,
And though he have no multitude, h'as manhood;
The elder-twin to that too, ſtaid experience.
But if he muſt be forced, ſir,—
Gov. There's no remedy,
Unleſſe he come himſelfe.
Ver. That will be doubtfull.
Did you never hear yet of the Noble Pedro?
Gov. I cannot by no means: I think he's dead ſure;
The Court bewailes much his untimely loſſe:
The King himſelfe laments him.
Verd. He was ſunke;
And if he be dead, he died happily,
He buried all he had in the Kings ſervice,
And loſt himſelfe.
Gov. Well: if he be alive, Captaine,
(As hope ſtill ſpeaks the beſt) I know the Kings mind
So inwardly and full, he will be happy.
Come, to this preparation; when that's done,
The Outlawes expedition is begun.
Cit. We'l contribute all to that, and help our ſelves too.
Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Roderigo, Pedro.

Rod. How ſweet theſe ſolitary places are! how wantonly
The wind blowes through the leafes, and courts, and playes with 'em?
Will ye ſit down, and ſleep? the heat invites ye.
Harke how yond purling ſtream dances, and murmurs,
The Birds ſing ſoftly too: pray take ſome reſt, ſir.
I would faine wooe his fancie to a peace,
It labours high and haſtily upon him;
Pray ye ſit, and Ile ſit by.
Ped. I cannot ſleep friend,
I have thoſe watches here admit no ſlumbers.
Saw ye none yet?
Rod. No creature.
Ped. What ſtrange Muſicke
Was that we heard afar off?
Rod. I cannot gueſſe;
Twas loud, and ſhrill: ſometimes it ſhew'd hard by us,
And by and by the ſound fled as the wind does;
Here's no inhabitants.
Ped. It much delighted me.
Rod. They talke of Faeries, and ſuch demi-devils,
This is as fine a place to dance their gambols.—
Ped. Me thought I heard a voyce. Muſick & Birds.
Rod. They can ſing admirably, (away

Muſick afar off. Pet Birds.
Ped. Tis here againe, harke gentle Roderigo,
Hark, hark: O ſweet, ſweet, how the Birds record too!
Marke how it flies now every way. O love,
In ſuch a harmony art thou begotten,
In ſuch ſoft Ayre, ſo gentle, lul'd and nouriſh'd.
O my beſt Miſtris!
Rod. How he weeps! deere Heaven
Give him his hearts content, and me forgive too.
I muſt melt too.

Nothing

Nothing rocks Love asleeep, but death.
Rod. Who are these?
Ped. What.
Rod. Those there, those, those things that come upon us,
Those grandame things, those strange antiquities.
Did not I say these words begot strange wonders?
Iul. Now ye may view 'em.
Alin. Ha?
Iul. The men ye long'd for,
Here they are both: now ye may boldy talke with 'em,
And never be ghest'd at: be not afraid, nor faint not;
They wonder at us; let's maintaine that wonder;
Shake not, but what ye purpose doe discreetly,
And from your tongue i'le take my part.
Alin. Ha? (Mistresse,
Iul. There: before ye, there, doe not turne coward
If ye doe love, carry your Love out handsomely.
Alin. 'Tis he and Roderigo; what a peace
Dwels in their faces, what a friendly calme
Crownes both their soules?
Rod. They show as if they were mortall,
They come upon us still.
Alin. Be not afraid, man,
Let 'em be what they wil, they cannot hurt us,
Rod. That thing ith' Button'd-Cap lookes terribly.
She has Guns in her eyes, the devils Ingeneer.
Ped. Come, stand, and let's goe meet 'em.
Rod. Goe you first.
I have lesse faith: when I have said my Prayers—
Ped. There needs no feare, haile reveren'd dames.
Alin. Good ev'en.
What doe ye seeke?
Ped. We would seek happier fortunes.
Rod. That little devill has maine need of a Barber,
What a trim beard she has?
Alin. Seek 'em, and make 'em,
Lie not still, nor longer here,
Here inhabits naught but feare.
Be constant good, in faith be clear,
Fortune will waite ye every where.
Ped. Whether should we goe? for we beleeve thy Re- (verence,
And next obey.
Alin. Goe to Segonia.
And there before the Altar pay thy vowes,
Thy gifts, and Prayers: unload thy heavines,
To morrow shed thy teares, and gaine thy suit,
Such honest noble showres, ne're wanted fruit.
Iul. Stand you out too.
Rod. I shall be hang'd, or whipt now:
These know, and these have power.
Iul. See how he shakes.
A secure conscience never quakes,
Thou hast been ill; be so no more,
A good retreat is a great store.
Thou hast commanded men of might,
Command thy selfe, and then thou art right,
Alin. Command thy will: thy foule desires.
Put out and quench thy unhallowed fires:
Command thy mind, and make that pure;
Thou art wise then, valiant, and secure.
A blessing then thou maist beget.
Iul. A curse else that shall never set
Will light upon thee: Say thy Prayers,
Thou hast as many sins, as haires.
Thou art a Captain, let thy men
Be honest, and good thoughts, and then
Thou maist command, and lead in chiefe,
Yet thou art bloody, and a theife.
Rod. What shall I doe? I doe confesse.
Alin. Retire,
And purge thee perfect in his fire:
His life observe; live in his Schoole,
And then thou shalt put off the foole.
Iul. Pray at Segonia too, and give Thy Offrings up, repent, and live. (Musicke Alin. Away, away: enquire no more, within
Doe this, ye are rich, else fooles, and poore;
What Musick's this?
Iul. Retire? 'tis some neat Joy,
In honour of the Kings great day: they wonder,
This comes in right to confirme their reverence.
Away, away, let them admire, it makes
For our advantage: how the Captaine shakes? Exit.
Ped. This was the Musick.
Rod. Yes, yes, how I sweat!
I was never so deserted; sure these woods
Are onely inhabited with rare dreames, and wonders;
I would not be a knave againe, a villaine:
Lord, how I loath it now: for these know all Sir,
And they would finde me out.
Ped. They are excellent women,
Deepe in their knowledge, friend.
Rod. I would not be traytor,
And have these of my Jury; how light I am,
And how my heart laughes now me thinkes within me?
Now I am Catechiz'd, I would ever dwell here,
For there is a kinde of Court of Reformation;
Had I beene stubborn friend,

Ped. Let's away (ly:
And doe their great Commands, and do 'em handsome-
Contrite, and true, for I beleeve Roderigo,
And constantly beleeve, we shall be happy.
Rod. So you doe well; fall edge or flat O my side;
All I can stagger at is the Kings Anger,
Which if it come, I am prepar'd to meet it.
Ped. The King has mercy, friend, as well as Justice:
And when you fall: no more.
Rod. I hope the fairest. Exeunt.

Scæna quinta.

My Service, and my selfe had both attended him

How I have us'd him, let him ſpeake.
Seb. Let's in, and viſit him:
Then to the holy Temple: there pay our duties,
And ſo wee'le take our leaves.
Maſt. I'le waite upon ye. Exeunt.

Scæna Sexta.

An Altar prepar'd: Solemne Muſick.

Enter Governour, Verdugo, Courtiers, Ladies, &c.

Gov. This to devotion ſacred be,
This to the Kings proſperity,
This to the Queen, and Chaſtity. Muſick.
Ver. Theſe Oblations firſt we bring
To purge our ſelves: Theſe to the King.
To love, and beautie theſe: now ſing. Muſick.
Ladies. Holy Altar, daigne to take
Theſe for our ſelves: For the Kings ſake
And honour theſe: Theſe ſacred lye
To Vertue, Love, and Modeſty
Our wiſhes to Eternity. Muſick. Enter Pedro
Ped. For our ſelves firſt, thus we bend and Roderigo.
Forgive us heaven, and be our friend:
Rod. And happy fortune to us ſend.
Ped. To the King, honour, and all Ioy,
Long, and happy from annoy.
Rod. Proſperous be all his dayes
Every new houre, a new praiſe.
Ped. Every minute thus be ſeene,
Both. And thouſand honours Crowne the Queene. Muſick.
Seb. Come to the Altar: let us do our duties. Enter Al-
Alph. I have almoſt forgot a Church. phonſo,
Cur. Kneele reverently. Curio,
Alph. For my loſt wits (let me ſee) Seberto.
Firſt I pray: and ſecondly
To be at home againe, and free,
And if I travell more, hang me,
For the King, and for the Queene,
That they may be wiſe, and ſeene
Never in the Mad-mans Inne.
For my daughter, I would pray
But ſhe has made a holly-day,
And needs not my devotion now
Let her take her own courſe (heaven,)
Whether it be od, or even. Muſick. Enter Alinda, & Iuletta
And if that pleaſe not, take her you. like Shepheards.
Seb. A ſhort, and ſweet Meditation: what are theſe here?
Alin. Haile to this ſacred place,
Iul. They are all here, Madam:
No violence dare touch here; be ſecure:
My Bilbo Maſter too: how got he looſe againe?
How lamentably he lookes: he has had diſcipline.
I dare not let him know my prancks.
Seb. 'Tis ſhe ſure.
Cur. 'Tis certainly.
Ped. Ha! doe I dazell?
Rod. 'Tis the faire Alinda.
Gov. What wonder ſtand theſe ſtrangers in?
Rod. Her woman by her,
The ſame Sir, as I live,
Alph. I had a daughter,
With ſuch a face once: ſuch eyes and noſe too,
Ha, let me ſee, 'tis wondrous like Alinda,
Their devotion ended, I'le marke 'em and neerer.
And ſhe had a Filly that waited on her:
Juſt with ſuch a favour,
Doe they keepe Goats now?
Alin. Thus we kneele, and thus we pray
A happy honour, to this day,
Thus our Sacrifice we bring
Ever happy to the King.
Jul. Theſe of Purple, Damaſk greene
Sacred to the vertuous Queene Herewe hang.
Alin. As theſe are now
Her glories ever ſpring, and ſhow,
Theſe for our ſelves: our hopes, and loves,
Full of pincks, and Ladies gloves,
Of hartes-eaſe too, which we would faine
As we labour for, attaine;
Heare me heaven, and as I bend,
Full of hope: ſome comfort ſend.
Jul. Heare her: heare her: if there be
A ſpotles Sweetnes, this is ſhe. Muſick.
Ped. Now Roderigo ſtand.
Rod. He that devides ye
Devides my life too.
Gov. Pedro, Noble Pedro.
Doe not you know your friend?
Ped I know, and honour ye.
Gov. Lady this leave i'le crave, pray be not angry,
I will not long devide you: how happy Pedro,
Would all the Court be now, might they be hold thee?
Might they but ſee you thus and thus embrace you?
The King will be a joyfull man beleeve it Moſt joyfull Pedro.
Ped. I am his humble Servant.
Nay, good Sir, ſpeake your will, I ſee you wonder, one eaſie word from you—
Alph. I dare ſay nothing
My tongue's a new tongue Sir, and knowes his tither,
Let her doe what ſhe pleaſe, I dare doe nothing,
I have been damn'd for doing, will the King know him?
That fellow there, will he reſpect and honour him?
He has been look'd upon they ſay: will he own him?
Gov. Yes certainly and grace him, ever honour him,
Reſtore him every way, he has much lamented him.
Alp. Is't your will too? this is the laſt time of asking.
Rod. I am ſure, none elſe ſhall touch her, none elſe en-
If this, and this hold. (joy her.
Alp. You had beſt begin the game then, I have no title in her,
Pray take her, and diſpatch her, and commend me to her,
And let me get me home, and hope I am ſober:
Kiſſe, kiſſe, it muſt be thus: ſtand up Alinda,
I am the more Childe, and more need of bleſſing.
Ye had a waiting woman, one Iuletta,
A pretty deſperate thing, juſt ſuch another
As this ſweet Lady; we call'd her nimble chaps.
I pray is this the party?
Jul. No indeed Sir,
She is at home; I am a little Foot-Boy,
That walke a nights, and fright old Gentlemen;
Make 'em looſe Hats and Cloakes.
Alph. And Horſes too. (ditches;
Iul. Sometimes I doe Sir, teach 'em the way through
And how to breake their worſhips ſhins, and noſes Againſt old broken Stiles, and Stumps.
Alph. A fine art.
I feele it in my bones yet.
Iul. I am a Drum Sir,
A Drum at mid-night, ran tan tan tan tan Sir,
Do you take me for Iuletta? I am a Page Sir,
That brought a letter from the Duke of Medina

To

To have one ſenior Alphonſo, juſt ſuch another
As your old worſhip worm'd for running mad Sir.
Alas, you are miſtaken.
Alph. Thou art the devill,
And ſo thou haſt uſed me,
Iul. I am any thing,
An old woman, that tels fortunes.
Rodo. Ha.
Iul And frights good people,
And ſends them to Segonia for their fortunes:
I am ſtrange ayers, and excellent ſweet voyces.
I am any thing, to doe her good beleeve me;
She now recovered, and her wiſhes crown'd
I am Iuletta againe, pray ſir forgive me.
Alph. I dare not doe otherwiſe, for fear thou ſhould'ſt ſtill follow me,
Prethee be forgiven, and I prethee forgive me too:
And if any of you, will marry her.
Iul. No I beſeech you Sir;
My Miſtreſſe is my husband, with her I'le dwell ſtill,
And when you play any more prancks you know where to have me.

Pedro. You know him Sir.
Gov. Know him, and much lament him:
The Kings incens'd much, much Sir, I can aſſure you.
Ped. Noble Governour.
Gov. But ſince he is your friend, and now appeares,
In honour of this day and love to you ſir:
I'le try the power I have to the pinch i'le put it;
Here's my hand Roderigo, I'le ſet you faire again.
Rod. And here's mine, to be true, and full of Service.
Gov. Your people too, ſhall have their generall par-(dons, We'll have all peace and love. (worths;
Rod. All ſhall pray for you.
Gov. To my houſe now, and ſuite you to your Off with theſe weeds, and appeare glorious:
Then to the Prieſt, that ſhall attend us here,
And this be ſtil'd Loves new and happy yeare.
Rod. The Kings and Queenes, two noble honors meet,
To grace this day, two true loves at their feet (wooing, Alph. Well well, ſince wedding will come after Give me ſome Roſe-Mary, and let's be going.

DAres she despise me thus? me that with spoile
And hazardous exploits, full sixteene yeers
Have led (as hand-maides) Fortune, Victory
Whom the Maltezi call my servitors?
Tempests I have subdude, and fought 'em calme,
Out-lightened lightning in my Chilvalry;
Rid (tame as patience) billowes that kick'd heaven,
Whilst I'd enraged Boreas till his gusts
Were growne so gentle, that he seem'd to sigh,
Because he could not show the ayr my keele,
And yet I cannot conquer her bright eyes,
Which though they blaze both comfort, and invite Neither by force, nor fraud passe through her eare (Whose guard is onely blushing Innocence)
To take the least possession of her heart,
Did I attempt her with a thred-bare name—unapt with meritorious actions,
She might with colour dis-allow my suit:
But by the honour of this Christian crosse
(In blood of Infidels so often dyde)
Which mine own soul and sword hath fixed here
And neither favour, nor births priviledge
Orians shall confesse, although she be Valettas Sister our Grand-Master, here
The wages of scorn'd Love is banefull hate, Enter Rocca.
And if I rule not her, i'le rule her fate.
Rocca, my trusty Servant, welcome.

Rocca. Sir,
I wish my newes deserv'd it: hapless I
That being lov'd, and trusted, faile to bring
The loving answer that you doe expect.

Mount. Why speak'st thou from me: thy pleas'd eyes Beames brighter then the star that ushers day, (send forth
Thy smiles, restore sick expectation.

Roc. I bring you Sir, her smiles, not mine.

Mount. Her smiles?
Why they are presents for Kings eldest Sonnes,
Great Solyman that wearies his hot eyes,
But to peruse his deck'd Ceraglio,
When from the number of his Concubines,
He chooseth one for that night, in his pride
Of them, wives, wealth, is not so rich as I
In this one smile, from Orians sent.

Roc. Sir, fare ye well.

Mount. Oh Rocca! thou art wise,
And would'st not have the torrent of my joy
Ruin me headlong; apely thou conceiv'st
If one reviving smile can raise me thus,
What trances will the sweet words, which thou bring'st Cast me into? I felt (my dearest friend,
No more my Servant) when I employ'd thee
That knew'st to look, and speak as Lovers should,
And carry faithfully thy Masters sighes,
That it must worke some heat in her cold heart,
And all my labours now come fraughted home
With ten fold prize.

Roc. Will you yet heare me?

Mount. Yes,
But take heed (gentle Rocca,) that thou do'it
Tenderly by degrees assault mine eares
With her consent, now to embrace my love,
For thou well know'st I have been so plundg'd, so torne
With her resolv'd reject, and neglect:
That to report her soft acceptance now,
Will stupifie sence in me, if not kill:
Why shew'st thou this distemper?

Roc. Draw your sword,
And when I with my breath have blasted you,
Kill me with it:
I bring you smiles of pitty, not affection:
For such she sent.

Mount. Oh! can she pitty me?
Of all the pathes lead to a womans love,
Pittie's the streightest.

Roc. Waken Sir, and know
That her contempt (if you can name it so)
Continues still: she bids you throw your Pearle
Into strong streames, and hope to turn them so,
Ere her to foule dishonour; write your plaints
In rocks of Corall grow'n above the Sea,
Them hope to soften to compassion,
Or change their modest blush to love-sick pale,
Ere worke her to your impious requests;
All your loose thoughts she chides you home againe,
But with such calme behaviour, and milde lookes,
She gentlier denies then others grant,
For just as others love, so doth she hate:
She sayes, that by your order you are bound
From marrying ever, and much marvels then
You would thus violate her and your own faith,
That being the virgin you should now protect,
Hitherto she professes she has conceal'd
Your lustfull Batteries, but the next she vowes,
(In open Hall, before the honour'd crosse
And her great brother) she will quite disclose
Calling for justice, to your utter shame.

Mount. Hence find the Blackamore that waits upon her,

Bring

Bring her unto me, she doth love me yet,
And I must her now, at least seeme to do:
Cupid, thy brands that glow thus in my veines,
I will with blood extinguish—ar't not gone?
Shall my desires, like beggars, waite at dore
Whil'st any others revell in her breast?
Sweat on my spirits: know thou trickt up toy,
My love's a violent flood, where thou art falne, Enter
Playing with which tide thou'dst bin gently toss'd, Asto-
But crossing it, thou art o're whelm'd, and lost. rius and Castriot.
Cast. Mounsieur, good day.
Ast. Good morrow valiant Knight,
What, are you for this great solemnity
This morne intended?
Mount. What solemnity?
Ast. The investing of the Martiall Spaniard,
Peter Gomera, with our Christian Badge.
Cast. And young Miranda, the Italian,
Both which with wondrous prowesse, and great luck
Have dar'd and done for Malta, such high feats,
That not one Fort in it, but rings their names
As loud as any mans.
Mount. As any mans?
Why, we have fought for Malta.
Ast. Yes Mountferrat.
No bold Knight ever past you: but we weare
The dignity of Christians on our breasts,
And have a long time triumph'd for our conquests;
These conquer'd a long time, not triumph'd yet;
Mount. Astorius, you are a most indulgent Knight,
Detracting from your selfe, to adde to others,
You know this title is the period
To all our labours, the extremity
Of that tall pyramid, where honour hangs,
Which we with sweat and agony have reach'd,
And should not then so easily impart
So bright a wreath to every cheap desert.
Cast. How is this French man chang'd Astorius?
Some sullen discontent possesses him,
That makes him envy, what he heretofore
Did most ingenuously but emulate.
Mount. Oh furious desire, how like a whirle-wind
Thou hurriest me beyond mine honours point?
Out of my heart, base lust, or heart, I vow
Those flames that heat thee thus, I'le burne thee in.
Ast. Do' ye observe him?
Mount. What newes of the Dane,
That valiant Captain Norandine?
Cast. He fights still,
In view oth' Town; he playes the devill with 'em,
And they the Turkes with him.
Mount. They'r well met then, twere sin to sever 'em.
Pish----woman. ----Memorie ----
Would one of ye would leave me:
Ast. Six freth Gallies
I in St. Angelo from the promontory
This morne discride, making a Girdle for him,
But our great Master doth intend reliefe
This present meeting: will you walke along?
Mount. Hunch---I have read Ladyes enjoy'd, have by
The gulphes of worthiest men, buried their names,
Their former valour, bountie, beauty, vertue,
And sent 'em stinking to untimely graves.
I that cannot enjoy, by her disdaine,
Am like to prove as wretched; woman then
Checking or granting, is the grave of men.
Ast. He's saying of his Prayers sure.
Cast. Will you goe Sir?
Mount. I cry you mercy: I am so transported
(Your pardon, noble Brothers) with a busines
That doth concerne all Malta, that I am (Anon you'll heare't) almost blind, and deafe
Lust neither sees nor heares ought but it selfe:
But I will follow instantly: your crosse.
Ast. Not mine.
Cast. Nor mine: 'tis yours.
Ast, Cast. Good morrow brother. Exeunt.
Mount. White innocent signe, that do'st abhorre to
So neer the dim thoughts of this troubled breast, dwell
And grace these graceless projects of my heart. Enter
Yet I must weare thee to protect my crimes, Zanthia
It not for conscience, for hypocrisie, alias Abdella.
Some Churchmen so wear Cassoks: Oh my Zan. with a
My Pearle, that scornes a staine! I much repent Letter.
All my neglects: Let me Ixion like,
Embrace my black cloud, since my Iuno is
So wrathfull, and averse; thou art more soft
And full of dalliance then the fairest flesh,
And farre more loving.
Zan. I, you say so now,
But like a property, when I have serv'd
Your turnes, You'll, cast me off, or hang me up
For a signe, somewhere.
Mount. May my life then forsake me
Of my expected blisse, be cast to hell.
Zan. My tongue Sir, cannot lispe to meet you so,
Nor my black Cheeke put on a feigned blush,
To make me seeme more modest then I am.
This ground-worke, will not beare adulterate red,
Nor artificiall white, to cozen love.
These dark locks, are not purchas'd, nor these teeth,
For every night, they are my bed-fellows;
No bath, no blanching water, smoothing oyles,
Doth mend me up; and yet Mountferrat, know,
I am as full of pleasure in the touch
As ere a white fac'd puppet of 'em all,
Juicy, and firme: unfledge 'em of their tyres,
Their wyres, their partlets, pins, and perriwigs,
And they appeare like bald cootes, in the nest;
I can as blithly work in my loves bed,
And deck thy faire neck, with these Jetty chains,
Sing thee asleep, being wearied, and refresh'd,
With the same organ, steale sleep off againe.
Mount. Oh my black swan, silkner then Signets plush,
Sweeter then is the sweet of Pomander,
Breath'd like curl'd Zephyrus, cooling Lymon-trees,
Straight as young pines, or Cedars in the grove,
Quickly discend lovers best Canopie,
Still night; for Zanthia doth enamour me
Beyond all continuance perpetrate (deere wench)
What thou hast promis'd, and I vow by heaven
Malta, I'le leave in it, my honours here,
And in some other Country (Zanthia) make
My wife, and my best fortune.
Zan. From this hope,
Here is an answer to that Letter, which
I lately shew'd you sent from Tripoly,
By the great Basha, which importunes her
Love unto him, and treachery to the Island,
Which will she undertake, by Mahomet
The Turke there vowes, on his blest Alcharon,
Marriage unto her: this the Master knowes,
But is resolv'd of her integrity
(As well he may) sweet Lady yet for love,
For love of thee Mountferrat, (Oh! what Chaines
Of deity, or duty can hold love?)

I have this anſwer fram'd, ſo like her hand
As if it had bin moulded of: returning
The Baſhas Letter ſafe into her pocket;
What you will do with it, your ſelf beſt knowes,
Farwell, keep my true heart, keep true your vowes. Exit
Mount. Till I be duſt, my Zanthia, be confirmd. Zan.
Sparrowes, and Doves, ſit coupling twixt thy Lips,
It is not love, but ſtrong Libidinous will
That trimphs o're me, and to ſatiat that,
What difference twixt this Moore, and her faire Dame?
Night makes their hews alike, their uſe is ſo,
Whoſe hand ſo ſubtile, he can colours name,
If he do winck, and touch 'em: luſt being blind,
Never in women did diſtinction find. Exit

Scæna Secunda.

Enter two Gentlewomen.

1. But yfaith doſt thou think my Lady was never in love?
2. I rather think ſhe was ever in love: in perfect charity.
1. I meane, with all the world.
2. A moſt chriſtian anſwer I promiſe you: but I meane Love with a man. (in
2. With a man? what els? wouldſt have her in love with (a beaſt?
1. Yon are ſomewhat quick: but if ſhe were, it were no Preſident: did, you never read of Europa the fair, that leapt A bull, that lept the Sea, that ſwoom to land, and then
2. Oh heavens, a bull? (leapt her?
1. Yes, a white bull.
2. Lord, how could ſhe ſit him? where did ſhe hold?
1. Why, by the horn: ſince which time, no woman (almoſt) is Contented, till ſhe have a horne of her own, to hold by.
2. Thou art very knaviſh.
1. And thou very fooliſh: but ſirah, why doſt not thou
2. Becauſe I would be no mans looking-glaſſe? (marry?
1. As how? Oriana ready above
2. As thus, there is no Wife, if ſhe be good, and true, will honour, and obey, but muſt reflect the true countenance of her husband upon him; if he looke ſad upon her, ſhee muſt not looke merrily upon him: if he looke merrily, ſhee muſt not ſorrowfully, elſe ſhe is a falſe glaſſe, and fit for nothing but breaking; his anger muſt be her diſcontent; his pleaſure, her delight: if he weep, ſhe muſt cry: if he laugh, ſhe muſt ſhow her teeth; if hee bee ſick, ſhee muſt not bee in health; if hee eate Cawdles, ſhe muſt eate pottage, ſhee muſt have no proper paſſion of her owne; and is not this a tyrany?
1. Yes, yfaith, Marriage may well be called a yoak; Wives then are but like ſuperficiall lines in Geometry, that have no proper motion of their own, but as their bodies their husbands move; yet I know ſome Wives, that are never freely merry, nor truly pleaſed, but when they are fartheſt of their husbands.
2. That's becauſe the Moon governes 'em which hath moſt light and ſhines brighteſt, the more remote it is from the Sun; and contrary, is more ſullen, dim, and ſhowes leaſt ſplendor, when it is neereſt.
1. But if I were to marry I would marry a faire effeminate foole.
2. Why?
1. Becauſe I would lead the blind whether I liſt.
2. And I the wiſeſt man I could get for money, becauſe (I had rather follow the cleer-ſighted bleſſe me from a husband That ſales by his Wives compaſſe?
1. Why?
2. Why, tis ten to one but ſhe breaks his head in her youth, and when ſhe is old ſhee'l never leave till ſhe has broke his back too ——
But what ſcurvy Knight have you here in Malta, &c.
Zan. Hiſt, wenches: my Lady cals, ſhe's entring The Tarraſſe, to ſee the ſhow.
1. Oh black pudding.
2. My little labour in vaine.
1. But what ſcurvy Knights have we here in Malta, that when they are dubd take their oath of allegeance to live poore, and chaſtly ever after?
2. 'Faith many Knights in other Nations (I have heard) are as poore as ours: marry where one of 'em has taken the Oath of chaſtity, we want a new Columbus to find out.

Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter (above) Oriana, Zanchia, two Gentlewomen, (beneath) Valetta, Mountferrat, Aſtorius, Caſtorot, Gomera, Miranda, Attendants of Knights, &c.

Mount. Are you there Lady?
Ori. Thou art a naughty man,
Heaven mend thee.
Val. Our great meeting princely brothers,
Ye holy ſouldiers of the Chriſtian Croſſe,
Is to relieve our Captaine Norandine,
Now fighting for Valetta, with the Turke,
A vallant Gentleman, a noble Dane
As ere the Country bred, endangerd now
By freſh ſupply of head-bound Infidels.
Much means, much blood this warlike Dane hath ſpent
To advance our flag, above their horned moones,
And oft hath brought in profitable conqueſt:
We muſt not ſee him periſh in our view:
How far off fight they?
Mir. Sir, within a League.
Val. Tis well: our next occaſion of conventing
Are theſe too gentlemen, ſtanding in your ſight.
(Ye noble props of Malta) royally
Deſcended are they both, valiant as war,
Miranda, and Gomera, full ten years
They have ſerv'd this Iſland, perfected exploits
Matchles, and infinite, they are honeſt, wiſe,
Not empty of one ornament of man:
Moſt eminent agents were they in that ſlaughter
That great marvelous ſlaughter of the Turks,
Before St. Elme, where five and twenty thouſand
Fell, for five thouſand of our Chriſtians:
Theſe ripe conſiderations moving us
(Having had your allowance on their worthies)
Here we would call 'em to our Brotherhood;
If any therefore can their manners tax,
Their faith, their chaſtity, any part of life,
Let 'em ſpeak now.
Aſt. None do's.
All. None can, great Maſter.
Val. The dignity then dignifie, by them
Is their reward: tender Miranda firſt
(Becauſe he is to ſuccour Norandine)
Our ſacred Robe of Knight-hood, our white Croſſe,

The holy cognizance of him we ſerve,
The ſword, the ſpurrs.
Mir. Grave, and moſt honord Maſter,
With humble duty, and my ſoules beſt thanks
To you, and all this famous Conventicle,
Let me, with modeſty refuſe acceptance
Of this high order: I (alas) am yet
Unworthy, and uncapable of ſuch honour,
That merit, which with favour you enlarge
Is far, far ſhort, of this propos'd reward.
Who take upon him ſuch a charge as this,
Muſt come with pure thoughts, and a gatherd minde
That time, nor all occaſions ever may
After diſperſe, or ſtaine; did this title here
Of Knighthood, aske no other ornaments
Then other countries glittring ſhow, poor pride,
A gingling ſpur, a feather, a white hand,
A frizled hayre, powder'd, perfumes, and luſt,
Drinking ſweet wines, ſurfeits, and ignorance,
Raſhly, and eaſily ſhould I venture on't,
But this requires an other kind of man.
Mount A ſtaid, and mature judgement; ſpeake on ſir.
Mir. May it pleaſe you then to allow me ſome ſmall (time
To rectifie my ſelfe, for that high ſeate,
Or give my reaſons to the contrary.
Ith meane ſpace, to diſmiſſe me to the aid
Of Norandine: my Ships ride in the bay
Ready to diſembogue, tackel'd, and mand
Even to my wiſhes.
Mount. His requeſt
Is faire, and honeſt.
Val. At your pleaſure go.
Mir. I humbly take my leave of all: of you
My noble friend Mountſerrat; gratious Miſtris,
Oh that auſpitious ſmile doth arme your ſouldier,
Who fights for thoſe eyes, and this ſacred Croſſe,
Can neither meete ſad accident, nor loſſe. Exit
Ori. The mighty Maſter of that Livory,
Conduct thee ſafely to theſe eyes againe.
Mount. Blowes the wind that way?
Val. Equally belov'd,
Equally meriting, Gomera, you
Without excuſe receive that dignity:
Which our provinciall chapter hath decreed you.
Gom. Great Maſter of Jeruſalems Hoſpitall,
From whence to Rhodes this bleſt Fraternity
Was driven, but now among the Maltois ſtands,
Long may it flouriſh, whileſt Gomera ſerves it,
But dares not enter farther.
All. This is ſtrange.
Val. What do ye object?
Gom. Nothing againſt it, but my ſelf (faire Knights)
I may not wear this Roabe.
Val. Expreſſe your reaſons;
Doth any hid ſin goare your conſcience?
Aſt. Are you unſteadfaſt in Religion?
Caſt. Or do ye intend to forſake Malta now,
And viſit your own Country, fruitfull Spaine.
Gom. Never good ſir.
Val. Then explicate your thoughts.
Gom. This then: I ſhould be perjurd to receive it,
Once in Malita, your next City here,
When I was younger, read I the decrees
Touching this point, being ambitious then
To approach it once, none but a Gentleman
Can be admitted.
Val. Thats no obſtacle
In you.
Gom. I ſhould be ſorry, that were it
No married man.
Mount. You never felt that yoake.
Gom. None, that hath bin contracted.
Caſt. Were you ever?
Gom. Nor married, nor contracted, none that ever
Hath vowd his love to any woman kinde,
Or findes that ſecret fire within his thoughts:
Here I am caſt, this Article my heart
Objects againſt the title of my fame,
I am in love; laugh not: though time hath ſet
Some wrinkles in this face, and theſe curld locks
Will ſhortly die into an other hew,
Yet, yet I am in love: (yfaith you ſmile)
What age, what ſex, or what profeſſion
Divine, or humane, from the man that cries
For armes in the high way, to him that ſings
At the high Altar, and doth ſacrifice,
Can truly ſay he knowes not what is Love?
Val. Tis honeſtly profeſt; with whom Gomera?
Name the Lady, that with all advantage
We may advance your ſuit.
Gom. But will you ſir?
Val. Now by our holy rock were it our ſiſter:
Spaniard, I hold thee worthy, freely name her.
Gom. Be maſter of your word: it is ſhe ſir,
The matchleſſe Oriana.
Val. Come down Lady,
You have made her bluſh, let her conſent, I wil
Make good my oath.
Mount. Is't ſo? ſtay: I do love
So tenderly Gomera, your bright flame,
As not to ſuffer your perdition.
Gom. What meanes Mountſerrat?
Mount. This whole auberge hath En. Guard
(A Guard upon this Lady) wonder not,
'Tane publique notice of the Baſſaes love
Of Tripoli unto her, and conſented
Shee ſhould returne this anſwer, as he writ
For her converſion, and betraying Malta,
She ſhould adviſe him betray Tripoli,
And turning Chriſtian, he ſhould marry her.
All. All this was ſo.
Mount. How weakly do's this court then
Send Veſſels forth to Sea, to guard the Land
Taking ſuch ſpeciall care to ſave one Bark,
Or ſtrive to adde fam'd men unto our cloak,
When they lurke in our boſomes would ſubvert
This State, and us, preſuming on their blood,
And partiall indulgence to their ſex?
Val. Who can this be?
Mount. Your Siſter, great Valetta,
Which thus I prove: demand the Baſſa's Letter.
Ori. Tis here, nor from this pocket hath bin mov'd Nor anſwerd, nor perus'd by——
Mount. Do not ſwear
Caſt not away your faire ſoule, to your treaſon
Adde not foule perjury: is this your hand?
Ori. Tis very like it.
Mount. May it pleaſe the Maſter,
Confer theſe Letters, and then read her Anſwer,
Which I have intercepted; pardon me
Reverend Valetta, that am made the meanes
To puniſh this moſt beauteous Treachery,
Even in your Siſter, ſince in it I ſave
Malta from ruin: I am bolder in't,
Becauſe it is ſo palpable, and withall
Know our great Maſter to this Country firme.

As

As was the Roman Marcus, who spar'd not
As deere a sister in the publique cause.
Val. I am enamoured on them.

Reades the Letter.

Let you forces by the next tyde be ready, my brother sleepes, then; put in at St. Michaels, the ascent at that Port is easie: the Keyes of the Castle, you shall receive at my hands: that possest, you are Lord of Malta, and may some destroy all by fire, then which I am hotter; till I embrace you, Farwell, Your VVife, ORIANA.

From this time let me never read againe.
Gent.w. Tis certaine her hand.
Val. This Letter too
So close kept by her self, could not be answered
To every period thus, but by her selfe.
Ori. Sir, heare me.
Val. Peace, thou faire sweet banke of flowers,
Under whose beauty Scorpions lie, and kill;
VVert thou a kin to me, in some new name
Deerer then sister, mother, or all blood,
I would not hear thee speak: beare her to prison,
So grosse is this, it needs no formall course,
Prepare thy selfe, to morrow thou shalt die.
Ori. I die a martyr then, and a poor maid,
Almost y faith as inocent as borne,
Thou knowst thou art wicked, Frenchman, heaven for-
All. This scene is strangly turnd. (give thee. Ex.
Val. Yet can nature be
So dead in me? I would my charge were off, Mountferrat should perceive my sister had
A brother would not live to see her dye
Unfought for; since the statutes of our state
Allow (in case of accusations)
A Champion to defend a Ladies truth.
Petri Gomera, thou hast lost thy wife,
Death pleads a precontract.
Gom. I have lost my Tongue,
My sence, my heart, and every faculty:
Mountferrat, go not up: with reverence
To our great master, and this consistory
(I have considered it, it cannot be)
Thou art a villaine, and a forger,
A blood-sucker of innocence, an hypocrite,
A most unworthy wearer of our Crosse;
To make which good take (if thou darst) that gage,
And armd at all points like a Gentleman
Meet me to morrow morning, where the master,
And this fraternity shall designe, where I
VVill cram this slander back into thy throat,
And with my swords point thrust it to thy heart,
The very nest where lust and slander breedes.
Pardon my passion: I will teare those spurrs
Off from thy heels, and stik 'em in thy front
As a mark'd villain.
Mount. This I lookd not for:
Ten times more villany, I return my gage,
And crave the Law of Armes.
Gom. Tis that I crave.
All. It cannot be denide.
Gom. Do not I know
VVith thousand gifts, and importunacies
Thou often hast sollicited this Lady
(Contrary to thy oath of chastity)
VVho nere disclosing this thy hot reignd lust,
Yet tender to prevent a publique scandall,
That Christendom might justly have impos'd
Upon this holy institution,
Thou now hast drawn this practise 'gainst her life
To quit her charity.
Mount. Spaniard, thou liest.
All. No more Gomera, thou art granted combat,
And you Mountferrat must prepare against
To morrow morning in the vally here
Adjoyning to St. Georges Port: a Lady
In case of life 'gainst whom one witnesse comes
May have her champion.
Val. And who hath most right Florish
VVith, or against our sister, speed in fight. Exit

Enter Rocca.

Mount. Rocca, the first news of Miranda service
Let me have notice of.
Roc. You shall: The Moore
VVaytes you without.
Mount. Admit her, ha, ha, ha.
Oh, how my fancies run at tilt! Gomera
Loves Oriana; she, as I should ghesse,
Affects Miranda; these are two deer friends,
As firme, and full of fire, as steele and flint.
To make 'em so now, one against the other: En. Zambia
Stay, let me like it better, Zambia;
First tell me this, did Don Gomera use
To give his visits to your Mistris?
Zam. Yes, and Miranda too: but severally.
Mount. VVhich did she most apply to?
Zam. Faith to neither:
Yet infinitely I have heard her praise 'em both,
And in that manner, that were both one man
I thinke she was in love with't.
Mount. Zambia,
Another Letter you must frame for me
Instantly, in your Ladies Character,
To such a purpose as I'le tell thee strait;
Go in, and stay me: go my Tinder-box,
Crosse lines i'le crosse; so, so: my after-game
I must play better: woman, I will spread
My vengeance over Malta, for thy sake:
Spaniard, Italian, like my steele and stone;
I'le knock you thus together, were ye out
To light my dark deeds, whilst I seeme precise,
And winck to save the sparcles from mine eyes.

Exeunt

Actus Secundus. Scæna Prima.

A Sea fight within, alarum.

Enter Norandine, Miranda, and Souldiers and Gentlemen.

Mir. How is it Sir?
Nor. Pray set me down; I coole,
And my wounds smart.
Mir. I hope yet
Though there be many, ther's none dangerous.
Nor. I know not, nor I care not much, I got 'em
Like a too forward foole; but I hope the Surgeons
Will take an order I shall not leave 'em so
I make the rogues more work then all the Island,
And yet they give me the hardest words for my money.
Mir. I am glad ye are so sprightly: ye fought bravely Go call the Surgeons Souldiers: wondrous nobly
Upon my life, I have not seen such valour,
Maintained so long, and to so large a ruin,

The oddes ſo ſtrong againſt ye.
Nor. I thank ye,
And thank ye for your help, your timely ſuccour.
By th' mas, it came ith' nick ſir, and well handled;
Stoutly, and ſtrongly handled: we had duckt elſe,
My Turke had Turk'd me elſe: but he has wel paid for't.
Why what a Signe for an Almanack h'as made me?
Enter Aſtorius.
Aſt. I am glad to finde ye here ſir, of neceſſity
I muſt have come aboard elſe; and brave Captain
We all joy much in your faire victory,
And all the Iſland ſpeaks your valour nobly.
Have ye brought the Turke in that ye took?
Mir. He rides there.
Nor. If he were out again, the devill ſhould bring him.
H'as truely circumcis'd me.
Aſt. I have a buſineſſe
Which much concernes ye, preſently concernes ye;
But not this place nor people: pray ye draw off ſir,
For tis of that weight to ye.
Mir. Ile walk on ye,
I muſt crave leave a while: my care dwels with ye,
And I muſt wait my ſelfe.
Nor. Your ſervant ſir.
Mir. Believe I ſhall, and what my love can miniſter;
Keep your ſtout heart ſtill.
Nor. That's my beſt Phyſitian.
Mir. And I ſhall keepe your fame faire. Exit.
Nor. Ye are too Noble.
A brave young fellow, of a matchleſſe ſpirit;
He brought me off like thunder, charg'd, and boorded,
As if he had been ſhot to ſave mine honour:
And when my fainting men tyr'd with their labour,
And lacke of blood gave to the Turke aſſurance
The day was his; when I was cut in ſhreds thus,
And not a corn of Powder left to bleſſe us,
Then flew his Sword in, then his Cannon roard,
And let flie blood and death in ſtorms amongſt em.
Then might I heare their ſleepy Prophet howl'd too,
And all their ſilver Creſcents then I ſaw
Like falling Meteors ſpent, and ſet for ever
Under the Croſſe of Malta; death ſo wanton
I never lookt upon, ſo full of revell. Enter Surgeon.
I will not be dreſt yet: Me thought that fellow
Was fit for no converſation, nor no Chriſtian
That had not halfe his brains knockt out, no Souldier.
Oh valiant young man, how I love thy vertue.
1 Soul. Pray ye ſir be dreſt, alaſſe ye bleed apace yet.
Nor. Tis but the ſweat of honour (alas) thou milkſop,
Thou man of March-paine, canſt thou feare to ſee
A few light hurts, that bluſh they are no bigger,
A few ſmall ſcratches? get ye a Cawdle firha,
Your finger akes: and let the old wives watch thee:
Bring in the booty, and the priſoners;
By Heaven Ile ſee 'em, and diſpoſe 'em firſt,
Before I have a drop of blood wipt from me; goe. Exeunt Souldiers.
Surg. You'l faint ſir.
Nor. No, ye lie ſir, like an Aſſe, ſir;
I have no ſuch pigs hurt in my belly.
Sur. By my life Captaine
Theſe hurts are not to be jeſted with.
Nor. If thou hadſt 'em:
They are my companions foole, my family;
I cannot eate nor ſleepe without their company.
Doſt take me for St Davy, that fell dead
With ſeeing of his noſe bleed? Enter Souldiers with booty.
Sur. Here they come ſir:
But would you would be dreſt.
Nor. Pox: dreſſe thy ſelfe firſt,
Thou faintſt a great deale ſooner: what's all this?
1 Sould. The money and the merchandize ye took ſir.
Nor. A goodly purchaſſe: is it ſo, this we venture
Our liberties and lives? what can all this doe?
Get me ſome dozen ſurtrins, ſome ſeven freſh whores,
And twenty pot-alleys and to: and then I am vertuous.
Lay the Knights part by, and that to pay the Souldier:
This is mine own, I think I have deſerv'd it: (maid,
Come, now looke to me, and grope me like a chamber-
Ile neither ſtart, nor ſpeake; what's that i'th truſſe there?
2 Soul. Tis cloth of Tiſſew ſir, and this is Scarlet.
Nor. I ſhall looke redder ſhortly then, I feare me,
And as a Captaine ought, a great deale prowder.
Can ye cure me of that crack, Surgeon?
Sur. Yes, when your Suit's at pawn, ſir.
Nor. There's for your playſter.
A very learned Surgeon: what's in that pack there?
1 Soul. Tis Engliſh Cloth.
Nor. That's a good weare indeed,
Both ſtrong, and rich: but it has a vertue
A twang of the own Country, that ſpoiles all:
A man ſhall nere be ſober in't: Where are the Gentlemen
That ventur'd with me, both their lives and fortunes?
Come forward my faire ſpirits; Ncrandine
Forgets his worth, when he forgets your valours.
You have loſt an eye, I ſaw ye face all hazards:
You have one left yet, to chooſe your Miſtris.
You have your leg broke with a ſhot; yet ſitting,
I ſaw you make the place good with your Pike ſtill.
And your hand's gone; a good heart wants no inſtru-Share that amongſt ye: there's an eye, an arme, (ments;
And that wil beare you up, when your legs cannot.
Oh where's the honeſt Saylor? that poore fellow,
Indeed that bold brave fellow, that with his Musket
Taught them new waies how to put their caps off;
That ſtood the fire of all the fight, twice blowne,
And twice I gave him drownd: welcome aſhore knave,
Give me thy hand, if they be not both loſt: faith thou art welcome,
My tough knave welcom: thou wilt not ſhrink ith' waſh-
Hold, there's a piece of Scarlet, get thee hanſome. (ing.
And this to buy thee Buttons.
Sayl. Thank ye Captaine,
Command my life at all houres.
Nor. Thou durſt give it.
You have deſerv'd too.
3 Soul. We have ſeen the fight ſir.
Nor. Yes: coyld up in a Cable, like ſalt Eeles;
Or buried low ith' ballaſſe: do you call that fighting?
Where be your wounds? your knocks? your want of limbs rogues?
Art not thou he that ask'd the Maſter-gunner
Where thou mightſt lie ſafeſt? and he ſtrait anſwered,
Put thy head in that hole new bor'd with a Cannon,
For twas a hundred to one, another ſhot would not hit
Your wages you ſhall have, but for rewards (there:
Take your owne wales: and get ye to the Tavernes;
There, when ye are hot with Wine mongſt your admirers,
Take Ships, and Towns, and Caſtles at your pleaſures,
And make the great Turk ſhake at your valours.
Bring in the priſoners now my brave Muſulmans,
Enter Priſoners, and Lauſcinda.
You that are Lords oth' Sea, and ſcorn us Chriſtians,
Which of your mangy lives is worth this hurt here?
Away to priſon with 'em, ſee 'em ſafe;
You ſhall finde we have Gallies too, and ſlaves too.

1 Soul. What shall be done with this woman sir?
Nor. Pox take her,
Twas she that set me on to fight with these rogues,
That Ring worme rot it: what can you doe now
With all your paintings, and your pouncings Lady,
To restore my blood again you, and your Cupid
That have made a Gurbinado of me; plague take ye,
Ye are too deep sir rogue, this is thy worke woman,
Thou louse woman; death, you go too deep still.
The seeing of your simpring sweetnesse: —— ye Filly,
Ye Tit, ye Tomboy, what can one nights gingling,
Or two, or ten, sweet heart, and oh my deare chicken,
Scratching my head, or fumbling with my fore-mast,
Doe me good now? ye have powder'd me for one yeere,
I am in sowse I thank ye; thanke your beauty,
Your most sweet beauty: pox upon those goggles.
We cannot fight like honest men, for honour,
And quietly kill one another as we ought,
But in steps one of you; the devils holinesse
And you must have a daunce: away with her,
She stinks to me now.
1 Soul. Shall I have her Captaine?
2 Soul. Or I?
3 Soul. Ile marry her.
4 Soul. Good Captaine, I. (her;
3 Soul. And make her a good Christian; lay hands on
I know she's mine.
2 Soul. Ile give my full share for her: have ye no man-
To thrust the woman so? (ners
Nor. Share her among ye;
And may she give ye as many hurts as I have,
And twice as many aches.
Lusc. Noble Captaine,
Be pleas'd to free me from these Souldiers wildnesse,
Till I but speake two words.
Nor. Now for your maidenhead,
You have your booke, proceed.
Lusc. Victorious sir,
Tis seldome seen in men so valiant,
Minds so devoyd of vertue: he that can conquer,
Should ever know how to preserve his conquest,
Tis but a base theft else. Valour's a vertue,
Crown of mens actions here; yours as you make it.
And can you put so rough a foyle as violence,
As wronging of weake woman to your triumph?
Nor. Let her alone.
Lusc. I have lost my husband, sir;
You feel not that: him that I love; you care not:
When fortune fals on you thus, you may grieve too;
My liberty, I kneele not for; mine honour,
(if ever vertuous honour toucht your heart yet)
Make deere, and precious, sir: you had a mother.
Nor. The rougy thing speaks finely, neat: who took ye?
For he must be your guard.
Lusc. I wish no better,
A Noble Gentleman, and Nobly us'd me,
They cal'd his name Miranda.
Nor. You are his then:
Ye have light upon a young man worth your service,
I free ye from all the rest: and from all violence;
He that doth offer't, by my head he hangs for't:
Go see her safe kept, till the Noble Gentleman
Be ready to dispose her: thank your tongue,
You have a good one, and preserve it good still:
Souldiers, come wait on me, Ile see ye paid all. Exeunt.

Scena secunda.

Enter Miranda and Asterius.

Ast. I knew ye lov'd her, vertuously ye lov'd her,
Which made me make that hast: I knew ye priz'd her
As all fair minds do goodnesse.
Mir. Good Asterius,
I must confesse I do much honour her;
And worthily I hope still.
Ast. Tis no doubt sir,
For on my life she is much wrong'd.
Mir. Very likely:
And I as much tormented I was absent.
Ast. You need not feare, Peter Gomera's Noble,
Of a tryd faith and valour.
Mir. This I know too:
But whilst I was not there, and whilst she suffer'd;
Whilst vertue suffer'd, friend, oh how it loads me!
Whilst innocence and sweetnesse sunke together,
How cold it sits here? if my arme had fought her,
My truth, though naked, stood against all treasons,
My Sword here grasped, love on the edge, and honour,
And but a signall from her eye to seale it,
If then she had been lost; I brag too late,
And too much I decline the Noble Peter.
Yet some poor service I would do her sweetnesse,
Alas she needs it, my Asterius,
The gentle Lady needs it.
Ast. Noble spirit.
Mir. And what I can: prethee bear with this weaknes.
Often I do not use these womens weapons
But where true pitty is. I am much troubled,
And something have to do, I cannot forme yet.
Ast. Ile take my leave, sir, I shall but disturb ye.
Mir. And please you for a while: and pray to fortune
To smile upon this Lady.
Ast. All my help sir. Exit.
Mir. Gomera's old and stiffe: and he may lose her,
The winter of his yeeres and wounds upon him:
And yet he has done bravely hithero;
Mountferrats fury, in his heat of summer,
The whistling of his Sword like angry stormes,
Renting up life by th' roots, I have seen him scale
As if a Falcon had run up a traine,
Clashing his warlike pynions, his steel'd curasse,
And at his pitch inmew the Town below him.
I must do something. Enter Collonna.
Col. Noble sir, for Heaven sake
Take pity of a poore afflicted Christian
Redeem'd from one affliction to another.
Mir. Boldly you aske that, we are bound to give it.
From what affliction sir?
Col. From cold, and hunger:
From nakednesse, and stripes.
Mir. A prisoner?
Col. A slave, sir, in the Turkish prize, new taken;
That in the heat of fight, when your brave hand
Brought the Dane succour, got my yrons off,
And put my selfe to mercy of the Ocean.
Mer. And swom to Land?
Col. I did sir, Heaven was gracious;
But now a stranger, and my wants upon me,
Though willingly I would preserve this life sir,
With honesty and truth; I am not look'd on;
The hand of pity, that should give for Heaven sake,
And charitable hearts are grown so cold, sir,
Never remembring what their fortunes may be.
Mir. Thou sayst too true: of what profession art thou?
Col. I have been better traind; and can serve truly,
Where trust is laid upon me.
Mir. A handsome fellow;
Hast thou ere bore Armes?

Col.

Col. I have trod full many a march, ſir,
And ſome hurts have to ſhew: before me too, ſir.
Mir. Pity this thing ſhould ſtarve, or forced for want Come to a worſe end. I know not what thou mayſt be.
But if thou think'ſt it fit to be a ſervant,
Ile be a Maſter, and a good one to thee,
If ye deſerve, ſir.
Col. Elſe I aske no favour.
Mir. Then ſir, to try your truſt, becauſe I like you,
Go to the Dane, of him receive a woman,
A Turkiſh priſoner; for me receive her,
I heare ſhe is my prize: looke fairly to her,
For I would have her know, though now my priſoner,
The Chriſtians need no Schoolmaſters for honour.
Take this to buy thee clothes: this Ring, to help thee
Into the fellowſhip of my houſe: ye are a ſtranger,
And my ſervants will not know ye elſe; there keep her,
And with all modeſty preſerve your ſervice.
Col. A foule example finde me elſe: Heaven thank ye.
Of Captaine Norandine?
Mir. The ſame.
Col. Tis done ſir:
And may Heavens goodneſſe ever dwell about ye.
Mir. Wait there till I come home.
Col. I ſhall not faile, ſir. Exeunt.

Scena tertia.

Enter Mountferrat with a Letter, and Abdella.

Abd. Tis ſtrange it ſhould be ſo, that your high mettle ſhould check thus poorly: dully; moſt un-manly.
Mount. Let me alone.
Abd. Thus leadenly?
Mont. ——take ye.
Abd. At every childiſh feare? at every ſhadow?
Are you Mountferrat, that have done ſuch deeds?
Wrought through ſuch bloody fields, men ſhake to ſpeak
Can ye go back? is there a ſafety left yet (of?
But fore-right? is not ruine round about ye?
Have ye not ſtil theſe armes, that Sword, that heart whol?
Is't not a man ye fight with, and an old man,
A man halfe kil'd already? Am not I here
As lovely in my blacke to entertaine thee,
As high, and full of heat, to meet thy pleaſures?
Mount. I wil be alone.
Abd. Ye ſhall: farewell ſir;
And doe it bravely, never think of conſcience:
There is none to a man reſolved be happy. Exit.

Enter Miranda.

Mount. No, moſt unhappy wretch, as thou haſt made More devil then thy ſelfe, I am. (me
Mir. Alone,
And troubled too, I take it: how he ſtarts?
All is not hanſome in thy heart Mountferrat.
God ſpeed ye ſir, I have been ſeeking of ye:
They ſay you are to fight to day.
Mount. What: then?
Mir Nay nothing but good fortune to your Sword, ſir.
Ye have a cauſe requires it, the Iſlands ſafety,
The orders, and your honours.
Mount. And do you make a queſtion
I wil not fight it Nobly?
Mir. Ye dare fight,
Ye have, and with as great a confidence as juſtice,
I have ſeen ye ſtrike as home, and hit as deadly.
Mount. Why are theſe queſtions then?
Mir. Ile tell ye quickly.
Ye have a Lady in your cauſe, a faire one,
A gentler never trod on ground, a Nobler.
Mount. Do ye come on ſo faſt? I have it for ye.
Mir. The Sunne ne're ſaw a ſweeter.
Mount. Theſe I grant ye:
Nor dare I againſt beauty heave my hand up,
It were unmanly, ſir; too much unmanly:
But when theſe excellencies turn to ruine,
To ruine of themſelves, and thoſe protect 'em;
When vertue's loſt luſt, and diſhonour enter'd,
Looſe of our ſelves, and ſouls baſely projected——
Mir. Do you think 'tis ſo?
Mount. Too ſure.
Mir. And can it be?
Can it be thought Mountferrat, ſo much ſweetnes,
So great a magazine of all things precious,
A mind ſo heavenly made, prethee obſerve me.
Mount. I thought ſo to: now by my holy Order,
He that had told me, (till experience found it Too bold a proof) this Lady had been vitious——
I weare no dull Sword ſir, nor hate I vertue, Mir. Againſt her brother? to the man has bred her?
Her blood and honour?
Mount. Where ambitious luſt
Deſires to be above the rule preſcribed her,
Takes hold, and wins, poore chaſtity, cold duty,
Like faſhions old forgot, ſhe flings behind her,
And puts on blood and miſchiefe, death, and ruine,
To raiſe her new built hopes, new faith to faſten her:
Ma' foy, ſhe is as foule, as heaven is beautrous.
Mir. Thou lieſt; thou lieſt Mountferrat: thou lieſt baſely.
Stare not, nor ſwell not with thy pride: thou lieſt;
And this ſhall make it good.
Mount. Out with your heat firſt,
Ye ſhall be fought withall.
Mir. By —— that Lady,
The vertue of that woman, were all the good deeds
Of all thy families bound in one fagot,
From Adam to this houre, but with one ſparkle
Would fire that wiſpe, and turn it to light aſhes.
Mount. Oh pitifull young man, ſtroke blind with beauty!
Shot with a womans ſmile: poore, poore Miranda;
Thou hopeful young man once, but now thou loſt man:
Thou naked man of all that we call Noble,
How art thou cozend? didſt thou know what I do,
And how far thy deare honour (mark me foole)
Which like a father I have kept from blaſting,
Thy tender honour is abus'd: but fight firſt,
And then too late, thou ſhalt know all.
Mir. Thou lieſt, ſtil.
Mount. Stay, now Ile ſhew thee all, and then Ile kil thee.
I love thee ſo deere, time ſhall not diſgrace thee.
Read that.
Mir. It is her hand: it is moſt certaine;
Good Angels keep me: that I ſhould be her agent
To betray Malta, and bring her to the Baſha,
That on my tender love lay all her project!
Eyes, never ſee again, melt out for ſorrow,
Did the divell do this?
Mount. No, but his Dam did it,
The vertuous Lady that you love ſo deerly;
Come, wil ye fight again?
Mir. No, prethee kill me:
For Heaven ſake, and for goodneſſe ſake diſpatch me,
For the diſgrace ſake that I gave thee, kill me.
Mount. Why, are ye guilty?
Mir. I have liv'd Mountferrat,

To

To ſee diſhonour ſwallow up all vertue,
And now would dye: by heavens eternall brightneſſe,
I am as cleere as Innocence.
Mount. I knew it,
And therefore kept this Letter from all knowledge,
And this ſword from anger, ye had died elſe.
And yet I lye, and baſely lye.
Mir. O vertue!
Unſpotted vertue, whether art thou vaniſh'd?
What haſt thou left to abuſe our fraileties
In ſhape of goodneſſe?
Mount. Come, take courage, man,
I have forgiven and forgot your raſhneſſe,
And hold you faire as light in all your actions,
And by my troth I griev'd your love; take comfort,
There be more women.
Mir. And more miſchiefe in 'em.
Mount. The juſtice I ſhall doe, to right theſe villaines
Shall make ye man againe: i'le ſtrike it ſure Sir.
Come, looke up bravely: put this puling paſſion
Out of your minde; one knock for thee Miranda,
And for the Boy, the grave Gomera gave thee,
When ſhe accepted thee her Champion;
And in thy abſence, like a valiant Gentleman,
I yet remember it: he is too young,
Too Boyiſh, and to tender, to adventure:
I'le give him one ſound rap for that: I love thee,
Thou art a brave young ſparke.
Mir. Boy did he call me?
Gomera call me Boy?
Mount. It pleas'd his gravity,
To think ſo of ye then: they that doe ſervice,
And honeſt ſervice, ſuch as thou, and I doe,
Are either knaves, or Boyes.
Mir. Boy, by Gomera?
How look'd he when he ſaid it? for Gomera
Was ever wont to be a vertuous Gentleman,
Humane, and ſweet.
Mount. Yes, when he will, he can be;
But let it goe, I would not breed diſſention;
'Tis an unfriendly office, and had it been
To any of a higher ſtraine then you Sir,
The well known, well approved, and lov'd Miranda,
I had not thought on't: 'twas happly, his haſte too,
And zeale to her.
Mir. A Traytor and a Boy too?
Shame take me if I ſuffer't: puff: farewell love.
Mount. Ye know my buſineſſe, I muſt leave ye Sir,
My houre grows on a pace.
Mir. I muſt not leave you
I dare not, nor I will not, till your goodneſſe
Have granted me one curteſie: ye ſay ye love me?
Mount. I doe, and deerely: aſk, and let that curteſie
Nothing concerne mine honour,
Mir. You muſt doe it.
Or you will never ſee me more:
Mount. What is it?
It ſhall be great that puts ye of; pray ſpeake it.
Mir. Pray let me fight to day: good, deere Mountferrat,
Let me, and bold Gomera—
Mount. Fie Miranda,
Doe ye weigh my worth ſo little?
Mir. On my knees,
As ever thou had'ſt true touch of a ſorrow
Thy friend conceiv'd, as ever honour lov'd thee.
Mount. Shall I turne recreant now?
Mir. 'Tis not thy cauſe,
Thou haſt no reputation wounded in't,
Thines but a generall zeale: 'death: I am tainted,
The deereſt twyn to life, my credit's murder'd,
Baffell'd, and boy'd,
Mount. I am glad ye have ſwallow'd it,
I muſt confeſſe I pitty ye; and 'tis a juſtice,
A great one too, you ſhould revenge theſe injuries:
I know it, and I know ye fit and bold to doe it,
And man, as much as man may: but Miranda,
Why doe ye kneel?
Mir. By ——I'le grow to the ground here,
And with my ſword digge up my grave, and fall in't
Unleſſe thou grant me: deere Mountferrat, friend,
Is any thing in my power, to my life, Sir?
The honour ſhall be yours.
Mount. I love ye deerely,
Yet ſo much I ſhould tender.
Mir. I'le preſerve all:
By——I will: or all the ſinne fall with me,
Pray let me.
Mount. Ye have won: i'le once be coward
To pleaſure you.
Mir. I kiſſe your hands, and thanke ye.
Mount. Be tender of my credit, and fight bravely.
Mir. Blow not the fire that flames.
Mount. I'le ſend mine Armor,
My man ſhall preſently attend ye with it,
For you muſt arme immediately, the houre cals,
I know 'twill fit ye right; be ſure, and ſecret,
And laſt be fortunate; farewell: ye are fitted:
I am glad the load's off me.
Mir. My beſt Mountferrat. Exeunt.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Norandine, and Doctor.

Nor. Doctor, I will ſee the Combat, that's the truth on't
If I had never a Legge, I would crawle to ſee it.
Doct. You are moſt unfit, if I might councell ye,
Your wounds ſo many, and the ayre——
Nor. The Halter;
The ayres as good an ayre, as fine an ayre;
Would'ſt thou have me live in an oven?
Doct. Beſide the noyſe, Sir:
Which to a tender body.
Nor. That's it, Doctor,
My body muſt be cur'd withall: if you'll heale me quickly
Boyle a Drum-head in my broth: I never proſper,
With knuckles o' veale, and birds in ſorrell ſops,
Cawdles, and Cullyſſes; they waſh me away
Like a horſe had eaten grains: if thou wilt cure me
A pickled herring, and a pottle of Sack, Doctor,
And halfe a dozen trumpets.
Doct. Ye are a ſtrange Gentleman, (gliſter
Nor. As ere thou knew'ſt: wilt thou give me an other
That I may ſit cleanly there, like a french Lady,
When ſhe goes to a Mask at Court? where's thy hoboy?
Doct. I am glad ye are growne ſo merry. Enter
Nor. Welcome Gentlemen. Aſtor: & Caſtr.
Aſt. We come to ſee you ſir; and glad we are
To ſee you thus, thus forward to your health, ſir.
Nor. I thank my Doctor here.
Doct. Nay, thanke your ſelfe ſir,
For by my troth, I know not how he's cur'd,
He nev'r obſerves any of our preſcriptions. (Doctor,
Nor. Give me my money again then, good ſweet
Wilt thou have twenty ſhillings a day for vexing me.

That

Doct. That ſhall not ſerve ye ſir; Drums a far off,
Nor. Then forty ſhall ſir, A low March.
And that will make ye ſpeake well: harke the Drums.
Caſt. They begin to beat to th' field: O noble Dane,
Never was ſuch a ſtake, I hope of innocence
Plaid for in Malta and in blood before.
Aſt. It makes us hang our heads all.
Nor. A bold villaine:
If there be treaſon in it: accuſe poore Ladies?
And yet they may do miſchief to: i'le be with ye:
If ſhe be innocent, I ſhall finde it quickly,
And ſomething then i'le ſay.
Aſt. Come, leane on us, ſir,
Nor. I thank ye Gentlemen: and domine Doctor,
Pray bring a litt'e ſneezing powder in your Pocket,
For feare I ſound when I ſee blood.
Doct. You are pleaſant. Exeunt.

Scæna quinta.

Enter two Marſhalls.

1 Are the Combatants come in? The Scaffold
2 Yes. ſet out and the ſtaires.
1 Make the field cleere there.
2 That's done too.
1 Then to the priſoner: the grand Maſters coming,
Let's ſee that all be ready there.
2 Too ready.
How ceremonious our very ends are?
Alas, ſweet Lady,
If ſhe be innocent, Floriſh.
No doubt but juſtice will direct her Champion Enter
Away: I heare 'em come: Valetta:
1 Pray heaven ſhe proſper. Norandine
Val. Give Captain Norandine a chaire. Aſtor.
Nor. I thank your Lordſhip. Caſtriot: &c.
Val. Sit ſir, and take your eaſe: your hurts require it.
You come to ſee a womans cauſe deſcrided:
That's all the knowledge now, or name I have for her:
They ſay a falſe, a baſe, and treacherous woman,
And partly prov'd too.
Nor. Pitty it ſhould be ſo:
And if your Lordſhip durſt aske my opinion,
Sure, I ſhould anſwer no: ſo much I honour her:
And anſwer't with my life too: But Gomera
Is a brave Gentleman; the other valiant,
And if he be not good, doggs gnaw his fleſh off,
And one above 'em both will finde the truth out.
He never failes, ſir,
Val. That's the hope reſts with me.
Nor. How nature, and his honour ſtruggle in him!
A ſweet, cleere, noble Gentleman. Within, make roome
Guard. Make roome there. there. Enter Oriana; La- Val. Go up: and what you have to ſay, ſay there, (dies,
Ori. Thus I aſcend: neerer I hope to heaven, Executioner,
Nor do I fear to tread this dark black Manſion: Abdel;
The Image of my grave each foot we move, la: & Guard.
Goes to it ſtill: each houre we leave behinde us,
Knols ſadly toward it: My noble Brother,
For yet mine innocence dares cals ye ſo,
And you the friends to vertue, that come hither,
The Chorus to this Tragick Scæne behold me,
Behold me with your juſtice, not with pitty,
(My cauſe was ne're ſo poore to aske compaſſion,)
Behold me in this ſpotleſſe white I weare,
The Emblem of my life, of all my actions,
So ye ſhall finde my ſtory, though I periſh:
Behold me in my Sex, I am no Souldier,
Tender, and full of fears our bluſhing Sex is,
Unhardned with relentleſſe thoughts; unhatcht
With blood, and bloody practiſe: alas we tremble;
But when an angry dreame afflicts our fancies,
Dye with a tale well told: had I been practis'd,
And known the way of miſchiefe, travell'd in it,
And given my blood, and honour up to reach it,
Forgot religion, and the line I ſprung on,
Oh heaven, I had been fit then for thy juſtice,
And then in black as dark as hell, I had howl'd here.
Laſt, in your own opinions weigh mine innocence;
Amongſt ye I was planted from an Infant
(would then if heaven had ſo been pleas'd, I had periſh'd)
Grew up, and goodly, ready to bear fruit,
The honourable fruit of marriage:
And am I blaſted in my bud with treaſon?
Boldly, and baſely of my faire name raviſh'd,
And hither brought to finde my reſt in ruine?
But he that knowes all he that rights all wrongs,
And in his time reſtores, knows me: I have ſpoken.
Val. If ye be innocent, heaven will protect ye,
And ſo I leave ye to his Sword ſtrikes for ye,
Farewell.
Ori. O that went deepe: farewell deere brother,
And howſoe'r my cauſe goes, ſee my body
(upon my knees I ask it) buried chaſtely;
For yet, by holy truth, it never treſpaſſ'd.
Aſt. Juſtice ſit on your cauſe; & heaven fight for ye.
Nor. Two of ye Gentlemen, doe me but the honour
To lead me to her: good my Lord, your leave too:
Val. You have it ſir.
Nor. Give me your faire hands feareleſſe,
As white as this I ſee your Innocence,
As ſpotleſſe, and as pure: be not afraid Lady,
You are but here brought to your nobler fortune,
To adde unto your life immortall ſtory:
Vertue, through hardeſt things arrives at happineſſe,
Shame follow that blunt ſword that looſes you:
And he that ſtrikes againſt you: I ſhall ſtudy
A curſe or two for him: once more your faire hands,
I never brought ill luck yet; be feareleſſe happy.
Ori. I thank ye, noble Captain.
Nor. So I leave ye.
Val. Call in the Knights ſeverally. Enter ſeverally
Ori. But two words to my Champion, Gomera, and Mi-
And then to heaven and him, I give my cauſe up: rando.
Val. Speake quickly: and ſpeake ſhort.
Ori. I have not much ſir.
Noble Gomera, from your own free vertue,
You have undertaken here a poore Maids honour,
And with the hazard of your life: and happily
You may ſuſpect the cauſe, though in your true worth
You will not ſhew it, therefore take this teſtimony
(And as I hope for happineſſe, a true one)
And may it ſteel your heart, and edge your good ſword,
Ye fight for her as ſpotleſſe of theſe miſchiefes,
As heaven is of our ſinnes, or truth of errors,
And ſo defie that treacherous man, and proſper.
Nor. Bleſſing o'thy heart Lady.
Val. Give the ſignall to 'em. Low Alarmes.
Nor. 'Tis bravely fought Gomera; follow that blow,
Well ſtrooke againe boy: looke upon the Lady,
And gather ſpirit: brave againe: lye cloſe.
Lye cloſe I ſay: he fights aloft, and ſtrongly:
Cloſe for thy life: a——— o' that fell buffet:
Retire, and gather breath: ye have day enough knights;
Looke lovely on him Lady: to't againe now,

Stand,

Stand, ſtand Gomera, ſtand: one blow for all now.
Gather thy ſtrength together; God bleſſe the woman:
Why, wher's thy noble heart? heaven bleſſe the Lady.
All. Oh, Oh!
Val. She is gone, ſhe is gone:
Nor. Now ſtrike it.
Hold, hold: he yeelds: hold thy brave ſword, he's con-(quer'd:
He's thine Gomera, now be joyfull Lady:
What could this theeſe have done, had his cauſe beene
He made my heart ſtrings tremble. (equall?
Val. Off with his Cask there:
And Executioner, take you his head next.
Abdel. Oh curſed fortune!
Gom. Stay, I beſeech ye ſir, and this one honour
Grant me, I have deſerv'd it, that this villaine
May live one day, to envy at my juſtice,
That he may pine, and dye before the ſword fall.
Viewing the glory, I have wone her goodneſſe.
Val. He ſhall, and you the harveſt of your valour
Shall reape brave ſir, abundantly.
Gom. I have ſaved her.
Preſerv'd her ſpotleſſe worth from black deſtruction,
Her white name to eternity delivered,
Her youth, and ſweetneſſe, from a timeleſſe ruin.
Now Lord Valetta, if this bloody labour
May but deſerve her favour.
Mir. Stay and heare me firſt.
Val. Of with his Cask, this is Miranda's voice.
Nor. 'Tis he indeed, or elſe mine eyes abuſe me,
What makes he here thus?
Ori. The young Miranda?
Is he mine enemy too?
Mir. None has deſerv'd her
If worth muſt carry it, and ſervice ſeeke her,
But he that ſaved her honour.
Gom. That's I Miranda.
Mir. No, no, that's I Gomera, be not ſo forward,
In bargaine for my love, ye cannot cozen me.
Gom. I fought it.
Mir. And I gave it: which is nobleſt?
Why every Gentleman would have done as much
As you did: fought it: that's a poore deſert, ſir,
They are bound to that; but then to make that ſight ſure,
To doe as I did, take all danger from it
Suffer that coldneſſe, that muſt call me now
Into diſgrace for ever, into pitty.
Gom. I undertook firſt, to preſerve from hazzard.
Mir. And I made ſure no hazzard ſhould come neere him.
Gom. 'Twas I defide Mountferrat.
Mir. 'Twas I wrought him,
You had had a darke day elſe; twas I defide
His conſcience firſt, 'twas I that ſhook him there,
Which is the brave defiance.
Gom. My life and honour
At ſtake I lay'd,
Mir. My care; and truth lay by it
Leaſt that ſtake might be loſt: I have deſerv'd her,
And none but I; the Lady might have periſh'd,
Had Fell Mountferrat ſtrooke it, from whoſe malice
With cunning, and bold confidence I catch'd it,
And 'twas high time, and ſuch a ſervice Lady
For you, and for your innocence, for who knows not
The all devouring ſword of fierce Mountferrat?
I ſhew'd ye what I could doe, had I beene ſpightfull
Or Maſter but of halfe the poyſon he beares, (Hell take his heart for't) and beſhrow theſe hands Mad-(dam,
With all my heart, I wiſh a miſchiefe on 'em,
They ma'd ye once looke ſad: ſuch another fright
I would not put ye in, to owne the Iſland,
Yet pardon me, 'twas but to ſhew a Shoulder,
Which, when I had done, I ended your poore coward.
Val. Let ſome looke out, for the baſe Knight Mount-
Ab. I hope he's far enough if his man be truly: (ferrat.
This was a ſtrange misfortune; I muſt not know it.
Val. That moſt deboſh'd knight come down ſweet ſiſter.
My ſpotleſſe Siſter; now, pray thanke theſe Gentlemen,
They have deſerv'd both truly, nobly of ye.
Both excellently deerely, both all the honour
All the reſpect and favour.
Ori. Both ſhall have it;
And as my life, their memories i'le nouriſh.
Val. Ye are both true Knights, and both moſt worthy Here ſtands a Lady ripen'd with your ſervice, (Lovers, Yong, faire, and (now I dare ſay) truly honourable:
'Tis my will ſhe ſhall marry: marry now, (deſerts
And one of you (ſhe cannot take more nobly) your Begot this will, and bred it; both her beauty
Cannot enjoy: dare ye marke me your umpier?
Gom. Mir. With all our Soules.
Val. He muſt not then be angry
That looſes her.
Gom. O, that were Sir, unworthy,
Mir. A little ſorrow he may finde.
Val. 'Tis manly.
Gomera, you are a brave accompliſh'd Gentleman
A braver no where lives then is Miranda,
In the white way of vertue, and true valour.
Ye have been a pilgrime long: yet no man farther
Has trod thoſe thorny ſteps then young Miranda,
You are gentle: he is gentleneſſe it ſelfe: Experience
Cals you her brother; 'tis his hopefull heire.
Nor. The young man now, and 't be thy will.
Val. Your hand ſir;
You undertooke firſt: nobly undertook,
This Ladies cauſe: you made it good, and fought it
You muſt be ſerv'd firſt: take her, and enjoy her,
I give her to you: kiſſe her; are you pleas'd now?
Gom. My joy's ſo much I cannot ſpeake.
Val. Nay, faireſt ſir;
You muſt not be diſpleaſed: you breake your promiſe.
Mir. I never griev'd at good, nor dare I now ſir,
Though ſomething ſeeme ſtrange to me.
Val. I have provided
A better match for you: more full of beauty,
I'le wed ye to our Order: there's a Miſtreſſe,
Whoſe beauty ne're decayes: time ſtands below her:
Whoſe honour Ermin-like, can never ſuffer,
Spot, or black foyle; whoſe eternall iſſue
Fame brings up at her breaſts, and leaves 'em ſainctied.
Her you ſhall marry.
Mir. I muſt humbly thanke ye.
Val. Saint Thomas Fort, a charge of no ſmall valew
I give ye too, in preſent, to keepe waking
Your noble ſpirits; and to breed ye pious,
Ile ſend ye a probation Roabe; weare that Till ye ſhall pleaſe to be our brother: how now?
Aſt. Mountferrat's fled ſir. Enter Aſtorius.
Val. Let him goe a while
Till we have done theſe rites, and ſeen theſe coupled:
His miſchiefe now lyes open: come all friends now.
And ſo let's march to th' Temple, ſound thoſe Inſtru-(ments,
That were the ſignall to a day of blood;
Evill beginning houres may end in good. Floriſh.
Nor. Come, we'll have wenches man, and all brave things.
——Let her goe: we'll want no Miſtreſſes,
Good ſwords, and good ſtrong Armours.

Mir. Thoſe are beſt Captain. (after us.
Nor. And fight 'till Queenes be in love with us, and run
Ile ſee ye at the Fort within theſe two dayes,
And let's be merry prethee.
Mir. By that time I ſhall.
Nor. Why that's well ſaid: I like a good heart truly.
Exeunt.

Actus Tertius. Scena prima.

Enter Norandine, and Servant, Corporall and Souldiers above.

Ser. The daye's not yet broak Sir.
Nor. 'Tis the cooler riding,
I muſt goe ſee Miranda: bring my horſe
Round to the South Port: i'le out here at the beach
And meet ye at the end oth' Sycamores,
'Tis a ſweet walke, and if the wind be ſtirring Serves like a fan to coole. Corporall and
Ser. Which walke? Watch above ſinging.
Nor. Why that ſir,
Where the fine City dames meet to make matches.
Ser. I know it.
Nor. Speed ye then; what mirth is this?
The watches are not yet diſcharged, I take it:
Theſe are brave careleſſe Rogues; i'le hear the Song out
And then i'le fit ye for't, merry Companions:
Here's notable order, now for a trick to tame ye—— Owgh, owgh.
1. Wat. Hark, hark, what's that below us? who goes
Nor. Owgh, owgh, owgh. (there?
2. W. 'Tis a Beare broke looſe: pray call the Corporall.
1 W. The Dutchmans huge fat ſow.
2 I ſee her now, and five fine piggs.
Nor. Owgh, owgh.
Corp. Now, what's the matter?
1 W. Here's the great fat Sow, Corporall.
The Dutch-mans Sow, and all the Piggs, brave fat piggs,
You have been wiſhing long ſhe would breake looſe.
Nor. Owgh, owgh.
Cor. 'Tis ſhe indeed, there's a white pigg now ſucking,
Looke, looke, doe you ſee it ſirs.
1 Wat. Yes, very well ſir.
Cor. A notable fat whorſon; come two of ye.
Goe downe with me, we'll have a tickling breakfaſt.
2 W. Let's eat 'em at the Croſſe.
Cor. There's the beſt liquor.
Nor. I'le liquor ſome of ye, ye lazy rogues,
Your mindes are of nothing but eating and ſwilling:
What a ſweet beaſt they have made of me? a Sow?
Hogge upon hogge? I heare 'em come. Enter Cor. be-
Cor. Go ſoftly, and fall upon 'em finely, nimbly. low and 1 W. Bleſſe me. watch.
Cor. Why, what's the matter?
1 W. Oh the devill!
The devill, as high as a Steeple.
2 W. There he goes Corporall,
His feet are cloven too.
Cor. Stand, ſtand I ſay: death' how I ſhake?
Where be your Muskets?
1 W. There's no good of them:
Where be our Prayers, man?
2 W. Lord, how he ſtalks: ſpeak to him Corporall.
Cor. Why, what a devill art thou.
Nor. Owgh owgh.
Cor. A dumb devill.
The worſt devill that could come, a dumb devil,
Give me a Muſket; he gathers into me,
I'th name of——ſpeak what art thou?——ſpeake
Or Ile put a plumb in your belly. (devill,
Nor. Owgh, owgh, owgh.
Corp. Fie, fie, in what a ſweat I am! Lord bleſſe me,
My Muskets gone too, I am not able to ſtirre it.
Nor. Who goes there? ſtand ſpeake.
Corp. Sure I am inchaunted.
Yet here's my harbert ſtill: nay, who goes there ſir,
What have I loſt my ſelfe? what are ye?
Nor. The Guard.
Corp. Why what are we then: he's not half ſo long now.
Nor he has no tuſke at all, I ſhake ſtill damnably.
Nor. The word.
Corp. Have mercy on me, what word do's he meane,
Prethee devill if thou be'ſt the devill,
Doe not make an Aſſe of me; for I remember yet
As well as I am here, I am the Corporall,
Ile lay my life on't devill.
Nor. Thou art damn'd:
Corp. That's all one: but am not I the Corpo all?
I would give a thouſand pound to be reſolv'd now,
Had not I Souldiers here?
Nor. No, not a man,
Thou art deboſh'd, and cozen'd.
Corp. That may be,
It may be I am drunk; Lord, where have I been?
Is not this my Halbert in my hand?
Nor. No, 'tis a May-pole.
Cor. Why then I know not who I am, nor what,
Nor whence I come.
Nor. Ye are an arrand raſcall;
You Corporall of a watch.
Cor. 'Tis the Dane's voyce: you are no devill then.
Nor. No, nor no Sow, ſir.
Cor. Of that I am right glad ſir,
I was ne're ſo frighted in my life, as I am a Souldier.
Nor. Tall watchmen,
A guard for a Gooſe, you ſing away your Centuries.
A carefull company: let me out oth' port here,
I was a little merry with your worſhips:
And keepe your guards ſtrong, though the devill walk.
Hold, there's to bring ye into your wits againe.
Goe off no more to hunt Piggs: ſuch another trick
And you will hunt the gallowes.
Cor. Pray Sir pardon us:
And let the devill come neare, i'le make him ſtand
Or make him ſtinck.
Nor. Doe doe your duty truly.
Come let me out, and come away: no more rage. Exe.

Scena ſecunda.

Enter Abdella with a Letter, and Roca.

Ab. Write thus to me? he hath fearfully, and baſely
Betray'd his own cauſe; yet to free himſelfe
He now aſcribes the fault to me.
Roc. I know not.
What he hath done: but what he now deſires,
His Letters have inform'd you.
Ab. Yes, he is Too well acquainted with the power he holds,
Over my mad affections: I want time

To

To write: but pray you tell him, if I were
No better ſteeld in my ſtrong reſolutions
Then he hath ſhown himſelfe in his, or thought
There was a hell hereafter, or a Heaven,
But in enjoying him, I ſhould ſtick here,
And move no further: bid him yet take comfort;
For ſomething I will doe, the devill would quake at,
But Ile unty this nuptiall knot of love,
And make way for his wiſhes: In the mean time
Let him lie cloſe, for he is ſtrictly ſought for,
And practiſe to love her, that for his ends
Scornes feare and danger. Enter Oriana, and Velleda.
Roc. All this I will tell him. Exit Rocca.
Abd. Do ſo: farewell. My Lady, with my fellow,
So earneſt in diſcourſe! what ere it be Ile ſecond it.
Vel. He is ſuch a Noble husband,
In every circumſtance, ſo truely loving,
That I might ſay, and without flattery, Maddam
The Sun ſees not a Lady but your ſelfe
That can deſerve him.
Abd Of all men I ſay
That dare (for tis a deſperate adventure)
Weare on their free necks the ſweet yoak of woman,
(For they that do repine, are no true husbands)
Give me a Souldier.
Ori. Why, are they more loving
Then other men?
Abd. And love too with more judgement;
For, but obſerve, your Courtier is more curious
To ſet himſelfe forth richly then his Lady;
His baths, perfumes, nay paintings too, more coſtly
Then his frugality will allow to her,
His clothes as chargeable; and grant him but
A thing without a beard, and he may paſſe
At all times for a woman, and with ſome
Have better welcome: Now, your man of Lands
For the moſt part is carefull to manure them,
But leaves his Lady fallow; your great Merchant
Breakes oftner for the debt he ows his wife,
Then with his creditos; and that's the reaſon
She looks elſewhere for payment: Now your Souldier-- Vel. I mary, do him right.
Abd. Firſt, who has one,
Has a perpetuall guard upon her honour;
For while he weares a Sword, ſlander her ſelfe
Dares not barke at it: next, ſhe ſits at home,
Like a great Queen, and ſends him forth to fetch in
Her Tribute from all parts; which being brought home,
He layes it at her feet, and ſeeks no further
For his reward, then what ſhe may give freely,
And with delight too, from her own Exchequer
Which he finds ever open.
Ori. Be more modeſt.
Abd. Why, we may ſpeak of that we are glad to taſte of,
Among our ſelves I mean.
Ori. Thou talkſt of nothing.
Abd. Of nothing Madam? You have found it ſome-
Or with the raiſing up this preety mount here, (thing
My Lord hath dealt with ſpirits. Enter Gomera.
Ori. Two long houres abſent?
Gom. Thy pardon, Sweet: I have been looking on
The prize that was brought in by the brave Dane,
The valiant Noraidine, and have brought ſomething,
That may be thou wilt like of, but one kiſſe,
And then poſſeſſe my purchaſe: there's a piece
Of cloth of Tiſſew, this of purple Velvet,
And as they ſweare of the right Tyrian dye;
Which others here but weakly counterfeit:
If they are worth thy uſe, weare them; if not,
Beſtow them on thy women.
Abd. Here's the husband.
Gom. While there is any trading on the Sea
Thou ſhalt want nothing; tis a Souldiers glory,
How ever he neglect himſelfe, to keep
His Miſtris in full luſtre.
Ori. You exceed ſir.
Gom. Yet there was one part of the prize diſpos'd of Before I came, which I grieve that I miſs'd of,
Being almoſt aſſured, it would have been
A welcome preſent.
Ori. Pray you ſay, what was it?
Gom. A Turkiſh Captive of incomparable beauty,
And without queſtion, in her Countrey Noble;
Which as companion to thy faithfull Moore,
I would have given thee for thy ſlave.
Ori. But was ſhe
Of ſuch an exquiſite forme?
Gom. Moſt equiſite.
Ori. And well deſcended?
Gom. So the habit promis'd,
In which ſhe was taken.
Ori. Of what yeeres?
Gom. Tis ſaid
A Virgin of fourteen.
Ori. I pity her,
And wiſh ſhe were mine, that I might have the meanes
T' entertain her gently.
Gom. She's now Miranda's,
And as I have heard, made it her ſuit to be ſo.
Ori. Miranda's? then her fate deſerves not pity;
But envy rather.
Gom. Envy Oriana?
Ori. Yes, and their envy that live free.
Gom. How's this?
Ori. Why, ſhe is faln into the hands of one,
So full of that, which in men we ſtile goodnes,
That in her being his ſlave, ſhe is happier far
Then if ſhe were confirm'd the Sultans Miſtris.
Gom. Miranda is indeed a Gentleman
Of faire deſert, and better hopes, but yet
He hath his equalls.
Ori. Where? I would go far,
As I am now, though much unfit for travailes,
But to ſee one that without injury
Might be put in the ſcale, or paralleld,
In any thing that's Noble, with Miranda;
His knowledge in all ſervices of war,
And ready courage, to put into act
That knowing judgement, as you are a Souldier
You beſt may ſpeak of. Nor can you deliver,
Nor I heare with delight, a better ſubject.
And heaven did well, in ſuch a lovely feature
To place ſo chaſte a mind; for he is of
So ſweet a carriage, ſuch a winning nature,
And ſuch a bold, yet well diſpos'd behaviour;
And to all theſe, h'as ſuch a charming tongue,
That if he would ſerve under Loves freſh colours,
What monumentall Trophies might he raiſe,
Of his free conqueſts, made in Ladies favours?
Gom. Yet you didſt reſiſt him, when he was An earneſt ſuitor to you.
Ori. Yes I did;
And if I were again ſought to, I ſhould;
But muſt aſcribe it rather to the fate
That did appoint me yours, then any power

Which I can call mine own.
Gom. Ev'n ſo?
Abd. Thanks fortune,
The plot I had to raiſe in him, doubts of her,
Thou haſt effected.
Ori. I could tell you too,
What cauſe I have to love him, with what reaſon.
In thankfulneſſe, he may expect from me,
All due obſervance; but I paſſe that, as
A benefit, for which in my behalfe
You are his debtor.
Abd. I perceive it takes,
By his chang'd lookes.
Ori. He is not in the City?
Is he my Lord?
Gom. Who Lady?
Ori. Why Miranda,
Having you here, can there be any elſe
Worth my enquiry?
Gom. This is ſomewhat more.
Then love to vertue,
Ori: Faith when he comes hither
(as ſometimes, without queſtion you ſhall meet him)
Invite him home.
Gom. To what end?
Ori. To dine with us,
Or ſup.
Gom. And then to take a hard bed with you:
Mean you not ſo?
Ori. If you could win him to it,
'Twould be the better; for his entertainment,
Leave that to me, he ſhall finde Noble uſage,
And from me a free welcome.
Gom. Have you never Heard of a Roman Lady (Oriana)
Remembred as a preſident for Matrons,
(Chaſte ones, I pray you underſtand) whoſe husband
Tax'd for his ſowre breath by his Enemy,
Condemn'd his wife, for not acquainting him
With his infirmity?
Ori. Tis a common one;
Her anſwer was, having kis'd none but him,
She thought it was a generall diſeaſe
All men were ſubject to; but what infer you
From that my Lord?
Gom. Why, that this vertuous Lady
Had all her thoughts ſo fix'd upon her Lord,
That ſhe could finde no ſpare time to ſing praiſes
Of any other; nor would ſhe imploy
Her husband (though perhaps in debt to yeeres
As far as I am) for an inſtrument
To bring home younger men that might delight her
With their diſcourſe, or —
Ori. What my Lord?
Gom. Their perſons,
Or if I ſhould ſpeak plainer —
Ori. No it needs not,
You have ſaid enough to make my innocence know
It is ſuſpected.
Gom. You betray your ſelfe
To more then a ſuſpition; could you elſe
To me that live in nothing but love to you
Make ſuch a groſſe diſcovery, that your luſt
Had ſold that hearts thought mine, to Miranda?
Or riſe to ſuch a height in impudence,
As to preſume to worke my yeelding weakneſſe
To play for your bad ends, to my diſgrace
The Wittall, or the Pander?
Ori. Doe not ſtudy
To print more wounds, (for that were tyranny)
Upon a heart that is pierced through already.
Gom. Thy heart? thou haſt pierc'd through mine honor
The honour of my houſe, foole that I was, (falſe one,
To give it up to the deceiving truſt
Of wicked woman: for thy ſake, vild creature,
For all I have done well in, in my life,
I have dig'd a grave, all buried in a wife;
For thee I have defi'd my conſtant Miſtris,
That never fail'd her ſervant, glorious war;
For thee, refus'd the fellowſhip of an Order
Which Princes through all dangers have been proud
To fetch as far as from Jeruſalem:
And am I thus rewarded?
Vel. By all goodneſſe,
You wrong my Lady, and deſerve her not,
When you are at your beſt: repent your raſhneſſe,
Twil ſhow well in you.
Abd. Do, and aske her pardon.
Ori. No, I have liv'd too long, to have my faith
(My tri'd faith) call'd in queſtion, and by him
That ſhould know true affection is too tender
To ſuffer an unkind touch, without ruine;
Study ingratitude, all, from my example;
For to be thankfull now, is to be falſe.
But be it ſo, let me die, I ſee you wiſh it;
Yet dead for truth, and pities ſake, report
What weapon you made choice of, when you kild me.
Vel. She faints,
Abd. What have ye done?
Ori. My laſt breath cannot
Be better ſpent, then to ſay I forgive you;
Nor is my death untimely, ſince with me
I take along, what might have been hereafter
In ſcorn delivered for the doubtfull iſſue
Of a ſuſpected mother.
Vel. Oh, ſhe's gone.
Abd. For ever gone. Are you a man?
Gom. I grow here.
Abd. Open her mouth, and powre this Cordiall in it;
If any ſpark of life be unquench'd in her,
This will recover her.
Vel. Tis all in vain,
She's ſtiffe already: live I, and ſhe dead?
Gom. How like a murtherer I ſtand? look up,
And heare me curſe my ſelfe, or but behold
The vengance I wilt take for't Oriana,
And then in peace forſake me: Jealouſie,
Thou loathſome vomit of the fiends below,
What deſperate hunger made me to receive thee
Into my heart, and ſoule? I let thee forth,
And ſo in death finde eaſe; and do's my fault then Deſerve no greater puniſhment? no, Ile live
To keep thee for a fury, to torment me,
And make me know what hell is on the earth:
All joyes and hopes forſake me; all mens malice,
And all the plagues they can inflict, I wiſh it
Fall thick upon me: Let my teares be laught at,
And may my enemies ſmile to heare me groane;
And dead, may I be pitied of none. Exeunt.

Scena tertia.

Enter Collonna and Lucinda.

Luc. Pray you ſir why was the Ordnance of the Fort Diſcharg'd ſo ſodainly?

Col.

Col. Twas the Governours pleasure,
In honour of the Dane, a custome us'd,
To speake a Souldiers welcome.
Luc. Tis a fit one:
But is my Master here too?
Col. Three daies since.
Luc. Might I demand without offence, so much,
Is't pride in him (however now a slave)
That I am not admitted to his presence?
Col. His curtesie to you, and to mankind
May easily resolve you, he is free
From that poore vice which onely empty men
Esteem a vertue.
Luc. What's the reason then,
As you imagine, sir?
Col. Why I will tell you;
You are a woman of a tempting beauty,
And he, however vertuous, as a man
Subject to humane frailties; and how far
They may prevaile upon him, should he see you,
He is not ignorant: and therefore chooses,
With care t'avoyd the cause that may produce
Some strange effect, which wil not well keep ranck
With the rare temperance, which is admired
In his life hitherto.
Luc. This much increases
My strong desire to see him.
Col. It should rather Teach you to thank the Prophet that you worship,
That you are such a mans, who though he may
Do any thing which youth and heat of blood
Invites him to, yet dares not give way to them:
Your entertainment's Noble, and not like
Your present fortune; and if all those teares
Which made grief lovely in you, in the relation
Of the sad story, that forc'd me to weep too,
Your husbands hard fate were not counterfeit;
You should rejoyce that you have means to pay
A chast life to his memory, and bring to him
Those sweets, which while he liv'd he could not taste of:
But if you wantonly bestow them on Another man, you offer violence
To him, though dead; and his griev'd spirit will suffer
For your immodest loosnesse.
Luc. Why, I hope sir,
My willingnesse to looke on him, to whom
I owe my life and service, is no proofe
Of any unchast purpose.
Col. So I wish too,
And in the confidence it is not, Lady,
I dare the better tell you he will see you
This night, in which by him I am commanded,
To bring you to his chamber; to what end
I easily should guesse, were I Miranda;
And therefore, though I can yeild little reason,
(But in a generall love to womens goodnesse)
Why I should be so tender of your honour,
I willingly would bestow some counsaile of you,
And would you follow it?
Luc. Let me first heare it,
And then I can resolve you.
Col. My advice then
Is, that you would not, (as most Ladies use
When they prepare themselves for such encounters)
Study to adde, by artificiall dressings
To native excellence, yours (without help)
But seen as it is now, would make a Hermit
Leave his deaths head, & change his after hopes
Of endlesse comforts for a few short minutes
Of present pleasures; to prevent which, Lady,
Practice to take away from your perfections,
And to preserve your chastity unstain'd,
The most deform'd shape that you can put on,
To cloud your bodies faire gifts, or your minds,
(It being laboured to so chaste an end)
Will prove the fairest ornament.
Luc. To take from
The workmanship of Heaven, is an offence
As great, as to endeavour to adde to it;
Of which Ile not be guilty: Chastity
That lodges in deformity, appeares rather
A must impos'd by nature, then a blessing;
And tis commendable onely when it conquers,
Though here so oft assaulted, in resistance:
For me, Ile therefore so dispose my selfe,
That if I hold out, it shall be with honour;
Or if I yeeld, Miranda shall finde something
To make him love his victory. Exit.
Col. With what cunning
This woman argues for her own damnation?
Nor should I hold it for a miracle,
Since they are all born Sophisters, to maintaine
That lust is lawfull, and the end and use
Of their creation: would I never had Hop'd better of her; or could not believe,
Though seen the ruine, I must ever grieve. Exit.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Miranda, Norandine, Servants with lights.

Mir. Ile see you in your chamber. A Table set, two stools.
Nor. Pray ye no farther:
It is a ceremony I expect not,
I am no stranger here, I know my lodging,
And have slept soundly there, when the Turks Cannon
Playd thick upon't: O 'twas Royall Musicke,
And to procure a sound sleep for a Souldier,
Worth forty of your Fiddles. As you love me
Presse it no further.
Mir. You will overcome.
Waite on him carefully.
Nor. I have tooke since supper
A rouse or two too much, and by——
It warms my blood.
Mir. You'l sleep the better for't.
Nor. —— on't, I should, had but I a kind wench
To pull my Boot-hose off, and warm my night-cap,
There's no charme like it: I love old Adams way;
Give me a diligent Eve, to wait towards bed-time,
Hang up your smooth chin page: and now I think on't,
Where is your Turkish prisoner?
Mir. In the Castle,
But yet I never saw her.
Nor. Fie upon you:
See her for shame; or, hark ye, if you would Performe the friends part to me, the friends part,
It being a fashion of the last edition,
Far from panderisme, now send her to me;
You look strange on't, no entertainments perfect
Without it on my word; no livery like it;
Ile tell her, he lookes for it as duly
As for his fee; there's no suit got without it,
Gold is an asse to't.
Mir. Go to bed, to bed.
Nor. Well, if she come, I doubt not to convert her,

If

If not, the sin lie on your head.
Good night. Exit Mir. and Servants.

Enter Colonna and Lucinda.

Col. There you shall finde him Lady: you know what I
And if you please you may make use. (have said,
Luc. No doubt sir.
Col. From hence I shall heare all.
Mir. Come hither young one.
Beshrew my heart, a handsome wench: come neerer,
A very handsome one: doo not you grieve, Sweet,
You are a prisoner?
Luc. The losse of liberty
No doubt sir, is a heavy and sharpe burden
To them that feele it truly: But your servant,
Your humble handmayd, never felt that rigor,
Thanks to that Noble will: no want, no hunger,
(Companions still to slaves) no violence,
Nor any unbefeeming act, we start at,
Have I yet met with; all content and goodnesse,
Civility, and sweetnesse of behaviour
Dwell round about me; therefore, worthy Master,
I cannot say I grieve my liberty.
Mir. Do not you fancie me too cold a Souldier,
Too obstinate an enemy to youth,
That had so faire a Jewell in my Cabinet,
And in so long a time, would nere look on it?
Col. What can she say now?
Luc. Sure I desir'd to see ye,
And with a longing wish.
Col. There's all her vertue.
Luc. Pursu'd that full desire to give ye thanks sir,
The onely Sacrifice I have left, and service
For all the vertuous care you have kept me safe with.
Col. She holds well yet.
Mir. The pretty foole, speaks finely:
Come sit down here.
Luc. O sir, tis most unseemly.
Mir. Ile have it so: sit close, now tell me truly,
Did you ere love yet?
Luc. My yeeres will answer that sir.
Mir. And did you then love truly?
Luc. So I thought sir.
Mir. Can ye love me so?
Col. Now!
Luc. With all my duty;
I were unworthy of those favours else,
You daily showre upon me.
Mir. What think'st thou of me?
Luc. I think ye are a truely worthy Gentleman,
A pattern, and a pride to the age ye live in,
Sweet as the commendations all men give ye.
Mir. A pretty flattering rogue: dare ye kisse that sweet Ye speak so sweetly of? Come. (man
Col. Farewell vertue.
Mir. What hast thou got between thy lips? kisse once Sure thou hast a spell there. (more.
Luc. More then ere I knew sir.
Col. All hopes goe now. (heare me,
Mir. I must tell you a thing in your eare, and you must
And heare me willingly, and grant me so too,
Twill not be worth my asking else.
Luc. It must be
A very hard thing sir, and from my power,
I shall deny your goodnesse.
Mir. Tis a good wench, I must lie with ye Lady.
Luc. Tis something strange:
For yet, in all my life I knew no bedfellow.
Mir. You will quickly finde that knowledge.
Luc. To what end sir?
Mir. Art thou so innocent, thou canst not guesse at it?
Did thy dreams never direct thee?
Luc. Faith none yet sir. (pleasure;
Mir. Ile tell thee then: I would meet thy youth and Give thee my youth for that, by Heaven she fires me,
And teach thy faire white armes, like wanton Ives,
A thousand new embraces,
Luc. Is that all sir?
And say I should try, may not we lie quietly?
Upon my conscience I could.
Mir. That's as we make it. (then?
Luc. Grant that, that likes ye best, what would ye doe
Mir. What would I do? certainly, I am no baby,
Nor brought up for a Nun; hark in thine eare.
Luc. Fie, fie, sir.
Mir. I wold get a brave boy on thee,
A warlike boy.
Luc. Sure we shall get ill Christians.
Mir. We'l mend 'em in the breeding then.
Luc. Sweet Master.
Col. Never beliefe in woman come neere me more.
Luc. My best and noblest sir, if a poor Virgin,
(For yet by ——— I am so) should change so far
(Seeing your excellence, and able sweetnesse)
To forget her selfe, and slip into your bosome,
Or to your bed, out of a doting on ye,
Take it the best way; have you that cruell heart,
That murdring mind too?
Mir. Yes by my troth (Sweet) have I,
To lie with her.
Luc. And do you think it wel done? (wench,
Mir. That's as she'l think when tis done; come to bed
For thou art so pretty, and so witty a companion,
We must not part to night.
Luc. Faith let me go sir,
And think better on't.
Mir. Yfaith thou shalt not;
I warrant thee Ile think on't.
Luc. I have heard 'em say here,
You are a mayd too.
Mir. I am sure I am, wench,
If that will please thee.
Luc. I have seen a wonder,
And would you lose that for a little wantonnesse,
(Consider my sweet Master, like a man, now,)
For a few honied kisses, sleight embraces,
That glory of your youth, that crown of sweetnesse?
Can ye deliver that unvalued treasure?
Would ye forsake, to seeke your own dishonour,
What gone, no age recovers, nor repentance?
To a poore stranger?
Col. Hold there again, thou art perfect.
Luc I know you do but try me.
Mir. And I know
Ile try you a great deale further: prethee to bed;
I love thee, and so well: come kisse me once more,
Is a maidenhead ill bestow'd o' me?
Luc. What's this sir?
Mir. Why, tis the badge (my Sweet) of that holy Order
I shortly must receive, the Crosse of Malta.
Luc. What vertue has it?
Mir. All that we call vertuous.
Luc. Who gave it first?
Mir. He that gave all, to save us.
Luc. Why then tis holy too?
Mir. True sign of holinesse,
The badge of all his Souldiers that professe him.

Luc.

Lut. The badge of all his ſouldiers that profeſſe him,
Can ſave in dangers?
Mir. Yes.
Luc. In troubles comfort?
Mir. You ſay true, ſweet.
Luc. In ſickneſſe, reſtore health?
Mir. All this it can do.
Luc. Preſerve from evils, that afflict our frailties.
Mir. I hope he will be Chriſtian: all theſe truly.
Luc. Why are you ſick then, ſick to death with luſt?
In danger to be loſt? no holy thought,
In all that heart, nothing but wandring frailties
Wild as the wind, and blind as death or ignorance,
Inhabit there.
Mir. Forgive me heaven, ſhe ſayes true.
Luc. Dare ye profeſſe that badge, prophan that goodneſs?
Col. Thou haſt redeemd thy ſelf again, moſt rarely.
Luc. That holines and truth ye make me wonder at?
Blaſt all the bounty heaven gives, that remembrance.
Col. O excellent woman.
Luc. Fling it from ye quickly,
If ye be thus reſolv'd; I ſee a vertue
Appear in't like a ſword, both edges flaming
That will conſume ye, and your thoughts, to aſhes,
Let them profeſſe it that are pure, and noble,
Gentle, and juſt of thought, that build the croſſe,
Not thoſe that break it, by——if ye touch me,
Even in the act, ile make that croſſe, and curſe ye.
Mir. You ſhall not (fair) I did diſſemble with ye,
And but to try your faith, I faſhioned all this:
Yet ſomething you provokt me this fair croſſe,
By me (if he but pleaſe to help, firſt gave it)
Shall ne'r be worne upon a heart corrupted;
Go to your reſt, my modeſt, honeſt ſervant,
My fair, and vertuous maid, and ſleep ſecure there,
For when you ſuffer, I forget this ſigne here.
Col. A man of men too: O moſt perfect Gentleman!
Luc. All ſweet reſt to your ſin; I am halfe a Chriſtian,
The other half, ile pray for; then for you, ſir;
Mir. This is the fowleſt play i'le ſhew, good night, ſweet.
Exeunt.

Actus quartus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Mountferrat, and Roco.

Mount. The Sun's not ſet yet?
Roc. No Sir.
Mount. Would it were,
Never to riſe againe to light the world.
And yet, to what vaine purpoſe do I wiſh it,
Since though I were inviron'd with thick miſts,
Black as Cymerian darkneſſe, or my crimes,
There is that here, upon which, as an anvile
Ten thouſand hammers ſtrike, and every ſpark
They force from it, to me's an other Sun
To light me to my ſhame?
Roc. Take hope, and comfort.
Mount. They are aides indeed, but yet as far from me,
As I from being innocent: this cave faſhioned
By provident nature, in this ſolid Rock
To be a den for beaſts, alone, receives me,
And having prov'd an enemy to mankinde,
All humane helpes forſak me.
Roc. I'le ne'r leave you,
And wiſh you would call back that noble courage
That old inviſible fortitude of yours
That us'd to ſhrink at nothing.
Mount. Then it did not.
But 'twas when I was honeſt; then in the height
Of all my happineſſe, of all my glories,
Of all delights, that made life pretious to me,
I durſt die Roco; death it ſelf then to me
Was nothing terrible, becauſe I knew,
The fame of a good Knight would ever live
Freſh on my memory; but ſince I fell
From my integrity, and diſmiſs'd thoſe guards,
Thoſe ſtrong aſſurances of innocence,
That conſtancy fled from me, and what's worſe,
Now I am loathſome to my ſelf; and life
A burthen to me, rackd with ſad remembrance
Of what I have done, and my preſent horrors
Unſufferable to me, tortur'd with deſpair
That I ſhall ne'r find mercy; hell about me,
Behind me, and before me, yet I dare not Still fearing worſe, put off my wretched being. Enter
Roc. To ſee this would deterre a doubtfull man Abdella
From miſchelvous intents, much more the practiſe
Of what is wicked: here's the Moore, look up ſir,
Some eaſe may come from her.
Mount. New trouble rather,
And I expect it.
Abd. Who is this? Mountferrat?
Riſe up for ſhame, and like a river dride up
With a long drought, from me, your bounteous Sea
Receive thoſe tides of comfort, that flow to you:
If ever I lookt lovely, if deſire
Could ever challenge welcom; if revenge,
And unexpected wreak, were ever pleaſing
Or could endear the giver of ſuch bleſſings,
All theſe I come adorn'd with, and as due
Make challenge of thoſe ſo long wiſhd embraces
Which you unkind have hither to denyde me.
Mount. Why, what have you done for me?
Abd. Made Oriana
As truly miſerable, as you thought him happy,
Could you wiſh more?
Mount. As if his ſickneſſe could Recover me; the injuries I received
Were Oriana.
Abd. She has paid deer for them,
She's dead.
Mount. How?
Abd. Dead: my hate could reach no further:
Taking advantage of her in a ſwoon,
Under preſence to give a Cordiall to her
I poyſond her: what ſtupid dulneſſe is this?
What you ſhould entertain with ſacrifice,
Can you receive ſo coldly?
Mount. Bloody deeds
Are gratefull offrings, pleaſing to the devill,
And thou, in thy black ſhape, and blacker actions
Being hels perfect character, art delighted
To do what I though infinitely wicked,
Tremble to hear; thou haſt in this tane from me
All meanes to make amends with penitence,
To her wronged vertues, and diſpoild me of
The poor remainder of that hope was left me,
For all I have already, or muſt ſuffer.
Abd. I did it for the beſt.
Mount. For thy worſt ends,
And be aſſurd but that, I think, to kill thee
Would but prevent, what thy deſpair muſt force thee
To do unto thy ſelf, and ſo to adde to

Thy moſt aſſur'd damnation, thou were dead now,
But get thee from my ſight: and if luſt of me
Did ever fire thee (love, I cannot call it)
Leap down from thoſe ſteep Rocks, or take advantage
Of the next Tree, to hang thy ſelf, and then
I may laugh at it.
Abd. In the mean time
I muſt be bold, to do ſo much for you, ha, ha.
Mount. Why grinſt thou, devill?
Abd. That 'tis in my power,
To puniſh thy ingratitude; I made triall
But how you ſtood affected, and ſince I know
I am us'd only for a property,
I can, and will revenge it to the full.
For, underſtand, in thy contempt of me
Thoſe hopes of Oriana, which I could
Have changd to certainties, are loſt for ever.
Mount. Why, lives ſhe?
Abd. Yes, but never to Mountferrat,
Although it is in me, with as much eaſe
To give her freely up to thy poſſeſſion,
As to remove this ruſh, which yet deſpaire of,
For by my much wrongd love, flattery, nor threats,
Teares, prayers, nor vowes, ſhall ever win me to it:
So with my curſe, I leave thee.
Mount. Prethee ſtay,
Thou knowſt I doat on thee, and yet thou art
So peeviſh, and perverſe, ſo apt to take Triffles unkindly from me.
Abd. To perſwade me
To break my neck, to hang, then damn my ſelf,
With you are triſles.
Mount. 'Twas my melancholy
That made me ſpeak I know not what: forgive,
I will redem my fault.
Roc. Believe him Lady.
Mount. A thouſand times I will demand thy pardon,
And keep the reckoning on thy lips, with kiſſes.
Abd. Ther's ſomething els, that would prevaile more (with me.
Mount. Thou ſhalt have all thy wiſhes do but bleſſe me
With meanes to ſatisfie my madde deſires
For once in Oriana, and for ever
I am thine, only thine my beſt Abdella.
Abd. Were I aſſur'd of this, and that you would Having enjoyd her.
Mount. Any thing: make choice of Thine own conditions.
Abd. Swear then, that performed.
(To free me from all doubts and fears hereafter)
To give me leave to kill her.
Mount. That our ſafety
Muſt of neceſſity urge us to.
Abd. Then know
It was not poyſon, but a ſleeping potion
Which ſhe received, yet of ſufficient ſtrength
So to bind up her ſences, that no ſigne
Of life appeard in her, and thus thought dead
In her beſt habit, as the cuſtome is
You know in Malta, with all ceremonies
She's buried in her families monument,
In the Temple of St. Iohn; i'le bring you thither,
Thus, as you are diſguiſd; ſome ſix howers hence
The potion will leave working.
Roc. Let us haſte then. Diſcover Tombe
Mount. Be my good angel, guid me.
Abd. But remember
You keep your Oath.
Mount. As I deſire to proſper
In what I undertak.
Abd. I ask no more. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Mirandz, Norandine, and Columna.

Col. Here ſir, I have got the Key, I borrowd it
Of him that keeps the Church, the door is open.
Mir. Look to the horſes then, and pleaſe the fellow.
After a few devotions, i'le retire.
Be not far off, there may be ſome uſe of ye,
Give me the light: come friend, a few good prayers
Were not beſtowd in vaine now, even from you ſir.
Men that are bred in blood, have no way left 'em,
No bath, no purge, no time to weare it out
Or waſh it off, but penitence, and prayer:
I am to take the order, and my youth
Loaden I muſt confeſſe with many follies,
Circled and bound about with ſins as many
As in the houſe of memory live figures.
My heart i'le open now, my faults confeſſe,
And riſe a new man, heaven I hope, to a new life.
Nor. I have no great devotion, at this inſtant,
But for a prayer or two, I will not out ſir,
Hold up your finger, when you have praid enough.
Mir. Go you to that end.
Nor. I ſhall ne'r pray alone ſure,
I have bin ſo us'd to anſwer the Clerk: would I had a cuſhion, for I ſhall ne'r make a good Hermit, and kneel till my knees are horn, theſe ſtones are plaguy hard where ſhal I begin now? for if I do not obſerve a method,
I ſhall be out preſently.
Ori. Oh, oh.
Nor. Whats that ſir? did ye heare?
Mir. Ha; to your prayers.
Nor. 'Twas here abouts, t'has put me clean awry now,
I ſhall ne'r get in again, ha, by Land,
And water, all children, and all women,
I there it was I left.
Ori. Oh, oh.
Nor. Never tell me ſir,
Here's ſomething got amongſt us.
Mir. I heard a groane:
A diſmall one,—Ori. Oh, Oh.
Nor. Here, tis here ſir, 'tis here ſir;
A devill in the wall.
Mir. Tis ſome illuſion
To fright us from devotion—Ori. Oh, oh.
Nor. Why tis here,
The ſpirit of a hunteſman choakd with butter,
Her's a new tomb, new trickments too.
Mir. For certaine,
This has not bin three dayes here.
Nor. And a Tablet
With rimes upon't.
Mir. I prethee read 'em Norandine.
Nor. An Epi—and Epi—taff. I think 'tis, I 'tis taff, an Upon the moſt excell, excell—lent—and. (Epitaff.
Mir. Thou canſt not read.
Nor. I have ſpoild mine eyes with gunpowder,
Mir. An Epitaph upon the moſt vertuous, and excellent
The honor of Chaſtity, Oriana. (Lady
Nor. The grand maſters ſiſter: how a devil came ſhe here?
When ſlipt ſhe out oth' way, the ſtone's but half upon her.
Mir. Tis is a ſodain chang: certain the miſchiefe
Mountferrat offerd to her broak her heart-ſtrings.
Nor. Would he were here, I would be the clerk my ſelf,
And

And by this little light, I would bury him alive here,
Her's no lamenting now. Ori. Oh, oh.
Nor. There tis. (for her
Mir. Sure from the monument, the very stone groanes
Oh, deer Lady: blessing of women, vertue of thy sex;
How art thou set for ever, how stolne from us.
Babling, and prating now converse with women.
Nor. Sir it rises, it looks up. She rises up.
Mir. Heaven blesse us.
Nor. It is in womans cloathes, it rises higher.
Mir. It looks about, and wonders, sure she lives sir.
Tis she, tis Oriana, tis that Lady.
Nor. Shall I go to her? Ori. Where am I?
Mir. Stand still.
Ori. What place is this?
Nor. She is as live as I am.
Ori. What smell of earth, and rotten bones, what dark Lord, whether am I carried? (place.
Nor. How she stares,
And sets her eyes upon him.
Mir. How is't deer Lady?
Do you know me, how she shakes?
Ori. You are a man.
Mir. A man that honours you.
Ori. A cruell man,
Ye are all cruell: are you in your grave too?
For ther's no trusting cruell man, above ground.
Nor. Byr' Lady, that goes hard.
Mir. To do your service
And to restore ye to the joyes you were in.
Ori. I was in joyes indeed, and hope——
Mir. She sincks againe
Again she is gon; she is gon: gon as a shadow;
She sinks for ever, friend.
Nor. She is cold now,
She is certainly departed, I must cry too.
Mir. The blessed angels guide thee: put the stone too,
Beauty thou art gon to dust, goodnesse to ashes.
Nor. Pray take it well: we must all have our houres sir.
Mir. I, that we are; and all our painted glory, now
A buble that a boy blowes in toth' ayre,
And there it breaks.
Nor. I am glad ye sav'd her honour yet.
Mir. Would I had sav'd her life now too: oh heaven
For such a blessing, such a timely blessing
O friend, what deer content 'twould be, what story
To keep my name from wormes? Ori. Oh, oh.
Nor. She lives again,
'Twas but a trance.
Mir. Pray ye call my man in presently
Help with the stone first, oh she stirs againe.
Oh call my man away.
Nor. I fly, I fly sir.
Mir. Upon my knees O heaven, O heaven I thank thee.
The living heat steales into every member; Ex. Colonn. &
Come help the Coffin out, softly, and sodainly Nor. and.
VVhere is the Clerk?
Col. Drunk above, he is sure sir.
Mir. Sirah, you must be secret.
Col. As your soule sir.
Mir. Softly good friend, take her into your armes.
Nor. Put in the cruft againe.
Mir. And bring her out there when I am a horseback
My man, and I will tenderly conduct her
Unto the Fort; stay you, and watch what issue,
And what inquirie's for the body.
Nor. Well sir.
Mir. And when ye have done, come back to me.
Nor. I will.
Mir. Softly, oh softly.
Nor. She growes warmer still sir.
Col. What shall I do with' Key?
Mir. Thou canst not stir now,
Leave it ith' door: go get the horses ready. Exeunt
Roc. The door's already open, the Key in it. En. Roca
Mount. What were those past by? Mountferrat
Roc. Some scout of Souldiers, I think. Abdello.
Mount. It may be well so, for I saw their horses, With a
They saw not us I hope. dark lan-
Abd. No, no, we were close, thorn.
Beside they were far off.
Mount. What time of night is't?
Abd. Much about twelve I think.
Roc. Let me go in first.
For by the leaving open of the door here
There may be some body in the Church: give me the Abd. You'l love me now I hope. (Lanthorne.
Mount. Make that good to me
Your promise is engaged for.
Abd. Why she is there
Ready prepar'd, and much about this time
Life will look up again.
Roc. Come in all's sure,
Not a foot stirring, nor a tongue.
Mount. Heaven blesse me,
I never enter'd with such unholy thoughts
This place before.
Abd. Ye are a fearfull foole,
If men have appetites allow'd 'em,
And warm desires, age that's not cends too for 'em?
Mount. Whether shall I me carry her?
Roc. Why, to the backsit,
I have provided one already waites us
The wind stands wondrous fair too for our passage.
Abd. And there, when ye have enjoyd her, for ye have Let me alone to send her to feed fishes, (that liberty
I'le no more sighes for her.
Mount. Where is the monument?
Thou art sure she will awake about this time?
Abd. Most sure, if she be not knockt oth' head: give me Here 'tis, how is this, the stone off? (the Lanthorn,
Roc. I, and nothing
Within the monument, that's worse, no body
I am sure of that, nor signe of any here,
But an empty Coffin.
Mount. No Lady.
Roc. No, nor Lord sir,
This Pye has bin cut up before.
Abd. Either the Devill
Must doe these tricks——
Mount. Or thou, damn'd one, worse;
Thou black swoln pitchie cloud, of all my afflictions:
Thou night hag gotten when the bright Moone suffred
Thou hell it self cousin'd in flesh: what trick now?
Tell me, and tell me quickly what thy mischief
Has done with her, and to what end, and whether Thou hast remov'd her body, or by this holy place
This sword shall cut thee into thousand peeces.
A thousand thousand, strow thee ore the Temple
A sacrifice to thy black fire, the Devill.
Roc. Tell him, you see he's angry.
Abd. Let him hardly,
Neither his sword, nor anger do I shake at,
Nor will yeild to feed his poor suspitions,
His idle jealousies, and maddle dogs humors
One thought against my self: ye have done a brave deed

A manly, and a valiant peece of Service
When ye have kill'd me; reckon't amongſt your Battels:
I am ſorry ye are ſo poore, ſo weake a gentleman
Able to ſtand no fortune: I diſpoſe of her?
My miſchiefe make her away? a likely project,
I muſt play booty againſt my ſelfe, if any thing croſſe ye
I am the devill, and the devils heire,
All plagues, all miſchiefes.
Mount. Will ye leave and doe yet?
Ab. I have done too much,
Far, far too much for ſuch a thankleſſe fellow,
If I be devill, you created me,
I never knew thoſe arts, nor bloody practiſes
(—— o' your cunning heart, that mine of miſchiefe)
Before your flatteries won'em into me,
Here did I leave her, leave her with that certainty
About this houre to wake again.
Mount. Where is ſhe?
This is the laſt demand.
Ab. Did I now know it,
And were I ſure, this were my lateſt minute
I would not tell thee: ſtrike, and then i'le curſe thee:
Rocca I ſee a light, ſtand cloſe, and leave your angers.
We all miſcarry elſe. Enter Gomera, Page with Torch.
Ab. I am now careleſſe,
Mount. Peace, prethee peace, ſweet, peace, all friends,
Ab. Stand cloſe then.
Gom. Waite there Boy, with the light, till I call to
In darkneſſe was my ſoule and ſences clouded (thee,
When my faire Jewell fell, the night of jealouſie,
In all her blackneſſe drawn about my judgement:
No light was let into me: to diſtinguiſh
Betwixt my ſuddain anger and her honour,
A blinde ſad Pilgrimage ſhall be my pennance,
No comfort of the day will I looke up at:
Far darker then my jealous Ignorance
Each place of my aboad ſhall be my prayers
No ceremonious lights ſhall ſet off more;
Bright Armes, and all that carry luſtre, life,
Society, and ſollace, I forſake ye.
And were it not once more to ſee her beauties
(For in her bed of death, ſhe muſt be ſweet ſtill,)
And on her cold ſad lips ſeal my repentance;
Thou child of heaven, faire light I could not miſſe thee.
Mount. I know the tongue, would I were out againe
I have done him too much wrong to looke upon him.
Ab. There is no ſhifting now, boldneſſe, and confidence
Muſt carry it now away: he is but one neither,
Naked as you are, of a ſtrength far under Mount. But he has a cauſe above me,
Ab. That's as you handle it.
Roc. Peace: he may goe againe, and never ſee us.
Gom. I feele I weepe apace, but where's the flood,
The torrent of my teares, to drown my fault in,
I would I could now like a loaden cloud
Begotten in the moyſt ſouth, drop to nothing
Give me the Torch, Boy.
Roc. Now he muſt diſcover us.
Ab. He has already, never hide your head
Be bold, and brave, if we muſt dye together.
Gom. Who's there: what friend to ſorrow? The Tombe
The Stone off too? the body gone, by —— (wide open Looke to the doore Boy: keep it faſt, who are ye?
What ſacrilegious villaines? falſe Mountferrat,
The wolfe to honour, h'as thy helliſh hunger,
Brought thee to tear the body out oth' tomb too?
Has thy foule mind ſo far wrought on thee? ha,
Are you there too? nay, then I ſpie a villany
I never dream't of yet, thou ſinfull uſher
Bred from that rottenneſſe, thou bawd to miſchiefe,
Doe you bluſh through all your blackneſſe? will not
Ab. I cannot ſpeake. (that hide it?
Gom. You are well met, with your dam, ſir,
Art thou a Knight? did ever on that ſword,
The Chriſtian cauſe ſit nobly? could that hand fight,
Guided by fame, and fortune? that heart inflame thee,
With vertuous fires of valour, to fall off,
Fall off ſo ſuddainly, and with ſuch foouleneſſe,
As the falſe Angels did, from all their glory?
Thou art no Knight, honour thou never heard'ſt of,
Nor brave deſires could ever build in that breaſt,
Treaſon, and tainted thoughts, are all the Gods (tune;
Thou worſhip'ſt, all the ſtrength thou hadſt: and for-
Thou didſt things out of feare, and falſe heart, villaine
Out of cloſe traps and treacheries, they have rais'd thee.
Mount. Thou rav'ſt old man.
Gom. Before thou get'ſt off from me,
Had'ſt thou the glory of thy firſt fights on thee
Which thou haſt baſely loſt, thy nobleſt fortunes,
And in their greateſt luſtres, I would make thee
Before we part, confeſſe, nay, kneele, and doe it,
Nay, crying kneele, coldly for mercy, crying:
Thou art the recreant'ſt Rogue, time ever nouriſh'd,
Thou art a dogge, I will make thee ſweare, a dog ſtav'd,
A mangy Cur-dogge; doe you creep behind the Altar?
Looke how it ſweats, to ſhelter ſuch a raſcall;
Firſt, with thy venemous tooth infect her chaſte life,
And then not dare to doe; next, rob her reſt,
Steale her dead body out oth' grave.
Mount. I have not.
Gom. Prethee come out, this is no place to quarrell in,
Valiant Mountferrat come,
Mount. I will not ſtir.
Gom. Thou haſt thy ſword about thee,
That good ſword, that never fail'd thee: prethee come,
We'l have but five ſtroakes for it, on, on Boy,
Here's one would faine be acquainted with thee, (ſir,
Would wondrous fain cleave that Calves-head of yours
Come, prethee let's diſpatch, the Moone ſhines finely:
Prethee be kill'd by me, thou wilt be hang'd elſe,
But it may be, thou long'ſt to be hang'd.
Roc. Out with him, Sir,
You ſhall have my ſword too: when he's diſpatch'd once
We have the world before us.
Gom. Wilt thou walke fellow,
I never knew a Rogue, hang arſe-ward ſo,
And ſuch a deſperate knave too.
Ab. Pray goe with him,
Something I'le promiſe too,
Mount. You would be kill'd then?
No remedy, I ſee,
Gom. If thou dar'ſt doe it?
Mount. Yes, now I dare; lead out, i'le follow preſently Vnder the Mount i'le meet ye.
Gom. Goe before me,
Ile have ye in a ſtring too.
Mount. As I am a Gentleman,
And by this holy place, I will not faile thee,
Feare not, thou ſhalt be kill'd, take my word for it
I will not faile.
Gom. If thou ſcap'ſt thou haſt Cats luck,
The Mount?
Mount. The ſame: make haſte, I am there before elſe.
Gom. Goe get ye home, now if he ſcape I am Coward.
Mount. Well, now I am reſolv'd, and he ſhall finde it.

Exeunt.

Scena

Scena Tertia.

Enter Miranda, Lucinda, Collonna.

Mir. How is it with the Lady?
Luc. Sir, as well
As it can be with one, who feeling knowes now
What is the curse the divine justice lay'd
On the first sinfull woman.
Mir. Is she in travell?
Luc. Yes sir; and yet the troubles of her mind
Afflict her more, then what her body suffers,
For in the extremity of her paine, she cries out,
Why am I here? Where is my Lord Gomera,
Then sometimes names Miranda, and then sighes,
As if to speake, what questionlesse she loves well,
If heard, might doe her injury.
Col. Heavens sweet mercy
Looke gently on her,
Mir. Prethee tell her, my Prayers
Are present with her, and good wench provide
That she want nothing: what's thy name?
Luc. Lucinda.
Mir. Lucinda, there's a prosperous omen in it,
Be a Lucina to her, and bring word
That she is safe delivered of her burthen,
And thy rewards thy liberty: come Collonna,
We will goe see how th' Engineer has mounted
The Canon the great Master sent, be carefull,
To view the workes, and learn the discipline
That is us'd here: I am to leave the world
And for your service, which I have found faithfull,
The charge that's mine, if I have any power
Hereafter may concerne you.
Col. I still finde
A noble Master in you,
Mir. 'Tis but justice,
Thou do'st deserve it in thy care, and duty. Exeunt.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Gomera, Mountferrat, Rocca, Abdella, with a Pistoll.

Gom. Here's even ground, i'le stir no foot beyond it,
Before I have thy head.
Mount. Draw Rocca.
Gom. Coward,
Hath inward guilt, rob'd thee as well of courage
As honesty? that without oddes thou dar'st not Answer a single Enemy?
Mount. All advantage
That I can take, expect.
Roc. We know you are valiant,
Nor doe we purpose to make further triall
Of what you can doe now: but to dispatch you.
Mount. And therefore fight, and pray together;
Gom. Villaines,
Whose baseness, all disgracefull words made one,
Cannot expresse, so strong is the good cause
That seconds me, that you shall feele, with horrour
To your proud hopes, what strength is in that arme,
Though old, that holds a sword made sharp by justice.
Ab. You come then here, to prate? fight.
Mount. Helpe Rocca, now,
Or I am lost for ever; how comes this?
Are villany, and weakness twynes?
Roc. I am gone too.
Gom. You shall not scape me, wretches,
Ab. I must doe it,
All will goe wrong else. shoots him
Gom. Treacherous bloody woman,
What hast thou done?
Ab. Done a poor womans part,
And in an instant, what these men so long Stood fooling for.
Mount. This aide was unexpected,
I kisse thee for't,
Roc. His right armes onely shot,
And that compell'd him to forsake his sword,
He's else unwounded.
Mount. Cut his throat.
Ab. Forbeare.
Yet doe not hope 'tis with intent to save thee.
But that thou maist live to thy farther torment
To see who triumphes over thee: come Mountferrat,
Here joyne thy foot to mine, and let our hearts
Meet with our hands, the contract that is made
And cemented with blood, as this of ours is,
Is a more holy sanction, and much surer,
Then all the superstitious ceremonies Enter
You Christians use. Norandine.
Roc. Who's this?
Mount. Betray'd againe?
Nor. By the report it made, and by the wind
The Pistoll was discharged here.
Gom. Norandine,
As ever thou lov'st valour, or wear'st Armes
To punish baseness, shew it.
Nor. O the devill,
Gomera wounded, and my Brache black beauty
An actor in it?
Ab. If thou strik'st, i'le shoote thee.
Nor. How? fright me with your Pot-gun? what art thou,
Good heaven, the Rogue, the traytor rogue Mountferrat
To swinge the neast of you, is a sport unlook'd for,
Hels consume you.
Mount. As thou art a man;
I am wounded, give me time to answer thee.
Go. Dar'st thou urge this? this hand can hold a sword yet.
Nor. Well done: to see this villaine, makes my hurts
Bleed fresh againe, but had I not a bone whole,
In such a cause I should doe thus, thus Rascals. Runs
Cor. Disarme them, and shoote any that resists. Corporall
Gom. Hold Corporall; I am Gomera, and watch.
Nor. 'Tis well yet, that once in an age you can Remember what you watch for: I had thought
You had again been making out your parties
For sucking piggs.
'Tis well:
Nor. As you will answer
The contrary with your lives, see these forth coming.
Cor. That we shall doe.
Nor. You bleed a pace: good Souldiers
Goe helpe him to a Surgeon;
Roc. Dare the worst,
And suffer like your selfe.
Ab. From me learne courage.
Nor. Now for Miranda, this newes will be to him
As welcome, as 'tis unexpected: Corporall,
There's something for thy care to night: my horse there.
Exeunt.

Actus quintus. Scena prima.

Enter Oriana, and Lucinda.

Ori. How do's my Boy?
Luc. Oh, wondrous lusty, Madam,
A little Knight already: you shall live
To see him tosse a Turke.
Ori. Gentle Lucinda,
Much must I thank thee for thy care, and service.
And may I grow but strong to see Valetta, Enter
My husband, and my brother, thou shalt finde Miranda,
I will not barely thank thee. Norandine, Collonna.
Mir. Looke Captaine, we must ride away this morn-
The Auberge sits to day, and the great Master (ning Writes plainly, I must or deliver in (The yeere expir'd) my probation weed;
Or take the Cloake: you likewise Norandine
For your full service, and your last assistance
In false Montferrats apprehension
Are here commanded to associate me; my twin in this high honour.
Nor. Ile none on't: doe they think to bind me to live chaste, sober, and temperately, all dayes of my life? they may as soone tye an Englishman to live so: I shall be a sweet Dane, a sweet Captaine, goe up and downe drinking small beere, and swearing 'odds neagues; no Ile live a Squire at Armes still, and doe thou so too; and thou beest wise: I have found the mystery now, why the Gentlemen weare but three barres of the crosse, and the knights the whole one.
Mir. Why Captaine?
Nor. Mary sir, to put us in remembrance, we are but three quarters cross'd in our licence, and pleasures: but the poore Knights cross'd altogether; the brothers at Armes, may yet meet with their Sisters at Armes, now and then, in brotherly love; but the poore Knights cannot get a Lady for love, nor money: 'tis not so in other Countries I wis, pray haste you, for i'le along, and see what will come ou't. Exit.
Mir. Collonna, provide strait, all necessaries
For this remove, the Lyttre for the Lady,
And let Lucinda beare her company,
You shall attend on me.
Coll. With all my duties Exit.
Mir. How fare you, gracious Mistresse?
Ori. O Miranda.
You pleas'd to honour me with that faire title
When I was free, and could dispose my selfe;
But now, no smile, no word, no looke, no touch
Can I impart to any, but as theft
From my Gomera; and who dares accept,
Is an usurper.
Mir. Leave us; I have touch'd thee,
(Thou fairer vertue, then thou'rt beautifull)
Hold but this test, so rich an ore was never Altar ready,
Try'd by the hand of man, on the vast earth: Taper; &
Sit brightest Oriana, is it sinne booke.
Still to professe I love you, still to vow
I shall doe ever? heaven my witnesse be,
'Tis not your eye, your cheeke, your tongue, no part
That superficially doth snare young men,
Which has caught me; read over in your thoughts
The story that this man hath made of you,
And thinke upon his merit.
Ori. Onely thought
Can comprehend it.
Mir. And can you be so
Cruell, thankelesse, to destroy his youth
That sav'd your honour, gave you double life?
Your own, and your faire Infants? that when fortune
(The blind foe to all beauty, that is good,) Bandied you from one hazard to another,
Was even heavens Messenger, by providence
Call'd to the Temple, to receive you there,
Into these Armes, to give ease to your throwes,
As if 't had thunder'd; take thy due Miranda,
For she was thine; Gomera's jealousie
Strooke death unto thy heart; to him be dead,
And live to me, that gave thee second life:
Let me but now enjoy thee: Oh regard
The torturing fires of my affections.
Ori. Oh master them, Miranda, as I mine;
Who follows his desires, such tyrants serves
As will oppresse him, insupportably.
My flames, Miranda, rise as high as thine,
For I did love thee 'fore my marriage,
Yet would I now consent, or could I think Thou wert in earnest, (which by all the soules
That have (for chastity) been sanctified
I can not) in a moment I doe know
Thou'ldst call faire temperance up to rule thy blood,
Thy eye was ever chaste, thy countenance too honest,
And all thy woings was like maidens talk;
Who yeeldeth unto pleasures, and to lust
Is a poore captive, that in Golden Fetters
(And pretious (as he thinkes) but holding gyves)
Frets out his life.
Mir. Find such another woman,
And take her for his labour, any man:
Ori. I was not worthy of thee, at my best,
Heaven knew I was not, I had had thee else;
Much lesse now gentle sir; Mirandas deeds
Have been as white, as Orianas fame,
From the beginning, to this point of time,
And shall we now begin to staine both thus?
Think on the legend which we two shall breed
Continuing as we are, for chastest dames
And boldest Souldiers to peruse and read,
I and read thorough, free from any act
To cause the modest cast the booke away,
And the most honour'd Capeaine fold it up.
Mir; Fairest; let goe my hand: my pulse beats thick,
And my mov'd blood rides high in every vaine,
Lord of thy selfe now, Souldier, and ever:
I would not for Aleppo, this fraile Bark,
This barke of flesh, no better steerer man had
Then has Montferrat's: may you kisse me, Lady?
Ori. No; though't be no essentiall injury,
It is a circumstance due to my Lord,
To none else: and my dearest friend, if hands
Playing together, kindle heate in you,
What may the game at lips provoke unto?
Mir. Oh what a tongue is here? whil'st she doth teach
My heart to hate my fond unlawfull love,
She talkes me more in love, with love to her,
My fires she quencheth with her arguments,
But as she breathes 'em, they blow fresher fires.
Sit further: now my flame cooles; husband, wife,
There is some holy mystery in those names
That sure the unmarried cannot understand.
Ori. Now thou art strait, and do'st enamour me,

So

So far beyhnd a carnall earthly love;
My very ſoule doats on thee, and my ſpirits
Doe embrace thine, my minde doth thy mind kiſſe,
And in this pure conjunction we enjoy
A heavenlyer pleaſure then if bodies met:
This, this is perfect love, the other ſhort,
Yet languiſhing fruition, every Swaine
And ſweating Groome may claſp, but our's refinde
Two in ten ages cannot reach unto;
Nor is our ſpirituall love, a barren joy,
For mark what bleſſed iſſue we'll beget,
Deerer then children to poſterity,
A great example to mens continence,
And womens chaſtity, that is a childe
More faire, and comfortable, then any heire.
Mir. If all wives were but ſuch, luſt would not finde
One corner to Inhabit, ſinne would be
So ſtrange, remiſſion ſuperfluous:
But one petition, I have done.
Ori. What (Sweet?).
Mir. To call me Lord, if the hard hand of death ſeize on Gomera firſt.
Ori. Oh, much too worthy;
How much you undervalue your own price,
To give your unbought ſelfe, for a poore woman,
That has been once ſold, us'd, and loſt her ſhow?
I am a garment worne, a veſſell crack'd,
A zoane untide, a Lilly trod upon,
A fragrant flowre cropt by anothers hand,
My colour ſullyde, and my odour chang'd,
If when I was new bloſſom'd, I did ſtare
My ſelfe unworthy of Mirandas ſpring:
Thus over-blown, and ſeeded, I am rather
Fit to adorn his Chimney, then his bed.
Mir. Riſe miracle: ſave Malta, with thy vertue,
If words could make me proud, how has ſhe ſpoke,
Yet I will try her to the very block:
Hard-hearted, and uncivill Oriana,
Ingrateſull payer of my induſtries,
That with a ſoft painted hypocriſie
Cozen'ſt, and geer'ſt my perturbation,
Expect a witty, and a fell revenge:
My comfort is, all men will thinke thee falſe, Beſide thy husband having been thus long Enter Nor.
(on this occaſion) in my Fort, and power. Colonna &
Ile heare no more words: Captaine, let's away Lucinda
With all care ſee to her: and you Lucinda with a
Attend her diligently: ſhe is a wonder. Childe.
Nor. Have you found ſhe was well delivered:
What, had ſhe a good Mid-wife, is all well?
Mir. You are merry Norandine.
Luc. Why weepe you, Lady?
Ori. Take the poor Babe along.
Col. Madam 'tis here.
Ori. Diſſembling death, why didſt thou let me live
To ſee this change, my greateſt cauſe to grieve? Exeunt.

Scena ſecunda.

Enter Aſturius, Caſtriot, Valetta, Gomera, Symnet: Knights, 2 Biſhops, Mountferrat, guarded by Corporall and Souldiers, Abdella, a Gentleman with a cloake, ſword, and Spurres: Gomera.

Val. A tender husband haſt thou ſhew'd thy ſelfe
My deareſt brother, and thy memory
After my life, in brazen Characters,
Shall monumentally be regiſter'd
To ages conſequent, till times running hand,
Beats back the world to undiſtinguiſh'd Chaos,
And on the top of that thy name ſhall ſtand
Freſh, and without decay.
Gom. Oh honour'd ſir!
If hope of this, or any bliſſe to come
Could lift my load of griefe off from my ſoule,
Or expiate the treſpaſſe 'gainſt my wife,
That in one houres ſuſpition I begat,
I might be won to be a man againe,
And fare like other husbands, ſleepe and eate,
Laugh, and forget my pleaſing penitence;
But till old nature can make ſuch a wife
Againe, I vow ne're to reſume the order
And habits, that to men are neceſſary,
All breath i'le ſpend in ſighes, all ſound in groanes,
And know no company but my waſting mone.
Aſt. This will be wilfull murder on your ſelf,
Nor like a Chriſtian doe you beare the chance
Which th'inſcrutable will of heaven admits.
Gom. What would you have my weakneſſe doe, that Suffer'd it ſelfe thus to be practis'd on,
By a damn'd hell-hound, and his agent dam,
The impious mid-wife to obortive birthes,
And cruell inſtrument to his decrees?
By forgery they firſt aſſail'd her life,
Heaven playing with us yet, in that, he wrought
My deareſt friend, the ſervant to her vertue
To combat me, againſt his Miſtreſſe truth.
That yet effectleſſe, this enchanting witch,
Bred baneſull jealouſie againſt my Lady,
My moſt immaculate Lady, which ſeiz'd on her
Almoſt to death: Oh yet! not yet content,
She in my hand put (to reſtore her life
As I imagin'd) what did execute
Their devilliſh malice, farther, great with childe,
Was this poore innocent, that too was loſt,
They doubled death upon her, not ſtaying there,
They have done violence unto her Tomb,
Not granting reſt unto her in the grave:
I wiſh Miranda had injoy'd my prize;
For ſure I'm puniſh'd for uſurping her,
Oh what a Tyger is reſiſted Luſt?
How it doth forrage all?
Mount. Part of this tale
I grant you true, but 'twas not poyſon given her.
Ab. I would it had, we had been farre enough,
If we had been ſo wiſe, and had not now
Stood curſing foe your mercies here.
Mount. Beſide,
What is become och'body? we know not.
Val. Peace impudent,
And deere Gomera practiſe patience
As I my ſelf muſt, by ſome meanes at laſt
We ſhall diſſolve this riddle.
Gom. Wherefore comes
This villaine in the feſtivall array,
As if he triumph'd for his treacherie?
Caſt. That is by our appointment: give us leave,
You ſhall know why anon. Enter Miranda,
Val. One of the Eſguard. Norandine,
Eſq. The Gentlemen are come, Colonna.
Val. Truyce then a while
With our ſad thoughts; what are you both reſolv'd?
Nor. Not I my Lord: your downe right Captain ſtill
Ile live, and ſerve you, not that altogether

I want compunction of conſcience,
I have enough to ſave me, and that's all,
Bar me from drink, and drabs, ev'n hang me too;
You muſt ev'n make your Captaines capons firſt,
I have too much fleſh for this ſpirituall Knighthood,
And therefore do deſire forbearance, ſir,
Till I am older, or more mortifide,
I am too ſound yet.
Val. What ſay you Miranda?
Mir. With all pure zeale to Heaven, duty to you,
I come to undergo it.
Val. Proceed toth' ceremony.
Gom. Before you match with this bright honor'd title,
Admir'd Miranda, pardon what in thought
I ever did tranſgreſſe againſt your vertue,
And may you find more joy with your new bride
Then poor Gomera ere injoyd with his.
But 'twas mine own crime, and I ſuffer for't:
Long wear your dignity, and worthily,
Whilſt I obſcurely in ſome corner vaniſh,
Mir. Have ſtronger thoughts, and better, firſt I crave
According to the order of the Court
I may diſpoſe my captives, and the fort,
That with a clean and purified heart
The fittiler I may endue my roabe.
All. Tis granted. Enter Oriana
Mir. Bring the captives. To your charge vaild, Ladies,
And ſtaid tuition my moſt noble friend; Lucinda, child.
I then commend this Lady; ſtart not off
A fairer, and a chaſter never liv'd;
By her own choyce you are her Guardian,
For telling her I was to leave my fort,
And to abandon quite all worldly cares.
Her own requeſt was, to Gomera hands
She might be given in cuſtody, for ſh'ad heard
He was a Gentleman wiſe, and temperate,
Full of humanity to womenkind,
And cauſe he had bin married knew the better
How to entrat a Lady.
Val. What Country woman is ſhe?
Mir. Borne a Greek.
Val. Gomera, 'twill be barbarous to deny
A Lady, that unto your refuge flyes,
And ſeekes to ſhrowd her under vertues wing.
Gom. Excuſe me noble ſir; oh think me not
So dull a devill, to forget the loſſe
Of ſuch a matchleſſe wife as I poſſes'd,
And ever to endure the ſight of woman:
Were ſhe the abſtract of her ſex for forme,
The only warehouſe of perfection,
Where there no Roſe, nor Lilly but her Cheek,
No Muſick but her tongue; vertue but hers;
She muſt not reſt near me, my vow is graven,
Here in my heart, irrevocably breath'd
And when I break it,
Aſt. This is rudeneſſe Spaniard,
Unſeaſonably you play the Timoniſt,
Put on a diſpoſition is not yours,
Which neither fits you, nor becomes you.
Gom. Sir.
Caſt. We cannot force you but we would perſwade.
Gom. Beſeech you Sir, no more I am reſolv'd
To forſake Malta, tread a Pilgrimage
To faire Jeruſalem, for my Ladies ſoule,
And will not be diverted.
Mir. You muſt beare
This Child along: we then.
Gom. What Child?
All. How's this?
Mir. Nay then Gomera, thou art injurious,
This child is thine, and this rejected Lady
Thou haſt as often known, as thine own wife,
And this I'le make good on thee, with my ſword.
Gom. Thou durſt as well blaſpheme: if ſuch a ſcandall
(I crave the rights due to a Gentleman)
Women unvaile.
Ori. Will you refuſe me yet?
Gom. My wife!
Val. My ſiſter!
Gom. Some body, thank Heaven
I cannot ſpeak.
All. All praiſe be ever given:
Mount. This ſaves our lives, yet would ſhe had bin dead;
The very ſight of her afflicts me more
Then fear of puniſhment, or my diſgrace.
Val. How came you to the Temple?
Mir. Sir, to do
My poor devotions, and to offer thanks
For ſcaping a temptation ne'r perform'd
With this faire virgin. I reſtore a wife
Earth cannot paralell: and buſie nature
If thou wilt ſtill make women, but remember
To work 'em by this ſampler; take heed ſir,
Henceforth you never doubt ſir.
Gom. When I do
Death take me ſodainly.
Mir. To encreaſe your happineſſe
To your beſt wife, take this addition.
Gom. Alack, my poor knave.
Val. The confeſſion
The Moor made 't ſeemes was truth.
Nor. Mary was it ſir; the only truth that ever iſſud out of hell, which her black jawes reſemble; a plague o' your bacon-face, you muſt be giving drinks with a venganee; ah thou branded bitch: do'ye ſtare, gogles, I hope to make winter bootes o' thy hide yet, ſhe feares not damning: hell fire cannot parch her blacker then ſhe is: do'ye grin, chimney ſweeper.
Ori. What is't Miranda?
Mir. That you would pleaſe Lucinda might attend you.
Col. That ſuit ſir, I conſent not to.
Luc. My husband?
My deereſt Angelo?
Nor. More liggam bobs; is not this the fellow that (ſwom
Like a duck to th'ſhoare in our ſea-ſervice?
Col. The very ſame, do not you know me now ſir,
My name is Angelo, though Colonna vaild it,
Your Countryman, and kinſman born in Florence,
Who from the neighbour Iſland here of Goza
Whascaptive lead, in that unfortunate day
When the Turk bore with him three thouſand ſoules;
Since in Conſtantinople have I liv'd
Where I beheld this Turkiſh Datooſell firſt.
A tedious ſuitor was I for her love,
And pittying ſuch a beauteous caſe ſhould hide
A ſoule prophan'd with infidelity,
I labourd her converſion with my love,
And doubly won her; to faire faith her ſoule
She firſt betroth'd, and then her faith to me,
But fearfull there to conſummate this contract
We fled, and in that flight were tane againe
By thoſe ſame Gallies, fore Valetta fought.
Since in your ſervice I attended her,
Where, what I ſaw, and heard, hath joy'd me more
Then all my paſt afflictions griev'd before.
Val. Wonders crown wonders: take thy wife Miranda.

Be henceforth called our Malta's better angell,
And thou her evill Mountferrat.

Nor. Wee'l call him Cacodemon, with his block gib there, his Succuba, his devils ſeed, his ſpawn of Phlegeton, that o' my conſcience was bred o' the ſpume of Cocitus; do ye ſnarle you black jill? ſhe looks lie the Picture of America.

Val. Why ſtay we now.

Mir. This laſt petition to the Court,
I may bequeath the keeping of my Fort
To this my kinſman, toward the maintenance
Of him, and his faire vertuous wife; diſcreet,
Loyall, and valiant I dare give him you.

Val. You muſt not ask in vaine, ſir.

Col. My beſt thanks
To you my noble Cozen, and my ſervice
To the whole Court; may I deſerve this bounty.

Val. Proceed to th'ceremony, one of our Eſguard
Degrade Mountferrat firſt

Mount. I will not ſue
For mercy, 'twere in vaine; fortune thy worſt. Muſick.

An altar diſcovered, with Tapers, and a book on it. The two Biſhops ſtand on each ſide of it Mountferrat as the Song is ſinging aſcends up the altar.

See ſee, the ſtaine of honor, vertues foe,
Of Virgins fair fames, the foule overthrow,
That broken hath his oath of chaſtity
Diſhonor'd much this holy dignity,
Off with his Roab, expell him forth this place,
Whilſt we rejoyce, and ſing at his diſgrace.

Val. Since by thy actions thou haſt made thy ſelf
Unworthy of that worthy ſigne thou wear'ſt,
And of our ſacred order, into which
For former vertues, we receiv'd thee firſt,
According to our Statutes, Ordinances,
For praiſe unto the good, a terror to
The bad, and an example to all men;
We here deprive thee of our habit, and Declare thee unworthy our ſociety,
From which we do expell thee, as a rotten
Corrupted, and contagious member.

Eſq. Uſing th'authority th'Superiour
Hath given unto me, I unty this knot,
And take from thee the pleaſing yoak of heaven:
We take from off thy breaſt this holy croſſe,
Which thou haſt made thy burthen, not thy prop;
Thy ſpurs we ſpoile thee off, cleaving thy heeles
Bare of thy honour, that have kick'd againſt
Our orders precepts: next we reave thy ſword,
And give thee armeleſſe to thy enemies,
For being foe to goodneſſe, and to God,
Laſt, 'cout thy ſtiff neck, we this halter hang,
And leave thee to the mercy of the Court.

Val. Inveſt Miranda.

Song.

Faire child of vertue, honors bloome
That here with burning zeale doſt come
With joy to ask the white croſſe cloak,
And yeild unto this pleaſing yoake
That being yong, vowes chaſtity,
And chooſeſt wilfull poverty;
As this flame mounts, ſo mount thy zeale, thy glory
Riſe paſt the Stars, and fix in Heaven thy ſtory.

1. Biſh. What crave you gentle ſir?

Mir. Humble admittance
To be a brother of the holy Hoſpitall
Of great Jeruſalem.

2. Biſh. Breath out your vow.

Mir. To heaven and all the bench of Saints above
Whoſe ſuccour I implore t'enhable me,
I vow henceforth a chaſte life, not to enjoy
Any thing proper to my ſelf; obedience
To my ſuperiours, whom Religion,
And Heaven ſhall give me: ever to defend
The vertuous fame of Ladies, and to oppugne
Even unto death the Chriſtian enemy,
This do I vow to accompliſh.

Eſq. Who can tell,
H'as he made other vow, or promis'd marriage
To any one, or is in ſervitude?

All He's free from all theſe.

1. Biſh. Put on his ſpurs, and girt him with the ſword,
The ſcourge of infidels, and tipes of ſpeed.
Buildſt thy faith on this

Mir. On him that di'd
On ſuch a ſacred figure, for our ſins.

2. Biſh. Here, then we fix it on thy left ſide, for Thy encreaſe of faith, Chriſtian defence, and ſervice
To th'poor, and thus near to thy heart we plant it
That thou maiſt love it even with all thy heart,
With thy right hand protect, preſerve it whole,
For if thou fighting 'gainſt heavens enemies
Shall fly away, abandoning the croſſe
The Enſigne of thy holy Generall,
With ſhame thou juſtly ſhalt be rob'd of it
Chas'd from our company, and cut away
As an infectious putrified limb.

Mir. I aske no favour.

1. Biſh. Then receive the yoak
Of him that makes it ſweet, and light, in which Thy ſoule find her eternall reſt.

Val. Moſt welcome.

All. Welcome, our noble brother.

Val. Break up the Court; Mountferrat, though your deeds
Conſpiring 'gainſt the lives of innocents
Hath forfeited your own, we will not ſtaine
Our white Croſſe with your blood: your doom is then
To marry this coagent of your miſchiefes
Which done, we baniſh you the continent,
If either, after three dayes here be found
The hand of Law, layes hold upon your lives.

Nor. Away French ſtallion, now you have a Barbary mare of your own, go leap her, and engender young devillings.

Val. We will find ſomething, noble Norandine
To quit your merit: ſo to civill feaſts,
According to our cuſtomes; and all pray
The dew of grace, bleſſe our new Knight to day. Exeunt.

FINIS.

FINIS

THE WOMANS PRIZE: OR, The Tamer Tamed.

Actus Primus——Scæna Prima.

Enter Morose, Sophocles, and Tranio, with Rosemary, as from a wedding.

Moroſo.

GOd give 'em joy.

Tra. Amen.

Soph. Amen, ſay I to: (wench,
The Puddings now i'th proof; alas poor
Through what a mine of patience muſt thou worke,
Ere thou know'ſt good houre more?

Tra. Tis too true: Certaine,
Me thinks her father has dealt harſhly with her,
Exceeding harſhly, and not like a Father,
To match her to this Dragon; I proteſt
I pity the poore Gentlewoman.

Mor. Me thinks now,
He's not ſo terrible as people think him.

Soph. This old thiefe flatters, out of meere devotion,
To pleaſe the father for his ſecond daughter.

Tra. But ſhall he have her?

Soph. Yes, when I have Rome.
And yet the father's for him.

Mor. Ile aſſure ye,
I hold him a good man.

Soph. Yes ſure a wealthy,
But whether a good womans man, is doubtfull.

Tra. Would 'twere no worſe.

Mor. What though his other wife,
Out of her moſt abundant ſoberneſſe,
Out of her daily huy and cries upon him,
(For ſure ſhe was a Rebell) turn'd his temper,
And forc'd him blow as high as ſhe? d'it follow
He muſt retain that long ſince buried Tempeſt,
To this ſoft maid?

Soph. I feare it.

Tra. So do I too:
And ſo far, that if God had made me woman,
And his wife that muſt be——

Mor. What would you doe ſir?

Tra. I would learn to eate Coales with an angry Cat,
And ſpit fire at him: I would (to prevent him)
Do all the ramping, roaring tricks, a whore
Being drunke, and tumbling ripe, would tremble at:
There is no ſafety elſe, nor morall wiſdome,
To be a wife, and his.

Soph. So I ſhould think too.

Tra. For yet the bare remembrance of his firſt wife
(I tell ye on my knowledge, and a truth too)
Will make him ſtart in's ſleep, and very often Cry out for Cudgels, Colſtaves, any thing;
Hiding his Breeches, out of feare her Ghoſt
Should walk, and weare 'em yet. Since his firſt marriage,
He is no more the ſtill Petruchio,
Then I am Babylon.

Soph. He's a good fellow,
And on my word I love him: but to think
A fit match for this tender ſoule——

Tra. His very frowne, if ſhe but ſay her prayers
Louder then men talk treaſon, makes him tindar;
The motion of a Diall, when he's teſty,
Is the ſame trouble to him as a water-worke;
She muſt do nothing of her ſelfe; not eate,
Drink, ſay ſir how do ye, make her ready, unready,
Unleſſe he bid her.

Soph. He will bury her
Ten ponnd to twenty ſhillings, within theſe three (weeks.

Tra. Ile be your halfe.

Enter Jaques with a pot of Wine.

Mor. He loves her moſt extreamly,
And ſo long 'twil be honey-moon. Now Jaques
You are a buſie man I am ſure.

Jaq. Yes certaine,
This old ſport muſt have egges,

Soph. Not yet this ten daies.

Jaq. Sweet Gentlemen with Muskadell.

Tra. That's right ſir.

Mor. This fellow broods his Maſter: ſpeed ye Jaques.

Soph. We ſhall be for you preſently.

Jaq. Your worſhips
Shal have it rich and neat: and o' my conſcience
As welcom as our Lady day: O my old ſir,
When ſhall we ſee your worſhip run at Ring?
That houre a ſtanding were worth money.

Mor. So sir.
Jaq. Upon my little honesty, your Mistris,
If I have any speculation, must thinke
This single thrumming of a Fiddle,
Without a Bow, but ev'n poore sport.
Mor. Y'are merry.
Ja. Would I were wise too: so God bless your worship.
Tra. The fellow tels you true. Exit Jaq.
Soph. When is the day man?
Come, come, you'l steale a marriage.
Mor. Nay believe me:
But when her father pleases I am ready,
And all my friends shall know it.
Tra. Why not now?
One charge had serv'd for both.
Mor. There's reason in't.
Soph. Call'd Rowland.
Mor. Will ye walke?
They'l think we are lost: Come Gentlemen.
Tra. You have wip't him now.
Soph. So will he never the wench I hope.
Tra. I wish it. Exeunt.

Scæna secunda.

Enter Rowland, and Livia.

Row. Now Livia, if you'l goe away to night,
If your affections be not made of words.
Liv. I love you, and you know how dearly Rowland,
Is there none neere us? my affections ever
Have been your servants; with what superstition
I have ever Sainted you—
Row. Why then take this way.
Liv. Twill be a childish and a lesse prosperous course,
Then his that knows not care: why should we do
Our honest and our hearty love such wrong,
To over-run our fortunes?
Row. Then you flatter.
Liv. Alas you know I cannot.
Row. What hopes left else
But flying to enjoy ye?
Liv. None so far,
For let it be admitted we have time,
And all things now in other expectation,
My father's bent against us; what but ruine,
Can such a by-way bring us? if your feares
Would let you look with my eyes, I would shew you,
And certain, how our staying here would win us
A course, though somewhat longer, yet far surer.
Row. And then Moroso h'as ye.
Liv. No such matter:
For hold this certaine, begging, stealing, whoring,
Selling, (which is a sin unpardonable)
Of counterfeit Cods, or musty English Cracus,
Switches, or stones for th'toothache sooner finds me,
Then that drawn Fox and Moroso.
Row. But his money,
If wealth may win you—
Liv. If a Hog may be High Priest among the Jewes: his money Rowland?
Oh Love forgive me, what faith hast thou?
Why, can his money kisse me?
Row. Yes.
Liv. Behind,
Lasd out upon a Petticote: or graspe me
While I cry, O good thank you? o' my troth
Thou makst me merry with thy feare: or lie with me,
As you may do? alas, what fooles you men are?
His mouldy money? half a dozen Riders,
That cannot sit, but stampt fast to their Saddles?
No Rowland, no man shall make use of me;
My beauty was born free, and free Ile give it
To him that loves, not buys me. You yet doubt me.
Row. I cannot say I doubt ye.
Liv. Goe thy waies,
Thou art the prettiest puling piece of passion:
Yfaith I will not faile thee.
Row. I had rather—
Liv. Prethee believe me, if I do not carry it,
For both our goods—
Row. But—
Liv. What but?
Row. I would tell you.
Liv. I know all you can tell me; all's but this,
You would have me, and lie with me; is't not so?
Row. Yes.
Liv. Why you shall; will that content you? Goe.
Row. I am very loth to goe. Enter Byancha,
Liv. Now o' my conscience and Maria.
Thou art an honest fellow: here's my sister;
Go, prethee goe; this kisse, and credit me,
Ere I am three nights older, I am for thee:
You shall heare what I do.
Farewell.
Row. Farewell. Exit Rowland.
Liv. Alas poore foole, how it looks?
It would ev'n hang it selfe, should I but crosse it.
For pure love to the matter I must hatch it.
Bya. Nay never look for merry houre Maria,
If now you make it not; let not your blushes,
Your modesty, and tendernesse of spirit,
Make you continuall Anvile to his anger:
Believe me, since his first wife set him going,
Nothing can bind his rage: Take your own Councell,
You shall not say that I perswaded you.
But if you suffer him—
Mar. Stay, shall I do it?
Bya. Have you a stomack to't?
Mar. I never shew'd it.
Bya. Twill shew the rarer, and the stronger in you.
But do not say I urg'd you.
Mar. I am perfect,
Like Curtius to redeeme my Countrey, have I
Leap'd into this gulph of marriage, and Ile do it.
Farewell all poorer thoughts, but spight & anger,
Till I have wrought a miracle. Now cosen,
I am no more the gentle tame Maria;
Mistake me not; I have a new soule in me
Made of a North-wind, nothing but tempest;
And like a tempest shall it make all ruins,
Till I have run my will out.
Bya. This is brave now,
If you continue it; but your own will lead you.
Mar. Adieu all tendernesse, I dare continue;
Maides that are made of feares and modest blushes,
View me, and love example.
Bya. Here is your sister.
Mar. Here is the brave old mans love.
Bya. That loves the young man.
Mar. I and hold thee there wench: what a grief of heart
When Paphos Rebels should up rowse old night, (is't,
To sweat against a Cork; to lie and tell
The clock o'th longs, to rise sport-starv'd?
Liv. Deere sister,
Where have you been you talke thus?
Mar. Why at Church, wench;

Where

Where I am tide to talke this: I am a wife now.
Liv. It seems so, and a modest.
Mar. You are an asse;
When thou art married once, thy modesty
Will never buy thee Pins.
Liv. Blesse me.
Mar. From what?
Bya. From such a tame foole as our cozen Livia?
Liv. You are not mad.
Mar. Yes wench, and so must you be,
Or none of our acquantance, marke me Livia.
Or indeed fit for our sex: Tis bed time.
Pardon me yellow Hymen, that I meane
Thine offrings to protract, or to keepe fasting
My valiant Bridegroome.
Liv. Whether will this woman?
Bya. You may perceive her end.
Liv. Or rather feare it.
Mar. Dare you be partner in't?
Liv. Leave it Maria,
I feare I have mark'd too much, for goodnesse leave it;
Devest you with obedient hands to bed.
Mar. To bed? No Livia, there are Comets hang Prodigious over that yet: there's a fellow
Must yet before I know that heat (here start wench)
Be ma le a man, for yet he is a monster;
Here must his head be Livia.
Liv. Never hope it.
Tis as easie with a Sive to scoope the Ocean, as To tame Petruchio.
Mar. Stay: Lucina heare me,
Never unlock the treasure of my womb
For humane fruit, to make it capable;
Nor never with thy secret hand make briefe
A mothers labour to me; if I doe
Give way unto my married husbands will,
Or be a wife, in any thing but hopes,
Till I have made him eane as a child,
And tame as feare, he shall not win a smile,
Or a pleas'd look, from this austerity,
Though it would pull another Joynture from him,
And make him ev'ry day another man;
And when I kisse him, till I have my will,
May I be barren of delights, and know
Onely what pleasures are in dreams, and guesses.
Liv. A strange Exordium.
Bya. All the severall wrongs
Done by Emperious husbands to their wives
These thousand yeeres and upwards, strengthen thee:
Thou hast a brave cause.
Mar. And Ile doe it bravely
Or may I knit my life out ever after.
Liv. In what part of the world got she this spirit?
Yet pray Maria, looke before you truly,
Besides the obedience of a wife,
Which you will finde a heavy imputation,
Which yet I cannot thinke your own, it shews
So distant from your sweetnesse.
Mar. Tis I sweare.
Liv. Weigh but the person, and the hopes you have,
To worke this desperate cure.
Mar. A weaker subject
Would shame the end I aime at, disobedience.
You talk too tamely: By the faith I have
In mine own Noble will, that childish woman
That lives a prisoner to her husbands pleasure,
Has lost her making, and becomes a beast,
Created for his use, not fellowship.
Liv. His first wife said as much.
Mar. She was a foole,
And took a scurvy course; let her be nam'd
'Mongst those that wish for things, but dare not do 'em:
I have a new daunce for him.
Liv. Are you of this faith?
Bya. Yes truly, and will die in't.
Liv. Why then let's all weare breeches.
Mar. Now thou comst neere the nature of a woman;
Hang these tame hearted Eyasses, that no sooner
See the Lure out, and heare their husbands halla,
But cry like Kites upon 'em: The free Haggard
(Which is that woman, that hath wing, and knowes it, Spirit, and plume) will make an hundred checks,
To shew her freedome, saile in ev'ry ayre,
And look out ev'ry pleasure; not regarding Lure, nor quarry, till her pitch command
What she desires, making her foundred keeper
Be glad to fling out traines, and golden ones,
To take her down again.
Liv. You are learned sister;
Yet I say still take heed.
Mar. A witty saying;
Ile tell thee Livia, had this fellow tired
As many wives as horses under him,
With spurring of their patience; had he got
A Patent, with an Office to reclaime us
Confirm'd by Parliament, had he all the malice
And subtilty of Devils, or of us,
Or any thing that's worse then both.
Liv. Hey, hey boyes, this is excellent.
Mar. Or could he
Cast his wives new again, like Bels to make 'em
Sound to his will; or had the fearfull name
Of the first breaker of wilde women: yet,
Yet would I undertake this man, thus single,
And spight of all the freedom he has reach'd to,
Turn him and bend him as I list, and mold him
Into a babe again; that aged women,
Wanting both teeth & spleen, may Master him.
Bya. Thou wilt be chronicl'd.
Mar. That's all I aime at.
Liv I must confesse, I do with all my heart
Hate an Emperious husband, and in time
Might be so wrought upon.
Bya. To make him cuckold?
Mar. If he deserve it.
Liv. Then Ile leave ye Ladies.
Bya. Thou hast not so much Noble anger in thee.
Mar. Goe sleep, goe sleep, what we intend to do,
Lies not for such starv'd soules as thou hast Livia.
Liv. Good night: the Bridegroom will be with you presently.
Mar. That's more then you know.
Liv. If ye worke upon him,
As you have promised, ye may give example,
Which no doubt will be followed.
Mar. So.
By. Good night: we'l trouble you no further.
Mar. If you intend no good, pray doe no harm.
Liv. None, but pray for you. Exit Livia.
Bya. 'Cheere wench?
Mar. Now Bysncha,
Those wits we have let's wind 'em to the height,
My rest is up wench, and I pull for that
Will make me ever famous. They that lay Foundations, are halfe builders all men say.

Enter Jaques.

Jaq. My Master forsooth.

Mar. Oh how do's thy Maſter? prethee commend me
Jaq. How's this? my Maſter ſtaies forſooth. (to him.
Mar. Why let him ſtay, who hinders him forſooth?
Jaq. The Revel's ended now,
To viſit you.
Mar. I am not ſick.
Jaq. I mean to ſee his chamber, forſooth. (ſooth?
Mar. Am I his Groom? where lay he laſt night, for-
Jaq. In the low matted Parlour.
Mar. There lies his way by the long Gallery.
Jaq. I mean your chamber: y'ar very merry Miſtris.
Mar. Tis a good ſigne I am ſound hearted Jaques:
But if you'l know where I lie, follow me;
And what thou ſeeſt, deliver to thy Maſter.
Bya. Do gentle Jaques. Exeunt.
Ja. Ha, is the wind in that dore?
By'r Lady we ſhall have foule weather then:
I doe not like the ſhuffling of theſe women, (ther:
They are mad beaſts when they knock their heads toge-
I have obſerv'd them all this day; their whiſpers,
One in anothers eare, their ſignes, and pinches,
And breaking often into violent laughters:
As if the end they purpos'd were their own.
Call you this weddings? Sure this is a knavery,
A very trick, and dainty knavery,
Marvellous finely carried, that's the comfort:
What would theſe women doe in wales of honour,
That are ſuch Maſters this way. Well, my Sir
Has been as good at finding out theſe toyes,
As any living; if he loſe it now,
At his own perill be it. I muſt follow. Exit.

Scena tertia.

Enter Servants with lights, Petruchio, Petronius, Moroſe, Tranio, and Sophocles.

Petru. You that are married, Gentlemen, home at ye
For a round wager now.
Soph. Of this nights Stage?
Petru. Yes. (ſhillings.
Soph. I am your firſt man: a paire of Gloves of twenty Petru. Done: who takes me up next? I am for all bets.
Mor. Well luſty Laurence, were but my night now,
Old as I am, I would make you clap on Spurs,
But I would reach you, and bring you to your trot too:
I would Gallants. (ha?
Petru. Well ſaid good Will; but where's the ſtaffe boy,
Old father time, your houre-glaſſe is empty. (ces;
Tra. A good tough traine would break thee all to pie-
Thou haſt not breath enough to ſay thy prayers.
Petron. See how theſe boyes deſpiſe us. Will you to bed
This pride will have a fall. (ſonne?
Petru. Upon your daughter;
But I ſhall riſe again, if there be truth
In Egges, and butter'd Paſnips.
Petro. Wil you to bed ſon, & leave talking;
To morrow morning we ſhall have you looke,
For all your great words, like St. George at Kingſton,
Running a foot-back from the furious Dragon,
That with her angry tayle belabours him
For being lazie.
Tra. His courage quench'd, and ſo far quench'd-- Petru. Tis well ſir.
What then?
Soph. Fly, fly, quoth then the fearfull dwarfe;
Here is no place for living man.
Petru. Well my maſters, if I doe finke under my buſi-neſſe, as I finde tis very poſſible, I am not the firſt that has miſcarried; So that's my comfort, what may be done without impeach or waſte, I can and will doe.

Enter Jaques.

How now is my faire Bride a bed?
Jaq. No truly ſir.
Petron. Not a bed yet? body o' me: we'l up and rifle her: here's a coyle with a mayden-head, tis not intayl'd, is it?
Petru. If it be, ile try all the Law i'th Land, but Ile cut it off: let's up, let's up, come.
Jaq. That you cannot neither.
Petru. Why?
Jaq. Unleſſe you'l drop through the Chimney like a Daw, or force a breach i'th windows: you may untile the houſe, tis poſſible.
Petru. What doſt thou meane?
Jaq. A morall ſir, the Ballat will expreſſe it:
The wind and the rain has turnd you back again,
And you cannot be lodged there. The truth is all the doores Are barracadoed, not a Cathole, but holds a murd'rer in't. She's victual'd for this moneth.
Petru. Art not thou drunk?
Soph. He's drunk, he's drunk; come, come, let's up.
Jaq. Yes, yes, I am drunke: ye may goe up, ye may Gentlemen, but take heed to your heads: I ſay no more.
Soph. Ile try that. Exit Soph.
Petron. How doſt thou ſay? the door faſt lock'd fellow?
Jaq. Yes truly ſir, tis lock'd, and guarded too; and two as deſperate tongues planted behind it, as ere yet batterd: they ſtand upon their honours, and will not give up without ſtrange compoſition, Ile aſſure you; marching away with their Pieces cockt, and Bullets in their mouthes will not ſatisfie them.
Petru. How's this? how's this they are?
Is there another with her?
Jaq. Yes marry is there, and an Engineir.
Mor. Who's that for Heavens ſake?
Jaq. Colonell Byancha, ſhe commands the workes: Spinola's but a ditcher to her, there's a halfe-moon: I am but a poore man, but if you'l give me leave, Ile venture a yeeres wages, draw all your force before it, and mount your ableſt piece of battery, you ſhall not enter it theſe three nights yet.

Enter Sophocles.

Petru. I ſhould laugh at that good Jaques.
Soph. Beat back again, ſhe's fortified for ever.
Jaq. Am I drunk now ſir?
Soph. He that dares moſt, goe up now, and be cool'd.
I have ſcap'd a pretty ſcowring.
Petru. What are they mad? have we another Bedlam?
They doe not talke I hope?
Soph. Oh terribly, extreamly fearfull, the noiſe at London-bridge is nothing neere her.
Petru. How got ſhe tongue?
Soph. As you got taile, ſhe was born to't.
Petru. Lock'd out a doors, and on my wedding-night?
Nay, and I ſuffer this, I may goe graze:
Come Gentlemen, Ile batter; are theſe vertues?
Soph. Do, and be beaten off with ſhame, as I was: I went up, came to th' doore, knockd, no body anſwered; knock'd lowder, yet heard nothing: would have broke in by force; when ſuddenly a water-worke flew from the window with ſuch violence, that had I not duck'd quickly like a Fryer, cætera quis neſcit? The chamber's nothing but a meere Offend, in every window Pewter cannons mounted, you'l quickly finde with what they are charg'd, ſir.

Petru.

Petru. Why then tantara for us.
Soph. And all the lower works lin'd ſure with ſmall ſhot, long tongues with Fire-locks, that at twelve ſcore blanke hit to the heart: now and ye dare go up Enter Maria and Byanca above.
Mar. The window opens, beat a parley firſt;
I am ſo much amaz'd my very haire ſtands.
Petron. Why how now daughter: what intrenc'd?
Mar. A little guarded for my ſafety ſir.
Petru. For your ſafety Sweet-heart? why who offends you?
I come not to uſe violence.
Mar. I thinke you cannot ſir, I am better fortified.
Petru. I know your end,
You would faine reprieve your Maiden-head
A night, or two.
Mar. Yes, or ten, or twenty, or ſay an hundred;
Or indeed, till I liſt lie with you.
Soph. That's a ſhrewd ſaying; from this preſent houre,
I never will believe a ſilent woman.
When they break out they are bonfires.
Petro. Till you liſt lie with him? why who are you Madam?
Bya. That trim Gentlemans wife, ſir.
Petru. Cry you mercy, do you command too?
Mar. Yes marry do's ſhe, and in chiefe.
Bya. I doe command, and you ſhall go without:
(I mean your wife, for this night)
Mar. And for the next too wench, and ſo as't follows.
Petru. Thou wilt not, wilt 'a?
Mar. Yes indeed deere father,
And till he ſeale to what I ſhall ſet down,
For any thing I know, for ever.
Soph. Indeed theſe are Bugs-words.
Tra. You heare ſir, ſhe can talke, God be thanked.
Petru. I would I heard it not ſir.
Soph. I finde that all the pity beſtowd upon this woman,
Makes but an Anagram of an ill wife,
For ſhe was never vertuous.
Petru. Youl let me in I hope, for all this jeſting.
Mar. Hope ſtill Sir.
Petron. You will come down I am ſure.
Mar. I am ſure I will not.
Petron. Ile fetch you then.
Bya. The power of the whole County cannot ſir,
Unleſſe we pleaſe to yeild, which yet I thinke
We ſhal not; charge when you pleaſe, you ſhall
Heare quickly from us.
Mar. Bleſſe me from a Chicken of thy hatching,
Is this wiving?
Petru. Prethee Maria tell me what's the reaſon,
And do it freely, you deale thus ſtrangely with me?
You were not forc'd to marry, your conſent
Went equally with mine, if not before it:
I hope you do not doube I want that mettle
A man ſhould have to keepe a woman waking;
I would be ſorry to be ſuch a Saint yet:
My perſon, as it is not excellent,
So tis not old, nor lame, nor weak with Phyſick,
But wel enough to pleaſe an honeſt woman,
That keeps her houſe, and loves her husband.
Mar. Tis ſo.
Petru. My means and my conditions are no ſhame
Of him that owes 'em, all the world knows that,
And my friends no reliers on my fortunes.
Mar. All this I believe, and none of all theſe parcels
I dare except againſt; nay more, ſo far
I am from making theſe the ends I aime at,
Theſe idle outward things, theſe womens feares,
That were I yet unmarried, free to chooſe
Through all the Tribes of man, I'ld take Petruchio
In's ſhirt, with one ten Groats to pay the Prieſt,
Before the beſt man living, or the ableſt (ones.
That ev'r leap'd out of Lancaſhire, and they are right
Petron. Why do you play the foole then, and ſtand prancing
Out of the window like a broken Miller! (ing
Petru. If you wil have me credit you Maria,
Come down, and let your love confirme it.
Mar. Stay there ſir, that bargain's yet to make.
Bya. Play ſure wench, the packs in thine own hand.
Soph. Let me die lowſie, if theſe two wenches
Be not brewing knavery to ſtock a Kingdome.
Petru. Why this is a Riddle:
I love you, and I love you not.
Mar. It is ſo:
And till your own experience do untie it,
This diſtance I muſt keep.
Petru. If you talk more,
I am angry, very angry.
Mar. I am glad on't, and I wil talke.
Petru. Prethee peace,
Let me not think thou art mad. I tell thee woman,
If thou goeſt forward, I am ſtill Petruchio.
Mar. And I am worſe, a woman that can feare
Neither Petruchio Furius, nor his fame,
Nor any thing that tends to our allegeance;
There's a ſhort method for you, now you know me.
Petru. If you can carry't ſo, tis very wel.
Bya. No you ſhall carry it, ſir.
Petru. Peace gentle Low-bel.
Petron. Uſe no more words, but come down inſtantly,
I charge thee by the duty of a child.
Petru. Prethee come Maria, I forgive all.
Mar. Stay there; That duty, that you charge me by (If you conſider truly what you ſay)
Is now another mans, you gave't away
I'th Church, if you remember, to my husband:
So all you can exact now, is no more
But onely a due reverence to your perſon,
Which thus I pay: Your bleſſing, and I am gone
To bed for this night.
Petron. This is monſtrous:
That bleſſing that St. Dunſtan gave the Devil,
If I were neere thee, I would give thee——
Pull thee down by th' noſe.
Bya. Saints ſhould not rave, ſir;
A little Rubarb now were excellent.
Petru. Then by that duty you owe to me Maria,
Open the doore, and be obedient: I am quiet yet.
Mar. I do confeſſe that duty; make your beſt on't.
Petru. Why give me leave, I will.
Bya. Sir, there's no learning
An old ſtiffe Jade to trot: you know the morall.
Mar. Yet as I take it ſir, I owe no more
Then you owe back again.
Petru. You wil not Article?
All I owe, preſently, let me but up, Ile pay.
Mar. Y'are too hot, and ſuch prove Jades at length;
You do confeſſe a duty or reſpect to me from you again:
That's very neere, or full the ſame with mine?
Petru. Yes.
Mar. Then by that duty, or reſpect, or what
You pleaſe to have it, goe to bed and leave me,
And trouble me no longer with your fooling;
For know, I am not for you.
Petru. Well, what remedy?
Petron. A fine ſmart Cudgell. Oh that I were neer thee.
Bya. If you had teeth now, what a caſe were we in?

Mar.

Mor. These are the most authentique Rebels, next Tyrone, I ever read of.

Mar. A weeke hence, or a fortnight, as you beare you,
And as I finde thy will observ'd, I may
With intercession of some friends be brought
May be to kisse you; and so quarterly
To pay a little rent by composition,
You understand me?

Soph. Thou Boy, thou.

Petru. Well there are more Maides then Mandlin, that's my comfort.

Mar. Yes, and more men then Michael. (meat Lady.

Petru. I must not to bed with this stomach, and no

Mar. Feed where you will, so it be sound, and whol-Else live at livery, for i'le none with you. (some,

By. You had best back one of the dairy maids, they'l carry.
But take heed to your girthes, you'l get a bruise else.

Petru. Now if thou would'st come down, and tender
All the delights due to a marriage bed, (me:
Studdy such kisses as would melt a man,
And turne thy selfe into a thousand figures,
To adde new flames unto me, I would stand
Thus heavy, thus regardlesse, thus despising
Thee, and thy best allurings: all thy beauty
That's laid upon your bodies, mark me well,
For without doubt your mind's are miserable,
You have no maskes for them: all this rare beauty,
Lay but the Painter, and the silke worme by,
The Doctor with his dyets, and the Taylor,
And you appeare like flead Cats, not so handsome.

Mar. And we appeare like her that sent us hither,
That onely excellent and beauteous nature;
Truly our selves, for men to wonder at,
But too divine to handle; we are Gold,
In our own natures pure; but when we suffer
The husbands stamp upon us: then alayes,
And base ones of you, men are mingled with us,
And make us blush like Copper.

Petru. Then, and never Till then are women to be spoken of,
For till that time you have no soules I take it:
Good night: come Gentlemen; i'le fast for this night,
But by this hand—well: I shall come up yet?

Mar. Noe.

Petru. There will I watch thee like a wither'd Jewry,
Thou shalt neither have meat, fire, nor Candle,
Nor any thing that's easie: doe you rebell so soone?
Yet take mercy.

By. Put up your Pipes: to bed sir; i'le assure you
A moneths seige will not shake us.

Mor. Well said Colonell.

Mar. To bed, to bed Petruchio: good night Gentlemen,
You'l make my Father sicke with sitting up:
Here you shall finde us any time these ten dayes,
Unlesse we may march off with our contentment.

Petru. Ile hang first.

Mar. And i'le quarter if I doe not,
Ile make you know, and feare a wife Petruchio,
There my cause lies.
You have been famous for a woman tamer,
And beare the fear'd-name of a brave wife-breaker:
A woman now shall take those honours off, (leeve me,
And tame you; nay, never look so bigge, she shall be-
And I am she: what thinke ye; good night to all,
Ye shall finde Centinels.

By. If ye dare sally. Exeunt above.

Petru. The devill's in 'em, ev'n the very devill, the downe right devill.

Petru. Ile devill 'em: by these ten bones I will: i'le bring it to the old Proverb, no sport no pie: —— taken down i'th top of all my speed; this is fine dancing: Gentlemen, stick to me. You see our Freehold's touch'd, and by this light, we will beleaguer 'em, and either starve 'em out, or make 'em recreant.

Petro. Ile see all passages stopt, but those about 'em:
If the good women of the Towne dare succour 'em,
We shall have warres indeed.

Soph. Ile stand perdue upon 'em.

Mor. My regiment shall lye before.

Iaq. I think so, 'tis grown too old to stand.

Petru. Let's in, and each provide his tackle,
We'l fire 'em out, or make 'em take their pardons,
Heare what I say, on their bare knees ——
Am I Petruchio, fear'd, and spoken of,
And on my wedding night am I thus jaded? Exe. Omnes.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Rowland, and Pedro, at severall doores.

Row. Now Pedro?

Ped. Very busie Master Rowland.

Row. What haste man?

Ped. I beseech you pardon me,
I am not mine own man.

Row. Thou art not mad?

Ped. No; but beleeve me, as hasty——

Row. The cause good Pedro?

Ped. There be a thousand sirs you are not married?

Row. Not yet.

Ped. Keepe your selfe quiet then.

Row. Why?

Ped. You'l finde a Fiddle
That never will be tun'd else: from all women—— Exit.

Row. What ailes the fellow tro? Iaques? Enter Iaques.

Iaq. Your friend sir.
But very full of businesse.

Row. Nothing but businesse?
Prethee the reason, is there any dying?

Iaq. I would there were sir.

Row. But thy businesse?

Iaq. Ile tell you in a word,
I am sent to lay
An imposition upon Sowse and Puddings,
Pasties, and Penny Custards, that the women
May not releeve yon Rebels: Fare ye well sir.

Row. How does my Mistresse?

Iaq. Like a resty jade.
She's spoil'd for riding. Exit Iaques.

Row. What a devill ayle they? Enter Sophocles.
Custards, and penney Pasties, Fooles and Fiddles,
What's this to'th purpose? O, well met.

Soph. Now Rowland.
I cannot stay to talk long.

Row. What's the matter?
Here's stirring, but to what end? whether goe you?

Soph. To view the works.

Row. What workes?

Soph. The womens Trenches.

Row. Trenches? are such to see?

Soph. I doe not jest sir.

Row. I cannot understand you.

Soph. Doe not you heare
In what a state of quarrell the new Bride Stands with her husband?

Row.

Row. Let him ſtand with her, and there's an end.
Soph. It ſhould be, but by'r Lady
She holds him out at Pikes end, and defies him,
And now is fortifide; ſuch a Regiment of Rutters
Never defied men braver: I am ſent
To view their preparation.
Row. This is newes
Stranger then Armes in the ayre, you ſaw not My gentle Miſtreſſe?
Soph. Yes, and meditating
Upon ſome ſecret buſineſſe, when ſhe had found it
She leapt for joy, and laugh'd, and ſtraight retir'd
To ſhun Moroſo.
Row. This may be for me.
Soph. Will you along?
Row. No.
Soph. Farewell. Exit Sophocles.
Row. Farewell ſir.
What ſhould her muſing meane, and what her joy in't,
If not for my advantage? ſtay ye; may not Enter
That Bob-taile Jade Moroſo, with his Gold, Livia at His gew-gawdes, and the hope ſhe has to ſend him one Quickly to duſt, excite this? here ſhe comes, doore, and
And yonder walkes the Stallion to diſcover: Moroſo at Yet i'le ſalute her: ſave you beauteous miſtreſſe. another
Livi. The Fox is kennell'd for me: ſave you ſir. harkning.
Row. Why doe you looke ſo ſtrange?
Liv. I uſe to looke ſir
Without examination.
Moro. Twenty Spur-Royals for that word.
Row. Belike then
The object diſcontents you?
Liv. Yes it does.
Row. Is't come to this? you know me, doe you not?
Liv. Yes as I may know many by repentance.
Row. Why doe you breake your faith?
Liv. Ile tell you that too,
You are under age, and no band holds upon you.
Moro. Excellent wench.
Liv. Sue out your underſtanding,
And get more haire, to cover your bare knuckle
(For Boyes were made for nothing, but dry kiſſes,)
And if you can, more manners.
Moro. Better ſtill.
Liv. And then if I want Spaniſh gloves, or ſtockings,
A ten-pound waſte-coate, or a Nag to hunt on,
It may be I ſhall grace you to accept 'em.
Row. Farewell, and when I credit women more,
May I to Smith-field, and there buy a Jade,
(And know him to be ſo) that breakes my neck.
Liv. Becauſe I have knowne you, Ile be thus kinde to Farewell, and be a man, and i'le provide you, (you;
Becauſe I ſee y'are deſperate, ſome ſtaid Chamber-maid
That may relieve your youth, with wholeſome doctrin.
Mor. She's mine from all the world: ha wench?
Liv. Ha Chicken?—— gives him a box o'th eare and Ex.
Mor. How's this? I do not love theſe favours: ſave you.
Row. The devill take thee—— wrings him byth' noſe.
Mor. Oh!
Row. There's a love token for you: thank me now.
Mor. Ile thinke on ſome of ye, and if I live,
My noſe alone ſhall not be plaid withall. Exit.

Actus ſecundus. Scena prima.

Enter Petronius, and Moroſo.

Petro. A Box o'th eare doe you ſay?
Mor. Yes ſure a ſound one,
Beſide my noſe blown to my hands; if Cupid
Shoot Arrows of that waight, i'le ſweare devoutly,
Has ſude his liverie, and no more a Boy.
Petro. You gave her ſome ill language?
Mor. Not a word,
Petro. Or might be you weare fumbling?
Mor. Would I had ſir.
I had been a forehand then; but to be baffel'd,
And have no feeling of the cauſe—
Petro. Be patient,
I have a medicine clapt to her back will cure her.
Mor. No ſure it muſt be afore ſir.
Petro. O' my Conſcience,
When I got theſe two wenches (who till now Ne'r ſhew'd their riding) I was drunck with Baſtard,
Whoſe nature is to forme things like it ſelfe
Heady, and monſtrous: did ſhe ſlight him too?
Mor. That's all my comfort: a meere Hobby-horſe
She made childe Rowland: I'foot ſhe would not know
Not give him a free look, not reckon him (him,
Among her thoughts, which I held more then wonder,
I having ſeene her within's three dayes kiſſe him
With ſuch an appetite as though ſhe would eat him.
Petro. There is ſome trick in this: how did he take it?
Mor. Ready to cry; he ran away.
Petro. I feare her.
And yet I tell you, ever to my anger,
She is as tame as Innocency; it may be
This blow was but a favour.
Mor. Ile be ſworne
'Twas well tye'd on then.
Petro. Goe too, pray forget it,
I have beſpoke a Prieſt: and within's two houres
Ile have ye married; will that pleaſe you?
Mor. Yes.
Petro. Ile ſee it done my ſelfe, and give the Lady
Such a ſound exhortation for this knavery
Ile warrant you, ſhall make her ſmell this Moneth on't,
Mor. Nay good ſir, be not violent.
Petro. Neither——
Mor. It may be
Out of her earneſt love, there grew a longing
(As you know women have ſuch toyes) in kindneſſe,
To give me a box o'th eare or ſo.
Petro. It may be.
Mor. I reckon for the beſt ſtill: this night then
I ſhall enjoy her.
Petro. You ſhall hanſell her.
Mor. Old as I am, i'le give her one blow for't
Shall make her groane this twelve-moneth.
Petro. Where's your joynture?
Mor. I have a joynture for her.
Petro. Have your Councell
Peruſ'd it yet?
Mor. No Councell, but the night, and your ſweet (daughter
Shall ere peruſe that Joynture.
Petro. Very well ſir.
Moro. Ile no demurrers on't nor no rejoynders.
The other's ready ſeal'd.
Petro. Come then lets' comfort
My Son Petruchio, he's like little Children
That looſe their Bables, crying ripe.
Mor. Pray tell me,
Is this ſtern woman ſtill upon the flaunt
Of bold defiance?
Petro. Still, and ſtill ſhe ſhall be
Till ſhe be ſtarv'd out: you ſhall ſee ſuch juſtice,
That women ſhall be glad after this tempeſt

To

To tye their husbands shooes, and walke their horses;
That were a merry world: doe you heare the rumour,
They say the women are in Insurrection,
And meane to make a——
Petro. They'l sooner
Draw upon walls as we doe: Let 'em, let 'em,
We'l ship 'em out in Cuck-stooles, there they'l saile
As brave Columbus did, till they discover
The happy Islands of obedience.
We stay too long, Come.
Mor. Now Saint George be with us. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Livia alone

Liv. Now if I can but get in handsomely,
Father I shall deceive you, and this night
For all your private plotting, i'le no wedlock;
I have shifted saile, and finde my Sisters safety
A sure retirement; pray to heaven that Rowland
Do not beleeve too farre, what I said to him,
For y'on old Foxcase forc'd me, that's my feare.
Stay, let me see, this quarter fierce Petruchio
Keepes with his Myrmidons: I must be suddaine,
If he seize on me, I can looke for nothing
But Marshall Law; to this place have I scap'd him;
Above there. Enter Maria, and Byancha above.
Mar. Cheval'a.
Liv. A Friend.
By. Who are you?
Liv. Looke out and know.
Mar. Alas poore wench who sent thee,
What weake foole made thy tongue his Orator?
I know you come to parly.
Liv. Y'are deceiv'd,
Urg'd by the goodnes of your cause I come
To doe as you doe.
Mar. Y'ar too weake, too foolish,
To cheat us with your smoothnesse: doe not we know
Thou hast been kept up tame?
Liv, Beleeve me.
Mar. No, prethee good Livia
Utter thy Eloquence somewhere else.
By. Good Cosen
Put up your Pipes; we are not for your palat,
Alas we know who sent you.
Liv. O' my word——
By. Stay there; you must not thinke your word,
Or by your Maydenhead, or such Sonday oathes
Sworne after Even-Song, can inveigle us
To loose our hand-fast: did their wisdomes thinke
That sent you hither, we would be so foolish,
To entertaine our gentle Sister Sinon,
And give her credit, while the woodden Jade
Petruchio stole upon us: no good Sister,
Goe home, and tell the merry Greekes that sent you,
Ilium shall burn, and I, as did Æneas,
will on my back, spite of the Myrmidons,
Carry this warlike Lady, and through Seas
Unknown, and unbeleev'd, seek out a Land,
Where like a race of noble Amazons,
We'le root our selves and to our endlesse glory
Live, and despise base men.
Liv. Ile second ye.
By. How long have you been thus?
Liv. That's all one Cosen.
I stand for freedome now.
By. Take heed of lying;
For by this light, if we doe credit you,
And finde you tripping, his infliction
That kill'd the Prince of Orenge, will be sport
To what we purpose.
Liv. Let me feele the heaviest. (mayden-head, Mar. Swear by thy Sweet-heart Rowland (for by your
I feare 'twill be too late to swear) you meane
Nothing but faire and safe, and honourable
To us, and to your selfe.
Liv. I sweare.
By. Stay yet,
Sweare as you hate Moroso, that's the surest,
And as you have a certaine feare to finde him
Worse then a poore dride Jack, full of more Aches
Then Autumne has; more knavery, and usury,
And foolery, and brokery, then dogges-ditch:
As you doe constantly beleeve he's nothing
But an old empty bagge with a grey beard,
And that beard such a Bob-taile, that it lookes
Worse then a Mares taile eaten off with Fillyes:
As you acknowledge, that young handsome wench
That lyes by such a Bilbo blade, that bends
With ev'ry passe he makes to'th hilts, most miserable,
A dry nurse to his Coughes, a fewterer
To such a nasty fellow, a rob'd thing
Of all delights youth lookes for: and to end,
One cast away on course beef, born to brush
That everlasting Cassock that has worne
As many Servants out, as the Northeast passage
Has consum'd Saylors: if you sweare this, and truly
Without the reservation of a gowne
Or any meritorious Petticoate,
'Tis like we shall beleeve you.
Liv. I doe sweare it.
Mar. Stay yet a little; came this wholesome motion (Deale truly Sister) from your own opinion,
Or some suggestion of the Foe?
Liv. Nev'r feare me,
For by that little faith I have in husbands,
And the great zeale I beare your cause, I come
Full of that liberty, you stand for, Sister.
Mar. If we beleeve, and you prove recreant Livia,
Think what a maym you give the noble Cause
We now stand up for: Thinke what women shall
An hundred yeare hence speak thee, when examples
Are look'd for, and so great ones, whose relations
Spoke as we doe th'em wench, shall make new customs.
By. If you be false, repent, goe home, and pray,
And to the serious women of the City
Confesse your selfe; bring not a sinne so heynous
To load thy soule, to this place: mark me Livia,
If thou bee'st double, and betray'st our honours,
And we fail in our purpose: get thee where
There is no women living, nor no hope
There ever shall be.
Mar. If a Mothers daughter,
That ever heard the name of stubborn husband
Found thee, and know thy sinne.
By. Nay, if old age,
One that has worne away the name of woman,
And no more left to know her by, but railing,
No teeth, nor eyes nor legges, but woodden ones (thee
Come but i'th wind-ward of thee, for sure she'l smell
Thou'lt be so ranck, she'l ride thee like a night-mare,
And say her Prayers back-ward to undoe thee,
She'l curse thy meat and drink, and when thou marriest,

Clap

Clap a ſound ſpell for ever on thy pleaſures.
Mar. Children of five yeare old, like little Fayries
Will pinch thee into motley, all that ever
Shall live, and heare of thee, I meane all women;
Will (like ſo many furies) ſhake their Keyes,
And toſſe their flaming diſtaffes o're their heads,
Crying Revenge: take heed, 'tis hideous:
Oh 'tis a fearefull office, if thou had'ſt
(Though thou bee'ſt perfect now) when thou cam'ſt hither,
A falſe Imagination, get thee gone,
And as my learned Cozen ſaid repent,
This place is ſought by ſoundneſſe.
Liv. So I ſeeke it,
Or let me be a moſt deſpis'd example.
Mar. I doe beleeve thee, be thou worthy of it.
You come not empty?
Liv. No, Here's Cakes, and cold meat,
And tripe of proofe: behold here's wine, and beere,
Be ſuddaine, I ſhall be ſurpriz'd elſe. (way:
Mar. Meet at the low Parlor doore, there lyes a cloſe
What fond obedience you have living in you,
Or duty to a man, before you enter,
Fling it away, 'twill but defile our Offrings.
By. Be wary as you come,
Liv. I warrant ye. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter three Maides.

1 Mai. How goes your buſineſſe Girles?
2 A foot, and faire.
3 If fortune favour us: away to your ſtrength
The Country Forces are ariv'd, be gone.
We are diſcover'd elſe.
1 Arme, and be valiant.
2 Think of our cauſe.
3 Our Juſtice.
1 'Tis ſufficient. Exeunt.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Rowland and Tranio at ſeverall doores.

Tra. Now Rowland?
Row. How yoe you?
Tra. How do'ſt thou man,
Thou look'ſt ill:
Row. Yes, pray can you tell me Tranio,
Who knew the devill firſt?
Tra. A woman.
Row. Thou haſt heard I am ſure of Eſculapius.
So were they not well acquainted?
Tra. May be ſo,
For they had certaine Dialogues together.
Row. He ſold her fruit, I take it?
Tra. Yes, and Cheeſe
That choak'd all mankinde after.
Row. Canſt thou tell me
Whether that woman ever had a faith
After ſhe had eaten?
Tra. That's a Schoole queſtion
Row. No
Tis no queſtion, for beleeve me Tranio,
That cold fruit after eating bread naught in her
But windy promiſes, and chollick vowes
That broke out both wayes.
Row. Thou ha'ſt heard I am ſure
Of Eſculapius, a farre famed Surgeon,
One that could ſet together quarter'd Traytors,
And make 'em honeſt men.
Tra. How do'ſt thou Rowland?
Row. Let him but take, (if he dare doe a cure Shall get him fame indeed) a faithleſſe woman,
There will be credit for him, that will ſpeake him,
A broken woman Tranio, a baſe woman,
And if he can cure ſuch a rack of honour
Let him come here, and practiſe.
Tra. Now for honours ſake
Why what ayl'ſt thou Rowland?
Row. I am ridden Tranio.
And Spur-gald to the life of patience
(Heaven keepe my wits together) by a thing
Our worſt thoughts are too noble for, a woman.
Tra. Your Miſtreſſe has a little frown'd it may be?
Row. She was my Miſtreſſe.
Tra. Is ſhe not?
Row. No Tranio.
She has done me ſuch diſgrace, ſo ſpitefully,
So like a woman bent to my undoing,
That henceforth a good horſe ſhall be my Miſtreſſe,
A good Sword, or a Booke: and if you ſee her,
Tell her I doe beſeech you, even for love ſake.——
Tra. I will Rowland.
Row. She may ſooner
Count the good I have thought her,
Our old love and our friend-ſhip,
Shed one true teare, meane one houre conſtantly,
Be old, and honeſt, married, and a maide,
Then make me ſee her more, or more beleeve her:
And now I have met a Meſſenger, farewell ſir. Exit.
Tra. Alas poore Rowland, I will doe it for thee:
This is that dogge Moroſo, but I hope
To ſee him cold i'th mouth firſt 'er he enjoy her: (him,
Ile watch this young man, deſperate thoughts may ſeize
And if my purſe, or councell can, i'le eaſe him. Exit

Scæna quinta.

Enter Petruchio, Petronius, Moroſo, and Sophocles.

Petru. For looke you Gentlemen, ſay that I grant her
Out of my free and liberall love, a pardon,
Which you and all men elſe know ſhe deſerves not,
(Teneatis amici) can all the world leave laughing?
Petro. I thinke not.
Petru. No by —— they cannot;
For pray conſider, have you ever read,
Or heard of, or can any man imagine.
So ſtiffe a Tomb-boy, of ſo ſet a ma ice,
And ſuch a brazen reſolution,
As this young Crab-tree? and then anſwer me,
And marke but this too friends, without a cauſe,
Not a foule word comes croſſe her, not a feare,
She juſtly can take hold on, and doe you thinke
I muſt ſleepe out my anger, and endure it,
Sow pillows to her eaſe, and lull her miſchiefe?
Give me a Spindle firſt: no, no my Maſters,
Were ſhe as faire as Nell a Greece, and houſe-wife,
As good as the wiſe Saylors wife, and young ſtill,
Never above fifteene; and theſe tricks to it,
She ſhould ride the wild Mare once a week, ſhe ſhould.

(Believe me friends she should) I would tabor her,
Till all the Legions that are crept into her,
Flew out with fire i'th tailes.
Soph. Methinks you erre now,
For to me seems, a little sufferance
Were a far surer cure.
Petru. Yes, I can suffer,
Where I see promises of peace and amendment.
Mor. Give her a few conditions.
Petru. Ile be hangd first.
Petron. Give her a crab-tree-cudgell.
Petru. So I will;
And after it a flock-bed for her bones.
And hard egges, till they brace her like a Drum,
She shall be pamperd with——
She shall not know a stoole in ten moneths Gentlemen.
Soph. This must not be. Enter Jaques.
Jaq Arme, arme, out with your weapons,
For all the women in the Kingdom's on ye; Enter Pedro.
They swarm like waspes, and nothing can destroy 'em,
But stopping of their hive, and smothering of 'em.
Ped. Stand to your guard sir, all the devils extant
Are broke upon us, like a cloud of thunder;
There are more women, marching hitherward,
In rescue of my Mistris, then ere turn'd taile
At Sturbridge Faire; and I believe, as fiery.
Jaq. The forlorn-hope's led by a Tanners wife,
I know her by her hide; a desperate woman:
She flead her husband in her youth, and made (ther,
Raynes of his hide to ride the Parish. Take 'em all toge-
They are a genealogy of Jennets, gotten
And born thus, by the boysterous breath of husbands;
They serve sure, and are swift to catch occasion,
(I meane their foes, or husbands) by the fore-locks,
And there they hang like favours; cry they can,
But more for Noble spight, then feare: and crying
Like the old Gyants that were foes to Heaven,
They heave ye stoole on stoole, and fling main Potlids
Like massie-rocks, dart ladles, tossing Irons,
And tongs like Thunderbolts, till overlayd,
They fall beneath the waight; yet still aspiring
At those Emperious Codsheads, that would tame 'em.
There's nere a one of these, the worst and weakest,
(Choose where you will) but dare attempt the raysing
Against the soveraigne peace of Puritans,
A May-pole, and a Morris, maugre mainly
Their zeale, and Dudgeon-daggers: and yet more,
Dares plant a stand of battring Ale against 'em,
And drinke 'em out o'th Parish (tience.
Soph. Lo you fierce Petruchio, this comes of your impa-
Ped. There's one brought in the Beares against the Ca-
Of the Town, made it good, and fought 'em. (nons
Jaq. Another, to her everlasting fame, erected
Two Ale-houses of ease: the quarter-sessions
Running against her roundly; in which businesse
Two of the disannullers lost their night-caps:
A third stood excommunicate by the cudgell.
The Cunstable, to her eternall glory,
Drunke hard, and was converted, and she victor.
Ped. Then are they victualed with pies and puddings,
(The trappings of good stomacks) noble Ale
the true defendor, Sawsages, and smoak'd oncs,
If need be, such as serve for Pikes; and Porke,
(Better the Jewes never hated:) here and there
A bottle of Metheglin, a stout Britaine
That wil stand to 'em; what else they want, they war for.
Petru. Come to councell,
Soph. Now you must grant conditions or the Kingdom
Will have no other talke but this.
Petron. Away then, and let's advise the best.
Soph. Why doe you tremble?
Mor. Have I liv'd thus long to be knockt o'th head,
With halfe a washing beetle? pray be wise sir.
Petru. Come, something Ile doe, but what it is I know not.
Soph. To councel then, and let's avoyd their follies.
Guard all the doors, or we shal not have a cloke left. Exe
Enter three mayds, at severall doors.
1. How goes the businesse, girles?
2. A foot, and faire.
3. If fortune favour us: away to your strength,
The Country forces are ariv'd; be gon we are discovered else.
1. Arme, and be valiant.
2. Think of our cause.
3. Our justice.
1. Tis sufficient. Exeunt

Scena tertia.

Enter Petronius, Petruchio. Moroso, Sophocles, and Tranio.

Petro. I am indifferent, though I must confesse,
I had rather see her carted.
Tra. No more of that sir.
Soph. Are ye resolv'd to give her fair conditions?
Twill be the safest way.
Petru. I am distracted,
Would I had run my head into a halter
When I first woo'd her: if I offer peace,
She'l urge her own conditions, that's the devil.
Soph. Why say she do?
Petru: Say, I am made an Asse, then;
I know her aime: may I with reputation
(Answer me this) with safety of mine honour,
(After the mighty mannage of my first wife,
Which was indeed a fury to this Filly,
After my twelve strong labours to reclaime her,
Which would have made Don Hercules horn mad,
And hid him in his hide) suffer this Sicely,
Ere she have warm'd my sheets, ere grappel'd with me,
This Pinck, this painted Foyst, this Cockle-boat,
To hang her Fights out, and defie me friends,
A wel known man of war? if this be equal,
And I may suffer, say, and I have done?
Petron. I do not think you may.
Tra. You'l make it worse sir.
Soph. Pray heare me good Petruchio: but ev'n now,
You were contented to give all conditions,
To try how far she would carry: Tis a folly,
(And you wil find it so) to clap the curb on,
Er you be sure it proves a naturall wildnesse,
And not a forc'd. Give her conditions,
For on my life this tricke is put into her.
Petron. I should believe so too.
Soph. And not her own.
Tra. You'l finde it so.
Soph. Then if she flownder with you,
Clap spurs on, and in this you'l deale with temperance,
Avoyd the hurry of the world.
Tra. And loose Musick above.
Mor. No honour on my life, sir.
Petru. I wil do it.
Petron. It seems they are very merry. Enter Jaques.
Petru. Why God hold it.
Mor. Now Jaques?
Jaq. They are i'th flaunt, sir.

Soph.

Soph. Yes we heare 'em.
Jaq. They have got a ſtick of Fiddles, and they ſirke
In wondrous waies, the two grand Capitanos, (it
(They brought the Auxiliary Regiments)
Daunce with their coats tuckt up to their bare breeches,
And bid them kiſſe 'em, that's the burden;
They have got Metheglin, and audacious Ale,
And talke like Tyrants.
Petron. How knoweſt thou?
Jaq. I peep't in Song!
At a looſe Lanſket.
Tra. Harke.
Petron. A Song, pray ſilence. All the women above.
Mor. They look out.
Petru. Good ev'n Ladies.
Mar. Good you good ev'n ſir.
Petru. How have you ſlept to night?
Mar. Exceeding well ſir.
Petru. Did you not wiſh me with you?
Mar. No, believe me,
I never thought upon you.
Cun. Is that he?
Bya. Yes.
Cun. Sir?
Soph. She has drunk hard, mark her hood.
Cun. You are ——
Soph. Learnedly drunk, Ile hang elſe: let her utter.
Cun. And I muſt tell you, viva voce friend,
A very fooliſh fellow.
Tra. There's an Ale figure.
Petru. I thank you Suſan Brotes.
Cit. Forward ſiſter.
Cun. You have eſpouſed here a hearty woman,
A comely, and couragious.
Petru. Wel I have ſo.
Cun. And to the comfort of diſtreſſed damſels,
Weomen out-worn in wedlock, and ſuch veſſels,
This woman has defied you.
Petru. It ſhould ſeem ſo.
Cun. And why?
Petru. Yes, can you tell?
Cun. For thirteen cauſes.
Petru. Pray by your patience Miſtris.
Cit. Forward ſiſter.
Petru. Do you mean to treat of all theſe?
Cit. Who ſhall let her?
Petro. Doe you heare, Velvet-hood, we come not now
To heare your doctrine.
Cunt. For the firſt, I take it,
It doth divide it ſelfe into ſeven branches.
Petru. Harke you good Maria,
Have you got a Catechiſer here?
Tra. Good zeale.
Soph. Good three pil'd predication, will you peace,
And heare the cauſe we come for?
Cunt. Yes Bob-tailes
We know the cauſe you come for, here's the cauſe,
But never hope to carry her, never dream
Or flatter your opinions with a thought
Of baſe repentance in her.
Cit. Give me ſack,
By this, and next ſtrong Ale.
Cun. Sweare forward ſiſter.
Cit. By all that's cordiall, in this place we'l bury
Our bones, fames, tongues, our triumphs, and then all
That ever yet was chronicl'd of woman;
But this brave wench, this excellent deſpiſer,
This bane of dull obedience, ſhall inherit
His liberall wil, and march off with conditions
Noble, and worth her ſelfe.
Cun. She ſhall Tom Tiler,
And brave ones too; My hood ſhal make a hearſe-cloth,
And I lie under it, like Jone o Gaunt,
Ere I goe leſſe, my Diſtaffe ſtucke up by me,
For the eternall Trophee of my conqueſts;
And loud fame at my head, with two main Bottles,
Shall fill to all the world the glorious fall
Of old Don Gillian.
Cit. Yet a little further,
We have taken Armes in reſcue of this Lady;
Moſt juſt and Noble: if ye beat us off
Without conditions, and we recant,
Uſe us as we deſerve; and firſt degrade us
Of all our ancient chambring: next that
The Symbols of our ſecrecy, ſilke Stockings,
Hew of our heeles; our petticotes of Armes
Teare of our bodies, and our Bodkins breake
Over our coward heads.
Cun. And ever after
To make the tainture moſt notorious,
At all our Creſts, videlicet our Plackets.
Let Laces hang, and we returne againe
Into our former titles, Dayry maids.
Petru. No more wars: puiſſant Ladies, ſhew conditions,
And freely I accept 'em.
Mar. Call in Livia; Enter Livia above.
She's in the treaty too.
Mor. How, Livia?
Mar. Heare you that ſir?
There's the conditions for ye, pray peruſe 'em.
Petron. Yes, there ſhe is: 't had been no right rebellion,
Had ſhe held off; what think you man?
Mor. Nay nothing,
I have enough o'th proſpect: o'my conſcience,
The worlds end, and the goodneſſe of a woman
Will come together.
Petron. Are you there ſweet Lady?
Liv. Cry you mercy ſir, I ſaw you not: your bleſſing.
Petron. Yes, when I bleſſe a jade, that ſtumbles with me.
How are the Articles?
Liv. This is for you ſir;
And I ſhal think upon't.
Mor. You have us'd me finely.
Liv. There's no other uſe of thee now extant,
But to be hung up; caſſock, cap, and all,
For ſome ſtrange monſter at Apothecaries.
Petron. I heare you whore.
Liv. It muſt be his then ſir,
For need wil then compell me.
Cit. Bleſſing on thee.
Liv. He wil undoe me in meere pans of Coles
To make him luſtie.
Petron. There's no talking to 'em;
How are they ſir?
Petru. As I expected: Liberty and clothes, Read.
When, and in what way ſhe wil: continuall moneys,
Company, and all the houſe at her diſpoſe;
No tongue to ſay, why is this? or whether wil it;
New Coaches, and ſome buildings, ſhe appoints here;
Hangings, and hunting horſes: and for Plate
And Jewels for her private uſe, I take it,
Two twouſand pound in preſent: then for Muſick,
And women to read French;
Petron. This muſt not be.
Petru. And at the latter end a clauſe put in,
That Livia ſhal by no man be importun'd.

This whole moneth yet, to marry.
Petron. This is monstrous.
Petru. This shall be done, Ile humor her awhile:
If nothing but repentance, and undoing
Can win her love, Ile make a shift for one.
Soph. When ye are once a bed, all these conditions
Lie under your own seale.
Mar. Do you like 'em?
Petru. Yes.
And by that faith I gave you fore the Priest
Ile ratifie 'em.
Cun. Stay, what pledges?
Mar. No, Ile take that oath;
But have a care you keep it.
Cit. Tis not now
As when Andrea liv'd.
Cun. If you do juggle,
Or alter but a Letter of these Articles
We have set down, the self-same persecution.
Mar. Mistrust him not.
Petru. By all my honesty —
Mar. Enough. I yield.
Petron. What's this Inserted here?
Soph. That the two valiant women that command here
Shall have a Supper made em, and a large one,
And liberall entertainment without grudging,
And pay for all their Souldiers.
Petru. That shall be too;
And if a tun of Wine wil serve to pay 'em,
They shall have justice: I ordaine ye all
Pay-masters, Gentlemen.
Tra. Then we shall have sport boyes.
Mar. We'l meet you in the Parlour.
Petru. Ne'r looke sad sir, for I will doe it.
Soph. There's no danger in't.
Petru. For Livia's Article, you shall observe it,
I have tyde my selfe.
Petron. I wil.
Petru. Along then: now
Either I break, or this stiffe plant must bow. Exeunt.

Actus tertius, Scæna prima.

Enter Tranio, and Rowland.

Tra. Come, you shall take my counsell.
Row. I shall hang first.
Ile no more love, that's certaine, tis a bane,
(Next that they poyson Rats with) the most mortall:
No, I thank Heaven, I have got my sleep again,
And now begin to write sence; I can walk ye
A long howre in my chamber like a man,
And think of something that may be true me;
Some serious point of Learning, or my fate;
No more ay-meet, and misereis Tranio
Come neer my brain. Ile tell thee, had the devil
But any essence in him of a man,
And could be brought to love, and love a woman,
Twould make his head ake worser then his hornes doe;
And strike him with a fire he never felt yet,
Would make him dance. I tell thee there is nothing
(It may be thy case Tranio, therefore heare me:)
Under the Sun (reckon the masse of follies Crept into th'world with man) so desperate,
So madde, so senceless, poor and base, so wretched,
Rogny, and scurvy.
Tra. Whether wilt thou Rowland?
Row. As tis to be in love.
Tra. And why for vertue sake?
Row. And why for vertues sake do'st thou not con(ceive me?
Tra. No by my troth.
Row. Pray then, and hartely
For fear thou fall into't: I'le tell thee why too,
(For I have hope to save thee) when thou lovest,
And first beginst to worship the gilt calfe,
Imprimis, thou hast lost thy gentry,
And like a prentice flung away thy freedom.
Forthwith thou art a slave.
Tra. That's a new Doctrine.
Row. Next thou art no more man.
Tra. What then?
Row. A Fryppery;
Nothing but brayded haire, and penny ribband,
Glove, garter, fing, rose, or at best a swabber,
If thou canst love so neer to keep thy making.
Yet thou wilt loose thy language.
Tra. Why.
Row. O Tranio,
Those things in love, ne'r talke as we do,
Tra. No?
Row. No without doubt, they sigh and shake the head,
And sometimes whistle dolefully.
Tra. No tongue?
Row. Yes Tranio, but no truth in't, nor no reason,
And when they cant (for tis a kind of canting)
Ye shall hear, if you reach to understand 'em (Which you must be a foole first, or you cannot)
Such gibbrish; such believe me, I protest Sweet,
And oh deer Heavens, in which such constellations
Raigne at the births of lovers, this is too well,
And daigne me Lady, daigne me I beseech ye
You poor unworthy lump, and then she licks him
Tra A —— on't, this is nothing.
Row. Thou ha'st hit it:
Then talks she ten times worse, and wryes and wriggles,
As though she had the itch (and so it may be.)
Tra. Why thou art grown a strange discoverer.
Row Of mine own follies Tranio.
Tra. Wilt thou Rowland,
Certaine ne'r love again?
Row. I think so, certain,
And if I be not dead drunk, I shall keep it.
Tra. Tell me but this; what do'st thou think of women?
Row Why as I think of fiddles, they delight me,
Till their strings break.
Tra. What strings?
Row. Their modesties,
Faithes, vowes and maidenheads, for they are like Kits
They have but foure strings to 'em.
Tra. What wilt thou
Give me for ten pound now, when thou next lovest,
And the same woman still?
Row. Give me the money;
A hundred, and my Bond for't.
Tra. But pray hear me,
I'le work all meanes I can to reconcile ye:
Row. Do, do, give me the money.
Tra. There.
Row. Work Tranio.
Tra. You shall go sometimes where she is.
Row. Yes straight.
This is the first good I ere got by woman.

Tra.

Tra. You would think it ſtrange now, if an other
As good as hers, ſay better. (beauty
Rom. Well.
Tra. Conceive me,
This is no point o'th wager.
Rom. That's all one. (you.
Tra. Love you as much, or more, then ſhe now hates
Rom. Tis a good hearing, let 'em lose ten pound more,
I never love that woman.
Tra. There it is;
And ſo an hundred, if you loſe.
Rom. Tis done;
Have you an other to put in?
Tra. No, no ſir.
Rom. I am very ſorry: now will I erect
A new Game and go hate for th' bell; I am ſure
I am in excellent caſe to win.
Tra. I muſt have leave.
To tell you, and tell truth too, what ſhe is,
And how ſhee ſuffers for you.
Rom. Ten pound more,
I never believe you.
Tra. No ſir, I am ſtinted.
Rom. Well, take your beſt way then.
Tra. Let's walk, I am glad
Your ſullen feavor's off.
Rom. Shal't ſee me Tranio
A monſtrous merry man now: let's to the Wedding,
And as we go, tell me the generall hurry
Of theſe madde wenches, and their workes.
Tra. I will.
Rom. And do thy worſt.
Tra. Something i'le do.
Rom. Do Tranio. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Pedro, and Jaques.

Ped. A paire of ſtocks beſtride 'em, are they gone?
Jaq. Yes they are gon; and all the pans i'th Town
Beating before 'em: what ſtrange admonitions
They gave my Maſter, and how fearfully
They threaten'd, if he brok 'em?
Ped. O' my conſcience
Has found his full match now.
Jaq. That I believe too.
Ped. How did ſhe entertaine him?
Iaq. She look't on him.
Ped. But ſcurvely.
Iaq. With no great affection
That I ſaw: and I heard ſome ſay he kiſſ'd her,
But 'twas upon a treaty, and ſome coppies
Say but her cheek.
Ped. Iaques, what wouldſt thou give
For ſuch a wife now?
Iaq. Full as many prayers
As the moſt zealous Puritane conceives
Out of the meditation of fat veale,
Or birds of prey, cram'd capons, againſt Players,
And to as good a tune too, but againſt her:
That heaven would bleſſe me from her: mark it Pedro,
If this houſe be not turn'd within this fortnight
With the foundation upward, i'le be cured.
My comfort is yet that thoſe Anſorities,
That came to back her cauſe, thoſe heathen whores had their hoods hallowed with ſack.
Ped. How div'liſh drunk they were?
Jaq. And how they tumbled, Pedro, didſt thou mark
The Countrey Cavaliero?
Ped. Out upon her,
How ſhe turn'd down the Bagpes?
Jaq. I that ſunke her.
Ped. That drink was wel put to her, what a ſober ſalt
When the chaire fel, ſhe fetchd, with her heels upward?
Jaq. And what a piece of Landskip ſhe diſcoverd?
Ped. Didſt mark her, when her hood fel in the Poſſet?
Jaq. Yes, and there rid, like a Dutch hoy, the Tumbrel,
When ſhe had got her ballaſſe.
Ped. That I ſaw too.
Jaq. How faine ſhe would have drawn on Sophocles
To come aboord, and how ſhe ſimperd it—
Ped. I warrant her, ſhe has been a worthy ſtriker.
Iaq. I'th heat of Summer there had been ſome hope
Ped. Hang her. (on't.
Jaq. She offerd him a Harry-groat, and belcht out,
Her ſtomack being blown with Ale, ſuch Courtſhip,
Upon my life has giv'n him twenty ſtooles ſince:
Believe my calculation, theſe old women
When they are tippled, and a little heated
Are like new wheels, they'l roare you all the Town o're
Till they be greaſd.
Ped. The City Cinquepace
Dame toſſe and Butter, had he Bob too?
Jaq. Yes,
But ſhe was ſullen drunk, and given to filching,
I ſee her offer at a Spoon; my maſter
I do not like his looke, I feare has faſted
For all this preparation; lets ſteale by him. Exeunt.

Scena tertia.

Enter Petruchio, and Sophocles.

Soph. Not let you touch her all this night?
Petru. Not touch her.
Soph. Where was your courage?
Petru. Where was her obedience?
Never poore man was ſham'd ſo; never Raſcall
That keeps a ſtud of whores was us'd ſo baſely.
Soph. Pray you tell me one thing truly;
Do you love her?
Petru. I would I did not, upon that condition
I paſt thee halfe my Land.
Soph. It may be then,
Her modeſty requir'd a little violence?
Some women love to ſtruggle.
Petru. She had it,
And ſo much that I ſweat for't, ſo I did,
But to no end: I waſht an Ethiope;
She ſwore my force might weary her, but win her
I never could, nor ſhould, till ſhe conſented,
And I might take her body priſoner,
But for her mind or appetite—
Soph. Tis ſtrange;
This woman is the firſt I ever read of,
Refus'd a warranted occaſion,
And ſtanding on ſo faire termes.
Petru. I ſhall quit her.
Soph. Us'd you no more art?
Petru. Yes, I ſwore to her,
And by no little ones, if preſently
Without more diſputation on the matter,
She grew not neerer to me, and diſpatcht me
Out of the pain I was, for I was neer'd,
And willingly, and eagerly, and ſweetly,

I would

I would to her Chamber-maid, and in her hearing
Begin her such a hunter-up.
Soph. Then she started?
Petru. No more then I do now; marry she answered
If I were so dispos'd, she could not help it;
But there was one cal'd Iaques, a poor Butler
One that might well content a single woman.
Soph. And he should tilt her.
Petru. To that sence, and last
She bad me yet these six nights look for nothing,
Nor strive to purchase it, but faire good night,
And so good morrow, and a kisse or two
To close my stomach, for her vow had seald it,
And she would keep it constant.
Soph. Stay ye, stay ye,
Was she thus when you woo'd her?
Petru. Nothing Sophocles,
More keenely eager, I was oft afraid
She had bin light, and easy, she would showre
Her kisses so upon me.
Soph. Then I fear
An other spoke's i'th wheele.
Petru. Now thou hast found me,
There gnawes my devill, Sophocles, O patience Preserve me; that I make her not example
By some unworthy way; as fleaing her,
Boyling, or making verjuce, drying her.
Soph. I hear her.
Petru Mark her then, and see the heire
Of spight and prodigality, she has studied
A way to begger's both, and by this hand Maria as the
She shall be if I live a Doxy. dore, and Servant
Soph. Fy Sir. and woman.
Mar. I do not like that dressing, tis too poor,
Let me have six gold laces, broad and massy,
And betwixt ev'ry lace a rich embroydry,
Line the gown through with plush, perfum'd, and
All the sleeves down with pearle. (purfle
Petru. What think you Sophocles.
In what point stands my state now?
Mar. For those hangings
Let 'em be carried where I gave appointment,
They are too base for my use, and bespeak
New pieces of the civill wars of France,
Let 'em be large and lively, and all silke work,
The borders gold.
Soph. I marry sir, this cuts it.
Mar. That fourteen yardes of satten give my woman,
I do not like the colour, tis too civill:
Ther's too much silk i'th lace too; tell the Dutchman
That brought the mares, he must with all speed send me
An other suit of horses, and by all meanes
Ten cast of Hawkes for 'th River, I much care not
What price they beare, so they be sound, and flying,
For the next winter, I am for the Country;
And mean to take my pleasure; wher's the horse man?
Petru. She meanes to ride a great horse.
Soph. With a side sadle? (month
Petru. Yes, and shee'l run a tilt within this twelve-
Mar. To morrow Ile begin to learne, but pray sir
Have a great care he be an easy doer,
Twill spoyle a Scholler els.
Soph. An easy doer,
Did you hear that?
Petru. Yes, I shal meet her morals
Er it be long I fear not.
Mar. O good morrow.
Soph. Good morrow Lady, how is't now.
Mar. Faith sickly,
This house stands in an ill ayre.
Petru. Yet more charges?
Mar. Subject to rots, and hewms; out on't, tis nothing
But a tild fog.
Petru. What think of the Lodge then?
Mar. I like the seate, but tis too little, Sophocles
Let me have thy opinion, thou hast judgement.
Petru. Tis very well.
Mar. What if I pluck it down,
And built a square upon it, with two courts
Still rising from the entrance?
Petru. And i'th midst
A Colledge for yong Scolds.
Mar. And to the Southward
Take in a garden of some twenty acres,
And cast it off the Italian fashion, hanging.
Petru. And you could cast your self so too; pray Lady
Will not this cost much money?
Mar. Some five thousand,
Say six: Ile have it battel'd too.
Petru. And gilt; Maria,
This is a fearfull course you take, pray think on't,
You are a woman now, a wife, and his
That must in honesty, and justice look for
Some due obedience from you.
Mar. That bare word
Shall cost you many a pound more, build upon't;
Tell me o' due obedience: what's a husband?
What are we married for, to carry sumpters?
Are we not one peece with you, and as worthy
Our own intentions, as you yours?
Petru. Pray hear me.
Mar. Take two small drops of water, equall weigh'd,
Tell me which is the heaviest, and which ought
First to discend in duty?
Petru. You mistake me;
I urge not service from you, nor obedience
In way of duty, but of love, and oredit;
All I expect is but a noble care
Of what I have brought you, and of what I am,
And what our name may be
Mar. That's in my making. Petru. Tis true it is so.
Mar. Yes it is Petruchio,
For there was never man without our molding,
Without our stampe upon him, and our justice,
Left any thing three ages after him
Good, and his own.
Soph. Good Lady understand him.
Mar. I do too much, sweet Sophocles, he's one
Of a most spightfull self condition,
Never at peace with any thing but age,
That has no teeth left to return his anger:
A Bravery dwels in his blood yet, of abusing
His first good wife: she's sooner fire then powder,
And sooner mischief.
Petru. If I be so sodain
Do not you fear me?
Mar. No nor yet care for you,
And if it may be lawfull, I defie you:
Petru. Do's this become you now?
Mar. It shall become me.
Petru. Thou disobedient, weak, vain-glorious woman,
Were I but half so wilfull, as thou pighfull,
I should now drag thee to thy duty.
Mar. Drag me?
Petru. But I am friends again; take all your pleasure.
Mar. Now you perceive him Sophocles.

Petru.

Petru. I love thee
Above thy vanity, thou faithleſſe creature.
Mar. Would I had been ſo happy when I married,
But to have met an honeſt man like thee,
For I am ſure thou art good, I know thou art honeſt,
A hanſome hurtleſſe man, a loving man,
Though never a penny with him; and thoſe eyes,
That face, and that true heart; weare this for my ſake,
And when thou think'ſt upon me pity me:
I am caſt away, Exit Mar.
Soph. Why how now man?
Petru. Pray leave me,
And follow your advices.
Soph. The man's jealous:
Petru. I ſhall find a time ere it be long, to aske you
One or two fooliſh queſtions.
Soph. I ſhall anſwer
As wel as I am able, when you call me:
If ſhe mean true, tis but a little killing,
And if I do not venture its—— Farewel ſir. Exit Soph.
Petru. Pray farewell. Is there no keeping
A wife to one mans uſe? no wintering
Theſe cattell without ſtraying? tis hard dealing,
Very hard dealing, Gentlemen, ſtrange dealing:
Now in the name of madneſſe, what ſtar raign'd,
What dog-ſtar, bull, or bear-ſtar, when I married
This ſecond wife, this whirlwind, that takes all Within her compaſſe? was I not wel warnd,
(I thought I had, and I believe I know it,)
And beaten to repentance in the dales
Of my firſt doting? had I not wife enough
To turn my love too? did I want vexation,
Or any ſpeciall care to kill my heart?
Had I not ev'ry morning a rare breakfaſt,
Mixt with a learned Lecture of ill language,
Louder then Tom o' Lincoln; and at dinner,
A dyet of the ſame diſh? was there evening
That ere paſt over us, without thou knave,
Or thou whore, for digeſtion? had I ever
A pull at this ſame poor ſport men run mad for,
But like a cur I was faine to ſhew my teeth firſt,
And almoſt worry her? and did Heaven forgive me,
And take this Serpent from me? and am I
Keeping tame devils now again? my heart akes;
Something I muſt do ſpeedily: Ile die,
If I can hanſomely, for that's the way
To make a Raſcall of her; I am ſick,
And Ile go very neer it, but Ile periſh. Exit.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Livia, Byancha, Tranio, and Rowland.

Liv. Then I muſt be content ſir, with my fortune.
Row. And I with mine.
Liv. I did not think, a look,
Or a poore word or two, could have diſplanted
Such a fix'd conſtancy, and for your end too. (gaws,
Row. Come, come, I know your courſes: there's no gew-
Your Rings, and Bracelets, and the Purſe you gave me,
The money's ſpent in entertaining you
At Plays, and Cherry-gardens.
Liv. There's your Chain too.
But if you'l give me leave, Ile weare the haire ſtill;
I would yet remember you.
Bya. Give him his love wench;
The youg man has imployment for't.
Tra. Fie Rowland.
Row. You cannot fie me out a hundred pound
With this poore plot: yet, let me nere ſee day more;
If ſomething do not ſtruggle ſtrangely in me.
Bya. Young man, let me talk with you.
Row. Wel young woman.
Bya. This was your Miſtris once.
Row. Yes.
Bya. Are ye honeſt?
I ſee you are young, and hanſome.
Row. I am honeſt. (judgement
Bya. Why that's wel ſaid: and there's no doubt your
Is good enough, and ſtrong enough to tell you
Who are your foes, and friends: why did you leave her?
Row. She made a puppy of me.
Bya. Be that granted:
She muſt doe ſo ſometimes, and oftentimes;
Love were too ſerious elſe.
Row. A witty woman.
Bya. Had you lov'd me——
Row. I would I had.
Bya. And deerly;
And I had lov'd you ſo: you may love worſe ſir,
But that is not materiall.
Row. I ſhal looſe.
Bya. Some time or other for variety
I ſhould have cal'd you foole, or boy, or bid you Play with the Pages: but have lov'd you ſtil,
Out of all queſtion, and extreamly too;
You are a man made to be loved:
Row. This woman
Either abuſes me, or loves me deadly.
Bya. Ile tell you one thing, if I were to chooſe
A husband to mine own mind, I ſhould think
One of your mothers making would content me,
For o' my conſcience ſhe makes good ones.
Row. Lady,
Ile leave you to your commendations:
I am in again, The divel take their tongues.
Bya. You ſhall not goe.
Row. I wil: yet thus far Livia,
Your ſorrow may induce me to forgive you,
But never love again; if I ſtay longer,
I have loſt two hundred pound.
Liv. Good ſir, but thus much——
Tra. Turn if thou beeſt a man.
Liv. But one kiſſe of you;
One parting kiſſe, and I am gone too.
Row. Come,
I ſhall kiſſe fifty pound away at this clap:
We'l have one more, and then farewel.
Liv. Farewel.
Bya. Wel, go thy waies, thou bearſt a kind heart with (thee.
Tra. H'as made a ſtand.
Bya. A noble, brave yonng fellow,
Worthy a wench indeed.
Row. I wil: I wil not. Exit Rowland.
Tra. He's gone: but ſhot agen; play you but your part,
And I will keep my promiſe: forty Angels
In fair gold Lady: wipe your eyes: he's yours
If I have any wit.
Liv. Ile pay the forfeit.
Bya. Come then, lets ſee your ſiſter, how ſhe fares now,
After her ſkirmiſh: and be ſure, Moroſo
Be kept in good hand; then all's perfect, Livia.
Exeunt.

Scena

Scena quinta.

Enter Jaques and Pedro.

Ped. O Jaques, Jaques, what becomes of us?
Oh my ſweet Maſter.
Jaq. Run for a Phyſitian,
And a whole peck of Pothecaries, Pedro.
He wil die, didle, didle die: if they come not quickly,
And bring all people that are skilfull
In Lungs and Livers: raiſe the neighbours,
And all the Aquavite-bottles extant;
And, O the Parſon, Pedro, O the Parſon,
A little of his comfort, never ſo little;
Twenty to one you finde him at the Buſh,
There's the beſt Ale.
Ped. I fly. Exit Pedro.

Enter Maria, and Servants.

Mar. Out with the Trunks, ho:
Why are you idle? Sirha, up to th' Chamber,
And take the hangings down, and ſee the Linnen
Packt up, and ſent away within this halfe houre.
What are the Carts come yet? ſome honeſt body
Help down the cheſts of Plate, and ſome the wardrobe,
Alas we are undone elſe.
Jaq. Pray forſooth,
And I beſeech ye, tell me, is he dead yet?
Mar. No, but is drawing on: out with the Armour.
Jaq. Then Ile goe ſee him.
Mar. Thou art undone then fellow: no man that has Been neere him come neere me.

Enter Sophocles, and Petronius.

Soph. Why how now Lady, what means this?
Petron. Now daughter, how dos my ſonne?
Mar. Save all you can for Heaven ſake.

Enter Livia, Byancha, and Tranio.

Liv. Be of good comfort ſiſter.
Mar. O my Casket.
Petron. How do's thy husband woman?
Mar. Get you gon, if you mean to ſave your lives: the (ſickneſſe.
Petron. Stand further off, I prethee.
Mar. Is i'th houſe ſir,
My husband has it now;
Alas he is infected, and raves extreamly:
Give me ſome counſell friends.
Byan. Why lock the doores up,
And ſend him in a woman to attend him.
Mar. I have beſpoke two women: and the City
Hath ſent a watch by this time: meat nor money
He ſhall not want, nor prayers.
Petron. How long is't
Since it firſt tooke him?
Mar. But within this three houres. Enter Watch.
I am frighted from my wits: —O here's the watch;
Pray doe your Office, lock the doores up friends,
And patience be his Angel.
Tra. This comes unlook'd for: (me,
Mar. Ile to the lodge; ſome that are kind and love
I know wil viſit me. Petruchio within.
Petru. Doe you heare my Maſters: ho, you that locke Petron. Tis his voyce. (the doores up.
Tra. Hold, and let's heare him. (retick.
Petru. Wil ye ſtarve me here: am I a Traytor, or an He-
Or am I grown infectious?
Petron. Pray ſir, pray.
Petru. I am as wel as you are, goodman puppy.
Mar. Pray have patience,
You ſhall want nothing ſir.
Petru. I want a cudgell,
And thee, thou wickedneſſe.
Petron. He ſpeakes wel enough.
Mar. 'Had ever a ſtrong heart ſir.
Petru. Wil ye heare me?
Firſt be pleas'd
To think I know ye all, and can diſtinguiſh
Ev'ry mans ſeverall voyce: you that ſpoke firſt,
I know my father in law; the other Tranio,
And I heard Sophocles; the laſt, pray marke me,
Is my dam'd wife Maria:
If any man miſdoubt me for infected,
There is mine arme, let any man looke on't.

Enter Doctor and Pothecary.

Doct. Save ye Gentlemen.
Petron: O welcome Doctor,
Ye come in happy time; pray your opinion,
What think you of his pulſe?
Doct. It beats with buſieſt,
And ſhews a generall inflammation,
Which is the ſymptome of a peſtilent feaver,
Take twenty ounces frow him.
Petru. Take a foole;
Take an ounce from mine arme, and Doctor Deuz-ace,
Ile make a cloſe-ſtoole of your Velvet coſtard.
——Gentlemen, doe ye make a may-game on me?
I tell ye once againe, I am as ſound,
As wel, as wholſome, and as ſentible,
As any of ye all: Let me out quickly,
Or as I am a man, Ile beat the wals down,
And the firſt thing I light upon ſhall pay for't.
Exit Doctor and Pothecary.
Petro. Nay we'l go with you Doctor.
Mar. Tis the ſafeſt;
I ſaw the tokens ſir.
Petro. Then there is but one way.
Petru. Wil it pleaſe you open?
Tra. His fit grows ſtronger ſtill.
Mar. Let's ſave our ſelves ſir,
He's paſt all worldly cure.
Petro. Friends do your office.
And what he wants, if money, love, or labour,
Or any way may win it, let him have it.
Farewell, and pray my honeſt friends — Exeunt.
Petru. Why Raſcals,
Friends, Gentlemen, thou beaſtly wife, Jaques;
None heare me? who at the doore there?
1 Watch. Thinke I pray ſir,
Whether you are going, and prepare your ſelfe.
2 Watch. Theſe idle thoughts diſturbe you', the good Gentlewoman
Your wife has taken care you ſhall want nothing.
Petru Shall I come out in quiet? anſwer me,
Or ſhall I charge a fowling-piece, and make
Mine own way; two of ye I cannot miſſe,
If I miſſe three; ye come here to aſſault me.
I am as excellent wel, I thank Heav'n for't,
And have as good a ſtomacke at this inſtant—
2 Watch. That's an ill ſigne.
1 Watch. He draws on; he's a dead man,
Petru. And ſleep as ſoundly; wil ye looke upon me?
1 Watch. Do you want Pen and Inke? while you have Settle your ſtate. (ſence ſir, Petru. Sirs, I am wel, as you are;

Or

Or any Raſcall living.
2 Watch. would you were ſir.
Petru. Look to your ſelves, and if you love your lives,
Open the doore, and fly me, for I ſhoot elſe;
——Ile ſhoot, and preſently, chain-bullets;
And under foure I will not kill.
1 Watch. Let's quit him,
It may be it is trick: he's dangerous.
2 Watch. The devill take the hinmoſt, I cry. Exit match running.
Enter Petruchio with a piece.
Petru. Have among ye;
The doore ſhall open too, Ile have a faire ſhoot;
Are ye all gone? tricks in my old daies, crackers
Put now upon me? and by Lady Green-ſleeves?
Am I grown ſo tame after all my triumphs?
But that I ſhould be thought mad, if I rail'd
As much as they deſerve againſt theſe women,
I would now rip up from the primitive cuckold,
All their arch-villanies, and all their dobles,
Which are more then a hunted Hare ere thought on:
When a man has the faireſt, and the ſweeteſt
Of all their ſex, and as he thinks the nobleſt,
What has he then? and Ile ſpeake modeſtly,
He has a Quartern-ague, that ſhall ſhake
All his eſtate to nothing; never cur'd,
Nor never dying; H'as a ſhip to venture
His fame, and credit in, which if he man not
With more continuall labour then a Gally
To make her tith, either ſhe grows a Tumbrell
Not worth the cloth ſhe weares; or ſprings more leakes
Then all the fame of his poſterity
Can ever ſtop againe: I could raile twenty daies;
Out on 'em hedge-hogs,
He that ſhal touch 'em, has a thouſand thorns
Runs through his fingers: If I were unmarried,
I would do any thing below repentance,
Any baſe dunhill ſlavery; be a hang-man,
Ere I would be a husband: O the thouſand,
Thouſand, ten thouſand waies they have to kil us!
Some fall with too much ſtringing of the Fiddles,
And thoſe are fooles; ſome, that they are not ſuffer'd,
And thoſe are Maudlin-lovers: ſome, like Scorpions,
They poyſon with their tailes, and thoſe are Martyrs;
Some die with doing good, thoſe Benefactors,
And leave 'em land to leap away: ſome few,
For thoſe are rareſt, they are ſaid to kill
With kindneſſe, and faire uſage; but what they are
My Catologue diſcovers not: onely tis thought
They are buried in old wals with their heeles upward.
I could raile twenty daies together now.
Ile ſeek 'em out, and if I have not reaſon,
And very ſenſible, why this was done,
Ile go a birding yet, and ſome ſhall ſmart for't. Exit.

Actus Quartus. Scæna prima.

Enter Moroſe and Petronius.

Mor. That I do love her, is without all queſtion,
And moſt extreamly, deerly, moſt exactly;
And that I would ev'n now, this preſent Monday,
Before all others, maids, wives, women, widdows,
Of what degree or calling, marry her,
As certaine too; but to be made a whim-wham,
A Jib-crack, and a Gentleman o'th firſt houſe
For all my kindneſſe to her.
Petron. How you take it?
Thou get a wench, thou get dozen night-caps;
Wouldſt have her come, and lick thee like a calfe,
And blow thy noſe, and buſſe thee?
Mor. Not ſo neither.
Petron. What wouldſt thou have her do?
Mor. Do as ſhe ſhould do;
Put on a clean ſmock, and to Church, and marry,
And then to bed a Gods name, this is faire play,
And keeps the Kings peace, let her leave her bobe,
I have had too many of them, and her quillets,
She is as nimble that way as an Eele;
But in the way ſhe ought to me eſpecially,
A ſow of Lead is ſwifter.
Petron Quoat your griefes down.
Mor. Give faire quarter, I am old and craſie,
And ſubject to much fumbling, I confeſſe it;
Yet ſomething I would have that's warme, to hatch me:
But underſtand me I would have it ſo,
I buy not more repentance in the bargaine
Then the ware's worth I have; if you allow me
Worthy your Son-in-law, and your allowance,
Do it a way of credit; let me ſhow ſo,
And not be troubled in my viſitations,
With blows, and bitterneſſe, and down right railings,
As if we were to couple like two cats,
With clawing, add loud clamour:
Petron. Thou fond man
Haſt thou forgot the Ballard, crabbed age,
Can May and January match together,
And nev'r a ſtorm between 'em? ſay ſhe abuſe thee,
Put caſe ſhe doe.
Mor. Wel.
Petron. Nay, believe ſhe do's.
Mor. I doe believe ſhe do's.
Petron. And div'liſhly:
Art thou a whit the worſe?
Mor. That's not the matter,
I know, being old, tis fit I am abus'd;
I know tis hanſome, and I know moreover
I am to love her for't.
Petron. Now you come to me.
Mor. Nay more then this; I find too, and finde certain,
What Gold I have, Pearle, Bracelets, Rings, or Owches,
Or what ſhe can deſire, Gowns, Petticotes,
Waſtcotes, Enbroydered-ſtockings, Scarffs, Cals, Feathers
Hats, five pound Garters, Muffs, Masks, Ruffs, & Ribands,
I am to give her for't.
Petron. Tis right, you are ſo.
Mor. But when I have done all this, and think it duty,
Is't requiſit an other bore my noſtrils?
Riddle me that.
Petron. Go get you gone, and dreame
She's thine within theſe two daies, for ſhe is ſo;
The boy's beſide the ſaddle: get warm broths,
And feed apace; think not of worldly buſineſſe,
It cools the blood; leave off your tricks, they are hateful,
And meere forerunners of the ancient meaſures;
Contrive your beard o'th top cut like Verdugoes;
It ſhows you would be wiſe, and burn your night-cap,
It looks like halfe a winding-ſheet, and urges
From a young wench nothing but cold repentance;
You may eate Onyons, ſo you'l not be laviſh.
Mor. I am glad of that.
Petron. They purge the blood, and quicken,
But after 'em, conceive me, ſweep your mouth,
And where there wants a tooth, ſtick in a clove.

Mar. Shall I hope once againe, say't.
Petro. You shall sir:
And you shall have your hope. Enter Byancha and Tranio.
Moro. Why there's a match then.
Byan. You shall not finde me wanting, get you gon.
Here's the old man, he'l think you are plotting else
Something against his new Sonne. Exit Tranio.
Moro. Fare ye well sir. Exit Moroso.

Byan. And ev'ry Buck had his Doe,
And ev'ry Cuckold a Bell at his Toe:
Oh what sport should we have then, then Boyes then,
O what sport should we have then?

Petro. This is the spirit, that inspires 'em all.
By. Give you good ev'n.
Petro. A word with you Sweet Lady.
By. I am very hasty sir.
Petro. So your were ever.
By. Well what's your will?
Petro. Was not your skilfull hand
In this last stratagem? were not your mischiefes
Eeking the matter on?
By. In's shutting up?
Is that it?
Petro. Yes.
By. Ile tell you.
Petro. Doe,
By And truly.
Good old man, I doe grieve exceeding much,
I feare too much.
Petro. I am sorry for your heavineſſe.
Belike you can repent then?
By. There you are wide too.
Not that the thing was done (conceive me rightly)
Do's any way molest me.
Petro. What then Lady?
By. But that I was not in't, there's my sorrow, there
Now you understand me, for Ile tell you,
It was so sound a peece, and so well carried,
And if you marke the way, so handsomely,
Of such a heigth, and excellence, and art
I have not known a braver, for conceive me,
When the grosse foole her husband would be sick——
Petro. Pray stay.
By. Nay, good, your patience: and no fence for't,
Then stept your daughter in.
Petro. By your appointment.
By. I would it had, on that condition
I had but one halfe smock, I like it so well;
And like an excellent cunning woman, cur'd me
One madneſſe with an other, which was rare,
And to our weake beleifes, a wonder.
Petro. Hang ye,
For surely, if your husband looke not to ye,
I know what will.
By. I humbly thank your worship.
And so I take my leave.
Petro. You have a hand I heare too.
By. I have two sir.
Petro. In my youg daughters buſineſſe.
By. You will finde there
A fitter hand then mine, to reach her frets,
And play down diddle to her.
Petro. I shall watch ye.
By. Doe.
Petro. And I shall have justice.
By. Where?
Petro. That's all one;
I shall be with you at a turne hence forward.
By. Get you a posset too; and so good ev'n sir.
Exeunt.

Enter Petruchio, Iaques, and Pedro.

Iaq. And as I told your worship, all the hangings,
Brasse, Pewter, Plate, ev'n to the very looking-glasses.
Ped. And that that hung for our defence, the Armor,
And the march Beere was going too: Oh Iaques
What a sad sight was that?
Iaq. Even the two Rundlets,
The two that was our hope, of Muskadell,
(Better nev'r tongue tript over) these two Cannons,
To batter brawne withall at Christmas, sir
Ev'n those two lovely twyns, the enemy
Had almost cut off cleane.
Petru. Goe trim the house up.
And put the things in order as they were. Exit Ped. and I shall finde time for all this: could I finde her Iaq.
But constant any way, I had done my buſineſſe;
Were she a whore directly, or a scold,
An unthrift, or a woman made to hate me,
I had my wish, and knew which way to rayne her:
But while she shewes all these, and all their losses,
A kinde of linsey woolsey, mingled mischiefe
Not to be gheſt at, and whether true, or borrowed,
Not certaine neither, what a hap had I, Enter
And what a tydie fortune, when my fate Maria.
Flung me upon this Beare-whelp? here she comes Now if she have a colour, for the fault is
A cleanly one, upon my conscience
I shall forgive her yet, and finde a something Certaine, I married for: her wit; Ile marke her.
Mar. Not let his wife come neere him in his sicknes,
Not come to comfort him? she that all lawes
Of heaven, and Nations have ordain'd his second,
Is she refus'd? and two old Paradoxes,
Peeces of five and fifty, without faith
Clapt in upon him? h'as a little pet,
That all young wives must follow necessary,
Having their Mayden-heads——
Petru. This is an Axiome
I never heard before.
Mar. Or say rebellion
If we durst be so foule, which two faire words
Alas win us from, in an houre, an instant,
We are so easie, make him so forgetfull
Both of his reason, honesty, and credit,
As to deny his wife a visitation?
His wife, that (though she was a little foolish,)
Lov'd him, Oh heaven forgive her for't! nay doted,
Nay had run mad, had she not married him,
Petru. Though I doe know this falser then the devill,
I cannot choose but love it.
Mar. What doe I know
But those that came to keepe him, might have kill'd him,
In what a case had I been then? I dare not Beleeve him such a base, debosh'd companion,
That one refusall of a tender maide
Would make him faigne this sickneſſe out of need,
And take a Keeper to him of fourescore
To play at Billiards; one that mew'd content
And all her teeth together; not come neere him?
Petru. This woman would have made a most rare Je-
She can prevaricate on any thing: (suite
There was not to be thought a way to save her
In all imagination, beside this.

Mar.

Mar. His unkinde dealing, which was worſt of all,
In ſending, who knowes whether, all the plate,
And all the houſhold-ſtuffe, had I not croſt it,
By a great providence, and my friends aſſiſtance
Which he will thanke me one day for: alas,
I could have watch'd as well as they, have ſerv'd him
In any uſe, better, and willinger.
The Law commands me to doe it, love commands me.
And my own duty charges me.

Petru. Heav'n bleſſe me.
And now I have ſaid my Prayers, Ile goe to her:
Are you a wife for any man?

Mar. For you Sir.
If I were worſe, I were better; That you are well,
At leaſt, that you appeare ſo, I thanke heaven,
Long may it hold and that you are here, I am glad too,
But that you have abus'd me wretchedly,
And ſuch a way that ſhames the name of husband,
Such a malicious mangy way, ſo mingled,
(Never looke ſtrangely on me, I dare tell you)
With breach of honeſty, care, kindneſſe, manners.

Petru. Holla, you kick too faſt.

Mar. Was I a ſtranger?
Or had I vow'd perdition to your perſon?
Am I not married to you, tell me that?

Petru. I would I could not tell you.

Mar. Is my preſence,
The ſtock I come of, which is worſhipfull,
If I ſhould ſay right worſhipfull, I ly'd not,
My Grandſire was a Knight.

Petru. O'the Shire?

Mar. A Souldier,
Which none of all thy Family e're heard off,
But one conductor of thy name, a Graſier
That ran away with pay: or am I grown (Becauſe I have been a little peeviſh to you, Onely to try your temper) ſuch a dogge-latch
I could not be admitted to your preſence?

Petru. If I endure this, hang me.

Mar. And two deaths heads,
Two Harry Groats, that had their faces worne,
Almoſt their names away too.

Petru. Now heare me.
For I will ſtay no longer.

Mar. This you ſhall:
How ever you ſhall think to flatter me,
For this offence, which no ſubmiſſion
Can ever mediate for, you'l finde it ſo,
What ever you ſhall doe by interceſſion,
What you can offer, what your Land can purchaſe,
What all your friends, or families can win,
Shall be but this, not to forſweare your knowledge,
But ever to forbeare it: now your will ſir.

Petru. Thou art the ſubtleſt woman I think living,
I am ſure the lewdeſt; now be ſtill, and marke me;
Were I but any way addicted to the devill,
I ſhould now think I had met a play-fellow
To profit by, and that way the moſt learned
That ever taught to murmur. Tell me thou,
Thou moſt poor, paltry ſpitefull whore: doe you cry?
Ile make you roare, before I leave.

Mar. Your pleaſure.

Petru. Was it not ſinne enough, thou Fruiterer
Full of the fall thou eat'ſt: thou devils broker,
Thou Seminary of all ſedition,
Thou ſword of veng'ance, with a thred hung o're us,
Was it not ſinne enough, and wickedneſs
In full abundance? was it not vexation
At all points, cap a pe? nay, I ſhall pinch you,
Thus like a rotten raſcall to abuſe
The name of heaven, the tye of marriage,
The honour of thy friends; the expectation
Of all that thought thee vertuous, with rebellion,
Childiſh and baſe rebellion, but continuing
After forgiveneſſe too, and worſe, your miſchiefe,
And againſt him, ſetting the hope of heaven by,
And the deere reſervation of his honour
Nothing above ground could have won to hate thee:
Well goe thy wayes.

Mar. Yes.

Petru. You ſhall heare me out firſt:
What puniſhment mai'ſt thou deſerve, thou thing,
Thou idle thing of nothing, thou pull'd Primroſe,
That two houres after, art a weed, and wither'd,
For this laſt flouriſh on me? am I one
Selected out of all the husbands living,
To be ſo ridden by a Tit of ten pence,
Am I ſo blind and Bed-rid? I was mad,
And had the Plague, and no man muſt come neere me,
I muſt be ſhut up, and my ſubſtance bezel'd,
And an old woman watch me.

Mar. Well ſir, well,
You may well glory in't.

Petru. And when it comes to opening, 'tis my plot,
I muſt undoe my ſelfe forſooth: do'it heare me?
If I ſhould beat thee now, as much may be,
Do'ſt thou not well deſerve it, o' thy conſcience,
Do'ſt thou not cry, come beat me?

Mar. I deſie you.
And my laſt loving teares farwell: the firſt ſtroke,
The very firſt you give me if you dare ſtrike,
Try me, and you ſhall finde it ſo, for ever
Never to be recall'd: I know you love me,
Mad till you have enjoy'd me; I doe turne
Utterly from you, and what man I meet firſt
That has but ſpirit to deſerve a favour,
Let him beare any ſhape, the worſe the better,
Shall kill you, and enjoy me; what I have ſaid
About your fooliſh ſickneſſe, e're you have me
As you would have me, you ſhall ſweare, is certaine,
And challenge any man, that dares deny it;
And in all companies approve my actions,
And ſo farwell for this time. Exit Mar.

Petru. Grief goe with thee,
If there be any witchcrafts, herbes, or potions,
Saying my Prayers back-ward, Fiends, or Fayries
That can againe unlove me, I am made. Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Byancha, and Tranio.

Tra. Miſtreſſe, you muſt doe it.

By. Are the writings ready I told you of?

Tra. Yes they are ready, but to what uſe I know not.

By. Y'are an Aſſe, you muſt have all things conſtru'd,

Tra. Yes, and peirc'd too,
Or I finde little pleaſure.

By. Now you are knaviſh,
Goe too, fetch Rowland hither preſently,
Your twenty pound lies bleeding elſe: ſhe is married
Within theſe twelve houres, if we croſſe it not,
And ſee the Papers of one ſize.

Tra. I have ye.

By. And for diſpoſing of 'em.

Tra. If I faile you
Now I have found the way, use Marshall Law
And cut my head off with a hand Saw:
By. Wel sir.
Petronius and Moroso I le see sent for
About your businesse; goe.
Tra. I am gone. Exit Tra.
By. Ho Livia. Enter Livia.
Liv. Who's that?
By. A friend of yours, Lord how you looke now,
As if you had lost a Carrick.
Liv. O Byancha.
I am the most undone, unhappy woman.
By. Be quiet wench, thou shalt be done, and done,
And done, and double done, or all shall split for't,
No more of these minc'd passions, they are mangy,
And ease thee of nothing, but a little wind,
An apple will doe more: thou fear'st Moroso.
Liv. Even as I feare the Gallowes.
By. Keepe thee there still.
And you love Rowland? say.
Liv. If I say not
I am sure I lye.
By. What would'st thou give that woman,
In spight of all his anger, and thy feare,
And all thy Fathers policy, that could
Clap ye within these two nights quietly
Into a Bed together?
Liv. How?
By. Why fairely,
At half sword man and wife: now the red blood comes,
I marry now the matters chang'd.
Liv. Byancha,
Me thinks you should not mock me.
By. Mock a pudding.
I speake good honest English, and good meaning.
Liv. I should not be ungratefull to that woman.
By. I know thou would'st not, follow but my Councell
And if thou hast him not, despight of fortune
Let me nev'r know a good night more; you must Be very sick o'th instant.
Liv. Well, what follows?
By. And in that sicknesse send for all your friends,
Your Father, and your feavor old Moroso,
And Rowland shall be there too.
Liv. What of these?
By. Doe you not twitter yet? of this shall follow
That which shall make thy heart leape, and thy lips
Venture as many kisses, as the Merchants
Doe dollars to the East-Indies: you shall know all,
But first walke in, and practise, pray be sick.
Liv. I doe beleeve you: and I am sick.
By. Doe
To bed then, come, Ile send away your Servants
Post for your Foole, and Father; and good fortune,
As we meane honesty, now strike an up-shot. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Tranio, and Rowland.

Tra. Nay, on my conscience, I have lost my money,
But that's all one: Ile never more perswade you,
I see you are resolute, and I commend you.
Row. But did she send for me?
Tra. You dare beleeve me.
Row. I cannot tell, you have your wales for profit
Allow'd you Tranio, as well as I
Have to avoid 'em feare:
Tra. No, on my word sir
I deale directly with you. Enter Servant.
Row. How now fellow,
Whither Post you so fast?
Serv. O sir my Master
Pray did you see my Master?
Row. Why your Master?
Serv. Sir his Jewell.
Row. With the gilded Button?
Serv. My pretty Mistresse Livia.
Row. What of her?
Serv. Is falne sick o'th suddaine.
Row. How o'th sullens?
Serv. O'th suddaine sir, I say, very sick: apples.
Row. It seemes she hath got the toothach with raw Serv. It seemes you have got the headach, fare you
You did not see my Master? (well sir.
Row. Who told you so?
Tra. No, no, he did not see him.
Row. Farewell blew bottle. Exit Servant.
What should her sicknesse be?
Tra. For you it may be.
Row. Yes when my braines are out, I may beleeve it, Never before I am sure: yet I may see her
'Twill be a point of honesty:
Tra. It will so.
Row. It may be not too; you would faine be fingring
This old sinne-offring of two hundred, Tranio,
How daintily, and cunningly you drive me
Up like a Deere to'th toyle, yet I may leape it,
And what's the woodman then?
Tra. A looser by you.
Speake will you go or not? to me 'tis equall.
Row. Come what goes lesse?
Tra. Nay not a penny Rowland.
Row. Shall I have liberty of conscience
Which by interpretation, is ten kisses?
Hang me if I affect her: yet it may be,
This whorson manners will require a strugling,
Of two and twenty, or by'r-Lady thirty.
Tra. By'r-lady Ile require my wager then,
For if you kisse so often, and no kindnesse,
I have lost my speculation, i'le allow you —
Row. Speake like a Gamster now.
Tra. It may be two.
Row. Under a dozen Tranio ther's no setting,
You shall have forty shillings, winck at small faults.
Say I take twenty, come, by all that's honest
I doe it but to vex her.
Tra. Ile no by-lowes.
If you can love her doe, if you can hate her,
Or any else that loves you.
Row. Prethee Tranio.
Tra. Why farewell twenty pound, twill not undoe me
You have my resolution.
Row. And your money,
Which since you are so stubborne, if I forfeit,
Make me a Jack o' Lent, and breake shins
For untag'd points and Compters: Ile goe with you,
But if thou gett'st a penny by the bargaine;
A parting kisse is lawfull?
Tra. I allow it. (bargaine;
Row. Knock out my braines with Apples; yet a
Tra. I tell you, i'le no bargaines: win, and weare it.
Row. Thou art the strangest fellow.
Tra. That's all one.

Row.

Ram. Along then, twenty pound more if thou dar'st,
I give her not a good word.
Tra. Not a Penny. Exeunt.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Petruchio, Jaques, and Pedro.

Petru. Prethee, entreat her come, I will not trouble her Above a word or two; ere I endure (Exit Pedro.
This life, and with a woman, and a vow'd one
To all the mischiefes she can lay upon me,
Ile goe to Plough again, and eat leeke Porridge;
Begging's a pleasure to't not to be numberd:
No there be other Countries Iaques for me, and other people, yea, and other women.
If I have need, here's money, there's your ware,
Which is faire dealing, and the Sunne, they say
Shines as warme there, as here, and till I have lost Either my selfe, or her, I care not whether Nor which first.
Iaq. Will your worship heare me?
Petru. And utterly outworne the memory
Of such a curse as this, none of my Nation
Shall ever know me more.
Iaq. Out alas sir
What a strange way doe you runne?
Petru. Any way,
So I out-runne this rascall.
Iaq. Me thinkes now,
If your good worship could but have the patience.
Petru. The patience, why the patience?
Iaq. Why i'le tell you,
Could you but have the patience.
Petru. Well the patience.
Iaq. To laugh at all she do's, or when she railes,
To have a drum beaten o'th top o'th house,
To give the neighbours warning of her Larme,
As I doe when my wife rebels.
Petru. Thy wife?
Thy wife's a Pigeon to her a meere slumber,
The dead of night's not stiller.
Iaq. Nor an Iron Mill.
Petru. But thy wife is certaine.
Iaq. That's false Doctrine,
You never read of a certaine woman.
Petru. Thou know'st her way.
Ja. I should doe, I am sure.
I have ridden it night, and day, this twenty yeare.
Petru. But mine is such a drench of Balderdash,
Such a strange carded cunningnesse, the Rayne-bow
When she hangs bent in heaven, sheds not her colours
Quicker and more then this deceitfull woman Enter Weaves in her dyes of wickednesse: what sayes she? Ped.
Ped. Nay not a word sir, but she pointed to me,
As though she meant to follow; pray sir bear it
Ev'n as you may, I need not teach your worship,
The best men have their crosses, we are all mortall.
Petru. What ailes the fellow?
Ped. And no doubt she may sir
Petru. What may she, or what do's she, or what is she?
Speake and be hang'd.
Ped. She's mad Sir.
Petru. Heaven continue it.
Ped. Amen if't be his pleasure
Petru. How mad is she?
Ped. As mad as heart can wish sir: she has dreſt her self (Saving your worships reverence) just i'th cut
Of one of those that multiply i'th Suburbs
For single money, and as durtily:
If any speake to her, first she whistles,
And then begins her compasse with her fingers,
And points to what she would have.
Petru. What new waye's this?
Ped. There came in Master Sophocles,
Petru. And what Did Master Sophocles when he came in?
Get my Truncks ready sirha, i'le be gone straight.
Ped. He's here to tell you Enter Sophocles.
She's horne mad Iaques.
Soph. Call ye this a woman?
Petru. Yes sir, she is a woman,
Soph. Sir, I doubt it.
Petru. I had thought you had make experience,
Soph. Yes I did so.
And almost with my life.
Petru. You rid too fast sir.
Soph. Pray be not mistaken: by this hand
Your wife's as chaste, and honest as a virgin,
For any thing I know: 'tis true she gave me
A Ring.
Petru. For rutting.
Soph. You are much deceiv'd still,
Beleeve me, I never kist her since, and now
Coming in visitation, like a friend,
I thinke she is mad sir, suddainly she started,
And snatch'd the Ring away, and drew her knife out,
To what intent I know not.
Petru. Is this certaine?
Soph. As I am here sir.
Petru. I beleeve you honest. Enter Marit.
And pray continue so.
Soph. She comes.
Petru. Now Damsell,
What will your beauty doe, if I forsake you?
Doe you deale by signes, and tokens? as I ghesse then,
You'l walke abroad, this Sommer, and catch Captainies,
Or hire a peece of holy ground i'th Suburbs,
And keepe a neast of Nuns?
Soph. O doe not stir her!
You see in what a case she is?
Petru. She is dogged,
And in a beastly case I am sure: Ile make her
If she have any tongue, yet tatle Sophocles
Prethee observe this woman seriously,
And eye her well, and when thou hast done, but tell me
(For thou hast understanding) in what case
My sence was, when I chose this thing.
Soph. Ile tell you
I have seene a sweeter——
Petru. An hundred times cry oysters.
Ther's a poore Begger wench about Black-Fryers
Runs on her breech may be an Empresse to her.
Soph. Nay, now you are too bitter.
Petru. Nev'r a whit sir:
Ile tell thee woman; for now I have day to see thee,
And all my wits about me, and I speake
Not out of passion neither (leave your mumping),
I know you're well enough: Now would I give
A million but to vex her: when I chose thee
To make a Bedfellow, I tooke more trouble,
Then twenty Termes can come too, such a cause,
Of such a title, and so everlasting
That Adams Genealogie may be ended
Ere any law find thee: I tooke a Leprosie, Nay worse, the plague, nay worse yet, a possession
and

And had the devill with thee, if not more:
And yet worse, was a beast, and like a beast
Had my reward, a Jade to fling my fortunes;
For who that had but reason to distinguish
The light from darkenesse, wine from water, hunger
From full saciety, and Fox from ferne bush
That would have married thee?
Soph. She is not so ill.
Petru. She's worse then I dare think of: she's so lewd,
No Court is strong enough to bear her cause,
She hath neither manners, honesty, behaviour,
Wife-hood, nor woman-hood, nor any morall
Can force me think she had a mother, no
I do believe her stedfastly, and know her
To be a woman-Woolfe by transmigration,
Her first forme was a Ferrets undergrounde,
She kils the memories of men: not yet?
Soph. Do you think she's sensible of this?
Petru. I care not,
Be what she will: the pleasure I take in her,
Thus I blow off; the care I took to love her,
Like this point I untye, and thus I loose it,
The husband I am to her, thus I sever:
My vanity farwell: yet, for you have bin
So neer me as to bear the name of wife,
My unquench'd charity shall tell you thus much (Though you deserve it well) you shall not beg,
What I ordain'd your Jointure, honestly
You shall have setled on you: and half my house,
The other half shall be imploy'd in prayers,
(That meritorious charge Ile be at also Yet to confirm you christian) your apparrell,
And what belongs to build up such a folly,
Keep I beseech you, it infects our uses,
And now I am for travell.
Mar. Now I love you,
And now I see you are a man ile talke to you,
And I forget your bitternesse,
Soph. How now man?
Petru. O Pliny, if thou wilt be ever famous
Make but this woman all thy wonders.
Mar. Sure sir
You have hit upon a happy course, a blessed,
And what will make you vertuous?
Petru. She'l ship me.
Mar. A way of understanding I long wisht for,
And now tis come, take heed you fly not back sir,
Me thinks you look a new man to me now,
A man of excellence, and now I see
Some great design set in you: you may think now
(And so may most that know me) 'twere my part
Weakly to weep your losse, and to resist you,
Nay hang about your neck and like a dotard
Urge my strong tie upon you: but I love you,
And all the world shall know it, beyond woman,
And more prefer the honour of your Country,
Which chiefly you are born for, and may perfect,
The uses you may make of other Nations,
The ripening of your knowledge, conversation,
The full ability, and strength of judgement,
Then any private love, or wanton kisses.
Go worthy man, and bring home understanding. (men.
Soph. This were an excellent woman to breed School-
Mar. For if the Merchant through unknown Seas
To get his wealth, then deer sir, what must you (plough
To gather wisdom? go, and go alone,
Only your noble mind for your companion,
And if a woman may win credit with you,
Go far: too far you cannot: still the farther
The more experience finds you: and go sparing,
One meale a week will serve you, and one suite,
Through all your travels: for you'l find it certaine,
The poorer and the baser you appear,
The more you look through still.
Petru. Do'st hear her?
Soph. Yes.
Petru. What would this woman do if she were suffer'd,
Upon a new adventure?
Soph. Make us nothing,
I wonder that she writes not.
Mar. Then when time,
And fulnesse of occasion have new made you,
And squard you from a sot into a Signour,
Or neerer from a lade into a courser;
Come home an aged man, as did Ulysses,
And I your glad Penelope.
Petru. That must have
As many lovers as I languages,
And what she do's with one i'th day, i'th night
Undoe it with an other.
Mar. Much that way sir;
For in your absence, it must be my honour,
That, that must make me spoken of hereafter,
To have temptations, and not little ones
Daily and hourely offerd me, and strongly,
Almost believed against me, to set off
The faith, and loyalty of her that loves you Petru. What should I do?
Soph. Why by my——I would travell,
Did not you mean so?
Petru. Alas no, nothing lesse man:
I did it but to try sir, shee's the devill,
And now I find it, for she drives me, I must go:
Are my trunks down there, and my horses ready?
Mir. Sir, for your house, and if you please to trust me
With that you leave behinde.
Petru. Bring down the money.
Mar. As I am able, and to my poor fortunes,
I'le govern as a widow: I shall long
To hear of your wel-doing, and your profit:
And when I hear not from you once a quarter,
I'le wish you in the Indies, or Cataya,
Those are the climes must make you.
Petru. How's the wind?
She'l wish me out o'th world anon.
Mar. For France.
Tis very faire; get you aboard to night sir,
And loose no time, you know the tide staies no man,
I have cold meats ready for you.
Petru. Far thee well,
Thou ha'st foold me o'th Kingdom with a vengeance,
And thou canst foole me in againe.
Mir. Not I sir,
I love you better, take your time, and pleasure,
Ile see you horsd.
Petru. I think thou wouldst see me hangd too,
Were I but halfe as willing.
Mar. Any thing
That you think well of, I dare look upon.
Petru. You'l bear me to the lands end Sopbocles,
And other of my friends I hope.
Mar. Nev'r doubt sir,
You cannot want companions for your good:
I am sure you'l kisse me ere I go; I have businesse,
And stay long here I must not.
Petru. Get thee going.

Fro

For if thou tarriest but an other Dialogue
Ile kick thee to thy Chamber.
Mar. Far you well Sir,
And bear your selfe, I do beseech you once more,
Since you have undertaken doing wisely,
Manly, and worthily, tis for my credit,
And for those flying fames here of your follies,
Your gambols, and ill breeding of your youth,
For which I understand you take this travell,
Nothing should make me leave you els, ile deale
So like a wife, that loves your reputation,
And the most large addition of your credit,
That those shall die: if you want Limon-waters,
Or any thing to take the edge o'th Sea off,
Pray speak, and be provided.
Petru. Now the Devill,
That was your first good master, shoure his blessing
Upon ye all: into whose custody——
Mar. I do commit your Reformation,
And so I leave you to your Stilo novo. Exit Maria Petru. I will go: yet I will not: once more Sophocles
Ile put her to the test.
Soph. You had better go.
Petru. I will go then: let's seek my father out,
And all my friends to see me faire aboard:
Then women, if there be a storme at Sea,
Worse then your tongues can make, and waves more
Then your dissembling sayths are, let me feele (broken
Nothing but tempests, till they cracke my Keele.
Exeunt

Actus Quintus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Petronius, and Byancha with foure papers.

By. Now whether I deserve that blame you gave me,
Let all the world discern sir.
Petron. If this motion,
(I mean this fair repentance of my Daughter)
Spring from your good perswasion, as it seems so,
I must confesse I have spoke too boldly of you,
And I repent.
By. The first touch was her own,
Taken no doubt from disobeying you,
The second I put to her, when I told her
How good, and gentle yet, with free contrition
Again you might be purchas'd: loving woman,
She heard me, and I thank her, thought me worthy
Observing in this point: yet all my councell,
And comfort in this case, could not so heal her
But that grief got his share too, and she sickend.
Petron. I am sorry she's so ill, yet glad her sicknesse Ha's got so good a ground. Enter Moroso.
By. Here comes Moroso.
Petron. O you are very welcome,
Now you shall know your happinesse.
Mor. I am glad on't.
What makes this Lady here?
By. A dish for you sir
You'l thank me for hereafter.
Petron. True Moroso,
Go get you in, and see your Mistris.
By. She is sick sir,
But you may kisse her whole.
Mor. How.
By. Comfort her.
Mor. VVhy am I sent for sir?
Petron. Will you in, and see?
By. May be she needs confession.
Mor. By St. Mary,
She shall have absolution then and pennance,
But not above her carriage.
Petron. Get you in foole. Exit Mor.
By. Here comes the other too. Enter Rowland and Tranio.
Petron. Now Tranio.
Good ev'n to you too, and you are welcome.
Row. Thank you.
Petron. I have a certaine Daughter.
Row. Would you had sir.
Petron. No doubt you know her well.
Row. Nor never shall sir.
She is a woman, and the waies unto her
Are like the finding of a certaine path
After a deep falne Snow.
Petron. Well thats by'th by still.
This Daughter that I tell you of is falne
A little crop sick, with the dangerous surfeit
She took of your affection.
Row. Mine sir?
Petron. Yes sir.
Or rather, as it seemes, repenting.
And there she lies within, debating on't,
Row. Well sir.
Petron. I think 'twere well you would see her.
Row. If you please sir;
I am not squeamish of my visitation.
Petron. But, this ile tell you, she is alter'd much,
You'l finde her now an other Livia.
Row. I have enough o'th old sir.
Petron. No more foole,
To look gay babies in your eyes yong Rowland,
And hang about your prety neck.
Row. I am glad on't,
And thank my Fates I have scapd such execution,
Petron. And busse you till you blush againe.
Row. Thats hard sir,
She must kisse shamefully ere I blush at it;
I never was so boyish; well, what followes?
Petron. She's mine now, as I please to settle her,
At my command, and where I please to plant her:
Only she would take a kind of farwell of you,
And give you back a wandring vow or two,
You left in pawn; and two or three slight oaths
She lent you too, she looks for.
Row. She shall have 'em
With all my heart sir, and if you like it better,
A free release in writing.
Petron. Thats the matter;
And you from her, you shall have an other Rowland,
And then turne taile to taile, and peace by with you.
Row. So be it: your twenty pound sweats Tranio.
Tra. 'Twill not undoe me Rowland, do your worst.
Row. Come, shall we see her Sir?
By. What ere she saies
You must beare manly Rowland, for her sicknesse
Has made her somewhat teatish.
Row. Let her talke
Till her tongue ake I care not: by this hand
Thou hast a handsome face wench, and a body
Daintely mounted; now do I feele an hundred Runing directly from me, as I pist it.
Enter Livia discovered abed, and Moroso by her.
By. pray draw 'em softly, the least hurry sir

Puts

Puts her to much impatience.
Petron. How is't daughter?
Liv. O very ſick, very ſick, yet ſomewhat
Better I hope; a little lightſommer,
Becauſe this goodman has forgiven me;
Pray ſet me higher; Oh my head:
Bya. Wel done wench.
Liv. Father, and all good people that ſhal heare me,
I have abus'd this man perniciouſly; was never old man humbled ſo;
I have ſcornd him, and cal'd him naſty names,
I have ſpit at him,
Flung Candles ends in's beard, and cald him harrow,
That muſt be drawn to all he dos: contemn'd him,
For me thought then he was a beaſtly fellow.
(Oh God my ſide) a very beaſtly fellow:
And gave it out, his caſſock was a Barge-cloth,
Pawnd to his predeceſſor by a Sculler,
The man yet living: I gave him purging-comfits
At a great chriſtning once,
That ſpoyl'd his Chamblet breeches; and one night
I ſtrewd the ſtaires with peaſe, as he paſt down;
And the good Gentleman (woe worth me for't)
Ev'n with his reverent head, this head of wiſdome,
Told two and twenty ſtaires, good and true;
Miſt not a ſtep, and as we ſay verbatim
Fell to the bottome, broke his caſting Bottle,
Loſt a fair toad-ſtone of ſome eighteen ſhillings,
Jumbled his joynts together, had two ſtooles,
And was tranſlated. All this villany
Did I: I Livia, I alone, untaught.
Mor. And I unask'd, forgive it.
Liv. Where's Byancha?
Bya. Here Cozen.
Liv. Give me drinke,
Bya. There.
Liv. Who's that?
Mor. Rowland.
Liv. O my diſſembler, you and I muſt part.
Come neerer ſir.
Row. I am ſorry for your ſickneſſe.
Liv. Be ſorry for your ſelfe ſir, you have wrong'd me,
But I forgive you; are the papers ready?
Bya I have 'em here: wilt pleaſe you view 'em?
Petron. Yes.
Liv. Shew 'em the young man too, I know he's willing
To ſhift his ſailes too: tis for his more advancement;
Alas, we might have beggerd one another;
We are young both, and a world of children
Might have been left behind to curſe our follies:
We had been undone Byancha, had we married,
Undone for ever: I confeſſe I lov'd him,
I care not who ſhall know it, moſt intirely;
And once, upon my conſcience, he lov'd me;
But farewell that, we muſt be wiſer coſen.
Love muſt not leave us to the world: have you done?
Row. Yes, and am ready to ſubſcribe.
Liv. Pray ſtay then:
Give me the papers, and let me peruſe 'em,
And ſo much time, as may afford a teare
At our laſt parting.
Bya. Pray retire, and leave her,
Ile call ye preſently.
Petro. Come Gentlemen, the ſhowre muſt fall.
Row. Would I had never ſeen her.
Bya. Thou haſt done bravely wench.
Liv. Pray Heaven it prove ſo.
Bya. There are the other papers: when they come
Begin you firſt, and let the reſt ſubſcribe
Hard by your ſide; give 'em as little light
As Drapers doe their wares.
Liv Didſt mark Moroſo,
In what an agony he was, and how he cry'd moſt
When I abus'd him moſt?
Bya. That was but reaſon.
Liv. Oh what a ſtinking thief is this?
Though I was but to counterfeit, he made me
Directly ſick indeed. Tames-ſtreet to him
Is a meere Pomander.
Bya. Let him be hang'd.
Liv. Amen.
Bya. And lie you ſtill.
And once more to your buſineſſe.
Liv. Call 'em in.
Now if there be a power that pities lovers,
Helpe now, and heare my prayers.
Enter Petronius, Rowland, Tranio, Moroſo.
Petro. Is ſhe ready?
Bya. She has done her lamentations: pray go to her.
Liv. Rowland, come neer me, and before you ſeale,
Give me your hand: take it again; now kiſſe me,
This is the laſt acquaintance we muſt have;
I wiſh you ever happy: there's the paper.
Row. Pray ſtay a little.
Petro. Let me never live more
But I do begin to pity this young fellow;
How heartily he weeps!
Bya. There's Pen and Inke ſir.
Liv. Ev'n here I pray you. Tis a little Emblem
How neere you have been to me.
Row. There.
Bya. Your hands too,
As witneſſes.
Petro. By any means
To th' booke ſonne.
Mor. With all my heart.
Bya. You muſt deliver it.
Row. There Livia, and a better love light on thee,
I can no more.
Bya. To this you muſt be witneſſe too.
Petro. We wil.
Bya. Doe you deliver it now.
Liv. Pray ſet me up;
There Rowland, all thy old love back: and may
A new to come exceed mine, and be happy.
I muſt no more.
Row. Farewell:
Liv. A long farewell. Exit Rowl.
Bya. Leave her by any means, till this wild paſſion
Be off her head; draw all the Curtaines cloſe,
A day hence you may ſee her, twil be better,
She is now for little company.
Petro. Pray tend her.
I muſt to horſe ſtraight: you muſt needs along too,
To ſee my ſonne aboard; were but his wife
As fit for pity, as this wench, I were happy.
Bya. Time muſt do that too: fare ye wel; to morrow
You ſhall receive a wife to quit your ſorrow. Exeunt.

Scæna ſecunda.

Enter Jaques, Pedro, and Porters, with Cheſt and Hampers.

Jaq. Bring 'em away ſirs.
Ped. Muſt the great Trunks go too?

Jaq.

Jaq. Yes, and the Hampers; nay be speedy Masters;
He'l be at Sea before us else.
Ped. O Jaques,
What a most blessed turn hast thou?
Jaq. I hope so.
Ped. To have the Sea between thee and this woman,
Nothing can drown her tongue, but a storm.
Jaq. By your leave,
We'l get us up to Paris with all speed;
For on my soule, as far as Anjeers
She'l carry blanke; away to Lyon key
And ship 'em presently, we'l follow ye.
Ped. Now could I wish her in that Trunk:
Jaq God shield man,
I had rather have a Beare in't.
Ped. Yes, Ile tell ye:
For in the passage if a Tempest take ye,
As many doe, and you lie beating for it,
Then, if it pleas'd the fates, I would have the Master
Out of a powerfull providence, to cry,
Lighten the ship of all hands, or we perish;
Then this for one, as best spar'd, should by all means
Over-board presently.
Jaq. O' that condition,
So we were certaine to be rid of her,
I would wish her with us: But believe me Pedro,
She would spoyle the fishing on this coast for ever,
For none would keepe her company, but Dog-fish,
As currish as her selfe; or Porpices,
Made to all fatall uses: The two Fish-streets
Were she but once ariv'd amongst the Whitings,
Would sing a wofull miserere Pedro;
And mourn in poor John, till her memory
Were cast o' shore agen, with a strong Sea-breach:
She would make god Neptune, and his fire-forke,
And all his demi-gods, and goddesses,
As weary of the Flemmish channell Pedro,
As ever boy was of the schoole: tis cream,
If she but meet him faire, and were wel angred,
She would break his god-head.
Ped. Oh her tongue, her tongue.
Jaq. Rather her many tongues.
Ped. Or rather strange tongues.
Jaq. Her lying tongue.
Ped. Her lisping tongue.
Jaq. Her long tongue.
Ped. Her lawsselle tongue.
Jaq. Her loud tongue.
Ped. And her lickrish —
Jaq. Many other tongues, and many stranger tonghes
Then ever Babel had to tell his ruines,
Were women rais'd withall; but never a true one.

Enter Sophocles.

Soph. Home with your stuffe agen; the journeys ended.
Jaq. What do's your worship meane?
Soph. Your Master, O Petruchio, O poore fellows.
Ped. O Jaques, Jaques.
Soph. O your Master's dead,
His body comming back; his wife, his devil,
The griefe of — her
Jaq. Has kild him?
Soph. Kild him, kild him.
Ped. Is there no law to hang her.
Soph. Get ye in,
And let her know her misery, I dare not
For feare impatience seize me, see her more,
I must away agen: Bid her for wife-hood,
For honesty, if she have any in her,
Even to avoyd the shame that follows her.
Cry if she can: your weeping cannot mend it.
The body wil be here within this houre, so tell her;
And all his friends to curse her. Farewell fellowes.
Exit Soph.
Ped. O Jaques, Jaques.
Jaq. O my worthy Master.
Ped. O my most beastly Mistris, hang her.
Jaq. Split her.
Ped. Drown her directly.
Jaq. Starve her.
Ped. Stinke upon her.
Jaq. Stone her to death: may all she eate be Eggs,
Till she run kicking mad for men.
Ped. And he,
That man, that gives her remedy, pray Heav'n
He may ev'n ipso facto, lose his longings. her,
Jaq. Let's goe discharge our selves, and he that serves
Or speaks a good word of her from this houre,
A scaldy curse light on him, which is, Pedro;
The feind ride through him booted, and spurd, with a Sythe at's back. Exeunt.

Scena tertia.

Enter Rowland, and Tranio stealing behind him.

Row. What a dull asse was I to let her go thus?
Upon my life she loves me still: wel Paper,
Thou onely monument of what I have had,
Thou all the love now left me, and now lost,
Let me yet kisse her hand, yet take my leave
Of what I must leave ever: Farewell Livia.
Oh bitter words, Ile read ye once again,
And then for ever study to forget ye.
How's this? let me look better on't: A Contract?
—— a Contract, seal'd, and ratified,
Her fathers hand set to it, and Morisso's.
I do not dream sure, let me read again,
The same still: tis a contract.
Tra. Tis so Rowland;
And by the vertue of the same, you pay me
An hundred pound to morrow.
Row. Art sure Tranio,
We are both alive now?
Tra. Wonder not, ye have lost.
Row. If this be true, I grant it.
Tra. Tis most certaine,
There's a Ring for you to, you know it.
Row. Yes.
Tra. When shall I have my money?
Row. Stay ye, stay ye,
When shall I marry her?
Tra. To night.
Row. Take heed now
You do not trifle me; if you doe,
You'l finde more payment, then your money comes to:
Come sweare; I know I am a man, and finde
I may deceive my selfe: Sweare faithfully,
Sweare me directly, am I Rowland?
Tra. Yes.
Row. Am I awake?
Tra. Ye are.
Row. Am I in health?
Tra. As far as I conceive.
Row. Was I with Livia?
Tra. You were, and had his contract.
Row. And shall I enjoy her?

Tra. Yes, if ye dare.
Row. Sweare to all these.
Tra. I will.
Row. As thou art honest, as thou hast a conscience,
As that may wring thee if thou lyest; all these
To be no vision, but a truth, and serious.
Tra. Then by my honesty, and faith, and conscience;
All this is certaine.
Row. Let's remove our places.
Sweare it again.
Tra. By——tis true.
Row. I have lost then, and Heaven knows I am glad ont.
Let's goe, and tell me all, and tell me how,
For yet I am a Pagan in it.
Tra. I have a Priest too,
And all shall come as even as two Testers. Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Petronius, Sophocles, Maroso, and Petruchio born in a Coffin.

Petron. Set down the body, and one call her out.

Enter Maria in blacke, and Jaques.

You are welcome to the last cast of your fortunes;
There lies your husband, there your loving husband,
There he that was Petruchio, too good for ye;
Your stubborn, and unworthy way has kild him
Ere he could reach the Sea; if ye can weep,
Now ye have cause begin, and after death
Do something yet to th'world, to thinke ye honest.
So many teares had sav'd him, shed in time;
And as they are (so a good mind goe with 'em)
Yet they may move compassion.
Mar. Pray ye all heare me,
And judge me as I am, not as you covet,
For that would make me ye more miserable:
Tis true, I have cause to grieve, and mighty cause;
And truely and unfainedly I weep it.
Soph. I see there's some good nature yet left in her.
Mar. But what's the cause? mistake me not, not this man,
As he is dead, I weep for; Heaven defend it,
I never was so childish: but his life,
His poore unmanly wretched foolish life,
Is that my full eyes pity, there's my mourning.
Petron. Dost thou not shame?
Mar. I do, and even to water,
To think what this man was, to think how simple,
How far below a man, how far from reason,
From common understanding, and all Gentry,
While he was living here he walkt amongst us.
He had a happy turn he dyed; ile tell ye,
These are the wants I weep for, not his person:
The memory of this man, had he liv'd
But two yeers longer, had begot more follies,
Then wealthy Autumne flyes: But let him rest,
He was a foole, and farewell he; not pitied,
I meane in way of life, or action
By any understanding man that's honest;
But onely in's posterity, which I
Out of the feare his ruines might out live him
In some bad issue, like a carefull woman,
Like one indeed born onely to preserve him,
Denyd him meanes to raise.
Petru. Unbutton me,
——I die indeed else? O Maria,
Oh my unhappinesse, my misery.
Petron. Go to him whore;——if he perish,
Ile see thee hang'd my selfe.
Petru. Why, why Maria. (give me;
Mar. I have done my worst, and have my end, for-
From this houre make me what you please: I have tam'd
And now am vowd your servant: Look not strangly, (ye,
Nor feare what I say to you. Dare you kisse me?
Thus I begin my new love.
Petru. Once againe?
Mar. With all my heart.
Petru Once again Maria!
O Gentlemen, I know not where I am.
Soph. Get ye to bed then: there you'l quickly know sir.
Petru. Never no more your old tricks?
Mar. Never sir.
Petru. You shall not need, for as I have a faith
No cause shall give occasion.
Mar. As I am honest,
And as I am a maid yet, all my life
From this houre since, since ye make so free profession,
I dedicate in service to your pleasure.
Soph. I marry, this goes roundly off.
Petru. Go Jaques,
Get all the best meat may be bought for money,
And let the hogsheds blood, I am born again:
Well little England, when I see a husband
Of any other Nation stern or jealous,
Ile wish him but a woman of thy breeding,
And if he have not butter to thy bread,
Till thy teeth bleed, ile never trust my travell.

Enter Rowland, Livia, Byancha, and Tranio.

Petro. What have we here?
Row. Another morris, sir.
That you must pipe too.
Tra. A poore married couple
Desire an offering sir.
Bya. Never frown at it,
You cannot mend it now: there's your own hand;
And yours Maroso, to confirme the bargaine.
Petron. My hand?
Mar. Or mine?
Bya. You'l finde it so.
Petron. A trick,
By—— a trick.
Bya. Yes sir, we trickt ye.
Liv. Father.
Petro. Hast thou lyen with him? speake?
Liv. Yes truly sir.
Petro. And hast thou done the deed boy?
Row. I have done sir,
That, that will serve the turne, I think.
Petru. A match then,
Ile be the maker up of this: Maroso,
There's now no remedy you see, be willing;
For be, or be not, he must have the wench.
Mar. Since I am over-reach'd, let's in to dinner,
And if I can Ile drink't away.
Tra. That's wel said.
Petro. Well sirha, you have playd a tricke, look to't,
And let me be a grandsire within's twelvemoneth,
Or by this hand, Ile curtaile halfe your fortunes.
Row. There shall not want my labour sir: your money;
Here's one has undertaken.
Tra. Well, Ile trust her,
And glad I have so good a pawn.
Row. Ile watch ye.
Petru. Lets in, and drink of all hands, and be joviall:
I have my colt again, and now she carries;
And Gentlemen, whoever marries next,
Let him be sure he keep him to his Text. Exeunt.

PROLOGUE

PROLOGUE.

Ladies to you, in whose defence and right,
Fletchers brave Muse prepar'd her self to fight
A battaile without blood, 'twas well fought too,
(The victory's yourt, though got with much ado.)
We do present this Comedy, in which
A rivulet of pure wit flowes, strong and rich
In Fancy, Language, and all parts that may Adde grace and ornament to a merry Play.
Which this may prove. Yet not to go too far
In promises from this our female war,
We do intreat the angry men would not Expect the mazes of a subtle plot,
Set Speeches, high expressions; and what's worse,
in a true Comedy, politique discourse.
The end we ayme at, is to make you sport;
Yet neither gall the City, nor the Court.
Heare, and observe his Comique straine and when T'are sick of melancholy, see't agen.
'Tis no deere Physick, since 'twill quit the cost:
Or his intentions, with our pains, are lost.

EPILOGUE.

THe Tamer's tam'd, but so, as nor the men
Can finde one just cause to complaine of, when
They fitly do consider in their lives,
They should not raign as Tyrants o'r their wives.
Nor can the women from this president
Insult, or triumph: it being aptly meant,
To teach both Sexes due equality;
And as they stand bound, to love mutually.
If this effect, arising from a cause
Well layd, and grounded, may deserve applause,
We something more then hope, our honest ends
Will keep the men, and women too, our friends.

LOVES CURE OR,
The Martial Maid.

Actus Primus——Scæna Prima.

Enter Vitelli, Lamvall, Anastro.

Vitelli.

LUcaresa pardon'd?

Ana. And return'd,

Lamv. I saw him land
At St. Lucars, and such a generall welcome
Fame, as harbinger to his brave actions,
Had with the cathe people, prepard for him,
As if by his command alone, and fortune
Holland with those low Provinces, that hold out Against the Arch-Duke, were again compel'd
With their obedience to give up their lives
To be at his devotion.

Vit. You amaze me,
For though I have heard, that when he fled from Civill
To save his life (then forfeited to Law
For murthering Don Pedro my deer Uncle)
His extreame wants inforc'd him to take pay
In th'Army sat down then before Ostena,
'Twas never yet reported, by whose favour
He durst presume to entertain a thought
Of coming home with pardon.

Ana. 'Tis our nature,
Or not to hear, or not to give beliefe
To what we wish far from our enemies.

Lam. Sir 'tis most certaine the Infantas letters Assisted by the Arch-Dukes, to King Philip
Have not alone secur'd him from the rigor
Of our Castillian Justice, but return'd him
A free man, and in grace.

Vit. By what curs'd meanes
Could such a fugitive arise unto
The knowledge of their highnesses? much more (Though known) to stand but in the least degree
Of favour with them?

Lam. To give satisfaction
To your demand, though to praise him I hate,
Can yeild me small contentment, I will tell you,
And truly, since should I detract his worth,
'Twould argue want of merit in my self.
Briefly, to passe his tedious pilgrimage
For sixteene years, a banish'd guilty-man,
And to forget the stormes, th'affrights, the horrors
His constancy, not fortune overcame,
I bring him, with his little son, grown man
(Though 'twas said here he took a daughter with him)
To Ostends bloody seige that stage of war
Wherein the flower of many Nations acted,
And the whole Christian world spectators were
There by his son, or were he by adoption
Or nature his, a brave Scene was presented,
Which I make choyce to speak of, since from that
The good successe of Alvarez had beginning.

Vil. So I love vertue in an enemy
That I desire in the relation of This young mans glorious deed, you'ld keep your self
A friend to truth, and it.

Lam Such was my purpose;
The Town being o'r assaulted, but in vaine,
To dare the prow'd defendants to a sally,
Weary of ease, Don Iniga Peralta
Son to the Generall of our Castile forces
All arm'd, advanc'd within shot of their wals,
From whence the musketeers plaid thick upon him,
Yet he (brave youth) as careless of the danger,
As carefull of his honor, drew his sword,
And waving it about his head, as if
He dar'd one spirited like himself, to triall
Of single valor, he made his retreat
With such a slow, and yet majestique pace,
As if he still cald low'd, dare none come on?
When sodainly from a posterne of the town
Two gallant horse-men issued, and o'r-took him,
The army looking on, yet not a man
That durst relieve the rash adventurer,
Which Lewis, son to Alvarez then seeing,
As in the vant-guard he sat bravely mounted,
Or were it pity of the youths misfortune,
Care to preserve the honour of his Country,
Or bold desire to get himselfe a name,
He made his brave horse, like a whirle wind bear him,
Among the Combatants: and in a moment
Discharg'd his Petronell, with such sure aime
That of the adverse party from his horse,
One tumbled dead, then wheeling round, and drawing
A faulchion swift as lightning, he came on

Upon

Upon the other, and with one ſtrong blow
In view of the amazed Town, and Campe
He ſtrake him dead, and brought Peralta off
With double honour to himſelfe.
Vit. 'Twas brave:
But the ſucceſſe of this?
Lam. The Campe receiv'd him
With acclamations of joy and welcome,
And for addition to the faire reward
Being a maſſy chain of guld given to him
By yong Peralta's Father, he was brought To the Infantas preſence, kiſs'd her hand,
And from that Lady, (greater in her goodneſſe
Then her high birth) had this encouragement
Go on youngman; yet not to feed thy valour
With hope of recompence to come, from me,
For preſent ſatisfaction of what's paſt,
Aske any thing that's fit for me to give,
And thee to take, and be aſſur'd of it.
Ana. Excellent princeſſe.
Vit. And ſtil'd worthily
The heart bloud, nay the ſoule of Souldiers.
But what was his requeſt?
Lam. That the repeale
Of Alvarez, makes plaine: he humbly begd
His Fathers pardon, and ſo movingly
Told the ſad ſtory of your uncles death
That the Infanta wept, and inſtantly
Granting his ſuit, working the Arch-duke to it,
Their Letters were directed to the King,
With whom they ſo prevaild, that Alvarez
Was freely pardon'd.
Vit. 'Tis not in the King
To make that good.
Ana. Not in the King? what ſubject
Dares contradict his power?
Vit. In this I dare,
And wil: and not call his prerogative
In queſtion, nor preſume to limit it.
I know he is the Maſter of his Lawes,
And may forgive the forfeits made to them,
But not the injury done to my honour;
And ſince (forgeting my brave Uncles merits
And many ſervices, under Duke D' Alva)
He ſuffers him to fall, wreſting from Juſtice
The powerfull ſword, that would revenge his death,
I'le fill with this Aſtrea's empty hand,
And in my juſt wreake, make this arme the Kings,
My deadly hate to Alvarz, and his houſe,
Which as I grew in years, hath ſtill encreas'd,
As if it cal'd on time to make me man,
Slept while it had no object for her fury
But a weak woman, and her talk'd of Daughter:
But now, ſince there are quarries, worth her ſight
Both in the father, and his hopefull ſon,
I'le boldly caſt her off, and gorge her full (ſhip,
With both their hearts: to further which your friend-
And oathes will your aſſiſtance, let your deedes
Make anſwer to me; uſeleſſe are all words
Till you have writ performance with your Swords.
Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Bobadilla, and Lucio

Luc. Go fetch my work: this ruffe was not well ſtarch'd,
So tell the maid, 'thas too much blew in it,
And look you that the Partrich and the Pullen
Have cleane meat, and freſh water, or my Mother
Is like to hear on't.
Bob. O good Sir Iaques helpe me: was there ever ſuch an Hermaphrodite heard of? would any wench living, that ſhould hear and ſee what I do, be wrought to believe, that the beſt of a man lies under this Petticoate, and that a Cod-peece were far fitter here, then a pind-Placket?
Luc. You had beſt talk filthily: do; I have a tongue
To tell my Mother, as well as ears to heare
Your ribaldry.
Bob. May you have ten womens tongues that way I am ſure: why my yong Mr. or Miſtris, Madam, Don or what you wil, what the devill have you to do with Pullen, or Partrich? or to ſit pricking on a clowt all day? you have a better needle, I know, and might make better work, if you had grace to uſe it.
Luc. Why, how dare you ſpeak this before me, ſirha?
Bob. Nay rather, why dare not you do what I ſpeak? — though my Lady your mother, for fear of Vitelli and his faction, hath brought you up like her daughter, and h'as kept you this 20 year, which is ever ſince you were born, a cloſe priſoner within dores, yet ſince you are a man, and are as wel provided as other men are, methinks you ſhould have the ſame motions of the fleſh, as other Cavaliers of us are inclin'd unto.
Luc. Indeed you have cauſe to love thoſe wanton mo-
They having hope you to an excellent whipping, (tions,
For doing ſomething, I but put you in mind of it,
With the Indian mayd, the governour ſent my mother
From Mexico.
Bob. Why, I but taught her a Spaniſh trick in charity, and holp the King to a ſubject that may live to take grave Maurice priſoner, and that was more good to the State, then a thouſand ſuch as you are ever like to do: and I wil tell you, (in a fatherly care of the Infant I ſpeak it) if he live (as bleſſe the babe, in paſſion I remember him) to your years, ſhall he ſpend his time in pinning, painting, purling, and perfuming as you do? no, he ſhall to the wars, uſe his Spaniſh Pike, though with the danger of the laſh, as his father has done, and when he is provoked, as I am now, draw his Toledo deſperately, as —
Luc. You will not Kill me? oh.
Bob. I knew this would ſilence him: how he hids his eys? If he were a wench now, as he ſeems, what an advantage Had I, drawing two Toledos, when one can do this? But oh me, my Lady: I muſt put up: young Maſter I did but jeſt: O cuſtom, what ha'ſt thou made of him?

Enter Eugenia, and Servants.

Eug. For bringing this, be ſtill my friend; no more
A ſervant to me.
Bob. What's the matter?
Eug. Here,
Even here where I am happy to receive
Aſſurance of my Alvarez returne,
I wil kneell down: and may thoſe holy thoughts
That now poſſeſſe me wholy, make this place a Temple to me, where I may give thanks
For this unhop'd for bleſſing Heavens Kind hand
Hath pour'd upon me.
Luc. Let my duty Madam
Preſume, if you have cauſe of joy, to entreat
I may ſhare in it.
Bob. 'Tis well, he has forgot how I frighted him yet.
Eug. Thou ſhalt: but firſt kneel with me Lucio,
No more Poſthumus now, thou haſt a Father,

A Father living to take off that name,
Which my too credulous feare, that he was dead,
Bestow'd upon thee: thou shalt see him Lucio,
And make him young again, by seeing thee,
Who only hadst a being in my Womb
When he went from me, Lucio: O my joyes,
So far transport me, that I must forget
The ornaments of Matrons, modesty,
And grave behaviour; but let all forgive me
If in th'expression of my soules best comfort
Though old, I do a while forget mine age,
And play the wanton in the entertinement
Of those delights I have so long despair'd of.

Luc. Shall I then see my Father?

Eug. This houre Lucio;
Which reckon the begining of thy life
I mean that life, in which thou shalt appeare
To be such as I brought thee forth: a man,
This womanish disguise, in which I have
So long conceal'd thee, thou shalt now cast off,
And change those qualities thou didst learn from me,
For masculine virtues, for which seek no tutor,
But let thy fathers actions be thy precepts;
And for thee Zembo, now expect reward
For thy true service.

Bob. Shall I? you hear fellow Stephano, learne to know me more respectively; how do'st thou think I shall become the Stewards chaire ha? will not these slender hanches show well with a chaine, and a gold night-Cap after supper when I take the accompes?

Eug. Haste, and take down those blacks, with which my Hath like the widow, her sad Mistris, mourn'd, (chamber
And hang up for it, the rich Persian arras,
Us'd on my wedding night: for this to me
Shall be a second marriage: send for Musique,
And will the cooks to use their best of cunning
To please the palat.

Bob. Will your Ladiship have a Potato-pie, tis a good stirring dish for an old Lady, after a long Lent.

Eug. Be gon I say: why sir, you can go faster?

Bob. I could Madam: but I am now to practise the Stewards pace, that's the reward I look for: every man must fashion his gate, according to his calling: you fellow Stephano, may walk faster, to overtake preferment: so, usher me.

Luc. Pray Madam, let the waistcoat I last wrought
Be made up for my Father: I wil have
A cap and boote-hose sutable to it.

Eug. Of that
Wee'l think hereafter Lucio: our thoughts now
Must have no object, but thy Fathers welcome,
To which thy helpe——

Luc. With humble gladnesse Madam. Exeunt

Scena Tertia.

Enter Alvarez, Clara.

Alv. Where lost we Sysevdra?

Cla. He was met
Entring the City by some Gentlemen
Kinsmen, as he said of his own, with whom
For complement sake (for so I think he term'd it)
He was compel'd to stay: though I much wonder
A man that knowes to do, and has done well
In the head of his troop, when the bold foe charg'd home,
Can learn so sodainly to abuse his time
In apish entertainment: for my part
(By all the glorious rewards of war)
I had rather meet ten enemies in the field
All sworn to fetch my head, then be brought on
To change an houres discourse with one of these Smooth City fools, or tissu Cavaliers,
Then only Gallans, as they wisely think;
To get a Jewell, or a wanton Kisse
From a Court-lip, though painted.

Alv. My Love Clara
(For Lucio is a name thou must forget
With Lucias bold behaviour) though thy breeding
I'the camp may plead something in the excuse
Of thy rough manners, custome having chang'd,
Though not thy Sex, the softnesse of thy nature,
And fortune (then a cruell stepdame to thee)
Impos'd upon thy tender sweetnesse, burthens
Of hunger, cold, wounds, want, such as would crack
The sinewes of a man, not borne a Souldier:
Yet now she smiles, and like a naturall mother
Looks gently on thee, Clara, entertaine
Her proffer'd bounties with a willing bosome;
Thou shalt no more have need to use thy sword;
Thy beauty (which even Belgia hath not alter'd)
Shall be a stronger guard, to keep my Clara,
Then that has bin, (though never us'd but nobly)
And know thus much.

Cla. Sir, I know only that
It stands not with my duty to gaine-say you,
In any thing: I must, and will put on What fashion you think best: though I could wish
I were what I appeare.

Alv. Endeavour rather. Musick.
To be what you are, Clara, entring here
As you were borne, a woman.

Enter Eugnia, Lucio, Servants.

Eug. Let choice Musick
In the best voyce that ere touch'd humane eare,
For joy hath tide my tongue up, speak your welcome.

Alv. My soule, (for thou giv'it new life to my spirit)
Myriads of joyes, though short in number of Thy vertues, fall on thee; Oh my Eugenia, Th'assurance, that I do embrace thee, makes
My twenty years of sorrow but a dreame,
And by the Nectar, which I take from these,
I feele my age restor'd, and like old Æson
Grow young againe.

Eug. My Lord, long wish'd for welcome,
Tis a sweet brietnesse, yet in that short word
All pleasures which I may c'll mine, begin,
And may they long increase, before they finde
A second period: let mine eyes now surfet
On this so wish'd for object, and my lips
Yet modestly pay back the parting kisse
You trusted with them, when you fled from Civill
With little Clara my sweet daughter: lives she?
Yet I coul'd chide my selfe, having you here
For being so covetous of all joyes at once,
'Tenquire for her, you being alone, to me
My Clara, Lucio, my Lord, my selfe;
Nay more then all the world.

Alv. As you, to me are.

Eug. Sit down, and let me feed upon the story
Of your past dangers, now you are here in safety
It will give rellish, and fresh appetite
To my delights, if such delights can cloy me.
Yet do not Alvarez, let me first yeild you

Accompt

Accompt of my life in your absence, and
Make you acquainted how I have preserv'd
The Jewell left lock'd up in my wombe, (try,
When you, in being forc'd to leave your coun-Suffer'd a civill death. within Clashing swords.
Alv. Doe my Eugenia,
'Tis that I most desire to be are,
Eug. Then know Sayavedra within.
Alv. What voyce is that?
If you are noble Enemies, Vitelli within.
Oppresse me not with odds, but kill me fairely,
Stand off, I am too many of my selfe. Enter Bobadilla.
Bob. Murther, murther murther, your friend my Lord,
Don Sayavedra is set upon in the Streets, by your enemies Vitelli, and his Faction: I am almost kill'd with looking on them.
Alv. Ile free him, or fall with him: draw thy sword
And follow me.
Cla. Fortune I give thee thankes
For this occasion once more to use it. (hang me. Exit.
Bob. Nay, hold not me Madam; if I doe any hurt,
Luc. Oh I am dead with feare! let's flye into Your Closet, Mother.
Eug. No houre of my life
Secure of danger? heav'n be mercifull,
Or now at once dispatch me. Enter Vitelli, pursued
Cla. Follow him by Alvarez, & Sayavedra,
Leave me to keepe these off. Clara beating of
Vit. Assault my friend Ansfiro.
So neere by houre?
Vit. Nor in it will spare thee,
Though 'twere a Temple: & Ile mak it one,
I being the Priest, and thou the sacrifice,
Ile offer to my uncle.
Alv. Haste thou to him,
And say I sent thee.
Cla. 'Twas put bravely by,
And that: and yet comes on, and boldly rare,
In the warres, where emulation and example
Joyn to encrease the courage, and make lesse
The danger, valour, and true resolution
Never appear'd so lovely: brave againe:
Sure he is more then man, and if he fall;
The best of vertue, fortitude would dye with him:
And can I suffer it? forgive me duty,
So I love valour, as I will protect it Against my Father, and redeeme it, though
'Tis forfeited by one I hate.
Vit. Come on,
All is not lost yet: You shall buy me dearer
Before you have me; keep off.
Cla. Feare me not,
Thy worth has tooke me Prisoner, and my sword
For this time knowes thee onely for a friend,
And to all else I turne the point of it.
Say. Defend your Fathers Enemy?
Alv. Art thou mad?
Cla. Are you men rather? shall that valour, which Begot you lawfull honour in the warres,
Prove now the parent of an infamous Bastard
So foule, yet so long liv'd, as murther will
Be to your shames? have each of you, alone
With your own dangers onely, purchas'd glory
From multitudes of Enemies, not allowing
Those neerest to you, to have part in it,
And doe you now joyn, and lend mutuall helpe
Against a single opposite? hath the mercy
Of the great King, but newly wash'd away
The blood, that with the forfeit of your life
Cleav'd to your name, and family like an aloes,
In this againe to set a deeper dye:
Upon your infamy? you'll say he is your foe,
And by his rashnesse call'd on his own ruine?
Remember yet, he was first wrong'd, and honour
Spur'd him to what he did, and neare the place
Where now he is, your house, which by the lawes
Of hospitable duty should protect him;
Have you been twenty yeeres a stranger to it,
To make your entrance now in blood? or thinke you
Your country-man, a true born Spaniard, will be An offring fit, to please the genius of it?
No, in this i'le presume to teach my Father,
And this first Act of disobedience shall Confirme I am most dutifull.
Alv. I am pleas'd
With what I dare not give allowance to;
Unnaturall wretch, what wilt thou doe?
Cla. Set free
A noble Enemy? come not on, by ——
You passe to him, through me: the way is open:
Farwell: when next I meet you, doe not look for
A friend, but a vow'd foe; I see you worthy,
And therefore now preserve you, for the honour
Of my sword onely:
Vit. Were this man a friend,
How would he win me, that being my vow'd foe
Deserves so well? I thanke you for my life,
But how I shall deserve it, give me leave Hereafter to consider. Exit.
Alv. Quit thy feare,
All danger is blown over: I have Letters
To the Governour, in the Kings name, to secure us,
From such attempts hereafter: yet we need not
That have such strong guards of our own, dread others;
And to encrease thy comfort, know, this young man
Whom with such fervent earnestnesse you eye,
Is not what he appeares, but such a one
As thou with joy wilt blesse, thy daughter Clara.
Eug. A thousand blessings in that word.
Alv. The reason
Why I have bred her up thus, at more leisure
I will impart unto you: wonder not
At what you have seen her doe, it being the least
Of many great and valiant undertakings
She hath made good with honour.
Eug. Ile returne
The joy I have in her, with one as great
To you my Alvarez: you, in a man
Have given to me a daughter: in a woman,
I give to you a Sonne: this was the pledge
You left here with me, whom I have brought up
Different from what he was, as you did Clara,
And with the like successe; as she appeares Alter'd by custome, more then woman, he Transform'd by his soft life, is lesse then man.
Alv. Fortune, in this gives ample satisfaction
For all our sorrowes past.
Luc. My deerest Sister.
Cla. Kinde brother.
Alv. Now our mutuall care must be Imploy'd to help wrong'd nature, to retrieve
Her right in either of them, lost by custome;
To your I give my Clara, and receive
My Lucio to my charge: and we'll contend
With loving industry, who soonest can Turne this man woman or this woman, man. Exeunt.

Actus

Actus secundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Pachico, and Lazarillo.

Pac. Boy: my Cloake, and Rapier; it fits not a Gentleman of my ranck, to walke the streets in Querpo.

Laz. Nay, you are a very ranck Gent. Signior, I am very hungry, they tell me in Civill here, I looke like an Eele, with a mans head: and your neighbour the Smith here hard by, would have borrowed me th'other day, to have fish'd with me, because he had lost his angle-rod.

Pac. Oh happy thou Lazarillo (being the cause of other mens wits) as in thine own: live leane, and witty still: oppresse not thy stomach too much: grosse feeders, great sleepers: great sleepers, fat bodies; fat bodies, lean braines: No Lazarillo, I will make thee immortall, change thy humanitie into dietie, for I will teach thee to live upon nothing.

Laz. Faith Signior, I am immortall then already, or very neere it, for I doe live upon little or nothing: belike that's the reason the Poets are said to be immortall, for some of them live upon their wits, which is indeed as good as little or nothing: But good Master, let me be mortall still, and let's goe to supper.

Pac. Be abstinent; shew not the corruption of thy generation: he that feeds, shall die, therefore he that feeds not, shalt live.

Laz. I; but how long shall he live ther's the question.

Pac. As long as he can without feeding: did'st thou read of the miraculous maid in Flanders?

Laz. No, nor of any maid else; for the miracle of virginitie now a daies ceases, ere the virgin can read virginitie?

Pac. She that liv'd three yeere without any other sustenance then the smell of a Rose.

Laz. I heard of her Signior; but they say her guts shrunck all into Lute-strings, and her neather-parts cling'd together like a Serpents Taile, so that though she continued a woman still above the girdle, beneath yet she was monster.

Pac. So are most women, beleeve it.

Laz. Nay all women Signior, that can live onely upon the smell of a Rose.

Pac. No part of the History is fabulous.

Laz. I thinke rather no part of the Fable is Historicall: but for all this, sir, my rebellious stomach will not let me be immortall: I will be as immortall, as mortall hunger will suffer: put me to a certaine stint sir, allow me but a red herring a day.

Pac. O' de dios: would'st thou be gluttonous in thy delicacies?

Laz. He that eats nothing but a red herring a day, shall neere be broyl'd for the devils rasher: a Pilcher, Signior, a Surdiny, an Ollve, that I may be a philosopher first, and immortall after.

Pac. Patience Lazarillo; let contemplation be thy food a while: I say unto thee, one Peaze was a Souldiers provant a whole day, at the destruction of Ierusalem.

Laz. I: and it were any where, but at the destruction of a place i'le be hang'd.

Enter Metaldi, & Mendoza.

Met. Signior Pachico Alasto, my most ingenious Cobler of Civill, the bonos noxias to your Signiorie.

Pac, Signior Metaldi de fargia, my most famous Smith, and man of mettle, I returne your curtesie ten fold, and do humble my Bonnet beneath the Shooe-soale of your congie: the like to you Signior Mendoza Pediculo de vermim, my most exquisite Hose-heeler.

Laz. Her's a greeting betwixt a Cobler, a Smith, and a Botcher: they all belong to the foot, which makes them stand so much upon their Gentrie.

Mend. Signior Lazarillo,

Laz. Ah Signior see: nay, we are all Signiors here in Spaine, from the Jakes-farmer to the Grandee, or Adelantado: this botcher looks as if he were dowgh-bak'd a little butter now, and I could eate him like an oaten-Cake: his fathers diet was new Cheese and Onions when he got him: what a scallion-fac'd-rascall 'tis?

Met. But why Signior Pachico, do you stand so much on the prioritie, and antiquitie of your qualitie (as you call it) in comparison of ours?

Mend. I; your reason for that.

Pac. Why thou Iron-pated Smith: and thou wollen-witted Hose heeler: heare what I will speak indifferently (and according to Ancient writers) of our three professions: and let the upright Lazarillo be both judge, and moderator. (may be.

Laz. Still am I the most immortally hungrie, that

Pac. Suppose thou wilt derive thy pedigree, like some of the old Heroes, (as Hercules, Æneas, Achilles) lineally from the Gods, making Saturne thy great Grand-father, and Vulcan thy Father: Vulcan was a God.

Laz. He'll make Vulcan your God-father by and by.

Pac. Yet I say Saturne was a crabbed block-head, and Vulcan a limping horn-head, for Venus his wife was a strumpet, and Mars begat all her Children; therefore however, thy originall must of necessitie spring from Bastardie: further, what can be a more deject spirit in man, then to lay his hands under every ones horses feet, to doe him service, as thou do'st? For thee, I will be briefe thou do'st botch, and not mend, thou art a hider of enormities, viz. scabs, chilblaines, and kibed heeles: much proane thou art to Sects, and Heresies, disturbing state, and government; for how canst thou be a sound member in the Common-wealth, that art so subject to stitches in the anckles? blush, and be silent then, Oh ye Machanick, compare no more with the politique Cobler: For Coblers (in old time) have prophesied, what may they doe now then, that have every day waxed better, and better? have we not the length of every mans foot? are we not daily menders? yea, and what menders? not horse-menders.

Laz. Nor manners-menders.

Pach. But soule-menders: Oh divine Coblers; doe we not like the wise man spin our own threds, (or our wives for us?) doe we not by our sowing the hide, reape the beefe? are not we of the gentle craft, whil'st both you are but crafts-men? You will say you feare neither Iron nor steele, and what you get is wrought out of the fire, I must answer you againe, though all this is but forgery, You may likewise say, a mans a man, that has but a hose on his head: I must likewise answer, that man is a botcher, that has a heel'd-hose on his head: to conclude there can be no comparison with the Cobler, who is all in all in the Common-wealth, has his politique eye and ends on every mans steps that walkes, and whose course shall be lasting to the worlds end.

Net. I give place: the wit of man is wonderfull: thou hast hit the naile on the head, and I will give thee six pots for't though I neere clinth shooe againe.

Enter Vitelli & Alguazier.

Pac. Who's this? Oh our Alguazier: as arrant a knave as E're wore ont head under two offices: he is one side Alguazier.

Met. The other side Serjeant.

Mend. That's both sides carrion I am sure.

Pac. This is he apprehends whores in the way of justice, and lodges 'em in his own house, in the way of profit: he with him, is the Grand-Don Vitelli, 'twixt whom and Fernando Alvarez the mortall hatred is: he is indeed my Dons Bawd, and do's at this present lodge a famous Curtizan of his, lately come from Madrill.

Vit. Let her want nothing Signior, she can aske:
What losse, or injury you may sustaine
I will repaire, and recompence your love:
Onely that fellowes coming I mislike,
And did fore-warn her of him: beare her this
With my best love, at night i'le visit her.

Alg. I rest your Lordships Servant.

Vit. Good ev'n, Signiors:
Oh Alvarez, thou hast brought a Sonne with thee
Both brightnes, and obscures our Nation,
Whose pure strong beames on us, shoot like the Suns
On baser fires: I would to heaven my blood
Had never stain'd thy bold unfortunate hand,
That with mine honour I might emulate
Not persecute such vertue: I will see him
Though with the hazard of my life: no rest
In my contentious spirits can I finde
Till I have gratefide him in like kinde. Exit.

Alg. I know you not: what are ye? hence ye base Besegnios.

Pac. Mary Catzo Signior Alguazier, do'ye not know us? why, we are your honest neighbours, the Cobler, Smith, and Botcher, that have so often sate snoaring cheeke by joll with your signiorie in rug at midnight.

Laz. Nay, good Signior, be not angry: you must understand, a Cat and such an Officer see best in the dark.

Met. By this hand, I could finde in my heart to shooe his head.

Pac. Why then know you Signior; thou mongrill begot at midnight, at the Goale gate, by a Beadle, on a Catch-poles wife, are not you he that was whipt out, of Toledo for perjury.

Men. Next, condemn'd to the Gallies for pilfery, to the buls pizell.

Met. And after call'd to the Inquisition, for Apostacie.

Pac. Are not you he that rather then you durst goe an industrious voyage being press'd to the Islands, skulk'd till the fleet was gone, and then earn'd your royall a day by squiring puncks, and puncklings up and down the City?

Laz. Are not you a Portuguize borne, descended o'the Moores, and came hither into Civill with your Master, an errant Taylor, in your red Bonnet, and your Blew Jacket lowsie: though now your block-head be cover'd with the Spanish Block, and your lashed Shoulders with a Velvet Pee?

Pac. Are not you he, that have been of thirty callings, yet ne're a one lawfull? that being a Chandler first, profess'd sincerity, and would sell no man Mustard to his beefe on the Sabbath, and yet sold Hypocrisie all your life time?

Met. Are not you he, that were since a Surgeon to the Stewes, and undertooke to cure what the Church it selfe could not, strumpets that rise to your Office by being a great Dons Baw'd?

Laz. That commit men nightly, offenceless, for the gaine of a groat a Prisoner, which your Beadle seemes to put up, when you share three pence?

Mend. Are not you he, that is a kisser of men, in drunkennesse, and a berrayer in sobriety?

Alg. Diabolo: they'll raile me into the Gallyes again.

Pac. Yes Signior, thou art even he we speake of all this while: thou maist by thy place now, lay us by the heeles: 'tis true: but take heed, be wiser, pluck not ruine on thine own head: for never was there such an Anatomy, as we shall make thee then: be wise therefore, Oh thou Childe of the night! be friends and shake hands, thou art a proper man, if thy beard were redder: remember thy worshipfull function, a Constable though thou turn'st day into night, and night into day, what of that? watch lesse, and pray more: gird thy beares skin (viz. thy Rug-gowne) to thy loyes, take thy staffe in thy hand, and goe forth at midnight: Let not thy mittens abate the talons of thy authority, but gripe theft and whoredom, whereso'ever thou meet'st 'em: bear 'em away like a tempest, and lodge 'em safely in thine own house:

Laz. Would you have whores and theeves lodg'd in such a house?

Pac. They ever doe so: I have found a theefe, or a whore there, when the whole Suburbs could not furnish me.

Laz. But why doe they lodge there?

Pac. That they may be safe, and forth-coming: for in the morning usually the theefe is sent to the Goale, and the whore prostrates her selfe to the Justice.

Mend. Admirable Pachieco.

Met. Thou Cobler of Christendom.

Alg. There is no railing with these rogues: I will close with 'em, till I can cry quittance: why Signiors, and my honest neighbours, will you impute that as a neglect of my friends, which is an imperfection in me? I have been Sand-blinde from my infancie: to make you amends, you shall sup with me.

Laz. Shall we sup with 'ye sir? O' my conscience, they have wrong'd the Gentleman extreamly, Alg. And after supper, I have a project to employ you in shall make you drink, & eat merrily this moneth: I am a little knavish: why and doe not I know all you to be knaves?

Pac. I grant you, we are all knaves, and will be your knaves: But, oh, while you live, take heed of being a proud knave.

Alg. On then passe: I will beare out my staffe, and my staffe shall beare out me.

Laz. Oh Lazarillo, thou art going to supper. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Lucio, and Bobadilla.

Luc. Pray be not angry.
I am angry, and I will be angry diablo': what should you doe in the Kitchin, cannot the Cooks lick their fingers without your overseeing? nor the maids make pottage, except your dogs-head be in the pot? Don Lucio, Don Quoi-quoane, Don Spinster, weare a Petti-coate still, and put on your smock a' monday: I will have a badie o' clouts made for it, like a great girl: nay, if you will needs be starching of Ruffs, and sowing of black-work, I will of a milde, and loving Tutor, become a Tyrant, Your Father has committed you to my charge, and I will make a man, or a mouse on you.

Luc. What would you have me doe? this scurvy sword
So gals my thigh: I would 'twer burnt: pish, looke
This cloak will ne'r keep on: these boots too hidebound,

Make

Make me walk thus, as if my legge were frozen,
And my Spurs gingle, like a Morris-dancer:
Lord, how my head akes, with this cognish hat;
This masculine suite, is most uneasie,
I am bound up in it: I had rather walke
In folio, againe, loose, like a woman.

Bob. In Foolio, had you not?
Thou mock to heav'n, and nature, and thy Parents,
Thou tender Legge of Lamb: Oh, how he walkes
As if he had he pil'd himselfe, and shaves!
Is this a gate for the young Cavalier,
Don Lucio, Sonne and heire to Alvarez?
Has it a corne? or do's it walke on conscience,
It treads so gingerly? Come on your wayes,
Suppose me now your Fathers foe, Vitelli,
And spying you i'th' street, thus I advance,
I twirle my Beard, and then I draw my sword.

Luc. Alas.

Bob. And thus accost thee: traiterous brat,
How dur'st thou thus confront me? impious twig
Of that old stock, dew'd with my kinsmans gore,
Draw, for i'le quarter thee in peeces fowre.

Luc. Nay, Pray thee Bobadilla, leave thy fooling,
Put up thy sword, I will not meddle with ye;
I, jutle me, I care not: I'le not draw,
Pray be a quiet man.

Bob. Do'ye heare? answer me, as you would doe Don Vitelli, or i'le be so bold as to lay the pomell of my sword over the hilts of your head: my name's Vitelli, and i'le have the wall. (keepe?

Luc. Why then i'le have the kennell: what a coyle you Signior, what happen'd 'twixt my Sire and your Kinsman, was long before I saw the world,
No fault of mine, nor will I justifie
My Fathers crimes: forget 'em, and forgive,
'Tis Christianity: I pray put up your sword,
Ile give you any satisfaction
That may become a Gentleman; howeve
I hope you are bred to more humanity.
Then to revenge my Fathers wrong on me
That crave your love, and peace: law you now Zancho
Would not this quiet him, were he ten Vitelli's.

Bob. Oh craven-chicken of a Cock o'th'game: well, what remedy? did thy father see this, O' my conscience, he would cut of thy Masculine gender, crop thine eares, beat out thine eyes, and set thee in one of the Peare-trees for a fear-crow: As I am Vitelli, I am satisfied, but as I am Bobadilla Spindola Zancho, Steward of the house, and thy fathers servant, I could finde in my heart to lop off the hinder part of thy face, or to beat all thy teeth into thy mouth: Oh thou whay-blooded milk-sop, Ile waite upon thee no longer, thou shalt ev'n waite upon me: come your wayes sir, I shall take a little paines with ye else. Exeunt Omnes.

Cla. Where art thou Brother Lucio? ran tan tan ta ran tan ran tan tan, ta ra tan tan tan. Oh, I shall ne more see those golden dayes, these clothes will never fadge with me: a—— O' this slishie vardingale, this hip hape: brother, why are womens haunches onely limited, coffin'd, hoop'd in, as it were with these same scurvy vardingales?

Bob. Because womens haunches onely are most subject to display and fly out.

Cla. Bobadilla, rogue, ten Duchats, I hit the prunest of thy Cod-peice.

Luc. Hold, if you love my life, Sister; I am not Zancho Bobadilla, I am your brother Lucio: what a fright you have put me in!

Cla. Brother? and wherefore thus?

Luc. Why, Master Steward here, Signior Zancho, made me change: he do's nothing but misuse me, and call me Cowheard, and sweares I shall main upon him.

Bob. Well: I doe no more then I have authority for: would I were away though: for she's as much too mannish, as he too womanish: I dare not meddle with her; yet I must set a good face on't (if I hadis). I have like charge of you Maddam, I am as well to mollifie you, as to qualifie him: what have you to doe with Armours and Pistols, and Javelins, and swords, and such tooles? remember Mistresse; nature hath given you a sheath onely, to signifie women are to put up mens weapons, not to draw them: looke you now, is this a fit case for a Gentlewoman? You shall see the Court Ladies move like Goddesses, as if they trod aire: they will swim you their measures, like whining mops as if their feet were finnes, and the hinges of their knees oyld: doe they love to ride great horses, as you doe? no, they love to ride great asses sooner: faith, I know not what to say to'ye both: Custome hath turn'd nature topsie-turvy in you.

Cla. Nay but Master Steward.

Bob. You cannot trot so fast, but he ambles as slowly.

Cla. Signior Spindle, will you heare me.

Bob. He that shall come to bestride your Virginicie had better be afoot o're the Dragon.

Cla. Very well.

Bob. Did ever Spanish Lady pace so?

Cla. Hold there a little;

Luc. Ile not touch 'em, I.

Cla. First doe I breake your Office o're your pate,
You Dog-skin fac'd-rogue, pilcher, you poore John,
Which I will beat to Stock-fish.

Luc. Sister,

Bob. Maddam.

Cla. You Chitern-head, who have you talk'd to, half
You natty, tincking, and ill-counterfac'd Cur.

Bob. By this hand, Ile bang your brother for this, when I get him alone.

Cla. How? kick him Lucio, he shall kick you Bob,
Spight o' the nose, that's flat: kick him, I say,
Or I will cut thy head off.

Bob. Softly y'had best. (Chuse,

Cla. Now, thou leane, dride, and ominous visag'd
Thou false and peremptory Steward, peep,
For I will hang thee up in thine own Chaine.

Luc. Good Sister, doe not choake him.

Bob. Murder, murder. Exit.

Cla. Well: I shall meet with 'ye: Lucio, who bought this?
'Tis a reasonable good one; but there hange one Spaines Champion ne're fil'd truer: with this Stuffe
Old Alvarez has led up men so close,
They could almost spit in the Canons mouth,
Whil'st I with that, and this, well mounted, scour'd
A Horse-troope through, and through, like swift desire,
And seen poor rogues retire, all gore, and gastly'd
Like bleeding Shades.

Luc. 'Blesse us, Sister Clara,
How desperately you talke: what do'ye call
This Gun-a-dag?

Cla. Ile give's thee: a French pettronell;
You never saw my Barbary, the Infanta
Bestow'd upon me, as you Lucio do:
Walke down, and see it.

Luc. What into the Stable?

Not I, the Jades wil kick: the poore Groom there
Was almoſt ſpoyld the other day.
Cla. Fie on thee,
Thou wilt ſcarce be a man before thy mother.
Luc. When wil you be a woman?
Enter Alvarez and Bobadilla.
Cla. Would I were none.
But natures privy Seale aſſures me one.
Alv. Thou angerſt me: can ſtrong habituall cuſtome
Work with ſuch Magick on the mind, and manners
In ſpight of ſex and nature? finde out ſirha,
Some skilfull fighter.
Bob. Yes ſir.
Alv. I wil rectifie,
And redeem either's proper inclination,
Or bray 'em in a morter, and new mold 'em. (Exit.
Bob. Believe your eyes ſir, I tell you, we waſh an Ethiop.
Cla. I ſtrike it for ten Duckets.
Alv. How now Clara,
Your breeches on ſtill? and your petticote
Not yet off Lucio? art thou not gueſt?
Or did the cold Muſcovite beget thee,
That lay here Lieger in the laſt great froſt?
Art not thou Clara, turn'd a man indeed
Beneath the girdle? and a woman thou?
Ile have you ſearch'd by——, I ſtrongly doubt;
We muſt have theſe things mended: come go in. Exit.
Enter Vitelli, and Bobadilla.
Bob. With Lucio ſay you? there is for you.
Vit. And there is for thee.
Bob. I thank you: you have now bought a little advice
Of me; if you chance to have conference with that Lady there, be very civill, or looke to your head: ſhe has Ten nailes, and you have but two eyes: If any fooliſh
Hot motions ſhould chance to riſe in the horizon
Under your equinoctiall there, qualifie it as well as You can, for I feare the elevation of your pole will Not agree with the Horoſcope of her conſtitution:
She is Bell the Dragon I aſſure you. Exit.
Vit. Are you the Lucio, ſir, that ſav'd Vitelli?
Luc. Not I indeed ſir, I did never brable;
There walks that Lucio, metamorphoſed. Exit.
Vit. Do ye mock me?
Cla. No, he do's not: I am that Supoſed Lucio, that was but Clara,
That is, and daughter unto Alvarez.
Vit. Amazement daunts me, would my life were riddles,
So you were ſtill my faire Expoſitor:
Protected by a Lady from my death.
Oh I ſhall weare an everlaſting bluſh
Upon my cheek from this diſcovery:
Oh you the faireſt Souldier, I ere ſaw;
Each of whoſe eyes, like a bright beamy ſhield
Conquers, without blowes, the contentious.
Cla. Sir, guard your ſelf, you are in your enemies houſe,
And may be injur'd.
Vit. 'Tis impoſſible:
Foe, nor oppreſſing odds dares prove Vitelli,
If Clara ſide him, and wil call him friend;
I would the difference of our bloods were ſuch
As might with any ſhift be wip'd away:
Or would to Heaven your ſelfe were all your name;
That having loſt blood by you, I might hope
To raiſe blood from you. But my black-wing'd fate
Hovers averſely over that fond hope:
And he, whoſe tongue thus gratifies the daughter,
And ſiſter of his enemy, weares a Sword
To rip the father and the brother up.
Thus you, that ſav'd this wretched life of mine,
Have ſavd it to the ruine of your friends.
That my affections ſhould promiſcuouſly
Dart love and hate at once, both worthily?
Pray let me kiſſe your hand.
Cla. You are treacherous,
And come to do me miſchiefe.
Vit. Speake on ſtill:
Your words are falſer ('faire) then my intents,
And each ſweet accent far more treacherous; for Though you ſpeak ill of me, you ſpeak ſo well,
I doe deſire to heare you.
Cla. Pray be gone:
Or kill me, if you pleaſe.
Vit. Oh, neither can:
For to be gone, were to deſtroy my life;
And to kill you, were to deſtroy my ſoule:
I am in love, yet muſt not be in love:
Ile get away a pace: yet valiant Lady,
Such gratitude to honour I do owe,
And ſuch obedience to your memory,
That if you will beſtow ſomething, that I
May weare about me, it ſhall bind all wrath,
My moſt inveterate wrath, from all attempts,
Till you and I meet next.
Cla. A favour ſir?
Why I wil 'give ye good councell.
Vit. That already
You have beſtowd. a Ribbon, or a Glove.
Cla. Nay thoſe are tokens for a waiting maid
To trim the Butler with.
Vit. Your feather.
Cla. Fie; the wenches give them to their Serving-men.
Vit. That little ring.
Cla. I will hold you but by th' finger;
And I would have you faſter.
Vit. Any thing
That I may weare, and but remember you.
Cla. This ſmile: my good opinion, or my ſelf.
But that it ſeems you like not.
Vit. Yes, ſo well:
When any ſmiles, I will remember yours;
Your good opinion ſhall in weight poize me
Againſt a thouſand ill: Laſtly, your ſelfe,
My curious eye now figures in my heart,
Where I wil weare you, till the Table breake.
So, whiteſt Angels guard you.
Cla. Stay ſir, I
Have fitly thought to give, what you as fitly
May not diſdaine to weare.
Vit. What's that?
Cla. This Sword.
I never heard a man ſpeak till this houre.
His words are golden chaines, and now I feare
The Lyoneſſe hath met a tamer here;
Ile, how his tongue chimes: what was I ſaying?
Oh: this favour I bequeath you, which I tie
In a love-knot, faſt, nere to hurt my friends;
Yet be it fortunate 'gainſt all your foes
(For I have neither friend, nor foe, but yours)
As ere it was to me: I have kept it long,
And value it, next my Virginity:
But good, return it, for I now remember
I vow'd, who purchas'd it, ſhould have me too.
Vit. would that were poſſible: but alas it is not Yet this aſſure your ſelfe, moſt honour'd Clara,
Ile not infringe an Article of breath
My vow hath offerd to ye: nor from this part

Whilſt

Whilſt it hath edge, or point, or I a heart. Exit.

Cla. Oh leave me living: what new exerciſe
Is crept into my breaſt, that blaunceth clean
My former nature? I begin to finde
I am a woman, and muſt learn to fight
A ſofter ſweeter battaile, then with Swords.
I am ſick me thinks, but the diſeaſe I feele
Pleaſeth, and puniſheth: I warrant love
Is very like this, that folks talke of ſo;
I skill not what it is, yet ſure even here,
Even in my heart, I ſenſibly perceive
It glows, and riſeth like a glimmering flame,
But know not yet the eſſence on't, nor name. Exit.

Actus tertius, Scæna prima.

Enter Malroda, and Alguazier.

Mal. He muſt not? nor he ſhall not, who ſhall let him?
You politique Diego, with your face of wiſdome;
Don-blirt, the —— on your aphoriſmes,
Your grave, and ſage Ale phyſiognomy:
Do not I know thee for the Alguazier
Whoſe dunghill all the Pariſh Scavengers
Could never rid? thou Comedy to men,
Whoſe ſerious folly is a but for all
To ſhoot their wits at; whilſt thou haſt not wit,
Nor heart, to anſwer, or be angry.

Alg. Lady.

Mal. Peace, peace, you rotten rogue, ſupported by
A ſtaffe of rottener office: dare you check
Anys acceſſes, that I wil allow?
Pizaro is my friend, and viſits me
In lawfull ſort to eſpouſe me as his wife;
And who wil croſſe, or ſhall our enter-viewes?
You know me ſirha, for no Chambermaid,
That caſt her belly, and her waſtcote lately;
Thou think'ſt thy Conſtableſhip is much: not ſo,
I am ten offices to thee: I, thy houſe,
Thy houſe, and Office is maintain'd by me.

Alg. My houſe of office is maintain'd ith' garden:
Go too, I know you, and I have contriv'd;
Y'are a delinquent, but I have contriv'd
A poyſon, though not in the third degree:
I can ſay, blacks your eye, though it be grey;
I have connivd at this your friend, and you:
But what is got by this connivency?
I like his feather well: a proper man,
Of good diſcourſe, fine converſation,
Valiant, and a great carrier of the buſineſſe,
Sweet breaſted, as the Nightingale, or Thruſh:
Yet I muſt tell you; you forget your ſelfe,
My Lord Vitellies love, and maintenance
Deſerves no other Jack ith' box, but he:
What though he gather'd firſt the golden fruit,
And blew your pigges-coat up into a bliſter,
When you did wait at Court upon his mother;
Has he not wel provided for the barne?
Beſide, what profit reap I by the other?
If you wil have me ſerve your pleaſure, Lady,
Your pleaſure muſt accommodate my ſervice;
As good be vertuous and poore, as not Thrive by my knavery: all the world would be Good, proſper'd goodneſſe like to villany.
I am the Kings vice-gerent by my place;
His right Lieutenant in mine owe precinct.

Mal. Thou art a right raſcall in all mens precincts;
Yet now my paire of twins, of foole, and knave,
Looke we are friends; there's Gold for thee, admit Whom I wil have, and keep it from my Don;
And I will make thee richer then thou art wiſe:
Thou ſhalt be my Bawd, and my Officer:
Thy children ſhall eate ſtill my good night Owle,
And thy old wife ſell Andyrons to the Court,
Be countenanced by the Dons, and weare a hood,
Nay keepe my garden-houſe; Ile call her mother,
Thee father, my good poyſonous red-har'd Dill,
And Gold ſhall daily be thy Sacrifice,
Wrought from a fertill Iſland of mine owne,
Which I wil offer, like an Indian Queen.

Alg. And I wil be thy divel, thou my fleſh,
With which Ile catch the world.

Mal. Fill ſome Tobacco,
And bring it in: if Pizaro come Before my Don, admit him; if my Don
Before my Love, conduct him, my deere devill. Exit.

Alg. I wil my dear fleſh: firſt come, firſt ſerv'd. Wel ſaid.
O equall Heaven, how wiſely thou diſpoſeſt
Thy ſeverall gifts? one's born a great rich foole,
For the ſubordinate knave to worke upon:
Anothers poore, with wits addition,
Which wel or ill uſ'd, builds a living up;
And that too from the Sire oft diſcends:
Onely faire vertue, by traduction
Never ſucceeds, and ſeldome meets ſucceſſe;
What have I then to do with't? My free will Left me by Heaven, makes me or good, or ill:
Now ſince vice gets more in this vicious world
Then piety, and my ſtars confluence Enforce my diſpoſition to affect Gaine, and the name of rich, let who wil practice
War, and grow that way great: religious,
And that way good: my chiefe felicity
Is wealth the nurſe of ſenſuality:
And he that mainly labours to be rich,
Muſt ſcratch great ſcabs, and claw a Strumpets itch. Exit.

Scæna ſecunda.

Enter Pizaro, and Bobadilla, with Letters.

Pi. To ſay ſir, I wil wait upon your Lord,
Were not to underſtand my ſelfe.

Bob. To ſay ſir
You wil doe any thing but wait upon him,
Were not to underſtand my Lord.

Pi. Ile meet him
Some halfe houre hence, and doubt not but to render
His ſonne a man againe: the cure is eaſie,
I have done divers.

Bob. Women do ye mean, ſir?

Pi. Cures I do mean ſir: be there but one ſparke
Of fire remaining in him unextinct,
With my diſcourſe Ile blow it to a flame;
And with my practice, into action:
I have had one ſo full of childiſh feare,
And womaniſh hearted ſent to my advice,
He durſt not draw a Knife to cut his meat.

Bob. And how ſir, did you help him?

Pi. Sir, I kept him
Seaven daies in a darke room by Candle-light,
A plenteous Table ſpread with all good meats,
Before his eyes, a caſe of keen broad Knives,

Upon

Upon the board, and he ſo watcht, he might not Touch the leaſt modicum, unleſſe he cut it:
And thus I brought him firſt to draw a knife.
Bob. Good.
Pio. Then for ten daies did I diet him
Onely with burnt Porke ſir, and gammons of Bacon,
A pill of Caveary now and then,
Which breeds choler adult you know.
Bob. Tis true.
Pio. And to purge phlegmatick humor, and cold crudities;
In all that time, he dranke me Aqua fortis,
And nothing elſe but——
Bob. Aqua vite Signior,
For Aqua fortis poyſons.
Pio. Aqua fortis
I ſay again: what's one mans poyſon Signior,
Is anothers meat or drinke.
Bob. Your patience ſir;
By your good patience, h'ad a huge cold ſtomacke.
Pio. I fir'd it: and gave him then three ſweats
In the Artillery-yard three drilling daies:
And now he'l ſhoot a Gun, and draw a Sword,
And fight with any man in Chriſtendome.
Bob. A receipt for a coward: Ile be bold ſir
To write your good preſcription.
Pio. Sir, hereafter
You ſhall, and underneath it put probatum:
Is your chaine right?
Bob. Tis both right and juſt ſir,
For though I am a Steward, I did get it
With no mans wrong.
Pio. You are witty.
Bob. So, ſo.
Could you not cure one ſir, of being too raſh
And over-daring? there now's my diſeaſe:
Fool-hardy as they ſay, for that in ſooth
I am.
Pio. Moſt eaſily.
Bob. How?
Pio. To make you drunke ſir,
With ſmal Beere once a day, and beat you twice,
Till you be bruis'd all over: if that help not,
Knock out your braines.
Bob. This is ſtrong Phyſick Signior,
And never wil agree with my weak body:
I finde the medcine worſe then the malady,
And therefore wil remain fool-hardy ſtil:
You'l come ſir?
Pio. As I am a Gentleman.
Bob. A man oth' Sword ſhould never break his word.
Pio. Ile overtake you: I have onely ſir
A complementall viſitation
To offer to a Miſtris lodged here by.
Bob. A Gentlewoman?
Pio. Yes ſir.
Bob. Faire, and comely?
Pio. Oh ſir, the Paragon, the Non-parill
Of Civill, the moſt wealthy Mine of Spaine,
For beauty, and perfection.
Bob. Say you ſo?
Might not a man entreat a curteſie,
To walke along with you Signior, to peruſe
This dainty Mine, though not to dig in't Signior?
Hauh——I hope you'l not deny me, being a ſtranger;
Though I am Steward, I am fleſh and blood,
And fraile as other men.
Pio. Sir, blow your noſe:
I dare not for the world: no, ſhe is kept
By a great Don, Vitelli.
Bob. How?
Pio. Tis true.
Bob. See, things will weare about: this Don Pietro
Am I to ſeeke now, to deliver Letters
From my young Miſtris Clara: and I tell you,
Under the Role, becauſe you are a ſtranger,
And my ſpeciall friend, I doubt there is
A little fooliſh love betwixt the parties,
Unknown unto my Lord.
Pio. Happy diſcovery:
My fruit begins to ripen: hark you ſir,
I would not wiſh you now, to give thoſe Letters:
But home, and ope this to Madona Clara,
Which when I come Ile juſtifie, and relate
More amply, and particularly.
Bob. I approve
Your counſell, and wil practice it: bazilus manus:
Here's two chewres chawrd; when wiſdome is imployd
Tis ever thus: your more acquaintance, Signior:
I ſay not better, leaſt you think, I thought not Yours good enough. Exit.

Enter Alguazier.

Pio. Your ſervant excellent Steward.
Would all the Dons in Spain had no more brains,
Here comes the Alguazier: dim vver guard Monſier.
Is my cuz ſtirring yet?
Alg. Your cuz (good coſen?)
A whore is like a foole, akin to all
The gallants in the Town: Your cuz, good Signior,
Is gone abroad ſir, with her other coſen,
My Lord Vitelli: ſince when there hath been
Some dozen coſens here to enquire for her.
Pio. She's greatly alli'd ſir.
Alg. Marry is ſhe ſir,
Come of a luſty kindred: the truth is,
I muſt connive no more: no more admittance
Muſt I conſent to: my good Lord has threatned me,
And you muſt pardon.
Pio. Out upon thee man,
Turne honeſt in thine age? one foot ith' grave?
Thou ſhalt not wrong thy ſelfe ſo, for a million:
Looke, thou three-headed Cerberus (for wit
I mean) here is one ſop, and two, and three,
For every chop a bit.
Alg. I marry ſir:
Wel, the poore heart loves you but too wel.
We have been talking on you 'faith this houre:
Where, what I ſaid, goe toot: ſhe loves your valour;
Oh and your Muſicke moſt abominably:
She is within ſir, and alone: what meane you?
Pio That is your Sergeants fide, I take it ſir:
Now I endure your Conſtables watch better,
There is leſſe danger in't; for one you know
Is a tame harmleſſe monſter in the light,
The Sergeant ſalvage both by day, and night.
Alg. Ile call her to you for this.
Pio. No, I will charme her. Enter Mabule.
Alg. She's come.
Pio. My Spirit.
Mal. Oh my Sweet,
Leape hearts to lips, and in our kiſſes meet.
Pio. Turn, turn thy beauteous face away, Song.
How pale and ſickly looks the day,
In emulation of thy brighter beams!
Oh envious light, fly, fly, be gone,
Come night, and place new wonders on;
When what love does, we will repeat in dreams.

Yet

Yet (thy eyes open) who can day bence fright,
Let but their lids fall, and it will be night.

Alg. Wel, I wil leave you to your fortitude;
And you to temperance: ah, ye pretty paire,
Twere sin to sunder you. Lovers being alone
Make one of two, and day and night all one.
But fall not out, I charge you, keep the peace;
You know my place elſe. Exit.

Mal. No, you wil not marry:
You are a Courtier, and can ſing (my Love)
And want no Miſtriſſes: but yet I care not,
Ile love you ſtill; and when I am dead for you,
Then you'l believe my truth.

Pio. You kill me (faire)
It is my leſſon that you ſpeake: have I
In any circumſtance deſerv'd this doubt?
I am not like your falſe and perjur'd Don
That here maintains you, and has vowd his faith,
And yet attempts in way of marriage
A Lady not far off.

Mal. How's that?

Pio. Tis ſo:
And therefore Miſtris, now the time is come
You may demand his promiſe; and I ſweare
To marry you with ſpeed.

Mal. And with that Gold
Which Don Vitelli gives, you'l walke ſome voyage
And leave me to my trade; and laugh, and brag,
How you ore-reach'd a whore, and guld a Lord.

Pio. You anger me extreamly: fare you wel.
What ſhould I ſay to be believd? expoſe me
To any hazzard; or like jealous Juno
(Th' incenſed ſtep-mother of Hercules)
Deſigne me labours moſt impoſſible,
Ile doe 'em, or die in 'em; ſo at laſt
You wil believe me.

Mal. Come, we are friends: I doe.
I am thine, walk in: my Lord has ſent me outſides,
But thou ſhalt have 'em, the colours are too ſad:

Pio. 'Faith Miſtris, I want clothes indeed.

Mal. I have
Some Gold too, for my ſervant.

Pio. And I have
A better mettle for my Miſtris. Exeunt.

Scena tertia.

Enter Vitelli and Alguazier, at ſeverall doors.

Alg. Undone — wit now or never help me: my Maſter
He wil cut my throat, I am a dead Conſtable;
And he'l not be hangd neither, there's the griefe:
The party ſir is here.

Vit. What?

Alg. He was here;
I cry your Lordſhip mercy: but I rattled him;
I told him here was no companions
For ſuch debonaire, and poor-condition'd fellows;
I bid him venture not ſo deſperately
The cropping of his eares, ſlitting his noſe,
Or being gelt.

Vit. Twas wel done.

Alg. Pleaſe your honour,
I told him there were Stewes, and then at laſt
Swore three or foure great oathes he was remov'd,
Which I did thinke I might in conſcience,
Being for your Lordſhip.

Vit. What became of him?

Alg. Faith ſir, he went away with a fiealin's eare,
Like a poore cur, clapping his trindle taile
Betwixt his legs. — A chi ba, a chi ba, a chi ba — now luck.

Enter Malroda and Piato.

Mal. Tis he, do as I told thee: 'Bleſſe thee Signior.
Oh, my deare Lord.

Vit. Malroda, what alone?

Mal. She never is alone, that is accompanied
With noble thoughts, my Lords and mine are ſuch,
Being onely of your Lordſhip.

Vit. Pretty Laſſe.

Mal. Oh my good Lord, my picture's done: but 'faith
It is not like; nay this way ſir, the light
Strikes beſt upon it here.

Pio. Excellent wench. Exit.

Alg. I am glad the danger's over. Exit.

Vit. Tis wondrous like,
But that Art cannot counterfeit what Nature
Could make but once.

Mal. All's cleare; another tune
You muſt heare from me now: Vitelli, thou'rt
A moſt perfidious and a perjur'd man,
As ever did uſurpe Nobility.

Vit. What meanſt thou Mal.?

Mal. Leave your betraying ſmiles,
And change the tunes of your inticing tongues
To penitentiall prayers; for I am great
In labour even with anger, big with child
Of womans rage, bigger then when my wombe
Was pregnant by thee: goe ſeducer, fly
Out of the world, let me the laſt wretch be Diſhonoured by thee: touch me not, I loath
My very heart, becauſe thou layſt there long;
A woman's wel helpt up, that's confident
In ere a glittering outſide on you all:
Would I had honeſtly been matchd to ſome
Poore Countrey-ſwaine, ere known the vanity
Of Court: peace then had been my portion,
Nor had been cozend by an houres pompe
To be a whore unto my dying day.

Vit. Oh the uncomforteable waies ſuch women have,
Their different ſpeech and meaning, no aſſurance
In what they ſay or do: Diſſemblers
Even in their prayers, as if the weeping Greeke
That flatter'd Troy afire had been their Adam;
Lyers, as if their mother had been made
Onely of all the falſhood of the man,
Diſpoſ'd into that rib: Do I know this,
And more: nay, all that can concern this Sex,
With the true end of my creation?
Can I with rationall diſcourſe ſometimes
Advance my ſpirit into Heaven, before
'T has ſhook hands with my body, and yet blindly
Suffer my filthy fleſh to maſter it,
With ſight of ſuch faire fraile beguiling objects?
When I am abſent, eaſily I reſolve
Nere more to entertaine thoſe ſtrong deſires
That triumph ore me, even to actuall ſin;
Yet when I meet again thoſe ſorſerers eyes,
Their beames my hardeſt reſolutions thaw,
As if that cakes of Ice and July met,
And her ſighes powerfull as the violent North,
Like a light feather twirle me round about
And leave me in mine own low ſtate again:
What ayl'ſt thou? prethee weep not: Oh, thoſe tears
If they were true, and righly ſpent, would raiſe
A flowry ſpring ith' midſt of January:
Celeſtiall Miniſters with Chriſtall cups
Would ſtoop to ſave 'em for immortall drink:

But

But from this paſſion ; why all this?
Mal. Do'ye ask?
You are marrying : having made me unfit
For any man, you leave me fit for all :
Porters muſt be my burthens now, to live
And fitting me your ſelfe for Carts, and Beadles
You leave me to 'em : And who of all the world
But the virago, your great Arch-foes daughter?
But on : I care not, this poore ruſh : 'twill breed
An excellent comedy : ha, ha : 't'makes me laugh :
I cannot chooſe : the beſt is, ſome report
It is a match for feare, not love o' your ſide.
Vit. Why how the devill knows ſhe, that I ſaw
This Lady? are all whores, peec'd with ſome witch?
I will be merry, 'faith 'tis true, ſweet heart,
I am to marry?
Mal. Are you? you baſe Lord.
By —— i'le Piſtoll thee.
Vit. A roaring whore?
Take heed, there's a correction houſe hard by: (you of,
You ha' learn'd this o' your ſwordman, that I warn'd
Your fencers, and your drunkards : but whereas
You upbraid me with oathes, why I muſt tell you
I ne're promis'd you marriage, nor have vow'd,
But ſaid I lov'd you, long as you remain'd
The woman I expected, or you ſwore, (know.
And how you have fail'd of that (ſweet heart) you
You faine would ſhew your power, but fare you well,
Ile keepe no more faith with an infidell.
Mal. Nor I my boſome for a Turk : do'ye heare?
Goe, and the devill take me, if ever
I ſee you more : I was too true.
Vit. Come, piſh :
That devill take the falſeſt of us two.
Mal. Amen.
Vit. You are an ill Clerk ; and curſe your ſelfe :
Madneſſe tranſports you : I confeſſe, I drew you Unto my will : but you muſt know that muſt not Make me doat on the habit of my ſin.
I will, to ſettle you to your content,
Be maſter of my word : and yet he li'd
That told you I was marrying, but in thought :
But will you ſlave me to your tyranny
So cruelly I ſhall not dare to looke
Or ſpeake to other women? make me not
Your ſmocks Monopolie : come, let's be friends:
Looke, her's a Jewell for thee : I will come
At night, and— —
Mal. What 'yfaith : you ſhall not ſir.
Vit. 'Faith, and troth, and verily, but I will
Ma. Halfe drunk, to make a noiſe, and raile?
Vit. No, no,
Sober, and dieted for the nonce : I am thine,
I have won the day.
Mal. The night (though) ſhall be mine. Exeunt.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Clara and Bobadilla with Letters.

Cla. What ſaid he ſirha?
Bob. Little, or nothing : faith I ſaw him not,
Nor will not : he doth love a ſtrumpet, Miſtreſſe,
Nay, keeps her ſoinefully, under the Conſtables noſe,
It ſhall be juſtifi'd by the Gentleman
Your brothers Matter, that is now within
A' practiſing : there are your Letters : come
You ſhall not caſt your ſelfe away, while I live,
Nor will I venture my right worſhipfull place Enter
In ſuch a buſineſſe—here's your Mother : downe: Eugc-
And he that loves you: another'gates fellow, I wiſh nia
If you had any grace. & Sayavedra.
Cla. Well rogue.
Bob. Ile in, to ſee Don Lucio mannage : he'll make
A pretty peece of fleſh ; I promiſe you,
He do's already handle his weapon finely. Exit.
Eug. She knows your love ſir, and the full allowance
Her Father and my ſelfe approve it with,
And I muſt tell you, I much hope it hath Wrought ſome impreſſion, by her alteration ;
She ſighes, and ſaies forſooth, and cries heigh ho,
She'll take ill words oth' Steward, and the Servants,
Yet anſwer affably, and modeſtly :
Things ſir, not uſuall with her : there ſhe is,
Change ſome few words.
Say. Maddam, I am bound to 'ye;
How now, faire Miſtreſſe, working?
Cla. Yes forſooth,
Learning to live another day.
Say. That needs not.
Cla. No forſooth: by my truly but it do's,
We know not what we may come too.
Eug. 'Tis ſtrange.
Say. Come, I ha beg'd leave for you to play.
Cla. Forſooth
'Tis ill for a faire Lady to be idle.
Say. She had better be well- buſied, I know that.
Turtle : me thinkes you mourne, ſhall I ſit by you?
Cla. If you be weary ſir, you had beſt be gone
(I work not a true ſtitch) now you'r my mate.
Say. If I be ſo, I muſt doe more then ſide you.
Cla. Ev'n what you will, but tread me.
Say. Shall we bill?
Cla. Oh no, forſooth.
Say. Being ſo faire, my Clara,
Why do'ye delight in black-worke?
Cla. Oh white ſir,
The faireſt Ladies like the blackeſt men :
I ever lov'd the colour : all black things
Are leaſt ſubject to change.
Say. Why, I doe love
A black thing too : and the moſt beauteous faces
Have oftneſt of them : as the blackeſt eyes,
Jet-arched browes, ſuch haire : i'le kiſſe your hand.
Cla. 'Twill hinder me work my ſir : and my Mother
Will chide me, if I doe not doe my taske.
Say. Your Mother, nor your Father ſhall chide : you Might have a prettier taske, would you be rul'd,
And looke with open eyes.
Cla. I ſtare upon you :
And broadly ſee you: a wondrous proper man,
Yet 'twere a greater taske for me to love you
Then I ſhall ever work ſir, in ſeven yeer,
—— o' this ſtitching, I had rather feele
Two, then ſow one: —this rogue h'as giv'n me a ſtitch
Cleane croſſe my heart: good faith ſir: I ſhall prick you.
Say. In goodder faith, I would prick you againe.
Cla. Now you grow troubleſome : piſh ; the man is,
Say. Pray weare theſe trifles. (fooliſh
Cla. Neither you, nor trifles,
You are a trifle, weare your ſelfe, ſir, out,
And here no more trifle the time away.
Say. Come : you're deceived in me, I will not wake,
Nor faſt, nor dye for you.
Cla. Gooſe, be not you deceiv'd,
I can not like, nor love, nor live with you,

Nor

Nor fast, nor watch, nor pray for you.
Eug. Her old fit.
Say. Sure, this is not the way: nay, I will breake
Your melancholie.
Cla. I shall breake your pate then,
Away, you sanguine scabbard.
Eug. Out upon thee
Thou'lt breake my heart, I am sure.
Say. She's not yet tame.
Alv. On sir; put home: or I shall goad you here
With this old Fox of mine, that will bite better:
Oh, the brave age is gone; in my young daies
A Chevalier would stock a needles point
Three times together: strait ith' hams?
Or shall I giv'ye new Garters?
Bob. Faith old Master.
There's little hope: the linnen sure was danck
He was begot in, he's so faint, and cold:
Ev'n send him to Toledo, there to study,
For he will never fadge with these Toledos;
Beare ye up your point there; pick his teeth: Oh' base.
Enter Alvarez, Florato, Lucio: & Bobadilla.
2 Torches ready.
Pio. Fie; you are the most untoward Scholler: beare
Your body gracefully: what a posture's there?
You lie too open breasted.
Luc. Oh!
Pio. You'ld never Make a good Statesman:
Luc. Pray no more.
I hope to breath in peace, and therefore need not
The practise of these dangerous qualities,
I doe not meane to live by't; for I trust
You'l leave me better able.
Alv. Not a Button:
Eugenia, Let's goe get us a new heire.
Eug. I by my troth: your daughter's as untoward.
Alv. I will breake thee bone by bone, and bake thee,
Ere i'le ha' such a woodden Sonne, to inherit:
Take him a good knock; see how that will work.
Pio. Now, for your life Signior:
Luc. Oh: alas, I am kill'd
My eye is out: looke Father: Zancho: ——
Ile play the foole no more thus, that I will not.
Cla. 'Heart: nere a rogue in Spaine shall wrong my brother
Whil'st I can hold a sword.
Pio. Hold, Maddam, Maddam.
Alv. Clara.
Eug. Daughter.
Bob. Mistresse.
Pio. Bradamante.
Hold, hold I pray.
Alv. The devil's in her, o'the other side: sure,
There's Gold for you: they have chang'd what ye calt's:
Will no cure help? well, I have one experiment,
And if that faile, Ile hang him, then here's an end on't.
Come you along with me: and you sir:
Exit
Bob. Now are you going to drowning. Alv. Eug. Luc.
Say. Ile ev'n along with ye: she's too great a Lady Bob.
For me, and would prove more then my match. Exit.
Cla. You'r he spoke of Vitelli to the Steward?
Pio. Yes: and I thank you, you have beat me for't.
Cla. But are you sure you doe not wrong him?
Pio. Sure?
So sure, that if you please venture your selfe
Ile show you him, and his Cockatrice together,
And you shall heare 'em talke.
Cla. Will you? by —— sir
You shall endeere me ever: and I ask
You mercy.
Pio. You were somewhat boystrous. (palmes,
Cla. There's Gold to make you amends: and for this Ile gratifie you further: i'le but masque me (on't. Exit.
And walke along with ye: faith let's make a night

Scena quinta.

Enter Alguazier, Pachieco, Mendoza. Metaldi, Lazarillo.

Alg. Come on my brave water-Spaniels: you that hunt Ducks in the night: and hide more knavery under your gownes then your betters: observe my precepts, and edifie by my doctrine: at yond corner will I set you; if drunkards molest the street, & fall to brabling, knock you down the malefactors, and take you up their cloaks and hats, and bring them to me: they are lawfull prisoners, and must be ransom'd ere they receive liberty: what else you are to execute upon occasion, you sufficiently know: and therefore I abreviat my Lecture.
Met. We are wise enough, and warme enough.
Men. Vice this night shall be apprehended.
Pach. The terror of rug-gownes shall be known: and Discharge us of after recknings. (out bils Laz. I will doe any thing, so I may eat.
Pach. Lazarillo, We will spend no more; now we are growne worse, we will live better: let us follow our calling faithfully. (and who
Alg. Away, then the Common-wealth is our Mistresse: Would serve a common Mistresse, but to gaine by her?
Exeunt.

Actus quartus. Scena prima.

Enter Vitelli, Lamorall, Genevora, Anaffe, and two Pages with lights.

Lam. I pray you see the Masque, my Lord,
Ana. 'Tis early night yet.
Gen. O if it be so late, take me along:
I would not give advantage to ill tongues
To tax my being here, without your presence
To be my warrant.
Vit. You might spare this, Sister,
Knowing with whom I leave you; one that is
By your allowance, and his choice, your Servant.
And may my counsell and perswasion work it,
Your husband speedily: For your entertainement
My thankes; I will not rob you of the meanes
To doe your Mistresse some acceptable service
In waiting on her to my house.
Gen. My Lord,
Vit. As you respect me, without further trouble
Retire, and taste those pleasures prepar'd for you,
And leave me to my own wayes.
Lam. When you please sir. Exeunt.

Scena secunda.

Enter Matrona, and Alguazier.

Mat. You'l leave my Chamber?
Alg. Let us but bill once;
My Dove, my Sparrow, and I, with my office
Will be thy slaves for ever.

Mal. Are you ſo hot?
Alg. But taſte the difference of a man in place,
You'l finde that when authoritie pricks him forward,
Your Don, nor yet your Diego comes not neere him
To doe a Lady right: no men pay deerer
For their ſtolne ſweetes, then we: three minutes trading Affords to any ſinner a protection
For three yeeres after: thinke on that, I burne;
But one drop of your bounty.
Mal. Hence you rogue,
Am I fit for you? is't not grace ſufficient
To have your ſtaffe, a bolt to bar the doore
Where a Don enters, but that you'l preſume
To be his taſter?
Alg. Is no more reſpect
Due to this rod of juſtice?
Mal. Doe you diſpute?
Good Doctor of the Dungeon, not a word more,
—— If you doe, my Lord Vitelli knowes it.
Alg. Why I am bigge enough to anſwer him,
Or any man.
Mal. 'Tis well. Vitelli within.
Vit. Malroda.
Alg. How? (Cur
Mal. You know the voice, and now crowch like a
Tane worrying ſheepe: I now could have you guelded
For a Bawd rampani: but on this ſubmiſſion
For once I ſpare you
Alg. I Will be reveng'd
My honourable Lord.
Vit. There's for thy care
Alg. I am mad, ſtarck mad: proud Pagan ſcorn her hoſt
I would I were but valiant enough to kick her,
Enter Pioratio & Clara, above.
Il'd wiſh no manhood elſe.
Mal. What's that?
Alg. I am gone. Exit.
Pio. You ſee, I have kept my word.
Cla. But in this object
Hardly deſerv'd my thanks.
Pio. Is there ought elſe
You will command me?
Cla. Onely your ſword
Which I muſt have: nay willingly I yet know
To force it, and to uſe it.
Pio. 'Tis yours Lady.
Cla. I ask no other guard.
Pio. If ſo, I leave you:
And now, if that the Conſtable keepe his word,
A poorer man may chance to gull a Lord. Exit.
Mal. By this good —— you ſhall not.
Vit. By this ——
I muſt, and will, Malroda; What doe you make
A ſtranger of me?
Mal. Ile be ſo to you,
And you ſhall find it.
Vit. Theſe are your old arts
T'endeere the game you know I come to hunt for,
Which I have borne too coldly.
Mal. Doe ſo ſtill,
For if I heat you, hang me.
Vit. If you doe not
I know who'll ſtarve for't: why, thou ſhame of women,
Whoſe folly, or whoſe impudence is greater
Is doubtfull to determine; this to me
That know thee for a whore.
Mal. And made me one,
Remember that.
Vit. Why ſhould I but grow wiſe
And tye that bounty up, which nor diſcretion
Nor honour can give way too; thou wouldſt be
A Bawd e're twenty, and within a moneth
A barefoot, lowzie, and diſeaſed whore,
And ſhift thy lodgings oftner then a rogue
That's whipt from poſt to poſt.
Mal. Piſh: all our Colledge
Know you can raile well in this kinde.
Cla. For me
He never ſpake ſo well.
Vit. I have maintain'd thee
The envy of great fortunes, made thee ſhine
As if thy name were glorious: ſtuck thee full
Of jewels, as the firmament of Starrs,
And in it made thee ſo remarkable
That it grew queſtionable, whether vertue poore,
Or vice ſo ſet forth as it is in thee,
Were even by modeſties ſelfe to be prefer'd,
And am I thus repaid?
You are ſtill my debtor;
Can this (though true) be weigh'd with my loſt honour,
Much leſſe my faith? I have liv'd private to you,
And but for you, had ne're known what luſt was,
Nor what the ſorrow for't.
Vit. 'Tis falſe.
Mal. 'Tis true,
But how return'd by you, thy whole life being
But one continued act of luſt, and Shipwrack
Of womens chaſtities.
Vit. But that I know
That ſhe that dares be damn'd dares any thing,
I ſhould admire thy tempting me: but preſume not
On the power you thinke you hold o're my affections,
It will deceive you: yeeld, and preſently
Or by the inflamed blood, which thou muſt quench
Ile make a forcible entrie.
Mal. Touch me not:
You know I have a throat, —— if you doe
I will cry out a rape, or ſheath this here,
Ere i'le be kept, and us'd for Julip-water
T'allay the heate which luſhious meats and wine
And not deſire hath rais'd.
Vit. A deſperate devill,
My blood commands my reaſon: I muſt take
Some milder way.
Mal. I hope (deere Don) I fit you.
The night is mine, although the day was yours
You are not faſting now: this ſpeeding trick
Which I would as a principle leave to all,
That make their maintenance out of their own Indies
As I doe now, my good old mother taught me,
Daughter, quoth ſhe, conteſt not with your lover
His ſtomach being empty, let wine heat him,
And then you may command him: 'tis a ſure one:
His lookes ſhew he is coming.
Vit. Come this needs not,
Eſpecially to me: you know how deere
I ever have eſteemed you.
Cla. Loſt again.
Vit. That any ſight of yours, hath power to change
My ſtrongeſt reſolution, and one teare
Sufficient to command a pardon from me,
For any wrong from you, which all mankinde
Should kneel in vaine for.
Mal. Pray you pardon thoſe
That need your favour, or deſire it
Vit. Prethee.

Be better temper'd: Ile pay as a forfeit
For my rash anger, this purse fil'd with Gold.
Thou shalt have servants, gownes, attires, what not?
Only continue mine.
Mal. 'Twas this I fish'd for
Vit. Look on me, and receive it.
Mal. Well, you know
My gentle nature, and take pride t'abuse it:
You see a trifle pleases me, we are friends;
This kisse, and this confirmes it.
Cla. With my ruine.
Mal. I'le have this dyamond, and this pearle.
Vit. They are yours.
Mal. But wil you not, when you have what you came Take them from me to morrow? tis a fashion (for,
Your Lords of late have us'd.
Vit. But Ile not follow.
Cla. That any man at such a rate as this Should pay for his repentance.
Vit. Shall we to bed now?
Mal. Instantly, Sweet: yet now I think on't better
Ther's something first that in a word or two
I must acquaint you with.
Cla. Can I cry ayme,
To this against my selfe? Ile break this match,
Or make it stronger with my bloud. Descends.

Enter Alguazier, Pisaro, Pachieco, Metaldi, Mendoza, Lazarillo, &c.

Alg. I am yours,
A Don's not priviledged here more then your self,
Win her, and weare her.
Pis. Have you a Priest ready?
Alg. I have him for thee, Lad; and when I have Married this scornefull whore to this poor gallant.
She wil make suit to me; there is a trick
To bring a high-priz'd wench upon her knees:
For you my fine neat Harpyes stretch your tallons
And prove your selves true night-Birds.
Pach. Take my word
For me and all the rest.
Laz. If there be meat
Or any banquet stirring, you shall see
How ile bestow my selfe.
Alg. When they are drawn,
Rush in upon 'em: al's faire prize you light on:
I must away: your officer may give way
To the Knavery of his watch, but must not see it.
You all know where to finde me. Exit.
Met. There look for us.
Vit. Who's that?
Mal. My Pisaro, welcome, welcome:
Faith had you not come when you did, my Lord
Had done I know not what to me.
Vit. I am gul'd,
First cheated of my Jewels, and then laugh'd at:
Sirha, what make you here?
Pis. A businesse brings me,
More lawfull then your own,
Vit. How's that, you slave?
Mal. He's such, that would continue his a whore Whom he would make a wife of.
Vit. Ile tread upon
The face you doat on, strumpet.
Enter Clara.
Pach. Keep the peace there.
Vit. A plot upon my life too?
Met. Down with him.
Cla. Show your old valour, and learn from a woman,
One Eagle has a world of odds against
A flight of Dawes, as these are.
Pis. Get you off,
Ile follow instantly.
Pach. Run for more help there. Exeunt all but Vit. and Cla.
Vit. Losse of my gold, & jewels, & the wench too Clara.
Afflicts me not so much, as th'having Clara
The witnesse of my weaknesse.
Cla. He turns from me,
And yet I may urge merit, since his life
Is made my second gift.
Vit. May I ne'r prosper
If I know how to thank her.
Cla. Sir, your pa don
For pressing thus beyond a Virgins bounds
Upon your privacies: and let my being
Like to a man, as you are, be th'excuse
Of my solliciting that from you, which shall not
Be granted on my part, although desir'd
By any other: sir, you understand me,
And 'twould shew nobly in you, to prevent
From me a farther boldnesse, which I must Proceed in, if you prove not merciful,
Though with my losse of blushes, and good name.
Vit. Madam, I know your wil, and would be thankfull
If it were possible I could affect
The Daughter of an enemy.
Cla. That faire false one
Whom with fond dotage you have long pursu'd
Had such a father: she to whom you pay
Deerer for your dishonour, then all titles
Ambitious men hunt for are worth.
Vit. 'Tis truth.
Cla. Yet, with her, as a friend you still exchange
Health for diseases, and to your disgrace
Nourish the rivals to your present pleasures;
At your own charge, us'd as a property
To give a safe protection to her lust,
Yet share in nothing but the shame of it.
Vit. Grant all this so, to take you for a wife
Were greater hazard, for should I offend you
(As tis not easy still to please a woman)
You are of so great a spirit, that I must learn
To weare your petticoat, for you wil have My breeches from me.
Cla. Rather from this houre
I here abjure all actions of a man,
And wil esteem it happinesse from you
To suffer like a woman: love, true love
Hath made a search within me, and expel'd
All but my naturall softnesse, and made perfect
That which my parents care could not begin.
I wil shew strength in nothing, but my duty;
And glad desire to please you, and in this Grow every day more able.
Vit. Could this be,
What a brave race might I beget? I finde
A kind of yeelding, and no reason why
I should hold longer out: she's yong, and faire,
And chast for sure, but with her leave the Devil Durst not attempt her. Madam, though you have A Souldiers arme, your lips appear as if They were a Ladies.
Cla. They dare sir from you
Endure the tryall.
Vit. Ha: once more I pray you:

The best I ever tasted; and tis said
I have prov'd many, 'tis not safe I feare
To aske the rest now: wel, I will leave whoring
And luck herein send me with her: worthiest Lady,
Ile wait upon you home, and by the way
(If ere I marry, as ile not forswear it)
Tell you, you are my wife.
Cla. Which if you do,
From me all man-kinde women, learne to woe. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Alguazier, Pachieco, Metaldi, Mendoza, Lazarillo.

Alg. A cloak? good purchase, and rich hangers? well,
Wee'l share ten Pistolets a man.
Laz. Yet still
I am monstrous hungry: could you not diduct
So much out of the grosse some, as would purchase
Eight loynes of Veale, and some two dozen of Capons?
Pach. O strange proportion for five.
Laz. For five? I have
A legion in my stomach that have kept
Perpetuall fast these ten years: for the Capons,
They are to me but as so many black Birds:
May I but eate once, and be satisfied,
Let the fates call me, when my ship is fraught,
And I shall hang in peace.
Alg. Steale well to night,
And thou shalt feed to morrow; so now you are
Your selves againe, ile raise another watch
To free you from suspition: set on any
You meet with boldly: Ile not be far off,
T'assist you, and protect you. Exit.
Met. O brave officer.

Enter Alvarez, Lucio, Bobadilla.

Pach. Would every ward had one but so well given,
And we would watch for rug, in gownes of velvet.
Mend. Stand close: a prize.
Met. Satten, and gold Lace, Lads.
Alv. Why do'st thou hang upon me?
Luc. 'Tis so darke
I dare not see my way: for heaven sake father
Let us go home.
Bob. No, ev'n here wee'l leave you:
Let's run away from him, my Lord.
Luc. Oh 'las.
Alv. Thou hast made me mad: and I wil beat thee dead
Then bray thee in a morter, and now mold thee
But I wil after thee.
Bob. 'Twill never be:
He has bin three dayes practising to drink,
Yet still he sips, like to a waiting woman,
And looks as he were murdring of a fart
Among wild Irish swaggerers.
Luc. I have still
Your good word, Lucio, father.
Alv. Milk-sop coward;
No house of mine receives thee: I disclam thee,
Thy mother, on her knees shall not entreat me
Hereafter to acknowledge thee.
Luc. Pray you speak for me.
Bob. I would; but now I cannot with mine honour.
Alv. Ther's only one course left, that may redeem thee,
Which is, to strike the next man that you meet,
And if we chance to light upon a woman,
Take her away, and use her like a man,
Or I wil cut thy hamstrings.
Pach. This makes for us
Alv. What do'st thou do now?
Luc. Sir, I am saying my prayers;
For being to undertake what you would have me,
I know I cannot live.

Enter Lamorell, Genevora, Anastro, and Pages with light.

Lam Madam, I fear
You'l wish you had us'd your coach: your brothers house
Is yet far off.
Gen. The better sir: this walk
Will help digestion after your great supper,
Of which I have fed largely.
Alv. To your task,
Or els you know what follows:
Luc. I am dying:
Now Lord have mercy on me: by your favour,
Sir I must strike you.
Lam. For what cause?
Luc. I know not:
And I must likewise talke with that young Lady,
An houre in private.
Lam. What you must, is doubtfull,
But I am certain sir, I must beat you.
Luc. Help, help.
Alv. Not strik againe?
Lam. How, Alvarez?
An. This for my Lord Virill's love.
Pach. Break out.
And like true theeves, make pray on either side,
But seem to help the stranger.
Bob. Oh my Lord,
They have beat him on his knees.
Luc. Though I want courage;
I yet have a sons duty in me, and Compassion of a fathers danger; than,
That wholy now possesses me.
Alv. Lucio.
This is beyond my hope.
Met. So Lazarillo,
Take up all boy: well done.
Pach. And now steale off
Closely, and cunningly.
An. How? have I found you?
Why Gentlemen, are you madde, to make your selves
A prey to Rogues?
Lam. Would we were off.
Bob. Theeves, theeves.
Lam. Defer our own contention: and down with them.
Luc. Ile make you sure.
Bob. Now he playes the Devil.
Gen. This place is not for me. Exit.
Luc. Ile follow her
Half of my pennance is past ore. Exit.
Enter Alguazier, Assistente and other Watch.
Alg. What noyse?
What tumult's there? keep the Kings peace I charge you.
Pach. I am glad he's come yet.
Alv. O, you keep good Guard
Upon the City, when men of our ranck
Are set upon in the streetes.

Lam.

Lam. The assistance
Shall heare of't be assur'd.
An. And if he be
That carefull Governour he is reported,
You will smart for it.
Alg. Patience, good Signiours:
Let me survey the Rascals: O, I know them,
And thank you for them: they are pillfring rogues
Of Andaluzia, that have perus'd
All Prisons in Castile: I dare not trust
The dungeon with them: no, ile have them home
To my own house.
Pach. We had rather go to prison.
Alg. Had you so dog-bolts? yes, I know you had:
You there would use your cunning fingers on
The simple locks; you would: but ile prevent you. Exit.
Lam My Mistris lost? good night.
Bob. Your Son's gon to,
What should become of him?
Alv. Come of him, what will:
Now he dares fight, I care not: i'le to bed:
Look to your prisoners Alguazier. Exit with Bobs.
Alg. All's cleer'd:
Droop not for one disaster: let us hug,
And triumph in our knaveries.
Assist. This confirmes
What was reported of him.
Met. 'Twas done bravely.
Alg. I must a little glory in the meanes
We officers have, to play the Knaves, and safely:
How we breake through the toyles, pitch'd by the Law,
Yet hang up them that are far lesse delinquents:
A simple shopkeeper's carted for a baud
For lodging (though unwittingly) a smock-Gamster:
Where, with rewards, and credit I have kept
Malrodo in my house, as in a cloyster,
Without taint, or suspition.
Pach. But suppose
The Governour should know't?
Alg. He? good Gentleman,
Let him perplex himself with prying into
The measures in the market, and th'abuses
The day stands guilty of: the pillage of the night
Is only mine, mine own feeimple;
Which you shall hold from me, tenants at will,
And pay no rent for't.
Pach. Admirable Landlord.
Alg. Now wee'l go search the taverns, commit such
As we finde drinking: and be drunk our selves
With what we take from them: these silly wretches
Whom I for forme sake only have brought hither
Shall watch without, and guard us.
Assist. And we will.
See you safe lodg'd, most worthy Alguazier,
With all of you his comrads.
Met. Tis the Governour.
Alg. We are betray'd?
Assist. My guard there: bind them fast:
How men in high place, and authority
Are in their lives and estimation wrong'd
By their subordinate Ministers? yet such
They cannot but imploy: wrong'd justice finding Scarce one true servant in ten officers.
T'expostulate with you, were but to delay
Your crimes due punishment, which shall fall upon you
So speedily, and severely, that it shall Fright others by th'example: and confirme
How ever corrupt officers may disgrace
Themselves, 'tis not in them to wrong their place.
Bring them away.
Alg. Wee'l suffer nobly yet,
And like to Spanish Gallants.
Pach. And wee'l hang so.
Laz. I have no stomach to it: but i'le endeavour.

Exeunt.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Lucio, and Genevora.

Gen. Nay you are rude; pray you forbeare; your offer
More then the breeding of a Gentleman (now
Can give you warrant for.
Luc. Tis but to kisse you,
And think not ile receive that for a favour
Which was enjoyn'd me for a pennance, Lady.
Gen. You have met a gentle confessor, and for once
(So then you wil rest satisfied) I vouchsafe it.
Luc. Rest satisfide with a kisse? why can a man Desire more from a woman? is there any Pleasure beyond it? may I never live
If I know what it is.
Gen. Sweet Innocence.
Luc. VVhat strange new motions do I feele? my veines
Burn with an unknown fire: in every part
I suffer alteration: I am poysond,
Yet languish with desire againe to taste it,
So sweetly it works on me.
Gen. I ne'r saw
A lovely man, till now.
Luc. How can this be?
She is a woman, as my mother is,
And her I have kiss'd often, and brought off
My lips unscorch'd; yours are more lovelie, Lady,
And so should be lesse hurtfull: pray you vouchsafe
Your hand, to quench the heat tane from your Lip,
Perhaps that may restore me.
Gen. VVillinglie.
Luc. The flame increases: if to touch you, burne thus,
VVhat would more strict embraces do? I know not,
And yet methinks to die so, were to ascend
To Heaven, through Paradise.
Gen. I am wounded too,
Though modesty forbids that I should speake
VVhat ignorance makes him bold in: why do you fix
Your eyes so stronglie on me?
Luc. Pray you stand still,
There is nothing els, that is worth the looking on:
I could adore you, Ladie.
Gen. Can you love mee?
Luc. To waite on you, in your chamber, and but touch
VVhat you, by wearing it, have made divine,
Were such a happinesse. I am resov'd,
Ile sell my libertie to you for this glove,
And write my selfe your slave.

Enter Lamvell.

Gen. On easier termes,
Receive it as a friend.
Lam. How! giving favour!
I'le have it with his heart.
Gen. VVhat will you doe?
Luc. As you are mercifull, take my life rather,
Gen. VVill you depart with't so?

Lam. Do's that grieve you?
Gen. I know not: but even now you appeare valiant.
Luc. Twas to preserve my father: in his cause
I could be so again. (enemy?
Gen. Not in your own? Kneel to thy rivall and thine Away unworthy creature, I begin
To hate my selfe, for giving entrance to
A good opinion of thee: For thy torment,
If my poore beauty be of any power,
Mayst thou doat on it desperately: but never Presume to hope for grace, till thou recover
And weare the favour that was ravish'd from thee.
Lam. He weares my head to then.
Gen. Poore foole, farewell. Exit.
Luc. My womanish soul, which hitherto hath governd
This coward flesh, I feele departing from me;
And in me by her beauty is inspir'd
A new, and masculine one: instructing me
What's fit to doe or suffer; powerfull love
That hast with loud, and yet a pleasing thunder
Rous'd sleeping manhood in me, thy new creature,
Perfect thy worke so that I may make known
Nature (though long kept back) wil have her owne.
Exeunt.

Actus Quintus. Scæna prima.

Enter Lamorall and Lucio.

Lam. Can it be possible, that in six short houres
The subject still the same, so many habits
Should be remov'd or this new Lucio, he
That yesternight was baffeld and disgrac'd,
And thankt the man that did it, that then kneeld
And blubberd like a woman, should now dare
One terme of honour seeke reparation
For what he then appear'd not capable of?
Luc. Such miracles, men that dare doe injuries
Live to their shames to see, and for punishment
And scourge to their proud follies.
Lam. Prethee leave me:
Had I my Page, or foot-man here to flesh thee,
I durst the better heare thee.
Luc. This scorn needs not:
And offer such no more.
Lam. Why say I should,
You'l not be angry?
Luc. Indeed I think I shal,
Would you vouchsafe to shew your selfe a Captaine,
And lead a little further, to some place
That's lesse frequented.
Lam. He looks pale.
Luc. If not, (glove
Make use of this.
Lam. There's anger in his eyes too:
His gesture, voyce, behaviour, all new fashion'd;
Wel, if it does endure in act the triall
Of what in show it promises to make good,
Vlysses Cyclops, Io's transformation,
Eurydice fetcht from Hell, with all the rest
Of Ovids Fables, ile put in your Creed:
And for proofe, all incredible things may be Writ down that Lucio, the coward Lamia,
The womanish Lucio fought.
Luc. and Lamorall,
The stil imployd great duellist Lamorall
Took his life from him.
Lam. Twill not come to that sure:
Methinks the onely drawing of my Sword
Should fright that confidence.
Luc. It confirmes it rather.
To make which good, know you stand now oppos'd
By one that is your Rivall, one that wishes
Your name and title greater, to raise his;
The wrong you did, lesse pardonable then it is,
But your strength to defend it, more then ever
It was when justice friended it. The Lady
For whom we now contend, Geneura
Of more desert, (if such incomparable beauty
Could suffer an addition) your love
To Don Vitelli multipli'd, and your hate
Aagainst my father and his house increas'd;
And lastly, that the Glove which you there wear,
To my dishonour, (which I must force from you)
Were deerer to you then your life.
Lam. You'l finde
It is, and so ile guard it:
Luc. All these meet then
With the black infamy, to be foyld by one
That's not allowd a man: to help your valour,
That falling by your hand, I may, or die,
Or win in this one single opposition
My Mistris, and such honour as I may Inrich my fathers Armes with.
Lam. 'Tis said Nobly.
My life with them are at the stake.
Luc. At all then. Fight.
Lam. She's yours: this, and my life, to follow your for-
And give not onely back that part the loser (tune, Scorns to accept of —
Luc. What's that?
Lam. My poor life,
Which do not leave me as a further torment,
Having dispoild me of my Sword, mine honour,
Hope of my Ladies grace, fame, and all else
That made it worth the keeping.
Luc. I take back
No more from you, then what you forc'd from me;
And with a worser title: yet think not
That Ile dispute this, as made insolent
By my successe, but as one equall with you,
If so you wil accept me, that new courage,
Or call it fortune if you please, that is Confer'd upon me by the onely sight
Of fair Geneura, was not bestow'd on me
To bloody purposes: nor did her command
Deprive me of the happinesse to see her
But till I did redeem her favour from you
Which onely I rejoyce in, and share with you
In all you suffer else.
Lam. This curtesie
Wounds deeper then your Sword can, or mine owne;
Pray you make use of either, and dispatch me.
Luc. The barbarous Turke is satisfied with spoile;
And shall I, being possest of what I came for,
Prove the more Infidell?
Lam. You were better be so,
Then publish my disgrace, as tis the custome,
And which I must expect.
Luc. Judge better on me:
I have no tongue to trumpet mine owne praise
To your dishonour: tis a bastard courage

That

That ſeekes a name out that way, no true born one;
Pray you be comforted, for by all goodneſſe
But to her vertuous ſelfe, the beſt part of it,
I never wil diſcover on what termes
I came by theſe: which yet I take not from you,
But leave you in exchange of them, mine own,
With the deſire of being a friend; which if
You wil not grant me, but on further triall
Of manhood in me, ſeeke me when you pleaſe,
(And though I might refuſe it with mine honour)
Win them again, and weare them: ſo good morrow. Exit.

Lam. I nere knew what true valour was till now;
And have gain'd more by this diſgrace, then all
The honours I have won: they made me proud,
Preſumptuous of my fortunes a meere beaſt,
Faſhion'd by them, onely to dare and doe:
Yeelding no reaſons for my wilfull actions
But what I ſtuck on my Swords point, preſuming
It was the beſt Revenew. How unequall Wrongs wel maintain'd makes us to others, which Ending with ſhame teach us to know our ſelves,
I wil think more on't.

Enter Vitelli.

Vit. Lamorall.

Lam. My Lord?

Vit. I came to ſeeke you.

Lam. And unwillingly;
You nere found me till now: your pleaſure ſir?

Vit. That which wil pleaſe thee friend: thy vowd love Shall now be put in action: means is offer'd (to me
To uſe thy good Sword for me; that which ſtill
Thou wearſt, as if it were a part of thee.
Where is it?

Lam. Tis chang'd for one more fortunate:
Pray you enquire not how.

Vit. Why, I nere thought
That there was muſick in't, but aſcribe
The fortune of it to the arme.

Lam. Which is grown weaker too. I am not (in a word)
Worthy your friendſhip: I am one new vanquiſh'd, Yet ſhame to tell by whom.

Vit. But Ile tell thee
'Gainſt whom thou art to fight, and there redeeme
Thy honour loſt, if there be any ſuch:
The King, by my long ſuit, at length is pleaſ'd
That Alvarez and my ſelf, with eithers Second,
Shall end the difference between our houſes,
Which he accepts of. I make choice of thee;
And where you ſpeak of a diſgrace, the means
To blot it out, by ſuch a publique triall
Of thy approved valour, wil revive
Thy ancient courage. If you imbrace it, doe;
If not, Ile ſeeke ſome other.

Lam. As I am
You may command me.

Vit. Spoke like that true friend
That loves not onely for his private end. Exeunt.

Scæna ſecunda.

Enter Gentlewoman with a Letter and Bobadilla.

Gen. This from Madona Clara?

Bob. Yes, and't pleaſe you.

Gen. Alvarez daughter?

Bob. The ſame, Lady.

Gen. She,
That ſav'd my brothers life?

Bob. You are ſtill in the right,
She wil'd me wait your walking forth: and knowing
How neceſſary a diſcreet wiſe man
Was in a buſineſſe of ſuch weight, ſhe pleaſ'd
To think on me; it may be in my face
Your Ladiſhip not acquainted with my wiſdome
Finds no ſuch matter: what I am, I am;
Thought's free: and think you what you pleaſe.

Gen. Tis ſtrange,

Bob. That I ſhould be wiſe, Madam?

Gen. No, thou art ſo;
There's for thy paines: and prethee tell thy Lady
I wil not faile to meet her: Ile receive
Thy thanks and duty in thy preſent abſence:
Farewell, farewel, I ſay, now thou art wiſe. Exit Bob.
She writes here, ſhe hath ſomething to impart
That may concerne my brothers life; I know not,
But generall fame does give her out ſo worthy,
That I dare not ſuſpect her: yet wiſh Lucio

Enter Lucio.

Were Maſter of her mind: but fie upon't;
Why do I think on him? ſee, I am puniſh'd for it;
In his unlookd for preſence: Now I muſt
Endure another tedious piece of Courtſhip,
Would make one forſweare curteſie.

Luc. Gracious Madam,
The ſorrow paid for your juſt anger towards me
Ariſing from my weakneſſe, I preſume
To preſſe into your preſence, and diſpaire not An eaſie pardon.

Gen. He ſpeaks ſence: oh ſtrange.

Luc. And yet believe, that no deſire of mine,
Though all are too ſtrong in me, had the power
For their delight, to force me to infringe
What you commanded, it being in your part
To leſſen your great rigour when you pleaſe,
And mine to ſuffer with an humble patience
What you'l impoſe upon it.

Gen. Courtly too.

Luc. Yet hath the poore, and contemn'd Lucio, Madam,
(Made able onely by his hope to ſerve you,)
Recover'd what with violence, not juſtice,
Was taken from him: and here at your feet
With theſe, he could have laid the conquer'd head
Of Lamorall (tis all I ſay of him)
For rudely touching that, which as a relique
I ever would have worſhip'd, ſince twas yours.

Gen. Valiant, and every thing a Lady could Wiſh in her ſervant.

Luc. All that's good in me,
That heavenly love, the oppoſite to baſe luſt,
Which would have all men worthy, hath created;
Which being by your beames of beauty form'd,
Cheriſh as your own creature.

Gen. I am gone
Too far now to diſſemble: riſe, or ſure
I muſt kneele with you too: let this one kiſſe
Speake the reſt for me: tis too much I doe,
And yet, if chaſtity would, I could wiſh more.

Luc. In over-joying me, you are grown ſad;
What is it Madam? by ——
There's nothing that's within my nerves (and yet Favour'd by you, I ſhould as much as man)
But when you pleaſe, now or on all occaſions
You can think of hereafter, but you may Diſpoſe of at your pleaſure.

Gen.

Gen. If you breake
That oath again, you loſe me. Yet ſo wel
I love you, I ſhall never put you to't;
And yet forget it not: reſt ſatisfied
With that you have receiv'd now: there are eyes
May be upon us, till the difference Between our friends are ended: I would not Be ſeen ſo private with you.

Luc. I obey you.

Gen. But let me heare oft from you, and remember
I am Vitellies ſiſter.

Luc. What's that Madam?

Gen. Nay nothing, fare you well: who feeles loves fire,
Would ever aske to have means to deſire. Exeunt

Scena tertia.

Enter Aſſiſtente, Sayavedra, Anaſtro, Herald, Attendants.

Aſſiſ. Are they come in?

Her. Yes.

Aſſiſ. Read the Proclamation,
That all the people here aſſembled may
Have ſatisfaction, what the Kings deere love,
In care of the Republique, hath ordained;
Attend with ſilence: read aloud.

Herald reads.

FOraſmuch as our high and mighty Maſter, Philip, the potent and moſt Catholique King of Spaine, hath not onely in his own Royall perſon, been long, and often ſollicited, and grieved, with the deadly and uncurable hatred, ſprung up betwixt the two ancient and moſt honourably diſcended Houſes of theſe his two deerely and equally beloved Subjects, Don Ferdinando de Alvarez, and Don Pedro de Vitelli: (all which in vaine his Majeſty hath often endeavoured to reconcile and qualifie:) But that alſo through the debates, quarrels, and outrages daily ariſing, falling, and flowing from theſe great heads, his publique civill Government is ſeditiouſly and barbarouſly moleſted and wounded, and many of his chiefe Gentry (no leſſe tender to his Royall Majeſty then the very branches of his own ſacred blood) ſpoyld, loſt, and ſubmerged, in the impious inundation and torrent of their ſtill-growing malice: It hath therefore pleaſed His ſacred Majeſty, out of His infinite affection to preſerve his Common-wealth, and generall peace, from farther violation, (as a ſweet and heartily loving father of his people) and on the earneſt petitions of theſe Arch-enemies, to Order, and Ordaine, That they be ready, each with his welchoſen and beloved friend, arm'd at all points like Gentlemen, in the Caſtle of St. Jago, on this preſent Munday morning betwixt eight and nine of the clocke; where (before the combatants be allowed to commence this granted Duell) This to be read aloud for the publique ſatisfaction of his Majeſties welbeloved Subjects.

'Save the King. Drums within.

Say. Hark how their Drums ſpeak their inſatiate thirſt
Of blood, and ſtop their eares 'gainſt pious peace,
Who gently whiſpering, implores their friendſhip?

Aſſiſ. Kings, nor authority can maſter fate;
Admit 'em then, and blood extinguiſh hate.

Enter ſeverally, Alvarez and Lucio, Vitelli and Lamora.

Say. Stay, yet be pleaſd to think, and let not daring
Wherein men nowadaies exceed even beaſts,
And think themſelves not men elſe, ſo tranſport you
Beyond the bounds of Chriſtianity:
Lord Alvarez, Vitelli, Gentlemen,
No Town in Spaine, from our Metropolis
Unto the rudeſt hovell, but is great
With your aſſured valours daily proofes:
Oh wil you then, for a ſuperfluous fame,
A ſound of honour, which in theſe times, all
Like heretiques profeſſe (with obſtinacy)
But moſt erroneouſly, venture your ſoules,
Tis a hard taſque, thorough a Sea of blood
To ſaile, and land at Heaven?

Vit. I hope not
If juſtice be my Pilot: but my Lord,
You know, if argument, or time, or love,
Could reconcile, long ſince we had ſhook hands;
I dare proteſt, your breath cooles not a veine
In any one of us, but blowes the fire
Which nought but blood reciprocall can quench.

Alv. Vitelli, thou ſayſt bravely, and ſayſt right,
And I wil kill thee for't, I love thee ſo.

Vit. Ha, ha, old man: upon thy death Ile build
A ſtory (with this arme) for thy old wife
To tell thy daughter Clara ſeven yeeres hence
As ſhe ſits weeping by a wintet fire,
How ſuch a time Vitelli ſlew her husband
With the ſame Sword his daughter favour'd him,
And lives, and weares it yet: Come Lamorall,
Redeeme thy ſelfe.

Lam. Lucio, Genevora
Shall on this Sword receive thy bleeding heart,
For my preſented hat, laid at her feet.

Luc. Thou talkſt wel Lamorall, but tis thy head
That I wil carry to her to thy hat:
Fie father, I do coole too much.

Alv. Oh boy:
Thy fathers true ſonne:
Beat Drums,---and ſo good morrow to your Lordſhip.

Enter above Eugenia, Clara, Genevora.

Say. Brave reſolutions.

Anaſt. Brave, and Spaniſh right.

Gen. Lucio.

Cla. Vitelli.

Eug. Alvarez.

Alv. How the devill
Got theſe Cats into th' gutter? my puſſe too?

Eug. Heare us.

Gen. We muſt be heard.

Cla. We will be heard
Vitelli; looke, ſee Clara on her knees
Imploring thy compaſſion: Heaven, how ſternly
They dart their emulous eyes, as if each ſcorn'd
To be behind the other in a look!
Mother, death needs no Sword here: oh my ſiſter
(Fate faine would have it ſo) perſwade, entreat,
A Ladies teares are ſilent Orators
(Or ſhould be ſo at leaſt) to move beyond

The

The honest corrupted Rethorician:
Why will you fight? why do's an uncles death
Twentie yeare old, exceed your love to me
But twentie daies? whose fore'd mouse, and faire manner
You could not understand, onely have heard.
Custome, that wrought so cunningly on nature
In me, that I forgot my sex, and knew not Whether my body femall were, or male,
You did unweave, and had the power to charme
A new creation in me, made me feare
To think on those deeds I did perpetrate,
How little power though you allow to me,
That cannot with my sighes, my teares, my prayers
Move you from your own losse, if you should gaine.
Vit. I must forget your Gloria, till I have Redeem'd my uncles blood, that brands my face
Like a pestiferous Carbuncle: I am blinde,
To what you doe: deafe to your cries: and Marble
To all impulsive exorations.
When on this point, I have pearch'd thy fathers soule,
Ile tender thee this bloody reeking hand
Drawne forth the bowels of that murtherer:
If thou canst love me then, i'le marry thee,
And for thy father lost, get thee a Sonne;
On no condition else.
Assist. Most barbarous.
Say. Savage.
Amost. Irreligious.
Gen. Oh Lucio!
Be thou more mercifull: thou bear'st fewer yeers,
Art lately wean'd from soft effeminacy,
A maidens manners, and a maidens heart
Are neighbours still to thee: be then more milde,
Proceed not to this combat; be't thou desperate
Of thine owne life; yet (dearest) pitty mine
Thy valour's not thine owne; I gave it thee,
These eyes begot it, this tongue bred it up,
This breast would lodge it: doe not use my gifts
To mine own ruine: I have made thee rich,
Be not so thankleſſe, to undoe me for't.
Luc. Mistresse, you know I doe not weare a vaine.
I would not rip for you, to doe you service:
Life's but a word, a shadow, a melting dreame,
Compar'd to essentiall, and eternall honour.
Why, would you have me value it beyond
Your brother: if I first cast down my sword
May all my body here, be made one wound,
And yet my soule not finde heaven thorough it.
Alv. You would be eatter-walling too, but peace, Goe, get you home, and provide dinner for
Your Sonne, and me: we'l be exceeding merry:
Oh Lucio, I will have thee cock of all
The proud Vitellies that doe live in Spaine:
Fie, we shall take cold: hunch: I am hoarse Already.
Lam. How your Sister whets my spleene?
I could eate Lucio now:
Gen. Lamorall: you have often sworne
You'ld be commanded by me.
Gen. Vitelli, Brother,
Ev'n for your Fathers soule, your uncles blood,
As you doe love my life: but last, and most
As you respect your own Honour, and Fame,
Throw downe your sword; he is most valiant
That herein yeelds first.
Vit. Peace, you foole.
Cla. Why Lucio,
Doe thou begin; 'tis no disparagement:
He's elder, and thy better, and thy valour
Is in his infancy.
Gen Or pay it me,
To whom thou ow'st it: Oh, that constant time
Would but goe back a week, then Lucio
Thou would'st not dare to fight.
Eug. Lucio, thy Mother,
Thy Mother beggs it: throw thy sword down first.
Alv. Ile throw his head downe after then.
Gen. Lamorall.
You have often sworne you'ld be commanded by me.
Lam. Never to this: your spight, and scorn Genevora
Has lost all power in me.
Gen. Your hearing for six words.
Ass. Say. An. Strange obstinacy!
Al. Vit. Lu. Lam. We'l stay no longer.
Cla. Then by thy oath Vitelli,
Thy dreadfull oath, thou would'st returne that sword
When I should aske it, give it to me, now,
This instant I require it.
Gen. By thy vow,
As dreadfull Lucio, to obey my will
In any one thing, I would watch to challenge,
I charge thee not to strike a stroake: now he
Of our two brothers that loves perjurie
Best, and dares first be damn'd, infringe his vow.
Say. Excellent Ladies.
Vit. Pish, you tyrannize.
Luc. We did equivocate.
Alv. On.
Cla. Then Lucio,
So well I love my husband, for he is so,
(wanting but ceremony) that I pray
His vengefull sword may fall upon thy head successfully for false-hood to his Sister.
Gen. I likewise pray (Vitelli) Lucio's sword (who equally is my husband, as thou hers)
May finde thy false heart, that durst gage thy faith,
And durst not keepe it.
Assist. Are you men, or stone.
Alv. Men, and we'l prove it with our swords:
Eug. Your hearing for six words, and we have done.
Zancho come forth--we'l fight our challenge too: Enter
Now speake your resolutions. Bobadilla with two
Gen. These they are, swords and a Pistoll.
The first blow given betwixt you, sheathes these swords
In one anothers bosomes.
Eug. And rogue, looke
You at that instant doe discharge that Pistoll
Into my breast: if you start back, or quake,
Ile stick you like a Pigge.
Alv. —— hold: you are mad.
Gen. This we said: and by our hope of blisse
This we will doe: speake your intents.
Cla. Gen. Strike.
Eug. Shoot.
Al. Vit. Lu. Lam. Hold, hold: all friends.
Assist. Come down.
Alv. These devilish women
Can make men friends and enemies when they list.
Say. A gallant undertaking and a happie;
Why this is noble in you: and will be
A well comer present to our Master Philip
Then the returne from his Indies. Enter Clara,
Cla. Father your blessing. Genevora Eugenia
Alv. Take her: if he bring not and Bobadilla.
Betwixt you, boyes that will finde out new worlds,
And win 'em too I'm a false Prophet.

Vit.

Vit. Brother.
There is a Sister: long divided streames
Mix now at length, by fate.

Bob. I am not regarded: I was the carefull Steward that provided these Instruments of peace, I put the longest weapon in your Sisters hand, (my Lord) because she was the shortest Lady: For likely the shortest Ladies, love the longest-men: And for mine own part, I could have discharged it: my Pistoll is no ordinary Pistoll, it has two ramming Bullets; but thought I, why should I shoot my two bullets into my old Lady? if they had gon, I would not have staid long after: I would ev'n have died too, bravely y'faith, like a Roman-Steward: hung my selfe in mine owne Chaine; and there had been a story of Bobadilla, Spindola, Zanebe, for after ages to lament: hum: I perceive I am not onely not regarded, but also not rewarded.

Alv, Prethee peace: 'shalt have a new chaine, next Saint Iaques day, or this new gilt:

Bob. I am satisfied: let vertue have her due: And yet i am melancholy upon this atonement: pray heaven the State rue it not: I would my Lord Vitelles Steward, and I could meet: they should finde it should cost 'em a little more to make us friends: well, I will forsweare wine, and women for a yeere: and then I will be drunk to morrow, and runne a whoring like a dogge with a broken bottle at's taile; then will I repent next day, and forsweare 'em againe more vehemently: be for-sworne next day againe, and repent my repentance: for thus a melancholy Gentleman doth, and ought to live.

Assist. Nay, you shall dine with me: and afterward
Ile with 'ye to the King: But first, I will Dispatch the Castles businesse, that this day
May be compleat. Bring forth the malefactors. Enter Al-
You Alguazier, the Ringleader of these guazier,
Poore fellowes, are degraded from your office, Pachieco,
You must restore all stolne goods you receiv'd, Metaldi,
And watch a twelve moneth without any pay: Mendoza,
This, if you faile of, (all your goods confiscate) Lazaril.
You are to be whipt, and sent into the Gallies. Pio.
Alg. I like all, but restoring that Catholique Medrad.
doctrine & Guard.
I doe dislike: Learn all ye officers
By this to live uprightly (if you can.) Exit.
Assist. You Cobler, to translate your manners new,
Are doom'd to th' Cloyster of the Mendicants,
With this your brother; botcher there, for nothing
To cobble, and heel hose for the poor Friers,
Till they allow your penitance for sufficient,
And your amendment; then you shall be freed,
And may set up againe, Pach. Mendoza, come.
Our soules have trod awry, in all mens sight, (Mend.
We'l underlay 'em, till they goe upright. Exit. Pach. &
Assist. Smith, in those shackles you for your hard heart Must lye by th' heeles a yeer.
Met. I have shod your horse, my Lord. Exit.
Assist. Away: for you, my hungry white-loaf'd face,
You must to th' Gallies, where you shall be sure
To have no more bits, then you shall have blowes.
Laz. Well, though herrings want, I shall have rowes.
Assist. Signior, you have prevented us, and punish'd
Your selfe severeller then we would have done.
You have married a whore: may she prove honest.
Pio. 'Tis better my Lord, then to marry an honest wo-
That may prove a whore. (man
Vit. 'Tis a handsome wench: and thou canst keepe her Ile send you what I promis'd. (time:
Pio. Joy to your Lordships.
Alv. Here may all Ladies learne, to make of foes
The perfect'st friends: and not the perfect'st foes
Of dearest friends, as some doe now a dayes.
Vit. Behold the power of love, to nature lost
By custome irrecoverably, past the hope
Of friends restoring, love hath here retriv'd
To her own habit, made her blush to see
Her so long monstrous metamorphoses,
May strange affaires never have worse successe. Exeunt.

EPILOGUE.

OVr Author feares there are some Rebell hearts,
Whose dulnesse doth oppose loves peircing darts;
Such will be apt to say there wanted wit,
The language low, very few scænes are writ
With spirit and life; such odde things as these
He cares not for, nor ever meanes to please;
For if your selves a Mistresse or loves friends,
Are lik't with this smooth Play he hath his ends.

FINIS.

A PROLOGUE.

At the reviving of this Play.

STatues and Pictures challenge price and fame;
If they can juſtly boaſt, and prove they came From Phidias or Apelles. None deny,
Poets and Painters hold a ſympathy;
Yet their workes may decay and loſe their grace,
Receiving blemiſh in their limbs or face.
When the minds art has this preheminence,
She ſtill retaineth her firſt excellence.
Then why ſhould not this deere peece be eſteem'd
Child to the richeſt fancies that ere teem'd?
When not their meaneſt off-ſpring, that came forth,
But bore the image of their fathers worth.
Beaumonts, and Fletchers, whoſe deſert outwayes
The beſt applauſe, and their leaſt ſprig of Bayes
Is worthy Phœbus; and who comes to gather
Their fruits of wit, he ſhall not rob the treaſure.
Nor can you ever ſurfeit of the plenty,
Nor can you call them rare, though they be dainty:
The more you take, the more you do them right,
And wee will thanke you for your own delight.

A PROLOGUE

At the leaving of the Play.

Tarres and Pictures challenge price and fame;
If they can purly speak, and prove they came
From Athens or some Greekish Dorye.
Nor do
Poets and Painters both a Sympathy,
Receiving blemish in their lims or face
When the marks are but this proportion.
The Full attaineth her full excellence.
Then why should not this decent piece be cherished
Child to the richest fancies that are read?
When not their meanest offspring that came forth
Scarce one, and Fletcher, whole deformities
The best applaud, and their least lights have Worthy Reader, and who comes to spell
Nor can you ever learn of the plenty,
Nor can you read them, but by delay.
Then your pains, the more you do them right
And we will thanke you for your own delight.

Queene of Corinth.

The Honeſt mans Fortune.

Actus primus—— Scena prima:

Enter the Duke of Orleans, and the Earle of Amiens at ſeverall doores.

Ame.

MOrrow my Lord of Orleance.

Orl. You ſalute me like a ſtranger; brother Orleance were to me a Title more belonging, whom you call the husband of your ſiſter.

Ami. Would the circumſtances of your brotherhood had never offer'd cauſe to make our converſation leſſe familiar: I meet you like a hinderance in your way: your great law ſuit is now upon the tongue, and ready for a judgement.

Orl. Came you from the Hall now?

Ami. Without ſtay: the Court is full, and ſuch a preſſe of people does attend the iſſue, as if ſome great man were brought to his araignment.

Orl. Every mothers ſonne of all that multitude of hearers went to be a witneſſe of the miſery your ſiſters fortunes muſt have come to, if my adverſary who did love her firſt, had been her husband.

Ami. The ſucceſſe may draw a teſtimony from them to confirme the ſame opinion, but they went prepar'd with no ſuch hope or purpoſe.

Orl. And did you intreat, the number of them that are come with no ſuch hope or purpoſe.

Ami. Tuſh, your own experience of my heart can anſwer ye.

Orl. This doubtfull, makes me clearly underſtand your diſpoſition.

Ami. If your cauſe be juſt,
I wiſh you a concluſion like your cauſe.

Orl. I can have any common charity to ſuch a prayer
From a friend I would expect a love to proſper in;
Without exceptions ſuch a love as might
Make all my undertakings thankfull ſo'ts;
Preciſely juſt is ſeldome thankfull in our wiſhes
To another mans deſires: Farewell. Exit Orl.

Enter Montague having a Patent, Dubois, Longueville, and Voramer the Fidler with two Gardes:

Dub. Here comes your adverſaries brother in law.

Long. The Lord of Amiens.

Dub. From the Hall I thinke.

Ami. I did ſo: ſave your Lordſhip!

Mont. That's a wiſh my Lord, as courteous to my preſent ſtate,
As ever honeſt mind was thankfull for.
For now my ſafety muſt expoſe it ſelfe
To queſtion: yet to look for any free
Or hearty ſalutation (ſir from you)
Would be unreaſonable in me.

Ami. Why?

Mont. Your ſiſter is my adverſaries wife;
That neerneſſe ne:ds muſt conſequently draw
Your inclination to him.

Ami. I will grant
Him all the neerneſſe his alliance claimes,
And yet be nothing leſſe impartiall
My Lord of Montague.

Mont. Lord of Montague yet:
But (ſir) how long the dignity or ſtate
Belonging to it will continue, ſtands
Upon the dangerous paſſage of this houre,
Either for ever more to be confirm'd,
Or like the time wherein twas pleaded, gone:
Gone with it, never to be call'd again.

Ami. Juſtice direct your proceſſe to the end;
To both your perſons my reſpect ſhall ſtil
Be equall; but the righteous cauſe is that
Which bears my wiſhes to the ſide it holds,
Wherſ,-ver may it proſper. Exit Amiens.

Mont. Then my thanks
Are proper to you, if a man may raiſe
A confidence upon a lawfull ground
I have no reaſon to be once perplexed
With any doubtfull motion, Longueville,
That Lord of Amiens, (didſt obſerve him?) has
A worthy nature in him.

Long. Either tis his nature or his cunning.

Mont. That's the viſard of moſt mens actions,
Whoſe diſſembled lives
Do carry onely the ſimilitude
Of goodneſſe on 'em, but for him
Honeſt behaviour makes a true report,
What diſpoſition does inhabit him,
Eſſentiall vertue.

Long. Then tis pitty that Injurious Orleance is his brother.

Dub. He is but his brother in law.

Long. Law? that's as bad.

Dub. How is your Law as bad? I rather wiſh
The hangman thy executor then that Equivocation ſhould be ominous.

Enter two Lawyers, and two Creditors.

Long. Some of your Lawyers.——

1 Law. What is ominous?

2 Law. Let no diſtruſt trouble your Lordſhips thought.
1 Law. The evidences of your queſtion'd land
Ha' not much as any literall
Advantage in 'em to be made againſt
Your title.
2 Law. And your Councell underſtands
The buſineſſe fully.
1 Law. Th'are induſtrious, juſt.
2 Law. And very confident.
1 Law. Your ſtate endures
A voluntary tryall; like a man
Whoſe honours are maliciouſly accus'd.
2 Law. The Accuſation ſerves to cleare his cauſe.
1 Law. And to approve his truth more.
2 Law. So ſhall all
Your adverſaries pleadings ſtrengthen your Poſſeſſion.
1 Law. And be ſet upon record
To witneſſe the hereditary right
Of you and yours.
2 Law. Courage, you have the law.
Long. And you the profits.
Mont. If diſcouragement
Could worke upon me, your aſſurances
Would put me ſtrongly into heart again;
But I was never fearfull: and let fate
Deceive my expectation, yet I am Prepared againſt dejection.
1 Cred. So are we.
2 Cred. We have received a comfortable hope
That all will ſpeed well.
Long. What is he Dubois?
Dub. A Creditor.
Long. I thought ſo, for he ſpeaks
As if he were a partner in his ſtate.
Mont. Sir, I am largely indebted to your loves.
Long. More to their purſes.
Mont. Which you ſhall not loſe.
1 Cred. Your Lordſhip.
Dub. That's another creditor.
1 Cred. Has intereſt in me.
Long. You have more of him.
1 Cred. And I have had ſo many promiſes
From theſe and all your learned Conncellors,
How certainly your cauſe will proſper: that—
Long. You brought no Serjeants with you?
Dub. To attend his ill ſucceſſe.
Mont. Good ſir, I will not be Unthankfull either to their induſtries
Or your affections.
1 Law. All your land (my Lord)
Is at the bar now, give me but ten Crowns
Ile ſave you harmleſſe.
Long. Take him at his word;
If he does loſe, you're ſav'd by miracle,
For I never knew a lawyer yet undone.
1 Law. Then now you ſhall ſir, if this proſpers not.
Long. Sir, I beſeech you doe not force your voyce
To ſuch a loudneſſe, but be thrifty now;
Preſerve it till you come to plead at bar
It will be much more profitable in
The ſatisfaction then the promiſe.
1 Law. Is not this a ſacisfaction to engage My ſelfe for this aſſurance, if he—
Mont. No ſir, my ruine never ſhall import
Anothers loſſe, if not by accident,
And that my purpoſe is not guilty of:
You are engaged in nothing but your care. Exit Law.
Attend the Procurator to the Court,
Obſerve how things incline, and bring me word.
Long. I dare not ſir; if I be taken there,
Mine eares will be in danger.
Mont. Why? haſt thou
Committed ſomething that deſerves thine eares?
Long. No, but I feare the noyſe; my hearing will be Periſhed by the noiſe; tis as good 't want
A member, as to looſe the uſe—
Mont. The ornament is excepted.
Long. Well my Lord
Ile put 'em to the hazzard. Exit Long.
1 Cred. Your deſires be proſperous to you.
2 Cred. Our beſt prayers waite
Upon your fortune. Exeunt Cred.
Dub. For your ſelves, not him.
Mont. Thou canſt not blame 'em: I am in their debt.
Ver. But had your large expence (a part whereof
You owe 'em) for unprofitable Silkes
And Laces, been beſtowed among the poore,
That would have prayd the right way for you:
Not upon you.
Mont. For unprofitable Silkes
And Laces? now believe me honeſt boy
Th'aſt hit upon a reprehenſion that belongs Unto me.
Ver. By——my Lord,
I had not ſo unmannerly a thought,
To reprehend you.
Mont. Why I love thee for't.
Mine own acknowledgement confirmes thy words:
For once I do remember, comming from
The Mercers, where my Purſe had ſpent it ſelfe
On thoſe unprofitable toyes thou ſpeakſt of,
A man halfe naked with his poverty
Did meet me, and requeſted my reliefe:
I wanted whence to give it, yet his eyes
Spoke for him, thoſe I could have ſatisfied
With ſome unfruitfull ſorrow, (if my teares
Would not have added rather to his griefe,
Then eaſ'd it) but the true compaſſion that
I ſhould have given I had not: this began
To make me think how many ſuch mens wants
The vaine ſuperfluous coſt I wore upon
My outſide would have clothed, and left my ſelfe
A habit as becomming: to encreaſe
This new conſideration there came one
Clad in a garment plaine and thrifty, yet
As decent as theſe faire deare follies; made
As if it were of purpoſe to deſpiſe
The vanity of ſhow: his purſe had ſtill
The power to doe a charitable deed,
And did it.
Dub. Yet your inclination, ſir,
Deſerv'd no leſſe to be commended, then his action.
Mont. Prethee do not flatter me;
He that intends well, yet deprives himſelfe
Of means to put his good thoughts into deed,
Deceives his purpoſe of the due reward
That goodneſſe merits: O antiquity
Thy great examples of Nobility
Are out of imitation, or at leaſt
So lamely follow'd, that thou art as much
Before this age in vertue, as in time.
Dub. Sir, it muſt needs be lamely followed, when
The chiefeſt men love to follow it
Are for the moſt part cripples.
Mont. Who are they?

Dub. Souldiers, my Lord, souldiers.
Mont. Tis true Dubois: but if the Law disables me no
For Noble actions, then good purposes, (more
Ile practice how to exercise the worth
Commended to us by our ancestors;
The poore neglected souldier shall command
Me from a Ladies Courtship, and the forme
Ile study shall no more be caught me by
The Taylor, but the Scholler; that expence
Which hitherto has been to entertaine
Th' intemperate pride and pleasure of the taste
Shall fill my Table more to satisfie,
And lesse to surfeit.
What an honest worke it would be; when we finde
A Virgin in her poverty, and youth
Inclining to be tempted, to imploy
As much perswasion, and as much expence
To keep her upright as men use to do upon her falling.
Dub. Tis charity that many mayds wil be unthankful
And some will rather take it for a wrong, (for,
To buy 'em out of their inheritance,
The thing that they were born to.
Enter Longueville. (thy face.
Mont. Longueville thou bringst a cheerfull promise in There stands no pale report upon thy cheeke, (lively.
To give me feare or knowledge of my losse, tis red and How proceeds my suit?
Long. That's with labour sir, a labour that to those of May adde anothers, or (at least) be cald (Hercules
A imitation of this burning shirt:
For twas a paine of that unmercifull
Perplexity, to shoulder through the throng
Of people that attended your successe:
My sweaty linnen fixt upon my skin,
Still as they puld me, tooke that with it; 'twas
A feare I should have left my flesh among 'em:
Yet I was patient, for (me thought) the toyle
Might be an emblem of the difficult
And weary passage to get out of Law.
And to make up the deare similitude,
When I was forth seeking my handkircher
To wipe my sweat off, I did finde a cause
To make me sweat more, for my Purse was lost
Among their finger.
Dub. There twas rather found.
Long. By them.
Dub. I mean so.
Mont. Well, I will restore
Thy dammage to thee: how proceeds my suit?
Long. Like one at Brokers; I thinke forfeited.
Your promising councell at the first
Put strongly forward with a labour'd speed,
And such a violence of pleading, that
His fee in Sugar-candie scarce will make
His throat a satisfaction for the hurt
He did it, and he carried the whole cause
Before him with so cleare a passage, that
The people in the favour of your side
Cried Montague, Montague: in the spight of him
That cryed out silence, and began to laugh
Your adversaries Advocate to scorn:
Who like a cunning foot-man? set me forth
With such a temperate easie kind of course
To put him into exercise of strength,
And follow'd his advantages so close, (wonne,
That when your hot mouthed pleader thought 'had Before he reacht it, he was out of breath,
And then the other stript him.
Mont. So all is lost.
Long. But how I know not, for (me thought) I stood Confounded with the clamour of the Court,
Like one embarqued upon a storm at Sea,
Where the tempestuous noise of Thunder mixt
With roaring of the billows, and the thick
Imperfect language of the Sea-men, takes His understanding and his safety both Together from him.
Mont. Thou dost bring ill news Long. Of what I was unwilling to have been
The first reporter.
Mont. Didst observe no more?
Long. At least no better.
Mont. Then th' art not informd
So well as I am; I can tell thee that
Will please thee, for when all else left my cause,
My very adversaries tooke my part.
Long. —— whosoever told you that abused you.
Mont. Credit me, he took my part
When all forsook me.
Long. Took it from you.
Mont. Yes I meane so, and I think he had just cause
To take it when the verdict gave it him.
Dub. His Spirit would ha' sunke him, ere he could Have carried an ill fortune of this waight so lightly.
Mont. Nothing is a misery unlesse our weakness apprehend it so;
We cannot be more faithfull to our selves
In any thing that's manly, then to make
Ill fortune as contemptible to us
As it makes us to others.
Enter Lawyers.
Long. Here come they Whose very countenances will tell you how Contemptible it is to others.
Mont. Sir?
Long. The sir of Knighthood may be given him, ere
They heare you now.
Mont. Good sir but a word.
Dub. How soon the losse of wealth makes any man
Grow out of knowledge.
Long. Let me see I pray sir,
Never stood you upon the pillory?
1 Law. The Pillory?
Long. O now I know you did not.
Y'ave eares, I thought ye had lost 'em; pray observe,
Here's one that once was gracious in our eyes.
1 Law. O my Lord, have an eye upon him.
Long. But ha' you nere a Counsell to redeeme
His Land yet from the judgement?
2 Law. None but this, a writ of errour to remove the cause.
Long. No more of errour, we have been in that too much already.
2 Law. If you will reverse the judgement, you must trust to that delay.
Long. Delay? Indeed he's like to trust to that,
With you has any dealing. (Sessions.
2 Law. Ere the Law proceeds to an habere facias post
Dub. That's a language sir, I understand not.
Long. Th'art a very strange unthankfull fellow to have taken Fees of such a liberall measure, and then give a man hard words for's money.
1 Law. If men will hazzard their salvations,
What should I say? I've other businesse.
Mont. Y'are ith' right;
That's it you should say now prosperity has left me.

Enter two Creditors.

1 Cred. Have an eye upon him: if
We loſe him now, he's gone for ever: ſtay
And dog him: Ile goe fetch the officers.
Long. Dog him you blood-hound: by this point thou ſhalt more ſafely dog an angry Lion then attempt him.
Mont. What's the matter? (your loſſe Long. Doe but ſtirre to fetch a Serjeant; and (beſides Of labour) Ile have you beaten, till
Thoſe caſements in your faces be falſe lights.
Dub. Falſer then thoſe you ſell by!
Mont. Who gave you Commiſſion to abuſe my friends thus?
Lon. Sir, are thoſe your friends that would betray you?
Mont. Tis to ſave themſelves rather then betray me.
1 Cred. Your Lordſhip makes a juſt conſtruction of it.
2 Cred. All our deſire is but to get our own.
Long. Your wives deſires and yours do differ then.
Mont. So far as my ability will goe
You ſhall have ſatisfaction Longeville,
Long. And leave your ſelfe neglected; every man
Is firſt a debtor to his own demands, being honeſt.
Mont. As I take it ſir, I did
Not entertaine you for my counſellor.
Long. Counſel's the office of a ſervant,
When the maſter falls upon a danger: as Defence is never threaten with your eyes,
They are no cockatrices; do you heare?
Talke with a Girdler, or a Milner,
He can informe you of a kind of men
That firſt undid the profit of thoſe trades
By bringing up the forme of carrying
There morglachs in their hands: with ſome of thoſe
A man may make himſelfe a priviledge
To aske a queſtion at the priſon gates,
Without your good permiſſion.
2 Cred. By your leave.
Mont. Stay ſir, what one example ſince the time
That firſt you put your hat off to me, have
You noted in me to encourage you
To this preſumption? by the juſtice now
Of thine own rule, I ſhould begin with thee,
I ſhould turn thee away ungratified
For all thy former kindneſſe, forget
Thou ever didſt me any ſervice: tis not feare
Of being arreſted makes me thus incline
To ſatisfie you; for you ſee by him,
I loſt not all defences with my ſtate;
The curſes of a man to whom I am
Beholding terrifie me more, then all
The violence he can purſue me with.
Dubois, I did prepare me for the worſt;
Theſe two ſmall Cabinets doe comprehend
The ſum of all the wealth that it hath pleaſed
Adverſity to leave me, one as rich
As th' other, both in Jewels; take thou this,
And as the Order put within it ſhall
Direct thee, diſtribute it half between Thoſe Creditors, and th' other halfe among
My ſervants: for (ſir) they are my creditors
As well as you are, they have truſted me
With their advancement: if the value faile,
To pleaſe you all, my firſt increaſe of meanes
Shall offer you a fuller payment; be content
To leave me ſomething, and imagine that
You put a new beginner into credit.
Cred. So proſper our own bleſſings, as we wiſh you to your merit.

Mont. Are your ſilences of diſcontent, or of ſorrow?
Dub. Sir, we would not leave you.
Long. Do but ſuffer us to follow you, and what our preſent means, or induſtries hereafter can provide, ſhall ſerve you.
Mont. O deſire me not to live
To ſuch a baſeneſſe, as to be maintained
By thoſe that ſerve me; pray be gone, I will Defend your honeſties to any man
That ſhal report you have forſaken me;
I pray be gone. Exeunt Servants and Creditors.
Why doſt thou weep my boy,
Becauſe I doe not bid thee goe too?
Ver. No, I weep (my Lord) becauſe I would not goe;
I feare you will command me.
Mont. No my child,
I wil not; that would diſcommend th' intent
Of all my other actions: thou art yet
Unable to adviſe thy ſelfe a courſe,
Should I put thee to ſeeke it; after that I muſt excuſe or at the leaſt forgive
Any uncharitable deed that can be done againſt my ſelfe.
Ver. Every day (my Lord) I tarry with you, Ile account
A day of bleſſing to me; for I ſhall
Have ſo much leſſe time left me of my life
When I am from you: and if miſery
Befall you (which I hope ſo good a man
Was never born to) I wil take my part,
And make my willingneſſe increaſe my ſtrength
To beare it. In the Winter I will ſpare
Mine own clothes from my ſelfe to cover you;
And in the Summer, carry ſome of yours
To eaſe you: Ile doe any thing I can.
Mont. Why, thou art able to make miſery
Aſhamed of hurting, when thy weakneſſe can
Both beare it, and deſpiſe it: Come my boy
I will provide ſome better way for thee
Then this thou ſpeakſt of; tis the comfort that Ill fortune has undone me into the faſhion:
For now in this age moſt men do begin,
To keep but one boy, that kept many men. Exeunt.

Enter Orleans, a Servant, his Ladie following.

Orl. Where is ſhe? call her.
Lady. I attend you ſir.
Orl. Your friend ſweet Madam.
Lady. What friend, good my Lord?
Orl. Your Montague, Madam, he will ſhortly want Thoſe Courtly graces that you love him for;
The means wherewith he purchaſed this, and this,
And all his own proviſions to the leaſt
Proportion of his feeding or his clothes,
Came out of that inheritance of land
Which he unjuſtly lived on: but the law
Has given me right in't, and poſſeſſion; now
Thou ſhalt perceive his bravery vaniſh, as
This Jewell does from thee now, and theſe Pearles
To him that owes 'em.
Lady. Ye are the owner ſir of every thing that does belong to me.
Orl. No, not of him, ſweet Lady.
Lady. O good God!
Orl. But in a while your mind will change, and be
As ready to diſclaime him; when his wants
And miſeries have periſh'd his good face,
And taken off the ſweetneſſe that has made
Him pleaſing in a womans underſtanding.

Lady.

La. O Heaven, how gratious had Creation been
To women, who are borne without defence,
If to our hearts there had been doores through which
Or husbands might have lookt into our thoughts,
And made themselves undoubtfull.
Orl. Made 'em meddle.
La. With honest women.
Orl. Thou dost still pretend
A title to that vertue: prethee let Thy honesty speak freelie to me now.
Thou knowest that Montaigne of whose Land
I am the master, did affect three first,
And should have had ther, if the strength of friends
Had not prevail'd above thine own consent.
I have undone him, tell me how thou doest
Consider his ill fortune and my good.
Iw. If I tell you justly his undoing is
An argument for pitty? and for teares
In all their dispositions that have known
The honour and the goodnesse of his life:
Yet that addition of prosperity,
Which you have got by't, no indifferent man
Will malice or repine at, if the Law
Be not abused in't, howsoever since
You have the upper fortune of him, 'twill
Become dishonour to you to beare your selfe
With any pride or glory over him.
Orl. This may be truly spoken, but in thee
It is not honest.
La. Yes, so honest, that I care not if the chast Penelope
Were now alive to hear me.

Enter Amiens.

Orl. Who comes there?
La. My brother.
Am. Save yee.
Orl. Now sir, you have heard of prosperous Montague.
Am. No sir, I have heard of Montague,
But of your prosperity.
Orl. Is he distracted.
Am. He does beare his losse with such a noble strength
Of patience that, to
Had fortune eyes to see him, she would weepe
For having hurt him, and pretending that Shee did it but for triall of his worth:
Hereafter ever love him.
Orl. I perceive you love him, and because (I must confesse)
He does deserve that though for some respects,
I have not given him that acknowledgement,
Yet in mine honour I did still conclude to use him nobly.
Am. Sir, that will become your reputation, and make me grow proud of your alliance.
Orl. I did reserve the doing of this friendship till I had
His fortunes at my mercy, that the world
May tell him 'tis a willing courtesie.
La. This change wil make me happy.
Orl. Tis a change; thou shalt behold it, then observe That Montague had possession of my Land, (me when I was his rivall, and at last obtain'd
This Lady who by promise of her own
Affection to him, should ha'bin his wife;
I had her, and withheld her like a pawne,
Till now my Land is rendred to me againe,
And since it is so, you shall see I have
The conscience not to keep her—give him her— draws
For by the faithfull temper of my sword, thou shalt not tarry with me.
Am. Give me way— draws
Thou most unworthy man—give me way
Or by the wrong he does the Innocent,
Ile end thy misery and his wickednesse, together.
Lady Stay and let me justifie
My husband in that, I have wrong'd his bed

Enter Amiens in amazement, the servant following him.

Never—all shames that can afflict me fall
Upon me if I ever wrong'd you.
Orl. Didst thou not confesse it?
La. Twas to save your blood from shedding, that has Turn'd my brothers edge;
He that beholdes our thoughts as plainely as
Our faces, knowes it, I did never hurt
My honesty but by accusing it.
Orl. Womens consents are sooner credited
Then their denials; and Ile never trust
Her body that prefers any defence
Before the safety of her honour—here— Enter servant
Show forth that stranger—give me not a word
Thou seest a danger readie to be tempted.
La. Cast that upon me rather then my shame,
And as I am now dying I wil now—
That I am honest.
Orl. Put her out of dores; but that I feare my land
May go againe to Montague, I would kill thee, I am loth,
To make a beggar of him that way; or else—
Go now you have the liberty of flesh,
And you may put it to a double use,
One for your pleasure, th'other to maintaine
Your welbeloved, he wil want. Exit Lady
In such a charitable exercise
The vertue wil excuse you for the vice. Exit Orleans.

Enter Amiens drawne, Montague, Vercamor meeting.

Mont. What meanes your Lordship?
Ver. For the love of God—
Am. Thou hast advantage of mee, cast away this (buckler.
Mont. So he is Sir, for he lives
With one that is undone—a voyd us boy.
Ver. Ile first avoid my safety,
Your Rapier shall be button'd, with my heade before it touch my Master.
Am. Montague?
Mont. Sir.
Am. You know my sister?
Mont. Yes sir.
Am. For a whore?
Mont. You lye, and shall lie lower if you dare abuse her (honor.

Enter Lady.

La. I am honest.
Am. Honest!
La. Upon my faith I am.
Am. What did then perswade thee to condemn thy self?
La. Your safety.
Am. I had rather be expos'd
To danger, then dishonor; th'ast betray'd
The reputation of my familie
More basely by the falsenesse of that word,
Then that thou hast deliver'd me asleepe
Into the hands of base enemie.
Reliefe will never make thee sensible

Of

Of thy disgraces; let thy wants compell thee to it. Exit

La. O I am a miserable woman. (relieve you?

Mont. Why Madam, are you utterly without means to

La. I have nothing sir, unlesse by changing of these cloaths for worse, and then at last the worst for nakednesse.

Mont. Stand off boy, nakednesse would be a change To please us Madam, to delight us both.

La. What nakednesse sir?

Mont. Why the nakednesse of body Madam, we were La. Never dishonest Lovers. (Lovers once.

Mont. Honestie has no allowance now to give our

La. Nor you allowance against honestie. (selves.

Mont. He send my Boy hence, opportunitie Shall be our servant, come and meet me first With kisses like a stranger at the doore, And then invite me neerer to receive A more familiar inward welcome—where, Instead of tapers made of Virgins wax Th'increasing flames of our desires shall light Us to a banquet: and before the taste Be dull with satisfaction, Ile prepare A nourishment compos'd of every thing That beares a naturall friendship to the bloud, And that shall set another edge upon't, Or else between the courses of the feast Wee'l dallie out an exercise of time, (it. That ever as one appetite expires another may succeede La. O my Lord, how has your nature lost her worthi- When our affections had their liberty, (nesse? Or kisses met as temperatelie as The hands of fisters, or of brothers, that Our blouds were then as moving; then you were So noble, that I durst have trusted your Embraces in an opportunity Silent enough to serve a ravisher, And yet come from you—undishonor'd—how You think me altered, that you promise your Attempt successe I know not; but were all The sweet temptations that deceive us set On this side, and one that side all the waiters, These neither should perswade me nor the force.

Mont. Then misery may waste your body.

Lady. Yes, but lust shall never.

Mont. I have found you still as uncorrupted as I left Continue so; and I wil serve you with (you first As much devotion as my word, my hand Or purse can show you; and to justifie That promise, here is half the wealth I have, Take it, you owe me nothing, till you fall From vertue, which the better to protect I have bethought me of a present meanes Give me the Letter; this commends my Boy Into the service of a Lady, whose Free goodnesse you have bin acquainted with Lamira.

Lady. Sir I know her. (you;

Mont. Then believe her entertainment wil be noble to My boy shall bring you thither: and relate Your manner of misfortune if your own (Lady. Report needs any witnesse: so I kisse your hand good Lady. Sir, I know not how to promise, but I cannot be unthankfull.

Mont. All that you can implore in thankfulnesse Be yours, to make you the more prosperous. Farwell my boy,—I am not yet oppress'd. Exit Lady Having the power to helpe one that's distress'd. Vera.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundi Scena Prima.

Enter Longaville and Dubois

Long. What shall we do now: swords are out of use, And words are out of credit.

Dub. We must serve.

Long. The meanes to get a service will first spend Our purses; and except we can allow Our selves an entertainment, service will Neglect us; now tis grown into a doubt Whether the Mr. or the servant gives the countenance.

Dub. Then fall in with Mistresses.

Long. They keep more servants now (indeed) then men, But yet the age is grown so populous Of those attendants, that the women are Grown full to.

Dub. What shall we propund our selves?

Long. I'le think on't.

Dub. Do; Old occupations have too many setters up to prosper, some uncommon trade would thrive now.

Long. Wee'l e'en make up some half a dozen proper And should not we get more (men, Then all your female sinners?

Dub. If the house be seated as it should be privately.

Long. I but that would make a multitude of witches.

Dub. VVitches? how prethee?

Long. Thus the bauds would all turn witches to revenge Themselves upon us and the women that Come to us, for disguises must wear beards, And that's they say, a token of a witch.

Dub. VVhat shall we then do.

Long. VVe must study on't, VVith more consideration; stay Duboys Are not the Lord of Orleans and the Lord Of Amiens enemies?

Dub. Yes, what of that.

Long. Methinks the factions of two such great men. Should give a promise of advancement now To us that want it. (cond thee.

Dub. Let the plot be thine, and in the enterprize Ile se-

Long. I have it, wee will first set down our selves The Method of a quarrell; and make choyce Of some frequented Taverne; or such a place Of common notice to perform it in By way of undertaking to maintaine The severall honours of those enemies. Thou for the Lord of Orleanes; I for Amiens.

Dub. I like the project, and I think 'twill take The better, since their difference first did rise From his occasion whom we followed once.

Long. We cannot hope lesse after the report, Then entertainment or gratuity, Yet those are ends, I do not aime at most; Greater spirits that are needy, and will thrive, Must labour whiles such troubles are alive. Exeunt

Enter Laverdine, and La-poope.

La p. Slander is sharper then the sword. I have fed this three dayes upon leafe Tobacco, for want of other Victuals.

Lav. You have liv'd the honester Captaine; but be not so dejected, but hold up thy head, and meate wil sooner fall i'thy mouth.

La-p.

Lo-p. I care not ſo much for meat, ſo I had but good liquor, for which my guts croak like ſo many Frogs for raine.

Lov. It ſeemes, you are troubled with the wind-Collick Captaine, ſwallow a bullet: tis preſent remedy i'le aſſure you.

Lo-p. A bullet; if you be Captain, my panch is nothing but a pile of bullets; when I was in any ſervice I ſtood between my Generall and the ſhot, like a mud-wall; I am all lead, from the crown of the head to the ſoale of the foot, not a ſound bone about me.

Lov. It ſeems you have bin in terrible hot ſervice Captaine.

Lo-p. It has ever bin the fate of the low Country wars to ſpoile many a man, I ha' not bin the firſt nor ſhall not be the laſt: but ile tell you ſir, (hunger has brought it in to minde) I ſerved once at the Siege of Breſte 'tis memorable to this day, where we were in great diſtreſſe for victuals, whole troops fainted more for want of food then for blood, and died, yet we were reſolved to ſtand it out; I my ſelf was but then Gentleman of a Company, and had as much need as any man, and indeed I had periſhed had not a miraculous providence preſerved me.

Lov. As how good Captaine?

Lo-p. Marry ſir ee'n as I was fainting and falling down for want of ſuſtenance, the enemy made a ſhot at me, and ſtruck me full ith' paunch with a penny loaf.

Lov. Inſtead of a bullet!

Lo-p. In ſtead of a bullet.

Lov. That was miraculous in deed; and that loaf ſuſtained you.

Lo-p. Nouriſhed me or I had famiſhed with the reſt.

Lov. You have done worthy acts being a ſouldier, and now you ſhall give me leave to requite your tale, and to acquaint you with the moſt notorious deeds that I have done being a Courtier. I proteſt Captain I will lie no more then you have done.

Lo-p. I can indure no lies.

Lov. I know you cannot Captaine, therefore ile only tell you of ſtrange things, I did once a deed of charity for it ſelf; I aſſiſted a poor widdow in a ſute, and obtained it, yet I proteſt I took not a penny for my labour.

Lo-p. Tis no ſuch ſtrange thing.

Lov. By Mars Captaine, but it is, and a very ſtrange thing too in a Courtier; it may take the upper hand of your penny loaf for a miracle. I could ha' told you how many Ladies have languiſhed for my love, and how I was once ſollicited by the mother, the daughter, and grand-mother out of the leaſt of which I might have digg'd my ſelfe a fortune; they were all great Ladies, for two of them were ſo big I could hardly embrace them: but I was ſluggiſh in my riſing courſes, and therefore let them paſſe; what meanes I had is ſpent upon ſuch as had the wit to cheat me; That wealth being gon, I have only bought experience with it, with a ſtrong hope to cheat others: but ſee here comes the much declined Montague, who had all the Manor houſes, which were the body of his eſtate overthrowen by a great winde.

Enter Montague, Mallicorne.

Lo-p. How by a great winde? was he not overthrown by law?

Lov. Yes, marry was he; but there was terrible puffing and blowing before he was overthrown, if you obſerv'd, and believe it Captain, ther's no wind ſo dangerous to a building as a lawyers breath.

Lo-p. What's he with him?

Lov. An eminent Citizen. Mounſier Mallicorne, lets ſtand a ſide and liſten their deſign.

Mal. Sir, profit is the Crown of labour, it is the life, the ſoule of the induſtrious Merchant, in it he makes his paradiſe, and for it neglects Wife, Children, Friends, Parents, nay all the world, and delivers up himſelfe to the violence of ſtormes, and to be toſs'd into unknown ayres; as there is no faculty ſo perillous, ſo ther's none ſo worthy profitable.

Mont. Sir, I am very well poſſeſt of it, and what of my poore fortunes remaines, I would gladly hazzard upon the Sea; it cannot deale worſe with me then the Land, though it ſinck or throw it in the hands of Pirats. I have yet five hundred pounds left, and your honeſt and worthy acquaintance may make me a young Merchant; th'one moity of what I have I would gladly adventure.

Mal. How adventure? you ſhall hazzard nothing: you ſhall only joyne with me in certaine commodities that are ſafe arrived unto the Key; you ſhall neither be in doubt of danger nor dammage; But ſo much mony diſburſt, ſo much receive; ſir I would have you conceive I purſue it not for any good your money wil do me, but meerly out of mine own freeneſſe and courteſie to pleaſure you.

Mont. I can believe no leſſe, and you expreſſe a noble nature, ſeeking to build up a man ſo ruin'd as my ſelfe.

Lov. Captaine here is ſubject for us to worke upon if we have wit; you hear that there is money yet left, and it is going to be layd out in Rattels, Bels, Hobby-Horſes, brown paper, or ſome ſuch like ſale commodities; now it would do better in our purſes, upon our backs in good Gold-lace, and Scarlet, and then we might purſue our projects, and our devices towards my Lady Annabella go to, ther's a conceit newly landed; harck I ſtand in good reputation with him, and therefore may the better cheat him: Captaine, take a few inſtructions from me.

Mont. What monies I have is at your diſpoſing, and upon ewelve I will meete you at the Pallace with it.

Mal. I wil there expect you, and ſo I take my leave. Exit

Lov. You apprehend me?

Lo-p. Why do ye think I am a dunce?

Lov. Not a dunce Captaine, but you might give me leave to miſdoubt that pregnancy in a Souldier, which is proper and hereditary to a Courtier; but proſequute it, I will both ſecond, and give credit to it. Good Mounſier Montague, I would your whole revenues lay within the circuit of mine armes, that I might as eaſily beſtow, or reſtore it unto you as my curteſie.

Lo-p. My zealous wiſhes ſir, do accompany his for your good fortunes.

Lov. Believe it ſir, our affection towards you is a ſtrong band of friendſhip.

Mont. To which I ſhall moſt willingly ſeale. But believe me Gentlemen in a broken eſtate, the bond of friendſhip oft is forfeited, but that it is your free and ingenuous nature to renew it.

Lov. Sir, I wil amply extend my ſelf to your uſe, and am very zealouſly aſſiſted as not one of your leaſt friends for your crooked fate; But let it ſeiſe you with any dejection, you have as I hear a ſufficient competency left, which well diſpoſed may reſtit you as high in the worlds account as ever.

Mont. I cannot live to hope it, much leſſe injoy it, for it is is it any part of my endeavour; my ſtudy is to render every man his own, and to containe my ſelf within the limits of a Gentleman.

Lav. I have the grant of an Office given me by ſome noble favorites of mine in Court, there ſtands but a ſmall matter between me and it, if your ability be ſuch to lay down the preſent ſum, out of the love I bear you, before any other man, it ſhall be confirmed yours.

Mont. I have heard you often ſpeak of ſuch a thing; if it be aſſur'd to you I wil gladly deale in it that portion I have, I would not hazard upon one courſe, for I ſee the moſt certaineſt is incertain.

Lap. Having money ſir, you could not light upon men that could give better direction; there is at this time a friend of mine upon the Seas; to be plain with you, he is a Pyrate, that hath wrote to me to work his fredom, and by this Gentlemans meanes, whoſe acquaintance is not ſmall at Court; we have the word of a worthy man for it, only there is ſome money to be ſuddainly disburſt, and if your happineſſe be ſuch to make it up you ſhall receive treble gaine by it, and good aſſurance for it.

Mont. Gentlemen out of the weakneſſe of my eſtate you ſeem (to have ſome knowledge of my breſt) that wood if it were poſſible advance my declined fortunes, to ſatisfie all men of whom I have had credit, and I know no way better then theſe which you propoſe; I have ſome money ready under my command, ſome part of it is already promiſ'd, but the remainder is yours to ſuch uſes as are propounded.

Lav. Appoint ſome certain place of meeting, for theſe affaires requires expedition.

Mont. I wil make it my preſent buſineſſe: at twelve, I am to meet Malicorne the Marchant at the Pallace, you know him ſir, about ſome negotiation of the ſame nature, there I wil be ready to tender you that money, upon ſuch conditions as wee ſhall conclude off.

Lav. The care of it be yours, ſo much as they affaire concernes you.

Mont. Your caution is effectuall, and till then I take my leave.

Lav. Good Mr Montague. Exit

Within a clamor, down with their weapons.
Enter Longavile and Dubois, their ſwords drawn, ſervants and others between them.

Ser. Nay Gentlemen what meane you pray be quiet, have ſome reſpect unto the houſe.

Long. A treacherous ſlave.

Du. Thou doſt revile thy ſelf baſe Longavile.

Long. I ſay thou art a villaine and a corrupt one, that haſt ſome ſeaven years fed on thy maſters trencher, yet never bredſt good bloud towards him: for if, thou hadſt have a ſounder heart.

Du. So ſir, you can uſe your tongue ſomething nimbler then your ſword.

Long. Wood you cood uſe your tongue well of your Maſter, friend you might have better imployment for your ſword.

Du. I ſay againe and I wil ſpeak it loud and often, that Orleans is a noble Gentleman with whom Amiens is to light to poyſe the ſcale.

Long. He is the weaker for taking of a prayſe out of thy mouth.

Du. This hand ſhall ſeale his merit at thy heart.

Lav. Part them my maſters part them.

Ser. Part them ſir, why do you not part them, you ſtand by with your ſword in your hand, and cry part 'em.

Lav. Why you muſt know my friend my cloaths are better then yours, and in a good ſuit, I do never uſe to part any body.

Lap. And it is diſcretion.

Lav. I marry is it Captaine.

Long. Dubois though this place priviledge thee, know where next we meet, the bloud which at thy heart flowes drops at thy feet.

Enter Amience in haſt, his ſword drawne.

Du. I would not ſpend it better then in this quarrell, and on ſuch a hazard.

Ami. What uprores this, muſt my name here be queſtion'd in Tavern brawels, and by affected Ruffins?

Lav. Not we indeed ſir.

Du. Fear cannot make me ſhrink out of your fury, though you were greater then your name doth make you, I am one, and the oppoſer; if your ſwoln rage have ought in mallice to inforce expreſſe it.

Ami. I ſeek thee not nor ſhalt thou ever gaine
That credit, which a blow from me wood give thee,
By my —— I more deteſt that fellow
Which took my part then thee, that he durſt offer
To take my honour in his feeble armes,
And ſpend it in a drinking room; which way went he?

Lav. That way ſir, I wood you wood after for I do fear we ſhall have ſome more ſcuffling.

Ami. Ile follow him, and if my ſpeed o're take him, I ſhall ill thank him for his forwardneſſe. Exit

Lav. I am glad he's gon, for I do not love to ſee a ſword drawn in the hand of a man that lookes ſo furious, ther's no jeſting with edge tooles, how ſay you Captaine?

Cap. I ſay tis better jeſting then to be in earneſt with them. Enter Orleance.

Orl. How now? what's the difference? they ſay there have bin ſwords drawn, and in my quarrell, let me know that man, whoſe love is ſo ſincere to ſpend his bloud for my ſake, I will bounteouſly requite him.

Lav. We were all of your ſide, but there he ſtands begun it.

Orl. What's thy name?

Dub. Dubois?

Orl. Give me thy hand, thou haſt receaved no hurt?

Dub. Not any, nor wear this body ſtuck full of wounds, I ſhould not count them hurts, being taken in ſo honorable a cauſe as the defence of my moſt worthy Lord.

Orl. The dedication of thy love to me requires my ample bounty, thou art mine. for I do finde thee made unto my purpoſes. Mounſieur Laverdine, pardon my neglect I not obſerved you, and how runs rumour.

Lav. Why, it runs my Lord like a foot man without a cloak, to ſhow that what's once rumour'd it cannot be hidde.

Orl. And what ſay the rable, am not I the ſubject of their talk?

Lav. Troth my Lord the common mouth ſpeakes foule words.

Orl. Of me, for turning away my wife do they not?

Lav. Faith the men do a little murmer at it and ſay, 'tis an ill preſident in ſo great a man, marry the women they rayle, out right.

Orl. Out upon them rampallions Ile keepe my ſelfe ſafe enough out of their fingers, but what ſay my prity jolly

Jelly composed gallant that censure every thing more desperate then it is dangerous; what say they?

Lov. Marry they are laying wagers, what death you shall die; one offers to lay five hundred pounds: And yet he had but a groat about him, & that was in two two-pences too to any man that wo'd make it up a shilling; that you were kil'd with a Pistoll charg'd with white Powder, another offerd to pawne his soule for five shillings, and yet no body wo'd take him, that you were stab'd to death and sho'd die with more wounds then Cæsar.

Orl. And who sho'd be the Bucchers that sho'd do it? Montague and his associates?

Lov. So 'tis conjectured.

Lo-p. And believe it, sweet Prince, it is to be feared, and therefore prevented.

Orl. By turning his purpose on himself, were not that the way?

Lov. The most direct path for your safety. For where doth danger lie more furious then in a desperate man?

Lo-p. And being you have declined his meanes, you have increast his malice.

Lov. Besides the generall report that steems in every mans breath, and staines you all over with Infamy, that Time the devourer of all things cannot eat out.

Lo-p. I, for that former familiarity, which he had with your Lady.

Lov. Men speak it as boldly as words of complement; good morrow, good even, or God save you sir, are not more usuall; if the word cuckold had been written upon your forehead in great Capitall Letters, it could not have been dilated with more confidence.

Orl. He shall not sleepe another night, I will have his blood, though it be required at my hands again.

Lov. Your Lordship may, and without hazzarding your own person; he's a Gentleman in whose looks I see a resolution to perform it.

Dub. Let his Lordship give me but his honourable word for my life, Ile kill him as he walks.

Lov. Or pistoll him as he sits at meat.

Lo-p. Or at game.

Lov. Or as he is drinking.

Dub. Any way.

Orl. Wot thou? call what is mine thine own, thy reputation shall not be brought in question for it, much-lesse thy life; it shall be namd a deed of valour in thee, not murder: Farewell. Exit.

Dub. I need no more encouragement, it is a worke I will perswade my selfe that I was borne to.

Lover. And you may perswade your selfe to that you shall be sav'd by it, being that it is for his honourable Lordship.

Dub. But you must yield me means, how, when and where.

Lov. That shall be our taskes;
Nay more, we will be agents with thee: (moneys,
This houre we are to meet him, on the receipt of certain
Which indeed we purpose honestly to cheat him of,
And that's the many causes I wo'd have him slain,
Who works with safety makes a double gain. Exeunt.

Enter Longaville, Amiens following him.

Ami. Stay sir, I have took some pains to overtake you. ——Your name is Longaville?

Long. I have the word of many honest men for't, I crave your Lordships pardon, your sudden apprehension on my steps made me to frame an answer unwitting and unworthy your respect.

Ami. Doe you know me?

Long. Yes, my Lord.

Ami. I know not you; nor am I well pleased to make this time, as the affaire now stands, the induction of your acquaintance; you are a fighting fellow?

Long. How my Lord?

Ami. I thinke I doo much grace you; rather you are a fellow dares not fight, but pet and puffe, and make a noyse whilst your trembling hand draws it out, your Sword, to lay it upon Andirons, stooles or tables, rather then on a man.

Long. Your honour may best speake this yet ——with little safety, if I thought it serious.

Ami. Come, you are a merry braggart, and you have given me cause to tell you so: what weaknesse have you ever seen in me to prompt your selfe, that I could need your helpe, or what other reasons could induce you to it? you never yet had a meales meat from my Table, nor as I remember from my Wardrop any cast Suite.

Long. 'Tis true, I never durst yet have such a servile spirit, to be the minion of a full swolne Lord, but alwaies did detest such slavery: a meales meat, or a cast sute? I wo'd first eate the stones, and from such rags the dunghils does afford pick me a garment.

Ami. I have mistook the man, his resolute spirit
Proclaimes him generous, he has a noble heart
As free to utter good deeds as to act them;
For had he not been right, and of one piece,
He would'h ave crumpled, curled, and struck himselfe
Out of the shape of man into a shadow.
But prethee tell me, if no such fawning hope
Did lead thee on to hazard life for my sake;
What was it that incited thee?
Tell me, speak it without the imputation of a Sicophant.

Long. Your own desert, and with it was joyn'd the unfained friendship that I judged you ever held unto my former Lord.

Ami. The noble Montague?

Long. Yes, the noble and much injured Montague.

Ami. To such a man as thou art, my heart shall be
A Casket: I will lock thee up there,
And esteem thee as a faithfull friend,
The richest Jewell that a man enjoyes;
And being thou didst follow once my friend,
And in thy heart still dost, not with his fortunes casting him off,
Thou shalt goe hand in hand with me, and share
As well in my ability as love; 'tis not my end
To gaine men for my use, but a true friend. Exeunt.

Enter Duboys.

Dub. There's no such thriving way to live in grace,
As to have no sence of it; his backe nor belly
Shall not want warming that can practise me mischiefe;
I walke now with a full purse, grow high and wanton,
Prune and briske my selfe in the bright shine
Of his good Lordships favours, and for what vertue?
For fashioning my selfe a murderer.
O noble Montague, to whom I owe my heart,
With all my best thoughts, tho my tongue have promisd
To exceed the malice of thy destiny,
Never in time of all my service knew I
Such a sinne tempt thy bounty; those that did feed
Upon thy charge had merit or else need.

Enter Laverdine and Lapoope, with diſguiſes.

Lav. Duboys, moſt proſperouſly met.

Dub. How now? will he come this way.

Lav. This way, immediately; therefore thy aſſiſtance, deere Duboys.

Dub. What have you cheated him of the money you ſpoke of?

Lav. Fough, as eaſily as a ſilly Countrey wench of her maydenhead; we had it in a twinkling.

Dub. Tis well Captaine, let me helpe you, you muſt be our leader in this action.

Lap. Tut, feare not, Ile warrant you if my Sword hold, we'l make no ſweating ſickneſſe of it.

Dub. Why that's well ſaid, but let's retire a little, that we may come on the more bravely; this way, this way.

Exeunt.

Enter Montague in the hands of three Officers, and three Creditors.

1 Cre. Officers look to him, and be ſure you take good ſecurity before he part from you.

Mont. Why but my friends, you take a ſtrange courſe with me; the ſums I owe you are rather forgetfulneſſe they are ſo ſlight, then want of will or honeſty to pay you.

1 Cred. I ſir, it may be ſo; but we muſt be paid, and we will be paid before you ſcape: we have wife and children, and a charge, and you are going down the wind, as a man may ſay; and therefore it behooves us to looke to't in time.

2 Cred. Your cloak here wo'd ſatisfie me, mine's not above a three pound matter, beſides the arreſt.

3 Cred. Faith and mine is much about that matter too; your Girdle and Hangers, and your Beaver, ſhall be ſufficient baile for't.

1 Cred. If you have ever a plain black ſute at home, this Silken one, with your Silke-ſtockings, Garters, and Roſes ſhall pacifie me too; for I take no delight, if I have a ſufficient pawne, to caſt any Gentleman in priſon; therefore tis but an untruſſing matter, and you are free, we are no unreaſonable creatures you ſee; for mine own part, I proteſt I am loth to put you to any trouble for ſecurity.

Mont. Is there no more of you? he wo'd next demand my skinne.

1 Cred. No ſir, here's no more of us, nor do any of us demand your skin, we know not what to doe with it: but it may be if you ow'd your Glover any money, he knew what uſe to make of it.

Mont. Ye dregs of baſeneſſe, vultures amongſt men,
That tyer upon the hearts of generous ſpirits.

1 Cred. You doe us wrong ſir, we tyre no generous ſpirits, we tyre nothing but our hackneys.

Enter Mallicorne.

Mont. But here comes one made of another piece;
A man well meriting that free born name
Of Citizen; welcome my deliverer, I am falne
Into the hands of blood-hounds, that for a ſum
Leſſer then their honeſties, which is nothing,
Wo'd teare me out of my skin.

Mal. Why ſir, what's the matter?

1 Cre. Why ſir, the matter is, that we muſt have our money, which if we cannot have, we'l ſatisfie our ſelves with his carcaſſe, and be payd that waies: you had as good ſir not have been ſo peremptory. Officer, hold faſt.

1 Off. The ſtrenuous fiſt of vengeance now is clutcht; therefore feare nothing.

Mal. What may be the debt in groſſe?

Mont. Some forty Crowns, nay rather not ſo much, tis quickly caſt.

Mal. Tis ſtrange to me, that your eſtate ſho'd have ſo low an ebbe, to ſticke at ſuch ſleight ſums: why my friends, you are too ſtrict in your accounts, and call too ſudden on this Gentleman, he has hopes left yet to pay you all.

1 Cred. Hopes? I marry bid him pay his friends with hopes, and pay us with currant Coyne: I knew a gallant once that fed his creditors ſtill with hopes, and bid 'em they ſho'd feare nothing, for he had 'em tyed in a ſtring; and truſt me ſo he had indeed, for at laſt he and all his hopes hopt in a haltar.

Mont. Good ſir, with what ſpeed you may free out the company of theſe ſlaves, that have nothing but their names to ſhow 'em men.

Mal. What wo'd you wiſh me do ſir? I proteſt I ha' not the preſent ſumme (ſmall as it is) to lay down for you; and for giving my word, my friends no latter then yeſternight made me take bread and eate it, that I ſho'd not do it for any man breathing ith' world; therefore I pray hold me excuſed.

Mont. You doe not ſpeake this ſeriouſly?

Mal. As ever I ſaid my prayers, I proteſt to you.

Mont. What may I think of this?

Mal. Troth ſir thought is free for any man; we abuſe our betters in it, I have done it my ſelfe.

Mont. Truſt me, this ſpeech of yours doth much amaze me, pray leave this language, and out of that ſame ſum you lately did receive of me, lay down as much as may diſcharge me.

Mal. You are a merry man ſir, and I am glad you take your croſſes ſo temperately; fare you well ſir, and yet I have ſomething more to ſay to ye, a word in your eare I pray; to be plaine with you I did lay this plot to arreſt you to enjoy this money I have of yours, with the more ſafety. I am a foole to tell you this now; but in good faith I could not keepe it in. And the money wo'd a done me little good elſe. An honeſt Citizen cannot wholly enjoy his own wife for you, they grow old before they have true uſe of them, which is a lamentable thing, and truely much hardens the hearts of us Citizens againſt you: I can ſay no more, but am heartily ſorry for your heavineſſe, and ſo I take my leave.

Exit Mallycorne.

1 Cred. Officers take hold on him againe, for Mounſier Mallycorne will doe nothing for him I perceive.

Enter Duboys, Lapoope, and Laverdine.

Dub. Nay come my maſters, leave dauncing of the old meaſures, and let's aſſault him bravely.

Lav. By no means; for it goes againſt my ſtomacke to kill a man in an unjuſt quarrell.

Lap. It muſt needs be a clog to a mans conſcience all his life time.

Lav. It muſt indeed Captaine: beſides doe ye not ſee he has gotten a guard of friends about him, as if he had ſome knowledge of our purpoſe?

Dub. Had he a guard of Devils as I think them little better, my Sword ſhould doe the meſſage that it came for.

Lav. If you will be ſo deſperate, the blood lie upon your own neck, for we'l not meddle in't.

Duboys

Duboys runs upon Montague, and ſtrugling yeelds him his Sword, the Officers draw, Loverdine and Lapoope in the ſcuffling retire, Montague chaſeth them off the Stage, himſelfe wounded.

Dub. I am your friend and ſervant,
Struggle with me and take my Sword;
Noble ſir make your way, you have ſlaine an Officer.

Mont. Some one of them has certainly Requited me; for I do loſe much blood.

1 Offic. Udſprecious, we have loſt a brother, purſue the Gentleman.

2 Offic. Ile not meddle with him: you ſee what comes on't; beſides I know he will be hang'd ere he be taken.

1 Offic. I tell thee yeoman he muſt be taken ere he be hanged; he is hurt in the guts, run afore therefore and know how his wife will rate his Sawſiges a pound.

3 Offic. Stay brother, I may live, for ſurely I finde i'm but hurt in the leg a dangerous kick on the ſhin-bone.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter Madam Lamira, Madam le Orleans, Veramour.

Lam. You ſee Lady
What harmleſſe ſports our Countrey life affords;
And though you meet not here with City dainties,
Or Courtly entertainment, what you have
Is free and hearty.

L. Orl. Madam, I finde here
What is a ſtranger to the Court, content,
And receive curteſies done for themſelves,
Without an expectation of returne,
Which binds me to your ſervice.

Lam. Oh your love;
My homely houſe built more for uſe then ſhew
Obſerves the Golden mean equally diſtant
From glittering pompe, and ſordid avarice;
For Maskes we will obſerve the workes of nature
And in the place of viſitation read.
Our Phyſick ſhall be wholſome walkes, our viandes,
Nourifhing not provoking: for I finde
Pleaſures are tortures, that leave ſtings behind.

L. Orl. You have a great eſtate.

Lam. A competency
Sufficient to maintaine me and my ranke,
Nor am I, I thank Heaven, ſo Courtly bred
As to imploy the utmoſt of my Rents
In paying Tailors for phantaſtick Roabes;
Or rather then be ſecond in the faſhion,
Eate out my Officers and my Revenues
With grating uſury; my back ſhall not
Be the baſe on which your ſoothing Citizen
Erects his Summer-houſes; nor on the other ſide
Will I be ſo penuriouſly wiſe,
As to make money (thats my ſlave) my Idoll,
Which yet to wrong, merits as much reproof,
As to abuſe our ſervant.

L. Orl. Yet with your pardon
I thinke you want the Crown of all contentment.

Lam. In what good Madam?

L. Orl. In a worthy husband.

Lam. —— It is ſtrange the galley-ſlave ſhould praiſe
His Oare, or ſtroakes; or you, that have made ſhipwracke
Of all delight upon this Rock cal'd marriage,
Should ſing Encomions o't.

L. Orl. Madam, though one fall
From his horſe and breake his neck, will you Conclude from that it is unfit to ride?
Or muſt it follow, becauſe Orleance
My Lord's pleaſed to make his paſſionate triall
Of my ſuſpected patience, that my brother,
(Were he not ſo, I might ſay, worthy Amiens)
Will imitate his ills, that cannot fancy
What's truely Noble in him?

Lam. I muſt grant
There's as much worth in him as can be lookt for
From a young Lord, but not enough to make Me change my golden liberty and conſent
To be a ſervant to it, as wives are
To the Imperious humors of their Lords:
Me thinks I'm well, I riſe and goe to bed
When I thinke fit, eate what my appetite
Deſires without controle, my ſervants ſtudy
Is my contentment, and to make me merry
Their fartheſt aymes; my ſleeps are enquired after,
My riſing up ſaluted with reſpect:
Command and liberty now waite upon
My Virgin ſtate; what would I more? change all,
And for a husband? no; theſe freedomes die;
In which they live with my Virginity;
Tis in their choice that's rich to be a wife,
But not being yoakt to chuſe the ſingle life.

Ver. Madam.

Lam. How like you the Countrey?

Ver. I like the ayre of it well Madam, and the rather becauſe as on Iriſh Timber your Spiders will not make his web, ſo for ought I ſee yet your Cheater, Pander, and Informer being in their diſpoſitions too foggy for this piercing climate, ſhun it, and chooſe rather to walk in miſts in the City.

Lam. Who did you ſerve firſt boy?

Ver. A rich Merchants widdow, and was by her preferred to a young Court-lady.

L. Orl. And what difference found you in their ſervice?

Ver. Very much: for looke how much my old City Madam gave to her young viſitants, ſo much my Lady received for her hoary Court-ſervants.

Lam. And what made you to leave her?

Ver. My father (Madam) had a deſire to have me a taleman, took me from thence.

Lam. Well, I perceive you inherit the wag, from your father.

Ver. Doves beget Doves; and Eagles, Eagles, Madam: A Citizen here, tho loſt never ſo rich, ſeldome at the beſt proves a Gentleman: the ſonne of an Advocate, tho dub'd like his father, will ſhew a reliſh of his diſcent, and the fathers thriving practice, as I have heard: ſhe that of a Chambermayd is metamorphoſed into a Madam, will yet remember how oft her daughter by her mother ventured to lie upon the ruſhes before ſhe could get in that which makes many Ladies.

L. Orl. But what think you of your late Maſter?

Ver. Oh Madam —— Sigh.

Lam. Why doe you ſigh? you are ſorry that you left him,
He made a wanton of you.

Ver. Not for that:
Or if he did, for that my youth muſt love him.
Oh pardon me, if I ſay liberty
Is bondage, if compared with his kind ſervice;

And but to have power now to ſpeake his worth
To its deſert; I ſhould be well content
To be an old man when his praiſe were ended:
And yet, if at this inſtant you were pleaſed,
I ſhould begin, the livery of age
Would take his lodging upon this head
Ere I ſhould bring it to a period.
In briefe he is a man (for God forbid
That I ſhould ever live to ſay he was
Of ſuch a ſhape as would make one beloved,
That never had good thought;) and to his body
He hath a mind of ſuch a conſtant temper
In which vertues throng to have a room:
Yet 'gainſt this noble Gentleman, this Montague,
For in that name I comprehend all goodneſſe,
Wrong, and the wreſted law, falſe witneſſes,
And envy ſent from hell, have roſe in Armes,
And tho not pierced, battered his honourd ſhield.
What ſhall I ſay? I hope you will forgive me,
That if you were but pleas'd to love,
I know no Juno worthy ſuch a Jove.

Enter Charlet with a letter.

Lam. Tis well yet that I have the ſecond place
In your affection: From whence?
Charl. From the Lord Amiens, Madam.
Lam. Tis welcome, though it beare his uſual language:
I thought ſo much, his love-ſuit ſpeake his health.
What's he that brought it?
Charl. A Gentleman of good ranke, it ſeems.
Lam. Where is he?
Charl. Receiving entertainment in your houſe
Sorting with his degree.
Lam. Tis well.
Charl. He waites your Ladiſhips pleaſure.
Lam. He ſhall not waite long:
Ile leave you for a while; nay ſtay you boy,
Attend the Lady. Exeunt Lam. Charl.
Vir. Would I might live once
To waite on my poore Maſter.
L. Orl. That's a good boy:
This thankfulneſſe looks lovely on thy forehead,
And in it, as a book, me thinks I read
Inſtructions for my ſelfe, that am his debtor,
And wo'd do much that I might be ſo happy
To repaire that which to our griefe is ruin'd.
Vir. It were a worke a King might glory in,
If he ſaw with my eyes: If you pleaſe Madam,
For ſure to me you ſeem to me unapt to walke,
To ſit, although the churliſh Birds deny
To give us muſicke in this grove, where they Are prodigall to others: Ile ſtrain my voyce
For a ſad Song, the place is ſafe and private.
L. Orl. I was my deſire; begin good Viramour.

Muſick a Song, at the end of it enter Montague fainting, his Sword drawn.

L. Orl. What's he Viramour?
Vir. A goodly perſonage.
Mont. Am I yet ſafe? or is my flight a dream?
My wounds and hunger tell me that I wake:
Whither have my feares borne me? no matter where,
Who hath no place to goe to, cannot erre:
What ſhall I doe? cunning calamity
That others groſſe wits uſes to refine,
When I moſt need it duls the edge of mine.
L. Orl. Is not this Montagues voyce?
Vir. My Maſters? fie.
Mont. What ſound was that, piſh,
Feare makes the wretch think every leafe oth' Jury:
What courſe to live, beg? better men have done it,
But in another kind: ſteale? Alexander
Though ſtiled a Conquerour, was a proud thiefe
Though he robd with an Army; fie how idle
Theſe meditations are: though thou art worſe
Then ſorrows tongue can ſpeak thee, thou art ſtill
Or ſhouldſt be, honeſt Montague.
L. Orl. Tis too true. (Heſh
Vir. Tis he: what villaines hands did this? oh that my
Were Balme; in faith ſir, I would plucke it off
As readily as this; pray you accept
My will to doe you ſervice: I have heard
The Mouſe once ſav'd the Lyon in his need,
As the poore Scarab ſpild the Eagles ſeed.
L. Orl. How do you?
Mont. As a forſaken man.
L. Orl. Do not ſay ſo, take comfort,
For your misfortunes have been kind in this,
To caſt you on a hoſpitable ſhoare,
Where dwels a Lady—
Vir. She to whom, good Maſter,
You prefer'd me.
L. Orl. In whoſe houſe, whatſoere
Your dangers are, Ile undetake your ſafety.
Mont. I feare that I am purſued, and doubt that I
In my defence have kild an Officer.
Vir. Is that all? there's no law under the Sunne
But will I hope confeſſe, one drop of blood
Shed from this arme is recompence enough
Though you had cut the throats of all the Catchpoles
In France, nay in the world.
Mont. I would be loth
To be a burthen, or feed like a drone
On the induſtrious labour of a Bee,
And baſer far I hold it to owe for
The bread I eate, what's not in me to pay;
Then ſince my full fortunes are declined,
To their low ebb Ile faſhion my high mind.
It was no ſhame to Hecuba to ſerve
When Troy was fired: if't be in your power
To be a means to make her entertainment,
And far from that I was; but to ſupply
My want with habit fit for him that ſerves,
I ſhall owe much to you.
L. Orl. Leave that care to me.
Vir. Good ſir, leane on my ſhoulder; helpe good Madam: oh that I were a horſe for halfe an houre, that I might carry you home on my backe: I hope you wil love me ſtill?
Mont. Thou doſt deſerve it boy, that I ſhould live
To be thus troubleſome.
L. Orl. Good ſir, tis none.
Vir. Trouble moſt willingly; I would be changd
Like Apuleius, weare his Aſſes eares,
Provided I might ſtill this burthen beare.
L. Orl. Tis a kind boy.
Mont. I finde true proofe of it. Exeunt.

Enter Amiens and Longeville with a Paper.

Ami. You'l carry it.
Long. As I live although my packet were like Bellerophons, what have you ſeen in me or my behaviour ſince your favours ſo plentifully ſhowed upon my wants, that may beget diſtruſt of my performance?
Ami. Nay, be not angry, if I entertained
But the leaſt ſcruple of your love, or courage,

I would

I would make of one which my ſtate
Should do me right in this, nor can you blame me
If in a matter of ſuch conſequence
I am ſo importunate. (jurations
Long. Good my Lord tell me, prevent your further con-
To rayſe my ſpirit, I know this is a challenge
To be delivered unto Orleance hand,
And that my undertaking ends not there,
But I muſt be your ſecond, and in that
Not alone ſearch your enemy, meaſure weapons,
But ſtand in all your hazzards, as our bloods
Ran in the ſelf ſame veines, in which if I
Better not your opinion, as a limbe
That's putrifyed and uſeleſſe, cut me off,
And underneath the Gallous bury it.
Ami. At full you underſtand me, and in this Binde me and what's mine to you and yours,
I wil not ſo much wrong you as to adde
One ſylable more, let it ſuffice I leave
My honor to your guard: and in that prove
You hold the firſt place in my heart and love. Exit Ami.
Long. The firſt place in a Lords affection? very good; and how long doth that laſt? perhaps the changing of ſome three ſhirts in the Tennis Court: wel it were very neceſſary that an order were taken (if it were poſſible,) that younger brother, might have more wit, or more money: for now how ever the foole hath long bin put upon him that inherits his revenew hath brought him a ſpunge, and wip't off the imputation, and for the underſtanding of the younger, let him get as much rhetorick as he can to grace his language.

Enter Dubois.

They wil ſee he ſhall have gloſſe little enough to ſet out his barck; ſtand Dubois look about all ſafe.
Dub. Approach not neer me but with reverence,
Lawrell and adorations, I have done more then deſerve a (no thanks.
Long. How now what's the matter?
Dub. With this hand only aided by this brain,
Without an Orpheus Harp redeem'd from hels
Three headed Porter, our Euridice.
Long. Nay prithee ſpeak ſence, this is like the ſtale braggart in a Play.
Dub. Then in plaine Proſe thus, and with as little action as thou canſt deſire, the three headed Porter, were three unexorable Catch-poles out of whoſe jawes with out the help of Orpheus Harp, baite or bribe, for thoſe too ſtringes, makes the Muſique that mollifies thoſe flinty furies, I reſcued our Euridice, I meane my old Maſter Montague.
Long. And is this all, a poor reſcue, I thought thou hadſt reverſt the judgement for his overthrow, in his ſute, or wrought upon his adverſary Orleance, taken the ſhape of a Ghoſt, frighted his mind into diſtraction, and for the appeaſing of his conſcience forc'd him to make reſtitution of Montagues Lands, or ſuch like reſcued; ſlight I would have hired Crohicture for two Cardekues to have done ſo much with his whip.
Dub. You wood ſir, and yet tis more then three on their foot-cloathes durſt do for a ſworne Brother, in a Coach.
Long. Beſides what proofs of it, for ought I know this may be a trick, I had rather have him a Priſoner, where I might viſit him, and do him ſervice, then not at all, or I know not where.
Dub. Well ſir, the end wil ſhew it, what's that a challenge?
Long. Yes, wher's Orleance? though we fight in jeſt he muſt meet with Amiens in earneſt, ——fall off, we are diſcovered; my horſe garcon ha'.
Dub. Were it not in a houſe and in his preſence,
To whom I owe all duty——
Long. What would it do? prate as it do's: but be as far from ſtricking as he that owes it Orleans.
Dub. How?
Long. I think thou art his Porter,
Set here to anſwer creditors, that his Lordſhip
Is not within or takes the diet. I am ſent,
And wil grow here untill I have an anſwer,
Not to demand a debt of money, but
To call him to a ſtrict account for wrong
Done to the honors of a Gentleman,
Which nothing but his heart-bloud ſhall waſh off.
Dub. Shall I hear this?
Long And more, that if I may not Have acceſſe to him, I will fix this here
To his diſgrace and thine.
Dub. And thy life with it.
Long. Then have the coppies of it paſted on poſts,
Like Phamplet titles that ſue to be ſold;
Have his diſgrace talk for Tobacco ſhops,
His picture baſful'd.
Dub. All reſpect away, wer't in a Church——draws both Long. This is the book I pray with.
Orl. Forbear upon your lives.
Long. What are you rous'd? I hope your Lordſhip can read (though he ſtaine not his birth with ſcholler-ſhip) doth it not pleaſe you now? if you are a right Mounſier, muſter up the reſt of your attendance, which is a page, a cook, a pander, coach-man, and a foot man, in theſe dayes a great Lords traine, pretending I am unworthy to bring you a challenge, in ſtead of anſwering it, have me kik't.
Dub. If he does thou deſerv'ſt it.
Long. I dare you all to touch me, I'le not ſtand ſtill,
What anſwer you?
Orl. That thou haſt done to Amience
The office of a faithfull friend which I
Would cheriſh in thee were he not my foe,
How ever ſince on honorable tearmes
He cals me forth, ſay I will meet with him,
And by Dubois ere Sun-ſet make him know
The time and place, my ſwords length, and what ever
Scruple of circumſtance he can expect.
Long. This anſwer comes unlookt for, far you well,
Finding your temper thus, wood I had fayd leſſe. Exit.
Orl. Now Comes thy love to the teſt.
Dub. My Lord 'twill hold,
And in all dangers prove it ſelfe true gold. Exeunt

Enter Lawerdine La-poop Malicorne, ſervant.

Ser. I wil acquaint my Lady with your comming. Pleaſe you repoſe your ſelves here.
Mal. Ther's a teſter, nay now I am a woer I muſt be bountifull.
Ser. If you would have two three-pences for it ſir, To give ſome of your kindred as you ride, I'le ſee if I can get them; we uſe not (tho Servants) to take Bribes. Exit.
Law. Then thou art unfit, to be in office either in Court or City.
La-p. Indeed corruption is a Tree whoſe branches are of an unmeaſurable length they ſpread every where, and the dew that drops from thence have infected ſome chayres and ſtooles of authority.
Mal. Ah Captaine, lay not all the fault upon Officers you know you can ſhark though you be out of action, witneſſe Montague.

Lav Hang him, hee's ſafe enough ; you had a hand in it to and have gained by him ; but I wonder you Citizens that keep ſo many bookes, and take ſuch ſtrict accounts for every farthing due to you from others, reſerve not ſo much as a memorandum for the curteſies you receive.

Mal. Would you have a Citizen book thoſe? thankfulnes is a thing we are not ſworn to in our indentures: you may as well urge conſcience.

Lav. Talke no more of ſuch vanities. Montague is irrecoverably ſunk, I would we had twenty more to ſend after him ; the Snake that would be a Dragon and have wings muſt eate; and what imployes that but this, that in this Canniball age he that would have the ſute of wealth muſt not care——whom he feeds on ? and as I have heard no fleſh battens better, then that of a profeſt friend ; and he that would mount to honour muſt not make dainty to uſe the head of his mother, back of his father, or neck of his brother, for ladders to his preferment ; for but obſerve, and you ſhall finde for the moſt part cunning villany ſit at a feaſt as principall gueſt, and Innocent honeſty waite as a contemn'd ſervant with a trencher.

La-p. The Ladies.

Enter Montague bare-headed, Lamira, Lady Orleance, Charlo, Veramour, ſalute.

Mont. Do yee ſmell nothing?

Cha. Not I ſir. (ſtrels.

Mont. The carrion of knaves is very ſtrong in my no-

Lav. We came to admire, and finde fame was a niggard
Which we thought prodigall in our report
Before we ſaw you.

Lam. Tuſh ſir, this Courtſhip's old.

La-p. Ile fight for thee ſweet wench,
This is my tongue and woes for me?

Lam. Good man of War,
Hands of; if you take me it muſt be by ſiege,
Not by an onſet; and for your valour, I Think that I have deſerved few enemies,
And therefore need it not.

Mal. Thou needſt nothing ſweet Lady, but an obſequious husband, and where wilt thou finde him, if not in the City: we are true Moſcovits to our Wives, and are never better pleaſed, then when they uſe us as ſlaves, bridle and ſaddle us ; have me, thou ſhalt command all my wealth as thine own, thou ſhalt ſit like a Queen in my ware houſe ; And my factors at the returne with my ſhips ſhall pay thee tribute of all the rarities of the earth; thou ſhalt wear gold, feed on delicates, the firſt peaſcods-ſtrauberies, grapes, cherries ſhall——

Lam. Be mine; I apprehend what you would ſay, Thoſe dainties which the City payes ſo dear for,
The Country yeilds for nothing, and as early;
And credit me your far fet viandes pleaſe not
My appetite better then thoſe that are neer hand.
Then for your promis'd ſervice and ſubjection
To all my humors, when I am your wife,
Which as it ſeemes is frequent in the City,
I cannot finde what pleaſure they receive
In uſing there fond husbands like their Maydes ;
But of this more hereafter; I accept
Your proffer kindly, and yours ; my houſe ſtands open
To entertain you: take your pleaſure in it,
And eaſe after your journey.

La. Orl. Do you note the boldneſſe of the fellowes ?

Lam. Alas Madam, a virgin muſt in this be like a lawyer,
And as he takes all fees, ſhee muſt hear all ſuitors ; the
One for gaine, the other for her mirth ; ſtay with the Gentlemen, wee'l to the Orchards. Exeunt Lamira,

La-p. ——what art thou? La. Orle. Veram.

Mont. An honeſt man, though poor; Charl.
And look they like to monſters, are they ſo rare?

Lav. Roſe from the dead.

Mal. Do you heare Mounſier Serviture, didſt thou never heare of one Montague a prodigall gull, that lives about Paris?

Mont. So ſir.

Lav. One that after the loſſe of his maine eſtate in a Law ſute, bought an Office in the Court.

La-p. And ſhould have letters of Mart, to have the Spaniſh treaſure as it came from the Indies; were not thou and he twins ? put of thy hat, let me ſee thy forehead.

Mont. Though you take priviledge to uſe your tongues, I pray you hold your fingers,
'Twas your baſe cozenage made me as I am,
And were you ſome where elſe I would take off
This proud filme from your eyes, that will not tell you, Know I am Montague.

Enter Lamira behinde the Arras.

Lam. I will obſerve this better.

Lav. And art thou he ? I wil do thee grace ; give me thy hand ; I am glad thou haſt taken ſo good a courſe; ſerve God and pleaſe thy Miſtris; if I prove to be thy Maſter as I am very likely, I will do for thee.

Mal. Faith the fellow's well made for a ſervingman, and will no doubt carry a chyne of Beefe with good grace.

La-p. Prithee be carefull of me in my chamber; I will remember thee at my departure.

Mont. All this I can indure under this roof,
And ſo much owe I her, whoſe now I am,
That no wrong ſhall inceniſe me to moleſt
Her quiet houſe ; while you continue here,
I will not be aſhamed to do you ſervice
More then to her, becauſe ſuch is her pleaſure.
But you that have broke thrice, and foureteen times
Compounded for two ſhillings in the pound,
Know I dare kick you in your ſhop; do ye hear?
If ever I ſee Paris, though an army
Of muſty Murrions, ruſty brown bils and clubs,
Stand for your guard—— I have heard of your tricks,
And you that ſmell of Amber at my charge,
And triumph in your cheat ; well I may live
To meet thee, be it among a troop of ſuch
That are upon the faire face of the Court
Like running ulcers, and before thy whore
Trampell upon thee.

La-p. This a language for a livery ? take heed, I am a Captaine.

Mont. A Cox-comb are you not ? that thou and I
To give proof, which of us dares moſt, were now
In mid'ſt of a rough Sea, upon a piece
Of a ſplit ſhip, where only one might ride, Exit Lamira
I would——but fooliſh anger makes me talke from the Like a Player. Arras.

Lam. Indeed you act a part
Doth ill become you my ſervant ; is this your duty?

Mont. I crave your pardon, and wil hereafter be more circumſpect.

Lav. Oh the power of a Womans tongue! it had done done more then we three with our ſwords durſt undertake; put a madde man to ſilence.

Lam. Why Sirra theſe are none of your comrades
To drink with in the celler; one of them
For ought you know may live to be your Maſter.

Lap. Ther's ſome comfort yet.

Lam. Here's choyce of three, a wealthy Merchant.

Mal. Hem, ſhee's taken, ſhe hath ſpy'd my good Calf,
And many Ladies chuſe their husbands by that.

Lam. A Courtier that's in grace, a valiant Captaine,
And are theſe mates for you? away be gon.

Mont. I humbly pray you will be pleaſed to pardon,
And to give ſatisfaction to you Madam.
(Although I break my heart) I will confeſſe
That I have wrong'd them too, and make ſubmiſſion.

Lam. No I'le ſpare that; goe bid the Cook haſte Supper. Exit Mont.

Lap. Oh brave Lady thou art worthy to have ſervants, to be commandreſſe of a Family, that knowſt how to uſe and govern it.

Lav. You ſhall have many Miſtreſſes that will ſo miſtake as to take their horſe keepers, and footemen inſteed of their Husbands, thou art none of thoſe.

Mal. But ſhe that can make diſtinction of men, and knowes when ſhe hath gallants, and fellowes of rank and quality in her houſe.—

Lam. Gallants indeed, if it be the Gallants faſhion
To triumph in the miſeries of a man,
Of which they are the cauſe: one that tranſcends
(In ſpight of all that fortune hath, or can be done)
A million of ſuch things as you, my doores
Stand open to receive all ſuch as wear
The ſhape of Gentlemen, and my gentlier nature
(I might ſay weaker) weighes not the expence
Of entertainment; think you i'le forget yet
What's due unto my ſelfe: do not I know,
That you have dealt with poor Montague, but like Needy Commanders, cheating Citizens,
And perjured Courtiers? I am much mov'd, elſe uſe not
To ſay ſo much, if you will bear your ſelves
As fits ſuch you would make me think you are,
You may ſtay; if not the way lies before you. Exit.

Mal. What think you of this Captaine?

Lap. That this is a baudy houſe, with Pinacles and Turrets, in which this diſguiſed Montague goes to rut gratis, and that this is a landed pandreſſe, and makes her houſe a brothell for charity.

Mal. Come, that's no miracle; but from whence derive you the ſuppoſition?

Lav. Obſerve but the circumſtance; you all know that in the height of Montagues proſperity, hee did affect and had his love return'd by this Lady Orleans; ſince her divorcement, and his decay of eſtate, it is knowne, they have met not ſo much as his boy is wanting; and that this can be any thing elſe then a meer plot for their night work, is above my imagination to conceive.

Mal. Nay it carries probability, let us obſerve it better, but yet with ſuch caution as our prying be not diſcovered: here's all things to be had without coſt, and therefore good ſtaying here.

Lap. Nay that's true, I would we might woe her twenty years like Penelopes ſutors; come Laverdine.

Exeunt Malli. Lap. Poop.

Lav. I follow inſtantly, yonder he is.

Enter Viramor.

The thought of this Boy hath much coold my affection to his Lady, and by all conjectures, this is a diſguiſed whore; I will try if I can ſearch this Mine. Page——

Ver. Your pleaſure ſir?

Lav. Thou art a pritty Boy.

Ver. And you a brave man: now I am out of your debt.

Lav. Nay prithy ſtay.

Ver. I am in haſte ſir.

Lav. By the faith of a Courtyer.

Ver. Take heed what you ſay, you have taken a ſtrange Oath.

Lav. I have not ſeene a youth that hath pleaſed me better, I would thou could'ſt like me, ſo far as to leave thy Lady and waite on me, I would maintaine thee in the braveſt Cloaths.

Ver. Though you took them up on truſt, or bought 'em at the brokers.

Lav. Or any way: then thy imployments ſhould bee ſo neate and cleanly, thou ſhouldſt not touch a payre of Pantables in a Moneth, and thy lodging——

Ver. Should be in a brothell.

Lav. No, but in mine armes.

Ver. That my be the circle of a Baudy houſe, or worſe.

Lav. I meane thou ſhouldeſt lie with me.

Ver. Lie with you? I had rather lie with my Ladies Monkey; 'twas never a good World ſince our French Lords learned of the Neopolitans; to make their Pages their Bed-fellowes, doth more hurt to the Suburbe Ladies then tweenty dead Vacations; Tis Supper time ſir. Exit Veram.

Lav. I thought ſo, I know by that 'tis a Woman, for becauſe peradventure ſhe hath made tryall of the Monkey, ſhe preferrs him before me, as one unknown; well theſe are ſtanding Creatures, and have ſtrange deſires; And men muſt uſe ſtrange meanes to quench ſtrange fires.

Exit.

Actus Quartus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Montague, alone, in meane habit.

Mont. Now Montague, who diſcerns thy ſpirit now?
Thy breeding or thy bloud? here's a poor cloud
Eccliſpeth all thy ſplendor; who can reade
In thy pale face, dead eye, or lenten ſhute,
The liberty thy ever giving hand
Hath bought for others, manacling it ſelfe
In gives of parchment indiſſoluble?
The greateſt hearted man ſupplyed with meanes,
Nobility of birth and gentleſt parts,
I though the right hand of his Soveraigne,
If vertue quit her ſeat in his high ſoule,
Glitters but like a Pallace ſet on fire,
Whoſe glory whilſt it ſhines, but ruins him,
And his bright ſhow each houre to aſhes tending
Shall at the laſt be rak't up like a ſparkle,
Unleſſe mens lives and fortunes feede the flame.
Not for my own wants though blame I my Stars,
But ſuffering others to caſt love on me,
When I can neither take nor thankfull be.
My Ladies woman, faire and vertuous

Young

Young as the present moneth, solliciting me
For love and marriage now being nothing worth—

Enter Veramour with Counters.

Ver. Oh Master, I have sought you a long hour,
Good faith, I never joyd out of your sight;
For Gods sake sir be merry, or else beare
The Buffets of your fortunes with more scorn;
Do but begin to raile, teach me the way,
And Ile sit down and help your anger forth:
I have known you weare a suit full worth a Lordship,
Give to a man whose need nere frighted you
From calling of him friend, five hundred Crowns
Ere sleep had left your fences to consider
Your own important present ills; yet
Since I have seen you with a trencher waite,
Voide of all scorne, therefore Ile waite on you.

Mont. Would God thou wert lesse honest.

Ver. Would to God you were lesse worthy: I am even wee sir.

Mont. Is not thy Master strangely fallen, when thou Serv'st for no wages, but for charity?
Thou dost surcharge me with thy plenteous love:
The goodnesse of thy vertue shown to me,
More opens still my disability
To quit thy pains: Credit me loving boy,
A free and honest nature may be oppresst,
Tir'd with curtesies from a liberall spirit,
When they exceed his means of gratitude.

Ver. But tis a due in him that to that end Exceeds his love or duty.

Mont. A little world
Of vertue, why dost love and follow me?

Ver. I will follow you through all Countries,
Ile run (fast as I can) by your horse side,
Ile hold your stirrop when you doe alight,
And without grudging waite till you returne:
Ile quit offerd meanes, and expose my selfe
To cold and hunger still to be with you;
Fearlesse Ile travell through a wilderneſſe,
And when you are weary, I will lay me down
That in my bosome you may rest your head,
Where whilst you sleep, Ile watch that no wild beast
Shall hurt or trouble you: and thus we'l breed a story
To make every hearer weep,
When they discourse our fortunes and our loves.

Mont. Oh what a scoffe might men of Wormes make,
If they did know this boy? but my desire
Is that thou wouldest not (as thou usest still When like a servant I mong servants sit)
Waite on my Trencher, fill my cups with wine:
Why shouldst thou doe this boy? prethee consider,
I am not what I was.

Ver. Curst be the day when I forget that Montague was my Lord, or not remember him my Master still.

Mont. Rather curse me, with whom thy youth hath spent
So many houres, and yet unaught to live
By any worldly qualitie.

Ver. Indeed you never taught me how to handle Cards
To cheat and cozen men with oathes and lies;
Those are the wordly qualities to live:
Some of our Scarlet Gallants teach their boyes
These worldly qualities.
Since stumbling fortune then leaves vertue thus
Let me leave fortune, ere be vicious.

Mont. Oh lad, thy love will kill me.

Ver. In truth, I think in conscience I shall die for you:
Good Master weep not, doe you want aught sir?
Will you have any money? here's some Silver;
And here's a little Gold, 'twill serve to play,
And put more troublesome thoughts out of your mind:
I pray sir take it, Ile get more with singing.
And then Ile bring it you; my Lady gat me,
And — it was not covetousnesse,
But I forgot to tell you sooner on't.

Mont. Alasse boy, thou art not bound to tell it me,
And lesse to give it, buy thee Scarfes and Garters,
And when I have money, I will give thee a Sword:
Nature made thee a beauteous Cabinet
To lock up all the godnesse of the Earth.

Enter Charlote.

Ver. I have lost my voyce with the very sight of this Gentlewoman: good sir steale away, you were wont to be a curious avoyder of womens company.

Mont. Why boy, thou darst trust me any where, darst thou not?

Ver. I had rather trust you by a roaring Lyon, then a ravening woman.

Mont. Why boy.

Ver. Why truly she devoures more mans flesh—

Mont. I, But she roares not boy.

Ver. No sir, why she is never silent but when her mouth is full.

Charl. Mounsier Montague.

Mont. My sweet fellow, since you please to call me so.

Ver. Ah my conscience she would be pleased well enough to call you bedfellow: oh Master, do not hold her by the hand so: a woman is a lyme-bush, that catcheth all she toucheth.

Charl. I do most dangerously suspect this boy to be a wench; art thou not one? come hither, let me feele thee.

Ver. With all my heart.

Charl. Why dost thou pull off thy glove?

Ver. Why, to feele whether you be a boy, or no.

Charl. Fie boy, goe too, Ile not looke your head, nor combe your locks any more, if you talke thus.

Ver. Why, ile sing to you no more then.

Charl. Fie upon't, how sad you are? a young Gentleman that was the very Sunne of France.

Mont. But I am in the eclipse now.

Charl. Suffer himselfe to be over-run with a Lethargy of melancholy and discontent! rouze up thy spirit, man, and shake it off:
A Noble soule is like a ship at Sea,
That sleepes at Anchor when the Ocean's calme;
But when she rages, and the wind blows high,
He cuts his way with skill and Majesty.
I would turn a foole, or Poet, or any thing, or marry, to make you merry; prethee let's walke: good Veramour leave thy Master and me, I have earnest businesse with him.

Ver. Pray doe you leave my Master, and me; we were very merry before you came, he does not covet womens companie.
What have you to do with him? come sir will you goe? And ile sing to you again:
I faith his mind is stronger then to credit womens vows, and too pure to be capable of their loves.

Charl. The boy is jealous; sweet lad leave us; my Lady call'd for you I sweare: that's a good child, there's a piece of Gold for thee, go buy a Feather.

Ver. There's two pieces for you, do you goe and buy one, or what you will, or nothing so you goe. Nay then I see you would have me go sir; why, faith I will: now I perceive you love her better then you doe me; but

God

God bleſſe you whatever you do, or intend; I know you are a very honeſt man. Exit.

Charl. Still ſhall I woe thee, whilſt thy eares reply
I cannot, or I will not marry thee?
Why haſt thou drawn the blood out of my cheekes,
And given a quicker motion to my heart?
Oh thou haſt bred a fever in my veines
Call'd love, which no Phyſitian can cure;
Have mercy on a maid whoſe ſimple youth—

Mont. How your example faireſt teacheth me
A ceremonious Idolatry! kneels.
By all the joy of love I love thee better
Then I or any man can tell another;
And will expreſſe the mercy which thou crav'ſt,
I will forbeare to marry thee: conſider
Thou art natures heire in feature, and thy parents
In faire inheritances; riſe with theſe thoughts,
And look on me; but with a womans eye,
A decayd fellow, voyd of means and ſpirit.

Charl. Of ſpirit?

Mont. Yes, could I tamely live,
Forget my fathers blood, waite and make legs,
Staine my beſt breeches, with the ſervile drops
That fall from others draughts: (ſpirit

Charl. This vizard wherewith thou wouldſt hide thy
Is perſpective, to ſhew it plainlier.
This under-value of thy life is but Becauſe I ſhould not buy thee; what more ſpeaks
Greatneſſe of man, then valiant patience,
That ſhrinks not under his fates ſtrongeſt ſtrokes?
Theſe Roman deaths, as falling on a Sword,
Opening of veines, with poyſon quenching thirſt, (Which we erroneouſly doe ſtile the deeds
Of the heroicke and magnanimous man)
Was dead-eyd cowardiſe, and white cheeke feare,
Who doubting tyranny, and fainting under Fortunes falſe Lottery, deſperately runne
To death for dread of death; that ſoules moſt ſtout,
That bearing all miſchance, dares laſt it out;
Will you performe your word, and marry me,
When I ſhall call you to't?

Enter Longueville with a riding-rod.

Mont. I'faith I will.

Charl. Who's this alights here?

Long. With leave faire creature, are you the Lady Miſtris of th' houſe?

Charl. Her ſervant ſir.

Long. I pray then favour me, to inform your Lady, and Duke Orleans wife,
A buſineſſe of emport awaites 'em here,
And craves for ſpeedy anſwer.

Charl. Are you in poſt ſir?

Long. No, I am in Satin Lady; I would you would be in poſt.

Charl. I will returne, Sweet. Exit.

Long. Honeſt friend, doe you belong to the houſe? I pray be covered.

Mont. Yes Sir, I doe.

Long. Ha, dreamſt thou Longaville? ſure tis not he: ſir I ſhould know you.

Mont. So ſhould I you, but that I am aſham'd.
But though thou knowſt me, prethee Longaville,
Mock not my poverty, pray remember your ſelfe;
Showes it not ſtrangely for thy cloathes to ſtand
Without a hat to mine? mocke me no more.

Long. he — embroyder me all over ſir,
If ever I began to mocke you yet.
The — on me, why ſhould I weare Velvet
And Silver Lace, — I will teare it off.

Mont. Why mad-man?

Long. Put on my Hat? yes, when I am hangd I will: — I could break my head
For holding eyes that knew not you at firſt:
But time and fortune run your courſes with him,
He'l laugh and ſtorm you, when you ſhew moſt hate.

Enter Lamira, Orleans Lady, Laverdine, La Poope, Malycorne, Veramour, Charlot.

Lam. You're a fair Mounſier.

Long. Doe you mocke me Lady?

Lam. Your buſineſſe ſir, I mean.

Lady. Regard your ſelfe good Mounſier Longueville.

Lam. You are too negligent of your ſelfe and place,
Cover your head ſweet Mounſier.

Long. Miſtake me not faire Ladies,
Tis not to you, nor you, that I ſtand bare.

Lav. Nay ſweet deere Mounſier, let it not be to us (then.

La-p. — a complement.

Mal. And — of manners.
Pray hide your head, your gallants uſe to do't.

Long. And you your foreheads, why you needfull acceſſary raſcals,
That cannot live without your mutuall knaveries,
More then a Bawd, a Pandor, or a Whore
From one another; how dare you ſuſpect
That I ſtand bare to you? what make you here?
Shift your houſe Lady of 'em, for I know 'em,
They come to ſteale Napkins, and your Spoons;
Look to your Silver-bodkin, (Gentlewoman)
Tis a dead utenſil, and Page 'ware your pockets;
My reverence is unto this man, my maſter,
Whom you with proteſtations, and oaths
As high as Heaven, as deep as hell, which would Deceive the wiſeſt man of honeſt nature,
Have cozned and abus'd; but I may meet you,
And beate you one with t'other.

Mont. Peace, no more.

Long. Not a word ſir.

Lav. I am ſomething thicke of hearing; what ſaid he?

La-p. I heare him, but regard him not.

Mal. Nor I, I am never angry faſting.

Long. My love keeps back my duty, nobleſt Lady;
If husband or brother merit love from you,
Prevent their dangers, this houre brings to triall
Their hereto ſleeping hates; by this time each
Within a yerd is of the others heart,
And met to prove their cauſes and their ſpirits
With their impartiall Swords points; haſte and ſave,
Or never meet them more but at the grave.

Lady. Oh my diſtracted heart, that my wrackt honour
Should for a brothers, or a husbands life, through thy undoing die.

Lam. Amiens engagd; if he miſcarry all my hopes and (Joys,
I now confeſſe it loudly, are undone:
Caroch, and haſte, one minute may betray
A life more worth then all time can repay.

Exeunt Ladies, & Mont.

Mal. Hump: Mounſier Laverdine purſues this boy extreamly. Captaine what will you doe?

La-p. Any thing but follow to this Sea-ſervice; I am a Sea-captaine you know, and to offer to part 'em, without we could do't like water-men with long ſtaves, a quarter of a mile off, might be dangerous.

Mal. Why then let's retire and pray for 'em, I am reſolv'd to ſtop your intent; abus'd more then we have been we cannot be, without they fall to flat beating o'us.

Exeunt Maly. La-poop. Lav.

Lav. And that were unkindly done i'faith.

Ver. ---- but you are the troubleſomeſt Aſſe that ere I met with; retire, you ſmel like a womans chamber, that's newly up, before ſhe have pinſht her vapours in with her cloathes.

Lav. I will haunt thee like thy Grandames ghoſt, thou ſhalt never reſt for me.

Ver. Well, I perceive tis vaine to conceale a ſecret from you: believe it ſir, indeed I am a woman.

Lav. Why la; I knew't, this Propheticall tongue of mine never faild me; my mother was halfe a witch, never any thing that ſhe foreſpake, but came to paſſe: a woman? how happy am I? now we may lawfully come together without feare of hanging; Sweet wench, be gracious, in honourable ſort I woe, no otherwiſe.

Ver. Faith the truth is I have loved you long.

Lav. See, ſee.

Ver. But durſt not open it.

Lav. --- I think ſo.

Ver. But briefly, when you bring it to the teſt, if there be not one Gentleman in this houſe, wil challenge more intereſt in me, then you can, I am at your diſpoſure.

Exit.

Lav. Oh Fortunatus, I envie thee not
For cap, or pouch, this day Ile prove my Fortune,
In which your Lady doth elect her husband,
Who will be Amiens, 'twill ſave my wedding dinner,
Povera, La-poop and Malicorne: if all faile,
I will turne Citizen, a beauteous wife
Is the horn-booke to the richeſt Tradeſmans life.

Exeunt.

Enter Duboys, Orleans, Longueville, Amiens, two Lacques, a Page with two Piſtols.

Dub. Here's a good even piece of ground my Lords: Will you fix here?

Orl. Yes anywhere; Lacquey, take off my ſpurs; Upon a bridge, a raile but my Swords bredth, upon a battlement, Ile fight this quarrell.

Dub. O' the ropes, my Lord.

Orl. Upon a line.

Dub. So all our Countrie Duels are carried, like a fireworke on a thred.

Orl. Go now ſtay with the horſes, and doe you heare Upon your lives, till ſome of us come to you, Dare not to looke this way.

Dub. Except you ſee ſtrangers or others that by chance or purpoſe are like to interrupt us.

Orl. Then give warning.

Long. Who takes a Sword? the advantage is ſo ſmall, As he that doubts hath the free leave to chooſe.

Orl. Come give me any, and ſearch me; tis not The ground, weapon, or ſeconds that can make Oddes in thoſe fatall trials: but the cauſe.

Ami. Moſt true, and but it is no time to wiſh When men are come to do, I would deſire The cauſe 'twixt us were other then it is; But where the right is, there prevaile our Swords. And if my ſiſter have outliv'd her honour, I doe not pray I may outlive her ſhame.

Orl. Your ſiſter Amiens, is a whore, at once.

Ami. You oft have ſpoke that ſence to me before, But never in this language Orleance; And when you ſpoke it faire, and firſt, I told you That it was poſſible you might be abuſ'd: But now, ſince you forget your manners, you ſhall finde, If I tranſgreſſe my cuſtome, you doe lie, And are a villaine, which I had rather yet My Sword had prov'd, then I been forc'd to ſpeake: Nay give us leave, and ſince you ſtand ſo haughtily And highly on your cauſe, let you and I, Without engaging theſe two Gentlemen, ſingly determine it.

Long. My Lord, you'l pardon us.

Dub. I truſt your Lordſhips may not doe us that affront.

Ami. As how?

Dub. We kiſſe your Lordſhips hand, and come to ſerve you here with Swords.

Long. My Lord, we underſtand our ſelves.

Dub. We have had the honour to be call'd unto the buſineſſe, and we muſt not now quit it on terms.

Ami. Not terms of reaſon?

Long. No, no reaſon for the quitting of our calling.

Dub. True if I be call'd to't I muſt aske no reaſon.

Long. Nor heare none neither, which is leſſe:
It is a favour if my throat be cut,
Your Lordſhip does me; which I never can,

A noiſe within, crying down with their Swords.

Nor muſt have hope how to requite: what noiſe,
What cry is that my Lord upon your guard?
Some treachery is a foot.

Enter Lady Orleans, Lamira, Montague.

Lady. O here they are:
My Lord (deare Lady helpe me) helpe me all;
I have ſo woefull intereſt in both,
I know not which to feare for moſt: and yet
I muſt prefer my Lord. Deare brother,
You are too underſtanding, and too Noble
To be offended, when I know my duty,
Though ſcarce my teares will let me ſo to do it.

Orl. Out loathed ſtrumpet.

Lady. O my deareſt Lord,
If words could on me caſt the name of whore,
I then were worthy to be loath'd; but know,
Your unkindneſſe cannot make me wicked;
And therefore ſhould leſſe uſe that power upon me.

Orl. Was this your art to have theſe actors come,
To make this interlude? withdraw, cold man,
And if thy ſpirit be not frozen up,
Give me one ſtroke yet at thee for my vengeance.

Ami. Thou ſhalt have ſtroakes, and ſtroakes, thou glorious man,
Till thou breathſt thinner ayre then that thou talkeſt.

Lam. My Lord Count Amiens.

Lady. Princely husband.

Orl. Whore.

Lam. You wrong her impudent Lord; O that I had (the bulke
Of thoſe dull men; look how they ſtand, and no man
Will revenge an innocent Lady.

Ami. You hinder it Madam.

Lam. I would hinder you; is there none elſe to kill him?

Lady. Kill him Madam? have you learn'd that bad Language? O repent,
And be the motive, rather both kill me.

Orl. Then die my infamy.

Mont. Hold bloody man.

Orl. Art thou their Baſiliske?

Mont: To ſtrike thee dead, but that thy fate deſerves ſome weightier hand.

Dub. Sweet my Lord.

Orl. O here's a plot; you bring your champions with you; the adultreſſe with the adulterer: Out howling---

Dub. Good my Lord.

Orl. Are you her Graces countenance Lady, the receiver, receiver to the poore vicious couple.

Dub. Sweet my Lord.
Orl. Sweet rascall, didst not thou tell me, false fellow,
This Montague, here was murdered?
Dub. I did so; but he was falser, and a worthlesse Lord,
Like thy foule selfe, that would have had it so.
Long. Orleance tis true, and shall be prov'd upon thee.
Mont. Thy malice Duke, and this thy wicked nature, are all as visible as thou; but I borne to contemne thy injuries, doe know, that though thy greatnesse may corrupt a Jury, and make a Judge afraid, and carry out a world of devils with thy title: yet thou art not quiet at home, thou beares about thee that, that doth charge thee, and condemne thee too. The thing that grieves me more, and doth indeed displease me, is, to thinke that so much basenesse stands here to have encountered so much honour: Pardon me my Lord what late my passion spake, when you provok'd my innocence.
Orl. Yes doe, O flattery becomes him better then the sute he weares; give him a new one Amiens. (raile Ami. Orleance, tis here no time nor place, to jest or Poorely with you, but I will finde a time to Whisper you forth to this or some fit place,
As shall not hold a second interruption.
Mont. I hope your Lordships honour, and your life
Are destined unto higher hazzards; this is of A meaner arme.
Dub. Yes faith, or none.
Long. He is not fit to fall by an honest Sword,
A Prince and lie!
Dub. And slander, and hire men
To publish the false rumours he hath made.
Long. And sticke 'em on his friends, and innocents.
Dub. And practice against their lives after their fames.
Long. In men that are the matter of all leudnesse, Bauds, thieves, and cheaters, it were monstrous.
Dub. But in a man of blood, how more conspicuous?
Ami. Can this be?
Lady. They doe slander him.
Orl. Hang them, a paire of railing hangbies.
Long. How? stand Orleance; stay, give me my Pistols boy, Hinder me not, by——
I will kill him.
Lady. O stay his fury,
Ami. Longueville, my friend.
Long. Not for my selfe, my Lord, but for mankind,
And all that have an interest to vertue,
Or title unto innocence.
Ami. Why heare me.
Long. For justice sake.
Ami. That cannot be.
Long. To punish his wives, your honour, and my Lords wrongs here, whom I must ever call so; for your loves Ile sweare, Ile sacrifice——
Ami. Longaville, I did not thinke you a murtherer before.
Long. I care not what you thought me.
Ami. By ——— If thou attempt
His life, thy own is forfeit.
Mont. Foolish frantick man, the murder will be of us, not him.
Lady. O God.
Mont. We could have kild him, but we would not take
The justice out of fates. ———
Singe but a haire of him, thou diest.
Long. No matter, shoot.
Ami. Villaine.
Dub. My Lord, your sister is slaine.
Ami. Biancha?
Mont. O hapless and most wretched chance. (made
Lam. Stand'st thou looking upon the mischief thou hast
Thou Godlesse man, feeding thy blood-shot eyes
With the red spectacle, and art not turn'd to stone
With horrour? hence and take the wings of thy blacke
Infamy, to carry thee beyond the shoot of looks,
Or sound of curses, which will pursue thee still:
Thou hast out-tied all but thy guilt.
Orl. O wish it off again, for I am crack'd
Under the burden, and my heart will breake.
How heavy guilt is, when men come to feele
If you could know the mountaine I sustaine
With horror, you would each take off your part,
And more, to ease me: I cannot stand,
Forgive where I have wrong'd I pray.
Ami. Looke to him Montague.
Long. My Lords and Gentlemen, the Lady is well, but Unlesse that have shot her; for feare,
I have the worst on't, that needs would venture
Upon a tricke had like to ha' cost my guts:
Look to her, she'l be well, it was but Powder
I charged with, thinking that a guilty man
Would have been frighted sooner; but I am glad He's come at last.
Lam. How is Biancha? well?
Ami. I ives she? see sister, doth she breath?
Lady. O Gentlemen, thinke you I can breath,
That am restored to the hatefull sense
Of feeling in me my deare husbands death?
O no, I live not; life was that I left;
And what you have cal'd me to, is death indeed;
I cannot weep so fast as he doth bleed.
Dub. Pardon me Madam, he is well.
Lady. Ha my husband.
Orl. I cannot speake whether my joy or shame
Be greater, but I thank the Heavens for both.
O look not black upon me, all my friends,
To whom I will be reconciled, or grow unto
This earth, till I have weept a trench
That shall be great enough to be my grave,
And I will think them too most manly teares,
If they do move your pities: it is true,
Man should do nothing that he should repent;
But if he have, and say that he is sorry,
It is a worse fault if he be not truly.
Lam. My Lord, such sorrow cannot be suspected:
Here take your honoured wife, and joyn your hands.
——— she hath married you again:
And Gentlemen, I do invite you all,
This night to take my house, where on the morrow,
To heighten more the reconciling feast,
Ile make my selfe a husband and a guest. Exeunt.

Actus Quintus. Scæna prima.

Enter Montague and Charlote.

Char. Well now I am sure you are mine.
Mont. I am sure I am glad
I have one to own then; you'l finde me honest
As these daies go, enough; poore without question,
Which beggars hold a vertue; give me meat, and I Shall do my worke, else knock my shooes off,
And turn me out again.

Char. You are a merry fellow.
Mont. I have no great cauſe.
Char. Yes thy love to me.
Mont. That's as we make our game.
Char. Why you repent then.
Mon. Faith no worſt then I am I cannot be;
Much better I expect not: I ſhall love you,
And when you bid me goe to bed, obey,
Lie ſtill or move, as you ſhall miniſter,
Keep a foure-nobles Nag, and a black
Merling, learn to love Ale, and play at two-hand Iriſh,
And there's then all I aime at.
Char. Nay ſweet fellow, Ile make it ſomething better.
Mont. If you doe, you'l make me worſe:
Now I am poore, and willing to doe wel,
Hold me in that courſe, of all the Kings creatures,
I hate his coyne, keep me from that, and ſave me;
For if you chance out of your houſewifery
To leave a hundred pound or two, beſtow it
In Plum-broth ere I know it, elſe I take it;
Seeke out a hundred men that want this money,
Share it among 'em, they'l cry noble Montague,
And ſo I ſtand again at livery.
Char. You have pretty fancies ſir, but married once,
This charity will fall home to your ſelfe.
Mont. I would it would, I am afraid my looſeneſſe
Is yet ſcarce ſtopt, though it have nought to worke on
But the meere aire of what I have had.
Char. Pretty.
Mont. I wonder ſweet heart why you'l marry me,
I can ſee nothing in my ſelfe deſerves it,
Unleſſe the handſome wearing of a band,
For that's my ſtocke now, or a paire of garters, Neceſſity will not let me looſe. (husband
Char. I ſee ſir a great deale more, a handſome man, a
To make a right good woman truely happy.
Mont. Lord, where are my eyes? either you are fooliſh
As wenches once a yeere are, or far worſe,
Extreamly vertuous, can you love a poore man
That relies on cold meat and caſt ſtockings,
One onely ſuit to his backe, which now is mewing?
But what will be the next coate will poſe Triſtram.
If I ſhould leavy from my friends a fortune:
I could not raiſe ten groats to pay the Prieſt now.
Char. Ile do that duty; tis not means nor money
Makes me purſue your love; were your mind bankrupt,
I would never love you.

Enter Lamira.

Mont. Peace wench, here's my Lady.
Lam. Nay never ſhrinke i'th wetting, for my preſence;
D'ee finde her willing Montague?
Mont. Willing Madam?
Lam. How dainty you make of it, doe not I know
You two love one another? (theſe matters:
Mont. Certaine Madam, I thinke ye'ave revelations of Your Ladyſhip cannot tell me when I kiſt her.
Lam. But ſhe can, ſir.
Mont. But ſhe will not Madam;
For when they talke once, tis like fairy-money,
They get no more cloſe kiſſes.
Lam. Thou art wanton.
Mont. God knows I need not, yet I would be luſty:
But — my provender ſcarce pricks me.
Lam. It ſhall be mended Montague, I am glad you are grown ſo merry.
Mont. So am I too Madam.
Lam. You two will make a pretty handſome conſort.
Mont. Yes Madam, if my fiddle faile me not.
Lam. Your Fiddle? why your Fiddle? I warrant thou meaneſt madly:
Mont. Can you blame me? alaſſe I am in love.
Char. Tis very well ſir.
Lam. How long have you been thus?
Mont. How thus in love?
Lam. You are very quick ſir: no, I mean thus pleaſant.
Mont. — Ever ſince I was poore.
Lam. A little wealth would change you then.
Mont. Yes Lady into another ſuit, but never more Into another man: Ile bar that mainly,
The wealth I get henceforward ſhal be charm'd
For ever hurting me, Ile ſpend it faſting:
As I live noble Lady there is nothing
I have found directly cures the melancholy,
But want and wedlocke; when I had ſtore of money
I ſimper'd ſometime, and ſpoke wondrous wiſe,
But never laught out-right; now I am empty
My heart ſounds like a bell, and ſtrikes at both ſides.
Lam. You are finely temper'd Montague. (fended, Mont. Pardon Lady, if any way my free mirth have of-Twas meant to pleaſe you: if it prove too ſawſie,
Give it a frown, and I am ever ſilenc'd.
Lam. I like it paſſing well; pray follow it:
This is my day of choice, and ſhall be yours too,
Twere pity to delay ye: call to the Steward,
And tell him tis my pleaſure he ſhould give you
500 Crowns: make your ſelfe handſome Montague,
Let none weare better cloathes, tis for my credit;
But pray be merry ſtill. (hundreds,
Mont. If I be not, and make a foole of twice as many Clap me in Canvas Lady. Exeunt.

Enter La-poope, Laverdine, and Malycorne.

Lav. I am ſtrangely glad, I have found the myſtery
Of this diſguiſed boy out: I ever truſted
It was a woman, and how happily
I have found it ſo; and for my ſelfe, I am ſure
One that would offer me a thouſand pound now
(And that's a pretty ſum to make one ſtagger)
In ready Gold for this concealment, could not Buy my hope of her, ſhe's a dainty wench,
And ſuch a one I finde I want extreamly
To bring me into credit: beauty does it.
Mal. Say we ſhould all meach here, and ſtay the feaſt, now what can the worſt be? we have plai'd the knaves,
that's without queſtion.
La-p. True, and as I take it this is the firſt truth
We told theſe ten yeeres, and for any thing
I know may be the laſt: but grant we are knaves,
Both baſe and beaſtly knaves —
Mal. Say ſo then. Lav. Well.
La-p. And likewiſe let it be conſidered, we have wrongd
And moſt malicioufly, this Gentlewoman,
We caſt to ſtay with, what muſt we expect now?
Mal. I there's the point, we would expect good eating.
La-p. I know we would, but we may find good beating.
Lav. You ſay true Gentlemen, and by —
Though I love meat as well as any man,
I care not what he be, if a eate a Gods name;
Such crab-ſauce to my meat wil turn my pallate.
Mal. There's all the hazzard, for the frozen Montague
Has now got ſpring againe, and warmth in him,
And without doubt dares beat us terribly.
For not to mint the matter, we are cowards,
And have and ſhall be beaten when men pleaſe
To call us into cudgelling.
La-p. I feele we are very prone that way.
Lav. The ſonnes of Adam.

La-p.

La-p. Now here then rests the state o'th question?
Whether we yeild our bodies for a dinner
To a sound dog-whip, for I promise ye
If men be given to correction,
We can expect no lesse, or quietly
Take a hard Egge or two, and ten mile hence
Baite in a ditch, this we may do securely;
For to stay here about will be all one,
If once our morall mischiefes come in memory.

Mal. But pray ye hear me, is not this the day
The Virgin Lady doth elect her husband?

Lav. The dinner is to that end.

Mal. Very well then, say we all stay, and say we all scape this whipping, and be well entertained, and one of us carry the Lady. (stay, how sitly

La-p. 'Tis a seemly saying, I must confesse, but if we
We may apply it to our selves (i'th end)
Will aske a Christian feare; I cannot see
If I say true, what spetiall ornaments
Of art or nature, lay aside our lying
Whoring and drinking, which are no great vertues,
We are endued withall to win this Lady.

Mal. Yet women go not by the best parts ever; that I have found directly.

Lav. Why should we fear then? they choose men
As they feed; some times they settle
Upon a white broth'd face, a sweet smooth gallant,
And him they make an end of in a night;
Sometimes a Goose, sometimes, a grosser meat,
A rump of beef will serve 'em at some season,
And fill their bellies too: though without doubt
They are great devourers: stock fish is a dish,
If it be well dresst, for the tufnesse sake
Wil make the proud'st of 'em long and leap for't.
They'l run mad for a pudding ere they'l starve,

La-p. For my own part I care not, come what can come,
If I be whipt, why so be it; if cudgel'd,
I hope I shall out live it, I am sure
'Tis not the hundreth time I have bin serv'd so,
And yet I thank God I am here.

Mal. Here's resolution.

La-p. A little patience, and a rotten Apple
Cures twenty worse diseases; what say you sir?

Lav. Marry I say sir, if I had bin acquainted
With lamming in my youth, as you have bin
With whipping, and such benefits of nature,
I should do better: as I am, i'le venture,
And if it be my luck to have the Lady,
I'le use my fortune modestly; if beaten
You shall not hear a word, one I am sure of,
And if the worst fall she shall be my phylick.
Lets go then, and a merry winde be with us.

Mal. Captaine your shoots are old, pray put 'em off,
And let one fling 'em after us, be bold sirs,
And howsoever our fortune fals, lets beare
An equall burden; if there be an odde lash,
Wee'l part it afterwards.

La-p. I am arm'd at all points. Exeunt

Enter foure serving in a Banquet.

1. Then my Lady will have a bedfellow to night.

2. So she sayes, heaven what a danty armefull shall he enjoy that has the launching of her, what a fight shee'l make.

3. I mary boyes, there will be sport indeed, there will be grapling, she has a murderer lies in her prow, I am affraid will fright his maine mast Robin.

4. Who dost thou think shall have her of thy conscience, thou art a wise man.

3. If she go the old way, the way of lot, the longest cut sweeps all without question?

1. She has lost a friend of me else; what think yee of the Courtier.

2. Hang him hedgehogge, h'as nothing in him but a piece of Euphues, and twenty dozen of twelve penny riband all about him, he is but one Pedlers shop of gloves and garters, pickteeth and pomander.

3. The Courtier I marry God blesse her Steven, she is not mad yet, she knowes that trindle tayle too well, he's creft falne, and pinburtock't with leaping Landresses.

4. The Merchant sure shee will not be so base to have him.

1. I hope so Robin, hee'l sell us all to the Moors to make mummy; nor the Captaine.

4. Who Potgun, that's a sweet youth indeed, will he stay thinke ye?

3. Yes, without question, and have half din'd too ere the grace be done; he's good for nothing in the world but eating, lying and sleeping; what other men devour in drink, he takes in Pottage, they say has bin at Sea, a Herring fishing, for without doubt he dares not hayle an Ele-boate, ith way of War.

2. I think so, they would beate him off with Butter.

3. When he brings in a prize, unlesse it be Cockles, or Callis sand to scoure with, I'le renounce my five mark a year, and all the hidden art I have in carving, to teach young Birds to whistle Walsingham; leave him to the lime boates; now, what think you of the brave Amiens?

1. That's a thought indeed.

2. I marry ther's a person fit to feed upon a dish so danty, and hee'l do't I warrant him ith nick boyes, has a body world without end.

4. And such a one my Lady will make no little off; but is not Montague married to day?

3. Yes faith, honest Montague must have his bout too.

2. Hee's as good a lad as ever turnd a trencher, must we leave him?

3. Hee's to good for us Steven, I'le give him health to his good luck to night ith old Beaker, and it shall be sack too.

4. I must have a Garter; and boyes I have bespoke, a a Posset, some body shall give me thanks for't, 'tas a few toyes in't will rase commotions in a bed lad.

1. Away; my Lady. Exeunt

Enter Orleance, and his Lady arme in arme, Amiens, Lavira, Charlote, like a Bride, Montague brave, Lavendine, Longavile Dubois, Mallycorn, La-Poope.

Lam. Stir your selves noble Lords and Gentlemen,
You know your places; many royall welcomes
I give your grace; how lovely shewes this change?
My house is honor'd in this reconcilement.

Orl. Thus Madam must you do, my Lady now shall see
You made a Woman;
And give you some short lessons for your voyage.
Take her instructions Lady, she knowes much.

Lam. This becomes you sir.

La. My Lord must have his will.

Orl. Tis all I can do now sweet heart, faire Lady;
This to your happy choyce brother Amiens,

You

You are the man I meane it to.
Ami. I'le pledge you.
Orl. And with my heart.
Ami. With all my love I take it.
Lam. Noble Lords I am proud ye have done this day, ſo much content, and me ſuch eſtimation that this hour (In this poor houſe) ſhall be a league for ever,
For ſo I know ye mean it.
Ami. I do Lady.
Orl. And I my Lord.
Omnes. Y'ave done a work of honor.
Ami. Give me the Cup, where this health ſtops, let That man be either very ſick, or very ſimple;
Or I am very angry; ſir, to you;
Madam me thinks this Gentleman might ſit to;
He would become the beſt on's.
Orl. Pray ſit down ſir, I know the Lady of the feaſt expects not this day ſo much old cuſtom.
Lam. Sit down Mountague; nay never bluſh for the matter.
Mont. Noble Madam, I have too reaſons againſt it, and I dare not; duty to you firſt, as you are my Lady, and I your pooreſt ſervant; next the cuſtome of this dayes ceremony.
Lam. As you are my ſervant, I may command you then.
Mon. To my liſe Lady.
Lam. Sit down, and here, i'le have it ſo.
Ami. Sit down man, never refuſe ſo faire a Ladies offer.
Mont. It is your pleaſure Madam, not my pride,
And I obey; ile pledge yee now, my Lord, Mounſier Longavile.
Lon. I thank you ſir.
Mon. This to my Lady, and her faire choyce to day, and happineſſe.
Lon. Tis a faire health, i'le pledge you though I ſinke for't.
Lam. Montague you are too modeſt; come i'le adde a little more wine t'ee, 'twill make you merry, this to the good I wiſh.——
Mont. Honord Lady, I ſhall forget my ſelfe with this great bounty.
Lami. You ſhall not ſir; give him ſome Vine.
Ami. By heaven you are a worthy woman, and that Man is bleſt can come neer ſuch a Lady.
Lami. Such a bleſſing wet weather waſhes.
Mont. At all, I will not go a lip leſſe my Lord.
Orl. Tis well caſt ſir.
Mal. If Montague get more Wine, we are like to heare on't.
Lov. I do not like that ſitting there.
Mal. Nor I, me thinks he looks like a Judge.
La-p. Now have I a kinde a grudging of a beating on me, I fear my hot fit.
Mal. Drink apace, ther's nothing allays a cudgell like it.
Lami. Montague, now I'le put my choyce to you; who do you hold in all this honor'd company a husband fit to enjoy thy Lady? ſpeak directly.
Mont. Shall I ſpeak Madam?
Lami. Montague, you ſhall.
Mont. Then as I have a ſoule i'le ſpeak my conſcience,
Give me more wine, in vino veritas,
Here's to my ſelf, and Montague have a care.
Lami. Speak to th'cauſe.
Mont. Yes, Madam; firſt i'le begin to thee.
Lov. Have at us.
La-p. Now for a Pſalme of mercy.
Mont. You good Mounſier, you that Lely the noble Name of Courtier, and think your claime good here, hold up your hand; your VVorſhip is endited here, for a vaine glorious foole.
Lov. Good, oh ſir.
Mont. For one whoſe wit
Lies in a ten pound waſtcoat, yet not warme;
Ye have travel'd like a Fidler to make faces,
And brought home nothing but a caſe of tooth-picks.
You would be married, and no leſſe then Ladies,
And of the beſt ſort can ſerve you; thou ſilke worm
What haſt thou in thee to deſerve this woman?
Name but the pooreſt piece of man, good manners,
Ther's nothing ſound about thee, faith thou'aſt none,
It lies pawn'd at thy ſilke mans, for ſo much lace;
Thy credit which is worſe cannot redeem it,
Thy cloaths are all the ſoule thou haſt, for ſo
Thou ſav'ſt them hanſome for the next great tilting
Let who wil take the t'other, thou wert never chriſten'd
Upon my conſcience (but in barbers water)
Thou art never out o'th baſen, thou art rotten,
And if thou darſt tell truth, thou wilt confeſſe it;
——thy skin
Looks of a Cheſtnut colour, greas'd with Amber
All women that on earth do dwell thou lov'ſt,
Yet none that underſtand love thee again,
But thoſe that love the Spittle, get thee home
Poor painted butter fly, thy ſummers pa'ſt;
Go ſweat and eat dry Mutton, thou mayſt live
To do ſo well yet; a bruis'd Chamber Maide
May fall upon thee, and advance thy follies.
You have your ſentence; now it followes Captaine, I treat of you.
La-p. Pray God I may deſerve it.
Orl. Beſhrow my heart he ſpeaks, plaine.
Ami. That's plain dealing.
Mont. You are a raſcall Captaine.
La-p. A fine calling.
Mont. A water coward.
Ami. He would make a prety ſtuffe.
Mont. Nay I ſpeak freely Madam.
Lami. Her's none ties you.
Mont. Why ſhould'ſt thou dare come hither with a (thought
To finde a wife here fit for thee? are all
Thy ſingle money whores that fed on Carrots,
And fild the high graſſe with familiars
Falne of to footmen? prethee tell me truly,
For now I know thou dar'ſt not lie, couldſt thou not Wiſh thy ſelfe beaten well with all thy heart now,
And out of paine? ſay that I broke a rib,
Or cut thy noſe off, wert not mercifull for this ambition?
La-p. Do your pleaſure ſir, beggars muſt not be chooſers.
Orl. He longs for beating.
Mon. But that I have nobler thoughts poſſeſſe my ſoule,
Then ſuch brown biſket, ſuch a peice of dog-fiſh,
Such a moſt mangy Mackrell eater as thou art
That dares do nothing that belongs toth' Sea,
But ſpue, and catch rats, and fear men of war,
Though thou haſt nothing in the world to looſe
Abord thee, but one piece of beeſe, one Musket
Without a cock for peace ſake, and a pitch barrell,
I'le tell thee if my time were not more pretious
Then thus to looſe it, I would rattle thee,
It may be beat thee, and thy pure fellow,
The Merchant there of Catskins, till my words,
Or blowes, or both, made ye two branded wretches
To all the world hereafter; you would faine to Venture your bills of lading for this Lady;

What

What would you give now for her? ſome five frayle
Of rotten Figs good Godſon, would you not ſir?
Or a Parrat that ſpeaks high Dutch? can all thou ever
Of thine own fraughts from Sea, or coſonage (ſaw'ſt
(At which thou art as expert as the devill)
Nay ſell thy ſoul for wealth to, as thou wilt do,
Forfeit thy friends, and raiſe a mint of Money,
Make thee dream all theſe double could procure
A kiſſe from this good Lady? can't thou hope
She would lie with ſuch a nook of hell as thou art,
And hatch young Merchant-furies? oh ye dog-bolts
That fear no God but Dunkirks, I ſhall ſee you Serve in a lowſy Lime boat, ere I die,
For mouldy cheeſe and butter Billingſgate
Would not endure, or bring in rotten Pippins
To cure blew eyes, and ſwear they came from China.

Lami. Vex 'em no more, alas they ſhake:

Mont. Down quickly on your marrow bones, and thank this Lady.
I would not leave you thus elſe, there are blankets,
And ſuch delights for ſuch knaves; but fear ſtill;
'Twill be revenge enough, to keep you waking.
Ye have no minde of Marriage, ha' ye?

La-p. Surely no great mind now.

Mont. Nor you.

Mal. Nor I, I take it.

Mont. Two eager ſutors.

Lav. Troth tis wonderous hot, God bleſſe us from (him

Lami. You have told me Montague
Who are not fit to have me, let me know
The man you would point out for me.

Mont. There he ſits; my Lord of Amiens, Madam, is my choyce, hee's noble every way, and worthy a wife with all the dowries of——

Ami. Do you ſpeak ſir out of your friendſhip to me?

Mont. Yes, my Lord, and out of truth, for I could never flatter.

Ami I would not ſay how much I owe you for it,
For that were but a promiſe, but Ile thank ye,
As now I find you, in deſpite of fortune,
A faire and noble Gentleman.

Lami. My Lords I muſt confeſſe the choyce this man (hath made
Is every way a great one, if not too great,
And no way to be ſlighted: yet becauſe
We love to have our own eyes, ſometimes now
Give me a little liberty to ſee,
How I could fit my ſelfe, if I were put to't.

Ami. Madam we muſt.

Lami. Are yee all agreed?

Omnes. We be?

Lami. Then as I am a maid, I ſhall chooſe here.
Montague, I muſt have thee.

Mont. Why Madam I have learnt to ſuffer more then you can (out of pitty) mock me with this way eſpecially.

Lami. Thou think'ſt I jeſt now;
But by the love I bear thee, I will have thee.

Mont. If you could be ſo weak, to love a falſe man,
He muſt deſerve more then I ever can,
Or ever ſhall (deer Lady;) look but this way
Upon that Lord and you will tell me then
Your eyes are no true chooſers of good men.

Ami. Do you love him truely?

Lam. Yes my Lord, I will obey him truly, for I'le marry him, and juſtly thinke he that has ſo well ſerv'd mee with his obedience being borne to greatneſſe, muſt uſe mee nobly of neceſſity when I ſhall ſerve him.

Ami. 'Twere a deepe ſin to croſſe ye, noble Montague,
I wiſh ye all content, and am as happy
In my friends good as it were meerly mine.

Mont. Your Lordſhip does ill to give up your right;
I am not capable of this great goodneſſe,
There ſits my wife that holds my troth.

Cha. I'le end all, I wooed you for my Lady, and now give up my title, alas poor wench, my aimes are lower far.

Mont. How's this ſweet heart?

Lami. Sweet heart tis ſo, the drift was mine to hide
My purpoſe till it ſtruck home.

Omnes. God give you joy.

Lami. Prethee leave wondring, by this kiſſe i'le have thee.

Mont. Then by this kiſſe, and this I'le ever ſerve ye.

Long. This Gentleman and I ſir muſt needs hop once more to follow yee.

Mont. As friends and fellows, never as ſervants more.

Long. Dub. You make us happy.

Orl. Friend Montague, ye have taught mee ſo much honor, I have found a fault in my ſelf but thus I'le purge my conſcience of it, the late land I took by falſe play, from you with as much Contrition, and entireneſſe of affection to this moſt happy day again, I render; be Maſter of your own, for get my malice, and make mee worthy of your love, L. Montague.

Mont. You have won me and honor to your name.

Mal. Since your Lordſhip has begun good deeds, wee'l follow; good ſir forgive us, we are now thoſe men fear you for goodnes ſake; thoſe ſums of money unjuſtly we detaine from you, on your pardon ſhall bee reſtord again, and we your ſervants.

La-p. You are very forward ſir, it ſeems you have money, I pray you lay out, I'le pay you or pray for you, as the Sea works.

Lav. Their pennance ſir I'le undertake, ſo pleaſe ye
To grant me on concealement.

Long. Right courtier, ſtill a begging.

Mont. What is it ſir?

Lav. A Gentlewoman.

Mont. In my gift?

Lav. Yes ſir, In yours.

Mont. Why bring her forth and take her.

Lami. What wench would he have?

Mont. Any wench I think.

Enter Laverdine and Veramour like a Woman.

Lav. This is the Gentlewoman.

Mont. 'Tis my Page ſir.

Ver. No ſir, I am a poor diſguis'd Lady? (god-wot.
That like a Page have followed you full long for love

Omnes. A Lady—Laverdine—yes, yes, tis a Lady.

Mont. It may be ſo, and yet we have laine together,
But by my troth I never found her, Lady.

L. Orl. Why wore you boyes cloathes?

Vir. I'le tell you Madam,
I took example by 2 or 3. playes, that methought Concernd me.

Mont. Why made you not me acquainted with it.

Ver. Indeed ſir I knew it not my ſelfe,
Untill this Gentleman opend my dull eyes,
And by perſwaſion made me ſee it.

Ami. Could his power in words make ſuch a change?

Ver. Yes, as truly woman as your ſelfe my Lord.

Lav. Why but hark you, are not you a woman?

Ver. If hands and face make it not evident, you ſhall (ſee more.

Mal. Breeches, breeches, Laverdine.

La-p. Tis not enough, women may wear thoſe caſes.
Search further Courtier.

Omnes

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha.
Lap. Oh thou freſhwater Gudgeon, wouldſt thou come
To point of Marriage with an Ignoramus?
Thou ſhouldſt haye had her urin to the doctors,
The fooliſheſt Phiſitian could have made plaine
The liquid Epicæne; a blind man by the hand
Could have diſcoverd the ring from the ſtone.
Boy, come, to Sea with me, ile teach thee to climb,
And come down by the rope, nay to eate Rats.
Ver. I ſhall devour my Maſter before the priſon then,
Sir, I have began my Trade. (thee.
Mal. Trade? to the Citie, child, a flatcap will become Mont. Gentlemen I beſeech you moleſt your ſelves no (further,
For his preferment it is determin'd.
Lav. I am much aſhamed, and if my cheek
Gives not ſatisfaction, break my head.
Mont. Your ſhame's enough ſir.
Ami. Montague, much joy attend thy marriage Bed;
By thy example of true goodneſſe, envie is exil'd,
And to all honeſt men that truth intend,
I wiſh good luck, faire fate be ſtill thy friend.
Exeunt.

FINIS.

Vpon an Honeſt Mans Fortune.

By Mr. John Fletcher.

YOu that can look through Heaven, and tell the Stars,
Obſerve their kind conjunctions, and their wars;
Find out new lights, and give them where you pleaſe,
To thoſe men honors, pleaſures, to thoſe eaſe;
You that are Gods ſurveyers, and can ſhow
How far, and when, and why the wind doth blow;
Know all the charges of the dreadfull thunder,
And when it will ſhoot over, or fall under:
Tell me, by all your art I conjure ye,
Yes, and by truth, what ſhall become of me?
Find out my ſtar, if each one, as you ſay,
Have his peculiar Angel, and his way;
Obſerve my fate, next fall into your dreames,
Sweep clean your houſes, and new line your ſceames,
Then ſay your worſt: or have I none at all?
Or is it burnt out lately? or did fall?
Or am I poor, not able, no full flame?
My ſtar, like me, unworthy of a name?
Is it, your art can only work on thoſe
That deale with dangers, dignities, and cloaths?
With love, or new opinions? you all lye,
A fiſhwife hath a fate, and ſo have I,
But far above your finding; he that gives,
Out of his providence, to all that lives,
And no man knowes his treaſure, no not you:
He that made Egypt blind, from whence you grew
Scaby and lowſy, that the world might ſee
Your calculations are as blind as ye,
He that made all the ſtars, you dayly read,
And from thence filtch a knowledge how to feed;
Hath hid this from you, your conjectures all
Are drunken things, not how, but when they fall;
Man is his own ſtar, and the ſoule that can Render an honeſt, and a perfect man
Command all light, all influence, all fate,
Nothing to him falls early or too late.
Our acts our Angels are, or good or ill,
Our fatall ſhadowes that walke by us ſtill,
And when the ſtars are labouring, we believe
It is not that they govern, but they grive
For ſtubborn ignorance; all things that are Made for our generall uſes are at war,
Even we among our ſelves, and from the ſtrife
Your firſt unlike opinions got a life.
O man, thou image of thy makers good,
What canſt thou fear, when breath'd into thy blood
His ſpirit is, that built thee? what dull ſence
Makes thee ſuſpect, in need, that providence?
Who made the morning, and who plact the light
Guid to thy labours? who cal'd up the night,
And bid her fall upon thee, like ſweet ſhowers
In hollow murmurs, to lock up thy powers?
Who gave thee knowledge, who ſo truſted thee,
To let thee grow ſo neer himſelfe, the Tree?
Aduſt be then be diſtruſted? ſhall his frame
Diſcourſe with him, why thus, and thus I am?
He made the Angels thine, thy fellowes all,
Nay even thy ſervants, when devotions call.
Oh canſt thou be ſo ſtupid then, ſo dim,
To ſeek a ſaving influence, and looſe him?
Can Stars protect thee? or can poverty,
Which is the light to Heaven, put out his eye?
He is my ſtar, in him all truth I find,
All influence, all fate, and when my mind
Is furniſhed with his fullneſſe, my poor ſtory
Shall outlive all their Age, and all their glory.
The hand of danger cannot fall amiſſe,
When I know what, and in whoſe power it is.
Nor Want, the cauſe of man, ſhall make me groan,
A holy hermit is a mind alone.
Doth not experience teach us all we can
To work our ſelves into a glorious man?
Love's but an exhalation to beſt eyes
The matter ſpent, and then the fooles fire dyes?
Were I in love, and could that bright ſtar bring Increaſe to wealth, honour, and every thing:
Were ſhe as perfect good as wee can aime,
The firſt was ſo, and yet ſhe loſt the Game.
My miſtris then be knowledge and faire truth,
So I enjoy all beauty and all youth,
And though to time her lights and lawes ſhe lends,
She knowes no Age that to corruption bends.
Friends promiſes may lead me to believe,
But he that is his own friend knowes to live.
Affliction when I know it is but this,
A deep allay whereby man tougher is
To bear the hammer, and the deeper ſtill,
We ſtill ariſe more image of his will.
Sickneſſe an humorous cloud twixt us and light,
And Death, at longeſt but another night.
Man is his own Star, and that ſoule that can Be honeſt is the only perfect man. FINIS.

The Queene of Corinth.

Actus primus, Scæna prima.

Enter Neaneres, Soſicles, Eraton.

Era. THe Generall is returned then?
Nean. With much honour.
Sol. And peace concluded with the Prince of Argos?
Nean. To the Queens wiſhes: the conditions ſign'd
So farre beyond her hopes, to the advantage
Of Corinth, and the good of all her Subjects;
That though Leonidas our brave Generall
Ever came home a faire and great example,
He never yet return'd, or with leſſe loſſe
Or more deſerved honour.
Era. Have you not heard
The motives to this generall good?
Nean. The maine one
Was admiration firſt in young Agenor,
(For by that name we know the Prince of Argos)
Of our Leonidas wiſedome, and his valour,
Which though an enemy, firſt in him bred wonder;
That liking, Love ſucceeded that, which was Followed by a deſire to be a friend
Upon what termes ſoever to ſuch goodneſſe;
They had an enterview; and that their friendſhip
Might with our peace be ratified, 'twas concluded,
Agenor yeelding up all ſuch ſtronge places
As he held in our Territories, ſhould receive (With a ſufficient Dower, paid by the Queene)
The faire Merione for his wife.
Era. But how
Approves the Queene of this? ſince we well know,
Nor was her Highneſſe ignorant, that her Sonne
The Prince Theanor made love to this Lady,
And in the nobleſt way.
Nean. Which ſhe allowed of;
And I have heard from ſome familiar with
Her neereſt ſecrets, ſhe ſo deeply priz'd her
Being from an Infant train'd up in her ſervice, (Or to ſpeake better, rather her owne Creature)
She once did ſay, That if the Prince ſhould ſteale
A Marriage without her leave, or knowledge,
With this Merione, with a little ſuit
She ſhould grant both their pardons: where as now
To ſhew her ſelfe forſooth a Spartan Lady,
And that 'tis in her power, now it concernes
The common good, not alone to ſubdue
Her owne affections, but command her Sons;
She has not onely forc'd him with rough threats
To leave his Miſtris, but compell'd him when Agenor made his entrance into Corinth
To wait upon his Rivall.
Soſ. Can it be
The Prince ſhould ſit downe with this wrong?
Nean. I know not,
I am ſure I ſhould not.
Era. Truſt me nor I,
A Mother is a name, but put in ballance
With a yong wench 'tis nothing; where did you leave him?
Nean. Neere Veſta's Temple, for there he diſmiſs'd me,
And full of troubled thoughts, calling for Crates:
He went with him, but whither or to what purpoſe
I am a ſtranger.

Enter Theanor and Crates.

Era. They are come backe Neanther.
The. I like the place well.
Cra. Well Sir? it is built
As if the Architect had been a Prophet,
And faſhion'd it alone for this nights action;
The vaults ſo hollow, and the walls ſo ſtrong,
As Dian there might ſuffer violence,
And with loud ſhrikes in vaine call Jove to helpe her;
Or ſhould he heare, his thunder could not finde
An entrance to it.
The. I give up my ſelfe
Wholly to thy direction, worthieſt Crates;
And yet the deſperate cure that we muſt practice
Is in it ſelfe ſo foule, and full of danger,
That I ſtand doubtfull whether 'twere more manly
To dye not ſeeking helpe, or that helpe being
So deadly, to purſue it.
Cra. To thoſe reaſons
I have already urg'd, I will adde theſe.
For but conſider Sir——
Era. It is of weight
What ere it be, that with ſuch vehement action,
Of eye, hand, foot, nay all his bodies motion,
Crates incites the Prince to.
Nean. Then obſerve,
With what variety of paſſions he Receives his reaſons; now he's pale, and ſhakes
For feare or anger; now his naturall red
Comes backe againe, and with a pleaſing ſmile
He ſeemes to entertaine it; 'tis reſolv'd on
Be it what 'twill: to his ends may it proſper
Though the State ſinke for't.
Cra. Now you are a Prince
Fit to rule others, and in ſhaking off
The Bonds in which your Mother fetters you
Diſcharge your debt to nature, ſhe's your guide,

Follow her boldly Sir.
The. I am confirm'd,
Fall what may fall,
Cra. Yet ſtill diſguiſe your malice
In your humility.
The. I am inſtructed.
Cra. Though in your heart there rage a thouſand temeſts,
All calmeneſſe in your lookes.
The. I ſhall remember.
Cra. And at no hand, though theſe are us'd as agents
Acquaint them with your purpoſe till the inſtant
That we employ them; tis not fit they have
Time to conſider, when 'tis done, reward
Or feare will keep them ſilent: yet you may
Grace them as you paſſe by, 'twill make them ſurer,
And greedier to deſerve you.
The. Ile move onely
As you would have me: Good day gentlemen;
Nay, ſpare this ceremonious forme of duty
To him that brings love to you, equall love,
And is in nothing happier, then in knowing
It is return'd by you; we are as one.
Soſ. I am ore-joyd, I know not How to reply: but———
Era. Hang all buts; my Lord,
For this your bounteous favour——
Nean. Let me ſpeake,
If to feed Vultures hereafter the halter
Has done his part, or if there be a Hell
To take a ſwindge or two there, may deſerve this.
Soſ. We are ready.
Era. Try us any way.
Nean. Put us to it.
The. What jewels I have in you?
Cra. Have theſe ſoules,
That for a good looke, and a few kinde words
Part with their eſſence?
The. Since you will compell me
To put that to the tryall, which I doubt not,
Crates may be ſuddenly will inſtruct you
How, and in what to ſhew your loves; obey him
As you would binde me to you.
Cra. Tis well grounded;
Leave me to reare the building.
Nean. We will doe.
Cra. I know it.
Era. Any thing youl put us to. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Leonidas, Merione, Beliza, Servant.

Leo. Siſter, I reape the harveſt of my labours
In your preferment, be you worthy of it,
And with an open boſome entertaine
A greater fortune then my love durſt hope for;
Be wiſe, and welcome it: play not the coy
And fooliſh wanton, with the offerd bounties
Of him that is a Prince. I was woo'd for you,
And won Merione: then if you dare
Beleeve the object that tooke me was worthy,
Or truſt my judgement, in me think you were Courted, ſued to, and conquerd.
Mer. Noble brother,
I have, and ſtill eſteeme you as a Father,
And will as farre obey you; my heart ſpeakes it:
And yet without your anger give me leave
To ſay, That in the choice of that on which
All my lifes joyes or ſorrowes have dependance,
It had been fit ere you had made a full
And abſolute grant of me to any other,
I ſhould have us'd mine owne eyes, or at leaſt
Made you to underſtand, whether it were Within my power to make a ſecond gift
Of my poore ſelfe.
Leo. I know what tis you point at,
The Prince Themot love; let not that cheat you;
His vowes were but meere courtſhip; all his ſervice
But practiſe how to entrap a credulous Lady:
Or grant it ſerious, yet you muſt remember
He's not to love but where the Queene his Mother
Muſt give allowance, which to you is barr'd up:
And therefore ſtudy to forget that ever
You cheriſht ſuch a hope.
Mer. I would I could.
Leo. But brave Agenor, who is come in perſon
To celebrate this Marriage, for your love
Forgives the forfeit often thouſand lives,
That muſt have falne under the ſword of war
Had not this peace been made; which generall good
Both Countries owe to his affection to you:
O happy Siſter, aske this noble Lady
Your boſome friend (ſince I faile in my credit)
What palme Agenors name above all Princes
That Greece is proud of carries, and with luſtre.
Rel. Indeed fame gives him out for excellent;
And friend, I doubt not but when you ſhall ſee him
He'l ſo appeare to you. Art ſure 'tis he?
Ser. As I live Madam——
Bel. Vertue enable me to containe my joy.
'Tis my Euphanes.
Ser. Yes.
Bel. And he's in health?
Ser. Moſt certainly Madam.
Bel. Ile ſee him inſtantly.
So prethee tell him. Exit Se.
Mer. I yeeld my ſelfe too weake
In argument to oppoſe you: you may leade me
Whither you pleaſe.
Leo. 'Tis anſwer'd like my Siſter;
And if in him you finde not ample cauſe
To pray for me, and daily on your knees,
Conclude I have no judgement.
Mer. May it prove ſo:
Friend, ſhall we have your company?
Bel. Two houres hence
I will not faile you.
Leo. At your pleaſure Madam. Exit Leo. and Mer.

Enter Euphanes.

Bel. Could I in one word ſpeake a thouſand welcomes (And hearty ones) you have 'em: Fie, my hand,
We ſtand at no ſuch diſtance, by my life
The parting kiſſe you tooke before your travell
Is yet a virgin on my lips, preſerv'd
With as much care as I would doe my fame,
To entertaine your wiſh'd returne.
Euph. Beſt Lady,
That I doe honour you, and with as much reaſon
As ever man did vertue; that I love you,
Yet looke upon you with that reverence
As holy men behold the Sun, the Starrs,
The Temples, and their gods, they all can witneſſe;
And that you have deſerv'd this duty from me;
The life, and meanes of life, for which I owe you,
Commands me to profeſſe it, ſince my fortune
Affords no other payment.
Bel. Good Euphanes, where benefits are ill conferr'd,
I had thought,
That for the trifling courteſies as I call them,

(Though

(Though you give them another name) you had Made ample ſatisfaction in th' acceptance,
And therefore did preſume you had brought home
Some other Language.
Euph. No one I have learn'd
Yeelds words ſufficient to expreſſe your goodneſſe;
Nor can I ever chuſe another theame
And not be thought unthankfull.
Bel. Pray you no more
As you reſpect me.
Euph. That charme is too powerfull
For me to diſobey it: 'Tis your pleaſure,
And not my boldneſſe Madam.
Bel. Good Euphanes,
Beleeve I am not one of thoſe weak Ladies,
That (barren of all inward worth) are proud
Of what they cannot truly call their owne,
Their birth or fortune, which are things without them,
Nor in this will I imitate the world,
Whoſe greater part of men think when they give
They purchaſe bondmen, not make worthy friends:
By all that's good I ſweare, I never thought
My great eſtate was an addition to me,
Or that your wants took from you.
Euph. There are few
So truly underſtanding or themſelves
Or what they doe poſſeſſe.
Bel. Good Euphanes,
Where benefits
Are ill conferr'd, as to unworthy men,
That turne them to bad uſes, the beſtower
For wanting judgement how, and on whom to place them,
Is partly guilty: but when we do favours
To ſuch as make them grounds on which they build
Their noble actions, there we improve our fortunes
To the moſt faire advantage. If I ſpeake
Too much, though I conteſſe I ſpeak well,
Prethee remember 'tis a womans weakneſſe,
And then thou wilt forgive it.
Euph. You ſpeake nothing
But what would well become the wiſeſt man:
And that by you deliver'd is ſo pleaſing
That I could heare you ever.
Bel. Fly not from
Your word, for I arreſt it: and will now
Expreſſe my ſelfe a little more, and prove
That whereas you profeſſe your ſelfe my debtor,
That I am yours.
Euph. Your Ladiſhip then muſt uſe
Some Sophiſtry I ne're heard of.
Bel. By plaine reaſons,
For looke you, had you never ſunk beneath
Your wants, or if thoſe wants had found ſupply
From Crates, your unkinde and covetous brother,
Or any other man, I then had miſs'd
A ſubject upon which I worthily
Might exerciſe my bounty: whereas now
By having happy opportunity
To furniſh you before, and in your travells,
With all conveniencies that you thought uſefull,
That Gold which would have ruſted in my Coffers
Being thus imploy'd, has rendred me a partner
In all your glorious actions. And whereas
Had you not been, I ſhould have di'd a thing
Scarce knowne, or ſoone forgotten: there's no Trophy
In which Euphanes for his worth is mentioned,
But there you have been carefull to remember,
That all the good you did came from Beliza.
Euph. That was but thankfulneſſe.
Bel. 'Twas ſuch an honour,
And ſuch a large returne for the poore traſh
I ventur'd with you, that if I ſhould part
With all that I poſſeſſe, and my ſelfe too
In ſatisfaction for it, 'twere ſtill ſhort
Of your deſervings.
Euph. You o're-prize them Madam.
Bel. The Queen her ſelfe hath given me gracious thanks
In your behalfe, for ſhe hath heard Euphanes
How gallantly you have maintain'd her honour
In all the Courts of Greece: and reſt aſſur'd, (Though yet unknown) when I preſent you to her,
Which I will doe this evening, you ſhall finde
That ſhe intends good to you.
Euph. Worthieſt Lady,
Since all you labour for is the advancement
Of him that will live ever your poore ſervant,
He muſt not contradict it.
Bel. Here's your Brother,
'Tis ſtrange to ſee him here.

Enter Crates.

Cra. You are welcome home Sir,
(Your pardon Madam) I had thought my houſe, Conſidering who I am, might have been worthy
Of your firſt viſit.
Euph. 'Twas not open to me
When laſt I ſaw you; and to me 'tis wonder
That abſence which ſtill renders men forgotten
Should make my preſence wiſh'd for.
Bel. That's not it,
Your too kinde Brother underſtanding that
You ſtand in no need of him, is bold to offer
His entertainment.
Cra. He had never wanted,
Or yours, or your aſſiſtance, had he practiz'd
The way he might have tooke, to have commanded
What ever I call mine,
Euph. I ſtudied many,
But could finde none.
Cra. You would not finde your ſelfe Sir,
Or in your ſelfe what was from you due to me:
The priviledge my birth beſtow'd upon me
Might challenge ſome regard.
Euph. You had all the Land Sir,
What elſe did you expect? and I am certaine
You kept ſuch ſtrong Guards to preſerve it yours
I could force nothing from you.
Cra. Did you ever
Demand helpe from me?
Euph. My wants have, and often,
With open mouthes, but you nor heard, nor ſaw them;
May be you look'd I ſhould petition to you
As you went to your Horſe; flatter your ſervants,
To play the Brokers for my furtherance,
Sooth your worſe humours, Act the Paraſite
On all occaſions, write my name with theirs
That are but one degree remov'd from ſlaves,
Be drunk when you would have me, then wench with you,
Or play the Pander; enter into Quarrels
Although unjuſtly grounded, and defend them
Becauſe they were yours; theſe are the tyrannies
Moſt younger Brothers groane beneath; yet beare them
From the inſulting Heire, ſelling their freedomes
At a leſſe rate then what the State allowes,
The ſallary of baſe and common Strumpets:
For my part, ere on ſuch low termes I feed
Upon a Brothers trencher, let me dye

The Beggers death, and ſtarve.
Cra. 'Tis bravely ſpoken,
Did what you doe ranke with it.
Bel. Why, what does he
You would not wiſh were yours?
Cra. Ile tell you Lady,
Since you riſe up his Advocate, and boldly,
(For now I finde, and plainly, in whoſe favour My love and ſervice to you was neglected)
For all your wealth, nay, adde to that your beauty,
And put your vertues in if you have any,
I would not yet be pointed at, as he is,
For the fine Courtier, the womans man,
That tells my Lady ſtories, diſſolves riddles,
Uſhers her to her Coach, lyes at her feet
At ſollemne Maskes, applauding what ſhe laughs at;
Reads her aſleep a nights, and takes his oath
Upon her Pantoffles, that all excellence
In other Madams doe but zany hers:
Theſe you are perfect in, and yet theſe take not
Or from your birth or freedome.
Euph. Should another
Say this, my deeds, not lookes ſhould ſhew——
Bel. Contemne it:
His envie faines this, and he's but reporter,
Without a ſecond, of his owne dry fancies.
Cra. Yes Madam, the whole City ſpeakes it with me,
And though it may diſtaſte, 'tis certaine you
Are brought into the ſceane, and with him cenſur'd;
For you are given out for the provident Lady,
That not to be unfurniſh'd for her pleaſures
(As without them to what vaine uſe is greatneſſe)
Have made choyce of an able man, a young man
Of an Herculean back to doe you ſervice,
And one you may command too, that is active,
And does what you would have him.
Bel. You are foule mouth'd.
Cra. That can ſpeake well, write Verſes too, and good Sharp and conceited, whoſe wit you may lie with (ones,
When his performance failes him; one you have Maintain'd abroad to learne new waies to pleaſe you,
And by the gods you well reward him for it,
No night (in which while you lye ſick and panting)
He watches by you but is worth a tallent:
No conference in your Coach which is not paid with
A ſcarlet Suit; this the poore people mutter,
Though I beleeve, for I am bound to doe ſo,
A Lady of your youth, that feeds high too,
And a moſt exact Lady, may doe all this
Out of a vertuous love, the laſt bought vizard
That Leachery purchas'd.
Euph. Not a word beyond this,
The reverence I owe to that one wombe
In which we both were embrions, makes me ſuffer
What's paſt; but if continued——
Bel. Stay your hand,
The Queene ſhall right mine honour.
Cra. Let him doe it,
It is but marrying him; and for your anger
Know that I ſlight it: when your Goddeſſe here
Is weary of your ſacrifice, as ſhe will be,
You know my houſe, and there amongſt my ſervants
Perhaps youl finde a livery. Exit.
Bel. Be not mov'd,
I know the rancour of his diſpoſition,
And turne it on himſelfe by laughing at it;
And in that let me teach you.
Euph. I learne gladly. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Neambes, Soſimes, and Eraton, ſeverally.

Nea. You are met unto my wiſhes, if you ever
Deſir'd true mirth ſo far as to adventure
To dye with the extreamity of laughter;
I come before the object that will doe it;
Or let me live your foole.
Soſ. Who is't Neambes?
Nea. Lamprias the Uſurers ſonne.
Era. Lampriας? the youth
Of ſix and fifty?
Soſ. That was ſent to travell
By rich Beliza, till he came to age,
And was fit for a Wife?
Nea. The very ſame;
This gallant with his Guardian, and his Tutor,
(And of the three who is moſt foole I know not)
Are newly come to Corinth, ile not ſtale them
By giving up their characters, but leave you
To make your owne diſcoveries: here they are Sir.

Enter Onos Uncle and Tutor.

Tutor. That legge a little higher, very well.
Now put your face into the Travellors poſture;
Exceeding good.
Vnckle. Doe you mark how they admire him?
Tut. They will be all my Schollars, when they know
And underſtand him truly.
Era. Phœbus guard me
From this new Python.
Soſ. How they have trimm'd him up
Like an old Reveller?
Nea. Curl'd him and perfum'd him,
But that was done with judgement, for he lookes
Like one that purg'd perpetually; truſt me,
That Witches face of his is painted too,
And every ditch upon it buries more
Then would ſet off ten Bawds, and all their tenants.
Soſ. See how it moves towards us.
Nea. There's a ſalutation:
'Troth Gentlemen, you have beſtowed much travell
In trayning up your Pupill.
Tut. Sir, great buildings
Require great labours, which yet we repent not,
Since for the Countries good we have brought home
An abſolute man.
Vnc. As any of his yeares,
Corinth can ſhew you.
Era. He's exceeding meagre.
Tut. His contemplation——
Vnc. Beſides, 'tis fit
Learners ſhould be kept hungry.
Nea. You all contemplate;
For three ſuch wretched pictures of leane famine
I never ſaw together.
Vnc. We have fat minds Sir,
And travell'd to ſave charges. Doe you thinke
'Twas fit a young and hopefull Gentleman
Should be brought up a glutton? he's my Ward,
Nor was there ever where I bore the bagg
Any ſuperfluous waſte.
Era. Pray you can it ſpeake?
Tut. He knowes all Languages, but will uſe none,
They are all too big for his mouth, or elſe too little T'expreſſe his great conceits: and yet of late
With ſome impulſion he hath ſet downe
In a ſtrange method by the way of queſtion,
And briefly, to all buſineſſe whatſoever
That may concerne a Gentleman.

Nea.

Nea. Good Sir, let's heare him.
Tut. Come on Sir.
Nea. They have taught him like an Ape,
To doe his tricks by ſignes: now he begins.
Onos. When ſhall we be drunke together?
Tut. That's the firſt.
Onos. Where ſhall we whore to night?
Uncle. That ever followes.
Era. 'Odds me, he now lookes angry.
Onos. Shall we quarrell?
Nea. With me at no hand Sir.
Onos. Then let's proteſt.
Era. Is this all?
Tut. Theſe are Sir, the foure new Vertues
That are in faſhion: many a mile we meaſur'd
Before we could arrive unto this knowledge.
Nea. You might have ſpar'd that labour, for at home Ther's little elſe in practice: Ha? the Queene? (here
Good friends, for halfe an houre remove your motion,
To morrow willingly when we have more leaſure
We'l looke on him againe.
Onos. Did I not rarely?
Uncle. Excellent well.
Tut. He ſhall have fixe Plumbs for it. Exeunt.

Enter Agenor, Leonidas, Theanor, Queene, Merione, Beliza, Euphanes, Crates, Ladies, attendants with Lights.

Queene. How much my Court is honour'd princely Bro-
In your vouchaſing it your long'd for preſence (ther
Were tedious to repeat, ſince 'tis already
(And heartily) acknowledg'd; may the gods
That looke into Kings actions ſmile upon
The league we have concluded; and their juſtice
Finde me out to revenge it if I breake
One article.
Age. Great miracle of Queenes,
How happy I eſteeme my ſelfe in being Thought worthy to be numbred in the rank
Of your confederates, my love and beſt ſervice
Shall teach the world hereafter: but this gift
With which you have confirm'd it, is ſo farre
Beyond my hopes and meanes ere to returne,
That of neceſſity I muſt dye oblig'd
To your unanſwer'd bounty.
The. The ſweet Lady
In bluſhes gives your Highneſſe thankes.
Quee. Beleeve it
On the Queenes word, ſhe is a worthy one,
And I am ſo acquainted with her goodneſſe,
That but for this peace that hath chang'd my purpoſe,
And to her more advancement, I ſhould gladly
Have call'd her Daughter.
The. Though I am depriv'd of
A bleſſing 'tis not in the Fates to equall,
To ſhew my ſelfe a ſubject as a ſonne,
Here I give up my claime, and willingly
With mine owne hand deliver you what once
I lov'd above my ſelfe; and from this houre
(For my affection yeelds now to my duty)
You never to ſollicite her.
Cra. 'Tis well cover'd Nembes, and the reſt. Exit Cra. Nea. Sof. Era.
Quee. Nay, for this night
You muſt (for 'tis our Country faſhion Sir)
Leave her to her devotions, in the morning
We'l bring you to the Temple.
Leo. How in this
Your Highneſſe honours me?
Mer. Sweet reſt to all.
Age. This kiſſe, and I obey you.
Bel. Pleaſe it your Highneſſe,
This is the Gentleman.
Quee. You are welcome home Sir,
(Now as I live, one of a promiſing preſence)
I have heard of you before, and you ſhall finde
Ile know you better: finde out ſomething that May doe you good, and reſt aſſur'd to have it.
Were you at Sparta lately?
Euph. Three daies ſince
Madam I came from thence.
Quee. 'Tis very late,
Good night my Lord; doe you Sir follow me,
I muſt talke further with you.
Ag. All reſt with you. Exeunt.

Enter Crates, Nembes, Eraſton, Soficles diſguiz'd.

Cra. She muſt paſſe through this Cloyſter, ſuddainly
And boldly ſeaze upon her.
Nea. Where's the Prince?
Cra. He does expect us at the place I ſhew'd you.

Enter Merione and Servant.

I heare ones footing, peace, 'tis ſhe;
Mer. Now leave me,
I know the way, though Veſta witneſſe with me
I never trod it with ſuch feare: helpe, helpe.
Cra. Stop her mouth cloſe, out with the Light, Ile guide
you. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Merione (as newly raviſhed.)

Mer. TO whom now ſhall I cry? What pow'r thus kneele to?
And beg my raviſht honour back upon me?
Deafe, deafe, you gods of goodneſſe, deafe to me,
Deafe Heaven to all my cryes; deafe hope, deafe juſtice,
I am abus'd, and you that ſee all ſaw it;
Saw it, and ſmil'd upon the villaine did it:
Saw it, and gave him ſtrength: why have I pray'd to ye,
When all the worlds eyes have been ſunk in ſlumbers?
Why have I then powr'd out my teares? kneel'd to ye?
And from the Altar of a pure heart ſent ye
Thoughts like your ſelves, white, innocent, vowes purer
And of a ſweeter flame then all earths odours?
Why have I ſung your praiſes, ſtrew'd your Temples,
And Crown'd your holy Prieſts with Virgin Roſes?
Is it we hold ye powerfull, to deſtroy us?
Beleeve, and honour ye, to ſee us ruin'd?
Theſe teares of anger thus I ſprinckle toward ye,
You that dare ſleep ſecure whilſt Virgins ſuffer,
Theſe ſtick like Comets, blaze eternally,
Till with the wonder they have wak't your juſtice,
And forc't ye feare our curſes, as we yours.

Enter Theanor, Crates, with Vizards.

My ſhame ſtill followes me, and ſtill proclames me;
He turnes away in ſcorne, I am contemned too,
A more unmanly violence then the other;
Bitten, and flung away? What ere you are
Sir, you that have abus'd me, and now moſt baſely
And ſacrilegiouſly rob'd this faire Temple,

I fling all theſe behinde me, but looke upon me,
But one kinde loving look, be what ye will,
So from this hower you will be mine, my Husband;
And you his hand in miſchiefe, I ſpeake to you too,
Counſell him nobly now; you know the miſchief,
The moſt unrighteous act he has done, perſwade him,
Perſwade him like a friend, knock at his Conſcience
Till faire Repentance follow: yet be worthy of me,
And ſhew your ſelf, if ever good thought guided ye, (age;
You have had your foul will, make it yet fair with marri-Open your ſelf and take me, wed me now: Draws his
More fruits of Villany? your Dagger? come Dagger.
Ye are mercifull, I thank ye for your medicine:
Is that too worthy too?

Enter the reſt diſguis'd.

Devill, thou with him,
Thou penny Bawd to his Luſt, will not that ſtir thee?
Do you work by tokens now? Be ſure I live not,
For your owne ſafeties knaves. I will ſit patiently:
But as ye are true Villaines, the Devills owne ſervants,
And thoſe he loves and truſts, make it as bloody
An Act, of ſuch true horrour Heaven would ſhake at,
'Twill ſhew the braver: goodneſſe hold my hope faſt,
And in thy mercies looke upon my ruines,
And then I am right: my eyes grow dead and heavy:

Enter ſixe diſguis'd, ſinging and dancing to a horrid Muſick, and ſprinkling water on her face.

Wrong me no more as ye are men.

The. She is faſt.

Cra. Away with her. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Agenor, and Gentlemen with Torches.

Ag. Now Gentlemen, the time's come now t'enjoy
That fruitfull happineſſe my heart has long'd for:
This day be happy call'd, and when old Time
Brings it about each yeare, crown'd with that ſweetneſſe
It gives me now, ſee every man obſerve it,
And laying all aſide beares ſhew of buſineſſe,
Give this to joy and triumph: How ſits my cloaths?

1 Gent. Handſome, and wondrous well Sir.

Ag. Do they ſhew richly?
For to thoſe curious eyes even beauty envies,
I muſt not now appeare poore, or low faſhion'd;
Me thinks I am younger then I was, farre younger;
And ſuch a promiſe in my bloud I feele now,
That if there may be a perpetuall youth
Beſtowed on man, I am that ſoule ſhall win it:
Do's my haire ſtand well, Lord how ill-favourdly
You have dreſt me to day? how baldly? why this Cloke?

2 Gent. Why 'tis the richeſt Sir.

Ag. And here ye have put me on
A paire of Breeches look like a paire of Bagpipes.

1 Gent. Beleeve Sir, they ſhew bravely.

Ag. Why theſe Stockings?

2 Gent Your Legg appeares——

Ag. Peuh I would have had 'em peach collour,
All young, and new about me: and this Scarfe here
A goodly thing: you have trickt me like a Puppet.

1 Gent. Ile undertake to rig forth a whole Navie,
And with leſſe labour then one man in love,
They are never pleas'd.

2 Gent. Me thinks he lookes well.

1 Gent. Well.
As man can looke, as handſome: now do I wonder
He found not fault his Noſe was put on ugly,
Or his Eyes lookt too gray, and rayle at us,
They are the waywards things, theſe Lovers.

2 Gent. All will be right
When once it comes to th' puſh.

1 Gent. I would they were at it
For our owne quiet ſake.

Ag. Come, wait upon me,
And beare your ſelves like mine, my friends, and nobly. Ex.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Theanor, Crates, and Erates, bringing Merione.

Erat. This is her Brothers Doore.

Cra. There lay her downe then.
Lay her along: ſhe is faſt ſtill.

Ser. As forgetfulneſſe.

Cra. Be not you ſtirr'd now, but away to your Mother,
Give all attendance, let no ſtaine appeare
Of feare, or doubt in your face: carry your ſelfe confi. (dently.

The. But whither runs your drift now?

Cra. When ſhe wakes,
Either what's done will ſhew a meere dreame to her,
And carry no more credit: or ſay ſhe finde it,
Say ſhe remember all the circumſtances,
Twenty to one the ſhapes in which they were acted,
The horrours, and the ſtill affrights we ſhew'd her,
Riſing in wilder figures to her memory
Will run her mad, and no man gheſſe the reaſon:
If all theſe faile, and that ſhe riſe up perfect,
And ſo collect her ſelfe, beleeve this Sir,
Not knowing who it was that did this to her,
Nor having any power to gheſſe; the thing done too,
Being the utter undoing of her Honour
If it be knowne, and to the worlds eye publiſh'd, Eſpecially at this time when Fortune courts her,
She muſt and will conceale it; nay, forget it,
The woman is no Lucrece; get you gone Sir,
And as you would have more of this ſport, feare not.

The. I am confirm'd, farewell.

Cra. Farewell, away Sir:
Diſperſe your ſelves, and as you love his favour,
And that that crowns it, Gold, no tongues amongſt ye.
You know your charge, this way goes no ſuſpition. Exeu.

Enter Agenor and Leonides, with two Gent. with Lights.

Ag. You are ſtirring early Sir.

Leo. It was my duty
To wait upon your Grace.

Ag. How fares your Siſter,
My beauteous Miſtris, what is ſhe ready yet? (way

Leo. No doubt ſhe'l loſe no time Sir, yong Maids in her Tread upon thornes, and think an houre an age
Till the Prieſt has done his part, that theirs may follow:
I ſaw her not ſince yeſterday ith' evening:
But Sir, I am ſure ſhe is not ſlack; beleeve me,
Your grace will finde a loving ſoule.

Ag. A ſweet one,
And ſo much joy I carry in the thought of it,
So great a happineſſe to know ſhe is mine;
Beleeve me noble Brother, that to expreſſe it
Me thinkes a Tongue's a poore thing, can do nothing, Imagination leſſe: who's that that lies there?

Leo. Where Sir?

Ag. Before the doore, it lookes like a woman:

Leo. This way I came abroad, but then there was no-
One of the Maids o're-watch'd belike. (thing,

Ag. It may be.

Leo. But me thinks this is no fit place to ſleep in.

1 Gent. 'Tis ſure a woman Sir, ſhe has Jewels on too:
She feares no foule play ſure.

Leo. Bring a Torch hither,
Yet 'tis not perfect day: I ſhould know thoſe Garments

Ag. How ſound ſhe ſleepes?

Leo.

Leo. I am ſorry to ſee this.
Ag. Do you know her?
Leo. And you now I am ſure Sir.
Ag. My Miſtris, how comes this?
Enter Queen, Theanor, Belixa, Euphanes, Neambes, attendants.
Leo. The Queene and her traine?
Quee. You know my pleaſure.
Eup. And will be moſt carefull.
Quee. Be not long abſent, the ſuit you preferr'd
Is granted.
Nea. This fellow mounts apace, and will Towre o're us like a Falcon.
Quee. Good morrow to ye all, why ſtand ye wondring?
Enter the houſe Sir, and bring out your Miſtris,
You muſt obſerve our Ceremonies: what's the matter?
What's that ye ſtand at? How Merione?
Aſleep i'th ſtreet? belike ſome ſudden Palſie
As ſhe ſtept out laſt night upon devotion,
To tooke her farewell of her Virgin ſtate,
The Ayre being ſharp and piercing, ſtruck her ſuddenly:
See if ſhe breath.
Leo. A little.
Quee. Wake her then,
'Tis ſure a fit.
Ag. She wakes her ſelfe,
Give roome to her.
Quee. See how the ſpirits ſtruggle to recover,
And ſtrongly re-inforce their ſtrengths; for certaine
This was no naturall ſleep.
The. I am of your minde Madam.
Quee. No Sonne, it cannot be.
The. Pray Heaven no trick in't;
Good ſoule ſhe little merits ſuch a miſchiefe.
Quee. She is broad awake now, and her ſence clears up,
'Twas ſure a fit; ſtand off.
Mer. The Queene, my Love here,
And all my noble friends? Why where am I? (me,
How am I traunc'd, and moaped i'th ſtreet? Heaven bleſſe Shame to my Sex; o'th ground too? O, I remember——
Leo. How wilde ſhe lookes?
Ag. Oh my cold heart, how ſhe trembles?
Mer. O I remember, I remember.
Quee. What's that?
Mer. My ſhame, my ſhame, my ſhame: O I remember
My never-dying ſhame.
The. Here has been villainie.
Quee. I feare ſo to.
Mer. You are no Furies are ye?
No horrid ſhapes ſent to affright me?
Ag. No ſweet,
We are your friends: looke up, I am Agenor,
O my Merione, that loves you dearely:
And come to marry ye.
Leo. Siſter, what ayle ye?
Speake out your griefes, and boldly——
Ag. Something ſticks here
Will choake ye elſe.
Mer. I hope it will.
Quee. Be free Lady,
You have your loving friends about ye.
Ag. Deare Merione,
By the unſpotted love I ever bore ye,
By thine owne goodneſſe——
Mer. O 'tis gone, 'tis gone Sir,
I am now I know not what: pray ye look not on me,
No name is left me, nothing to inherit
But that deteſted, baſe, and branded——
Ag. Speake it,
And how; diſeaſes of moſt danger
Their cauſes once diſcover'd are eaſily cur'd:
My faire Merione.
Mer. I thanke your love Sir;
When I was faire Merione, unſpotted,
Pure, and unblaſted in the bud you honour'd,
White as the heart of truth, then Prince Agenor,
Even then I was not worthy of your favour;
Wretch that I am, leſſe worthy now of pitty:
Let no good thing come neare me, vertue fly me;
You that have honeſt noble names deſpiſe me,
For I am nothing now but a maine peſtilence
Able to poyſon all. Send thoſe unto me
That have forgot their names, ruin'd their fortunes,
Deſpis'd their honours; thoſe that have been Virgins
Raviſh'd and wrong'd, and yet dare live to tell it.
The. Now it appeares too plaine.
Mer. Send thoſe ſad people
That hate the light, and curſe ſociety;
Whoſe thoughts are Graves, and from whoſe eyes conti-
Their melting ſoules drop out, ſend thoſe to me; (nually
And when their ſorrowes are moſt excellent,
So full that one griefe more cannot be added,
My Story like a torrent ſhall devoure 'em.
Hark, it muſt out; but pray ſtand cloſe together,
And let not all the world heare.
Leo. Speake it boldly.
Mer. And Royall Lady, think but charitably,
Your Grace has known my breeding.
Quee. Prethee ſpeake it.
Mer. Is there no ſtranger here? ſend off your ſervants,
And yet it muſt be knowne: I ſhake.
Ag. Sweet Miſtris.
Mer. I am abus'd, baſely abus'd; do you gheſſe yet?
Come cloſe ile tell ye plainer; I am Whor'd,
Raviſh'd, and robb'd of Honour.
Leo. O the Divell.
Ag. What helliſh Slave was this?
The. A wretch, a wretch,
A damned wretch: do you know the Villaine Lady?
Mer. No.
The. Not by gheſſe?
Mer. O no.
The. It muſt be knowne.
Quee. Where was the place?
Mer. I know not neither.
Ag. O Heaven,
Is this the happy time? my hope to this come?
Leo. Neither the man, nor circumſtances?
The. His tongue,
Did you not heare his tongue, no voice?
Mer. None, none Sir:
All I know of him was his violence.
Ag. How came ye hither Sweet?
Mer. I know not neither.
The. A cunning piece of Villany.
Mer. All I remember
Is onely this: Going to Veſtas Temple
To give the Goddeſſe my laſt Virgin prayers,
Neere to that place I was ſuddenly ſurpris'd,
By five or ſixe diſguis'd, and from thence violently
To my diſhonour hal'd: that Act perform'd,
Brought back, but how, or whether, till I wak'd here.——
The. This is ſo monſtrous the gods cannot ſuffer it;
I have not read in all the villanies
Committed by the moſt obdurate Raſcalls,
An act ſo truly impious.

Leo. Would I knew him.
The. He muſt be known, the Devill cannot hide him.
Quee. If all the Art I have, or power can do it,
He ſhall be found, and ſuch a way of juſtice
Inflicted on him: A Lady wrong'd in my Court,
And this way rob'd, and ruin'd?
The. Be contented Madam,
If he be above ground I will have him.
Ag. Faire vertuous Maid, take comfort yet and flouriſh,
In my love flouriſh: the ſtaine was forc'd upon ye
None of your wills, nor yours; riſe, and riſe mine ſtill,
And riſe the ſame white, ſweet, faire ſoule, I lov'd ye,
Take me the ſame.
Mer. I kneele and thank ye Sir,
And I muſt ſay ye are truly honourable,
And dare confeſſe my will yet ſtill a Virgin;
But ſo unfit and weak a Cabinet
To keep your love and vertue in am I now,
That have been forc'd and broken, loſt my luſtre,
I meane this body, ſo corrupt a Volume
For you to ſtudy goodneſſe in, and honour,
I ſhall intreat your Grace, conferre that happineſſe
Upon a beauty ſorrow never ſaw yet:
And when this griefe ſhall kill me, as it muſt do,
Only remember yet ye had ſuch a Miſtris;
And if ye then dare ſhed a teare, yet honour me:
Good Gentlemen expreſſe your pitties to me,
In ſeeking out this villany; and my laſt ſuit
Is to your Grace, that I may have your favour
To live a poore recluſe Nun with this Lady,
From Court and Company, till Heaven ſhall heare me,
And ſend me comfort, or death end my miſery.
Que. Take your own will, my very heart bleeds for thee.
Ag. Farewell Merione, ſince I have not thee
Ile wed thy goodneſſe, and thy memory.
Leo. And I her faire revenge.
The. Away: let's follow it,
For he is ſo rank i'th wind we cannot miſſe him. Exeunt.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Crates and Conon.

Cra. Conon you are welcome home, yee are wondrous welcome,
Is this your firſt arrivall? (welcome,
Con. Sir, but now
I reacht the Towne.
Cra. Ye'ar once more welcome then.
Con. I thanke ye noble Sir.
Cra. Pray ye do me the honour
To make my poore houſe firſt——
Con. Pray Sir excuſe me,
I have not ſeene mine owne yet; nor made happy
Theſe longing eyes with thoſe I love there: what's this a Cra. It ſeemes ſo by the outſide. (Taverne?
Con. Step in here then,
And ſince it offers it ſelfe ſo freely to us,
A place made only for liberall entertainment,
Let's ſeeke no further but make uſe of this,
And after the Greek faſhion, to our friends
Crown a round cup or two.

Enter Vintner and drawer.

Cra. Your pleaſure Sir.
Drawers, who waits within?
Draw. Anon, anon Sir.
Vint. Look into the Lilly-pot: why Mark there;
You are welcome Gentlemen; heartily welcome
My noble friend.
Cra. Let's have good Wine mine Hoſt,
And a fine private roome.
Vint. Will ye be there Sir?
What is't you'l drink? ile draw your Wine my ſelf e:
Quiſſions ye knaves: why when?

Enter Drawer with Quiſſions.

Dra. Anon, anon Sir.
Vint. Chios, or Lebos, Greek?
Cra. Your beſt and neateſt.
Vint. Ile draw ye that ſhall dance.
Cra. Away, be quick then. Exit Vintner.
Con. How does your Brother Sir, my noble friend
The good Euphanes? in all my courſe of travell
I met not with a Gentleman ſo furniſh'd
In gentleneſſe and courteſie; beleeve Sir,
So many friendly Offices I receiv'd from him,
So great, and timely, and enjoy'd his company
In ſuch an open and a liberall ſweetneſſe,
That when I dare forget him——
Cra. He's in good health Sir,
But you will finde him a much alter'd man,
Growne a great Courtier Sir.
Con. He's worthy of it.
Cra. A man drawne up, that leaves no print behind him
Of what he was: thoſe goodneſſes you ſpeake of
That have been in him, thoſe that you call freedomes,
Societies, and ſweetneſſe, looke for now Sir,
You'le finde no ſhadowes of them left, no ſound,
The very Ayre he has liv'd in alter'd: now behold him,
And you ſhall ſee a thing walk by, looke big upon ye,
And cry for place; I am the Queenes, give roome there:
If you bow low, may be he'l touch the Bonnet,
Or fling a forced ſmile at ye for a favour.
Con. He is your brother Sir.
Cra. Theſe formes put off,
Which travell, and Court Holy-water ſprinkle on him,
I dare accept, and know him: you'l think it ſtrange Sir,
That even to me, to me his naturall Brother,
And one by birth he owes a little honour too——

Enter Vintner with Wine.

(But that's all one) come give me ſome Wine, mine Hoſt,
Here's to your faire returne.
Con. I wonder at it,
But ſure he has found a nature not worth owning
In this way; elſe I know he is tender carried.
I thank ye Sir: and now durſt I preſume
For all you tell me of theſe alterations,
And ſtops in his ſweet nature, which till I finde ſo,
I have known him now ſo long, & look'd ſo through him,
You muſt give me leave to be a little faithleſſe:
I ſay for all theſe, if you pleaſe to venter
Ile lay the Wine we drink, let me ſend for him
(Even I that am the pooreſt of his fellowſhip)
But by a Boy oth' houſe too, let him have buſineſſe,
Let him attend the Queene, nay let his Miſtris
Hold him betwixt her armes, he ſhall come to me,
And ſhall drink with me too; love me, and heartily,
Like a true honeſt man bid me welcome home.
I am confident.
Cra. You will loſe.
Con. You'l ſtand toth' wager?
Cra. With all my heart.
Con. Go Boy, and tell Euphanes.
Boy. He's now gone up the ſtreet Sir,
With a great traine of Gallants.
Cra. What think you now Sir?
Con. Go, and overtake him,
Commend my love unto him: my name is Conon,
Tell him I am new arriv'd, and where I am,
And would requeſt to ſee him preſently:
Ye ſee I uſe old dudgen phraſe to draw him.

Cra,

Cra. Ile hang and quarter when you draw him hether.
Con. Away Boy.
Boy. I am gone Sir. Exit.
Con. Here's to you now,
And you ſhall finde his travell has not ſtopt him
As you ſuppoſe, nor alter'd any freedome,
But made him far more cleare and excellent;
It drawes the groſneſſe off the underſtanding,
And renders active and induſtrious ſpirits:
He that knowes moſt mens manners, muſt of neceſſity
Beſt know his owne, and mend thoſe by example:
'Tis a dull thing to travell like a Mill-horſe,
Still in the place he was borne in, lam'd and blinded;
Living at home is like it: pure and ſtrong ſpirits
That like the Fire ſtill covet to fly upward,
And to give fire as well as take it; caſt'd up, and mewd here
I meane at home, like luſty metled Horſes,
Onely ty'd up in Stables, to pleaſe their Maſters,
Beat out their fiery lives in their owne Litters,
Why doe not you travell Sir?
Cra. I have no beliefe in't
I ſee ſo many ſtrange things, halfe unhatcht, to Returne, thoſe that went out men, and good men,
They looke like potch'd Eggs with the ſoules ſuckt out,
Empty and full of wind: all their affections
Are bak'd in Rye cruſt, to hold carriage
From this good Towne toth' other: and when they are They are ſo ill cooked and mouldy—— (open'd,
Con. Ye are pleaſant.
Cra. Ile ſhew ye a pack of theſe: I have 'em for ye,
That have been long in travell too.
Con. Pleaſe you Sir.
Cra. You know the Merchants walk, Boy?
2 Boy. Very well.
Cra. And you remember thoſe Gentlemen were here
The other day with me?
2 Boy. Yes.
Cra. Then go thither,
For there I am ſure they are, pray 'em come hither,
(And uſe my name) I would be glad to ſee 'em.

Enter 1 Boy.

1 Boy. Your Brother's comming in Sir.
Vint. Odds my paſſion,
Out with the Plate ye knaves: bring the new Quiſhions,
And waſh thoſe Glaſſes I ſet by for high dayes,
Perfume the roomes along, why Sirrah.
1 Boy. Here Sir.
Vint. Bid my Wife make her ſelfe ready handſomely,
And put on her beſt Apron: it may be
The noble Gentleman will looke upon her.

Enter Euphanes and two Gentlemen.

Euph. Where is he Boy?
Vint. Your worſhip's heartily welcome,
It joyes my very heart to ſee ye here Sir.
The Gentleman that ſent for your Honour——
Euph. O good mine Hoſt.
Vint. To my poor homely houſe, and't like your honor.
Euph. I thank thine honour good mine Hoſt, where is he?
Con. What think ye now? my beſt Euphanes.
Euph. Conon, welcome my friend, my noble friend how Are you in ſafety come, in health? (is it?
Con. All health, all ſafety,
Riches, and all that makes content and happineſſe
Now I am here I have: how have you far'd Sir?
Euph. Well, I thank Heaven, and never nearer friend
To catch at great occaſion.
Con. Indeed I joy in't.
Euph. Nor am I for my ſelfe borne in theſe fortunes,
In truth I love my friends.
Con. You were noble ever.
Cra. I thought you had not knowne me.
Euph. Yes, ye are my Brother,
My elder Brother too, would your affections
Were able but to aske that love I owe to ye,
And as I give, preſerve it: here friend Conon,
To your faire welcome home.
Con. Deare Sir, I thank ye,
Fill it toth' brim, Boy: Crates.
Cra. Ile pledge you,
But for that glorious Comet lately fired.
Con. Fie, fie Sir, fie.
Euph. Nay, let him take his freedomes,
He ſtirs not me I vow to ye, much leſſe ſtaines me.
Cra. Sir, I cannot talke with that neat travelling tongue.
Con. As I live, he has the worſt beleefe in men abroad.

Enter the 2. Boy.

I am glad I am come home.
2 Boy. Here are the Gentlemen.
Cra. O let 'em enter: now you that truſt in travell,
And make ſharp Beards, and little Breeches Deities,
You that inhaunce the daily price of Tooth-picks,
And hold there is no homebred hapineſſe,
Behold a modell of your minds and actions.
Euph. Though this be envious, yet done ith' way of
I am content to thank ye for't. (mirth,
Con. 'Tis well yet.
Cra. Let the Maske enter.

Enter Onos, his Unckle and Tutor.

Onos. A pretty Taverne 'faith, of a fine ſtructure.
Vnc. Beare your ſelfe like a Gentleman, here's ſix pence,
And be ſure you breake no Glaſſes.
Tut. Harke ye Pupill,
Go as I taught you, hang more upon your hams,
And put your knees out bent: there, yet a little:
Now I beſeech ye, be not ſo improvident
To forget your travelling pace, 'tis a maine poſture,
And to all unayr'd Gentlemen will betray you:
Play with your Piſa Beard: why, where's your bruſh Pupil?
He muſt have a Bruſh Sir.
Vnc. More charge yet?
Tut. Here, take mine,
Theſe elements of travell he muſt not want Sir.
Vnc. Ma' foy, he has had ſome nineteene pence in ele-
What would you more? (ments,
Tut. Durus me bercle pater.
Con. What Mounſieur Onos, the very pump of travell,
Sir, as I live you have done me the greateſt kindneſſe,
O my faire Sir, Lampree, the carefull Unckle
To this young hopefull iſſue; Mounſieur Tutor too,
The father to his minde; Come, come, let's hug Boyes,
Why what a bunch of travell doe I embrace now,
Me thinkes I put a Girdle about Europe;
How has the Boy profited?
Vnc. He has enough Sir,
If his too fiery mettle doe not mar it.
Con. Is he not thrifty yet?
Tut. That's all his fault,
Too bounteous minded being under age too,
A great conſumer of his ſtock in Pippins,
Had ever a hot ſtomack.
Con. Come hither Onos,
Will you love me for this fine Apple?
Onos. We.
Con. And will ye be rul'd by me ſometimes?
Onos. 'Faith I will.
Con. That's a good Boy:

Unc. Pray give not the childe ſo much fruit,
He's of a raw Complexion.
Euph. You Mounſieur hard egge,
Do you remember me? Doe you remember
When you and your Conſort travell'd through Hungary?
Con. He's in that circuit ſtill.
Euph. Do you remember
The cantell of immortall Cheeſe ye carried with ye,
The halfe cold Cabbedge, in a leather Sachell,
And thoſe invincible Eggs that would lye in your bowells
A fortnight together, and then turne to bedſtaves;
Your ſowre milk that would choak an Iriſh man,
And bread was bak'd in Ceſars time for the Army?
Con. Providence, providence.
Tut. The ſoule of travell.
Euph. Can the Boy ſpeak yet?
Tut. Yes, and as fine a Gentleman,
I thanke my able knowledge, he has arriv'd at,
Only a little ſparing of his Language,
Which every man of obſervation ——
Vne. And of as many tongues.
Tut. Pray be content Sir,
You know you are for the bodily part, the Purſe,
I for the magazine, the minde.
Euph. Come hither ſpringall.
Vn. That in the Almain Tongue ſignifies a Gentleman.
Euph. What think you of the formes of Italy or Spain?
Onos. I love mine owne Country Pippin.
Tut. Nobly anſwer'd,
Borne for his Country firſt.
Euph. A great Philoſopher:
What Horſes do you prefer?
Onos. The White horſe Sir,
There where I lye; honeſt and a juſt beaſt,
Tut. O Caput lepidum: a Childe to ſay this,
Are theſe figures for the mouthes of Infants?
Con. Onos, what wenches?
Come, tell me true.
On. I cannot ſpeake without booke.
Con. When ſhall we have one, ha?
On. Steale me from mine Unckle,
For looke you, I am broke out horribly
For want of fleſhly Phiſick: they ſay I am too yong,
And that 'twill ſpoyle my growth but could you help me?
Con. Meet me to morrow man, no more.
Euph. You thinke now
Ye have open'd ſuch a ſhame to me of travell,
By ſhewing theſe thin Cubbs: ye have honour'd us
Againſt your will, proclam'd us excellent:
Three Frailes of Sprats carried from Mart, to Mart,
Are as much meat as theſe, to more uſe travell'd;
A bunch of bloted fooles: me thinkes your judgement
Should looke abroad ſometimes without your envie.
Cra. Such are moſt of you: ſo I take my leave,
And when you finde your womens favour faile,
'Tis ten to one you'l know your ſelfe, and ſeeke me
Upon a better Muſter of your manners.
Con. This is not handſome Sir.
Euph. Pray take your pleaſure,
You wound the wind as much ——
Cra. Come you with me,
I have buſineſſe for you preſently: there's for your Wine,
I muſt confeſſe I loſt it.
On. Shall I ſteale to ye
And ſhall we ſee the Wench?
Con. A dainty one.
On. And have a diſh of Pippins?
Con. What a peck man.
Tut. Will you wait Sir.
Con. Pray let's meet oftner Gentlemen,
I would not loſe ye.
Tut. O ſweet Sir.
Con. Do you thinke I would,
Such noted men as you?
Onos, Unc. Tut. We are your Servants. Exeunt.
Euph. That thing they would keep in everlaſting nonage,
My Brother for his owne ends has thruſt on Upon my Miſtris, 'tis true, he ſhall be rich
If ever he can get that Rogue his Unckle
To let him be of yeares to come to inherit it,
Now what the maine drift is ——
Con. Say ye ſo? no more words,
Ile keepe him company till he be of yeares,
Though it be a hundred yeares, but Ile diſcover it;
And ten to one Ile croſſe it too.
Euph. You are honeſt,
And I ſhall ſtudy ſtill your love: farewell Sir,
For theſe few houres I muſt deſire your pardon,
I have buſineſſe of importance: once a day
At leaſt I hope you'l ſee me: I muſt ſee you elſe:
So, once more ye are welcome.
Con. All my thankes Sir,
And when I leave to love you, life go from me. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Theanor and Crates.

Cra. WHy Sir, the Kingdomes his, and no man now
Can come to Corinth, or from Corinth goe
Without his Licence; he puts up the tithes
Of every Office through Achaia;
From Courtier to the Carter hold of him:
Our Lands, our Liberties, nay very lives
Are ſhut up in his Cloſet, and let looſe
But at his pleaſure; Bookes, and all diſcourſe
Have now no Patron, nor direction,
But gloriſi'd Euphanes: our Cups are guilty
That quench our thirſts, if not unto his health:
Oh, I could eat my heart, and fling away
My very ſoule for anguiſh: gods, nor men
Should tollerate ſuch diſproportion.
The. And yet is he belov'd: whether't be vertue,
Or ſeeming vertue which he makes the cloake
To his ambition.
Cra. Be it which it will:
Your Highneſſe is to tame, your eyes too film'd
To ſee this, and ſit ſtill: the Lion ſhould not Tremble to heare the bellowing of the Bull;
Nature excuſe me, though he be my Brother,
You are my Countries Father, therefore mine:
One paralell line of Love I bend on him,
All lines of love and duty meet in you
As in their Center: therefore heare, and weigh
What I ſhall ſpeake: You know the Queen your Mother
Did from a private ſtate your Father raiſe,
So all your Royalty you hold from her;
She is older then ſhe was, therefore more doating,
And what know we but blindneſſe of her love

(That

(That hath from underneath the foot of fortune Set, even Euphanes foot, on fortunes head)
Will take him by the hand, and cry, Leap now
Into my bed; 'tis but a trick of age;
Nothing impoſſible.
The. What do you infer on this?
Cra. Your pardon Sir:
With reverence to the Queen; yet why ſhould I
Feare to ſpeak plaine what pointeth to your good?
A good old Widow is a hungry thing,
(I ſpeak of other Widows, not of Queens.)
The. Speak to thy purpoſe.
Cra. I approach it: Sir,
Should young Euphanes claſpe the Kingdome thus,
And pleaſe the good old Lady ſome one night;
What might not ſhe be wrought to put on you,
Quite to ſupplant your birth? neither is ſhe
Paſt children, as I take it.
The. Crates, Thou ſhak'ſt me;
Thou, that doſt hate thy Brother for my love,
In my love finde one; henceforth be my brother:
This Gyant I will fell beneath the earth;
I will ſhine out, and melt his artfull wings:
Euphanes, from my mothers ſea of favours
Spreads like a River, and runs calmly on,
Secure yet from my ſtormes; like a young pine
He growes up planted under a faire Oake,
Whoſe ſtrong large branches yet do's ſhelter him,
And every Traveller admires his beauty;
But like a winde, ile work into his crancks,
Trouble his ſtreame, and drowne all Veſſells that Ride on his Greatneſſe: under my mothers armes,
Like to a ſtealing tempeſt will I ſearch,
And rend his root from her protection.
Cra. I, now Theanor ſpeaks like Prince Theanor.
The. But how ſhall we provoke him to our ſnares?
He has a temper malice cannot move
To exceed the bounds of judgement; he is ſo wiſe,
That we can pick no cauſe to affront him.
Cra. No?
What better then his croſſing your intent?
The ſuit I had to ye? Conons forfeit ſtate (Before he travel'd) for a Riot, he Hath from your Mother got reſtor'd to him:
The. Durſt he? What is this Conon?
Cra. One that hath,
As people ſay, in forraigne pleaſur'd him.

Enter Onos, Uncle, Tutor, Neantoes, Soſicles, Eraton.

But now no more;
They have brought the Travellors I told you of,
That's the ſweet youth, that is my Brothers Rivall,
That curles his head, for he has little haire,
And paints his vizor, for it is no face,
That ſo deſires to follow you, my Lord:
Show 'em ſome countenance, and it will beget
Our ſport at leaſt.
The. What villanous Crab-tree legs he makes?
His ſhins are full of true-love knots.
Cra. His leggs were ever villanous, ſince I knew him.
Era. Faith his Uncles ſhanks are ſomewhat the better.
Nea. But is't poſſible he ſhould believe he is not of age?
He is 50. man, in's Jubile I warrant: s'light, he (why Looks older then a groat, the very ſtamp on's face is Worne out with handling. (him ſpeake,
Soſ. Why I tell you all men believe it when they heare
He utters ſuch ſingle matter in ſo infantly a voice.
Nea. He looks as like a fellow that I have ſeen accommodate Gentlemen with Tobacco in our Theaters.
Onos. Moſt illuſtrious Prince.
Era. A pox on him, he is gueſt, how he trebles?
Onos. I am a Gentleman a both ſides.
Tut. He meanes (ſo't pleaſe your highneſſe) both by Fa- (ther & Mother.
Soſ. Thou a Gentleman? thou an Aſſe.
Nea. He is nere the farther from being a Gent. I aſſure you.
Tut. May it pleaſe your Grace, I am another.
Nea. He is another Aſſe he ſaies, I believe him.
Uncle. We be three, Heroicall Prince.
Nea. Nay then we muſt have the Picture of 'em, and the Word Nos ſumus.
Tut. That have travail'd all parts of the Globe together.
Unc. For my part, I have ſeen the viciſſitude of fortune before.
Onos. Peace Uncle, for though you ſpeak a little better (then I—
Nea. 'Tis a very little, in truth.
Onos. Yet we muſt both give place, as they ſay, to the beſt (Speaker
The Tutor.
Tut. Yet ſince it hath pleas'd your radience to decline ſo (low, as on us,
Poore and unworthy dunghils.—
Nea. What a ſtinking knaves this?
Tut. Our Perigrination was nere ſo felicitated, as ſince we ente'r'd the line of your gracious favour, under whoſe beamy aſpect, and by which infallible Mathematicall compaſſe, may we but hereafter preſume to ſaile, our induſtries have reach't their deſir'd termination and period; and we ſhall voluntarily ſacrifice our lives to your reſplendent eyes, both the Altars and fires of our devoted offrings.
Onos. Oh divine Tutor!
Cra. Can you hold Sir? (in Corinth.
Era. He ha's ſpoken this very ſpeech to ſome Whore
Nea. A plague on him for a fuſtian Dictionary; on my conſcience this is the Ulyſſean Travellor that ſent home his Image riding upon Elephants to the great Magoll.
Soſ. The ſame: his wit is ſo huge, nought but an Elephant could carry him.
Era. So heavy you meane.
Nea. Theſe three, are ev'n the fineſt one foole tripartite, that was ere diſcovered.
Soſ. Or a Treatiſe of famine divided into three branches.
Era. The Prince ſpeakes.
The. I thank ye for your loves; but as I told you,
I have ſo little meanes, to do for thoſe
Few followers I have already, that I would have none ſhiprack themſelves, and fortune,
Upon my barren ſhelf: Sue to Euphanes.
For he is Prince, and Queen, I would have no man
Curſe me in his old age.
Cra. Alas Sir, they deſire to follow you
But a farre off, the farther off the better.
Tut. I Sir, and't be ſeven mile off, ſo we may but follow you, onely to countenance us in the confronts and affronts, which (according to your Highneſſe will) we meane on all occaſions to put upon the Lord Euphanes.
Onos. He ſhall not want gibing nor jeering, I warrant him; if he do, i'le forſweare wit.
Nea. It has forſworne thee, 'ile ſweare, it is the ancient enemy to thy houſe.
The. Well, be it ſo; I here receive ye, for my followers a great way off.
Nea. Seven miles, my Lord, no further.
Onos. By what time, Sir, (by this meaſure) may I come to follow him in his Chamber?
Nea. Why when his Chamber, Sir, is ſeven miles long.

Enter Euphanes, Conon, Page, Gent. Attendants.

Gent. Make way there, for my Lord Euphanes.

Cro. Looke Sir, Jove appeares,
The Peacock of our State, that ſpreads a traine
Brighter then Iris bluſhes after raine.
Euph. You need not thank me Conon, in your love
You Antidated what I can do for you,
And I in gratitude was bound to this,
And am to much more: and what ere he be
Can with unthankfulneſſe aſſoile me, let him
Dig out mine eyes, and ſing my name in verſe,
In Ballad verſe at every drinking-houſe,
And no man be ſo charitable to lend me
A Dogg to guide my ſteps.
Nea. Haile to Euphanes.
Soſ. Mighty Euphanes.
Era. The great Prince Euphanes.
Tut. Key of the Court, and Jewell of the Queene.
Unc. Sol in our Firmament.
Onos. Pearl in the States eye.
Nea. Being a black man.
Era. Miſtris of the Land.
Nea. Our humble, humble poore Petitions are,
That we may hold our places.
All. May we?
Euph. Yes; be you malicious knaves ſtill: and you fooles.
Con. This is the Princes, and your Brothers ſpight.
Euph. I know't, but will not know't it.
Con. Yonder they are,
Who's fine childe's this?
Unc. Sir,
Onos. Unckle, le' be,
Let him alone, he is a mighty Prince.
Euph. I aske your Highneſſe pardon: I proteſt
By Jupiter I ſaw you not.
The. Humh, it may be ſo,
You have rais'd ſuch mountaines 'twixt your eyes and me,
That I am hidden quite: what do ye meane Sir?
You much forget your ſelfe.
Euph. I ſhould much more,
Not to remember my due duty to your Grace;
I know not wherein I have ſo tranſgreſſ'd
My ſervice to your Highneſſe, to deſerve
This rigour and contempt, not from you only
But from your followers, with the beſt of whom
I was an equall in my loweſt ebbe:
Beſeech you Sir, reſpect me as a Gentleman,
I will be never more in heart to you:
Five faire Diſcents I can derive my ſelfe,
From Fathers worthy both in Arts and Armes.
I know your goodneſſe companies your greatneſſe
But that you are perverted: Royall Sir,
I am your humbleſt ſubject, uſe your pleaſure,
But do not give protection to the wrongs
Of theſe ſubordinate Slaves, whom I could cruſh
By that great deſtin'd favour, which my Miſtris
And your majeſtick Mother deignes to me,
But in reſpect of you: I know leane envie
Waites ever on the ſteps of vertue advanc'd:
But why your Mothers grace gets me diſgrace,
Or renders me a ſlave to beare theſe wrongs
I do not know.
Oh Mediocrity,
Thou prizeleſſe jewell, only meane men have
But cannot value; like the precious Jem,
Found in the Mukhill by the ignorant Cock.
The. Your creamy words but cozen: how durſt you Intercept me ſo lately to my Mother?
And what I meant your Brother, you obtain'd
Unto the forfeiture againe.
Cra. Your anſwer to that my Lord, my Brother.
Euph. May I periſh
If ere I heard you intended ſuch a Suit,
Though 'twould have ſtuck an ignominious brand
Vpon your Highneſſe, to have given your ſervant
A Gentlemans whole ſtate of worth and quality,
Confiſcate only for a youthfull brawle.
The. Your rudiments are too ſawcy: teach your Page.
Con. I, ſo are all things but your flatterers.
Onos. Hold you your prating.
Con. You know where you are, you fleeten face.
Euph. Yet Sir to appeaſe and ſatisfie your anger,
Take what you pleaſe from me, and give it him
In lieu of this: you ſhall not take it neither,
I freely will impart it, halfe my ſtate,
Which Brother if you pleaſe——
Cra. Ile ſtarve in Chaines firſt,
Eat my owne armes.
Euph. Oh that you ſaw your ſelfe:
You ne're made me ſuch offer in my pooreneſſe,
And 'cauſe (to do you eaſe) I ſought not to you
You thus maligne me; yet your nature muſt not Corrupt mine, nor your rude examples lead me:
If mine can mend you, I ſhall joy; you know
I feare you not: you have ſeene me prov'd a man
In every way of fortune, 'tis my comfort
I know no more ſuch Brothers in the world
As Crates is.
Con. Nor I ſuch as Euphanes:
The temper of an Angell raignes in thee.
Euph. Your Royall Mother Sir, (I had forgot)
Entreates your preſence.
The. You have done her errand,
I may do yours. Exit.
Euph. Let it be truth my Lord.
Con. Crates, ile queſtion you for this.
Cra. Piſh, your worſt. Exit.
Con. Away you hounds after your ſent.
Onos. Coue, we'l ſcorn to talk to 'm: now they are gone, We'l away too. Exeunt.
Con. Why beare you this my Lord?
Euph. To ſhew the paſſive fortitude the beſt;
Vertues a ſolid Rock, whereat being aym'd
The keeneſt darts of envie, yet unhurt
Her Marble Heroes ſtand, built of ſuch Baſes, Whilſt they recoyle, and wound the Shooters faces.
Enter Queene and Ladies.
Con. My Lord, the Queene.
Quee. Gentle Euphanes, how,
How do'ſt thou honeſt Lord? oh how I joy
To ſee what I have made, like a choyce Workman,
That having fram'd a Maſter-peece, doth reape
An univerſall comendations.
Princes are Gods in this. Ile build thee yet,
(The good foundation ſo pleaſes me)
A ſtory or two higher; let Doggs barke,
They are fooles that hold them digniſi'd by blood,
They ſhould be only made great that are good.
Euph. Oraculous Madam.
Quee. Sirrah, I was thinking
If I ſhould marry thee, what merry tales
Our neighbour Iſlands would make of us;
But let that paſſe, you have a Miſtris
That would forbid our Banes: troth I have wiſh'd
A thouſand times that I had been a man,
Then I might ſit a day with thee alone,
And talke,
But as I am I muſt not; there's no skill

In

In being good, but in not being thought ill.
Sirrah, who's that?
Euph. So't pleaſe your Majeſty Conon, the friend I ſu'd for.
Quee. 'Tis diſpatch'd.
Con. Gracious Madam,
I owe the gods and you my life.
Quee. I thanke you,
I thank you heartily; and I do think you
A very honeſt man, he ſayes you are:
But now ile chide thee; what's the cauſe my Son,
For my eye's every where, and I have heard,
So inſolently do's thee Contumelies
Paſt ſufferance (I am told) yet you complaine not,
As if my juſtice were ſo partiall
As not to right the meaneſt: credit me,
Ile call him to a ſtrict accompt, and fright
By his example, all that dare curb me
In any thing that's juſt: I ſent you for him.
Euph. Humbly he did returne, he would wait on you:
But let me implore your Majeſty, not to give
His Highneſſe any check, for worthleſſe me;
They are Court canckers, and not Counſellors
That thus informe you: they do but hate the Prince,
And would ſubvert me: I ſhould curſe my fortune
Even at the higheſt, to be made the ginne
To unſcrew a Mothers love unto her Son:
Better had my pale flame in humble ſhades
Been ſpent unſeene, then to be rais'd thus high,
Now to be thought a meteor to the State,
Portending ruine and contagion:
Beſeech you then reſt ſatisfi'd, the Prince
Is a moſt noble natur'd Gentleman,
And never did to me but what I tooke
As favours from him, my blown billowes muſt not Strive 'gainſt my ſhore, that ſhould confine me; nor Juſtle with Rocks to break themſelves to peeces.
Quee. Well, thou'rt the compoſition of a god:
My Lion, Lamb, my Eaglet, and my Dove,
Whoſe ſoule runs clearer then Dianas Fount,
Nature pick'd ſeverall flowers from her choyce banks
And bound 'em up in thee, ſending thee forth
A Poſie for the boſome of a Queene.
Lady. The Prince attends you.
Quee. Farewell my good Lord,
My honeſt man; Stay, haſt no other ſuit?
I prethee tell me; Sirrah, thine eye ſpeakes
As if thou hadſt: out with it modeſt foole.
Euph. With favour Madam, I would crave your leave
To Marry, where I am bound in gratitude,
The immediat meanes ſhe was to all my being:
Nor do I think your wiſedome ſacred Queen
Fetters in favours, taking from me ſo
The liberty that meaneſt men enjoy.
Quee. To marry? you are a foole: thou'ſt anger'd me:
Leave me, ile think on't: Exit Euph. and Conon.
Only to try thee this, for though I love thee,

Enter Theanor.

I can ſubdue my ſelfe: but ſhe that can
Enjoy thee, doth enjoy more then a man.
Nay riſe without a bleſſing, or kneele ſtill:
What's Sir the reaſon you oppoſe me thus,
And ſeeke to darken what I would have ſhine?
Ecclipſe a fire much brighter then thy ſelfe,
Making your Mother not a competent Judge
Of her owne actions?
The. Gracious Madam, I
I have done no more then what in royalty
(And to preſerve your fame) was fit to do:
Heard you the peoples talke of you, and him
You favour ſo, his greatneſſe, and your love,
The pitty given to me, you would excuſe me;
They prate as if he did diſhonour you:
And what know I, but his owne laviſh tongue
Has utter'd ſome ſuch ſpeeches; he is call'd
The King of Corinth.
Quee. They are traitors all:
I weare a Chriſtall caſement 'fore my heart,
Through which each honeſt eye may looke in to't:
Let it be proſpect unto all the world,
I care not this.
The. This muſt not be my way;
Your pardon gracious Madam: theſe inclements
Made me not ſhew ſo cleare a countenance
Upon the Lord Euphanes as I would:
Which ſince your Majeſty affects ſo grievouſly
Ile cleare the black cloud of it, and henceforth Vow on this knee all love and grace to him.
Quee. Riſe with my bleſſing, and to prove this true,
Beare him from me this Cabinet of Jewells
In your owne perſon, tell him, for his marrying
He may diſpoſe him how, and when he pleaſe. Exit Quee.
The. I ſhall diſcharge my duty and your will.
Crates?

Enter Crates.

Cra. I have heard all my Lord, how luckely
Fate pops her very ſpindle in our hands:
This marriage with Beliza you ſhall croſſe,
Then have I one attempt for Lampriaſ more
Upon this Phaeton: where's Merione's Ring;
That in the Rape you tooke from her?
The. 'Tis here.
Cra. In and effect our purpoſe: you my Lord
Shall diſobey your Mothers charge, and ſend
This Cabinet by ſome ſervant of her owne,
That what ſucceeds may have no reference
Unto your Highneſſe.
The. On, my engine on.
Cra. Now, if we be not ſtruck by Heavens owne hand,
We'l ruine him, and on his ruines ſtand. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Agenor, Leonidas, Merione, Beliza.

A ſad Song.

Ag. Theſe heavie Ayres feed ſorrow in her Lady,
And nouriſh it too ſtrongly; like a Mother
That ſpoiles her Childe with giving on't the will.
Bel. Some lighter note. A lighter Song.
Leo. How like a hill of Snow ſhe ſits, and melts
Before the unchaſt fire of others luſt?
What heart can ſee her paſſion and not break?
Ag. Take comfort gentle Madam; you know well
Even actuall ſins committed without will,
Are neither ſins nor ſhame, much more compell'd;
Your Honour's no whit leſſe, your Chaſtity
No whit impair'd, for faire Merione
Is more a Virgin yet then all her Sex:
Alas, 'tis done; why burne theſe Tapers now?
Wicked and frantick Creatures joy in night.
Leo. Imagine faire Merione had dream'd
She had been raviſh'd, would ſhe ſi: thus then Excruciate?
Mer. Oh.
Bel. Fye, fye, how fond is this?
What reaſon for this ſurfet of remorſe?
How many that have done ill, and proceed,
Women that take degrees in wantonneſſe,

Commence,

Commence, and riſe in rudiments of Luſt,
That feele no ſcruple of this tenderneſſe?
Mer. Piſh.
Bel. Nor are you matches in miſhap, even I
Doe beare an equall part of miſery;
That love, belov'd, a man, the Crowne of men,
Whom I have friended, and how rais'd 'tis better
That all doe know and ſpeak it then my ſelfe:
When he ſail'd low I might have made him mine,
Now at his full gale, it is queſtionable
If ever I o're-take him.
Ag. Wherefore ſits
My Phebe ſhadowed in a ſable cloud?
Thoſe pearly drops which thou lets't fall like beades,
Numbring on them thy veſtall Oriſons
Alas are ſpent in vaine: I love thee ſtill,
In mid'ſt of all theſe ſhowres thou ſweetlier ſent'ſt,
Like a green Meadow on an April day,
In which the Sun and Weſt-wind play together,
Striving to catch and drink the balmy drops.

Enter Euphanes and Servant.

Ser. The Lord Euphanes Madam. Exit Mer.
Ag. Poore Merione,
She loathes the light, and men. Exit.
Euph. The vertuous gods preſerve my Miſtris.
Bel. O my moſt honour'd Lord, thoſe times are chang'd.
Euph. Let times and men change, could Heaven change, Should never change, to be devoted ever (Euphanes
To faire Beliza, ſhould my load of honours,
Or any Grace which you were Author of Detract mine honour, and diminiſh Grace?
The gods forbid: you here behold your Servant,
Your Creature, gentle Lady, whoſe ſound ſleepes
You purchas'd for him: whoſe food you paid for,
Whoſe garments were your charge, whoſe firſt preferment
You founded: then, what ſince the gracious Queene
Hath, or can reare, is upon your free Land,
And you are Miſtris of.
Bel. Mock me not gentle Lord,
You ſhine now in too high a ſpheare for me,
We are Plannets now disjoyn'd for ever: yet
Poore ſuperſtitious innocent that I am,
Give leave that I may lift my hands, and love
Not in Idolatry, but perfect zeale:
For credit me, I repent nothing I have done,
But were it to begin would do the ſame.
Euph. There are two Seas in Corinth, and two Queens,
And but there, not two ſuch in the ſpacious Univerſe;
I came to tender you the man you have made,
And like a thankfull ſtreame to retribute
All you my Ocean have enrich'd me with.
You told me once you'ld marry me.
Bel. Another mock? you were wont to play faire play,
You ſcorne poore helps; he that is ſure to win,
May ſlight mean harts, whoſe hand commands the Queen
Euph. Let me be held the Knave through all the Stock
When I doe ſlight my Miſtris; you know well
The gracious inclination of the Queene,
Who ſent me leave this morning to proceed
To marry, as I ſaw convenience,
And a great gift of Jewels: Three daies hence
The generall ſacrifice is done to Veſta,
And can you by then be accommodated
Your ſervant ſhall wait on you to the Temple.
Bel. Till now
I never felt a reall joy indeed.
Euph. Here then I ſeale my duty, here my love,
Till which vouchſafe to weare this Ring, deare Miſtris;
Twas the Queens Token, and ſhall celebrate
Our Nuptialls.
Bel. Honour ſtill raiſe, and preſerve
My honour'd Lord, as he preſerves all honour. Exit Euph.

Enter Agenor, Leonidas, Merione.

Ag. Why ſhift you places thus Merione,
And will not lend a word? Could'ſt thou ſo ſoone
Leave ſorrow as the place, how bleſt were I,
But 'twill not be; griefe is an impudent gueſt,
A follower every where, a hanger on,
That words nor blowes can drive away.
Leo. Deare Siſter.
Bel. Who can be ſad? out with theſe Tragick Lights,
And let day repoſſeſſe her naturall howres:
Teare downe theſe blacks, caſt ope' the Caſements wide,
That we may jocondly behold the Sun.
I did partake with ſad Merione
In all her mourning: let her now rejoyce
With glad Beliza, for Euphanes is
As full of love, full of humility
As when he wanted.
Mer. Oh —— that.
Leo. Help, ſhe faints:
Her griefe has broke her heart.
Mer. No —— that - —— that.
Ag. Miſtris, what point you at?
Her lamps are our, yet ſtill ſhe extends her hand
As if ſhe ſaw ſomething antipathous
Unto her vertuous life.
Leo. Still, ſtill ſhe points,
And her lips move, but no articulate ſound
Breathes from 'em: Siſter, ſpeak, what moves you thus?
Bel. Her ſpirits returne.
Mer. Oh, hide that fatall Ring,
Where had it you Beliza?
Bel. What hid fate
Depends on it? Euphanes gave it me
As holy pledge of future Marriage.
Mer. Then is Euphanes the foule Raviſher?
Let me ſpeake this and dye. That diſmall night
Which ſeal'd my ſhame upon me, was that Ring,
The partner of my rob'd virginity.
Leo. Euphanes?
Ag. Strange.
Bel. Impoſſible.
Mer. Impoſſible to have redreſſe on him,
Chiefe ſervant to the Queene--- ha! I have read Somewhere I am ſure, of ſuch an injury
Done to a Lady: and how ſhe durſt dye. Exit.
Ag. Oh follow her Beliza
Bel. To aſſure her,
The unlikelihood of this
Ag. Love hides all ſins. Exit.
What's to be done Leonidas?
Leo. Why this:
Amazement takes up all my faculties;
The plagues of gods and men will muſter all
To avenge this tyranny. Oh frontleſſe man,
To dare doe ill, and hope to beare it thus:
Firſt let's Implore, then cure.
Ag. Who, who can truſt
The gentle lookes and words of two-fac'd man?
Like Corinths double torrent, you and I
Will ruſh upon the Land; nor ſhall the Queene
Defend this Villaine in his villany:
Luſts violent flames can never be withſtood
Nor quench'd, but with as violent ſtreames of blood.
Exeunt.

Actus

Actus Quartus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Crates, Vncle, Tutor, and Ones.

Ons. THinkes he to carry her and live?
Cra. It seemes so,
And she will carry him the story sayes.
On. Well, hum——
Have I for this thou faire but falsest faire
Stretch'd this same simple legge over the Sea?
What though my bashfulnesse, and tender yeares,
Durst ne're reveale my affection to thy teeth?
Deep love ne're tatles, and (say they) loves bit
The deeper dip'd, the sweeter still is it.
Tut. Oh, see the power of Love: he speakes in ryme.
Cra. Oh, love will make a Dog howle in rime:
Of all the Lovers yet I have heard or read
This is the strangest: but his Guardian,
And you his Tutor should informe him better,
Thinkes he, that Love is answer'd by instinct?
Tut. He should make meanes,
For certaine Sir his bashfulnesse undo's him,
For from his Cradle h'had a shamefull face.
Thus walkes he night and day, eates not a bit,
Nor sleepes one jot, but's growne so humorous;
Drinkes Ale, and takes Tobacco as you see;
Weare's a Steeleto at his Codpeece close,
Stabs on the least occasion: stroakes his beard,
Which now he puts i'th posture of a T.
The Roman T. your T. beard is the fashion,
And twifold doth expresse the enamour'd Courtier,
As full as your fork-carving Travellour.
On. Oh, black clouds of discontent invellop me,
Garters fly off: go Hatband, binde the browes
Of some dull Citizen that feares to ake:
And Leg appeare now in simplicity
Without the trappings of a Courtier:
Burst Buttons, burst, your Bachelor is worm'd.
Cra. A worm-eaten Batchelor th'art indeed.
On. And Devill melancholly possesses me now.
Vnc. Crosse him not in this fit I advise you Sir.
On. Dye crimson Rose, that didst adorne these cheeks,
For ytch of love is now broke forth on me. (scabby.
Vnc. Poore Boy, 'tis true: his wrists and hands are
On. Burne eyes out in your sockets, sinck and stink:
Teeth I will pick ye to the very bones,
Hang haire like Hemp, or like the Ising Curs,
For never Powder, nor the Crisping-Iron
Shall touch these dangling locks——oh——Ruby lips,
Love hath to you been like Wine-vinegar,
Now you look wan and pale, lips, ghosts ye are,
And my disgrace sharper than Mustard-seed.
Cra. How like a Chaundler he do's vent his passions,
Risum teneatis?
On. Well sung the Poet,
Love is a golden bubo, full of Dreames:
That ripen'd breakes, and fills us with extreames.
Tut. A gold buble, pupill, Oh grosse solœcisme
To chaster eares, that understand the Latine.
On. I will not be corrected now:
I am in love, revenge is now the Cud
That I do chaw: Ile challenge him.
Cra. I marry Sir.
Vnc. Your Honour bids you Nephew on, and prosper.
On. But none will beare it from me, times are dange rous.
Cra. Carry it your selfe man.
On. Tutor, your counsell: Ile do nothing Sir
Without him.
Vnc. This may rid thee, (valiant Cur)
Whom I have kept this forty yeare my Ward:
Faine would I have his state, and now of late
He did enquire at Ephesus for his age,
But the Church Booke being burnt with Diana Temple
He lost his ayme: I have try'd to famish him,
Marry he'l live o'stones: and then for Poysons,
He is an Antidote 'gainst all of 'em;
He sprung from Mithridates; he is so dry and hot,
He will eat Spiders faster then a Monkey:
His Maw (unhurt) keeps Quicksilver like a bladder,
The largest dosse of Camphire, Opium,
Harmes not his braine; I think his Skul's as empty
As a sucht Egge; Vitriol, and Oyle of Tartar
He will eat tosts of: Henbane I am sure
And Hemblock I have made his Pot-herbs often.
Cra. If he refuse you, yours is then the honour:
If he accept, he being so great, you may
Crave both to chuse the Weapon, time, and place,
Which may be ten yeares hence, and Calicut,
Or underneath the lyne to avoid advantage.
On. I am resolved.
Tut. By your favour Pupill,
Whence shall this challenge rise? for you must ground it
On some such fundamentall base, or matter
As now the Gentry set their lives upon.
Did you ere cheat him at some Ordinary,
And durst he say so, and be angry? if thus,
Then you must challenge him: hath he call'd your whore,
Whore; though she be (beside yours) twenty mens?
Your honour, reputation is touch'd then,
And you must challenge him: Has he deny'd
On thirty damne me's to accommodate money,
Though he have broke threescore before to you?
Here you must challenge him: Durst he ever shun
To drink two pots of Ale wi' ye? or to wench,
Though weighty businesse otherwise importun'd?
He is a proud Lord,
And you may challenge him: Has he familiarly
Dislik'd your yellow Starch, or said your Dublet
Was not exactly frenchift'd? or that, that report
In faire tearmes was untrue? or drawn your Sword, Cry'd 'twas ill mounted? Has he given the lye
In circle, or oblique, or semy-circle,
Or direct paralell? you must challenge him.
On. He never gave my direct apparell the lye in's life.
Tut. But for the crown of all, Has he refus'd
To pledge your Mistris health though he were sick?
Enter Neanthes and Page.
And crav'd your pardon? you must challenge him,
There's no avoyding: one or both must drop.
On. Exquisite Tutor. (here
Nean. Crates, I have sought you long, what make you Fooling with these three farthings, while the Towne
Is all in uproare, and the Prince our Master, (Ceas'd by Leonidas, and Agenor) carried
And Prisoner kept i'the Castle, flankes
The west part of the City, where they vow
To hold him, till your Brother, Lord Euphanes
Be rendr'd to 'em, with his life to satisfie
The Rape, by him suspected to Merione?

The

The Queene refuſes to deliver him,
Pawning her knowledge for his innocency,
And dares 'em do their worſt on Prince Theanor,
The whole State's in combuſtion.
Cra. Fatall Ring.
Unc. What will become of us?
Nea. And ſhe hath given Commiſſion to Euphanes
And Conon (who have leavied men already)
With violence to ſurprize the Towre, and take 'em.
What will you doe?
Cra. Along wi' ye, and prevent
A further miſchiefe: Gentlemen, our intents
We muſt defer: you are the Princes followers.
Nea. Will ye walk with us?
Unc. You ſhall pardon us.
Tut. We are his followers afarre off you know.
And are contented to continue ſo.
Exit Crates and Neant.
Onos. Sir Boy.
Page. Sir Foole? a Challenge to my Lord?
How dar'ſt thou, or thy ambs--ace here think of him,
Ye Crow-pick'd heads, which your thin ſhoulders beare
As doe the poles on Corinth Bridge the Traitors:
Why you three Nine-pins, you talke of my Lord,
And Challenges? you ſhall not need: come draw,
His Page is able to ſwindge three ſuch whelpes:
Unckle, why ſtand ye off: long-man advance.
Onos. S'light, what have we done Tutor?
Tut. He is a Boy,
And we may run away with honour.
Page. That ye ſhall not,
And being a Boy I am fitter to encounter
A Childe in Law as you are, under twenty:
Thou Sot, thou three-ſcore Sot, and that's a Childe Againe I grant you.
Unc. Nephew, here's an age:
Boyes are turn'd men, and men are Children.
Page. Away you Pezants with your bought Gentry;
Are not you he, when your fellow Paſſengers,
Your laſt tranſportment being aſſayl'd by a Galley
Hid your ſelfe i'the Cabbin: and the Fight done
Peep'd above Hatches, and cry'd, Have we taken,
Or are we tane? Come, I doe want a ſlipper,
But this ſhall ſerve: Sweare all as I would have you,
Or I will call ſome dozen brother Pages,
(They are not farre off I am ſure) and we will blancket
You untill you piſſe againe.
All. Nay, we will ſweare Sir.
Page. 'Tis your beſt courſe:
Firſt, you ſhall ſweare never to name my Lord,
Or heare him nam'd hereafter, but bare-headed.
Next, to begin his health in every place,
And never to refuſe to pledge it, though
You ſurfeit to the death. Laſtly, to hold
The pooreſt, litleſt Page in reverence;
To think him valianter, and a better Gentleman
Then you three ſtamp'd together: and to give him
Wine and Tobacco whereſoe're you meet,
And the beſt meat if he can ſtay.
All. We ſweare it loyally.
Page. Then I diſmiſſe you
True Leigmen to the Pantaffle:
I had more Articles, but I have buſineſſe
And cannot ſtay now: ſo adieu deare Monſieur,
Tres nobles & tres puiſſant.
Unc. Adieu Monſieur.
On. A voſtre ſervice & commaundement.
Tut. I told you Pupill, you'd repent this foolery.
On. Who, I repent? you are miſtaken Tutor,
I ne're repented any thing yet in my life,
And ſcorne to begin now: Come, let's be melancholly.
Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Queene, Euphanes, Conon, Lords.

Lord. 'Twere better treat with 'em.
Quee. I will no Treaties
With a League-breaker and a Rebell; ſhall I
Article with a Traitor? be compell'd
To yeeld an innocent unto their fury
Whom I have prov'd ſo to you?
Euph. Gracious Queene,
Though your owne god-like diſpoſition
Would ſuccour vertue, and protect the right,
Yet for the publike good, for the deare ſafety
Of your moſt Royall onely Son, conſent
To give me up the ſacrifice to their malice:
My life is aym'd at, and 'twere better farre
The blood of twenty thouſand ſuch as I
Purpled our Seas, then that your Princely Son
Should be endanger'd.
Quee. Still well ſaid honeſt Foole,
Were their demand but one haire from thy head,
By all the gods il'd ſcorne 'em: were they here,
The Majeſty that dwels upon this brow
Should ſtrike 'em on their knees: As for my Son,
Let 'em no more dare then they'l anſwer, I
An equall Mother to my Country, am,
And every vertuous Son of it is ſon
Unto my boſome, tender as mine owne.
Con. Oh, you are heavenly Madam, and the gods
Can ſuffer nothing paſſe to injure you:
The life that Conon promis'd, he ſtands now
Ready to pay with joy.
Quee. Farewell both,
Succeſſe attend you: you have Souldiers been,
Tam Marte quam Mercurio: if you bring not peace
Bring me their heads.
Con. I will put faire for one. Exit Quee. Lords.
Euph. Double the Guard upon her Highneſſe Perſon;
Conon, you muſt performe a friendly part,
Which I ſhall counſell you.
Con. I am your Servant Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Theanor, Agenor, Leonidas above.

Leo. Make good that Fortification, and the Watch
Keepe ſtill upon the Battlements: Royall Sir, Weigh but our injuries, we have told you fully
The manner and the matter hales us thus;
Nor ſhall this upſtart Muſhrum bred i'th night,
Sit brooding underneath your Mothers wings
His damn'd impieties.
Ag. For your ſelfe, brave Prince,
Feare nothing that this face of Armes preſents:
We aske the Raviſher, and have no meanes
To win him from your moſt indulgent Mother
But by this practice.
The. Stout Leonidas,
Princely Agenor, your wrongs cry ſo loud,
That who ſo would condemne you is not heard:
I blame you not, who but Euphanes durſt
Make Stories like to this? My wrong's as ſtrong Aske my revengefull arme to ſtrengthen yours:
As for my feare, know you, and Greece throughout,
Enter Euphanes and Conon.
Our Mother was a Spartan Princeſſe borne,
That never taught me to ſpell ſuch a word.

Con

Con. Sir, you doe tempt your life.
Euph. Conon, no more.
Doe thus as thou wouldst save it. Sound Trumpet within.
Ag. What Trumpet's this?
Leo. Beneath I doe perceive
Two armed men, single, that give us summons
As they would treat.
Ag. Let us descend.
Con. My Lord,
I would you would excuse me, and proceed
According to the Queenes directions.
Euph. Friend,
As thou wouldst weare that title after death
Enter below Theanor, Agenor, Leonidas and Souldiers.
Performe my charge: no Souldier on his life
Approach us nearer.
Con. Safety to both the Princes, loyalty
To you Lord Generall, the Queene, your Mistris
As well as ours, though not to feare, to cut
Civill dissention from her Land, and save
Much guiltlesse blood, that uprore ever thirsts,
And for the safe-guard of her Son, by me
(As you demand) hath sent the Lord Euphanes
To plead his owne cause, or to suffer death
As you shall finde him worthy; so delivering
The Prince back, I shall leave him to your Guard.
Leo. The Queene is good and gracious: kisse her hand.
Ag. And seale our duties: Sir, depart in peace.
The. Oh Sir, you now perceive, when in the scales
Nature, and fond affection weigh together,
One poyzes like a feather, and you know my Lords
What's to be done.
Euph. Your Highnesse is unarm'd,
Please you to use mine, and to lead the Army
Back to your Mother: Conon, march you with 'em.
Con. I will my Lord: But not so farre as not
To bring you help if danger looke upon you. Exit.
Euph. Why doe you looke so strangely, fearefully,
Or stay your deathfull hande, be not so wise
To stop your rage: looke how unmoov'dly, here
I give my selfe my Countries sacrifice,
An innocent sacrifice: Truth laughs at death,
And terrifies the killer more then kill'd;
Integrity thus armelesse seekes her foes,
And never needs the Target, nor the Sword,
Bow, nor invenom'd shafts.
Leo. We are amaz'd,
Not at your eloquence, but impudence,
That dare thus front us.
Ag. Kill him, who knowes not
The iron forehead that bold mischiefe weares.
Leo. Forbeare a while Agenor, I doe tremble,
And something fits like vertue in his face,
Which the gods keep.
Euph. Agenor, strike Leonidas
You that have purchas'd fame on certaine grounds,
Loose it on supposition? smeare your hands
In guiltlesse blood, laugh at my Martyrdome:
But yet remember, when Posterity
Shall read your Volumes fill'd with vertuous acts,
And shall arrive at this black bloody leafe,
Noting your foolish barbarisme, and my wrong,
(As time shall make it plaine) what followes this Disciphering any noble deed of yours
Shall be quite lost, for men will read no more.
Leo. Why? dare you say you are innocent?
Euph. By all the gods, as they
Of this foule crime, why Gent. pry clean through my life,
Then weigh these circumstances: think you that he
Which made day night, and men to furies turn'd,
Durst not trust silence, vizors, nor her sence
That suffer'd; but with Charmes and Potions
Cast her asleep, (for all this I have enquir'd)
Acted the Fable of Proserpines Rape,
The place (by all description) like to Hell:
And all to perpetrate unknowne his Lust,
Would fondly in his Person bring a Ring,
And give it a betrothed Wife, ith' same house
Where the poore injur'd Lady liv'd, and groan'd.
Ag. Hell gives us Art to reach the depth of sin,
But leaves us wretched Fooles, when we are in.
Euph. Had it given me that Art, and left me so,
I would not thus into the Lyons jawes
Have thrust my selfe (defenceleſse) for your good,
The Princes safety, or the Common-weales:
You know the Queene deny'd me, and sent us
Commanders to surprize you, and to race
This Tower down, we had power enough to doe it,
Or starve you, as you saw, and not to tender
My Person to your wrath, which I have done,
Knowing my heart as pure as infants sleep.
Leo. What think you Sir?
Ag. No harme I am sure: I weepe.
Euph. The gods are just, and mighty: but to give you
Further assurance, and to make your selves
Judges, and witnesses of my innocency,
Let me demand this question: On what night
Was this foule deed committed?
Ag. On the Eave
Before our Marriage meant.
Euph. Leonidas,
(Your rage being off, that still drownes memory)
Where was your selfe and I that very night,
And what our conference?
Leo. By the gods 'tis true:
Both in her Highnesse Chamber conferring
Even of this Match untill an houre of day,
And then came I to call you: we are sham'd.
Ag. Vtterly lost, and sham'd.
Euph. Neither, be chear'd,
He that could finde this out can pardon it,
And know this Ring was sent me from the Queene,
How she came by it, yet is not exquir'd,
Deeper occurrents hang on't: and pray Heaven
That my suspicions prove as false as yours,
Which (for the world) till I have greater proofe
I dare not utter what, nor whom they touch;
Only this build upon, with all my nerves
Ile labour with ye, till time waken truth.
Ag. There are our swords Sir, turne the points on us,
Leo. Punish Rebellion, and revenge your wrong.
Euph. Sir, my revenge shall be to make your peace,
Neither was this Rebellion, but rash love.
Enter Conon.
Con. How's this? unarm'd left, now found doubly arm'd?
And those that would have slaine him at his feet?
Oh Truth, thou art a mighty Conquerese:
The Queene (my Lord) perplex'd in care of you,
That crosse to her command hazard your selfe
In person, here is come into the Field,
And like a Leader, marches in the head
Of all her Troopes, vowes that she will demolish
Each stone of this proud Tower be you not safe:
She chafes like stormes in Groves, now sighs, now weepes,
And both sometimes, like Raine and Wind commixt,

Abjures her Son for ever, leſſe himſelfe
Do fetch you off in perſon, that did give Your ſelfe to ſave him of your owne free will,
And ſweares he muſt not, nor is fit to live.
Euph. Oh ſhe's a Miſtris for the gods.
Ag. And thou
A godlike ſervant fit for her.
Leo. Wide Greece
May boaſt becauſe ſhe cannot boaſt thy like.
Euph. Thus Conon tell her Highneſſe.
Con. My joy flyes.
Euph. Let's toward her march : ſterne Drum ſpeake gentle peace.
Leo. We are priſoners, lead us, ne're was knowne
A preſident like this : one unarm'd man
(Suſpected) to captive with golden words (Truth being his ſheild) ſo many arm'd with ſwords. Ex.

Enter (at one Doore) Queen, Theanor, Crates, Conon, Lords, Souldiers, (at another) Euphanes (with two ſwords) Agenor, Leonidas, Souldiers : Euphanes preſents Leonidas on his knees to the Queen : Agenor bare-headed makes ſhew of ſorrow to the Queen, ſhe ſtamps and ſeemes to be angry at firſt, Euphanes perſwades her, layes their ſwords at her feet, ſhe kiſſes him, gives them their ſwords againe, they kiſſe her hand and embrace, th. Souldiers lift up Euphanes, and ſhout : Theanor and Crates diſcovered, Conon whiſpers with Crates, Euphanes with Agenor, and Leonidas obſerves it, who ſeeme to promiſe ſomething, Euphanes directs his Page ſomewhat.
Exeunt all but Theanor and Crates.

The. We are not lucky Crates, this great torrent
Beares all before him.
Cra. Such an age as this
Shall ne're be ſeene againe : vertue growes fat,
And villany pines; the Furies are aſleep,
Miſchiefe 'gainſt goodneſſe aym'd is like a ſtone,
Unnaturally forc'd up an imminent hill,
Whoſe weight falls on our heads and buries us,
We ſpringe our ſelves, we ſink in our owne bogs.
The. What's to be done?
Cra. Repent and grow good.
The. Piſh,
'Tis not the faſhion (foole) till we grow old :
The peoples love to him now ſcares me more
Then my fond Mothers : both which like two floods
Bearing Euphanes up; will o're-flow me,
And he is worthy, would he were in Heaven,
Be that hereafter : Crates helpe me now,
And henceforth be at eaſe.
Cra. Your will my Lord?
The. Beliza is to marry him forth-with,
I long to have the firſt touch of her too,
That will a little quiet me.
Cra. Fie Sir,
You'l be the tyrant to virginity;
To fall but once is manly, to perſevere
Beaſtly, and deſperate.
The. Croſſe me not but do't :
Are not the meanes, the place, the inſtruments
The very ſame? I muſt expect you ſuddenly. Exit.
Cra. I muſt obey you.
Who is in evill once a companion
Can hardly ſhake him off, but muſt run on.
Here I appointed Conon to attend
Him, and his ſword : he promis'd to come ſingle
Enter Conon and Page.
To avoyd prevention : he is a man on's word.
Con. You are well met Crates.
Cra. If we part ſo Conon.
Con. Come, we muſt doe theſe mutuall offices,
We muſt be our owne ſeconds, our owne Surgeons,
And fairely fight, like men, not on advantage.
Cra. You have an honeſt boſome.
Con. Yours ſeemes ſo.
Cra. Let's paire our ſwords : you are a juſt Gentleman.
Con. You might be ſo : now ſhake hands if you pleaſe, Though't be the cudgell faſhion, 'tis a friendly one.
Cra. So, ſtand off.
Page. That's my que to beckon 'em. Exit.
Con. Crates, to expoſtulate your wrongs to me
Were to doubt of 'em, or wiſh your excuſe
In words, and ſo returne like maiden Knights :
Yet freely thus much I profeſſe, your ſpleene
And rugged carriage toward your honour'd Brother
Hath much more ſtirr'd me up, then mine owne cauſe,
For I did ne're affect theſe bloody men,
But hold 'em fitter be made publike Hangmen,
Or Butchers call'd, then valiant Gentlemen :
'Tis true ſtamp'd valour do's upon juſt grounds,
Yet for whom juſtlier ſhould I expoſe my life
Than him, unto whoſe vertue I owe all.
Cra. Conon, you think by this great deed of yours
To inſinuate your ſelfe a lodging nearer
Unto my Brothers heart : ſuch men as you
Live on their undertakings for their Lords,
And more diſable them by anſwering for 'em
Then if they ſate ſtill, make 'em but their Whores,
For which end Gallants now adayes do fight :
But here we come not to upbraid; what men
Seeme, the raſh world will judge; but what they are Heaven knowes : and this—— Horſes, we are diſcry'd,
One ſtroak for feare of laughter.
Enter Euphanes, Agenor, Leonidas, Page.
Con. Halfe a ſcore.
Euph. Hold, hold : on your allegeance hold.
Ag. He that ſtrikes next——
Leo. Falls like a Traytor on our ſwords.
Euph. Oh Heaven, my Brother bleeds : Conon, thou art
A villaine, an unthankfull man, and ſhalt
Pay me thy blood for his, for his is mine :
Thou wert my friend, but he is ſtill my Brother;
And though a friend ſometimes be nearer ſaid
In ſome gradation, it can never be
Where that ſame Brother can be made a friend,
Which deareſt Crates thus low I implore;
What in my poverty I would not ſeeke,
Becauſe I would not burthen you, now here
In all my height of bliſſe I beg of you,
Your friendſhip; my advancement Sir is yours;
I never held it ſtrange, pray uſe it ſo :
We are but two, which number Nature fram'd
In the moſt uſefull faculties of man,
To ſtrengthen mutually and releeve each other :
Two eyes, two eares, two armes, two leggs and feet,
That where one fail'd the other might ſupply;
And I, your other eye, eare, your arme and legge,
Tender my ſervice, helpe and ſuccour to ye.
Ag. Leo. A moſt divine example.
Euph. For deare Brother,
You have been blind, and lame, and deafe to me,
Now be no more ſo : in humility
I give ye the duty of a younger Brother,
Which take you as a Brother, not a Father,
And then you'l pay a duty back to me.
Cra. Till now I have not wept theſe thirty yeares.

Euph.

Euph. Diſcording Brothers are like mutuall leggs
Supplanting one another: he that ſeekes
Aid from a ſtranger and forſakes his Brother,
Do's but like him that madly lops his arme,
And to his body joynes a wooden one:
Cuts off his naturall legge, and truſts a Crutch,
Plucks out his eye to ſee with Spectacles.
Cra. Moſt deare Euphanes, in this crimſon flood
Waſh my unkindneſſe out: you have ore-come me,
Taught me humanity and brotherhood;
Full well knew Nature thou wert fitter far
To be a Ruler ore me then a Brother,
Which henceforth be: Jove ſurely did deſcend
When thou wert gotten in ſome heavenly ſhape
And greet my Mother, as the Poets tell
Of other women.
Ag. Be this Holy-day.
Leo. And noted ever with the whiteſt ſtone.
Con. And pardon me my Lord, looke you, I bleed
Faſter then Crates; what I have done I did
To reconcile your loves, to both a friend,
With my blood ciment, never to part or end.
Ag. Moſt worthy Conon.
Leo. Happy riſe, this day
Contracts more good then a whole age hath done.
Euph. Royall Agenor, brave Leonidas,
You are maine cauſes, and muſt ſhare the fame.
Cra. Which in ſome part this hower ſhall requight,
For I have aym'd my black ſhafts at white markes,
And now ile put the clew into your hands
Shall guide ye moſt perſpicuouſly to the depth
Of this dark Laborinth, where ſo long ye were loſt
Touching this old Rape, and a new intent,
Wherein your counſell, and your active wit
My deareſt Brother will be neceſſary.
Euph. My Prophecy is come, prove my hopes true
Agenor ſhall have right, and you no wrong,
Time now will pluck her daughter from her Cave:
Let's hence to prevent rumour; my deare Brother,
Natures divided ſtreames the higheſt ſhelfe
Will over-run at laſt, and flow to it ſelfe. Exeunt

Actus Quintus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Crates, Euphanes, Neanthes, Soſicles, Eraton.

Euph. I Have won the Lady to it, and that good
Which is intended to her, your faith onely
And ſecrecie muſt make perfect: Thinke not Sir,
I ſpeake as doubting it, for I dare hazard
My ſoule upon the tryall.
Cra. You may ſafely,
But are Agenor, and Leonidas ready
To ruſh upon him in the Act, and ſeize him
In the height of his ſecurity?
Euph. At all parts
As you could wiſh them.
Cra. Where's the Lady?
Euph. There
Where you appointed her to ſtay.
Cra. 'Tis wiſely order'd. (way,
Euph. Laſt, when you have him ſure compell him this
For as by accident here ile bring the Queene
To meet you, 'twill ſtrike greater terrour to him,
To be tane unprovided of excuſe,
And make more for our purpoſes. Exit.
Cra. Come Neanthes,
Our fames and all are at the ſtake.
Nea. 'Tis fit
That ſince relying on your skill we venture
So much upon one game, you play with cunning
Enter Theanor.
Or we ſhall riſe ſuch loſers: as——
Soſ. The Prince.
Cra. The plot is laid Sir, howſoe're I ſeem'd
A little ſcrupulous, upon better judgement
I have effected it.
The. 'Tis the laſt ſervice
Of this foule kinde I will employ you in.
Cra. We hope ſo Sir.
The. And I will ſo reward it——
Nea. You are bound to that; in every Family
That do's write luſtfull, your fine Bawd gaines more (For like your Broker, he takes fees on both ſides)
Then all the Officers of the houſe.
Soſ. For us then
To be a great mans Panders, and live poore,
That were a double fault.
Cra. Come, you loſe time Sir,
We will be with you inſtantly: the deed done,
We have a Mask that you expect not.
The. Thou art ever carefull: for Joves Mercury
I would not change thee. Exit.
Era. There's an honour for you.
Nea. To be compar'd with the celeſtiall Pimp, Joves ſmock-ſworne Squire, Dan Hermes.
Cra. Ile deſerve it,
And Gentlemen be aſſur'd, though what we do now
Will to the Prince Theanor looke like treaſon
And baſe diſloyalty; yet the end ſhall prove,
When he's firſt taught to know himſelfe, then you,
In what he judg'd us falſe we were muſt true. Exeunt

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Euphanes, Agenor, Leonidas, Conon.

Euph. Only make haſte (my Lords) in all things elſe
You are inſtructed: you may draw your ſwords
For ſhew if you thinke good, but on my life
You will finde no reſiſtance in his ſervants,
And he's himſelfe unarm'd.
Ag. I would he were not,
My juſt rage ſhould not then be loſt.
Euph. Good Sir,
Have you a care no injury be done
Unto the Perſon of the Prince: but Conon,
Have you an eye on both, it is your truſt
That I relye on.
Con. Which I will diſcharge,
Aſſure your ſelfe moſt faithfully.
Euph. For the Lady,
I know your beſt reſpect will nor be wanting:
Then to avoyd ſuſpition and diſcovery,
I hold it requiſite, that as ſoone as ever
The Queene hath ſeene her, ſhe forſake the place,
And fit her ſelfe for that which is projected
For her good, and your honour.
Leo. If this proſper, Beleeve it you have made a purchaſe of
My ſervice and my life.
Euph. Your love I ayme at.
Leo. Here I ſhall finde you?

Euph. With the Queene.
Con. Enough Sir. Exit.

Enter Page.

Page. The Queene enquires for you my Lord, I have met
A dozen Messengers in search of you.

Enter Queene, Ladies, Attendants.

Euph. I knew I should be sought for, as I wish'd
She's come her selfe in person.
Quee. Are you found Sir?
I wonder where you spend your houres, me thinkes
Since I so love your company, and professe
'Tis the best comfort this life yeelds me; mine
Should not be tedious to you.
Euph. Gracious Madam,
To have the happinesse to see and heare you,
Which by your bounty is conferr'd upon me,
I hold so great a blessing, that my honours
And wealth compar'd to that are but as Cyphers
To make that number greater: yet your pardon
For borrowing from my duty so much time
As the provision for my sudden Marriage
Exacted from me.
Quee. I perceive this Marriage
Will keepe you often from me: but ile beare it.
She's a good Lady, and a faire, Euphanes,
Yet by her leave I will share with her in you:
I am pleas'd that in the night she shall enjoy you,
And that's sufficient for a Wife; the day time
I will divorce you from her.
Leo. within. We will force you if you resist.
Queen. What noyce is that?
The. within. Base Traytors.
Euph. It moves this way.

Enter Agenor, Leonidas with Theanor, Meriome like Beliza, Conon, Crates, Neambes, Soficles, Eraton, Guard.

Quee. What ere it be ile meet it,
I was not borne to feare: Who's that Beliza?
Euph. My worthiest, noblest Mistris. Exit.
Quee. Stay her, ha?
All of you looke as you were rooted here,
And wanted motion: what new Gorgons head
Have you beheld, that you are all turn'd Statues?
This is prodigious: ha's none a tongue
To speake the cause?
Leo. Could every haire great Queene
Upon my head yeeld an articulate sound,
And all together speake, they could not yet
Expresse the villany we have discover'd,
And yet, when with a few unwilling words
I have deliver'd what must needs be knowne, You'l say I am too eloquent, and with
I had been borne without a tongue.
Quee. Speak boldly,
For I unmov'd with any losse will heare.
Leo. Then know, we have found out the Ravisher
Of my poore Sister, and the place, and meanes
By which th' unfortunate though faire Beliza
Hath met a second violence.
Euph. This confirmes
What but before I doubted, to my ruine
My Lady ravish'd.
Quee. Point me out the villaine,
That guilty wretched monster that hath done this,
That I may looke on him, and in mine eye
He read his Sentence.
Leo. That I truly could
Name any other but the Prince, that heard
You have it all.
Queen. Wonder not that I shake,
The miracle is greater that I live,
Having endur'd the thunder that thy words
Have throwne upon me: dar'st thou kneele, with hope
Of any favour, but a speedy death,
And that too in the dreadfull'st shape that can Appeare to a dispairing leaprous soule,
If thou hast any? no, libidinous beast,
Thy Lust hath alter'd so thy former being,
By Heaven I know thee not.
The. Although unworthy
Yet still I am your Son.
Quee. Thou lyest, lyest falsly,
My whole life never knew but one chaste bed,
Nor e're desir'd warmth but from lawfull fires,
Can I be then the Mother to a Goat,
Whose lust is more insatiate then the grave,
And like infections ayre engenders plagues,
To murder all that's chaste, or good in woman?
The gods I from my youth have serv'd and fear'd,
Whose holy Temples thou hast made thy Brothells;
Could a Religious Mother then bring forth
So damn'd an Atheist? read but o're my life,
My actions, manners, and made perfect in them
But looke into the story of thy selfe
As thou art now, not as thou wert Theanor,
And Reason will compell thee to confesse,
Thou art a stranger to me.
Ag. Note but how heavie
The weight of guilt is: it so low hath sunke him
That he wants power to rise up in defence
Of his bad cause.
Quee. Perswade me not Euphanes,
This is no Prince, nor can claime part in me:
My Son was borne a Free-man, this a Slave
To beastly passions, a Fugitive,
And run-away from vertue: bring bonds for him.
By all the honour that I owe to Justice
He loses me for ever that seekes to save him:
Binde him I say, and like a wretch that knowes
He stands condemn'd before he heares the Sentence,
With his base Agents, from my sight remove him,
And lodge them in the Dungeon: As a Queene
And Patroness to Justice I command it:
Thy teares are like unseasonable showres,
And in my heart now steel'd can make no entrance:
Thou art cruell to thy selfe (Foole) 'tis not want
In me of soft compassion; when thou left'st
To be a Son, I ceas'd to be a Mother;
Away with them: The children I will leave
To keepe my name to all posterities
Shall be the great examples of my Justice,
The government of my Country, which shall witnesse
How well I rul'd my selfe: bid the wrong'd Ladies
Appeare in Court to morrow, we will heare them;
And by one Act of our severity
For feare of punishment, or love to vertue,
Teach others to be honest: all will shun
To tempt her Lawes, that would not spare her Son. Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Onos, Uncle, and Tutor.

Unc. Nay Nephew.
Tut. Pupill, heare but reason.
On. No, I have none, and will heare none; oh my honor,
My honour blasted in the bud, my youth,
My hopefull youth, and all my expectation
Ever to be a man are lost for ever.
Unc. Why Nephew, we as well as you are dub'd

Knights

Knights of the Pantofle.
Tut. And are ſhouted at,
Kick'd, ſcorn'd, and laugh'd at by each Page and Groome,
Yet with erected heads we beare it.
Onos. Alas,
You have yeares, and ſtrength to doe it; but were you
(As I) a tender griſle, apt to bow,
You would like me with Cloakes envelloped,
Walke thus, then ſtamp, then ſtare.
Unc. He will run mad
I hope, and then all's mine.
Tut. Why looke you Pupill,
There are for the recovery of your honour
Degrees of Medicines, for a tweak by the Noſe
A man's to travell but ſixe moneths, then blow it
And all is well againe: the Baſtinado
Requires a longer time, a yeare or two,
And then 'tis buried: I grant you have been bafful'd,
'Tis but a journey of ſome thirty yeares
And it will be forgotten.
Onos. Thinke you ſo?
Tut. Aſſuredly.
Unc. He may make a ſhorter cut,
But hange, or drowne himſelfe, and on my life
'Twill no more trouble him.
Onos. I could ne're endure
Or Hemp or Water, they are dangerous tooles
For youth to deale with: I will rather follow
My Tutors counſell.
Tut. Do ſo.
Onos. And put in
For my ſecurity, that ile not returne
In thirty yeares, my whole ſtate to my Unckle.
Unc. That I like well of.
On. Still provided Unckle,
That at my comming home you will allow me
To be of age, that I may call to accompt
This Page, that hath abus'd me.
Unc. 'Tis a match.
On. Then Corinth, thus the baſhfull Lampriat
Takes leave of thee: and for this little time
Of thirty yeares will labour all he can,
Though he goes yong forth, to come home a man. Exeu.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Euphanes and Martiall.

Euph. Are your Priſoners ready?
Mar. When it ſhall pleaſe the Queene
To call them forth my Lord.
Euph. Pray you doe me the favour
To tell me how they have borne themſelves this night
Of their impriſonment?
Mar. Gladly Sir; your Brother
With the other Courtiers willingly receiv'd
All courteſies I could offer; eat, and drank,
And were exceeding merry, ſo diſſembling
Their guilt, or confident in their innocence,
That I much wonder'd at it. But the Prince,
That (as borne higheſt) ſhould have grac'd his fall
With greateſt courage, is ſo ſunck with ſorrow,
That to a common judgement ye would ſeeme
To ſuffer like a woman: but to me,
That from the experience I have had of many Looke further in him, I doe finde the deep Conſideration of what's paſt, more fright him
Then any other puniſhment.
Euph. That is indeed
True magnanimity: the other but
A deſperate baſtard vallour.
Mar. I preſſed to him,
And notwithſtanding the Queenes ſtrict command,
(Having your Lordſhips promiſe to ſecure me)
Offer'd to free him from his bonds, which he Refus'd, with ſuch a ſorrow mixt with ſcorne
That it amaz'd me; yet I urg'd his Highneſſe
To give one Reaſon for't: he briefly anſwer'd,
That he had ſate in Judgement on himſelfe,
And found that he deſerv'd them: that he was
A Raviſher, and ſo to ſuffer like one,
Which is the reaſon of my teares: he addeth,
For were't not I againe ſhould breake the Lawes,
By ſcorning all their rigour can inflict,
I ſhould dye ſmiling.
Euph. I forbeare to wonder
That you were mov'd that ſaw this: I am ſtrooke
With the relation ſo. 'Tis very well;
See all things ready. I doe wiſh I could Send comfort to the Prince; be ready with him;
'Tis in the Queenes breaſt only, which for us Bar brought in
To ſearch into were ſawcineſſe, to determine
What ſhe thinkes fit.

Enter Leonidas with Meriane (in white) Euphanes with Beliza (in black) Queene, Agenor, Conon, Martiall, with Theanor, Crates, Soſicles, Eraton. Lords, Ladies, Guard.

Lord. Make way there for the Queene.
Quee. Read firſt the Law, and what our Anceſtors
Have in this caſe provided, to deter
Such like offenders: To you gentle Ladies
This onely, Would I could as well give comfort,
As bid you be ſecure from feare or doubt
Of our diſpleaſure: be as confident
As if your plea were 'gainſt a common man,
To have all right from us; I will not grieve
For what's not worth my pitty: Read the Law.

Clerke Reades.

Lycurgus the nineteenth againſt Rapes: It is provided, and publiquely enacted and confirmed, That any man of what degree ſoever, offering violence to the chaſtity of a Virgin, ſhall (Ipſo facto) be lyable to her accuſation, and according to the ſaid Law be cenſur'd; Ever provided, that it ſhall be in the choyce of the ſaid Virgin ſo abuſed, either to compell the Offender to Marry her without a Dowre, if ſo ſhe will be ſatisfied, or demanding his head for the offence, to have that accordingly performed.

Quee. You heare this: what doe you demand?
Mer. The benefit
The Law allowes me.
Bel. For the injury
Done to mine Honour, I require his head.
Mer. I likewiſe have an eye upon mine Honour;
But knowing that his death cannot reſtore it
I aske him for my Husband.
Bel. I was Raviſh'd,
And will have Juſtice.
Mer. I was Raviſh'd too,
I kneele for mercy.
Bel. I demand but what
The Law allowes me.
Mer. That which I deſire
Is by the ſame Law warranted.
Bel. The Rape
On me, hath made a forfeit of his life,
Which in revenge of my diſgrace I plead for.
Mer. The Rape on me gives me the priviledge

To be his wife, and that is all I ſue for.
Age. A doubtfull caſe.
Leo. Such pretty Lawyers, yet
I never ſaw, nor read of.
Euph. May the Queene
Favour your ſweet plea, Madam.
Bel. Is that juſtice?
Shall one that is to ſuffer for a Rape
Be by a Rape defended? Looke upon
The publike enemy of chaſtity,
This luſtfull Satyre, whoſe enrag'd deſires
The ruine of one wretched Virgins honour
Would not ſuffice; and ſhall the wrack of two
Be his protection? May be I was raviſh'd
For his luſt onely, thou for his defence;
O fine evaſion! ſhall with ſuch a ſleight
Your juſtice be deluded? your Lawes cheated?
And he that for one fact deſerv'd to die,
For ſinning often finde impunity?
But that I know thee, I would ſweare thou wert
A falſe Impoſtour, and ſubornd to this;
And it may be thou art Merione:
For hadſt thou ſuffer'd truly what I have done,
Thou wouldſt like me complaine, and call for vengeance,
And our wrongs being equall, I alone
Should not deſire revenge: But be it ſo,
If thou prevaile, even he will puniſh it,
And fooliſh mercy ſhew'd to him undoe thee,
Conſider, foole, before it be too late,
What joyes thou canſt expect from ſuch a husband,
To whom thy firſt, and what's more, forc'd embraces,
Which men ſay heighten pleaſure, were diſtaſtefull.
Mer. 'Twas in reſpect, that then they were unlawfull,
Unbleſſd by Hymen, and left ſtings behind them,
Which from the marriage bed are ever baniſh'd.
Let this Court be then the image of Joves throne,
Upon which grace and mercy ſtill attend,
To intercede betweene him and his Juſtice;
And ſince the Law allowes as much to me
As ſhe can challenge, let the milder ſentence,
Which beſt becomes a Mother, and a Queene
Now overcome; nor let your wiſdome ſuffer,
In doing right to her, I in my wrong
Indure a ſecond Raviſhment.
Bel. You can free him
Onely from that which do's concerne your ſelfe,
Not from the puniſhment that's due to me:
Your injuries you may forgive, not mine;
I plead mine owne juſt wreak, which will right both,
Where that which you deſire robs me of Juſtice;
'Tis that which I appeale to.
Mer. Bloody woman,
Doſt thou deſire his puniſhment? Let him live then;
For any man to marry where he likes not
Is ſtill a lingring torment.
Bel. For one Rape
One death's ſufficient, that way cannot catch me.
Mer. To you I fly then, to your mercy Madam,
Exempting not your Juſtice, be but equall;
And ſince in no regard I come behind her,
Let me not ſo be undervalu'd in
Your highneſſe favour, that the world take notice
You ſo prefer'd her, that in her behalf
You kil'd that Son, you would not ſave for me;
Mercy, O mercy Madam.
Bel. Great Queen, Juſtice.
Age. With what a Maſculine conſtancy the grave Lady hath heard them both?
Leo. Yet how unmov'd ſhe ſits
In that which moſt concernes her?
Con. Now ſhe riſes,
And having well waigh'd both their arguments,
Reſolves to ſpeak.
Euph. And yet againe ſhe pauſes;
O Conon, ſuch a reſolution once
A Roman told me he had ſeene in Cato
Before he kill'd himſelf.
Que. 'Tis now determin'd.
Merione, I could wiſh I were no Queene,
To give you ſatisfaction; no Mother
Beliza, to content you; and would part,
Even with my being, both might have their wiſhes;
But ſince that is impoſſible, in few words
I will deliver what I am reſolved on:
The end for which all profitable Lawes
Were made, lookes two waies onely, the reward
Of innocent good men, and the puniſhment
Of bad Delinquents: Ours, concerning Rapes,
Provided that ſame latter clauſe of Marriage
For him that had falne once, not then foreſeeing
Mankinde could prove ſo monſtrous, to tread twice
A path ſo horrid. The great Law-giver
Draco, That for his ſtrange ſeverity
Was ſaid to write his ſterne Decrees in blood,
Made none for Parricides, preſuming that
No man could be ſo wicked; Such might be,
Lycurgus anſwere (did he live) for this.
But ſince I finde that in my Sonne, which was not Doubted in any elſe, I will adde to it;
He cannot marry both, but for both dying,
Both have their full revenge: You ſee Beliza
You have your wiſh; with you Merione
Ile ſpend a teare or two, ſo Heaven forgive thee.
The. Upon my knees I do approve your judgement,
And beg that you would put it into act
With all ſpeed poſſible; onely that I may,
Having already made peace with my ſelf,
Part ſo with all the world: Princely Agenor
I aske your pardon; yours my Lord Euphanes;
And Crates, with the reſt too, I forgive you;
Do you the like for me: Yours, gracious Mother,
I dare not ask, and yet if that my death
Be like a Son of yours, though my life was not,
Perhaps you may vouchſafe it: Laſtly that Both theſe whom I have wrong'd, may wiſh my aſhes
No heavy burden, ere I ſuffer death,
For the reſtoring of Meriones honour,
Let me be married to her, and then dye
For you Beliza.
Que. Thou haſt made in this Part of amends to me, and to the world,
Thy ſuit is granted, call a Flamyn forth
To do this holy work; with him a Headſman.
Enter Flamyn, and Executioner.
Raiſe up thy weeping eyes Merione,
With this hand I confirme thy Marriage,
Wiſhing that now the Gods would ſhew ſome miracle,
That this might not divorſe it.
Cra. To that purpoſe
I am their Miniſter; ſtand not amaz'd,
To all your comforts I will do this wonder,
Your Majeſty (with your pardon I muſt ſpeak it)
Allow'd once heretofore of ſuch a Contract,
Which you repenting afterwards, revok'd it,
Being fully bent to match her with Agenor,
The griev'd Prince knowing this, and yet not daring

To croſſe what you determin'd, by an Oath
Bound me and theſe his followers to doe ſomething
That he might once enjoy her, we ſworne to it,
And eaſily perſwaded, being aſſur'd
She was his Wife before the face of Heaven,
Although ſome Ceremonious formes were wanting,
Committed the firſt Rape, and brought her to him,
Which broke the Marriage; but when we perceiv'd
He purpos'd to abuſe our ready ſeruice
In the ſame kinde, upon the chaſte Beliza,
Holding our ſelves leſſe ty'd to him then goodneſſe;
I made diſcovery of it to my Brother,
Who can relate the reſt.

Euph. It is moſt true.

Quee. I would it were:

Euph. In every circumſtance
It is upon my ſoule: For this knowne to me,
I wan Merione in my Ladies habit,
To be againe (but willingly) ſurpriz'd,
But with Agenor, and her noble Brother,
With my approv'd friend Conon, with ſuch ſpeed
She was purſu'd, that the lewd act ſcarce ended,
The Prince (aſſur'd he had enjoy'd Beliza,
For all the time Meriones face was cover'd)
Was apprehended, and brought to your preſence,
But not till now diſcover'd, in reſpect
I hop'd the imminent danger of the Prince,
To which his looſe unquenched heats had brought him,
Being purſu'd unto the lateſt tryall
Would worke in him compunction, which it has done;
And theſe two Ladies in their feign'd contentions,
To your delight I hope have ſerv'd as Maskers
To their owne Nuptialls.

Quee. My choyce was worthy
When firſt I look'd on thee, as thou haſt order'd
All ſhall be done, and not the meaneſt that Plaid in this unexpected Comedy,
But ſhall partake our bounty: And my Lord,
That with the reſt you may ſeeme ſatisfi'd,
If you dare venture on a Queene, not yet
So farre in debt to yeares, but that ſhe may Bring you a luſty Boy, I offer up
My ſelfe and Kingdome during my life to you.

Ag. It is a bleſſing which I durſt not hope for,
But with all joy receive.

All. We all applaud it.

Quee. Then on unto the Temple, where the rights
Of Marriage ended, we'l finde new delights. Exeunt.

Here endeth the Queene of Corinth.

VVomen pleas'd.

Actus primus, Scæna prima.

Enter Bartello, and Silvio.

Sil. 'Tis true she is a right good Princes, and a just one,
And Florence when she sets has lost a Planet.
Bar. My Mistris? I tell thee gentle Nephew,
There is not such another friend to goodnesse,
To down-right dealing, to faith and true heart
Within the Christian confines: Before she blest us,
Justice was a Cheese-monger, a meere Cheese-monger,
Weigh'd nothing to the World but mytes and maggots,
And a maine stinke: Law like a Horse-courser,
Her rules, and precepts hung with gawdes and ribbonds,
And pamper'd up to couzen him that bought her,
When shee her selfe was hackney lame and founder'd.
Sil. But the sweet Lady,
Belvidere the bright one——
Bar. I, there's a face indeed: O my deare Nephew,
Could a young fellow of thy fiery mettle
Freeze, and that Lady in his armes?
Sil. I think not.
Bar. Thou hast a parlous judgement; but let that passe,
She is as truly vertuous, faire, and noble,
As her great Mother's good; and that's not ordinary.
Sil. But why (so many Princes, and so great ones Being Suitors) should the Dutchesse deny to match her?
Bar. She is a Jewell man, hangs in her bosome,
Her only Childe: with her eyes she sees all things,
Discourses with her tongue, and pluck her from her
(So dotingly the old one loves her young one)
You pluck her heart out too: Besides, of late daies,
The Duke of Millaine, who could never win her
By love, nor treaty, laid a close traine for her
In her owne private walkes: some forty Horse-men, Set to surprize her; which we found, and dealt with,
And sent 'em running home to the Duke their Master,
Like Doggs with bottles at their tailes.
Sil. Since that, I heard Sir,
She has sent her to your Cittadell to secure her,
My couzen Rodope, your wife attending her.
Bar. You heare a truth, and all convenient pleasures
Are there proportion'd for her.
Sil. I would faine Sir,
Like one that owes a dutious service to her Sometimes, so please you——
Bar. Gentle Couzen pardon me,
I must not, nor you must not dare to offer,
The last Edict lyes on his life pursues it;
Your friend Sir to command, abroad to love you,
To lend ye any thing I have, to wait upon ye,
But in the Cittadell where I stand charg'd,
Not a bit upon a march: no service Sir,
No, good Sir by no meanes: I kisse your hands Sir. Exit.
Sil. To your keeping only? none else to look upon her?
None but Bartello worthy her attendance?
No faith but his to serve her? O Belvidere,
Thou Saint to whom my youth is sacrifie'd,
Thou point to which my life turnes, and my fortune,
Art thou lock'd from me now? from all my comforts,
Art thou snatch'd violently? thou hear'st me not,
Nor canst thou see (faire soule) thy Servants mournings,
Yet let thy gentle heart feele what his absence,
The great divorse of minds so truly loving,
So long, and nurs'd in one affection
Even from our infant eyes, suck'd in and nourish'd:
O let it feele but that, and there stand constant
And I am blest. My deare Neece Rodope,
That is her Governesse, did love me dearely,
There's one hope yet to see her: when he is absent
It may be ventur'd, and she may work it closely:
I know the Ladies will goes equall with me,
And so the danger of the Edict avoyded;
Let me think more, for I must try all hazards.

Enter Claudio, and Soto.

Soto. Will ye go yonder Sir?
Cla. Yes marry will I Sir.
Soto. And by this Ladder?
Cla. By that Ladder, coxcomb.
Soto. Have ye any more necks at home when this is broken,
For this will crack with the best friend he has Sir?
Or can you pitch of all foure, like an Ape now?
Let me see you tumble.
Cla. You are very pleasant Sir.
Soto. No truly Sir, I should be loath to see ye
Come fluttering down like a yong Rooke, cry squab,
And take ye up with your brains beaten into your buttocks
Cla. Hold your peace Asse: who's this stands musing here?
Silvio?
Sil. Who calls me?
Cla. One most glad to see you Sir.
Sil. My dearest Claudio! what make you thus private,
And with a preparation of this nature?
Soto. We have leave to play, and are going to climbe Birds nests.
Sil. Prethee what is it friend? why start ye from me?
Is your old Mistris growne so coy and cruell,
She must be scal'd? it seemes you are loath to tell me,
Since twenty yeares continuance of our friendship
May not be worth the weight of such a secret,
'Twill be but rude to aske againe: save ye.
Cla. Nay stay, deare Silvio, if you love me take it:
For till you know it, never woman labour'd
As I do now.
Sil. Ile do my best to ease it.
Cla. You have heard the Lady Belvidere——
Sil. What heard Sir?
Cla. Heard to the Cittadell, upon some feares
She is confin'd.
Sil. Why dreames he on this beauty?
'Tis true, I have heard it.
Cla. And that no accesse,
No blessing from those eyes but with much hazard,
Even hazard of a life.
Sil. He dares not love her,
I have heard that too: but whither points your purpose?
Cla. O Silvio, let me speake that none may heare me,
None but thy truth: I have lov'd this Lady long,
Long given away my life to her devotion,
Long dwelt upon that beauty to my ruine.

Sil. Do's she know this?
Cla. No, there begins my misery,
Ixion-like, I have onely yet clasp'd Clouds,
And fed upon poore empty dreames that starve me.
Sil. And what do you meane to do now?
Cla. Though I dye for't,
Though all the tortures in the world hung on me,
Arm'd with imperious Love, I stand prepar'd now,
With this to reach her Chamber: there to see her,
And tell her boldly with what truth I love her.
Sil. 'Twill not be easily done Sir.
Cla. O my Silvio,
The hardest things are sweetest in possession.
Sil. Nor will shew much discretion.
Cla. Love is blinde man,
And he that lookes for reason there far blinder.
Sil. Have ye consider'd ripely?
Cla. All that may fall,
And arm'd against that all.
Sil. Her honour too?
What she may suffer in this rash adventure?
The beauty of her name?
Cla. Ile do it closely,
And only at her window, with that caution——
Sil. Are there no Guards?
Cla. Corruption chokes their service.
Sil. Or do you hold her bred so light a woman
To hold commerce with strange tongues?
Cla. Why this service,
This only hazard of my life must tell her,
Though she were Vestas selfe, I must deserve her.
Sil. I would not have ye go: pray let it sinke here,
And think a nobler way to raise your service,
A safer, and a wiser.
Cla. 'Tis too late Sir.
Sil. Then I must say, You shall not go.
Cla. I shall not?
Sil. You shall not go: that part bred with ye, friendship
Bids me say boldly so, and you observe me.
Cla. You stretch that tye too far.
Sil. Ile stretch it farther:
The honour that I beare that spotlesse vertue
You foully seeke to taint, unnobly covet,
Bids me command ye stay: if not, thus force ye.
Soto. This will be worse then climbing.
Cla. Why do ye draw Sir?
Sil. To kill thee, if thy base will be thy Master.
Cla. I ever was your friend.
Sil. Whilst thou wert honest,
And not a Night-theife of anothers honour;
I never call'd a Foole my friend, a mad-man,
That durst expose his fame to all opinions,
His life to unhonest dangers: I never lov'd him,
Durst know his name, that sought a Virgins ruine,
Nor ever tooke I pleasure in acquaintance
With men, that give as loose raynes to their fancies
As the wilde Ocean to his raging fluxes:
A noble soule I twin with, and my love
Followes, his life dares master his affections.
Will ye give off, or fight?
Cla. I will not fight with ye:
The sacred name of friend tyes up that anger,
Rather ile study.
Sil. Do, to be a friend still.
Cla. If this way, I shall never hold.
Sil. Ile watch ye:
And if I catch ye false: by Heaven ye dye for't,
All love forgot.
Cla. When I feare that I am fit for't. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Lopez at a Table with jewels and money upon it, an Egge rosting by a Candle.

Lop. Whilst prodigall yong gaudy Fools are banqueting,
And launching out their states to catch the giddy,
Thus do I study to preserve my fortune,
And hatch with care at home the wealth that Saints me.
Here's Rubies of Bengala, rich, rich, glorious;
These Diamonds of Ormus bought for little,
Here vented at the price of Princes Ransomes;
How bright they shine like constellations,
The South seas treasure here, Pearle, faire and orient
Able to equall Cleopatra's Banket,
Here chaines of lesser stones for Ladies lustres,
Ingotts of Gold, Rings, Brooches, barrs of Silver,
These are my studies to set off in sale well,
And not in sensuall surfeits to consume 'em;
How rosts mine egg? he heats apace, ile turne him:
Penurio, where you knave do you wait? Penurio,
You lazie knave.
Pen. Did you call Sir?
Lop. Where's your Mistris?
What vanity holds her from her attendance?
Pen. The very sight of this egge has made him cockish,
What would a dozen butter'd do? She is within Sir.
Lop. Within Sir, at what thrift ye knave? what getting?
Pen. Getting a good stomack Sir, & she knew where to get (meat to it,
She is praying heartily upon her knees Sir,
That Heaven would send her a good bearing dinner.
Lop. Nothing but gluttony and surfeit thought on,
Health flung behinde: had she not yesternight firrah
Two Sprats to supper, and the oyle allowable?
Was she not sick with eating? Hadst not thou,
(Thou most ungratefull knave, that nothing satisfies)
The water that I boyl'd my other egge in
To make thee hearty broth?
Pen. 'Tis true, I had Sir;
But I might as soone make the Philosophers Stone on't,
You gave it me in water, and but for manners sake,
I could give it you againe in wind, it was so hearty
I shall turne pissing Conduit shortly: my Mistris comes Sir.

Enter Isabella.

Lop. Welcome my Dove.
Isab. Pray ye keep your welcome to ye,
Unlesse it carries more then words to please me,
Is this the joy to be a Wife? to bring with me,
Besides the nobleness of blood I spring from,
A full and able portion to maintaine me?
Is this the happinesse of youth and beauty,
The great content of being made a Mistris,
To live a Slave subject to wants, and hungers,
To jealousies for every eye that wanders?
Unmanly jealousie.
Lop. Good Isabella.
Isab. Too good for you: do you think to famish me,
Or keep me like an Almes-woman in such rayment,
Such poore unhandsome weeds? am I old, or ugly?
I never was bred thus: and if your misery
Will suffer wilfull blindnesse to abuse me,
My patience shall be no Bawd to mine owne ruine.
Pen. Tickle him Mistris: to him.
Isab. Had ye love in ye,
Or any patt of man——
Pen. Follow that Mistris.
Isab. Or had humanity but ever knowne ye,
You would shame to use a woman of my way thus,

So

So poore, and basely: you are strangly jealous of me
If I should give ye cause.
Lop. How Isabella?
Isab. As do not venture this way to provoke me.
Pen. Excellent well Mistris, Lop. How's this Isabella?
Isab. 'Twill stir a Saint, and I am but a woman,
And by that tenure may.
Lop. By no meanes Chicken,
You know I love ye: fie, take no example
By those young gadding Dames: (you are noted vertuous)
That stick their Husbands wealth in trifles on 'em
And point 'em but the way to their owne miseries:
I am not jealous, kisse me, —— I am not:
And for your diet, 'tis to keep you healthfull,
Surfits destroy more then the sword: that I am carefull
Your meat should be both neat, and cleanly handled
See, Sweet, I am Cook my selfe, and mine owne Cater.
Pen. A —— of that Cook cannot lick his fingers.
Lop. Ile adde another dish: you shall have Milke to it,
'Tis nourishing and good.
Pen. With Butter in't Sir?
Lop. This knave would breed a famine in a Kingdom:
And cloths that shall content ye: you must be wise then,
And live sequestred to your selfe and me,
Not wandring after every toy comes crosse ye, (Penurio.
Nor strooke with every spleene: what's the knave doing?
Pen. Hunting Sir, for a second course of flyes here,
They are rare new Sallads.
Lop. For certaine Isabella
This ravening fellow has a Woolf in's belly:
Untemperate knave, will nothing quench thy appetite?
I saw him eat two Apples, which is monstrous.
Pen. If you had given me those 'thad bin more monstrous.
Lop. 'Tis a maine miracle to feed this villaine,
Come Isabella, let us in to Supper,
And think the Romans dainties at our Table,
'Tis all but thought. Exeunt.
Pen. Would all my thoughts would do it:
The Devill should think of purchasing that Egge-shell,
To victle out a Witch for the Barmoothes:
'Tis treason to any good stomack living now
To heare a tedious Grace said, and no meat to't,
I have a Radish yet, but that's but transitory. Exit.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Soto.

Soto. Can any living man unlesse a Rascall
That neither knowes himselfe, nor a fashion'd Gentleman
Take me for a worse man then my Master now?
I am naturally proud in these cloths: but if pride now
Should catch a fall in what I am attempting,
'Tis but a Proverb sound, and a Neck broken,
That's the worst can come on't: a Gentleman's gone then,
A Gentleman oth' first house, there's the end on't:
My Master lyes most pittifully complaining,
Wringing and kicking up toth' eares in love yonder,
And such a lamentable noyse he keepes, it kills me:
I have got his cloths, and if I can get to her
By hooke or crooke here, such a song ile sing her ——
I think I shall be hang'd, but that's no matter, (Elephant, What's a hanging among friends: I am valiant now as an
I have consider'd what to say too: let me see now,
This is the place, 'tis plaguy high: stay at that lower window
Let me ayme finely now, like a good Gunner,
It may prove but a whipping.

Enter Silvio.

Sil. I saw some-body
Passe by me now, and though it were dark, me thought yet
I knew the cloths: ha, let me not be cozen'd,
The Ladder too, ready to sling it: monstrous,
'Tis he, 'tis Claudio: most voluptuous villaine, Scandall to womans credit: Love, I forget thee. (there?
Soto. What will he do ith' name of heaven, what's that
Sil. And all the friendship that I bore thee, bury here.
Soto. What has he in's hand? I hope but a Cudgell.
Sil. Thy fault's forgive O Heaven: farewell thou traitor.
Soto. I am slaine: I am slaine.
Sil. He's downe, and dead: dead certaine,
'Twas too rash, too full of spleene, stark dead:
This is no place now to repent in, onely
Would I had given this hand that shot the Pistoll
I had miss'd thee, and thou were once more Claudio. Exit.

Enter Claudio.

Cla. Why should I love thus foolishly? thus desperatly?
And give away my heart where no hope's left me?
Why should not the true counsell of a friend restraine me?
The Devills mouth I run into affright me,
The honour of the Lady charme my wildnesse;
I have no power, no being of my selfe,
No reason strong enough now left within me
To binde my will: O Love, thou God, or Devill,
Or what thou art that playes the tyrant in me.
Soto. Oh.
Cla. What's that cry?
Soto. A Surgeon, a Surgeon,
Twenty good Surgeons.
Cla. 'Tis not far from me,
Some Murther o' my life,
Soto. Will you let me dye here?
No drink come, nor no Surgeon?
Cla. 'Tis my man sure,
His voyce, and here he lyes: how is it with thee?
Sot. I am slaine, Sir, I am slaine.
Cla. Slaine? Who has slaine thee?
Soto. Kill'd, kill'd, out-right kill'd.
Cla. Where's thy hurt?
Soto. I know not,
But I am sure I am kill'd.
Cla. Canst thou sit up,
That I may finde the hurt out?
Soto. I can sit up,
But ne're the lesse I am slaine.
Cla. 'Tis not o'this side?
Soto. No Sir, I thinke it be not.
Cla. Nor o' this side,
Was it done with a Sword?
Soto. A Gun, a Gun sweet Master.
Cla. The devill a' bullet has been here: thou art well, Soto. No sure, I am kill'd. (man.
Cla. Let me see thy thighes, and belly,
As whole as a fish for any thing I see yet:
Thou bleed'st no where.
Soto. I thinke I do not bleed Sir,
But yet I am afraid I am slaine.
Cla. Stand up Foole,
Thou hast as much hurt as my naile: who shot thee,
A Pottle, or a Pinte?
Soto. Signiour Silvio shot me
In these clothes, taking me for you, and seeing
The Ladder in my hand here, which I stole from ye, (for ye Thinking to have gone to the Lady my selfe, & have spoke
Cla. If he had hit ye home, he had serv'd ye right sirra,
You sawcy rogue, how poore my intent showes to me,
How naked now, and foolish?
Soto. Are ye sure he has not hit me,
It gave a monstrous bounce?

Cla. You riſſe of your right ſide,
And ſaid your prayers too, you had been payed elſe:
But what need'ſt thou a Bullet when thy feare kills thee?
Sirrah, keep your own counſell for all this, you'l be hang'd
If it be knowne. (elſe, Soto. If it be by my meanes let me;
I am glad I am not kill'd, and far more gladder
My gentleman-like humours out: I feele 'tis dangerous,
And to be a gentleman, is to be kill'd twice a week.
Cla. Keepe your ſelfe cloſe ith' Country for a while ſirra.
There's Money, walk to your friends.
Soto. They have no Piſtolls,
Nor are no Gentlemen, that's my comfort. Exit.
Cla. I will retire too, and live private; for this Silvio
Inflam'd with nobleneſſe will be my death elſe;
And if I can forget this love that loades me,
At leaſt the danger: and now I think on't better,
I have ſome concluſions elſe invites me to it. Exit.

Actus Secundus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Rodope, and Silvio at ſeverall doores.

Rod. NEphew.
Sil. My deare Ant.
Rod. Would you goe by thus ſlily
And never ſee me, not once ſend in to me
Your loving Neece? ſhe that above all thoſe
I call my Kindred honour'd you, and placed you
Neareſt my heart?
Sil. I thanke you worthy Couſen,
But ſuch at this time are my occaſions——
Rod. You ſhall not goe yet, by my faith you ſhall not,
I will not be deny'd: why looke ye ſad Nephew?
Sil. I am ſeldome other: O, this blood ſits heavy:
As I walk't this way late laſt night,
In meditation of ſome things concern'd me——
Rod. What Nephew?
Sil. Why me thought I heard a Peece, Lady,
A peece ſhot off, much about this place too,
But could not judge the cauſe, nor what it boaded,
Under the Caſtle wall.
Rod. We heard it too,
And the Watch purſu'd it preſently, but found nothing,
Not any tract.
Sil. I am right glad to heare it:
The Ruffians ſurely, that command the night
Have found him, ſtript him: and into the River
Convey'd the body.
Rod. You looke ſtill ſadder, Nephew,
Is any thing within theſe walls to comfort ye?
Speake, and be Maſter of it.
Sil. Ye are a right Courtier,
A great Profeſſor, but a poore performer.
Rod. Do you doube my faith: you never found me that I dare well ſpeake it boldly, but a true friend. (way
Sil. Conclude me then.
Rod. Try me, and ſee who falters.
Sil. I will, and preſently ye 'tis in your power
To make me the moſt bound man to your courteſie.
Rod. Let me know how, and if I faile——
Sil. 'Tis thus then,
Get me acceſſe to the Lady Belvidere
But for a minute, but to ſee her: your Husband now
Is ſafe at Court, I left him full employ'd there.
Rod. You have ask'd the thing without my power to grant ye,
The Law lyes on the danger: if I lov'd ye not (elſe,
I would bid ye goe, and there be found, and dye for't.
Sil. I knew your love, and where there ſhew'd a danger
How far you durſt ſtep for me: give me a true friend,
That where occaſion is to doe a benefit
Aymes at the end, and not the rubs before it;
I was a foole to aske ye this, a more foole
To thinke a woman had ſo much noble nature
To entertaine a ſecret of this burthen;
Ye had beſt to tell the Dutcheſſe I perſwaded ye,
That's a fine courſe, and one will win ye credit;
Forget the name of Couſen, blot my blood out,
And ſo you raiſe your ſelfe, let me grow ſhorter.
A woman friend? he that beleeves that weakneſſe
Steeres in a ſtormy night without a Compaſſe.
Rod. What is't I durſt not do might not impeach ye?
Sil. Why this ye dare not do, ye dare not thinke of.
Rod. 'Tis a maine hazard.
Sil. If it were not ſo
I would not come to you to ſeeke a favour.
Rod. You will loſe your ſelfe.
Sil. The loſſe ends with my ſelfe then.
Rod. You will but ſee her?
Sil. Onely looke upon her.
Rod. Not ſtay?
Sil. Preſcribe your time.
Rod. Not traffique with her
In any cloſe diſhonourable actions?
Sil. Stand you your ſelfe by.
Rod. I will venture for ye,
Becauſe ye ſhall be ſure I am a tonch'd friend,
Ile bring her to ye: come walke, you know the Garden,
And take this key to open the little Poſterne,
There ſtand no guards.
Sil. I ſhall ſoone finde it Couſen. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter two Souldiers.

1 Sol. Is the Captaine come home?
2 Sol. No, who commands the Guard to night?
1 Sol. I thinke Perrubio.
2 Sol. What's the Word?
1 Sol. None knowes yet.
2 Sol. I would this Lady were married out och' way once,
Or out of our cuſtodies; I wiſh they wold take in more com (planie,
For I am ſure we feel her in our duties ſhrewdly.
1 Sol. 'Tis not her fault I warrant ye, ſhe is ready for't,
And that's the plague, when they grow ripe for marriage
They muſt be ſlipt like Hawkes.
2 Sol. Give me a meane wench,
No State doubt lyes on her, ſhe is alwaies ready.
1 Sol. Come to the Guard, 'tis late, and ſure the Captaine
Can not be long away.
2 Sol. I have watch'd theſe three nights,
To morrow they may keep me tame for nothing. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Silvio, Belvidere, and Rodope with a light.

Sil. This is the place I think; what light is that there
The Lady and my Couſen?
Bel. Is this the Garden?
Rod. Yes Madam.
Sil. O my bleſſed Miſtris,
Saint of my ſoule.
Bel. Speake ſoftly: take me to ye,
O Silvio I am thine, thine ever Silvio.

Rod.

Rod. Is this your promiſe Sir? Lady your honour?
I am undone if this be ſeene, diſgrac'd,
Fallen under all diſcredit.
Bel. Do you love ſtill?
Deere, do you keepe your old faith?
Sil. Ever Lady;
And when that failes me, all that's good forſake me.
Rod. Do not you ſhame? Madam, I muſt not ſuffer this,
I will not ſuffer it; men call you vertuous,
What do you meane to loſe your ſelfe thus? Silvio
I charge thee get away, charge you retire ye,
Ile call the watch elſe.
Sil. Call all the world to ſee us,
We live in one anothers happineſſe,
And ſo will die.
Bel. Here will I hang for ever.
Rod. As ye reſpect me, as hereafter Madam
You would enjoy his love—— nothing prevaile with ye?
Ile try my ſtrength then; get thee gone thou villain,
Thou Promiſe-breaker.
Sil. I am tide, I cannot.
Rod. Ile ring the Bell then.
Sil. Ring it to death, I am fixt here.
Enter Bartello, two Souldiers with lights.
Bart. I ſaw a light over the Garden walke,
Hard by the Ladies Chamber, heare's ſome knavery
As I live, I ſaw it twice.
Rod. The Guard, the Guard there;
I muſt not ſuffer this, it is too miſchievous.
Bart. Light up the torch, I fear'd this, ha? young Silvio?
How got he in?
1. Sold. The Divell brought him in ſure
He came not by us.
Bart. My wife between 'em baſting?
Guard, pull him off.
Rod. Now, now, ye feele the miſery.
Bart. You, Madam, at an houre ſo far undecent?
Death, O my ſoule! this is a ſoule fault in ye,
Your mothers care abuſd too, light's to her Chamber,
I am ſorry to ſee this.
Bel. Farewell my Sylvio,
And let no danger ſink thee.
Sil. Nor death Lady. Exit. Bel. Rod.
Bart. Are ye ſo hot? I ſhall prepare ye Phiſick
Will purge ye finely, neatly; you are too fiery;
Think of your prayers, Sir, and you have not forgot 'em;
Can ye fly i'th ayre, or creepe ye in at key-holes?
I have a gyn will catch ye though you conjur'd:
Take him to Guard to night, to ſtrong and ſure Guard;
Ile back to'th Ducheſſe preſently: no leſſe ſport ſerve ye,
Then the Heire to a Dukedom play at puſh-pin there Sir?
It was well aim'd, but plague upon't, you ſhot ſhort,
And that will loſe your game.
Sil. I know ſhe loſſe then. Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Claudio (like a Merchant.)

Cla. Now, in this habit may I ſafely ſee
How my inconſid friend carries my murther,
Who little I imagin'd had been wrought
To ſuch a height of rage; and much I grieve now
Mine owne blinde paſſion had ſo maſter'd me,
I could not ſee his love, for ſure he loves her,
And on a nobler ground then I pretended.
Enter Penurio.
It muſt be ſo, it is ſo; what Penurio,
My ſhotten friend, what winde blew you?
Pen. Faith 'tis true,
Any ſtrong winde will blow me like a feather,
I am all Ayre, nothing of earth within me,
Nor have not had this moneth, but that good Dinner
Your Worſhip gave me yeſterday, that ſtaies by me,
And gives me ballaſſe, elſe the Sun would draw me.
Cla. But do's my Miſtris ſpeake ſtill of me?
Pen. Yes Sir,
And in her ſleep, that makes my Maſter mad too,
And turne and fart for anger.
Cla. Art ſure ſhe ſaw me?
Pen. She ſaw ye at a window.
Cla. 'Tis moſt true,
In ſuch a place I ſaw a Gentlewoman,
A young, ſweet handſome woman.
Pen. That's ſhe, that's ſhe Sir.
Cla. And well ſhe view'd me, I view'd her.
Pen. Still ſhe Sir.
Cla. At laſt ſhe bluſh'd, and then look't off.
Pen. That bluſh Sir,
If you can read it truly——
Cla. But didſt thou tell her,
Or didſt thou foole me, thou knew'ſt ſuch a one?
Pen. I told her, and I told her ſuch a ſweet tale——
Cla. But did ſhe heare thee?
Pen. With a thouſand eares Sir,
And ſwallow'd what I ſaid as greedily,
As great-bellyed women do Cherries, ſtones and all Sir.
Cla. Methinkes ſhe ſhould not love thy Maſter?
Pen. Hang him Pilcher, (him,
There's nothing loves him: his owne Cat cannot endure
She had better lye with a Beare, for he is ſo hairie,
That a tame warren of flyes friſk round about him.
Cla. And wilt thou worke ſtill?
Pen. Like a Miner for ye.
Cla. And get acceſſe.
Pen. Or conjure you together,
'Tis her deſire to meet: ſhe is poyſon'd with him,
And till ſhe take a ſweet freſh ayre, that's you Sir.
Cla. There's money for thee: thou art a precious Varlet,
Be fat, be fat, and blow thy Maſter backward.
Pen. Blow you my Miſtris Sir, as flat as a flounder,
Then blow her up againe as Butchers blow their Veales,
If ſhe dye upon the ſame
Bury her, bury her in Gods name.
Cla. Thou art a merry knave: by this hand ile feed thee,
Till thou crack'ſt at both ends, if thou dar'ſt do this
Thou ſhalt eat no fantaſticall Porredge,
Nor lick the diſh where oyle was yeſterday,
Duſt, and dead flyes to day; Capons, fat Capons——
Pen. O hearty ſound.
Cla. Cramb'd full of itching Oyſters.
Pen. Will ye have the Ducheſſe?
Cla. And Lobſters big as Gauntlets,
Thou ſhalt deſpiſe baſe Beefe.
Pen. I do deſpiſe it,
And now me thinkes I feele a Tart come ſliding.
Cla. Leaping into thy mouth: but firſt deale faithfully.
Pen. When will ye come?
Cla. To morrow.
Pen. Ile attend ye,
For then my Maſter will be out in buſineſſe.
Cla. What newes abroad?
Pen. 'Mas as I was comming to you,
I heard that Signiour Silvio, a good Gentleman,
Many a good meale I have eaten with him——
Cla. What of him?
Pen. Was this day to be Arraigned before the Ducheſſe,
But why I could not heare.
Cla. Silvio arraign'd?

Go, get ye gone, and thinke of me.
Pen. I fly Sir. Exit Pen.
Cla. Arraign'd? for what? for my suppoſed death? no,
That cannot be ſure, there's no rumour of it,
Be it what it will, I will be there and ſee it,
And if my help will bring him off he has it. Exit.

Scæna Quinta.

Enter Ducheſſe, Lords, Silvio priſoner, Belvidere, Bartello, Rodope, Clerke, Counſellours, Attendants.

Du. Read the Edict laſt made,
Keepe ſilence there.

Clerk. If any man of what condition ſoever, and a ſubject, after the publiſhing of this Edict, ſhall without ſpeciall Licence from the great Ducheſſe, attempt or buy, offer, or make an attempt, to ſolicite the love of the Princeſſe Belvidere, the perſon ſo offending ſhall forfeit his life.

Counſellour. The reaſon why my Royall Miſtris here
In her laſt Treaty with Siennas Duke,
Promis'd her beauteous Daughter there in marriage,
The Duke of Millaine, rivall in this fortune,
Un-nobly ſought by practiſe to betray her;
Which found, and croſs'd, the Cittadell receiv'd her
There to ſecure her Mothers word; the laſt cauſe
So many Gentlemen of late enamour'd
On this moſt beauteous Princeſſe, and not brooking
One more then other, to deſerve a favour,
Blood has been ſpilt, many brave ſpirits loſt, (lence
And more unleſſe ſhe had been kept cloſe from their vio-
Had like to have followed: therefore for due prevention
Of all ſuch hazards and unnoble actions,
This laſt Edict was publiſh'd, which thou Silvio
Like a falſe man, a bad man, and a Traitor
Haſt rent a peeces, and contemn'd; for which cauſe
Thou ſtandeſt a guilty man here now. Exit Claudio.
Clark. Speak Silvio,
What canſt thou ſay to avoyd the hand of Juſtice?
Sil. Nothing, but I confeſſe, ſubmit, & lay my head to it.
Bel. Have ye no eyes my Lords, no underſtandings?
The Gentleman will caſt himſelfe away,
Caſt himſelfe wilfully: are you, or you guilty?
No more is he, no more taint ſticks upon him:
I drew him thether, 'twas my way betray'd him,
I got the entrance kept, I entertain'd him,
I hid the danger from him, forced him to me,
Poore gentle ſoule, he's in no part tranſgreſſing,
I wrot unto him.
Sil. Do not wrong that honour,
Caſt not upon that pureneſſe theſe aſperſions,
By Heaven it was my love, my violence,
My life muſt anſwer it: I broke in to her,
Tempted the Law, ſollicited unjuſtly.
Bel. As there is truth in Heaven I was the firſt cauſe,
How could this man have come to me, left naked
Without my counſell and proviſion?
What hower could he finde out to paſſe the Watchs,
But I muſt make it ſure firſt? Reverend Judges,
Be not abus'd, nor let an innocent life lye
Upon your ſhaking Conſcience; I did it,
My love the maine wheele that ſet him a going:
His motion but compell'd.
Sil. Can ye beleeve this,
And know with what a modeſty and whiteneſſe
Her life was ever ranck'd? Can you beleeve this
And ſee me here before ye young, and wilfull?
Apt to what danger Love dares thruſt me on,
And where Law ſtops my way, apt to contemne it?
If I were baſhfull, old, or dull, and ſleepy
In Loves allarmes, a woman might awake me,
Direct, and clew me out the way to happineſſe:
But I like fire, kindled with that bright beauty,
Catch hold of all occaſions, and run through 'em.
Bel. I charge ye as your honeſt ſoules will anſwer it.
Sil. I charge ye, as you are the friends to vertue,
That has no patterne living but this Lady.
Bel. Let not his blood——
Sil. Let not her wilfulneſſe——
For then you act a ſcene Hell will rejoyce at.
Bel. He is cleare.
Sil. She is as white in this as infants.
Cla. The god of Love protect your cauſe, and help ye,
Two nobler peeces of affection
Theſe eyes ne're look'd on, if ſuch goodneſſe periſh,
Let never true hearts meet againe, but break. Exit.
1 Lord. A ſtrange example of ſtrong love, a rare one.
2 Lord. Madam, we know not what to ſay to think on.
Duch. I muſt confeſſe it ſtrikes me tender too,
Searches my Mothers heart: you found 'em there?
Bar. Yes certaine Madam.
Duch. And ſo linked together?
Bar. As they had been one peece of Alablaſter.
Duch. Nothing diſhonourable?
Sil. So let my ſoule have happineſſe,
As that thought yet durſt never ſeeke this boſome.
Duch. What ſhall I do? 'has broke my Law, abus'd me,
Faine would I know the truth, either confeſſe it,
And let me underſtand the maine offender,
Or both ſhall feele the torture.
Sil. Are ye a Mother?
The Mother of ſo ſweet a Roſe as this is?
So pure a Flower? and dare ye loſe that nature?
Dare ye take to your ſelfe ſo great a wickedneſſe,
(O holy Heaven) of thinking what may ruine
This goodly building? this temple where the gods dwell?
Give me a thouſand tortures, I deſerve 'em,
And ſhew me death in all the ſhapes imagin'd.
Bel. No death but I will anſwer it, meet it, ſeeke it;
No torture but ile laugh upon't, and kiſſe it.
1 Lord. This is no way.
2 Lord. They ſay no more for certaine
Then their ſtrong hearts will ſuffer.
Duch. I have bethought me;
No Lords, although I have a Childe offending,
Nature dares not forget ſhe is a Childe ſtill;
Till now I never look'd on love imperious:
I have bethought me of a way to breake ye,
To ſeparate, though not your loves your bodies:
Silvio attend, ile be your Judge my ſelfe now,
The ſentence of your death (becauſe my Daughter
Will beare an equall part in your afflictions)
I take away and pardon: this remaines then
An eaſie, and a gentle puniſhment,
And this ſhall be fulfill'd: becauſe unnobly
You have ſought the love, and marriage of a Princeſſe,
The abſolute and ſole Heire of this Dukedome,
By that meanes as we muſt imagine ſtrongly,
To plant your ſelfe into this Rule hereafter,
We here pronounce ye a man baniſh'd from us.
Sil. For ever baniſh'd Lady?
Duch. Yet more mercy,
But for a yeare: and then againe in this place
To make your full appearance: yet more pitty,
If in that time you can abſolve a queſtion,
Writ down within this ſcrowle, abſolve it rightly,

This

This Lady is your wife, and ſhall live with ye;
If not, you looſe your head.
Sil. I take this honour,
And humbly kiſſe thoſe Royall hands.
Duch. Receive it: Bartello, to your old guard take the Princeſſe,
And ſo the Court break up.
Sil. Farewell to all,
And to that ſpotleſſe heart my endleſſe ſervice. Exit.
1. Lord. What will this prove?
2. Lord. Ile tell you a yeare hence, Sir. Exeunt.

Scena Sexta.

Enter Penurio, Iſabella, Claudio.

Pen. Are you pleas'd now? have I not wrought this wonder Nun eben fatto Signiour.
Cla. Rarely Penurio.
Pen. Cloſe, cloſe then, and work wax.
Cla. I am ſtudying for thee
A dinner, that ſhall victuall thee for ten yeare.
Pen. Do you heare Miſtris?
You know what a dundier whelp my Maſter is,
I need not preach to ye, how unfit and wanting
To give a woman ſatisfaction:
How he ſtinks, and ſnores, a Bull's a better bed-fellow;
And for his love never let that deceive ye.
Iſab. Nay ſure he loves me not.
Pen. If he could coyne ye,
Or turne ye into mettle much might be then;
He loves not any thing but what is traffique:
I have heard him ſweare he would ſell ye to the grand Signior.
Iſab. The Turk.
Pen. The very Turke, and how they would uſe ye.
Iſab. Ile fit him fort: the Turke?
Pen. I know the price too:
Now ye have time to pay him, pay him home Miſtris;
Pay him o'th pate, clout him for all his curteſies;
Here's one that daunces in your eyes, young delicate
To work this vengeance; if ye let it ſlip now,
There is no pittying of ye, od's precious, Miſtris,
Were I his wife, I would ſo mall his Mazard,
'Tis charity, meere charity, pure charity,
Are you the firſt? has it not been from Eves time,
Women would have their ſafe revenges this way?
And good, and gracious women, excellent women;
Is't not a handſome Gentleman? a ſweet Gentleman?
View him from head to foot, a compleat Gentleman;
When can ye hope the like againe? I leave ye,
And my revenge too, with ye; I know my Office,
Ile not be farre off, be not long a fumbling,
When danger ſhall appeare, Ile give the larme. Exit.
Iſab. You are welcome Sir, and would it were my fortune
To afford a Gentleman of your faire ſeeming,
A freer entertainment then this houſe has,
You partly know Sir.——
Cla. Know, and pitty Lady,
Such ſweetneſſe in the bud, ſhould be ſo blaſted;
Dare you make me your Servant?
Iſab. Dare you make Sir,
That ſervice worthy of a womans favour
By conſtancy and goodneſſe?
Cla. Here I ſweare to ye,
By the unvalued love I beare this beauty,
(And kiſſe the Book too) never to be recreant,
To honour ye, to truly love, and ſerve ye,
My youth to wait upon ye, what my wealth has.
Iſab. O make me not ſo poore, to ſell affection,
Thoſe bought love's Sir, weare faſter then the moneys;
A handſome Gentleman.
Cla. A moſt delicate ſweet one,
Let my truth Purchaſe then.
Iſab. I ſhould firſt try it,
But you may happily.——
Cla. You ſhall not doubt me,
I hope ſhe loves me; when I prove falſe ſhame take me;
Will ye believe a little?
Iſab. I feare, too much, Sir.
Cla. And will ye love a little?
Iſab. That ſhould be your part.
Cla. Thus I begin then, thus and thus.
Iſab. A good beginning,
We have a Proverbe ſaies, makes a good ending.
Cla. Say ye ſo? 'tis well infer'd.
Iſab. Good Sir, your patience:
Me thinks I have ventur'd now, like a weak Bark
Upon a broken billow, that will ſwallow me,
Upon a rough ſea of ſuſpitions,
Stuck round with iealous rocks.
Pen. within. A hem, a hem there.
Iſab. This is my man; my feares too ſoone have found me,
Enter Penurio.
Now what's the newes?
Pen. A pox of yonder old Rigell,
The Captaine, the old Captaine.
Iſab. What old Captaine?
Pen. Captaine couragious yonder of the Caſtle,
Iſab. Where is he?
Pen. He's comming in:
'Twould vex the Divell, that ſuch an old Potgun as this,
That can make no ſport, ſhould hinder them that can do it.
Iſab. I would not have him ſee the Gentleman
For all the world, my credit were undone then.
Pen. Shall I fling a piſſe-pot on's head as he comes in,
And take him into'th Kitchin, there to dry him.
Iſab. That will not do; and he is ſo humerous too
He will come in.
Cla. What is he?
Iſab. One much troubles me.
Pen. And can do nothing, cannot eat.
Iſab. Your ſight now,
Out of a driveling dotage he beares to me,
May make him tell my husband, and undo me.
Cla. What would ye have me do?
Iſab. But for a while Sir,
Step here behind this hanging, preſently
I'le anſwer him, and then.——
Cla. I will obey ye.

Enter Bartello.

Bar. Where's my rich Jeweller? I have ſtones to ſet.
Pen. He is abroad, and ſure Sir.
Bart. Ther's for your ſervice:
Whe's the faire Lady? all alone ſweet beauty?
Iſab. She's never much alone Sir, that's acquainted With ſuch companions as good honeſt thoughts are.
Bar. Ile ſit down by thee, and ile kiſſe thy hand too,
And in thine eare ſweare by my life I love thee.
Iſab. Ye are a merry Captaine.
Bar. And a mad one, Lady;
By th' mas thou haſt goodly eyes, excellent eyes, wench,
Ye twinkling rogue, look what thy Captain brings thee,
Thou muſt needs love me, love me heartily,
Hug me, and love me, hug me cloſe.
Iſab. Fye Captaine.
Bar. Nay, I have ſtrength, and I can ſtraine ye ſirrah,
And vault into my ſeat as nimbly, little one.
As any of your ſmooth chinn'd boyes in Florence,
I muſt needs commit a little folly with ye,

Ile

Ile not be long, a brideling caſe, and away wench;
The hobnaile thy husband's as fitly out o'th way now.
Iſab. Do you think he keeps a bawdy houſe?
Bar. That's all one.
Iſab. Or did you ever ſee that lightneſſe in my carriage,
That you might promiſe to your ſelf ——
Bar. Away foole,
A good turn's a good turne; I am an honeſt fellow.
Iſab. You have a handſome wife, a vertuous Gentlewo-Bar. They are not for this time o'th yeer. (man.
Iſab. A Lady,
That ever bore that great reſpect to you,
That noble conſtancy.
Bar. That's more then I know.

Enter Maid, and Penurio.

Maid. O Miſtris, ye are undone, my Maſter's coming.
Pen. Coming hard by here.
Bar. Plague Conſume the Raſcall,
Shall I make petty-patties of him?
Iſab. Now what love Sir?
Feare of your comming made him jealous firſt;
Your finding here, will make him mad and deſperate,
And what in that wilde mood he will execute——
Bar. I can think of nothing, I have no wit left me,
Certaine my heads a muſtard-pot.
Iſab. I have thought Sir,
And if you'l pleaſe to put in execution
What I conceive——
Bar. I'le do it, tell it quickly.
Iſab. Draw your Sword quickly, and go down inrag'd,
As if you had purſu'd ſome foe up hither,
And grumble to your ſelf extremely, terribly,
But not a word to him, and ſo paſſe by him.
Bar. Ile do it perfectly.

Enter Lopez.

Iſab. Stand you ſtill good Sir.
Bar. Raſcall, ſlave, villaine, take a houſe ſo poorely,
After thou haſt wrong'd a Gentleman, a Souldier,
Baſe Poultroon boy, you will forſake your neaſt ſirrah.
Lop. The matter, good ſweet Captain?
Bar. Run-away rogue,
And take a houſe to cover thy baſe cowardize, Ile whip ye, Ile ſo ſcourge ye. (Exit.
Lop. Mercy upon me,
What's all this matter wife?
Iſab. Did you meet the mad man?
Lop. I never ſaw the Captain ſo provok't yet.
Iſab. O he's a Devill ſure, a moſt bloody devill,
He follow'd a young Gentleman, his ſword drawne,
With ſuch a fury, how I ſhake to think on't,
And foyn'd, and ſlaſh't at him, and ſwore he'd kill him,
Drove him up hither, follow'd him ſtill bloodily,
And if I had not hid him, ſure had ſlaine him;
A mercileſſe old man.
Cla. Moſt vertuous Lady,
Even as the giver of my life, I thank ye.
Lop. This fellow muſt not ſtay here, he is too handſom;
He is gone Sir, and you may paſſe now with all ſecurity,
Ile be your guide my ſelfe, and ſuch a way
Ile lead ye, none ſhall croſſe, nor none ſhall know ye.
The doore's left open Sirrah, ile ſtarve you for this trick,
Ile make thee faſt o' Sondayes; and for you Lady,
Ile have your lodgings farther off, and cloſer,
Ile have no ſtreet lights to you; will you go Sir?
Cla. I thank ye Sir; the Devill take this fortune;
And once more all my ſervice to your goodneſſe. Exit.
Pen. Now could I eat my very arms for madneſſe, Croſſ'd in the nick o'th matter? vengeance take it,
And that old Cavalier that ſpoil'd our Cock-fight;
Ile lay the next plot ſurer.
Iſab. I am glad and ſorry;
Glad, that I got ſo fairely off ſuſpition;
Sorry I loſt my new lov'd friend.
Pen. Not loſt Miſtris;
Ile conjure once againe to raiſe that ſpirit;
In, and looke ſoberly upon the matter,
Wee'l ring him one peale more, and if that fall,
The Devill take the clappers, bells, and all. Exeunt

Actus Tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Ducheſſe, Lords, and Rodope,

Duch. NOw, Rhodope, How do you finde my daughter?
Rho. Madam, I finde her now what you would have her,
What the State wiſhes her; I urg'd her fault to her,
Open'd her eyes, and made her ſee the miſchiefe
She was running with a headlong will into,
Made her ſtart at her folly, ſhake and tremble,
At the meere memory of ſuch an ignorance,
She now contemnes his love, hates his remembrance,
Cannot endure to heare the name of Silvia;
His perſon ſpits at.
Duch. I am glad to heare this.
Rho. And humbly now to your will, your care, Madam,
Bends her affections, bowes her beſt obedience;
Syenna Duke, with new eyes now ſhe looks on,
And with a Princely love, fit for his perſon, Returnes that happineſſe and joy he look't for;
The generall good of both the neighbour Dukedoms,
Not any private end, or raſh affection
She aims at now: hearing the Duke ariv'd too,
(To whom ſhe owes all honour, and all ſervice,)
She charg'd me kneele thus at your Graces feet,
And not to riſe without a generall pardon.
Duch. She has it, and my love againe, my old love,
And with more tenderneſſe I meet this penitence,
Then if ſhe ne're had ſtarted from her honour;
I thank ye Rhodope, am bound to thank ye,
And dayly to remember this great ſervice,
This honeſt faithfull ſervice; go in peace,
And by this Ring, delivered to Bartello,
Let her enjoy our favour, and her liberty,
And preſently to this place, with all honour,
See her conducted.
Rho. Your Grace has made me happy. Exit.

Enter 1 Lord.

1 Lord. Syenna noble Duke, craves his admittance.

Enter Duke of Syenna with Attendants.

Duch. Go, wait upon his Grace; fair Sir, you are welcome,
Welcome to her ever admir'd your vertues:
And now, me thinks, my Court looks true nobly;
You have taken too much pains, Sir.
Syen. Royall Lady,
To wait upon your Grace is but my ſervice.
Duch. Keep that Sir, for the Saint ye have vow'd it to.
Syen. I keep a life for her: Since your Grace pleaſes
To jump ſo happily into the matter,
I come indeed to claime your royall promiſe,

The

The beauteous Belvidere in marriage,
I come to tender her my youth, my fortune,
My everlasting love.
Enter Belvidere, Bartello, Rhodope, attendance.
Duch. You are like to win Sir:
All is forgot, forgiven too; no sadnesse
My good Childe, you have the same heart still here,
The Duke of Syenna, Childe, pray use him nobly.
Sy. An Angell beauty.
Bel. Your Grace is fairely welcome,
And what in modesty a blushing maid may Wish to a Gentleman of your great goodnesse;
But wishes are too poore a pay for Princes.
Sy. You have made me richer then all States and Titles,
One kisse of this white hand's above all honours,
My faith deare Lady, and my fruitfull service,
My duteous zeale——
Bel. Your Grace is a great Master,
And speake too powerfully to be resisted:
Once more you are welcome Sir, to me you are welcome,
To her that honours ye; I could say more Sir,
But in anothers tongue 'twere better spoken,
Sy. As wise as faire, you have made your Servant happy;
I never saw so rich a Mine of sweetnesse.
Duch. Will your Grace please, after your painfull journy
To take some rest? Are the Dukes Lodgings ready?
Lord. All Madam.
Duch. Then wait upon his Grace, all, and to morrow Sir
We'l shew ye in what high esteeme we hold ye,
Till then a faire repose.
Sy. My fairest service Exit Duke, &c.
Duch. You have so honour'd me, my dearest Daughter,
So truly pleas'd me in this entertainment,
I meane your loving carriage to Syenna,
That both for ever I forget all trespasses,
And to secure you next of my full favour,
Aske what you will within my power to grant ye,
Aske freely: and if I forget my promise——
Aske confidently.
Bel. You are too royall to me,
To me that have so foolishly transgress'd you,
So like a Girle, so far forgot my vertue,
Which now appeares as base and ugly to me,
As did his Dream, that thought he was in Paradice, Awak'd and saw the Devill; how was I wander'd? (thing,
With what eyes could I look upon that poore, that course
That wretched thing call'd Silvio? that (now) despis'd
And lose an object of that gracefull sweetnesse; thing?
That god-like presence as Syenna is?
Darknesse, and cheerfull day had not such difference:
But I must ever blesse your care, your wisedome,
That led me from this labirinth of folly,
How had I sunk else? what example given?
Duch. Prethee no more, and as thou art my best one,
Aske something that may equall such a goodnesse.
Bel. Why did ye let him go so slightly from ye,
More like a man in triumph, then condemn'd?
Why did ye make his pennance but a question,
A riddle, every Idle wit unlocke,
Duch. 'Tis not so,
Nor do not feare it so: he will not finde it,
I have given that (unlesse my selfe discover it)
Will cost his head.
Bel. 'Tis subject to construction?
Duch. That it is too.
Bel. It may be then absolv'd,
And then are we both scorn'd and laugh'd at, Madam;
Beside the promise you have ty'd upon it,
Which you must never keepe.
Duch. I never meant it.
Bel. For heaven sake let me know it, 'tis my Suit to ye,
The Boone you would have me aske; let me but see it,
That if there be a way to make't so strong,
No wit nor powerfull reason can run through it,
For my disgrace, I may beg of heaven to grant it.
Duch. Feare not, it has been put to sharper judgements
Then ere he shall arrive at: my deare Father,
That was as fiery in his understanding,
And ready in his wit as any living,
Had it two yeares, and studied it, yet lost it:
This night ye are my Bed-fellow, there Daughter
Into your bosome ile commit this secret,
And there we'l both take counsell.
Bel. I shall finde
Some trick I hope too strong yet for his minde. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Penurio.

Pen. Methinks I am batten'd well of late, growne lusty,
Fat, high, and kicking, thankes to the bounteous Ragio;
And now, methinkes I scorne these poore repasts,
Cheese parings, and the stinking tonguer of Pilchers;
But why should I remember these? they are odious,
They are odious in mine eyes; the full fat dish now,
The bearing dish is that I reverence,
The dish an able Serving-man sweats under,
And bends ith' hams, as if the house hung on him,
That dish is the dish: hang your bladder Bankets,
Or halfe a dozen of Turnop, and two Mushrumps,
These when they breed their best, hatch but two Belches;
The state of a fat Turkey, the decorum
He marches in with, all the traine and circumstance;
'Tis such a matter, such a glorious matter;
And then his sauce, with Orenges and Onions,
And he display'd in all parts, for such a dish now,
And at my need I would betray my father,
And for a roasted Conger, all my Country.
Enter Bartello. (Mistris?
Bar. What my friend Lean-gut, how do's thy beauteous
And where's your Master Sirra? where's that horn-pipe?
Pen. My Mistris Sir, do's as a poore wrong'd Gentlewo-
Too much heaven knows oppress with injuries, (man,
May do and live.
Bar. Is the old foole still jealous?
Pen. As old fooles are, and will be still the same Sir.
Bar. He must have cause: he must have cause.
Pen. 'Tis true Sir,
And would he had with all my heart.
Bar. He shall have.
Pen. For then he had Salt to his Saffron Porredge.
Bar. Why do not I see thee sometime? why thou starv'd
Why do not ye come to me, you precius bow-case? (rascal?
I keepe good meat at home, good store.
Pen. Yes Sir,
I will not faile ye all next weeke.
Bar. Thou art welcome,
I have a secret I would faine impart to thee,
But thou art so thin the wind will blow it from thee,
Or men will read it through thee.
Pen. Wrapt up in beefe Sir,
In good grosse beefe, let all the world looke on me;
The English have that trick to keep intelligence.
Bar. A witty knave, fast, there's to tye your tongue up,
Pen. Dumbe as a Dog Sir.
Bar. Next, harke in your eare, Sirra.
Pen. Well, very well, excellent well: 'tis done Sir,
Say no more to me.

Bar. Say and hold.
Pen. 'Tis done Sir.
Bar. As thou lov'ſt butter'd eggs, ſweare.
Pen. Let me kiſſe the Booke firſt,
But here's my hand, brave Captaine.
Bar. Looke ye hold, ſirra. Exit.
Pen. O the moſt precious vanity of this world
When ſuch dry Neatſ-tongues muſt be ſok'd and larded
With young fat ſupple wenches? O the Devill,
What can he do, he cannot ſuck an egge off
But his back's looſe ith' hilts: go thy wales Captaine,
Well may thy Warlike name work Miracles,
But if e're thy founder'd cottſer win match more,
Or ſtand right but one traine———

Enter three Gentlemen.

1. Gent. Now Signiour Shadow,
What art thou thinking of, how to rob thy Maſter?
Pen. Of his good deeds? the Thief that undertakes that Muſt have a hook will pose all Hell to hammer:
Have ye dined Gentlemen, or do you purpoſe?
2 Gent. Dined, two long houres ago.
Pen. Pray ye take me with ye.
3 Gent. To ſupper do'ſt thou meane?
Pen. To any thing
That has the ſhuall of meat in't: tell me true, Gentlemen,
Are not you three now going to be ſinfull,
To jeabard a joynt, or ſo? I have found your faces,
And ſee whore written in your eyes.
1 Gent. A parlous Raſcall,
Thou are much upon the matter.
Pen. Have a care Gentlemen,
'Tis a ſore age, very ſore age, lewd age,
And women now are like old Knights adventures,
Full of inchanted flames, and dangerous.
2 Gent, Where the moſt danger is, there's moſt honour.
Pen. I grant ye, honour moſt conſiſts in ſufferance,
And by that rule you three ſhould be moſt honourable.
3 Gent. A ſubtle Rogue: but canſt thou tell Penurio
Where we might light upon——— Pen. A learned Surgeon? (wenches.
3 Gent. Pox take ye foole; I meane good wholſome
Pen. 'Faith wholſome women will but ſpoyle ye too,
For you are ſo us'd to ſnap-haunces: But take my counſell,
Take fat old women, fat, and five and fifty,
The Dog-dayes are come in.
2 Gent. Take fat old women?
Pen. The fatter and the older, ſtill the better,
You do not know the pleaſure of an old Dame,
A fat old Dame, you do not know the knack on't:
They are like our Country grotes, as coole as Chriſtmas,
And ſure ith' keeles.
1 Gent. Hang him ſtarv'd foole, he mocks us.
3. Gent. Penurio, thou know'ſt all the handſome wenches?
What ſhall I give thee for a Merchants wife now?
Pen. I take no money Gentlemen, that's baſe,
I trade in meat, a Merchants wife will coſt ye
A glorious Capon, a great ſhoulder of Mutton,
And a Tart as big as a Conjurers circle.
3 Gent. That's cheap enough.
1 Gent. And what a Haberdaſhers?
Pen. Worſe meat will ſerve for her: a great Gooſe Pye,
But you muſt ſend it out oth' Country to me,
It will not do elſe: with a piece of Bacon,
And if you can a pot of Butter with it.
2 Gent. Now do I ayme at horſe-fleſh: what a Parſone?
Pen. A tithe Pig has no fellow, if I fetch her,
If ſhe be Purſeane, Plumb-porridge do's it,
And a fat loyne of Veale well ſawc'd and roſted.
2 Gent. Wee'l meet one night, and thou ſhalt have all
O' that condition we may have the wenches, (theſe,
A dainty raſcall.
Pen. When your ſtomacks ſerve ye,
(For mine is ever ready) Ile ſupply ye.
1 Gent. Farewell, and there's to fill thy paunch.
Pen. Brave Gentleman.
2 Gent. Hold ſirrah, there.
Pen. Any young wench ith' Towne Sir.
3 Gent. It ſhall go round. Exit Gent.
Pen. Moſt honourable Gentlemen,
All theſe are Courtiers, but they are meere Coxcombs,
And only for a wench, their purſes open,
Nor have they ſo much judgement left to chuſe her;
If e're they call upon me Ile ſo fit 'em,
I have a pack of wry-mouth'd mackrell Ladies,
Stinke like a ſtanding ditch, and thoſe deare Damſels;
But I forgot my buſineſſe, I thank ye Mounſieurs,
I have a thouſand whimſies in my braines now. Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter (to a Banket) Duches, Sycinus, Lords, Attendants.

Duch. Your Grace ſhall now perceive how much we ho-
And in what deare regard we hold your friendſhip (nor ye
Will you ſit Sir, and grace this homely Banquet?
Sy. Madam, to your poor friend you are too magnificent.
Duc. To the Dukes health, and all the joyes I wiſh him,
Let no man miſſe this cup: have we no Muſick?
Sy. Your noble favours ſtill you heap upon me,
But where's my vertuous Miſtris, ſuch a Feaſt,
And not her ſparkling beauty here to bleſſe it?
Me thinkes it ſhould not be, it ſhewes not fully.
Duch. Young Ladies Sir, are long, and curious
In putting on their trims, forget how day goes,
And then 'tis their good morrow when they are ready:
Go ſome and call her, and wait upon her hither,
Tell her the Duke and I deſire her company:
I warrant ye, a hundred dreſſings now
She has ſurvey'd, this, and that faſhion look'd on,
For Ruffs and Gowns; caſt this away, theſe Jewels
Suited to theſe and theſe knots: o' my life Sir,
She feares your curious eye will ſoone diſcover elſe:
Why ſtand ye ſtill, why gape ye on one another?
Did I not bid ye go and tell my Daughter?
Are ye nayled here? nor ſtir? nor ſpeake? who am I,
And who are you?
1 Lord. Pardon me, gracious Lady,
The feare to tell you that you would not hear of Makes us all dumb, the Princeſſe is gone, Madam.
Duch. Gone? whither gone? ſome wiſer fellow anſwer me.
2 Lord. We ſought the Court all over, and beleeve Lady,
No newes of where ſhe is, nor how convey'd hence.
Duch. It cannot be, it muſt not be.
1 Lord. 'Tis true Madam,
No roome in all the Court but we ſearch'd through it,
Her women found her want firſt, and they cry'd to us.
Duch. Gone? ſtolne away? I am abus'd, diſhonour'd.
Sy. 'Tis I that am abus'd, 'tis I diſhonour'd,
Is this your welcome, this your favour to me?
To foyſt a trick upon me, this trick too,
To cheat me of my love? Am I not worthy?
Or ſince I was your Gueſt, am I growne odious?
Duch. Your Grace miſtakes me, as I h.ve a life, Sir.
Sy. And I another, I will never beare this,
Never endure this dor.
Duch. But heare me patiently.
Sy. Give me my love.
Duch. As ſoone as care can finde her,
And all care ſhall be uſed.

Sy.

Sy. And all my care too,
To be reveng'd; I ſmell the trick, 'tis too ranke,
Fie, how it ſmells oth' Mother.
Duch. You u rong me, Duke.
Sy. For this diſgrace ten thouſand Florentines
Shall pay their deareſt bloods, and dying curſe ye,
And ſo I turne away, your mortall enemy. Exit.
Duc. Since ye are ſo high and hot Sir, ye have half arm'd us,
Be carefull of the Towne, of all the Caſtles,
And ſee ſupplyes of Souldiers every where,
And Muſters for the Field, when he invites us,
For he ſhall know 'tis not high words can fright us.
My Daughter gone? has ſhe ſo finely cozen'd me?
This is for Silvio's ſake ſure, O cunning falſe one;
Publiſh a Proclamation thorough the Dukedome,
That whoſoe're can bring toth' Court young Silvio,
Alive or dead, beſide our thankes and favour,
Shall have two thouſand Duckets for his labour;
See it diſpatch'd, and ſent in haſte: O baſe one. Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Iſabella, and Penurio with a Light.

Iſab. Was't thou with Rugio?
Pen. Yes marry was I cloſely.
Iſab. And do's he ſtill remember his poore Miſtris?
Do's he deſire to ſee me?
Pen. Yes, and preſently:
Puts off all buſineſſe elſe, lives in that memory,
And will be here according to directions.
Iſab. But where's thy Maſter?
Pen. Where a coxcombe ſhould be,
Waiting at Court with his Jewells,
Safe for this night I warrant ye.
Iſab. I am bound to thee.
Pen. I would ye were; as cloſe as I could tye ye,
Iſab. Thou art my beſt, my trueſt friend.
Pen. I labour,
I moyle and toyle for ye: I am your hackney.
Iſab. If ever I be able——
Pen. Steale the great Cheeſe Miſtris,
Was ſent him out oth' Country.
Iſab. Any thing.
Pen. That's meat, 'tis lawfull Miſtris: where's the Caſtle (Cuſtard
He got at Court?
Iſab. He has lock't it in's ſtudy.
Pen. Get a warrant to ſearch for counterfeit gold.
Iſab. Give me thy Candle,
Ile finde a time to be thy carefull Cater.
Pen. And many a time Ile finde to be his Cook,
And dreſſe his Calves head to the ſweeteſt ſauce Miſtris.
Iſab. To bed Penurio, go, the reſt is my charge,
Ile keep the Watch out.
Pen. Now if you ſpare him—— Exit.
Iſab. Peace foole,
I hope my Rugio will not faile, 'twould vexe me:
Now to my ſtring; ſo, ſure he cannot miſſe now,
And this end to my finger: ile lye downe,
For on a ſuddaine I am wondrous heavy,
'Tis very late too; if he come, and finde this,
And pull it, though it be with eaſie motion
I ſhall ſoone waken, and as ſoone be with him.

Enter Lopez.

Lop. Thou ſecret friend, how am I bound to love thee,
And how to hug thee for thy private ſervice?
Thou art the Star all my ſuſpitions ſaile by,
The fixed point my wronged honour turnes to;
By thee I ſhall know all, finde all the ſubtilties
Of devilliſh women, that torment me daily:
Thou art my Conjurer, my Spell, my Spirit,
All's huſh'd and ſtill, no ſound of any ſtirring,
No tread of living thing: the Light is in ſtill,
And there's my Wife, how prettily the foole lyes,
How ſweet, and handſomely, and in her clothes too,
Waiting for me upon my life; her fondneſſe
Would not admit her reſt till I came to her:
O carefull foole, why am I angry with thee?
Why do I think thou hat'ſt thy loving Husband?
I am an Aſſe, an over-doating Coxcombe,
And this ſweet ſoule the mirrour of perfection:
How admirable faire and delicate,
And how it ſtirs me, Ile ſing thy ſweets a Requiem,
But will not waken thee.

Song.

O Faire ſweet face, O eyes celeſtiall bright,
Twin-ſtars in Heaven that now adorn the night;
O fruitfull lips, where Cherries ever grow,
And Damaſk cheeks, where all ſweet beauties blow;
O thou from head to foot divinely faire,
Cupids moſt cunning Nets made of that haire,
And as he weaves himſelfe for curious eyes,
O me, O me, I am caught my ſelfe, he eyes:
Sweet reſt about this ſweets and golden ſleepe,
Soft peacefull thoughts your howrely watches keepe,
Whilſt I in wonder ſing this ſacrifice,
To beauty ſacred, and thoſe Angell-eyes.

Now will I ſteale a kiſſe, a deare kiſſe from her,
And ſuck the Roſie breath of this bright beauty;
What a Devill is this? ty'd to her finger too?
A ſtring, a damned ſtring to give intelligence
O my lov'd key, how truly has't thou ſerv'd me;
Ile follow this: ſoft, ſoft, toth' doore it goes,
And through toth' other ſide; a damned ſtring 'tis,
I am abus'd, topt, Cuckolded, fooled, jaded,
Ridden to death, to madneſſe; ſtay, this helps not:
Stay, ſtay, and now invention help me,
Ile ſit downe by her, take this from her eaſily,
And thus upon mine owne: Dog, I ſhall catch ye,
With all your cunning Sir: I ſhall light on ye,
I felt it pull ſure: yes, but wondrous ſoftly,
'Tis there againe, and harder now, have at ye:
Now and thou ſcap'ſt, the Devills thy ghoſtly father. Exit.
Iſab. Sure 'twas my Husbands voyce: The ſtring is gone
He has found the trick on't: I am undone, betray'd, (to,
And if he meet my friend he periſhes,
What fortune followes me, what ſpightfull fortune?
Hoa, Jaquenet.

Enter Jaquenet.

Jaq. Here Miſtris, do you call me?
Iſab. Didſt thou heare no noiſe?
Jaq. I heare my Maſter mad yonder,
And ſweares, and chafes——
Iſab. Dar'ſt thou do one thing for me?
One thing concernes mine honour, all is loſt elſe?
Jaq. Name what you will.
Iſab. It can bring but a beating,
Which I will recompence ſo largely——
Jaq. Name it.
Iſab. Sit here, as if thou wert aſleep.
Jaq. Is that all?
Iſab. When he comes in, what e're he do unto thee
(The worſt will be but beating) ſpeak not a word,
Not one word as thou loveſt me.
Jaq. Ile run through it.
Iſab. Ile carry away the Candle. Exit.
Jaq. And I the blowes Miſtris.

Enter Lopez.

Lop. Have you put your light out? I ſhall ſtumble to ye,
You whore, you cunning whore, I ſhal catch your rogue to,
Has light leggs elſe: I had ſo Ferret-claw'd him:
O have I found ye? do ye play at dog-ſleep ſtill whore?
Do you think that can protect ye? yes, I will kill thee,
But firſt ile bring thy friends to view thy villanies,
Thy whoriſh villanies: and firſt ile beat thee,
Beat thee to pin-duſt, thou ſalt whore, thou varlet,
Scratch out thine eyes; ile ſpoile your tempting viſage;
Are ye ſo patient? ile put my nayles in deeper,
Is it good whoring? whoring ye baſe raſcall?
Is it good tempting men with ſtrings to ride ye?
So, ile fetch your kindred, and your friends, whore,
And ſuch a Juſtice I will act upon thee. Exit.

Enter Iſabella.

Iſab. What is he gone?
Jaq. The Devill go with him Miſtris,
Has harrowed me, plow'd land was ne're ſó harrowed:
I had the moſt ado to ſave mine eyes.
Iſab. Has paid thee,
But ile heale all againe with good gold Jaquenet;
Has damned nayles.
Jaq. They are ten-penny nayles I think Miſtris:
Ile undertake he ſhall ſtrike 'em through an inch board.
Iſab. Go up, and waſh thy ſelfe: take my Pomatum,
And now let me alone to end the Tragedy.
Jaq. You had beſt beware.
Iſab. I ſhall deale ſtoutly with him,
Reach me my book, and ſee the doore made faſt wench,
And ſo good night: now to the matter politick.

Lopez knocks within.

Lop. within You ſhall ſee what ſhe is, what a ſweet jewell.
Iſab. Who's there, what mad-man knocks? is this an hower
And in mine husbands abſence?
Lop. within. Will ye open?
You know my voyce ye whore, I am that husband:
Do you mark her ſubtlety? but I have paid her,
I have ſo ferk'd her face: here's the blood Gentlemen,
Ecce ſignum: I have ſpoyl'd her Goatiſh beauty,
Obſerve her how ſhe lookes now, how ſhe is painted,
O 'tis the moſt wicked'ſt whore, and the moſt treacherous-

Enter Lopez, Bartello, Gent. and two Gentlewomen.

Gent. Here walkes my Couſen full of meditation,
Arm'd with religious thoughts.
Bar. Is this the monſter?
1 Gentlew. Is this the ſubject of that rage you talk't of,
That naughty woman you had pull'd a peeces?
Bar. Here's no ſuch thing.
1. Gentlew. How have ye wrong'd this beauty?
Are not you mad my friend? what time o'th Moon is't?
Have not you Maggots in your braines?
Lop. 'Tis ſhe ſure.
Gent. Where's the ſcratch'd face ye ſpoke of, the torne garments,
And all the haire pluck'd off her head?
Bar. Beleeve me,
'Twere better far you had loſt your paire of pibbles,
Then ſhe the leaſt adornment of that ſweetneſſe.
Lop. Is not this blood?
1 Gentlew. This is a monſtrous folly,
A baſe abuſe.
Iſab. Thus he do's ever uſe me,
And ſtickes me up a wonder, not a woman,
Nothing I do but ſubject to ſuſpition;
Nothing I can do able to content him.
Bar. Lopez, you muſt not uſe this.
2 Gentlew. 'Twere not amiſſe Sir,
To give ye ſauce to your meat, and ſuddainly.
1 Gentlew. You that dare wrong a woman of her goodneſſe,
Thou have a wife, thou have a Beare ty'd to thee,
To ſcratch thy jealous itch, were all o' my minde,
I meane all women, we would ſoone diſburthen ye
Of that that breeds theſe fits, theſe dog-ſlawes in ye,
A Sow-guelder ſhould trim ye.
Bar. A rare cure Lady,
And one as fit for him as a Thief for a halter,
You ſee this youth: will you not cry him quittance,
Body 'me, I would pine, but I would pepper him,
Ile come anon, he, hang him, poore pompillion:
How like a wench bepitt he lookes, ile come Lady:
Lopez, the Law muſt teach ye what a wife is,
A good, a vertuous wife.
Iſab. Ile ne're live with him,
I crave your loves all to make knowne my cauſe,
That ſo a faire Divorce may paſſe between us,
I am weary of my life: in danger hourely.
Bar. You ſee how rude you are, I will not miſſe ye,
Unſufferable rude: ile pay him ſoundly,
You ſhould be whipt in Bedlam: ile reward him.
2 Gentlew. Whipping's too good.
Lop. I think I am alive ſtill,
And in my wits.
Bar. Ile put a trick upon him,
And get his goods Confiſcate: you ſhall have 'em;
I will not faile at nine.
Lop. I think I am here too,
And once I would have ſworn I had taken her napping,
I think my name is Lopez.
Gent. Fie for ſhame Sir,
You ſee you have abus'd her, foulely wrong'd her,
Hung ſcandalous and courſe opinions on her,
Which now you finde but children of ſuſpition:
Aske her forgiveneſſe, ſhew a penitence,
She is my Kinſ-woman, and what ſhe ſuffers
Under ſo baſe and beaſtly jealouſies,
I will redreſſe elſe, ile ſeeke ſatisfaction.
Bar. Why, every Boy ith' Towne will piſſe upon thee.
Lop. I am ſorry for't.
1 Gentlew. Downe o' your marrow-bones.
Lop. Even ſorry from my heart: forgive me ſweet wife,
Here I confeſſe moſt freely I have wrong'd ye,
As freely here I beg a pardon of ye,
From this hower no debate, no croſſe ſuſpition——
Iſab. To ſhew ye Sir I underſtand a wives part,
Thus I aſſure my love, and ſeale your pardon.
2 Gentlew. 'Tis well done, now to bed and there confirm it.
Gent. And ſo good night.
Bar. Aware relapſes, Lopez. Exeunt.
Lop. Now Iſabella tell me truth, and ſuddainly,
And do not juggle with me, nor diſſemble,
For as I have a life ye dye then: I am not mad,
Nor do's the Devill work upon my weakneſſe,
Tell me the trick of this, and tell me freely.
Iſab. Will then that ſatisfie ye?
Lop. If ye deale ingenuouſly.
Iſab. Ile tell ye all, and tell ye true and freely,
Bartello was the end of all this jealouſie,
His often viſitations brought by you, firſt
Bred all theſe fits, and theſe ſuſpicions:
I knew your falſe key, and accordingly
I fram'd my plot, to have him take him finely,
Too poore a pennance for the wrong his wife beares,
His worthy vertuous wife: I felt it ſenſibly
When ye tooke off the ſtring, and was much pleas'd in't, Becauſe I wiſh'd his importunate dotage paid well,

And

And had you ſtaid two minutes more, ye had had him.
Lop. This ſounds like truth.
Iſab. Becauſe this ſhall be certaine,
Next time he comes, as long he cannot tarry,
Your ſelf ſhall ſee, and heare, his lew'd temptations.
Lop. Till then I am ſatisfied, and if this prove true,
Henceforward Miſtris of your ſelf I give ye,
And I to ſerve ye: For my luſty Captaine,
Ile make him daunce, and make him think the Devill
Clawes at his breech, and yet I will not hurt him:
Come now to bed, and prove but conſtant this way,
Ile prove the man you ever wiſhed.
Iſab. You have bleſt me. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Silvio.

Sil. WHat labour and what travell have I runne
Through?
And through what Cities to abſolve this Riddle?
Diviners, Dreamers, Schoolemen, deep Magitians,
All have I tride, and all give ſeverall meanings,
And from all hope of any future happineſſe,
To this place am I come at length, the country,
The people ſimple, plaine, and harmleſſe witty,
Whoſe honeſt labours Heaven rewards with plenty
Of Corne, Wine, Oyle, which they againe, as thankfull,
To their new Croppe, new paſtimes celebrate,
And crowne their joyfull harveſts with new voyces;
By a rich farmer here I am entertain'd,
And rank't among the number of his Servants,
Not gueſſing what I am, but what he would have me,
Here may be ſo much wit (though much I feare it)
To undo this knotty queſtion; and would to Heaven
Enter Soto with a Proclamation.
My fortunes had been hatch'd with theirs, as innocent,
And never knowne a pitch above their plainneſſe.
Soto. That it is, that it is, what's this word now? this Is a plaguy word, that it is, r. e. a. that it is, reaſon,
By your leave, Mr. Soto, by your leave, you are too quick,
Ther's a ſtrange par'lous T. before the reaſon, (Sir,
A very tall T. which makes the word High Treaſon.
Sil. What Treaſon's that? do's this fellow underſtand Himſelfe?
Soto. Pitch will infect, ile meddle no more with this geere;
What a Devill ayles this fellow? this fooliſh fellow,
Being admitted to be one of us too,
That are the maſters of the Sports proceeding,
Thus to appeare, before me too, unmorriſs'd?
Do you know me friend?
Sil. You are my Maſters Son, Sir.
Soto. And do you know what ſports are now in ſeaſon?
Sil. I heare there are ſome a foot.
Soto. Where are your Bells then?
Your Rings, your Ribanes, friend? & your clean Napkins?
Your noſegay in your hat, pinn'd up, am not I here?
My fathers eldeſt Son, and at this time, Sir, (vant,
I would have ye know it, though ye be ten times his ſer-
A better man then my father far, Lord of this Harveſt, Sir,
And ſhall a man of my place want attendance?
Sil. 'Twas want of knowledge, Sir, not duty, bred this,
I would have made ſuit elſe for your Lordſhips ſervice.
Soto. In ſome ſort I am ſatisfied now, mend your maners,
But thou art a melancholly fellow, veng'ance melancholly,
And that may breed a inſurrection amongſt us;
Go too, Ile lay the beſt part of two pots now
Thou art in love, and I can gueſſe with whom too,
I ſaw the wench that twir'd and twinkled at thee,
The other day; the wench that's new come hither,
The young ſmug wench.
Sil. You know more then I feele Sir. (for thee,
Soto. Go too, Ile be thy friend, ile ſpeak a good word
And thou ſhalt have my Lordſhips countenance to her;
May be I have had a ſnap my ſelf, may be I, may be no,
We Lords are allow'd a little more.
Sil. 'Tis fit Sir;
I humbly thank ye, you are too too tender of me,
But what Sir, I beſeech ye, was that paper,
Your Lordſhip was ſo ſtudiouſly imployed in,
When ye came out a doores?
Soto. Thou meaneſt this paper.
Sil. That Sir, I think.
Soto. Why, 'tis a Proclamation,
A notable piece of villany, as ever thou heard'ſt in thy life,
By mine honour it is.
Sil. How Sir? or what concernes it?
Soto. It comes ye from the Ducheſſe, a plaguy wiſe wo-
To apprehend the body of one Silvio, (man,
As arrant a Raſcall as ever piſt againſt poſt,
And this ſame Silvio, or this foreſaid raſcall,
To bring before her, live or dead; for which good ſervice
The man that brings him, has two thouſand Duckets;
Is not this notable matter now?
Sil. 'Tis ſo indeed,
This Proclamation beares my bane about it;
Can no reſt finde me? no private place ſecure me?
But ſtill my miſeries like blood-hounds haunt me?
Unfortunate young man, which way now guides thee, Guides thee from death? the Countrey's laid round for thee;
O Claudio, now I feele thy blood upon me,
Now it ſpeaks lowdly here, I am ſure againſt me,
Time now has found it out, and truth proclam'd it,
And Juſtice now cries out, I muſt die for it.
Soto. Haſt thou read it?
Sil. Yes.
Soto. And doſt thou know that Silvio.
Sil. I never ſaw him, Sir.
Soto. I have, and know him too,
I know him as well as I know thee, and better,
And if I light upon him, for a trick he plaid me once,
A certaine kinde of dog-trick, ile ſo fiddle him,
Two thouſand Duckets, ile ſo pepper him,
And with that money ile turne Gentleman,
Worth a browne Bakers dozen of ſuch Silvio's.
Sil. There is no ſtaying here, this rogue will know me,
And for the money ſake betray me too;
I muſt bethink me ſuddenly and ſafely.
Enter Morriſdancers.
Soto. Mine owne deare Lady, have at thy honey-comb,
Now, for the honour of our Towne, Boyes, trace ſweetly,
Cry within of Arme, Arme.
What a vengeance ayles this whobub? pox refuſe 'em,
Cannot they let us dance in our owne defence here?
Enter Farmer and Captaine.
Capt. Arme, honeſt friends, arme ſuddenly & bravely,
And with your antient reſolutions follow me; (bours
Look how the Beacons ſhow like comets, your poor neigh-Run maddingly affrighted through the Villages;

Symms

Syennas Duke is up, burnes all before him,
And with his ſword, makes thouſand mothers childleſſe,
Soto. What's this to our Morriſdancers?
Sil. This may ſerve my turne. (May-game.
Soto. Theres ne're a Duke in Chriſtendome but loves a Cap. At a Horſe you were alwaies ceaz'd, put your Son on him,
And arme him well i'th States name, I command ye;
And they that dare go voluntary, ſhall receive reward.
Soto. I dare go no way, Sir, this is ſtrange, Maſter Captaine,
You cannot be content to ſpoile our ſport here,
Which I do not think your Worſhip's able to anſwer,
But you muſt ſet us together by the ears, with I know not
We are for the bodily part o'th dance. (who to?
Cap. Arme him ſuddenly,
This is no time to foole, I ſhall returne ye elſe,
A rebell to the Generall, State, and Ducheſſe,
And how you'l anſwer then——
Far. I have no more Sons, Sir,
This is my onely boy; I beſeech ye Maſter Captain.
Soto. I am a rank coward too, to ſay the truth, Sir,
I never had good luck at buffets neither.
Far. Here's vorty ſhillings, ſpare the childe.
Cap. I cannot.
Soto. Are ye a man? will ye caſt away a May-Lord?
Shall all the wenches in the Country curſe ye?
Sil. An't pleaſe you Captaine, ile ſupply his perſon,
'Tis pitty their old cuſtome ſhould be frighted,
Let me have Horſe, and good Armes, ile ſerve willingly,
And if I ſhrink a foot of ground, Hell take me.
Cap. A promiſing aſpect, face full of courage,
Ile take this man, and thank ye too.
Far. Ther's for thee,
'Tis in a clout, but good old gold.
Sil. I thank ye Sir.
Far. Goe ſaddle my fore-horſe, put his feather on too,
Hee'l praunce it bravely, friend, he feares no Colours,
And take the Armour down, and ſee him dizin'd, (ter,
Soto. Farewell, & if thou carrieſt thy ſelf well in this mat-
I ſay no more, but this, there muſt be more May-Lords,
And I know who are fit.
Sil. Dance you, Ile fight, Sir,
Cap. Away, away.
Sil. Farewell, I am for the Captaine. Exit.
Far. Now to this matter againe, my honeſt fellowes,
For if this go not forward, I foreſee friends,
This war will fright our neighbours out o'th villages;
Cheere up your hearts, we ſhall heare better news, boyes.
Hob. Surely, I will daunce no more, 'tis moſt ridiculous,
I finde my wives inſtructions now meere verities,
My learned wives, ſhe often hath pronounc'd to me
My ſafety Bomby, defie theſe ſports, thou art damn'd elſe,
This Beaſt of Babylon, I will never back againe,
His pace is ſure prophane, and his lewd wihies
The Sons of Hymyn, and Gymyn, in the wilderneſſe.
Far. Fie neighbour Bomby, in your fits againe,
Your zeale ſwets, this is not carefull, neighbour,
The Hobby-Horſe, is a ſeemely Hobby-Horſe.
Soto. And as pretty a Beaſt on's inches, though I ſay it.
Hob. The Beaſt is an unſeemely, and a lew'd Beaſt,
And got at Rome by the Popes Coach-Horſes,
His mother was the Mare of ignorance. (lers,
Soto. Cobler, thou lyeſt, and thou wert a thouſand Cob-
His mother was an honeſt Mare, & a Mare of good credit,
I know the Mare, and if need be, can bring witneſſe;
And in the way of honeſty I tell thee,
Scorn'd any Coach-Horſe the Pope had, thou art fooliſh,
And thy blind zeale makes thee abuſe the Beaſt.
Hob. I do defie thee, and thy foot-cloth too,
And tell thee to thy face, this prophaine riding
I feele it in my conſcience, and I dare ſpeake it,
This unedified ambling, hath brought a ſcourge upon us,
This Hobby-horſe ſincerity we liv'd in War, and the ſword of ſlaughter: I renounce it,
And put the Beaſt off; thus, the Beaſt poluted,
And now no more ſhall hope on high Bomby,
Follow the painted Pipes of worldly pleaſures,
And with the wicked daunce the Devills meaſures;
Away thou pamper'd jade of vanity,
Stand at the Livery of lewd delights now,
And eat the provender of prickear'd folly,
My daunce ſhall be to the pipe of perſecution.
Far. Will you daunce no more Neighbour?
Hob. Surely no,
Carry the Beaſt to his Crib: I have renounc'd him,
And all his workes.
Soto. Shall the Hobby-horſe be forgot then?
The hopefull Hobby-horſe? ſhall he lye founder'd?
If thou do'ſt this, thou art but a caſt-away Cobler:
My anger's up, think wiſely, and think quickly,
And look upon the quondam beaſt of pleaſure,
If thou doſt this (mark me, thou ſerious Sowter)
Thou Bench-whiſtler of the old tribe of toe-peeces,
If thou do'ſt this there ſhall be no more Shooe-mending,
Every man ſhall have a ſpeciall care of his owne ſoule:
And in his pocket carry his two Confeſſors,
His Yugell, and his Nawle; if thou do'ſt this——
Far. He will dance againe for certaine.
Hob. I cry out on't,
'Twas the fore-running ſin brought in thoſe Tilt-ſtaves,
They brandiſh 'gainſt the Church, the Devill calls May-Take up your Horſe againe, and girth him to ye, (poles,
And girth him handſomely good neighbour Bomby.
Hob. I ſpit at him.
Soto. Spit in the Horſe face, Cobler?
Thou out of tune-Pſalm-ſinging Slave; ſpit in his viſ-Hob. I ſpit againe, and thus I riſe againſt him: (nomy?
Againſt this Beaſt: that ſignifi'd deſtruction,
Fore-ſhew'd ith' falls of Monarchies.
Soto. Ith' face of him?
Spit ſuch another ſpit, by this hand Cobler
Ile make ye ſet a new peece o' your noſe there,
'Tak't up I ſay, and dance without more bidding,
And dance as you were wont: you have been excellent
And art ſtill, but for this new nicity,
And your wives learned Lectures: take up the Hobby-horſe
Come, 'tis a thing thou haſt lov'd with all thy heart Bomby
And would'ſt do ſtill but for the round-breecht Brothers:
You were not thus in the morning, tak't up I ſay,
Do not delay but do it: you know I am officer,
And I know 'tis unfit all theſe good fellowes
Should wait the cooling of your zealous porridge;
Chuſe whether you will dance, or have me execute:
Ile clap your neck ith' Stocks, and there ile make ye
Dance a whole day, and dance with theſe at night too,
You mend old Shooes well, mend your old manners bet-
And ſuddenly ſee you leave off this ſincereneſſe. (ter,
This new hot batch borrowed from ſome brown Baker,
Some learned Brother, or ile ſo bait ye for't,
Take it quickly up.
Hob. I take my perſecution,
And thus I am forced a by-word to my Brethren.
Soto. Strike up, ſtrike up: ſtrike merrily.
Far. To it roundly,
Now to the harveſt feaſt: then ſport againe Boyes. Exeunt
Scen

Scena Secunda.

Enter Silvio (arm'd.)

Sil. What shall I do? live thus unknown, and base still?
Or thrust my self into the head oth' Battell?
And there, like that I am, a Gentleman,
And one that never fear'd the face of danger,
(So in her angry eyes she carried honour)
Fight nobly, and (to end my cares) dye nobly?

Song within.

SIlvio go on, and raise thy noble minde
To noble ends; fling course base thoughts behinde:
Silvio, thou Sonne of everliving fame,
Now aime at vertue, and a Noble Name.
Silvio consider, Honour is not wonne,
Nor vertue reach't, till some brave thing be done:
Thy Country calls thee now; she burnes, and bleeds,
Now raise thy self, young man, to noble deeds.
Into the Battell Silvio, there seeke forth
Danger, and blood, by them stands fairest worth.

What heavenly voice is this that followes me?
This is the second time 't has waited on me,
Since I was arm'd, and ready for the Battell;
It names me often, steeles my heart with courage,

Enter Belvidere deformed.

And in a thousand sweet notes comforts me;
What Beldom's this? how old she is, and ugly,
Why do's she follow me?

Bel. Be not dismaid, Son,
I wait upon thee, for thy good, and honour,
Twas I that now sung to thee, stir'd thy minde up,
And rais'd thy spirits to the pitch of noblenesse.

Sil. Though she be old, and of a crooked carkasse,
Her voice is like the harmony of Angels.

Bel. Thou art my darling, all my love dwells on thee
The Son of vertue, therefore I attend thee;
Enquire not what I am, I come to serve thee,
For if thou beest inquisitive, thou hast lost me:
A thousand long miles hence my dwelling is,
Deep in a Cave, where but mine owne, no foot treads,
There by mine Art, I found what danger (Silvio)
And deep distresse of heart, thou wert growne into,
A thousand leagues I have cut through empty aire,
Far swifter then the sayling tack that gallops
Upon the wings of angry winds, to seeke thee.
Sometimes 'ore a swelling tide, on a Dolphins back I ride,
Sometimes passe the earth below, and through the unmoved Center go;
Sometimes in a flame of fire, like a Meteor I aspire,
Sometimes in mine own shape, thus, when I helpe the vertuous,
Men of honourable minds, command my Art in all his kinds;
Pursue the noble thought of war, from thy Guard ile not be far,
Get thee worship on thy foe, lasting fame is gotten so.
Single Syrmus Duke alone, heare thy friends, thy Country grone,
And with thy manly arme strike sure, then thou hast wrought thine owne free cure. (vours.

Sil. Some Sybell sure, some soule heaven loves, and fa-
And lends her their free powers, to worke their wonders?
How she incites my courage?

Bel. Silvio,
I knew thee many daies a go,
Foresaw thy love to Belvidere, the Duchesse Daughter, and her Heire; Knew she lov'd thee, and know what past, when you were found i'th Castle fast (Law;
In one anothers armes; foresaw the taking of ye, and the
And so thy innocence I loved, the deepest of my skill I proved;
Be rul'd by me, for to this houre I have dwelt about thee with my powre.

Sil. I will, and in the course of all observe thee,
For thou art sure an Angell good sent to me.

Bel. Get thee gone then to the fight, longer stay but robs thy right;
When thou grow'st weary ile be neere, then think on beauteous Belvidere,
For every precious thought of her, ile lend thine honour a new spurre;
When all is done, meet here at night; Go and be happy in the fight. Exit.

Sil. I certainly believe I shall do nobly,
And that Ile bravely reach at too, or die. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Claudio, and Penurio.

Cla. Is she so loving still?

Pen. She is mad with love,
As mad as ever unworm'd dogge was, Signior,
And do's so weep, and curse, for your prevention,
Your crosses in your love; it frets me too,
I am falne away to nothing, to a spindle,
Growne a meere man of mat, no foule within me,
Pox o' my Master, Sir, will that content ye?

Cla. This rogue but cozens me, and she neglects me,
Upon my life there are some other gamsters,
Neerer the winde then I, and that prevents me,
Is there no other holds acquaintance with her?
Prethee be true, be honest, do not mock me,
Thou knowest her heart, no former interest
She has vow'd a favour to? and cannot handsomly
Go off, but by regaining such a friendship?
There are a thousand handsom men, young, wealthy,
That will not stick at any rate, nor danger,
To gaine so sweet a prize; nor can I blame her,
If where she finds a comfort she deale cunningly,
I am a stranger yet.

Pen. Ye are all she looks for,
And if there be any other, she neglects all;
And all for you: I would you saw how grievously
And with what hourely lamentations.

Cla. I know thou flatter'st me; tell me but truth,
Looke here, look well, the best meat in the Dukedom,
The rarest, and the choicest of all diets,
This will I give thee, but to satisfie me;
That is, not to dissemble; this rare Lobster,
This Pheasant of the sea, this dish for Princes,
And all this thou shalt enjoy, eat all thy selfe,
Have good Greeke wine, or any thing belongs to it,
A wench if it desire one.

Pen. All this, Signior?

Cla. All, and a greater far then this.

Pen. A greater?

Cla. If thou deserve by telling truth.

Pen. A wench too?

Cla. Or any thing, but if you play the knave now,
The Cozening knave besides the losse of this,
In which thou hast parted with a paradise,
I neare will give thee meat more, not a morsell,
No smell of meat by my meanes shall come neere thee,
Nor name of any thing that's nourishing,
But to thy old part Tantalus againe,
Thou shalt returne, and there snap at a shadow.

Pen.

Pen. Upon this point, had I intended Treaſon,
Or any thing might call my life in queſtion, Follow'd with all the tortures time could think on,
Give me but time to eat this lovely Lobſter,
This Alderman o'th Sea, and give me wine to him,
I would reveale all, and if that all were too little,
More then I knew; Bartello holds in with her,
The Captain of the Cittadell, but you need not fear him,
His tongue's the ſtiffeſt weapon that he carries.
He is old, and out of uſe; there are ſome other,
Men young enough, handſome, and bold enough,
Could they come to make their game once; but they want
They want the unde quare, they are laid by then, (Sir,

Enter Bartello.

You onely are the man ſhall knock the nayle in——
Bar. How now Penurio?
Pen. Your Worſhip's fairely met, Sir.
You ſhall heare further from me, ſteale aſide Sir.
Cla. Remember your Maſter for thoſe Chaines.
Pen. They are ready, Sir. (Merchant;
Bart. What young thing's this? by his habit hee's a
I feare he trades my way too, you dryed dog-fiſh,
What bait was that?
Pen. Who Sir, the thing went hence now?
A notable young whelp.
Bart. To what end Sirrah?
Pen. Came to buy Chaines and Rings, is to be married,
An Aſſe, a Coxcomb, has nothing in his houſe, Sir;
I warrant you think he came to ſee my Miſtris?
Bart. I doubt it ſhrewdly.
Pen. Away, away, 'tis fooliſh;
He has not the face to look upon a Gentlewoman,
A poore skym'd thing, his Mothers maids are faine, Sir,
To teach him how to kiſſe, and againſt he is married,
To ſhew him on which ſide the ſtirrop ſtands.
Bart. That's a fine youth.
Pen. Thou wouldſt hang thy ſelf, that thou hadſt half Thou empty Potgun. (his power,
Bart. Am I come fit Penurio?
Pen. As fit as a fiddle,
My Maſter's now abroad about his buſineſſe. (pected
Bart. When thou cam'ſt to me home to day, I half ſuſ-
My wife was jealous, that ſhe whiſpered to thee.
Pen. You deſerve well the whil'ſt, ther's no ſuch matter,
She talk'd about ſome toyes my Maſter muſt bring to her,
You muſt not know of.
Bart. Ile take noat, Penurio.
Pen. No, Nor you ſhall not, till you have it ſoundly.
This is the braveſt Capitano Pompo,

Enter Iſabella.

But I ſhall pump ye anon Sir.
Iſab. O my Bartello? (Rogue,
Bart. Ye pretty Rogue, you little Rogue, you ſweet Away Penurio, go and walk i'th Horſe-Fayre.
Iſab. You do not love me?
Bart. Thou lyeſt thou little Raſcall;
There Sirrah, to your Centry.
Pen. How the Colt itches?
Ile help ye to a Curry-comb ſhall claw ye. Exit.
Iſab. And how much doſt thou love me?
Bart. Let's go in quickly,
Ile tell thee preſently, ile meaſure it to thee.
Iſab. No buſſes firſt? ſit 'o my knee, my brave boy,
My valiant boy; do not look ſo fiercely on me,
Thou wilt fright me with thy face; come buſſe againe Smile in my face you mad thing. (Chick,
Bart. I am mad indeed wench,
Precious I am all o' fire.
Iſab. Ile warrant thee better.
Bar. Ile warme thee too, or ile blow out my bellowes;
Ha, ye ſweet rogue, you loving rogue, a Boy now,
A Souldier I will get ſhall prove a fellow.

Enter Jaquenet and Penurio.

Jaq. Miſtris, looke to your ſelfe, my Maſter's comming.
Bar. The Devill come, and go with him.
Pen. The Devill's come indeed, he brings your wife, Sir.
Iſab. We are undone, undone then.
Bar. My wife with him?
Why this is a diſmall day.
Pen. They are hard by too, Sir.
Bar. I muſt not, dare not ſee her.
Iſab. Nor my Husband,
For twenty thouſand pound.
Bar. That I were a Cat now,
Or any thing could run into a Bench-hole,
Saint Anthonies Fire upon the Rogue has brought her;
Where ſhall I be? juſt in the nick oth' matter?
When I had her at my mercy: think for heaven ſake,
My wife, all the wilde furies hell has.
Pen. Up the Chimney.
Bar. They'l ſmoke me out there preſently.
Iſab. There, there, it muſt be there,
We are all undone elſe: it muſt be up the Chimney.
Bar. Give me a Ladder.
Iſab. You muſt uſe your Art Sir,
Alas, we have no Ladders.
Bar. Pox o' thy husband,
Do's he never mend his houſe?
Pen. No, nor himſelfe neither:
Up nimbly Sir, up nimbly.
Bar. Thou know'ſt I am fat,
Thou mercileſſe leane Rogue.
Pen. Will ye be kill'd?
For if he take ye——
Bar. Lend me thy ſhoulder.
Pen. Soft Sir,
You'l tread my ſhoulder-bones into my ſides elſe,
Have ye faſt hold oth' barrs?
Bar. A vengeance bar 'em.
Iſab. Patience good Captain, patience: quickly, quickly.
Bar. Do you think I am made of ſmoke?
Pen. Now he talkes of ſmoke,
What if my Maſter ſhould call for fire?
Bar. Will ye Martyr me?
Iſab. He muſt needs have it.
Bar. Will ye make me Bacon?
Iſab. We'l do the beſt we can, are all things ready?
Pen. All, all, I have 'em all.
Bar. Go, let 'em in then,
Not a word now on your life.
Bar. I hang like a Meteor.

Enter Lopez and Rodope.

Lop. You are welcome Lady.
Rho. You are too too curteous,
But I ſhall make amends, faire Iſabella.
Iſab. Welcome my worthy friend, moſt kindely welcome.
Rho. I heare on't, and ile fit him for his foolery.
Lop. Some ſweet meats wife: ſome ſweet meats preſently.
Bart. O my ſowre ſauce.
Lop. Away quick Iſabella. Exit Iſab.
Did you heare him?
Rho. Yes, yes, perfectly, proceed Sir.
Lop. Speake loud enough: Dare ye at length but pitty me?
Rho. 'Faith Sir, you have us'd ſo many reaſons to me,
And thoſe ſo powerfully——

Lop. Keep this kisse for me.
Bar. And do I stand and heare this?
Rho. This for me Sir,
This is some comfort now: Alas my Husband—
But why Do I think of so poore a fellow,
So wretched, so debosh'd?
Bar. That's I, I am bound to heare it.
Rho. I dare not lye with him, he is so ranke a Whore-master.
Lop. And that's a dangerous point.
Rho. Upon my conscience Sir,
He would stick a thousand base diseases on me.
Bar. And now must I say nothing.
Lop. I am sound Lady,
Rho. That's it that makes me love ye.
Lop. Let's kisse againe then.
Rho. Do, do.
Bar. Do, the Devill
And the grand Pox do with ye.
Lop. Do ye heare him? well——

Enter Pennio and Isabella.

Now, what's the newes with you?
Pen. The sound of War Sir,
Comes still along: The Duke will charge the City,
We have lost they say——
Lop. What shall become of me then,
And my poore wealth?
Bar. Even hang'd, I hope.
Rho. Remove your Jewells presently,
And what you have of wealth into the Cittadell;
There all's secure.
Lop. I humbly thank ye Lady:
Pennio, get me some can climbe the Chimney,
For there my Jewells are, my best, my richest,
I hid 'em, fearing such a blow.
Pen. Most happily:
I have two Boyes, that use to sweep fould Chimnies,
Truly I brought 'em Sir, to mock your worship,
For the great Fires ye keep, and the full diet.
Lop. I forgive thee knave, where are they?
Pen. Here Sir, here.
Mounsieur Black will your small worship mount?

Enter two Boyes.

1 Boy. Madam è be com to creep up into your Chimney, and make you cleane, as any Lady in de world: Ma litla, litla frera, and è, Chanta, frere, chanta.

Boy sings.

Pen. Come Mounsieur, mounte, mountè, mount Mounsieur Musterd-pot.

Boy sings.

1 Boy. Mounsieur è have dis for votra barba, ple ta vou Mounsieur.
Pen. Mounte Mounsieur, mountè dere be some fine tings.
1 Boy. Me will creep like de Ferret Mounsieur.
Pen. Dere in the Chimney.

The Boy above singing.

1 Boy. He be de shellde due shausson, Madam.

Boy goes in behinde the Arras.

Pen. There's a Birds neast, I wound have ye climbe it Mounsieur,
Up my fine singing Mounsieur: that's a fine Mounsieur.
Lop. Watch him, he do not steale.
Pen. I warrant ye Sir.
Lop. These Boyes are knavish.
Pen. Ile looke to him tithly
Lop. Lord, what comes here,
A walking apparition?
Isab. Saint Christopher.

Boy within, Madam here be de Rat, de Rat Madam.

Boy sings upon Bartellas shoulder.

Rho. Mercy o' me, what is it?
How like my Husband it lookes?
Bar. Get ye howse Devills,
Ile breake your neck else: was ever man thus chimnied?
Lop. Go pay the Boyes well: see them satisfied.
Pen. Come Mounsieur Devills, come my Black-berries
Ile butter ye o' both sides.

Boys Exeunt saying, Adieu Madam, adieu Madam.

Isab. Nay, ev'n look Sir, are you cooled now, Captaine?
Bar. I am Cuckolled, and fool'd to boot too:
Fool'd fearefully, fool'd shamefully.
Lop. You are welcome Sir,
I am glad I have any thing within these doores Sir
To make ye merry: you love my wife, I thank ye,
You have shew'd your love.
Bar. Wife, am I this? this odde matter,
This monstrous thing?
Rho. You ought, but yet you are not:
I have been bold with you Sir, but yet not basely,
As I have faith I have not.
Lop. Sir, believe it,
'Twas all meant but to make you feele your trespasse;
We knew your howre, and all this fashion'd for it.
Bar. Were you oth' plot too?
Isab. Yes by my truth, sweet Captaine.
Bar. You will forgive me wife?
Rho. You will deserve it?
Bar. Put that toth' venture.
Rho. Thus am I friends againe then,
And as you ne're had gone astray, thus kisse yè.
Bar. And ile kisse you, and you too ask forgiveneſſe,
Kisse my wife Lopez, 'tis but in jeſt remember;
And now all friends together to my Castle,
Where we'l all dine, and there discourse these stories,
And let him be Chimney-swept in's lust that glories. Exe.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Silvio, and Belvidere severally.

Sil. Haile reverent Dame, heaven wait upon thy studies.
Bel. You are well met Son: what is the Battell ended?
Sil. Mother, 'tis done.
Bel. How has thy honour prosper'd?
Sil. The Dutchesse has the day, Syenna's Prisoner:
Arm'd with thy powrefull Art, this arme dismounted him,
Receiv'd him then on foot, and in faire valour
Forc'd him mine owne, this Jewell I tooke from him,
It hung upon his cask, the Victors triumph:
And to the Dutchesse now a Prisoner
I have renderd him: Come off again unknown, Mother.
Bel. 'Tis well done, let me see the jewell Son;
'Tis a rich one, curious set, fit a Princesse Burgonet:
This rich token late was sent, by the Dutchesse with intent
The Marriage next day to begin: Do'st thou know what's hid within?
Wipe thine eyes, and then come neere, see the beauteous Belvidere:
Now behold it.
Sil. O my Saint.
Bel. Weare it nobly, do not faint.
Sil. How blest am I in this rich spoile, this picture,
For ever will I keep it here, here Mother,
For ever honour it: how oft, how chastly
Have I embrac'd the life of this, and kist it?
Bel. The day drawes on that thou must home returne,
And make thy answer to the Dutchesse quest on
I know it troubles thee, for if thou faile in't——
Sil. O, I must dye.
Bel. Feare not, feare not, ile be nigh,
Cast thy trouble on my back, art nor cunning shal not lack

To preserve thee, ſtill to keepe, what thy envious foemen ſeeke;
Go boldly home, and let thy minde, no diſtruſtfull croſſes finde:
All ſhall happen for the beſt; ſouls walk through ſorrowes that are bleſt.
Sil. Then I go confident.
Bel. But firſt my Son, a thankfull ſervice muſt be done,
The good old woman for her paine, when every thing ſtands faire againe, Muſt ask a poore Boon, and that granting, there's nothing to thy journey wanting.
Sil. Except the triall of my ſoul to miſchief,
And as I am a Knight, and love mine honour,
I grant it whatſoever.
Bel. Thy pure ſoule
Shall never ſinke for me, nor howle.
Sil. Then any thing.
Bel. When I ſhall aske remember.
Sil. If I forget, heavens goodneſſe forget me.
Bel. On thy journey then a while, to the next croſſe way and ſtile:
Ile conduct thee, keepe thee true, to thy Miſtris and thy vow,
And let all their envies fall, ile be with thee and quench all.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Ducheſſe, Syenna, and Lords,

Sy. LAdy, the ſtubborn war's more milde then you are,
That allowes Ranſome, and the Priſoner taken--- Duch. We muſt not be too haſty: Remember Sir,
The wrong and violence you have offer'd us,
Burnt up our Frontire Townes, made prey before ye
Both of our Beaſts, and Corne, ſlaine our deare Subjects,
Open'd the fountaine eyes of thouſand widowes,
That daily ſling their curſes on your fury;
What ordinary ſatisfaction can ſalve this?
What haſty thought on Ranſome give a remedy?
You muſt excuſe us yet, we'l take more counſell:
In the meane time, not as a Priſoner,
But as a noble Prince we entertaine ye.
Sy. I am at your mercy Lady, 'tis my fortune,
My ſtubborne fate; the day is yours, you have me,
The valour of one ſingle man has croſs'd me,
Croſt me and all my hope; for when the Battells
Were at the hotteſt game of all their furies,
And conqueſt ready then to crowne me Victor,
One ſingle man broke in, one ſword, one vertue,
And by his great example thouſands followed,
O how I ſhame to think on't, how it ſhakes me!
Nor could our ſtrongeſt head then ſtop his fury,
But like a tempeſt 'bore the field before him,
Till he arriv'd at me, with me he buckell'd,
A while I held him play; at length his violence
Beat me from my Saddle, then on foot purſu'd me,
There triumph'd once againe, then tooke me Priſoner:
When I was gone a feare poſſeſt my people.
Duch. One ſingle arme, in a juſt cauſe, heaven proſpers.
Is not this ſtranger Knight as yet diſcover'd,
That we may give his vertue a due honour?
Lord. Not yet that we hear Madam, but to that purpoſe,
Two dayes ago we publiſh'd Proclamations

Enter Soto with a Trumpet, and Silvia.

Soto. O dainty Ducheſſe, here I bring that Knight
Before thy fragrant face, that warlike wight,
He that Syenna's Duke, and all his Louts
Beat (as the Proverb ſeemly ſayes) to clouts:
He that unhorſ'd the man of fame to boot,
And bootleſſe taught his Grace to walk afoot:
He that your writings (pack'd to every pillar)
Promis'd promotion to, and ſtore of ſiller,
That very man I ſet before thy Grace,
And once againe pronounce this man it was.
Duch. A pretty fooliſh Squire, what muſt the Knight be?
Sy. Some Jugler, or ſome Mad-man.
Sil. I was not ſo,
When thy faint Troopes in flockes I beat before me,
When through the thickeſt of thy warlike horſe
I ſhot my ſelfe, even to thy Standard Duke,
And there found thee, there fingled thee, there ſhew'd thee
The temper of my Sword. 'Tis true, thou ſtood'ſt me,
And like a noble Souldier bid'ſt me welcome;
And this ile ſay, More honour in that arme
I found and tryed, then all thy Army carried:
What followes thy Impriſonment can tell thee.
Sy. His faire relation carries truth and vertue,
And by thoſe Armes I ſee (for ſuch were his,
So old, ſo ruſty) this may be he that forc'd me.
Sil. Do you know this Jewell, from your Caſk I rent it,
Even as I clos'd, and forced ye from your ſaddle;
Do you now remember me?
Sy. This is the valour
Madam, for certaine he, it muſt be he,
That day I wore this Jewell, you remember it.
Duch. Yes, very well, not long before I ſent it.
Sy. That day I loſt this Jewell, in fight I loſt it,
I felt his ſtroakes, and felt him take it from me,
I wore it in my Caſk; take it againe Sir,
You won it nobly, 'tis the prize of honour.
Soto. My Father, and my ſelfe are made for ever.
Duc. Kneele down brave Sir, thus my Knight firſt I raiſe (ye,
Gird on a Sword; next Generall of my Army,
Give him a Staffe; laſt, one in Counſell neare me.
Now, make us happy with your fight: how? Silvia?
Have I on thee beſtow'd this love, this honour?
The Treaſons thou haſt wrought ſet off with favours?
Unarme him preſently: O thou foule Traitor,
Traitor to me, mine honour, and my Country,
Thou kindler of theſe Warres.
Sil. Miſtake not Madam.
Duch. Away with him to priſon,
See him ſafe kept, the Law ſhall ſhortly Sirra,
Finde fitter titles for ye, then I gave ye.
Soto. This is the youth that kild me, ile be quit with him,
What a blinde rogue was I, I could never know him?
And't pleaſe your Grace, I claime the benefit
Of the Proclamation that proclam'd him Traitor,
I brought him in.
Duch. Thou ſhalt have thy reward for't.
Soto. Let him be hang'd, or drown'd then.
Duch. Away with him.
Sil. Madam, I crave your promiſe firſt; you are tyed to it,
You have paſt your Princely word.
Duch. Prove it, and take it.

Sil.

Sil. This is the day appointed,
Appointed by your Grace for my appearance,
To answer to the Question.
Duch. I remember it.
Sil. I claime it then,
Duch. If you performe it not,
The penalty you claime too.
Sil. I not repent it;
If I absolve the words?
Duch. Your life is free then,
You have drawne a speedy course above my wishes,
To my rezenge, be sure ye hit it right,
Or ile be sure you shall not scape the danger.
Sil. My tell is up now Madam.
Duch. Then play it cunningly. {(promises,
Sil. Now, where's the Hag? where now are all her
She would be with me, strengthen me, informe me?
My death will now be double death, ridiculous:
She was wont still to be neare, to feele my miseries,
And with her Art, I see her no where now;
What have I undertaken? now she failes me,
No comfort now I finde, how my soule staggers?
Till this houre never fear, nor doubt possest me,
She cannot come, she will not come, she has fool'd me;
Sure, she is the Devill, has drawne me on to ruine,
And now to death bequeaths me in my danger.
Sy. He stands distracted, and his colour changes.
Duch. I have given him that will make his blood forsake Shortly his life. (him;
Sy. His hands and contemplation
Have motion still; the rest is earth already. (our Sir;
Duc. Come, will ye speak or pray? your time growes
How every where he looks? he's at last cast.
Enter Belvidere, and secretly gives him a paper, and Exit.
Sy. His colour comes againe fresh.
Duc. 'Tis a flash, Sir,
Before the flame burnes out; can ye yet answer?
Sil. Yes Madam, now I can.
Duch. I feare you'l faile in't.
Sil. And do not think my silence a presage,
Or Omen to my end, you shall not finde it;
I am bred a Souldier, not an Orator,
Madam, peruse this scrowle, let that speake for me,
And as you are Royall, wrong not the construction.
Duch. By Heaven you shall have faire play.
Sil. I shall looke for't.

Question.

Tell me what is that onely thing,
For which all women long;
Yet having what they most desire,
To have it do's them wrong.

Answer.

'Tis not to be chaste, nor faire,
Such gifts malice may impaire;
Richly trim'd, to walke or ride,
Or to wanton unespi'd;
To preserve an honest name,
And so to give it up to fame;
These are toyes. In good or ill
They desire, to have their will;
Yet when they have it, they abuse it,
For they know not how to use it.

Duch. You have answer'd right, and gain'd your life,
I give it.
Sil. O happy Hag! But my most gracious Madam,
Your promise tide a nobler favour to me.
Duch. 'Tis true, my daughter too.
Sil. I hope you will keep it.
Duc. 'Tis not in my powre now, she is long since wanderd, Stolne from the Court, and me; and what I have not
I cannot give: no man can tell me of her,
Nor no search finde her out: and if not Silvio,
Which strongly I beleeve ——
Sil. Mock me not Lady,
For as I am a servant to her vertue,
Since my first howre of exile, I ne're saw her
Lord. That she is gone 'tis too too true, and lamentable,
Our last hope was in you.
Sil. What do I heare then,
And wherefore have I life bestow'd and honour?
To what end do I walk? for men to wonder at,
And fight, and foole? pray ye take your honours from me,
(My sorrowes are not fit companions for 'em)
And when ye please my life: Art thou gone Mistris,
And wander'st heaven knowes where? this vow I make thee,
That till I finde thee out, and see those faire eyes,
Those eyes that shed their lights, and life into me,
Never to know a friend, to seeke a kindred,
To rest where pleasure dwells, and painted glory,
But through the world, the wide world thus to wander,
The wretched world alone, no comfort with me,
But the meere meditations of thy goodnesse:
Honour and greatnesse, thus adieu.

Enter Belvidere.

Bel. Stay Silvio,
And Lady sit againe, I come for Justice.
Sil. What would she now?
Bel. To claime thy promise Silvio,
The Boone thou swor'st to give me.
Sy. What may this be,
A woman, or a Devill?
Duch. 'Tis a Witch sure,
And by her meanes he came to untwist this Riddle,
Sil. That I am bound to her for my life, mine honour,
And many other thousand wales for comfort
I here confesse: Confesse a promise too,
That what she would aske me to requite these favours,
Within the endeavour of my life to grant,
I would; and here I stand my words full master.
Bel. I wish no more: great Lady, witnesse with me,
The Boone I crave for all my service to thee,
Is now to be thy wife, to grant me marriage.
Sil. How? for to marry thee? aske againe woman,
Thou wilfull woman, aske againe.
Bel. No more Sir.
Sil. Aske land, and life.
Bel. I aske thee for a Husband.
Soto. Marry her, and beat her into Gun-powder,
She would make rare Crackers.
Sil. Aske a better fortune,
Thou art too old to marry: I a Souldier,
And alwaies married to my sword.
Bel. Thy word Foole,
Breake that, and ile breake all thy fortunes yet.
Duch. He shall not,
I am witnesse to his faith: and ile compell it.
Sy. 'Tis fit ye hold your word, Sir.
Sil. O most wretched.
Duch. This was a fortune now beyond my wishes,
For now my Daughter's free, if e're I finde her.
Sy. But not from me.
Duch. You are sharer in this happinesse,
My selfe will wait upon this marriage,
And do the old woman all the honour possible. (ance,
Sy. Ile lead the Knight, and what there wants in dalli-

Wee'l take it out in drinke.
Sil. O wretched Silvio. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Lopez and Isabella.

Lop. Haſt thou ſent for him?
Iſab. Yes,
Lop. A young man, ſaiſt thou?
Iſab. Yes, very young, and very amarous.
Lop. And handſom?
Iſab. As the Town affords.
Lop. And dar'ſt thou
Be ſo farre good, and Miſtris of thine honour,
To ſleight theſe?
Iſab. For my husbands ſake to curſe 'em,
And ſince you have made me Miſtris of my fortune,
Never to point at any joy, but husband,
I could have cozen'd ye, but ſo much I love ye,
And now ſo much I weigh the eſtimation
Of an unſpotted wife——
Lop. I dare believe thee,
And never more ſhall doubt torment my ſpirit.

Enter Penurio.

Iſab. How now Penurio?
Pen. The thing is comming, Miſtris.
Lop. Ile take my ſtanding.
Pen. Do, and Ile take mine. Exit Lopez.
Iſab. Where didſt thou leave him?
Pen. I left him in a Cellar,
Where he has paid me titely, paid me home Miſtris,
We had an hundred & fifty healths to you, ſweet Miſtris,
And three ſcore and ten damnations to my Maſter;
Miſtris, ſhall I ſpeak a fooliſh word to ye?
Iſab. What's that Penurio?
The fellow's drunke.
Pen. I would faine know your body.
Iſab. How's that? how's that prethee?
Pen. I would know it carnally,
I would conglutinate.
Iſab. The reaſon ſirrah?
Pen. Lobſter, ſweet Miſtris, Lobſter.
Iſab. Thy Maſter heares.
Pen. Lobſter, ſweet Maſter, Lobſter.
Iſab. Thou art the moſt precious rogue.

Enter Claudio.

Pen. Moſt pretious Lobſter.
Iſab. Do you ſee who's here? go ſleep ye drunken raſcall.
Pen. Remember you refuſe me arm'd in Lobſter. Exit.
Iſab. O my loſt Rugio, welcome, welcome, welcome,
A thouſand welcomes here Ile ſeale.
Cla. Pray ye ſtay, Lady,
Do you love me ever at this rate? or is the fit now,
By reaſon of ſome wrong done by your husband,
More fervent on ye?
Iſab. Can I chuſe but love thee?
Thou art my Martyr, thou haſt ſuffered for me,
My ſweet, ſweet Rugio.
Cla. Do you do this ſeriouſly?
'Tis true, I would be entertained thus.
Iſab. Theſe are nothing,
No kiſſes, no embraces, no endearements,
To thoſe——
Cla. Do what you will.
Iſab. Thoſe that ſhall follow,
Thoſe I will crowne our love withall; why ſigh ye?
Why look ye ſad my deere one?
Cla. Nay faith nothing,
But me thinks ſo ſweet a beauty, as yours ſhowes to me,
And ſuch an innocence as you may make it,
Should hold a longer Siege.
Iſab. Ha, you ſpeake truth, Sir.
Cla. I would not have it ſo.
Iſab. And now methinkes,
Now I conſider truly what becomes me,
I have been cozen'd, fearefully abus'd,
My reaſon blinded.
Cla. Nay, I did but jeſt with ye.
Iſab. Ile take ye at your word, and thank ye for't Sir;
And now I ſee no ſweetneſſe in that perſon,
Nothing to ſtir me to abuſe a Husband,
To ruine my faire fame.
Cla. Good Iſabella.
Iſab. No handſome man, no any thing to doat on,
No face, no tongue to catch me, poore at all points,
And I an aſſe.
Cla. Why do ye wrong me Lady?
If I were thus, and had no youth upon me,
My ſervice of ſo meane a way to win ye,
(Which you your ſelfe are conſcious muſt deſerve ye,
If you had thrice the beauty you poſſeſſe, muſt reach ye)
If in my tongue your fame lay wrack't, and ruin'd
With every cup I drink: if in opinion
I were a loſt, defam'd man: but this is common
Where we love moſt, where moſt we ſtake our fortunes,
There leaſt and baſeſt we are rewarded: fare ye well,
Know now I hate you too as much, contemne ye,
And weigh my credit at as high a value.
Iſab. May be I did but jeſt.
Cla. Ye are a woman,
And now I ſee your wants, and mine owne follies,
And taxe my ſelfe with indiſcretion,
For doating on a face ſo poore.
Iſab. Say ye ſo Sir,
(I muſt not loſe my end) I did but jeſt with you,
Only fool'd thus to try your faith: my Rugio,
Do you think I could forget?
Cla. Nay, 'tis no matter.
Iſab. Is't poſſible I ſhould forſake a conſtancy,
So ſtrong, ſo good, ſo ſweet?
Cla. A ſubtle woman.
Iſab. You ſhall forgive me, 'twas a trick to try ye,
And were I ſure ye lov'd me——
Cla. Do you doubt now?
Iſab. I do not doubt, but he that would profeſſe this,
And beare that full affection you make ſhew of,
Should do——
Cla. What ſhould I do?
Iſab. I cannot ſhew ye.
Cla. Ile try thee damnedſt Devill: hark ye Lady,
No man ſhall dare do more, no ſervice top me,
Ile marry ye.
Iſab. How Sir?
Cla. Your husbands ſentenc'd,
And he ſhall dye.
Iſab. Dye?
Cla. Dye for ever to ye,
The danger is mine owne.
Iſab. Dye did ye tell me?
Cla. He ſhall dye, I have caſt the way.
Iſab. O foule man,
Malicious bloody man.

Enter Lopez.

Lop. When ſhall he dye Sir,
By whom, and how?
Cla. Haſt thou betray'd me, woman? (too,
Iſab. Baſe man, thou wouldſt have ruin'd me, my name
And like a Toad, poyſon'd my vertuous memory:

Further then all this, doſt thou ſee this friend here,
This only friend, ſhame take thy luſt and thee,
And ſhake thy ſcabbe, his life, the life I love thee,
My life in him, my only life thou aim'ſt at.
Cla. Am I catch'd thus?
Lop. The Law ſhall catch ye better.
Iſab. You make a trade of betraying women's honours,
And think it noble in ye to be luſtful,
Repent of me heres for ——
Cla. Fool'd thus finely?
Lop. I muſt intreat ye walk, Sir, to the Juſtice,
Where if hee'l bid ye kill me ——
Cla. Pray ſtay a while, Sir,
I muſt uſe a Players ſhift, do you know me now Lady?
Lop. Your brother Claudio ſure.
Iſab. O me, 'tis he Sir,
O my beſt brother.
Cla. My beſt ſiſter now too,
I have tryed ye, found ye ſo, and now I love ye,
Love ye ſo truly nobly.
Lop. Sir, I thank ye,
You have made me a moſt happy man.
Cla. Thank her Sir,
And from this houre preſerve that happineſſe,
Be no more fool'd with jealouſie.
Lop. I have loſt it,
And take me now new borne againe, new natur'd.
Iſab. I do, and to that promiſe tye this faith,
Never to have a falſe thought tempt my vertue.
Lop. Enough, enough, I muſt deſire your preſence,
My Cozen Rhodope has ſent in all haſt for us,
I am ſure you will be welcome.
Cla. Ile wait on ye.
Lop. What the Project is —— Iſab. We ſhall know when we are there, Sir. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Ducheſſe, Syenna, Lords, Silvio.

Duch. Joy to you Silvio, and your young faire Bride,
You have ſtolne a day upon us; you cannot wooe Sir.
Sil. The joyes of Hell hang over me, O miſchiefe,
To what a fortune has the Devill driven me?
Am I reſerv'd for this?
Sy. Beſhrew me Sir,
But you have gotten you a right faire bedfellow,
Let you alone to chuſe.
Sil. I beſeech your Grace,
'Tis miſery enough to have met the Devill,
Not mens reproches too.
Sy. How old is ſhe?
Duch. A very Girle, her eye delivers it.
Sy. Her teeth are ſcaree come yet.
Lord. What goodly children
Will they two have now? ſhe is rarely made to breed on,
What a ſweet timberd body?
Duch. Knotty i'th back,
But will hold out the ſtronger; What a noſe?
Sy. I marry, ſuch a noſe, ſo rarely mounted,
Upon my conſcience, 'twas the part he doted on.
Duch. And that fine little eye to it, like an Elephants.
Lord. Yes, if her feet were round, and her ears ſachells.
Sy. For any thing we know.
Sil. Have ye no mercy?
No pitty in your bloods, to uſe a wretch thus?
You Princes, in whoſe hearts the beſt compaſſions,
Neereſt to thoſe in Heaven, ſhould finde fit places,
Why do you mock at miſery? fling ſcornes and baſeneſſe
Upon his broken back, that ſinks with ſorrowes?
Heaven may reward you too, and an houre come,
When all your great deſignes ſhall ſhew ridiculous,
And your hearts pinch'd like mine.
Muſick in divers places
Duch. Fye Sir, ſo angry
Upon your wedding day? go ſing your ſelfe,
The Maid will come anon: what Muſick's this?
Sy. I warrant you ſome noble preparation.
Duch. Let's take our places then.
Sil. More of theſe Devills dumps?
Muſt I be ever haunted with theſe witchcrafts?

Enter a Maſquerado of ſeverall Shapes and Dances, after which enter Belvidere and diſpoſes them, before the Maskers enter two Perſonages, among which are Bartella, Lopez, Claudio, Iſabella, Rhodope, Soto, Pantria, Joquina.

1. Per. Roome, roome for merry ſpirits, roome,
Hether on command we come,
From the good old Beldam ſent,
Cares and ſorrowes to prevent.
2. Looke up Silvio, ſmile, and ſing,
After winter comes a ſpring.
1. Feare not faint foole what may follow,
Eyes that now are ſunk and hollow,
By her Art may quick returne
To their flames againe, and burne.
2. Art commands all youth, and blood,
Strength and beauty it makes good.
1. Feare not then, diſpaire not, ſing
Round about as we do ſpring:
Cares and ſorrowes caſt away,
This is the old wives holy-day.
Dance here, then enter Belvidere.
Duch. Who is this?
Sy. The ſhape of Belvidere.
Bel. Now Silvio,
How do'ſt thou like me now?
Sil. Thus I kneele to thee.
Bel. Stand up, and come no nearer, mark me well too,
For if thou troubleſt me I vaniſh inſtantly:
Now chuſe wiſely or chuſe never,
One thou muſt enjoy for ever.
Do'ſt thou love me thus?
Sil. Moſt dearely.
Bel. Take heed foole, it concernes thee nearely.
If thou wilt have me young and bright,
Pleaſing to thine eye and ſight,
Courtly, and admir'd of all,
Take heed leaſt thy fame do fall,
I ſhall then be full of ſcorne,
Wanton, proud, beware the horne,
Hating what I lov'd before,
Flattery apt to fall before,
All conſuming, nothing getting,
Thus thy faire name comes to ſetting.
But if old and free from theſe
Thou ſhalt chuſe me, I ſhall pleaſe:
I ſhall then maintaine thee ſtill,
With my vertue and my skill:
Still encreaſe and build thy name,
Chuſe now Silvio, here I am.
Sil. I know not what to ſay, which way to turne me,
Into thy Soveraigne will I put my anſwer.
Bel. I thank ye Sir, and my will thus rewards ye,
Take your old Love, your beſt, your deareſt Silvio:
No more Spells now, nor further ſhapes to alter me,
I am thy Belvidere indeed. Deare Mother,
There is no altering this, heavens hand is with it:

And now you ought to give me, he has fairely won me.
Sil. But why that Hag?
Bel. In that shape most secure still,
I followed all your fortunes, serv'd, and counsell'd ye,
I met ye at the Farmers first a Country wench,
Where fearing to be knowne I tooke that habit,
And to make ye laughing sport at this mad marriage,
By secret ayde of my friend Rhodope
We got this Maske.
Sil. And I am sure I have ye.
Bel. For ever now, for ever.
Duch. You see it must be,
The wheele of destiny hath turn'd it round so.
Sy. It must, it is, and curs'd be he that breakes it.
Duch. Ile put a choyce to you Sir: ye are my Prisoner.
Sy. I am so, and I must be so, till it please you——
Duch. Chuse one of these, either to pay a Ransome,
At what rate I shall set it, which shall be high enough,
And so returne a Free-man, and a Bachellor,
Or give me leave to give you a fit wife,
Inthonour every way your Graces equall,
And so your Ransom's paid.
Sy. You say most nobly,
Silvio's example's mine, pray chuse your for me.
Duc. I thank ye Sir, I have got the maistry too,
And here I give your Grace a husbands freedome,
Give me your hand, my Husband.
Sy. You much honour me,
And I shall ever serve ye for this favour.
Bart. Come Lopez, let us give our wives the breeches too,
For they will have 'em.
Lop. Whilst they rule with vertue
Ile give 'em, skin and all.
Isab. Wee'l scratch it off else.
Sil. I am glad ye live, more glad ye live to honour,
And from this houre a stronger love dwell with us;
Pray you take your man againe.
Cla. He knowes my house Sir.
Duch. 'Tis fin to keep you longer from your Loves,
Wee'l lead the way; and you young men that know not
How to preserve a wife, and keep her faire,
Give 'em their soveraign wills, & pleas'd they are. Exeunt.

Here endeth Women pleas'd.

A VVife for a Moneth.

Actus primus, Scæna prima.

Enter King Frederick, Soranzo, Valerio, Camillo, Chamberlain, Menallo, and Attendants.

Sor. Will your Grace speak?

Fre. Let me alone Soranzo,
Although my thoughts seeme sad, they are welcome to me.

Sor. You know I am private as your secret wishes,
Ready to fling my soule upon your service,
Ere your command be on't.

Fre. Bid those depart.

Sor. You must retire my Lords.

Cam. What new design is hammering in his head now?

Cle. Lets pray heartily
None of our heads meet with it, my wife's old,
That's all my comfort.

Men. Mine's ugly, that I am sure on,
And I think honest too, 'twould make me start else.

Cam. Mine's troubled in the Country with a feaver,
And some few infirmities else; he looks againe,
Come let's retire, certaine 'tis some she businesse,
This new Lord is imployed.

Val. I'le not be far off, because I doubt the cause. Ex.

Fre. Are they all gone? Lords.

Sor. All but your faithfull servant.

Fred. I would tell thee,
But 'tis a thing thou canst not like.

Sor. Pray ye speak it, is it my head? I have it ready for ye, Sir:
Is't any action in my powre? my wit?
I care not of what nature, nor what followes.

Fre. I am in love.

Sor. That's the least thing of a thousand,
The easiest to atchieve.

Fre. But with whom Soranzo?

Sor. With whom you please, you must not be deny'd, Sir.

Fred. Say it be with one of thy Kinswomen.

Sor. Say withall,
I shall more love your Grace, I shall more honour ye,
And would I had enough to serve your pleasure.

Fred. Why 'tis thy Sister then, the faire Evanthe,
Ile be plaine with thee.

Sor. Ile be as plaine with you Sir,
She brought not her perfections to the world,
To lock them in a case, or hang 'em by her,
The use is all she breeds 'em for, she is yours, Sir.

Fred. Dost thou meane seriously?

Sor. I meane my Sister,
And if I had a dozen more, they were all yours:
Some Aunts I have, they have been handsome women,
My mother's dead indeed, and some few cosens
That are now shooting up, we shall see shortly.

Fred. No, 'tis Evanthe.

Sor. I have sent my man unto her,
Upon some businesse to come presently
Hither, she shall come; Your Grace dare speak unto her?
Large golden promises, and sweet language, Sir,
You know what they worke, she is a compleat Courtier,
Besides Ile set in.

Fred. She waights upon my Queene,
What jealousie and anger may arise,
Incensing her?

Sora. You have a good sweet Lady,
A woman of so even and still a temper,
She knows not anger; say she were a fury,
I had thought you had been absolute the great King,
The fountaine of all honours, playes and pleasures;
Your will and your commands unbounded also;
Go get a paire of beads and learne to pray, Sir.

Enter Servant.

Ser. My Lord, your servant staies.

Sor. Bid him come hither, and bring the Lady with him.

Fred. I will woo her,
And either lose my selfe, or win her favour.

Sor. She is comming in.

Fre. Thy eyes shoot through the doore,
They are so piercing, that the beames they dart
Give new light to the roome.

Enter Podramo and Evanthe.

Eva. Whether dost thou go?
This is the Kings side, and his private lodgings,
What businesse have I here?

Pod. My Lord sent for ye.

Eva. His lodgings are below, you are mistaken;
We left them at the staire-foot.

Pod. Good sweet Madam,

Evan. I am no Counsellor, nor important Suter.
Nor have no private businesse through these Chambers;
To seek him this way, o' my life thou art drunke,
Or worse then drunke, hir'd to convey me hither
To some base end; now I looke on thee better,
Thou hast a bawdy face, and I abhor thee,
A beastly bawdy face, Ile go no further.

Sor. Nay shrink not back, indeed you shall good Sister,
Why do you blush? the good King will not hurt ye,
He honours ye, and loves ye.

Eva. Is this the businesse?

Sor. Yes, and the best you ever will arive at, if you be wise.

Eva. My Father was no bawd Sir,

Nor

Nor of that worshipfull stock as I remember.
Sora. You are a foole.
Eva. You are that I shame to tell ye.
Fred. Gentle Evanthe,
Eva. The gracious Queen Sir
Is well and merry, heaven be thanked for it,
And as I think she waites you in the Garden.
Fred. Let her wait there, I talk not of her Garden,
I talk of thee sweet flower.
Eva. Your Grace is pleasant,
To mistake a nettle for a rose.
Fred. No Rose, nor Lilly, nor no glorious Hyacinth
Are of that sweetnesse, whitenesse, tendernesse,
Softnesse, and satisfying blessednesse
As my Evanthe.
Eva. Your Grace speakes very feelingly,
I would not be a handsome wench in your way Sir,
For a new gowne.
Fred. Thou art all handsomnesse,
Nature will be asham'd to frame another
Now thou art made, thou hast rob'd her of her cunning,
Each severall part about thee is a beauty.
Sor. Do you heare this Sifter?
Eva. Yes unworthy Brother, but all this will not do.
Fred. But love Evanthe,
Thou shalt have more then words, wealth, ease, and honors
My tender wench.
Eva. Be tender of my credit, no
And I shall love you Sir, and I shall honour ye.
Fred. I love thee to injoy thee my Evanthe,
To give thee the content of love.
Eva. Hold, hold Sir, ye are to fleet,
I have some businesse this way, your Grace can nere con-
Sor. You stubborne toy. (tent.
Eva. Good my Lord Bawd I thank ye.
Fred. Thou shalt not go, beleeve me sweet Evanthe,
So high I will advance thee for this favour,
So rich and potent I will raise thy fortune,
And thy friends mighty.
Eva. Good your Grace be patient,
I shall make the wo st honourable wench that ever was,
Shame your discretion, and your choyce.
Fred. Thou shalt not.
Eva. Shall I be rich do you say, and glorious,
And shine above the rest, and scorne all beauties,
And mighty in command?
Fred. Thou shalt be any thing.
Eva. Let me be honest too, and then ile thank ye.
Have you not such a title to bestow too?
If I prove otherwise, I would know but this Sir;
Can all the power you have or all the riches,
But tye mens tongues up from discoursing of me,
Their eyes from gazing at my glorious folly,
Time that shall come from wondering at my impudence,
And they that read my wanton life from curses?
Can you do this? have ye this magick in ye?
This is not in your powre, though you be a Prince Sir,
No more then evill is in holy Angels,
Nor I, I hope; get wantonnesse confirm'd
By Act of Parliament an honesty,
And so receiv'd by all, ile hearken to ye.
Heaven guide your Grace.
Fred. Evanthe, stay a little,
Ile no more wantonnesse, ile marry thee.
Eva. What shall the Queene do?
Fred. Ile be divorsed from her.
Eva. Can you tell why? what has she done against ye?
Has she contrived a treason gainst your Person?
Abus'd your bed? does disobedience urge ye?
Fre. That's all one, 'tis my will.
Eva. 'Tis a most wicked one,
A most absurd one, and will show a Monster;
I had rather be a Whore, and with lesse sin,
To your present lust, then Queen to your injustice.
Yours is no love, Faith and Religion fly it,
Nor has no taste of faire affection in it,
Some hellish flame abuses your faire body,
And hellish furies blow it; looke behinde ye,
Divorse ye from a woman of her beauty,
Of her integrity, her piety?
Her love to you, to all that honours ye,
Her chast and vertuous love, are these fit causes?
What will you do to me, when I have cloyd ye?
You may finde time out in eternity,
Deceit and violence in heavenly Justice,
Life in the grave, and death among the blessed,
Ere staine or brack in her sweet reputation.
Sor. You have fool'd enough, be wise now, and a wo-
You have shew'd a modesty sufficient, (man,
If not too much for Court.
Eva. You have shew'd an impudence,
A more experienc'd bawd would blush and shake at;
You will make my kindred mighty.
Fred. Prethee heare me.
Evan. I do Sir, and I count it a great offer.
Fre. Any of thine.
Eva. 'Tis like enough you may clap honour on them,
But how 't will sit, and how men will adore it,
Is still the question. Ile tell you what they'l say Sir,
What the report will be, and 'twill be true too,
And it must needs be comfort to your Master,
These are the issues of her impudence;
Ile tell your Grace, so deare I hold the Queene,
So deare that honour that she nurs'd me up in,
I would first take to me, for my lust, a Moore,
One of your Gally-slaves, that cold and hunger,
Decrepid misery, had made a mock-man,
Then be your Queene.
Fred. You are bravely resolute.
Evan. I had rather be a Leopar, and be shun'd,
And dye by peeces, rot into my grave,
Leaving no memory behind to know me,
Then be a high Whore to eternity.
Fred. You have another Ganster I perceive by ye,
You durst not slight me else.
Sor. Ile finde him out,
Though he lye next thy heart hid, Ile discover him,
And ye proud peat, Ile make you curse your insolence.
Val. Tongue of an Angell, and the truth of Heaven,
How am I blest? Exit Val.
Sor. Podramo go in hast
To my Sisters Gentlewoman, you know her well,
And bid her send her Mistris presently
The lesser Cabinet she keeps her Letters in,
And such like toyes, and bring it to me Instantly. Away.
Pod. I am gone. Exit.
Enter the Queene with two Ladies.
Sora. The Queene.
Fre. Lets quit the place, she may grow jealous. Exit
Fred. Sora.
Mar. So suddenly departed, what's the reason?
Doe's my approach displease his Grace? are my eyes
So hatefull to him? or my conversation
Infected, that he flies me? faire Evanthe,
Are you there? then I see his shame.
Eva. 'Tis true Madam,

'That

'Thas pleas'd his Goodneſſe to be pleaſant with me,
Mar. 'Tis ſtrange to finde thy modeſty in this place,
Doe's the King offer faire? doe's thy face take him?
Nere bluſh Evanthe, 'tis a very ſweet one,
Doe's he raine gold, and precious promiſes
Into thy lap? will he advance thy fortunes?
Shalt thou be mighty wench?
Evan. Never mock Madam;
'Tis rather on your part to be lamented,
At leaſt reveng'd, I can be mighty Lady,
And glorious too, glorious and great, as you are.
Mar. He will marry thee.
Evan. Who would not be a Queene, Madam?
Mar. 'Tis true Evanthe, 'tis a brave ambition,
A golden dreame, that may delude a good minde,
What ſhall become of me?
Evan. You muſt learne to pray,
Your age and honour will become a Nunnery.
Mar. Wilt thou remember me? Weeps.
Evan. She weeps. Sweet Lady
Upon my knees I aske your ſacred pardon,
For my rude boldneſſe; and know, my ſweet Miſtris,
If e're there were ambition in Evanthe,
It was and is to do you faithfull duties;
'Tis true I have been tempted by the King,
And with no few and potent charmes, to wrong ye,
To violate the chaſte joyes of your bed;
And thoſe not taking hold, to uſurpe your ſtate,
But ſhe that has been bred up under ye,
And daily fed upon your vertuous precepts,
Still growing ſtrong by example of your goodneſſe,
Having no errant motion from obedience,
Flyes from thoſe vanities, as meere illuſions;
And arm'd with honeſty, defies all promiſes.
In token of this truth, I lay my life downe
Under your ſacred foot, to do you ſervice.
Mar. Riſe my true friend, thou vertuous, bud of beauty,
Thou Virgins honour, ſweetly blow and flouriſh,
And that rude nipping winde, that ſeeks to blaſt thee,
Or taint thy root, be curſt to all poſterity;
To my protection from this houre I take ye,
Yes, and the King ſhall know——
Evan. Give his heat way, Madam,
And 'twill go out againe, he may forget all. Exeunt.

Enter Camillo, Cleambes, and Menallo.

Cam. What have we to do with the times? we cannot cure 'em;
Let 'em go on, when they are ſwolne with ſurfets
They'le burſt and ſtink, then all the world ſhall ſmell 'em.
Cle. A man may live a bawd, and be an honeſt man.
Men. Yes, and a wiſe man too, 'tis a vertuous calling.
Cam. To his owne wife eſpecially, or to his ſiſter,
The neerer to his owne blood, ſtill the honeſter;
There want ſuch honeſt men, would we had more of 'em.
Men. To be a villaine is no ſuch rude matter.
Cam. No, if he be a neat one, and a perfect,
Art makes all excellent, what is it Gentl.
In a good cauſe to kill a dozen coxcombs?
That blunt rude fellowes call good Patriots?
Nothing, nor ne're look'd after.
Men. 'Tis one as much, as eaſie too, as honeſt, & as cleer,
To raviſh Matrons, and deflowre coy wenches,
But here they are ſo willing, 'tis a complement.
Cle. To pull downe Churches with pretention,
To build 'em fairer, may be done with honour,
And all this time beleeve no God. (their angers,
Cam. I think ſo, 'tis faith enough if they name him in
Or on their rotten Tombs ingrave an Angell;
Well, brave Alphonſo, how happy had we been,
If thou had'ſt rain'd?
Men. Would I had his diſeaſe,
Tyed like a Leproſie to my poſterity,
So he were right againe.
Cleam. What is his Melady?
Cam. Nothing but ſad and ſilent melancholly,
Laden with griefes and thoughts, no man knows why neither;
The good Brandino Father to the Princeſſe,
Uſed all the art and induſtry that might be,
To free Alphonſo from this dull calamity,
And ſeat him in his rule, he was his eldeſt
And nobleſt too, had not faire nature ſtopt in him,
For which cauſe this was choſen to inherit,
Frederick the yonger.
Cleam. Doe's he uſe his brother
With that reſpect and honour that befits him?
Cam. He is kept privately, as they pretend,
To give more eaſe and comfort to his ſickneſſe;
But he has honeſt ſervants, the grave Rugio,
And Fryer Marco, that waight upon his Perſon,
And in a Monaſtery he lives.
Men. 'Tis full of ſadneſſe,
To ſee him when he comes to his fathers Tombe,
As once a day that is his Pilgrimage,
Whilſt in devotion the Quire ſings an Antheme:
How piouſly he kneeles, and like a Virgin
That ſome croſſe fate had cozen'd of her Love,
Weeps till the ſtubborne Marble ſweats with pitty,
And to his grones the whole Quire beares a Chorus.

Enter Frederick, Soranzo with the Cabinet.

Pod. So do I too. The King with his contrivers,
This is no place for us. Exeunt Lords.
Fred. This is a Jewell,
Lay it aſide, what Paper's that?
Pod. A Letter,
But 'tis a womans, Sir, I know by the hand,
And the falſe authography, they write old Saxon.
Fred. May be her ghoſtly mothers, that inſtructs her.
Sor. No, 'tis a cozens, and came up with a great Cake.
Fred. What's that?
Sora. A paire of Gloves the Ducheſſe gave her,
For ſo the outſide ſaies.
Fred. That other Paper? (Saints and Croſſes.
Sor. A charme for the tooth-ach, here's nothing but
Fre. Look in that box, me thinks that ſhould hold ſecrets,
Pod. 'Tis paint and curles of haire, ſhe begins to exerciſe.
A glaſſe of water too, I would faine taſte it,
But I am wickedly afraid 'twill ſilence me,
Never a Conduit Pipe to convey this water. (mentoe.
Sor. Theſe are all Rings, deaths heads, and ſuch me-
Her Grandmother, and worme-eaten Aunts left to her,
To tell her what her beauty muſt arive at.
Fred. That, that. (dies;
Pod. They are written Songs Sir, to provoke young La-
Lord, here's a prayer booke, how theſe agree?
Here's a ſtrange Union. (Patient.
Sir. Ever by a ſuſeit you have a julip ſet to coole the Fred. Thoſe, thoſe.
Sor. They are Verſes to the bleſt Evanthe.
Fred. Thoſe may diſcover, Reade them out Soran.

To the bleſt Evanthe,

LEt thoſe complaine, that feeles Loves cruelty,
And in ſad Legends write their woes,
With Roſes gently 'has corrected me;
My war is without rage or blowes;
My Miſtris eyes ſhine faire on my deſires,
And hope ſprings up inflam'd with her new fires.

No more an Exile will I dwell,
With folded armes, and ſighs all day,
Reckoning the torments of my hell,
And ſtinging my ſweet joyes away;
I am cal'd home againe to quiet peace,
My Miſtris ſmiles, and all my ſorrowes ceaſe.
Yet what is living in her eyes?
Or being bleſt with her ſweet tongue,
If theſe no other joyes imply?
A golden Give, a pleaſing wrong:
To be your owne but one poore Moneth, I'd give
My youth, my fortune, and then leave to live.

Fred. This is my rivall, that I knew the hand now.

Sor. I know it, I have ſeene it, 'tis Valerio's,
That hopefull Gentlemans that was brought up with ye,
And by your charge nouriſht and fed
At the ſame Table, with the ſame allowance.

Fred. And all this curteſie to ruine me?
Croſſe my deſires? had better have fed humblier,
And ſtood at greater diſtance from my fury:
Go for him quickly, finde him inſtantly,
Whilſt my impatient heart ſwells high with choller;
Better have lov'd deſpaire, and ſafer kiſt her. Exit Lords.

Enter Evandre and Caſſandra.

Eva. Thou old weak foole, doſt thou know to what end,
To what betraying end he got this Casket?
Durſt thou deliver him without my Ring?
Or a command from mine own mouth? that Cabinet
That holds my heart, you unconſiderate aſſe,
Thou brainleſſe Ideot.

Caſ. I ſaw you go with him,
At their firſt word commit your perſon to him,
And made no ſcruple; he is your brothers Gentleman,
And for any thing I know, an honeſt man;
And might not I upon the ſame ſecurity deliver him a (box?

Evan. A Bottle-head.

Fred. You ſhall have cauſe to chafe, as I will handle it.

Eva. I had rather thou hadſt delivered me to Pirats,
Betrald me to uncurable diſeaſes,
Hung up my Picture in a Market place,
And ſold me to wilde bawds.

Caſſan. As I take it Madam,
Your Maidenhead lyes not in that Cabinet,
You have a Cloſer, and you keep the key too,
Why are you vext thus?

Eva. I could curſe thee wickedly,
And wiſh thee more deformed then age can make thee,
Perpetuall hunger, and no teeth to ſatiſhe it,
Waight on thee ſtill, nor ſleep be found to eaſe it:
Thoſe hands that gave the Casket, may the Palſie
For ever make unuſefull, even to feed thee;
Long winters, that thy bones may turne to Iſicles
No Hell can thaw againe, inhabit by thee.
Is thy care like thy body, all on crookednesſe?
How ſcurvily thou crieſt now? like a drunkard,
Ile have as pure teares from a durty ſpout:
Do, ſweare thou didſt this ignorantly, ſweare it,
Sweare and be damn'd, thou halſe witch.

Caſſan. Theſe are fine words, well Madam, Madam.

Evan. 'Tis not well thou mummy,
'Tis impudently, baſely done, thou durty——

Fred. Has your young Lanſtry done railing, Madam, Againſt your innocent Squire? do you ſee this Sonnet?
This loving Scripe do you know from whence it came too?

Eva. I do, and dare avouch it pure and honeſt.

Fred. You have private Viſitants, my noble Lady,
That in ſweet numbers court your goodly vertues,
And to the height of adoration.

Evan. Well Sir,
There's neither Hereſie nor Treaſon in it.

Fred. A Prince may beg at the doore, whilſt theſe feaſt
A favour or a grace, from ſuch as I am. (with ye;

Enter Valerio, and Podrano.

Courſe, common things. You are welcome; pray come
Do you know this paper? (neer, Sir,

Val. I am betray'd; I do Sir,
'Tis mine, my hand and heart, if I die for her,
I am thy Martyr, Love, and time ſhall honour me.

Caſſ. You ſawcy Sir, that came in my Ladies name,
For her guilt Cabinet, you cheating Sir too,
You ſcurvy Uſher, with as ſcurvy legge,
And a worſe face, thou poore baſe hanging holder,
How durſt thou come to me with a lye in thy mouth?
An impudent lye?

Pod. Hollow, good Jill, you hobble.

Caſſ. A ſtinking lye, more ſtinking then the teller,
To play the pilfring knave, there have been raſcals
Brought up to fetch and carry like your Worſhip,
That have been hang'd for leſſe, whipt there are daily
And if the Law will do me right——

Pod. What then old Maggot?

Caſſ. Thy mother was carted younger; Ile have thy hide,
Thy mangy hide, embroder'd with a dog-whip,
As it is now with potent Pox, and thicker.

Fred. Peace, good antiquity, Ile have your bones elſe Ground into Gunpowder to ſhoot at Cats with;
One word more, and Ile blanch thee like an Almond,
There's no ſuch cure for the ſhe-falling-ſickneſſe,
As the powder of a dried bawds skin, be ſilent,
You are very prodigall of your ſervice here, Sir,
Of your life more it ſeemes.

Val. I repent neither,
Becauſe Your Grace ſhall underſtand it comes
From the beſt part of love, my pure affection,
And kindled with chaſte flame, I will not fly from it,
If it be error to deſire to marry,
And marry her that ſanctity would dote on,
I have done amiſſe; if it be a Treaſon
To graft my ſoule to vertue, and to grow there,
To love the tree that beares ſuch happineſſe;
Conceive me, Sir, this fruit was ne're forbidden;
Nay, to deſire to taſte too, I am Traytor;
Had you but plants enough of this bleſt Tree, Sir,
Set round about your Court to beautifie it,
Deaths twice ſo many, to diſmay the aproachers,
The ground would ſcarce yeeld graves to noble Lovers.

Fred. 'Tis well maintain'd, you wiſh and pray to fortune,
Here in your Sonnet, and ſhe has heard your prayers,
So much you dote upon your owne undoing,
But one Month to injoy her as your wife,
Though at the expiring of that time you die for't.

Val. I could wiſh many, many ages Sir,
To grow as old as time in her imbraces,
If heaven would grant it, and you ſmile upon it,
But if my choice were two houres, and then periſh,
I would not pull my heart back.

Fred. You have your wiſh,
To morrow I will ſee you nobly married,
Your Month take out in all content and pleaſure;
The firſt day of the following Moneh you dye for't;
Kneele not, not all your prayers can divert me;
Now marke your ſentence, mark it ſcornfull Lady,
If when Valerio's dead, within twelve houres,
For that's your lateſt time, you finde not out
Another husband on the ſame condition
To marry you againe, you dye your ſelf too.

Evan.

Evan. Now you are mercifull, I thank your Grace.
Fre. If when you are married, you but seek to scape
Out of the Kingdome, you, or he, or both,
Or to infect mens minds with hot commotions,
You dye both instantly; will you love me now Lady?
My tale will now be heard, but now I scorne ye, Exe.
Manent, Valerio, and Evanthe.
Eva. Is our faire love, our honest, our intire,
Come to this hazard? (lice for it,
Val. 'Tis a noble one, and I am much in love with ma-
Envy could not have studied me a way,
Nor fortune pointed out a path to honour,
Straighter and nobler, if she had her eyes:
When I have once injoyed my sweet Evanthe,
And blest my youth with her most deere Imbraces,
I have done my journey here, my day is out,
All that the world has else is foolery,
Labour, and losse of time, what should I live for?
Think but mans life a moneth, and we are happy.
I would not have my joyes grow old for any thing;
A paradise, as thou art my Evanthe,
Is only made to wonder at a little,
Enough for humane eyes, and then to wander from.
Come do not weep, sweet, you dishonour me,
Your teares and griefes but question my ability,
Whether I dare dye: Do you love intirely?
Eva. You know I do.
Val. Then grudge not my felicity.
Eva. Ile to the Queene.
Val. Do any thing that's honest,
But if you sue to him in death, I hate you.

Actus Secundus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Camillo, Cleanther, and Menallo
Cam. WAs there ever heard of such a marriage?
Men. Marriage and hanging go by destiny,
'Tis the old proverb, now they come together.
Cle. But a month married, then to lose his life for't?
I would have a long month sure that payes the Souldiers,
Ent Tony with Urinall.
Cam. Or get all the Almanacks burnt, that were a rare
And have no month remembred. How now Tony? (trick, Whose water are you casting?
Tony. A sick Gentlemans,
Is very sick, much troubled with the stone,
He should not live above a month by his Urine,
About Saint Davids day it will go hard with him,
He will then be troubled with a paine in his neck too.
Men. A pestilent foole; when wilt thou marry Tony?
Ton. When I mean to be hangd, & 'tis the surer contract.
Cle. What think you of this marriage of Valerios?
Tony. They have given him a hot custard, and meane to burne his mouth with it; had I knowne he had been given to die honourably, I would have helpt him to a wench, a rare one, should have kill'd him in three weeks, and sav'd the sentence. (too.
Cam. There be them would have spared ten daies of that
Ton. It may be so, you have women of all vertues;
There be some Guns that I could bring him too,
Some Morter-peeces that are plac'd i'th Suburbs,
Would teare him into quarters in two houres;
There be also of the race of the old Cockatrices,
That would dispatch him with once looking on him.
Men. What Month wouldst thou chuse Tony, if thou hadst the like fortune?
Ton. I would chuse a mull'd Sack month, to comfort my belly, for sure my back would ake for't, and at the months end I would be most dismally drunk, & scorn the gallows.
Me. I would chuse March, for I would come in like a Lion.
To. But you'ld go out like a Lamb, when you went to han-
Ca. I would take April, take the sweet o'th year, (ging.
And kisse my wench upon the tender flowrets,
Tumble on every Greene, and as the birds sung,
Embrace and melt away my soule in pleasure.
Ton. Your would go a Maying gayly to the gallowes.
Clean. Prethee tell us some newes.
Tony. Ile tell ye all I know,
You may be honest and poore fooles, as I am,
And blow your fingers ends.
Cam. That's no newes foole. (knaves,
Ton. You may be knaves then, when you please, starke
And build faire houses, but your heires shall have none of Men. These are undoubted. ('em.
Ton. Truth is not worth the hearing,
Ile tell you newes then, There was a drunken Saylor,
That got a Marmaid with childe as she went a milking,
And now she sues him in the bawdy Court for it,
The infant Monster is brought up in fish-street.
Cam. I, this is something.
Ton. Ile tell you more, There was a fish taken,
A monstrous fish, with a sword by his side, a long sword,
A pike in's neck, and a gun in's nose, a huge gun,
And letters of Mart in's mouth, from the Duke of Florence.
Cle. This is a monstrous lye.
Ton. I do confesse it; ('heare 'em?
Do you think I would tell you truths, that dare not
You are honest things, we Courtiers scorn to converse with.
Cam. A plaguy foole, but lets consider Gentl. (Exit.
Why the Queen strives not to oppose this sentence,
The Kingdomes honour suffers in this cruelty.
Men. No doubt the Queen, though she be vertuous,
Winks at the marriage, for by that only meanes
The Kings flame lessens to the youthfull Lady,
If not goes out, within this month, I doubt not,
She hopes to rock a sleep his anger also;
Shall we go see the preparation?
'Tis time, for strangers come to view the wonder.
Cam. Come, lets away, send my friends happier wed-Enter Queen and Evanthe. (dings. Exe.
Que. You shall be merry, come, Ile have it so,
Can there be any nature so unnoble?
Or anger so unhumane to pursue this?
Eva. I feare there is.
Que. Your feares are poore and foolish,
Though he be hasty, and his anger death,
His will like torrents, not to be resisted,
Yet Law and Justice go along to guide him;
And what Law or what Justice can he finde
To justifie his will? what Act or Statute,
By Humane or Divine establishment,
Left to direct us, that makes marriage death?
Honest faire wedlock? 'twas given for increase,
For preservation of mankinde I take it;
He must be more then man then, that dare break it;
Come dresse ye handsomly, you shall have my Jewels,
And put a face on that contemnes base fortune,
'Twill make him more insult to see you fearfull,
Outlooke his anger.
Eva. O my Valerio!

Be witneſſe my pure minde, 'tis thee I grieve for.
Que. But ſhew it not, I would ſo crucifie him
With an innocent neglect of what he can do,
A brave ſtrong pious ſcorne, that I would ſhake him;
Put all the wanton Cupids in thine eyes,
And all the graces on that nature gave thee,
Make up thy beauty to that height of excellence,
Ile help thee, and forgive thee, as if Venus
Were now againe to catch the God of Warre,
In his moſt rugged anger, when thou haſt him
(As 'tis impoſſible he ſhould reſiſt thee)
And kneeling at thy conquering feet for mercy,
Then ſhew thy vertue, then againe deſpiſe him
And all his power, then with a looke of honour,
Mingled with noble chaſtity, ſtrike him dead.
Eva. Good Madam dreſſe me,
You arme me bravely.
Que. Make him know his cruelty
Begins with him firſt, he muſt ſuffer for it,
And that thy ſentence is ſo welcome to thee,
And to thy noble Lord, You long to meet it.
Stamp ſuch a deep impreſſion of thy beauty
Into his ſoule, and of thy worthineſſe,
That when Valerio and Evanthe ſleep
In one rich earth, hung round about with bleſſings,
He may run mad, and curſe his act; be luſty,
Ile teach thee how to die too, if thou fear'ſt it.
Evan. I thank your Grace, you have prepar'd me ſtrongly,
And my weak minde.
Que. Death is unwelcome never,
Unleſſe it be to tortur'd mindes and ſick ſoules,
That make their own Hells; 'tis ſuch a benefit
When it comes crown'd with honour, ſhews ſo ſweet too,
Though they paint it ugly, that's but to reſtraine us,
For every living thing would love it elſe,
Fly boldly to their peace, ere nature call'd 'em;
The reſt we have from labour, and from trouble,
Is ſome incitement, every thing alike,
The poore ſlave that lies private has his liberty,
As amply as his Maſter, in that Tombe,
The earth as light upon him, and the flowers
That grow about him, ſmell as ſweet, and flouriſh,
But when we love with honour to our ends,
When memory and vertues are our mourners,
What pleaſure's there? they are infinite Evanthe;
Onely, my vertuous wench, we want our ſences,
That benefit we are barr'd, 'twould make us proud elſe,
And lazy to look up to happier life,
The bleſſings of the people would ſo ſwell us.
Evan. Good Madam dreſſe me, you have dreſt my ſoul,
The merrieſt Bride ile be for all this miſery,
The proudeſt to ſome eyes too.
Que. 'Twill do better, come ſhrink no more.
Evan. I am too confident. Exeunt.

Enter Frederick and Soranzo.

Sora. You are too remiſſe and wanton in your angers,
You mold things handſomly, and then neglect 'em;
A powerfull Prince ſhould be conſtant to his power ſtill,
And hold up what he builds, then people feare him;
When he lets looſe his hand, it ſhewes a weakneſſe,
And men examine or contemne his greatneſſe;
A ſcorne of this high kinde ſhould have cal'd up
A revenge equall, not a pitty in you.
Fred. She is thy ſiſter.
Sor. And ſhe were my mother,
Whilſt I conceive ſhe has you wrong'd, I hate her,
And ſhake her neerneſſe off; I ſtudy, Sir,
To ſatisfie your angers that are juſt,
Before your pleaſures.
Fred. I have done that already,
I feare has pull'd to many curſes on me.
Sora. Curſes or envies, on Valerio's head,
Would you take my counſell, Sir, they ſhould all light,
And with the weight, not only crack his ſcull,
But his faire credit; the exquiſite vexation
I have deviſ'd, ſo pleaſe you give way in't,
And let it worke, ſhall more afflict his ſoule,
And trench upon that honour that he brags of,
Then feare of death in all the frights he carries;
If you ſit downe here they will both abuſe ye,
Laugh at your poore relenting powre, and ſcorne ye;
What ſatisfaction can their deaths bring to you,
That are prepar'd and proud to dye, and willingly,
And at their ends will thank you for that honour?
How are you nearer the deſire you aim at?
Or if it be revenge your anger covets,
How can their ſingle deaths give you content, Sir?
Petty revenges end in blood, ſleight angers,
A Princes rage ſhould finde out new diſeaſes,
Death were a pleaſure too, to pay proud fooles with.
Fred. What ſhould I do?
Sor. Adde but your power unto me,
Make me but ſtrong by your protection,
And you ſhall ſee what joy, and what delight,
What infinite pleaſure this poore mouth ſhall yeeld him,
Ile make him wiſh he were dead on's marriage day,
Or bedrid with old age, ile make him curſe,
And cry and curſe, give me but power.
Fred. You have it,
Here take my Ring, I am content he pay for't.
Sor. It ſhall be now revenge, as I will handle it,
He ſhall live after this to beg his life too,
Twenty to one by this thread, as ile weave it,
Evanthe ſhall be yours.
Fred. Take all authority, and be moſt happy.
Sor. Good Sir, no more pitty. Exeunt.

Enter Tony, three Citizens, and three Wives.

1. Wife. Good Maſter Tony, put me in.
Ton. Where do you dwell? (Mutton,
1. Wife. Forſooth, at the ſign of the great ſhoulder of
To. A hungry man would hunt your houſe out inſtantly, Keep the dogs from your doore; Is this Lettice Ruffe your husband? a fine ſharp ſallet to your ſigne.
2. Wife. Will you put me in too?
3. Wife. And me, good Maſter Tony.
Ton. Put ye all in? you had beſt come twenty more; you Think 'tis eaſie, a trick of legerdemaine, to put ye all in,
'Twould poſe a fellow that had twice my body,
Though it were all made into chines and fillets.
2. W. Puts into'th wedding, Sir, we would fain ſee that.
1. W. And the brave Maſque too.
To. You two are pretty women, are you their husbands?
2. Citiz. Yes, for want of better.
Ton. I think ſo too, you would not be ſo mad elſe
To turne 'em looſe to a company of young Courtiers,
That ſwarme like Bees in May, when they ſee young wen-
You muſt not ſqueak. (ches;
3. W. No Sir, we are better tutor'd.
Ton. Nor if a young Lord offer you the curteſie——
2. W. We know what 'tis, Sir.
Ton. Nor you muſt not grumble,
If you be thruſt up hard, we thruſt moſt furiouſly.
1. W. We know the worſt.
Ton. Get you two in then quietly,
And ſhift for your ſelves; we muſt have no old women,
They are out of uſe, unleſſe they have petitions,

Beſides

Beſides they cough ſo loud they drown the Muſick,
You would go in too, but there is no place for ye,
I am ſorry for't, go and forget your wives,
Or pray they may be able to ſuffer patiently.
You may have Heires may prove wiſe Aldermen,
Go, or ile call the Guard.

3 Citi. We will get in, wee'l venture broken pates elſe.

Exit Citiz. and Women.

Ton. 'Tis impoſſible,
You are too ſecurely arm'd; how they flock hether,
And with what joy the women run by heapes
To ſee this Marriage? they tickle to think of it,
They hope for every moneth a husband too;
Still how they run, and how the wretch follow 'em,
The weake things that are worne between the legge,
That bruſhing, dreſſing, nor new naps can mende,
How they poſt to ſee their owne confuſion?
This is a merry world.

Enter Frederick.

Fred. Looke to the doore ſirra,
Thou art a foole, and may'ſt do miſchiefe lawfully.

Ton. Give me your hand, you are my brother Foole,
You may both make the Law, and mar it preſently.
Do you love a wench?

Fred. Who does not foole?

Ton. Not I, unleſſe you will give me a longer leaſe to marry her.

Fred. What are all theſe that come, what buſineſſe have they?

Ton. Some come to gape, thoſe are my fellow fooles;
Some to get home their wives, thoſe be their own fooles;
Some to rejoyce with thee, thoſe be the times fooles;
And ſome I feare to curſe thee, thoſe are poore fooles.

Enter Caſſandra, an old Lady paſſing over.

A ſet people calls them honeſt. Looke, looke King, look,
A weather-beaten Lady new carin'd.

Fred. An old one.

Ton. The glaſſes of her eyes are new rub'd over,
And the worme-eaten records in her face are daub'd up neatly;
She layes her breaſts out too, like to poch'd eggs
That had the yelkes ſuckt out; they get new heads alſo,
New teeth, new tongues, for the old are all worne out,
And as 'tis hoped, new tayles.

Fred. For what?

Ton. For old Courtiers,
The young ones are too ſtirring for their travells.

Fred. Go leave your knavery, and helpe to keepe the doore well,
I will have no ſuch preſſe.

Ton. Lay thy hand a thy heart King.

Fred. Ile have ye whipe.

Ton. The Foole and thou are parted. Exit.

Fred. Soname work, and free me from this ſpell, Twixt love and ſcorne there's nothing felt but hell. Exit.

Enter Valerio, Camillo, Cleantbes, Menallo, and Servants.

Val. Tye on my Scarfe, you are ſo long about me,
Good my Lords help, give me my other Cloke,
That Hat and Feather, Lord what a Taylor's this,
To make me up thus ſtraight, one ſigh would burſt me,
I have not roome to breath, come button, button,
Button, apace.

Cam. I am glad to ſee you merry Sir.

Val. 'Twould make you merry had you ſuch a wife,
And ſuch an age to injoy her in.

Men. An age Sir?

Val. A moneth's an age to him that is contented,
What ſhould I ſeeke for more? give me my ſword.
Ha my good Lords, that every one of you now
Had but a Lady of that youth and beauty
To bleſſe your ſelves this night with, would ye not?
Pray ye ſpeak uprightly.

Cle. We confeſſe ye happy,
And we could well wiſh ſuch another Banquet,
But on that price my Lord——

Val. 'Twere nothing elſe,
No man can ever come to ſome at Heaven,
But by the knowledge of a Hell. Theſe ſhooes are heavy,
And if I ſhould be call'd to dance they'l clog me,
Get me ſome pumps; Ile tell ye brave Camillo,
And you deare friends, the King has honour'd me,
Out of his gracious favour has much honour'd me,
To limit me my time, for who would live long?
Who would be old? 'tis ſuch a wearineſſe,
Such a diſeaſe, that hangs like lead upon us
As it increaſes, ſo vexations,
Griefes of the minde, paines of the feeble body,
Rhumes, coughs, catarrs, we are but our living coffines;
Beſide, the faire ſoules old too, it growes covetous,
Which ſhewes all honour is departed from us,
And we are earth againe.

Cle. You make faire uſe Sir.

Val. I would not live to learne to lye Cleantbes
For all the world, old men are prone to that too;
Thou that haſt been a Souldier, Menallo
A noble Souldier, and defied all danger,
Adopted thy brave arme the heire to victory,
Would'ſt thou live ſo long till thy ſtrength forſooke thee?
Till thou grew'ſt only a long tedious ſtory
Of what thou hadſt been? till thy ſword hang by,
And lazie Spiders fil'd the hilt with cobwebs?

Men. No ſure, I would not.

Val. 'Tis not fit ye ſhould,
To dye a young man is to be an Angell,
Our great good parts, put wings to our ſoules:
Wee'l have a rouſe before we go to bed friends,
Pray ye tell me, iſt a handſome Maske we have?

Cam. We underſtand ſo.

Val. And the young gent. dance?

Cle. They do Sir, and ſome dance well.

Val. They muſt before the Ladies,
Wee'l have a rouſe before we go to bed friends,
A luſty one, 'twill make my blood dance too. Muſick.

Cam. Ten if you pleaſe.

Val. And wee'l be wondrous merry,
They ſtay ſure, come, I heare the Muſick forward,
You ſhall have all Gloves preſently. Exit.

Men. We attend Sir, but firſt we muſt looke to'th Doores. Knocking within.
The King has charged us. Exeunt.

Enter two Servants.

1 Serv. What a noyſe do you keepe there, call my fellowes
A the Guard; you muſt ceaſe now untill the King be Enter'd, he is gone to'th Temple now.

2 Serv. Looke to that back doore, and keep it faſt,
They ſwarme like Bees about it,

Enter Camillo, Cleantbes, Menallo, Tony following, and Foole following.

Cam. Keepe back thoſe Citizens, and let their wives in,
Their handſome wives.

Ton. They have crowded me to Vergis,
I ſweat like a Butter-box.

1 Serv. Stand further off there.

Men. Take the women aſide, and talk with 'em in privat,

Give

Give 'em that they came for.
Tom. The whole Court cannot do it;
Beſides, the next Maske if we uſe 'em ſo,
They'l come by millions to expect our largeſſe;
We have broke a hundred heads.
Cle. Are they ſo tender?
Ton. But 'twas behinde, before they have all murrions.
Cam. Let in thoſe Ladies, make 'em roome for ſhame there.
Ton. They are no Ladies, there's one bald before 'em,
A gent. bald, they are curtall'd queanes in hired clothes,
They come out of Spaine I think, they are very ſultry.
Men. Keep 'em in breath for an Embaſſadour. Knocks within.
Me thinks my noſe ſhakes at their memories,
What bounſing's that?
Within. I am one of the Muſick Sir.
Within. I have ſweet-meats for the banquet.
Cam. Let 'em in.
Ton. They lye my Lord, they come to ſeeke their wives,
Two broken Citizens.
Cam. Breake 'em more, they are but bruſled yet.
Bold Raſcalls, offer to diſturbe your wives.
Cle. Lock the doores faſt; the Muſick, hark, the King (comes.

A Curtaine drawne.

The King, Queene, Valerio, Evanthe, Ladies, Attendants, Camillo, Cleanthes, Sorano, Menallo.

A Maske.

Cupid deſcends, the Graces ſitting by him, Cupid being bound the Graces unbinde him, he ſpeakes.

Cup. Unbinde me, my delight, this night is mine;
Now let me looke upon what Stars here ſhine,
Let me behold the beauties, then clap high
My cullor'd wings, proud of my Deity;
I am ſatisfied, binde me agen, and faſt,
My angry Bow will make too great a waſte
Of beauty elſe, now call my Maskers in,
Call with a Song, and let the ſports begin;
Call all my ſervants the effects of love,
And to a meaſure let them nobly move.
Come you ſervants of proud love,
Come away:
Fairely, nobly, gently move,
Too long, too long you make us ſtay;
Fancy, Deſire, Delight, Hope, Feare,
Diſtruſt and Jealouſie, be you too here;
Conſuming Care, and raging Ire,
And Poverty in poore attire,
March fairely in, and laſt Deſpaire;
Now full Muſick ſtrike the Aire.

Enter the Maskers, Fancy, Deſire, Delight, Hope, Feare, Diſtruſt, Jealouſie, Care, Ire, Deſpaire, they dance, after which Cupid ſpeakes.

Cup. Away, I have done, the day begins to light,
Lovers, you know your fate, good night, good night.
Cupid and the Graces aſcend in the Chariot.
King. Come to the Banquet, when that's ended Sir,
Ile ſee you a bed, and ſo good night; be merry,
You have a ſweet bed-fellow.
Val. I thanke your Grace,
And ever ſhall be bound unto your nobleneſſe.
King. I pray I may deſerve your thankes, ſet forward.
Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter divers Monkes, Alphonſo going to the Tombe, Rugio and Frier Marco diſcover the Tombe and a Chaire.

Mar. THe night growes on, lead ſoftly to the Tombe,
And ſing not till I bid ye; let the Muſick
Play gently as he paſſes.
Rug. O faire picture,
That wert the living hope of all our honours;
How are we baniſht from the joy we dreamt of?
Will he ne're ſpeak more?
Mar. 'Tis full three moneths Lord Rugio,
Since any articulate ſound came from his tongue,
Set him downe gently. Sits in a Chaire.
Rug. What ſhould the reaſon be Sir?
Mar. As 'tis in nature with thoſe loving Husbands,
That ſympathize their wives paines, and their throwes
When they are breeding, and 'tis uſuall too,
We have it by experience ſo in him Sir,
In this moſt noble ſpirit that now ſuffers;
For when his honour'd Father good Brandino
Fell ſick, he felt the griefes, and labour'd with them,
His fits and his diſeaſe he ſtill inherited,
Grew the ſame thing, and had not nature check'd him,
Strength, and ability, he had dyed that houre too.
Rug. Embleme of nobld love!
Mar. That very minute
His fathers breath forſooke him, that ſame inſtant,
A rare example of his piety,
And love paternall, the Organ of his tongue
Was never heard to ſound againe; ſo neare death
He ſeekes to waite upon his worthy Father,
But that we force his meat, he were one body.
Rug. He points toth' Tombe.
Mar. That is the place he honours,
A houſe I feare he will not be long out of.
He will toth' Tombe, good my Lord lend your hand;
Now ſing the Funerall Song, and let him kneele,
For then he is pleas'd. A Song.
Rug. Heaven lend thy powerfull hand,
And eaſe this Prince.
Mar. He will paſſe back againe. Exeunt.

Enter Valerio.

Val. They drink abundantly, I am hot with wine too,
Luſtily warme, Ile ſteale now to my happineſſe,
'Tis midnight, and the ſilent houre invites me,
But ſhe is up ſtill, and attends the Queene;
Thou dew of wine and ſleep hang on their eye-lids,
Steep their dull ſences in the healths they drink,
That I may quickly finde my lov'd Evanthe.
The King is merry too, and dranke unto me,
Signe of faire peace, O this nights bleſſedneſſe!
If I had forty heads I would give all for it.
Is not the end of our ambitions,
Of all our humane ſtudies, and our travells,
Of our deſires, the obtaining of our wiſhes?
Certaine it is, and there man makes his Center.
I have obtain'd Evanthe, I have married her,
Can any fortune keep me from injoying her?

Enter Soranzo.

I have my wish, what's left me to accuse now?
I am friends with all the world, but thy base malice;
Go glory in thy mischiefes thou proud man,
And cry it to the world thou hast ruin'd vertue;
How I contemne thee and thy petty malice,
And with what scorne I looke downe on thy practice.

Sor. You'l sing me a new Song anon Valerio,
And wish these hot words——

Val. I despise thee fellow,
Thy threats, or flatteries, all I fling behinde me;
I have my end, I have thy noble Sister,
A name too worthy of thy blood; I have married her,
And will injoy her too.

Sor. 'Tis very likely.

Val. And that short moneth I have to blesse me with her
Ile make an age, ile reckon each embrace
A yeare of pleasure, and each night a Jubilee,
Every quick kisse a Spring; and when I meane
To lose my selfe in all delightfulnesse,
Twenty sweet Summers I will eye together
In spight of thee, and thy malignant Master:
I will dye old in love, though young in pleasure.

Sor. But that I hate thee deadly, I could pitty thee,
Thou art the poorest miserable thing
This day on earth; ile tell thee why Valerio,
All thou esteemest, and build'st upon for happinesse,
For joy, for pleasure, for delight is past thee,
And like a wanton dreame already vanisht.

Val. Is my love false?

Sor. No, she is constant to thee,
Constant to all thy misery she shall be,
And curse thee too.

Val. Is my strong body weakn'd,
Charm'd, or abus'd with subtle drink? speak villaine.

Sor. Neither, I dare speake, thou art still as lusty
As when thou lovedst her first, as strong and hopefull,
The month thou hast given thee is a month of misery,
And where thou think'st each hower shall yeeld a pleasure
Looke for a killing paine, for thou shalt finde it
Before thou dyest, each minute shall prepare it,
And ring so many knells to sad afflictions;
The King has given thee a long moneth to dye in,
And miserably dye.

Val. Unclo thy Riddle,
I am prepar'd what ever fate shall follow.

Sor. Dost thou see this Ring?

Val. I know it too.

Sor. Then marke me,
By vertue of this Ring this I pronounce to thee,
'Tis the Kings will.

Val. Let me know it suddenly.

Sor. If thou dost offer to touch Evanthe's body
Beyond a kisse, though thou art married to her,
And lawfully as thou think'st may'st injoy her,
That minute she shall dye.

Val. O Devill——

Sor. If thou discover this command unto her,
Or to a friend that shall importune thee,
And why thou abstainest, and from whose will, ye all pe-
Upon the self-same forfeit are ye sized Sir, (rish,
Now if ye love her, ye may preserve her life still,
If not, you know the worst, how saith your mouth out?

Val. This tyranny could never be invented
But in the Schoole of Hell, earth is too innocent;
Not to injoy her when she is my wife?
When she is willing too?

Sor. She is most willing,
And will run mad to misse; but if you hit her,
Be sure you bit her home, and kill her with it;
There are such women that will dye with pleasure:
The Axe will follow else, that will not faile
To fetch her Maiden-head, and dispatch her quickly;
Then shall the world know you are the cause of Murther,
And as 'tis requisite your life shall pay for't.

Val. Thou dost but jest, thou canst not be so monstrous
As thou proclaim'st thy selfe; thou art her Brother, and there must be a feeling heart within thee
Of her afflictions; were thou a stranger to us,
And bred amongst wilde rocks, thy nature wilde too,
Affection in thee as thy breeding, cold,
And unrelenting as the rocks that nourisht thee,
Yet thou must shake to tell me this; they tremble
When the rude sea threatens divorce amongst 'em,
They that are senceleese things shake at a tempest;
Thou art a man——

Sor. Be thou too then, 'twill try thee,
And patience now will best become thy nobleness.

Val. Invent some other torment to afflict me,
All, if thou please, put all afflictions on me,
Study thy braines out for 'em, so this be none
I care not of what nature, nor what cruelty,
Nor of what length.

Sor. This is enough to vex ye.

Val. The tale of Tantalus is now prov'd true,
And from me shall be registred Authentick,
To have my joyes within my armes, and lawfull,
Mine owne delights, yet dare not touch. (this,
Even as thou hatest me Brother, let no young man know
As thou shalt hope for peace when thou most needst it,
Peace in thy soule, desire the King to kill me,
Make me a traitor, any thing, ile yeeld to it,
And give thee cause so I may dye immediately;
Lock me in Prison where no Sun may see me,
In walls so thick no hope may ere come at me;
Keep me from meat, and drink, and sleep, ile blesse thee;
Give me some damned potion to deliver me,
That I may never know my selfe againe, forget
My Country kindred, name and fortune; last,
That my chaste love may never appeare before me,
This were some comfort.

Sor. All I have I have brought ye,
And much may it do ye with it my deare Brother,
See ye observe it well; you will finde about ye
Many eyes set, that shall o're-looke your actions,
If you transgresse ye know, and so I leave ye.

Val. Heaven be not angry, and I have some hope yet,
And when you please, and how allay my miseries.

Enter Frederick.

To whom I kneele be mercifull unto me,
Looke on my harmeleese youth Angels of pitty,
And from my bleeding heart wipe off my sorrowes,
The power, the pride, the malice and injustice
Of cruell men are bent against mine innocence.
You that controwle the mighty wills of Princes,
And bow their stubborne armes, look on my weaknesse,
And when you please, and how, allay my miseries. Exit.

Fred. Hast thou been with him?

Sor. Yes, and given him that Sir
Will make him curse his Birth; I told ye which way,
Did you but see him Sir, but look upon him,
With what a troubled and dejected nature
He walkes now in a mist, with what a silence,
As if he were the shrowd he wrapt himselfe in,
And no more of Valerio but his shadow,
He seekes obscurity to hide his thoughts in,

You

You would wonder and admire for all you know't,
His jollity is downe, valed to the ground Sir,
And his high hopes of full delights and pleasures
Are turn'd tormenters to him, strong diseases.
Fred. But is there hope of her?
Sor. It must fall necessary
She must dislike him, quarrell with his person,
For women once deluded are next Devills,
And in the height of that opinion Sir,
You shall put on againe, and she must meet ye,
Fred. I am glad of this.
Sor. Ile tell ye all the circumstance
Within this houre, but sure I heard your Grace
To day as I attended, make some stops,
Some broken speeches, and some sighs between,
And then your Brothers name I heard distinctly,
And some sad wishes after.
Fred. Ye are i'th right Sir,
I would he were as sad as I could wish him,
Sad as the earth.
Sor. Would ye have it so?
Fred. Thou heares't me,
Though he be sick with small hope of recovery,
That hope still lives, and mens eyes live upon it,
And in their eyes their wishes; my Soran,
Were he but cold once in the tombe he dotes on,
As 'tis the fittest place for melancholly,
My Court should be another Paradice,
And flow with all delights.
Sor. Go to your pleasures, let me alone with this,
Hope shall not trouble ye, nor he three dayes.
Fred. I shall be bound unto thee.

Enter Valerio, Camillo, Cleanthes, Menallo.

Sor. Ile do it neatly too, no doubt shall catch me.
Fred. Be gone, they are going to bed, ile bid good night to 'em.
Sor. And mark the man, you'le scarce know 'tis Valerio. Exit.
Cam. Cheere up my noble Lord, the minutes come,
You shall injoy the abstract of all sweetnesse,
We did you wrong you need no wine to warme ye,
Desire shoots through your eyes like sudden wild-fires.
Val. Beshrew me Lords, the wine has made me dull,
I am I know not what.
Fred. Good pleasure to ye,
Good night and long too, as you finde your appetite
You may fall too.
Val. I do beseech your Grace,
For which of all my loves and services
Have I deserved this:
Fred. I am not bound to answer ye.
Val. Nor I bound to obey in unjust actions.
Fred. Do as you please, you know the penalty,
And as I have a soule it shall be executed;
Nay look not pale, I am not used to feare Sir,
If you respect your Lady, good night to ye Exit.
Val. But for respect to her and to my duty,
That reverent duty that I owe my Soveraigne,
Which anger has no power to snatch me from,
The good night should be thine; good night for ever,
The King is wanton Lords, he would needs know of me
How many nick chases I would make to night.
Men. My Lord, no doubt you'l prove a perfect gamester.
Val. Faith no, I am unacquainted with the pleasure,
Bungle a set I may, how my heart trembles,
And beats my breast as it would breake his way out
Good night my noble friends.
Cle. Nay we must see you toward your bed my Lord.
Val. Good faith it needs not,
'Tis late, and I shall trouble you.
Cam. No, no, till the Bride come Sir.
Val. I beseech you leave me,
You will make me bashfull else, I am so foolish,
Besides, I have some few devotions Lords,
And he that can pray with such a book in's armes ——
Cam. Wee'l leave ye then, and a sweet night wait upon ye.
Men. And a sweet issue of this sweet night crown ye.
Cle. All nights and dayes be such till you grow old Sir.
Exeunt Lords.
Val. I thank ye, 'tis a curse sufficient for me,
A labour'd one too, though you meane a blessing.
What shall I do, I am like a wretched Debtor,
That has a summe to tender on the forfeit
Of all he is worth, yet dare not offer it.
Other men see the Sun, yet I must wink at it;
And though I know 'tis perfect day, deny it:
My veines are all on fire, and burne like Ætna,
Youth and desire beat larums to my blood,
And adde fresh fuell to my warme affections.
I must injoy her, yet when I consider,
When I collect my selfe, and weigh her danger,
The Tyrants will, and his powre taught to murther,
My tender care controlls my blood within me,
And like a cold fit of a pervish Ague
Creepes to my soule, and flings an Ice upon me.

Enter Queene, Evanthe, Ladies, and Foole.

That locks all powres of youth up but prevention;
O what a blessednesse 'twere to be old now,
To be unable, bed-rid with diseases,
Or halt on Crutches to meet holy Hymen;
What a rare benefit, but I am curst
That that speakes other men most freely happy,
And makes all eyes hang on their expectations,
Must prove the bane of me youth, and ability.
She comes to bed, how shall I entertaine her?
Ton. Nay I come after too, take the foole with ye,
For lightly he is ever one at Weddings.
Quee. Evanthe, make ye unready, your Lord staies for ye,
And prethee be merry.
Ton. Be very merry, Chicken,
Thy Lord will pipe to thee anon, and make thee dance too.
Lady. Will he so, good-man asse.
Ton. Yes goody silly,
And you had such a Pipe, that piped so sweetly,
You would dance to death, you have learnt your sinque a pace.
Evan. Your Grace desires that that is too free in me,
I am merry at the heart.
Ton. Thou wilt be anon, the young smug Boy will give thee a sweet cordiall.
Evan. I am so taken up in all my thoughts,
So possest Madam with the lawfull sweets
I shall this night partake of with my Lord,
So far transported (pardon my immmodesty)
Val. Alas poore wench, how shall I recompence thee?
Evan. That though they must be short, and snatcht away too,
E're they grow ripe, yet I shall far prefer 'em
Before a tedious pleasure with repentance.
Val. O how my heart akes.
Evan. Take off my Jewells Ladies,
And let my Ruffe loose, I shall bid good night to ye,
My Lord staies here.
Quee. My wench, I thank thee heartily,
For learning how to use thy few houres handsomly,

They

They will be yeares I hope; off with your Gowne now,
Lay downe the bed there?
Ton. Shall I get into it and warme it for thee, a Fooles fire is a fine thing,
And I 'll ſo buſſe thee.
Quee. Ile have ye whipt ye raſcall.
Ton. That will provoke me more, ile talke with thy husband,
He's a wiſe man I hope.
Evan. Good night deare Madam,
Ladies, no further ſervice, I am well,
I do beſeech your Grace to give us this leave,
My Lord and I to one another freely,
And privately, may do all other Ceremonies,
Women and Page wee'l be to one another,
And trouble you no farther.
Ton. Art thou a wiſe man?
Val. I cannot tell thee Tony, aske my neighbours.
Ton. If thou beeſt ſo, go lye with me to night,
The old foole will lye quieter then the young one,
And give thee more ſleep, thou wilt looke to morrow elſe Worſe then the prodigall foole the Ballad ſpeakes of,
That was ſqeez'd through a horne.
Val. I ſhall take thy counſell.
Quee. Why then good night, good night my beſt Evan-
My worthy maid, and as that name ſhall vaniſh, the,
A worthy wife, a long and happy; follow ſirra.
Evan. That ſhall be my care,
Goodneſſe reſt with your Grace.
Quee. Be luſty Lord, and take your Lady to ye,
And that power that ſhall part ye be unhappy.
Val. Sweet reſt unto ye, to ye all ſweet Ladies;
Tony good night.
Ton. Shall not the Foole ſtay with thee?
Quee. Come away Sirra. Exeunt Queene, Ladies.
Ton. How the Foole is ſought for, ſweet Malt is made of eaſie fire,
A haſty horſe will quickly tire, a ſudden leaper ſticks i'th mire, Phlebotomy and the word lye nier, take heed of friend I thee require;
This from an Almanack I ſtole, and learnt this Leſſon from a foole.
Good night my Bird. Exit Tony
Evan. Good night wiſe Maſter Tony;
Will ye to bed my Lord? Come, let me help ye.
Val. To bed Evanthe, art thou ſleepy?
Evan. No, I ſhall be worſe if you look ſad upon me,
Pray ye let's to bed.
Val. I am not well my love.
Evan. Ile make ye well, there's no ſuch Phiſick for ye
As your warme Miſtris armes.
Val. Art thou ſo cunning?
Evan. I ſpeake not by experience, pray ye miſtake not;
But if you love me ——
Val. I do love ſo dearely,
So much above the baſe bent of deſire
I know not how to anſwer thee.
Evan. To bed then,
There I ſhall better credit yea; fie my Lord,
Will ye put a maid too't, to teach ye what to do?
An innocent maid? Are ye ſo cold a Lover?
Intruth you make me bluſh, 'tis midnight too,
And 'tis no ſtolne love, but authoriſed openly,
No ſin we covet, pray let me undreſſe ye,
You ſhall help me; prethee ſweet Valerio;
Be not ſo ſad, the King will be more mercifull.
Val. May not I love thy minde?
Evan. And I yours too,
'Tis a moſt noble one, adorn'd with vertue;
But if we love not one another really,
And put our bodies and our mindes together,
And ſo make up the concord of affection,
Our love will prove but a blinde ſuperſtition:
This is no ſchoole to argue in my Lord,
Nor have we time to talke away allow'd us,
Pray let's diſpatch, if any one ſhould come
And finde us at this diſtance, what would they think?
Come, kiſſe me and to bed.
Val. That I dare do, and kiſſe againe.
Evan. Spare not, they are your owne Sir,
Val. But to injoy thee is to be luxurious,
Too ſenſuall in my love, and too ambitious;
O how I burne to pluck thee from the ſtalke,
Where now thou grow'ſt a ſweet bud and a beauteous,
And bear'ſt the prime and honour of the Garden,
Is but to violate thy ſpring, and ſpoile thee.
Evan. To let me blow, and fall alone would anger ye.
Val. Let's ſit together thus, and as we ſit
Feed on the ſweets of one anothers ſoules,
The happineſſe of love is contemplation,
The bleſſednеſſe of love is pure affection,
Where no allay of actuall dull deſire,
Of pleaſure that partakes with wantonneſſe,
Of humane fire that burnes out as it kindles,
And leaves the body but a poore repentance,
Can ever mix, let's fixe on that Evanthe,
That's everlaſting, the tother caſuall;
Eternity breeds one, the other Fortune,
Blinde as her ſelfe, and full of all afflictions.
Shall we love vertuouſly?
Evan. I ever loved ſo.
Val And only think our love; the rareſt pleaſure,
And that we moſt deſire, let it be humane,
If once injoyed growes ſtale, and cloyes our appetites;
I would not leſſen in my love for any thing,
Nor finde thee but the ſame in my ſhort journey,
For my loves ſafety.
Evan. Now I ſee I am old Sir,
Old and ill-favour'd too, poore and deſpiſ'd,
And am not worth your noble Fellowſhip,
Your fellowſhip in Love, you would not elſe
Thus cunningly ſeeke to betray a maid,
A maid that honours you thus piouſly;
Strive to abuſe the pious love ſhe brings ye.
Farewell my Lord, ſince ye have a better Miſtris;
For it muſt ſeeme ſo, or ye are no man,
A younger, happier, I ſhall give her roome,
So much I love ye ſtill.
Val. Stay my Evanthe,
Heaven beare me witneſſe, thou art all I love,
All I deſire, and now have pitty on me,
I never lyed before; forgive me Juſtice,
Youth and affection ſtop your eares unto me.
Evan. Why do you weep? if I have ſpoke too harſhly,
And unbeſeeming my beloved Lord,
My care and duty, pardon me.
Val. O heare me,
Heare me Evanthe; I am all on torture
And this lye tears my conſcience as I vent it;
I am no man.
Evan. How Sir?
Val. No man for pleaſure, no womans man, (ſelfe;
Evan. Goodneſſe forbid my Lord, ſure you abuſe your
Val. 'Tis true Evanthe;
I ſhame to ſay you will finde it. Weepes.
Evan. He weepes bitterly,
'Tis my hard fortune, bleſſe all young maids from it;

Is there no help my Lord in Art will comfort ye?
Val. I hope there is.
Evan. How long have you been deſtitute?
Val. Since I was young.
Evan. 'Tis hard to dye for nothing,
Now you ſhall know 'tis not the pleaſure Sir,
(For I am compell'd to love you ſpiritually)
That women aime at I affect ye for,
'Tis for your worth; and kiſſe me, be at peace,
Becauſe I ever loved ye I ſtill honour'd ye,
And with all duty to my Husband follow ye;
Will ye to bed now? ye are aſham'd it ſeemes;
Pigmalion prayed and his cold ſtone took life,
You do not know with what zeale I ſhall aske Sir,
And what rare miracle that may worke upon ye;
Still bluſh? preſcribe your Law.
Val. I prethee pardon me,
To bed, and ile ſit by thee, and mourne with thee,
Mourne both our fortunes, our unhappy ones:
Do not deſpiſe me, make me not more wretched,
I pray to heaven when I am gone Evanthe,
As my poore date is but a ſpan of time now,
To recompence thy noble patience,
Thy love and vertue with a fruitfull husband,
Honeſt and honourable.
Evan. Come, you have made me weep now,
All fond deſire dye here, and welcome chaſtity,
Honour and chaſtity, do what you pleaſe Sir. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter at one doore Rugio, and Frier Marco, at the other doore Sorano, with a little glaſſe violl.

Rug. WHat ailes this peece of miſchief to looke ſad?
He ſeemes to weep too.
Mar. Something is a hatching,
And of ſome bloody nature too Lord Rugio,
This Crocadile mournes thus cunningly.
Sor. Haile holy Father,
And good day to the good Lord Rugio,
How fares the ſad Prince I beſeech ye Sir?
Rug. 'Tis like you know, you need not aske that queſtion,
You have your eyes and watches on his miſeries
As neare as ours, I would they were as tender.
Mar. Can you do him good? as the King and you appointed him,
So he is ſtill, as you deſir'd I think too,
For every day he is worſe (Heaven pardon all)
Put off your ſorrow, you may laugh now Lord,
He cannot laſt long to diſturbe your Maſter,
You have done worthy ſervice to his Brother,
And he moſt memorable love.
Sor. You do not know Sir
With what remorſe I aske, nor with what wearineſſe
I grone and bow under this load of honour,
And how my ſoule ſighs for the beaſtly ſervices,
I have done his pleaſures, theſe be witneſſe with me,
And from your piety beleeve me Father,
I would as willingly unclothe my ſelfe
Of title, that becomes me not I know;
Good men, and great names beſt agree together;
Caſt off the glorious favours, and the trappings
Of ſound and honour, wealth and promiſes,
His wanton pleaſures have flung on my weakneſſe,
And chuſe to ſerve my Countries cauſe and vertues,
Poorely and honeſtly, and redeeme my ruines,
As I would hope remiſſion of my miſchiefes.
Rug. Old and experienc'd men my Lord Sorano,
Are not ſo quickly caught with gilt hypocriſie,
You pull your clawes in now and fawne upon us,
As Lyons do to intice poore fooliſh beaſts;
And beaſts we ſhould be too if we beleeved ye,
Go exerciſe your Art.
Sor. For heaven ſake ſcorne me not,
Nor adde more hell to my afflicted ſoule
Then I feele here; as you are honourable,
As you are charitable looke gently on me,
I will no more to Court, be no more Devill,
I know I muſt be hated even of him
That was my Love now, and the more he loves me
For his ſoule ends, when they ſhall once appeare to him,
Muſter before his conſcience and accuſe him,
The fouler and the more falls his diſpleaſure,
Princes are fading things, ſo are their favours. (morce.
Mar. He weeps agen, his heart is toucht ſure with re-
Sor. See this, and give me faire attention good my Lord,
And worthy Father ſee, within this violl
The remedy and cure of all my honour,
And of the ſad Prince lyes.
Rug. What new trick's this?
Sor. 'Tis true, I have done Offices abundantly
Ill, and prodigious to the Prince Alphonſo,
And whilſt I was a knave I ſought his death too.
Rug. You are too late convicted to be good yet.
Sor. But Father, when I felt this part afflict me,
This inward, and call'd me to an audit
Of my miſdeeds and miſchiefes———
Mar. Well, go on Sir.
Sor. Othen, then, then, what was my glory then Father?
The favour of the King, what did that eaſe me?
What was it to be bow'd to by all creatures?
Worſhipt, and courted, what did this availe me?
I was a wretch, a poore loſt wretch.
Mar. Still better.
Sor. Till in the midſt of all my griefe I found
Repentance, and a learned man to give the meanes to it,
A Jew, an honeſt and a rare Phiſition,
Of him I had this Jewell; 'tis a Jewell,
And at the price of all my wealth I bought it:
If the King knew it I muſt loſe my head,
And willingly, moſt willingly I would ſuffer,
A childe may take it, 'tis ſo ſweet in working.
Mar. To whom would you apply it too?
Sor. To the ſick Prince,
It will in halfe a day diſſolve his melancholly.
Rug. I do beleeve, and give him ſleep for ever.
What impudence is this, and what baſe malice,
To make us inſtruments of thy abuſes?
Are we ſet here to poiſon him?
Sor. Miſtake not, yet I muſt needs ſay, 'tis a noble care,
And worthy vertuous ſervants; if you will ſee
A flouriſhing eſtate againe in Naples,
And great Alphonſo reigne that's truly good,
And like himſelfeable to make all excellent;
Give him this drink, & this good health unto him. Drinks
I am not ſo deſperate yet to kill my ſelfe,
Never looke on me as a guilty man,
Nor on the water as a ſpeedy poiſon:
I am not mad, nor laid out all my treaſure,
My conſcience and my credit to abuſe ye;
How nimbly and how cheerefully it workes now

Upon

Upon my heart and head, ſure I am a new man
There is no ſadneſſe that I feele within me,
But as it meets it like a lazie vapour
How it flyes off. Here, give it him with ſpeed,
You are more guilty then I ever was,
And worthier of the name of evill ſubjects
If but an houre you hold this from his health.
Reg. 'Tis ſome rare vertuous thing ſure, he is a good man,
It muſt be ſo, come, let's apply it preſently,
And may it ſweetly work.
Sor. Pray let me heare on't, and carry it cloſe my Lords.
Mar. Yes, good Soranzo. Exit Regio, Marcel.
Sor. Do my good fooles, my honeſt pious coxcombe,
My wary fooles too, have I caught your wiſedomes,
You never dream't I knew an Antidote,
Nor how to take it to ſecure mine owne life;
I am an aſſe, go, give him the fine cordiall,
And when you have done go dig his grave, good Frier,
Some two houres hence we ſhall have ſuch a bawling,
And roaring up and downe for Aquavitæ,
Such rubbing, and ſuch nointing, and ſuch cooling,
I have ſent him that will make a bonefire in's belly,
If he recover it, there is no heat in Hell ſure. Exit.

Enter Frederick and Podrano.

Fred. Podrano?
Pod. Sir.
Fred. Call hither Lord Valerio, and let none trouble us.
Pod. It ſhall be done Sir. Exit.

Enter Caſſandra.

Fred. I know he wants no additions to his tortures,
He has enough for humane blood to carry,
Yet I muſt vex him further;
So many that I wonder his hot youth
And high-bred ſpirit breakes not into fury;
I muſt yet torture him a little further,
And make my ſelfe ſport with his miſeries,
My anger is too poore elſe. Here he comes, Valerio.
Now my young married Lord, how do you feele your ſelf?
You have the happineſſe you ever aimed at
The joy and pleaſure.
Val. Would you had the like Sir.
Fred. You tumble in delights with your ſweet Lady,
And draw the minutes out in deare embraces,
You live a right Lords life.
Val. Would you had tryed it,
That you might know the vertue but to ſuffer,
Your anger though it be unjuſt and inſolent,
Sits handſomer upon you then your ſcorne,
To do a wilfull ill and glory in it,
Is to do it double, double to be damn'd too.
Fred. Haſt thou not found a loving and free Prince,
High in his favours too; that has confer'd
Such hearts eaſe, and ſuch heapes of comfort on thee,
All thou coudeſt aske.
Val. You are too growne a tyrant
Upon ſo ſuffering, and ſo ſtill a ſubject;
You have put upon me ſuch a puniſhment,
That if your youth were honeſt it would bluſh at:
But you are a ſhame to nature, as to vertue.
Pull not my rage upon ye, 'tis ſo juſt,
It will give way to no reſpect; my life,
My innocent life, I dare maintaine it Sir,
Like a wanton prodigall you have flung away,
Had I a thouſand more I would allow 'em,
And be as careleſſe of 'em as your will is;
But to deny thoſe rights the Law has given me,
The holy Law, and make her life the pennance,
Is ſuch a ſtudied and unheard of malice,
No heart that is not hyred from Hell dare think of;
To do it then too, when my hopes were high,
High as my blood, all my deſires upon me,
My free affections ready to embrace her,
And ſhe mine owne; do you ſmile at this, ill done well?
Is there not heaven above you that ſees all?
Come hither Time, how does your noble Miſtris?
Caſſ. As a Gentlewoman may do in her caſe that's newly married Sir:
Sickly ſometimes, and fond on't, like your Majeſty.
Fred. She is breeding then?
Caſſ. She wants much of her fullour,
And has her qualmes as ladies uſe to have Sir,
And her diſguſts.
Fred. And keeps her chamber?
Caſſ. Yes Sir.
Fred. And eats good Broaths and Jellies.
Caſſ. I am ſure ſhe ſighs Sir, and weepes, good Lady,
Fred. Alas good Lady for it,
She ſhould have one could comfort her Caſſandra,
Could turne thoſe teares to joyes, a luſty comforter.
Caſſ. A comfortable man does well at all houres,
For he brings comfortable things. (eaten Onions,
Fred. Come hither, & hold your face between, you have
Her breath ſtinks like a Fox, her teeth are contagious, Theſe old women are all Elder-pipes, do ye mark me.
Gives a Purſe.
Caſſ. Yes Sir, but does your Grace think I am fit,
That am both old and vertuous.
Fred. Therefore the fitter, the older ſtill the better,
I know thou art as holy as an old Cope,
Yet upon neceſſary uſe.
Caſſ. 'Tis true Sir.
Fred. Her feeling ſence is fierce ſtill, ſpeake unto her,
You are familiar, ſpeake I ſay unto her,
Speake to the purpoſe, tell her this, and this.
Caſſ. Alas, ſhe is honeſt, Sir, ſhe is very honeſt,
And would you have my gravity——
Fred. I, I, your gravity will become the cauſe the better,
Ile looke thee out a Knight ſhall make thee a Lady too,
A luſty Knight, and one that ſhall be ruled by her,
And adde to theſe, ile make 'em good, no mincing,
Nor ducking out of nicity good Lady,
But do it home, wee'l all be friends to tell her;
And ſuch a joy——
Caſſ. That's it that ſtirs me up Sir,
I would not for the world attempt her chaſtity,
But that they may live lovingly hereafter.
Fred. For that I urge it too. (good, Sir,
Caſſ. A little evill may well be ſuffered for a generall Ile take my leave of your Majeſty. Exit.

Enter Valerio.

Fred. Go fortunately, be ſpeedy too, here comes Valerio,
If his affliction have allayed his ſpirit
My work has end. Come hither Lord Valerio,
How do you now?
Val. Your Majeſty may gheſſe,
Not ſo well, nor ſo fortunate as you are,
That can tye up mens honeſt wills and actions.
Fred. You have the happineſſe you ever aim'd at,
The joy, and pleaſure.
Val. Would you had the like Sir.
Fred. You tumble in delights with your ſweet Lady;
And draw the minutes out in deare embraces,
You lead a right Lords life.
Val. Would you had tryed it,
That you might know the vertue but to ſuffer,
If anger, though it be unjuſt and inſolent

Sits hansomer upon you then your scorne, Sir.
Fred. You clearly see now brave Valerio
What 'tis to be the rivall to a Prince,
To interpose against a raging Lion;
I know you have suffer'd, infinitely suffer'd,
And with a kinde of pitty I behold it,
And if you dare be worthy of my mercy,
I can yet heale you; yeeld up your Evanthe,
Take off my sentence also.
Val. I fall thus low Sir,
My poore sad heart under your feet I lay,
And all the service of my life.
Fred. Do this then, for without this 'twill be impossible,
Part with her for a while.
Val. You have parted us,
What should I do with that I cannot use Sir?
Fred. 'Tis well consider'd, let me have the Lady,
And thou shalt see how nobly Ile befriend thee,
How all this difference.
Val. Will she come, do you think Sir?
Fred. She must be wrought, I know she is too modest,
And gently wrought, and cunningly.
Val. 'Tis fit Sir.
Fred. And secretly it must be done.
Val. As thought.
Fred. Ile warrant ye, her honour shall be faire still,
No soyle nor staine shall appeare on that, Valerio,
You see a thousand that beare sober faces,
And shew of as in-imitable modesties;
You would be sworn to that, they were pure Matrons,
And most chaste maids; and yet to augment their fortunes
And get them noble friends——— (for't,
Val. They are content Sir,
In private to bestow their beauties on 'em.
Fred. They are so, and they are wise, they know no want
Nor no eye sees they want their honesties.
Val. If it might be carried thus.
Fred. It shall be Sir.
Val. Ile see you dead first, with this caution,
Why sure I think it might be done.
Fred. Yes, easily.
Val. For what time would your Grace desire her body?
Fred. A moneth or two, it shall be carried still
As if she kept with you, and were a stranger,
Rather a hater of the Grace I offer:
And then I will returne her with such honour——
Val. 'Tis very like I dote much on your honour.
Fred. And load her with such favour to Valerio——
Val. She never shall claw off, I humbly thank ye.
Fred. Ile make ye both the happiest, and the richest,
And the mightiest too———
Val. But who shall work her Sir,
For on my conscience she is very honest,
And will be hard to cut as a rough Diamond?
Fred. Why you must work her, any thing from your (tongue,
Set off with golden and perswasive language,
Urging your dangers too.
Val. But all this time
Have you the conscience Sir to leave me nothing,
Nothing to play withall?
Fred. There be a thousand, take where thou wilt.
Val. May I make bold with your Queene,
She is useleſſe to your Grace as it appeares Sir,
And but a loyall wife that may be lost too;
I have a minde to her, and then 'tis equall?
Fred. How Sir?
Val. 'Tis so Sir, thou most glorious impudence,
Have I not wrongs enow to suffer under,
But thou must pick me out to make a monster?
A hated wonder to the world? Do you stare
At my intrenching on your private liberty,
And would you force a hye-way through mine honour,
And make me pave it too? but that thy Queene
Is of that excellence in honesty,
And guarded with Divinity about her,
No loose thought can come neare, nor flame unhallowed,
I would so right my selfe.
Fred. Why take her to ye,
I am not vext at this, thou shalt injoy her,
Ile be thy friend if that may win thy courtesie.
Val. I will not be your Bawd though for your Royalty.
Was I brought up, and nourisht in the Court,
With thy most Royall Brother and thy selfe,
Upon thy Fathers charge, thy happy Fathers,
And suckt the sweetnesse of all humane Arts,
Learnt armes and honour to become a rascall;
Was this the expectation of my youth,
My growth of honour? Do ye speak this truly,
Or do ye try me Sir? for I beleeve not,
At least I would not, and me thinks 'tis impossible
There should be such a Devill in a Kings shape,
Such a malignant Fiend.
Fred. I thank ye Sir,
To morrow is your last day, and looke to it,
Get from my sight, away.
Val. Ye are, Oh, my heart's too high and full to think upon ye. Exeunt.

Enter Evanthe and Cassandra.

Evan. You think it fit then mortified Cassandra,
That I should be a Whore?
Cass. Why a whore, Madam?
If every woman that upon necessity
Did a good turne, for there's the maine point, mark it,
Were term'd a whore, who would be honest, Madam?
Your Lords life and your owne are now in hazard,
Two precious lives may be redeem'd with nothing,
Little or nothing; say an houres or dayes sport,
Or such a toy, the end to it is wantonnesse.
(That we call lust that maidens lose their fame for)
But a compell'd necessity of honour,
Faire as the day, and cleare as innocence,
Upon my life and conscience a direct way.———
Evan. To be a rascall.
Cass. 'Tis a kinde of Rape too,
That keeps you cleare, for where your will's compell'd,
Though you yeeld up your body you are safe still.
Evan. Thou art grown a learned Bawd, I ever look'd
Thy great sufficiency would breake out.
Cass. You may,
You that are young and faire scorne us old creatures,
But you must know my yeares ere you be wise Lady,
And my experience too; say the King loved ye?
Say it were nothing else?
Evan. I marry wench, now thou comest to me. (things,
Cass. Doe you thinke Princes favours are such sleight
To fling away when you please? there be young Ladies
Both faire and honourable, that would leap to reach 'em,
And leap aloft too.
Evan. Such are light enough;
I am no Valter, wench, but canst thou tell me,
Though he be a King, whether he be sound or no?
I would not give my youth up to infection.
Cass. As sound as honour ought to be, I think Lady;
Go too, be wise, I do not bid you try him;
But if he love you well, and you neglect him,
Your Lords life hanging on the hazard of it,

If

If you be ſo wilfull proud.
Evan. Thou ſpeakeſt to the point ſtill;
But when I have lyen with him, what am I then, Gentlewoman?
Caſſ. What are you? why the ſame you are now, a Woman,
A vertuous woman, and a noble woman,
Touching at what is noble, you become ſo.
Had Lucrece e're been thought of, but for Tarquin?
She was before a ſimple unknowne woman,
When ſhe was ravifht, ſhe was a reverent Saint;
And do you think ſhe yeelded not a little?
And had a kinde of will to have been re-ravifht?
Believe it yet: There are a thouſand ſtories
Of wondrous loyall women, that have ſlipt,
But it has been on the lee of tender honour,
That kept 'em coole ſtill to the world, I think you are bleſt,
That have ſuch an occaſion in your hands to beget a Chronicle,
A faithfull one.
Evan. It muſt needs be much honour.
Caſſ. As you may make it, infinite and ſafe too,
And when 'tis done, your Lord and you may live
So quietly and peaceably together,
And be what you pleaſe.
Evan. But ſuppoſe this, wench,
The King ſhould ſo delight me with his company,
I ſhould forget my Lord, and no more look on him.
Caſſ. That's the maine hazard, for I tell you truly,
I have heard report ſpeak, is an infinite pleaſure,
Almoſt above beliefe: there be ſome Ladies,
And modeſt to the world too, wondrous modeſt,
That have had the bleſſedneſſe to try his body,
That I have heard proclaime him a new Hercules.
Evan. So ſtrongly able?
Caſſan. There will be the danger,
You being but a young and tender Lady,
Although your minde be good, yet your weak body,
At firſt encounter too, to meet with one
Of his unconquer'd ſtrength.
Evan. Peace thou rude bawde,
Thou ſtuffed old corruptneſſe, rye thy tongue up,
Your hired baſe tongue; is this your timely counſell?
Doſt thou ſeeke to make me dote on wickedneſſe?
Becauſe 'tis ten times worſe then thou deliver'ſt it?
To be a whore, becauſe he has ſufficiency,
To make a hundred? O thou impudence,
Have I relieved thy age to mine owne ruine?
And worne thee in my boſome to betray me?
Can yeares and impotence win nothing on thee
That's good and honeſt, but thou muſt go on ſtill?
And where thy blood wants heat to ſin thy ſelfe,
Force thy decreped will to make me wicked.
Caſſ. I did but tell ye.
Evan. What the damned'ſt woman,
The cunning'ſt and the skilfull'ſt bawd comes ſhort of:
If thou had'ſt liv'd ten ages to be dam'd in,
And exerciſed this art the Devill taught thee,
Thou could'ſt not have expreſt it more exactly.
Caſſ. I did not bid you ſin.
Evan. Thou wood'ſt me to it,
Thou that art fit for prayer and the grave,
Thy body earth already, and corruption,
Thou taught'ſt the way; go follow your fine function,
There are houſes of delight, that want good Matrons,
Such grave inſtructors, get thee thither monſter,
And read variety of ſins to wantons,
And when they rore with paines, learne to make playſters.
Caſſ. This we have for our good wills.
Evan. If e're I ſee thee more,
Or any thing that's like thee, to affright me,
By this faire light Ile ſpoile thy bawdery,
Ile leave thee neither eyes nor noſe to grace thee,
When thou wanteſt bread, and common pitty towards thee,
Enter Frederick.
And art a ſtarving in a ditch, think of me,
Then die, and let the wandering bawds lament thee;
Be gone, I charge thee, leave me.
Caſſ. You'l repent this. Exit.
Fred. She's angry, and t'other crying too, my ſuit's cold;
Ile make your heart ake, ſtubborne wench, for this;
Turne not ſo angry from me, I will ſpeak to you,
Are you growne proud with your delight, good Lady,
So pamper'd with your ſport, your ſcorne to know me?
Evan. I ſcorne ye not, I would you ſcorn'd not me, Sir,
And forc'd me to be weary of my duty,
I know your Grace, would I had never ſeene ye,
Fred. Becauſe I love you, becauſe I dote upon ye,
Becauſe I am a man that ſeeke to pleaſe ye.
Evan. I have man enough already to content me,
As much, as noble, and as worthy of me,
As all the world can yeeld.
Fred. That's but your modeſty,
You have no man, nay never look upon me,
I know it Lady, no man to content ye,
No man that can, or at the leaſt that dare,
Which is a poorer man, and neerer nothing.
Evan. Be nobler, Sir, inform'd.
Fred. Ile tell thee, wench,
The poore condition of this poorer fellow,
And make thee bluſh for ſhame at thine owne errour,
He never tendred yet a husbands duty,
To thy warme longing bed.
Evan. How ſhould he know that?
Fred. I am ſure he did not, for I charg'd him no,
Upon his life I charg'd him, but to try him;
Could any brave or noble ſpirit ſtop here?
Was life to be prefer'd before affection?
Lawfull, and long'd for too?
Evan. Did you command him?
Fred. I did in policy to try his ſpirit.
Evan. And could he be ſo dead cold to obſerve it?
Brought I no beauty? nor no love along with me?
Fred. Why what is it that makes me ſcorne to name him?
I ſhould have lov'd him, if he had ventur'd for't,
Nay, doted on his bravery.
Evan. Onely charg'd?
And with that ſpell ſit downe? dare men fight bravely
For poore ſlight things, for drink or oſtentation?
And there indanger both their lives and fortunes,
And for their lawfull Loves fly off with feare?
Fred. 'Tis true, and with a cunning baſe feare too to abuſe thee;
Made thee believe, poore innocent Evanthe,
Wretched young girle, it was his impotency;
Was it not ſo? deny't.
Evan. O my anger, at my yeares to be cozen'd with a young man!
Fred. A ſtrong man too, certaine he lov'd ye deerly.
Evan. To have my ſhame and love mingled together,
And both flung on me like a wait to ſinke me,
I would have dyed a thouſand times.

Fred.

Fred. So would any,
Any that had the ſpirit of a man;
I would have been kill'd in your armes.
Evan. I would he had been,
And buried in mine armes, that had been noble,
And what a monument would I have made him?
Upon this breaſt he ſhould have ſlept in peace,
Honour, and everlaſting love his mourners;
And I ſtill weeping till old time had turn'd me,
And pittying powers above into pure chriſtall.
Fred. Hadſt thou lov'd me, and had my way been ſtuck
With deaths, as thick as froſty nights with ſtars,
I would have ventur'd.
Evan. Sure there is ſome trick in't; Valerio ne're was coward.
Fred. Worſe then this too,
Tamer, and ſeaſoning of a baſer nature,
He ſet your woman on ye to betray ye,
Your bawdy woman, or your ſin ſolicitor:
I pray but think what this man may deſerve now,
I know he did, and did it to pleaſe me too.
Evan. Good Sir afflict me not too faſt, I feele
I am a woman, and a wrong'd one too,
And ſenſible I am of my abuſes,
Sir, you have loved me.
Fred. And I love thee ſtill, pitty thy wrongs, and dote upon thy perſon.
Evan. To ſet my woman on me 'twas too baſe Sir.
Fred. Abominable vilde.
Evan. But I ſhall fit him.
Fred. All reaſon and all Law allowes it to ye,
And ye are a foole, a tame foole, if you ſpare him.
Evan. You may ſpeake now, and happily prevaile too,
And I beſeech your Grace be angry with me.
Fred. I am at heart. She ſtaggers in her faith,
And will fall off I hope, Ile ply her ſtill,
Thou abuſed innocence, I ſuffer with thee
If I ſhould give him life, he would ſtill betray thee;
That foole that feares to dye for ſuch a beauty,
Would for the ſame feare ſell thee unto miſery?
I do not ſay he would have been bawd himſelf too,
Evan. Follow'd thus far? nay then I ſmell the malice,
It taſts too hot of practis'd wickedneſſe,
There can be no ſuch man, I am ſure no Gentleman:
Shall my anger make me whore, and not my pleaſure?
My ſudden unconſiderate rage abuſe me?
Come home againe, my frighted faith, my vertue,
Home to my heart againe: he be a bawd too?
Fred. I will not ſay, he offered faire Evanthe.
Evan. Nor do not dare, 'twill be an impudence,
And not an honour for a Prince to lye;
Fie Sir, a perſon of your ranke to trifle,
I know you do lye.
Fred. How?
Evan. Lye ſhamefully, and I could wiſh my ſelfe a man but one day,
To tell you openly you lye too, baſely.
Fred. Take heed wilde foole.
Evan. Take thou heed thou tame Devill,
Thou all Pandora's box in a Kings figure,
Thou haſt almoſt whor'd my weake beliefe already,
And like an Engineer blowne up mine honour;
But I ſhall countermine, and catch your miſchiefe,
This little Fort you ſeeke, I ſhall man nobly,
And ſtrongly too, with chaſte obedience
To my deere Lord, with vertuous thoughts that ſcorne ye.
Victorious Tomeris nere won more honour
In cutting off the Royall head of Cyrus,
Then I ſhall do in conquering thee; farewell,
And if thou canſt be wiſe, learne to be good too;
'Twill give thee nobler lights then both thine eyes do,
My poore Lord and my ſelfe are bound to ſuffer,
And when I ſee him faint under your ſentence,
Ile tell ye more, it may be then Ile yeeld too.
Fred. Foole, unexampled, ſhall my anger follow thee?
Exeunt.

Enter Rugio, and Fryer Marco, amazed.

Rugio. Curſt on our ſights, our fond credulities,
A thouſand curſes on the ſlave that cheated us.
The damn'd ſlave.
Mar. We have e'ne ſham'd our ſervice,
Brought our beſt care and loyalties to nothing.
'Tis the moſt fearefull poyſon, the moſt potent,
Heaven give him patience; oh it works moſt ſtrongly,
And teares him Lord.
Rug. That we ſhould be ſo ſtupid,
To truſt the arrant'ſt villaine that e're flatter'd,
The bloodieſt too, to believe a few ſoft words from him,
And give way to his prepar'd teares.
Within Alphonſo. Oh, oh, oh.
Rug. Harke Fryer Marco, harke, the poore Prince, that we ſhould be ſuch blockheads,
As to be taken with his drinking firſt?
And never think what Antidotes are made for?
Two wooden ſculls we have, and we deſerve to be hang'd for't;
For certainly it will be laid to our charge;
As certaine too, it will diſpatch him ſpeedily,
Which way to turne, or what to. ——
Mar. Lets pray, Heavens hand is ſtrong.
Rug. The Poyſons ſtrong, you would ſay,

Enter Alphonſo, carried in a Coach by two Fryers.

Would any thing —— He comes, let's give him comfort.
Alphon. Give me more ayre, ayre, more ayre, blow, blow,
Open thou Eaſterne gate, and blow upon me,
Diſtill thy cold dewes, O thou icy Moone,
And rivers run through my afflicted ſpirit,
I am all fire, fire, fire, the raging dog ſtar
Raines in my blood, oh which way ſhall I turne me?
Ætna and all his flames burne in my head,
Fling me into the Ocean or I periſh:
Dig, dig, dig, till the ſprings fly up,
The cold, cold ſprings, that I may leap into 'em,
And bathe my ſcorcht limbs in their purling pleaſures;
Or ſhoot me up into the higher Region,
Where treaſures of delicious ſnow are nouriſht,
And banquets of ſweet haile.
Rug. Hold him faſt Fryer, O how he burnes!
Alph. What will ye ſacrifice me?
Upon the Altar lay my willing body?
And pile your wood up, fling your holy incenſe?
And as I turne me you ſhall ſee all flame,
Conſuming flame, ſtand off me, or you are aſhes.
Both. Moſt miſerable wretches.
Alph. Bring hither charity
And let me hug her, Fryer, they ſay ſhe's cold,
Infinite cold, devotion cannot warme her;
Draw me a river of falſe lovers teares
Cleane through my breſt, they are dull, cold, and forgetfull,
And will give eaſe, let Virgins ſigh upon me,
Forſaken ſoules, the ſighs are precious,
Let them all ſigh: oh hell, hell, hell, oh horror.
Mar. To bed, good Sir.

Alph.

Alpho. My bed will burne about me,
Like Phaeton, in all conſuming flaſhes
I am incloſed, let me fly, let me fly, give roome;
Betwixt the cold beare, and the raging Lyon
Lyes my ſafe way: O for a cake of ice now,
To clap unto my heart to comfort me;
Decrepid winter hang upon my ſholders,
And let me weare thy frozen Iſicles
Like Jewels round about my head, to coole me;
My eyes burne out, and ſinke into their ſockets,
And my infected braine like brimſtone boyles,
I live in hell, and ſeverall furies vex me;
O carry me where no Sun ever ſhew'd yet
A face of comfort, where the earth is chriſtall,
Never to be diſſolv'd, where nought inhabits
But night and cold, and nipping froſts, and winds
That cut the ſtubborne rocks, and make them ſhiver;
Set me there friends.

Rug. Hold faſt, he muſt to bed Fryer, what ſcalding ſweats he has?

Mar. He'le ſcalld in hell for't, that was the cauſe.

Alph. Drinke, drinke, a world of drinke,
Fill all the cups, and all the antick veſſels,
And borrow pots, let me have drinke enough,
Bring all the worthy drunkards of the time,
The experienc'd drunkards, let me have them all,
And let them drinke their worſt, Ile make them Ideots,
Ile lye upon my Back and ſwallow Veſſels;
Have Rivers made of cooling wine run through me,
Not ſtay for this mans health, or this great Princes,
But take an Ocean, and begin to all; oh, oh.

Mar. He cooles a little, now away with him,
And to his warme bed preſently.

Alph. No drinke? no winde? no cooling aire?

Rug. You ſhall have any thing.
His hot fit leſſens, Heaven put in a hand now,
And ſave his life; there's drink Sir in your chamber,
And all coole things.

Alph. Away, away, lets fly to 'em. Exeunt.

Enter Valerio and Evanthe.

Evan. To ſay you were impotent, I am aſham'd on't,
To make your ſelf no man, to a freſh maid too,
A longing maid, upon her wedding night alſo,
To give her ſuch a dor.

Val. I prethee pardon me.

Evan. Had you been drunke, 'thad been excuſable,
Or like a Gentleman under the Surgeons hands,
And ſo not able, there had been ſome colour,
But wretchedly to take a weakneſſe to ye,
A fearefull weakneſſe, to abuſe your body,
And let a lye worke like a ſpell upon ye,
A lye, to ſave your life.

Val. Will you give me leave ſweet?

Evan. You have taken too much leave, and too baſe leave too,
To wrong your Love; haſt thou a noble ſpirit?
And canſt thou looke up to the peoples loves,
That call thee worthy, and not bluſh Valerio?
Canſt thou behold me that thou haſt betraid thus?
And no ſhame touch thee?

Val. Shame attend the ſinfull, I know my innocence.

Evan. Ne're think to face it, that's a double weakneſſe,
And ſhewes thee falſer ſtill; the King himſelfe,
Though he be wicked, and our Enemy,
But juſter then thine, in pitty of my injuries,
Told me the truth.

Val. What did he tell Evanthe?

Evan. That but to gaine thy life a fortnight longer,
Thy lov'd poore life, thou gav'ſt up all my duties.

Val. I ſweare 'tis falſe, my life and death are equall,
I have weigh'd 'em both, and finde 'em but one fortune,
But Kings are men, and live as men, and dye too,
Have the affections men have, and their faſhoods;
Indeed they have more power to make 'em good;
The King's to blame, it was to ſave thy life which,
Thy innocent life, that I forbore thy bed,
For if I had toucht thee thou hadſt dyed, he ſwore it.

Evan. And was not I as worthy to dye nobly?
To make a ſtory for the times that follows,
As he that married me? what weakneſſe, Sir,
Or diſſability do you ſee in me,
Either in minde or body? to defraud me
Of Such an opportunity? Do you think I married you
Only for pleaſure, or content in luſt?
To lull you in mine armes, and kiſſe you hourely?
Was this my end? I might have been a Queen, Sir,
If that had caught me, and have knowne all delicates;
There's few that would have ſhun'd ſo faire an offer,
O thou unfaithfull fearefull man, thou haſt kill'd me,
In ſaving me this way, thou haſt deſtroy'd me,
Rob'd me of that my love can never give more;
To be unable to ſave me? O miſery!
Had I been my Valerio, thou Evanthe,
I would have lyen with thee under a Gallower,
Though the Hangman had been my Hymen, and the furies
With iron whips and forks, ready to torter me,
I would have hug'd thee too, though hell had gap'd at me;
Save my life! that expected to dye bravely,
That would have woo'd it too? Would I had married
An Eunuch, that had truly no ability,
Then ſuch a fearefull lyar, thou haſt done me
A ſcurvy curteſie, that has undone me.

Val. Ile do no more, ſince you are ſo nobly faſhion'd,
Made up ſo ſtrongly, Ile take my ſhare with ye,
Nay Deere, Ile learne of you.

Evan. He weeps too tenderly;
My angers gone, good my Lord pardon me,
And if I have offended, be more angry,
It was a womans flaſh, a ſudden valour,
That could not lye conceal'd.

Val. I honour ye by all the rights of holy marriage,
And pleaſures of chaſte love, I wonder at ye,
You appeare the viſion of a Heaven unto me,
Stuck all with ſtars of honour ſhining cleerly,
And all the motions of your minde celeſtiall;
Man is a lumpe of earth, the beſt man ſpiritleſſe,
To ſuch a woman; all our lives and actions
But counterfeits in Arras to this vertue;
Chide me againe, you have ſo brave an anger,
And flowes ſo nobly from you, thus deliver'd,
That I could ſuffer like a childe to heare ye,
Nay make my ſelf guilty of ſome faults to honour ye.

Evan. Ile chide no more, you have rob'd me of my courage.
And with a cunning patience checkt my impudence;
Once more forgiveneſſe? She kneeles.

Val. Will this ſerve Evanthe? Kiſſes her.
And this my love? Heavens mercy be upon us;
But did he tell no more?

Evan. Only this trifle: You ſet my woman on me, to betray me;
'Tis true, ſhe did her beſt, a bad old woman,
It ſtir'd me Sir.

Val. I cannot blame thee, Jewell.

Evan. And me thought when your name was ſounded that way——

Val.

Val. He that will ſpare no fame, will ſpare no name
Sweet;
Though as I am a man, I am full of weakneſſe,
And may ſlip happily into ſome ignorance,
Yet at my yeeres to be a bawd, and cozen
Mine owne hopes with my Doctrine ——
Evan. I beleeve not, nor never ſhall; our time is out to morrow.
Val. Let's be too night then full of fruitfulneſſe,
Now we are both of one minde, let's be happy,
I am no more a wanting man Evanthe,
Thy warme embraces ſhall diſſolve that impotence,
And my cold lye ſhall vaniſh with thy kiſſes;
You houres of night be long, 'as when Alcmena
Lay by the luſty ſide of Jupiter;
Keep back the day, and hide his golden beames,
Where the chaſte watchfull morning may not finde 'em;
Old doting Tython hold Aurora faſt,
And though ſhe bluſh the day-break from her cheeks,
Conceale her ſtill; thou heavy Waine ſtand firme,
And ſtop the quicker revolutions;
Or if the day muſt come, to ſpoile our happineſſe,
Thou envious Sunne peepe not upon our pleaſure,
Thou that all Lovers curſe, be farre off from us.

Enter Caſtruchio with Guard.

Evan. Then let's to bed, and this night in all joyes
And chaſte delights ——
Caſt. Stay, I muſt part ye both;
It is the Kings command, who bids me tell ye,
To morrow is your laſt houre.
Val. I obey, Sir,
In Heaven we ſhall meet, Captaine, where King Frederick
Dare not appeare to part us.
Caſt. Miſtake me not, though I am rough in doing of my Office,
You ſhall finde, Sir, you have a friend to honour ye.
Val. I thank ye Sir.
Evan. Pray Captaine tell the King,
They that are ſad on Earth, in Heaven ſhall ſing.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Fryer Marco, and Rugio.

Rug. HAve you writ to the Captaine of the Caſtle?
Mar. Yes, and charged him
Upon his ſoules health, that he be not cruell,
Told him Valerio's worth among the people,
And how it muſt be puniſht in poſterity,
Though he ſcape now.
Rug. But will not he, Fryer Marco, betray this to the King?
Mar. Though he be ſtubborne, and of a rugged nature, yet he is honeſt,
And honours much Valerio.
Rug. How doe's Alphonſo?
For now me thinks my heart is light againe,
And pale feare fled.
Mar. He is as well as I am;
The Rogue againſt his will has ſav'd his life,
A deſperate poyſon has re-cur'd the Prince.
Rug. To me 'tis moſt miraculous.
Mar. To me too, till I conſider why it ſhould do ſo,
And now I have found it a moſt excellent Phyſick,
It wrought upon the dull cold miſty parts,
That clog'd his ſoule, which was another poyſon,
A deſperate too, and found ſuch matter there,
And ſuch abundance alſo to reſiſt it,
And weare away the dangerous heat it brought with it,
The pure blood and the ſpirits ſcap'd untainted.
Rug. 'Twas Heavens high hand, none of Soranzo's pitty.
Mar. Moſt certaine 'twas, had the malitious villaine

Enter Caſtruchio

Given him a cooling poyſon, he had paid him.
Rug. The Captain of the Caſtle.
Mar. O ye are welcome, how doe's your Priſoner?
Caſt. He muſt go for dead;
But when I do a deed of ſo much villany,
Ile have my skin pull'd o're mine eares, my Lord,

Enter Alphonſo, and Fryers.

Though I am the Kings, I am none of his abuſes;
How doe's your Royall Charge? that I might ſee once.
Mar. I pray ſee now, you are a truſty Gentleman.
Alph. Good Fathers, I thanke Heaven, I feele no
ſickneſſe,
Caſt. He ſpeaks againe.
Alph. Nothing that barres the free uſe of my ſpirit,
Me thinks the ayre's ſweet to me, and company
A thing I covet now Caſtruchio.
Caſt. Sir, he ſpeaks, and knowes, for Heaven ſake break my pate Lord,
That I may be ſure I ſleep not.
Alph. Thou wert honeſt.
Ever among the rank of good men counted,
I have been abſent long out of the world,
A dreame I have lived, how doe's it looke Caſtruchio?
What wonders are abroad?
Caſt. I fling off duty to your dead Brother, for he is dead in goodneſſe,
And to the living hope of brave Alphonſo,
The noble heire of nature, and of honour,
I faſten my Allegeance.
Mar. Softly Captaine, we dare not truſt the ayre with this bleſt ſecret,
Good Sir, be cloſe againe, heaven has reſtor'd ye,
And by miraculous meanes, to your faire health,
And made the inſtrument your enemies malice,
Which doe's prognoſticate your noble fortune;
Let not our careleſſe joy loſe you againe, Sir,
Help to deliver ye to a further danger,
I pray you paſſe in, and reſt a while forgotten,
For if your brother come to know you are well againe,
And ready to inherit as your right,
Before we have ſtrength enough to aſſure your life,
What will become of you? and what ſhall we Deſerve in all opinions that are honeſt,
For our loſſe of judgement, care, and loyalty?
Rug. Deere Sir, paſſe in, Heaven has begun the worke,
And bleſt us all, let our indeavours follow,
To preſerve this bleſſing to our timely uſes,
And bring it to the noble end we aime at;
Let our cares worke now, and our eyes pick out
An houre to ſhew ye ſafely to your Subjects,
A ſecure houre.
Alph. I am counſell'd; ye are faithfull.
Caſt. Which houre ſhall not be long, as we ſhall handle it.
Once more the tender of my duty.
Alph. Thank ye.

Caſtr.

Castr. Keep you the Monastery.
Reg. Strong enough Ile warrant ye. Exeunt.
Enter the Foole, and Pedrano.
Ped. Who are all these that crowde about the Court
Those strange new faces? (Foole?
Foole. They are Suitors Coxcombe,
Dainty fine Suitors to the widow Lady,
Thou hadst best make one of 'em, thou wilt be hang'd as handsomly
At the Moneths end, and with as much joy follow'd,
And 'twere to morrow; as many mourning bawds for thee,
And holy Nuns, whose vestall fire ne're vanishes,
In sackcloth smocks, as if thou wert Heire apparent
To all the impious Suburbs, and the sink-holes.
Ped. Out you base rogue.
Foole. Why dost abuse thy selfe,
Thou art to blame, I take thee for a Gentleman,
But why doe's not thy Lord and Master marry her?
Ped. Why, she is his sister.
Foole. 'Tis the better Foole,
He may make bold with his owne flesh and blood,
For a my conscience there's none else will trust him;
Then he may pleasure the King at a dead pinch too,
Without a Mephostophilus, such as thou art,
And ingrosse the royall disease like a true Subject.
Ped. Thou wilt be whipt.
Foole. I am sure thou wilt be hangd,
I have lost a Ducket else, which I would be loath to venter Without certainty. They appeare.
Ped. Why these are rascals.
Foole. They were meant to be so, doo's thy Master deserve better kinred?
Ped. Ther's an old Lawyer,
Trim'd up like a Gally Foist, what would he do with her?
Foole. As Usurers do with their Gold, he would looke on her,
And read her over once a day, like a hard report,
Feed his dull eye, and keepe his fingers itching;
For any thing else, she may appeale to a Parliament,
Sub Pœna's and Post Kaes have spoil'd his Codpeece;
There's a Physitian too, older then he,
And Gallen Gallenatius, but he has lost his spurres,
He would be nibling too.
Ped. I marked the man, if he be a man.
Foole. Has much a do to be so,
Searecloths and Sirrops glew him close together,
He would fall a peeces else; mending of the patients,
And then trying whether they be right or no,
In his owne person, there's the honest care an't,
Has mollifi'd the man; if he do marry her,
And come but to warme him well at Cupids bonfire,
He will bulge so subtilly and suddenly,
You may snatch him up by parcels, like a Sea Rack:
Will your Worship go, and looke upon the rest, Sir?
And heare what they can say for themselves?
Ped. I'le follow thee. Exeunt.
Enter Camillo, Menallo, Cleanthes, Castruchio.
Cam. You tell us wonders.
Cast. But I tell you truths, they are both well.
Men. Why are not we in Armes then?
And all the Island given to know —— (misse else,
Cast. Discreetly and privately it must be done, 'twill
And prove our ruines; most of the noble Citizens
Know it by me, and stay the houre to attend it,
Prepare your hearts and friends, let their's be right too,
And keepe about the King to avoid suspition;
Enter Frederick, and Sorano.
When you shall heare the Castle Bell, take courage,
And stand like men, away, the King is comming. Exeunt (Lords.
Fre. Now Captain, what have you done with your Prisoner?
Cast. He is dead, Sir, and his body flung i'th Sea,
To feed the fishes, 'twas your will, I take it,
I did it from a strong Commission,
And stood not to capitulate.
Fred. 'Tis well done,
And I shall love you for your faith. What anger
Or sorrow did he utter at his end?
Castr. Faith little, Sir, that I gave any eare to,
He would have spoke, but I had no Commission
To argue with him, so I flung him off;
His Lady would have seene, but I lockt her up,
For feare her womans teares should hinder us.
Fred. 'Twas trusty still. I wonder, my Sorano,
We heare not from the Monastery; I believe
They gave it not, or else it wrought not fully.
Cast. Did you name the Monastery?
Fred. Yes, I did Captaine.
Cast. I saw the Fryer this morning, and Lord Regio, Bitterly weeping, and wringing of their hands,
And all the holy men hung downe their heads.
Sora. 'Tis done, Ile warrant ye.
Cast. I asked the reason.
Fred. What answer hadst thou?
Cast. This in few words, Sir,
Your Brothers dead, this morning he deceased,
I was your servant, and I wept not, Sir,
I knew 'twas for your good.
Fred. It shall be for thine too,
Captaine, indeed it shall. O my Sorano,
Now we shall live.
Sor. I, now there's none to trouble ye.
Fred. Captaine, bring out the woman, and give way
To any Suitor that shall come to marry her,
Of what degree soever.
Cast. It shall be done, Sir. Exit Cap.
Fre. O let me have a lusty Banquet after it,
Enter Evanthe, Camillo, Cleanthes, Menallo, Foole, Castruchio.
I will be high and merry.
Sor. There be some Lords
That I could counsell ye to fling from Court, Sir,
They pry into our actions, they are such
The foolish people call their Countries honours,
Honest brave things, and stile them with such Titles,
As if they were the patternes of the Kingdome,
Which makes them proud, and prone to looke into us,
And talk at randome of our actions,
They should be your lovers of your commands,
And followers of your will; bridles and curbs
To the hard headed Commons that maligne us,
They come here to do honour to my sister,
To laugh at your severity, and fright us;
If they had power, what would these men do?
Do you heare, Sir, how privily they whisper?
Fred. I shall silence 'em,
And to their shames within this weeke Sorano,
In the meane time have patience.
Sor. How they jeere, and looke upon me as I were a Monster!
And talk and jeere, How I shall pull your plumes, Lords,
How I shall humble ye within these two daies,
Your great names, nor your Country cannot save ye.
Fred. Let in the Suitors. Yet submit, Ile pardon ye;
You are halfe undone already, do not winde
My anger to that height, it may consume ye.

Enter Lawyer, Physitian, Captain Cutpurse.

And utterly destroy thee, faire Evanthe: yet I have mercy.

Evan. Use it to your bawds,
To me use cruelty, it best becomes ye,
And shewes more Kingly: I contemne your mercy,
It is a cozening, and a bawdy mercy;
Can any thing be hoped for, to relieve me?
Or is it fit? I thank you for a pitty, when you have kill'd my Lord.

Fred. Who will have her?

Evan. My teares are gone,
My teares of love to my deere Valerio,
But I have fill'd mine eyes againe with anger;
O were it but so powerfull to consume ye,
My tongue with curses I have arm'd against ye,
With Maiden curses, that Heaven crownes with horrors,
My heart set round with hate against thy tyranny;
O would my hands could hold the fire of Heaven,
Wrapt in the thunder that the Gods revenge with,
That like sterne Justice I might fling it on thee;
Thou art a King of Monsters, not of men,
And shortly thou wilt turne this Land to Devills.

Fred. Ile make you one first, and a wretched Devill,
Come, who will have her?

Law. I an't like your Majesty, I am a Lawyer,
I can make her a Joynter of any mans Land in Naples,
And she shall keepe it too, I have a trick for it.

Foole. Canst thou make her a Joynter of thine honesty?
Or thy ability, thou lewd abridgement?
Those are non-suted and flung o're the barre.

Physitian. An't please your Majesty to give me leave,
I dare accept her; and though old I seeme, Lady,
Like Eason, by my art I can renew youth and ability.

Foole. In a powdring Tub
Stew thy selfe tender againe, like a Cock Chicken,
The broth may be good, but the flesh is not fit for doggs sure;

Capt. Lady, take me, and Ile maintaine thine honour,
I am a poore Captaine, as poore people call me,
Very poore people, for my Souldiers
They are quartered in the outsides of the City,
Men of ability, to make good a high way;
We have but two grand Enemies that oppose us,
The Don Gout, and the Gallowes.

Foole. I believe ye, and both these you will binde her for a Joynter;
Now Signior sirke.

Cut-purse. Madam, take me and be wise,
I am rich and nimble, and those are rare in one man,
Every mans pocket is my Treasury,
And no man weares a Sute but fits me neatly;
Clothes you shall have, and weare the purest Linnen,
I have a tribute out of every Shop, Lady,
Meat you shall eat, I have my Caters out too,
The best and lustiest, and drinke good Wine, good Lady,
Good quickening Wine, Wine that will make you caper,
And at the worst——

Foole. It is but capring short, Sir,
You seldome stay for Agues or for Surfets,
A shaking fit of a whip sometimes o're takes ye,
Marry you dye most commonly of chokings,
Obstructions of the halter are your ends ever;
Pray leave your horne and your knife for her to live on.

Evan. Poore wretched people, why do you wrong your selves?
Though I fear'd death, I should feare you ten times more,
You are every one a new death, and an odious,
The earth will purge corrupted bodies,
You'le make us worse, and stinke eternally.
Go home, go home, and get good Nurces for you,
Dreame not of wives.

Fred. You shall have one of 'em, if they dare venter for ye.

Evan. They are dead already,
Crawling diseases that must creep into
The next grave they finde open, are these fit husbands
For her you have loved Sir, though you hate me now,
And hate me mortally, as I hate you,
Your nobleness in that you have done otherwise,
And named Evanthe once as your poore Mistris,
Might offer worthier choice.

Fred. Speake, who dare take her for one moneth, and then dye?

Phi. Dye Sir?

Fred. I, dye Sir, that's the condition.

Phi. One moneth is too little
For me to repent in for my former pleasure,
To go still on, unlesse I were sure she would kill me,
And kill me delicately before my day,
Make it up a yeare, for by that time I must dye,
My body will hold out no longer.

Fred. No Sir, it must be but a moneth.

Law. Then farewell Madam,
This is like to be a great yeare of dissention
Among good people, and I dare not lose it,
There will be money got.

Capt. Blesse your good Ladiship, there's nothing in the grave but bones and ashes,
In Tavernes there's good wine, and excellent wenches,
And Surgeons while we live.

Cutp. Adieu sweet Lady,
Lay me when I am dead neare a rich Alderman,
I cannot pick his Purse, no, ile no dying,
Though I steale Linnen, ile not steale my shrowde yet.

All. Send ye a happy match. Exeunt.

Foole. And you all halters, you have deserved 'em richly
These do all Villanies, all mischiefes of all sorts, yet those they feare not
To flinch where a faire wench is at the stake.

Evan. Come, your sentence, let me dye, you see Sir,
None of your valiant men dare venture on me,
A moneth's a dangerous thing.

Enter Valerio disguis'd.

Fred. Away with her, let her dye instantly.

Evan. Will you then be willing To dye at the time prefixt, that I must know too,
And know it beyond doubt.

Fred. What if I did wench?

Evan. On that condition if I had it certaine,
I would be your any thing, and you should injoy me,
How ever in my nature I abhor you,
Yet as I live I would be obedient to you,
But when your time came how I should rejoyce,
How then I should bestir my selfe to thanke ye
To see your throat cut, how my heart would leap Sir,
I would dye with you, but first I would torture ye,
And cow you in your end, so dispise you,
For a weak and wretched coward, you must end sure,
Still make ye feare, and shake, dispised, still laugh at ye.

Fred. Away with her, let her dye instantly.

Cism. Stay, there's another, and a Gentleman,
His habit shewes no lesse, may be his businesse
Is for this Ladies love.

Fred. Say why ye come Sir, and what you are.

Val. I am discended nobly, a Prince by birth, and by my trade a Souldier,
A Princes fellow, Abidig brought me forth,
My Parents Duke Agenor, and faire Egla,

My Parents Duke Agenor and faire Egla,
My buſineſſe hither to renew my love
With a young noble ſpirit, call'd Valerio;
Our firſt acquaintance was at Sea, in fight
Againſt a Turkiſh man of War, a ſtout one,
Where Lyon-like I ſaw him ſhew his valour,
And as he had been made of compleat vertue,
Spirit, and fire, no dreggs of dull earth in him. (keſt him.
Evan. Thou art a brave Gentleman, and bravely ſpea-
Val. The Veſſell dancing under him for joy,
And the rough whiſſling winds becalm'd to view him;
I ſaw the childe of honour, for he was young,
Deale ſuch an Almes amongſt the ſpightfull pagans,
His towring ſword flew like an eager Falcon,
And round about his reach invade the Turks,
He had intrencht himſelfe in his dead quarryes;
The ſilver Creſſents on the tops they carried Shranke in their heads to ſee his rage ſo bloody,
And from his fury ſuffered ſad eccliſpes;
The game of death was never plaid more nobly,
The meager theeſe grew wanton in his miſchiefes,
And his ſhrunke hollow eyes ſmil'd on his ruines. (tor,
Evan. Heaven keepe this Gentleman from being a Sui-
For I ſhall ne're deny him, he's ſo noble.
Val. But what can laſt long? ſtrength and ſpirit waſted,
And freſh ſupplies flew on upon this Gentleman,
Breathleſſe and weary with oppreſſion,
And almoſt kill'd with killing, 'twas my chance
In a tall Ship I had to view the fight;
I ſet into him, entertain'd the Turke.
And for an houre gave him ſo hot a breakfaſt,
He clapt all linnen up he had to ſave him,
And like a Lovers thought he fled our fury;
There firſt I ſaw the man I lov'd, Valerio,
There was acquainted, there my ſoul grew to him,
And his to me, we were the twins of friendſhip.
Eva. Fortune protect this man, or I ſhall ruine him.
Val. I made this voyage to behold my friend,
To warme my love anew at his affection;
But ſince I landed, I have heard his fate:
My Fathers had not been to me more cruell,
I have lamented too, and yet I keepe
The treaſure of a few teares for you Lady,
For by deſcription you were his Evanthe.
Evan. Can he weep that's a ſtranger to my ſtory?
And I ſtand ſtill and looke on? Sir, I thank ye;
If noble ſpirits after their departure,
Can know, and wiſh, certaine his ſoule gives thanks too;
There are your teares againe, and when yours faile Sir, Pray ye call to me, I have ſome ſtore to lende ye. Your Val. Urbino. (name?
Evan. That, I may remember,
That little time I have to live, your friendſhips,
My tongue ſhall ſtudy both. (Urbino?
Fred. Do you come hither, only to tell this ſtory Prince
Val. My buſineſſe now is, Sir, to wooe this Lady.
Evan. Bleſſing defend ye; Do you know the danger?
Val. Yes, and I feare it not, danger's my play-fellow,
Since I was man 'thas been my beſt companion,
I know your doome, 'tis for a Moneth you give her,
And then his life you take that marries her.
Fred. 'Tis true, nor can your being borne a Prince,
If you accept the offer, free you from it.
Val. I nor deſire it, I have caſt the worſt,
And even that worſt to me is many bleſſings;
I lov'd my friend, not meaſur'd out by time,
Nor hired by circumſtance of place and honour,
But for his wealthy ſelfe and worth I lov'd him,
His minde and noble mold he ever mov'd in,
And woe his friend becauſe ſhe was worthy of him,
The only relick that he left behinde, Sir;
To give his aſhes honour, Lady take me,
And in me keepe Valerio's love alive ſtill,
When I am gone, take thoſe that ſhall ſucceed me,
Heaven muſt want light, before you want a husband,
To raiſe up Heires of love and noble memory,
To your unfortunate ——.
Evan. Am I ſtill hated? haſt thou no end, O fate, of my
Was I ordained to be a common Murdreſſe? (affliction?
And of the beſt men too? Good Sir.
Val. Peace Sweet, looke on my hand.
Evan. I do accept the Gentleman, I faint with joy.
Fred. I ſhop it, none ſhall have her, convey this ſtran-ger hence.
Val. I am no ſtranger.—Harke to the bell, that rings,
Harke, harke, proud Frederick, that was King of miſchief.
Harke, thou abhorred man, doſt thou heare thy ſentence?
Doe's not this bell ring in thine eares thy ruine?
Fred. What bell is this?
Cam. The Caſtle bell: Stand ſure Sir, and move not, if you do you periſh.
Men. It rings your knell; Alphonſo, King Alphonſo.
All. Alphonſo, King Alphonſo.
Fred. I am betraid, lock faſt the Palace.
Cam. We have all the keyes, Sir.
And no doore here ſhall ſhut without our Licence.
Clem. Do you ſhake now Lord Soranzo? no new trick?
Nor ſpeedy poyſon to prevent this buſineſſe?
No bawdy meditation now to fly to?
Fred. Treaſon, Treaſon, Treaſon.
Cam. Yes, we heare ye,
Enter Alphonſo, Rugio, Marco, Caſtruchio, Pietro, with Guard.
And we have found the Traytor in your ſhape, Sir,
Wee'l keep him faſt too.
Fred. recover'd! then I am gone,
The Sun of all my pompe is ſet and vaniſht. (derick?
Alp. Have you not forgot this face of mine, King Fre-
Brother I am come to ſee you, and have brought
A Banquet to be merry with your Grace;
I pray ſit downe, I do beſeech your Majeſty
And eat, eat freely, Sir, why do you ſtart?
Have you no ſtomack to the meat? I bring you?
Dare you not taſte? have ye no Antidotes?
You need not feare; Soranzo's a good Apothecary,
Me thinks you looke not well, ſome freſh wine for him,
Some of the ſame he ſent me by Soranzo;
I thank you for't, it ſav'd my life, I am bound to ye,
But how 'twill worke on you— I hope your Lordſhip
Will pledge him too, me thinks you looke but ſcurvily,
And would be put into a better colour,
But I have a canded Toad for your good Lordſhip.
Sor. Would I had any thing that would diſpatch me,
So it were downe, and I out of this feare once.
Fred. Sir, Thus low as my duty now compells me,
I do confeſſe my unbounded ſinnes, my errours,
And feele within my ſoule the ſmarts already;
Hide not the noble nature of a brother,
The pitty of a friend, from my afflictions;
Let me a while lament my miſery,
And caſt the load off of my wantonneſſe,
Before I finde your fury, then ſtrike home,
I do deſerve the deepeſt blow of Juſtice,
And then how willingly, O death, Ile meet thee.
Alp. Riſe, Madam, thoſe ſweet tears are potent ſpeakers,
And brother live, but in the Monaſtery,

Where I lived, with the selfe same silence too,
Ile teach you to be good against your will brother,
Your tongue has done much harme, that must be dumbe now;
The daily pilgrimage to my fathers Tombe, Teares, sighs, and groanes, you shall weare out your daies with,
And true ones too, you shall performe deare brother;
Your diet shall be slender to inforce these; to light a pennance, Sir.

Fred. I do confesse it.

Alph. Soran, you shall——

Sor. How he studies for it,
Hanging's the least part of my pennance certaine.

Evanthe kneeles.

Alph. What Lady's that that kneeles?

Cast. The chaste Evanthe.

Alph. Sweet, your petition?

Evan. 'Tis for this bad man, Sir,
Abominable bad, but yet my brother.

Alph. The bad man shall attend as bad a Master,
And both shall be confin'd within the Monastery;
His ranke flesh shall be pull'd with daily fasting,
But once a week he shall smell meat, he will surfet else,
And his immodest minde compell'd to prayer;
On the bare bords he shall lye, to remember
The wantonnesse he did commit in beds;
And drinke faire water, that will ne're inflame him;
He sav'd my life, though he purpos'd to destroy me,
For which Ile save his, though I make it miserable:
Madam, at Court I shall desire your company,
You are wise and vertuous, when you please to visit
My brother Frederick, you shall have our Licence,
My deere best friend, Valerio.

Val. Save Alphonso.

Omn. Long live Alphonso, King of us, and Naples.

Alph. Is this the Lady that the wonder goes on?
Honour'd sweet maid, here take her my Valerio,
The King now gives her, she is thine owne without feare:
Brother, have you so much provision that is good?
Not season'd by Soranzo and his Cooks?
That we may venture on with honest safety,
We and our friends?

Fred. All that I have is yours, Sir.

Alph. Come then, let's in, and end this Nuptiall,
Then to our Coronation with all speed:
My vertuous maid, this day Ile be your Bride-man,
And see you bedded to your owne desires too;
Beshrew me Lords, who is not merry hates me,
Onely Soranzo shall not beare my cup:
Come, now forget old paines and injuries,
As I must do, and drowne all in faire healths;
That Kingdom's blessed, where the King begins
His true love first, for there all loves are twins.

Exeunt Omnes.

Prologue.

YOu are welcome Gentlemen, and would our Feast
Were so well season'd, to please every Guest;
Ingenuous appetites, I hope we shall,
And their examples may prevaile in all
(Our noble friends) who writ this, bid me say,
He had rather dresse, upon a Triumph day,
My Lord Mayors Feast, and make him Sawces too,
Sawce for each severall mouth, nay further go,
He had rather build up those invincible Pyes
And Castle Custards that affright all eyes,
Nay eat 'em all, and their Artillery,
Then dresse for such a curious company
One single dish; yet he has pleas'd ye too,
And you have confest he knew well what to do;
Be hungry as you were wont to be, and bring
Sharpe stomacks to the stories he shall sing,
And he dare yet, he sates, prepare a Table
Shall make you say well dresst, and he well able.

Epilogue.

WE have your favours Gentlemen, and you
Have our indeavours, (deere friends grudge not now,)
There's none of you, but when you please can tell
Many a lame Horse, and many a faire tale tell;
Can put off many a maid unto a friend,
That was not so since the action at Mile-end;
Ours is a Virgin yet, and they that love
Untainted flesh, we hope our friends will prove.

Here endeth A Wife for a Moneth.

Actus primus, Scæna prima.

Enter Sir Perfidious Old-craft an old Knight, and Witty-pate his Sonne.

Witty. SIr, i'me no Boy, I'me deepe in one and twenty,
The ſecond yeare's approaching.
Old K. A fine time
For a youth to live by his wits then I ſhould thinke,
If e're he meane to make account of any.
Witty. Wits Sir?
Old K. I wits Sir, if it be ſo ſtrange to thee,
I'me ſorry I ſpent that time to get a Foole,
I might have imploy'd my paines a great deale better;
Thou know'ſt all that I have I ha got by my wits,
And yet to ſee how urgent thou art too;
It grieves me thou art ſo degenerate
To trouble me for meanes, I never offer'd it:
My Parents from a Schoole-boy, paſt nineteen once,
See what theſe times are growne too, before twenty
I ruſht into the world, which is indeed
Much like the Art of Swimming, he that will atteine to't
Muſt fall plumpe, and duck himſelfe at firſt,
And that will make him hardy and adventurous,
And not ſtand putting in one foot and ſhiver,
And then draw tother after, like a quake-buttock;
Well he may make a padler i' the world,
From hand to mouth, but never a brave ſwimmer,
Borne up byth' chin as I bore up my ſelfe
With my ſtrong induſtry that never fayl'd me;
For he that lyes borne up with Patrimonies,
Lookes like a long great Aſſe that ſwims with bladders,
Come but one prick of adverſe fortune to him
He ſinkes, becauſe he never try'd to ſwim
When wit playes with the billowes that choackt him.
Witty. Why is it not a faſhion for a Father Sir,
Out of his yearely thouſands, to allow
His only ſonne a competent brace of hundreds,
Or ſuch a toy?
Old K. Yes, if he meane to ſpoyle him,
Or mar his wits he may, but never I
This is my humour Sir, which you'le finde conſtant;
I love wit ſo well becauſe I liv'd by't,
That ile give no man power out of my meanes to hurt it,
And that's a kinde of gratitude to my rayſer,
Which great ones oft forget; I admire much
This Ages dulneſſe, when I ſcarce writ man,
The firſt degree that e're I tooke in thriving,
I lay intelligencer cloſe for wenching,
Could give this Lord or Knight a true Certificate
Of all the Maiden-heads extant, how many lay
'Mongſt Chamber-maids, how many 'mongſt Exchange Wenches,
Though never many there I muſt confeſſe,
They have a trick to utter ware ſo faſt;
I knew which Lady had a minde to fall,
Which Gentlewoman new divorc'ſt, which Tradeſman breaking,
The price of every ſinner to a haire,
And where to raiſe each price; which were the Teamers
That would give Velvet Petty-coates, Tiſſue Gownes,
Which Peeces, Angells, Suppers, and Halfe crownes;
I knew how to match and make my market,
Could give Intelligence where the Pox lay ledger,
And then to ſee the Letchers ſhift a point,
'Twas ſport and profit too; how they would ſhun
Their ador'd Miſtris chambers, and run fearefully,
Like Rats from burning houſes, ſo brought I
My Clyents a the game ſtill ſafe together,
And noble Gameſters lov'd me, and I felt it:
Give me a man that lives by his wits ſay I,
And never left a Groat, there's the true Gallant.
When I grew ſomewhat purſie, I grew then
In mens opinions too, and confidences,
They put things call'd Executorſhips upon me,
The charge of Orphans, little ſenceleſſe creatures,
Whom in their Childe-hoods I bound forth to Felt-makers,
To make 'em loſe and work away their Gentry,
Diſguiſe their tender natures with hard cuſtome,
So wrought 'em out in time, there I rizze ungently,
Nor do I feare to diſcourſe this unto thee,
I'me arm'd at all points againſt treachery,
I hold my humour firme, if I can ſee thee thrive by Thy wits while I live, I ſhall have the more courage
To truſt thee with my Lands when I dye; if not,
The next beſt wit I can heare of carries 'em:
For ſince in my time and knowledge ſo many rich Children
Of the City conclude in beggery, i'de rather
Make a wiſe ſtranger my Executor, then a fooliſh

Sonne

Sonne my Heire, and to have my Lands call'd after my Wit, thou after my name; and that's my nature.

Witty. 'Tis a strange harth one, must I still shift then? I come brave cheates, once to my trade agen, And i'le ply't harder now then e're I did for't, You'le part with nothing then, Sir?

Old K. Not a jot Sir.

Witty. If I should aske you blessing e're I go Sir, I think you would not give't me.

O. K. Let me but heare thou liv'st by thy wits once Thou shalt have any thing, thou'rt none of mine else, Then why should I take care for thee?

Witty. 'Thanke your bounty. Exit

O. K. So wealth love me, and long life, I beseech it, As I do love the man that lives by his wit, He comes so neare my nature; I'me growne old now, And ev'n arriv'd at my last cheat I feare me, But 'twill make shift to bury me, by day-light too, And discharge all my Legacies, 'tis so wealthy, And never trouble any Interest money: Iv'e yet a Neece to wed, over whose steps I have plac'it a trusty watchfull Gardinesse, For feare some poore Earle steale her, 't has bin threatned To redeem morgag'd Land, but he shall misse on't; To prevent which, I have fought out a match for her, Fop of Fop-hall, he writes himselfe, I take it, The antient, st Fop in England, with whom I'me privately Compounded for the third part of her Portion,

Enter Sir Gregory Fop, and Cuningham.

And she seemes pleas'd, so two parts rest with me, Hee's come; Sir Gregory, welcome, what's he Sir?

Sir Greg. Young Cunningham, a Norfolke Gentleman, One that has liv'd upon the Fops, my kinred, Ever since my remembrance; hee's a wit indeed, And we all strive to have him, nay, 'tis certaine Some of our name has gone to Law for him; Now 'tis my turne to keep him, and indeed Hee's plaguy chargeable as all your wits are, But I will give him over when I list, I ha us'd wits so before.

O. K. Hope when y'are married Sir you'le shake him off.

Sir Greg. Why what do you take me to be, old Father i'Law that shall be, do you think ile have any of the Wits hang upon me after I am married once? none of my kinred ever had before me; but where's this Neece? ist a fashion in London to marry a woman and never see her?

O. K. Excuse the niceness Sir, that care's your friend, Perhaps had she been seen, you had never seen her; There's many a spent-thing call'd an't like your honour, That lyes in wait for her at first snap, she's a Countesse, Drawne with sixe Mares through Fleet-streete, and a Coach-man, Sitting Bare-headed to their Flaunders buttocks, This whets him on.

Sir Greg. Pray let's clap up the businesse Sir, I long to see her; are you sure you have her, Is she not there already? Hark, O hark.

O. K. How now, what's that Sir?

Sir. Greg. Every Caroach goes by, Goes ev'n toth' heart of me.

O. K. Ile have that doubt eas'd Sir, Instantly eas'd, Sir Gregory, and now I think on't A toy comes i' my minde, seeing your friend there, Wee'l have a little sport, give you but way to't, And put a trick upon her, I love wit pretiously, You shall not be seene yet, wee'le stale your friend first, If't please but him to stand for the Anti-maske. (per Sir Greg. Puh, he shall stand for any thing, why his sup-Lyes i' my breeches here, ile make him fait else.

O. K. Then come you forth more unexpectedly The Maske it selfe, a thousand a yeare joynture, The cloud your friend will be then drawne away, And only you the beauty of the Play.

Sir Greg. For Red and Black ile put downe all your Fullers, Let but your Neece bring White, and we have three Gullers. Exit Sir Greg.

O. K. I'me given to understand you are a Wit Sir.

Cunning. I'me one that Fortune shewes small favour to Sir.

O. K. Why there you conclude it, whether you will or no Sir; To tell you truth, I'me taken with a wit.

Cun. Fowlers catch Woodcocks so, let not them know so much,

O. K. A Pestilence mazard, a Duke Humphrey sparke Had rather lose his Dinner then his Jest, I say, I love a wit the best of all things.

Cun. Alwaies except your selfe.

O. K. Has gin't me twice now,

Enter Neece and Guardiomesse.

All with a breath, I thank him; but that I love a wit I should be heartily angry; cuds, my Neece, You know the businesse with her,

Cun. With a woman?

'Tis ev'n the very same it was i'me sure Five thousand yeares a go, no foole can misse it.

O. K. This is the Gentleman I promist Neece, To present to your affection.

Cun. 'Ware that Arrow.

O. K. Deliver me the truth now of your liking.

Cun. I'me spoyl'd already, that such poore leane Game Should be found out as I am,

O. K. Go set too her Sir--ha, ha, ha.

Cun. How noble is this vertue in you Lady, Your eye may seeme to commit thousand slaughters On your dull servants, which truly tasted Conclude all in comforts.

O. K. Puh.

Neece. It rather shewes what a truth worth can make, Such as yours is.

O. K. And that's not worth a groat, How like you him Neece?

Neece. It shall appeare how well Sir, I humbly thanke you for him.

O. K. Hah? ha, good gullory, he does it well ifaith, Light, as if he meant to purchase lip-land there: Hold, hold, beare off I say, slid your part hangs too long,

Cun. My joyes are mockeries.

Neece. Y'ave both expreft a worthy care and love Sir, Had mine owne eye been set at liberty, To make a publike choyce (beleeve my truth Sir) It could not ha done better for my heart Then your good providence has.

O. K. You will say so then, Alasse sweet Neece, all this is but the scabbard, Now I draw forth the weapon.

Neece. How?

O. K. Sir Gregory, Approach thou Lad of thousands.

Enter Sir Gregory.

Sir Greg. Who calls me?

Neece. What motion's this? the Modell of Ninivie?

O. K. Accost her daintily now, let me advise thee.

Sir Greg. I was advis'd to bestow dainty cost on you.

Neece.

Neece. You were ill adviſ'd, back, and take better counſell;
You may have good for an Angell, the leaſt coſt
You can beſtow upon a woman Sir
Trebles ten Counſellors Fees, in Lady-ware,
Y'art over head and eares ere you be aware,
Faith keep a Batchelour ſtill, and go to bowles Sir,
Follow your Miſtris there, and prick and ſave Sir,
For other Miſtreſſes will make you a ſlave Sir.
Sir Greg. So, ſo, I have my lettrepoop already.
O. K. Why how now Neece, this is the man I tell you.
Neece. He, hang him Sir, I know you do but mocke,
This is the man you would ſay.
O. K. The Devill rides I think.
Cun. I muſt uſe cunning here.
O. K. Make me not mad, uſe him with all reſpect,
This is the man I ſweare.
Neece. Would you could perſwade me to that;
Alaſſe, you cannot go beyond me Unckle,
You carry a leſt well I muſt confeſſe,
For a man of your yeares, but——
O. K. I'me wrought beſide my ſelfe.
Cun. I never beheld comlineſſe till this minute.
Guar. O good ſweet Sir, pray offer not theſe words
To an old Gentlewoman.
Neece. Sir.
Cun. Away fifteene,
Here's fifty one exceeds thee.
Neece. What's the buſineſſe?
Cun. Give me theſe mocherly creatures, come, ne're ſmother it,
I know you are a teeming woman yet.
Guard. Troth a young Gent. might do much I think Sir
Cun. Go too then.
Guard. And I ſhould play my part, or I were ingratefull.
Neece. Can you ſo ſoone neglect me?
Cun. Hence, i'me buſie.
O. K. This croſſe point came in luckely, impudent Baggage,
Hang from the Gentleman, art thou not aſham'd
To be a Widowes hinderance?
Cun. Are you angry Sir?
O. K. You're welcome, pray court on, I ſhall deſire
Your honeſt wiſe acquaintance; vexe me not
After my care and paines to finde a match for thee,
Leſt I confine thy life to ſome out chamber,
Where thou ſhalt waſte the ſweetneſſe of thy youth,
Like a conſuming light in her owne ſocket,
And not allow'd a male creature about thee;
A very Munckey thy neceſſity
Shall prize at a thouſand pound, a Chimney-ſweeper
At fifteene hundred.
Neece. But are you ſerious Unckle?
O. K. Serious.
Neece. Pray let me looke upon the gentleman
With more heed, then I did but hum him over
In haſte, good faith, as Lawyers Chancery ſheetes;
Beſhrew my blood a tollerable man,
Now I diſtinctly read him.
Sir Greg. Hum, hum, hum.
Neece. Say he be black, hee's of a very good pitch,
Well anckled, two good confidene calves, they looke
As if they would not ſhrink at the ninth childe;
The redneſſe in's face, why that's in faſhion,
Moſt of your high bloods have it, ſigne of greatneſſe marry;
Tis to be taken downe too with May butter,
Ile ſend to my Lady Spend-tayle for her Medicine.
Sir Greg. Lum te dum, dum, dum, de dum.
Neece. Hee's qualified too, beleve me.
Sir Greg. Lum te dum, de dum, de dum.
Neece. Where was my judgement?
Sir Greg. Lum te dum, dum, dum, te dum, te dum.
Neece. Perfections cover'd meſſe.
Sir Greg. Lum te dum, te dum, te dum.
Neece. It ſmoakes apparantly, pardon ſweet Sir
The errour of my Sex.
O. K. Why well ſaid Neece,
Upon ſubmiſſion you muſt pardon her now Sir.
Sir Greg. Ile do't by courſe, do you think i'me an aſſe Knight?
Here's firſt my hand, now't goes to the Seale Office.
O. K. Formally finiſht, how goes this Suit forward?
Cun. I'me taking meaſure of the widowes minde Sir,
I hope to fit her heart.
Guard. Who would have dreamt
Of a young morſell now? things come in minutes.
Sir Greg. Truſt him not widow, hee's a younger Brother,
Hee'le ſweare and lye; beleeve me hee's worth nothing.
Guard. He brings more content to a woman with that nothing,
Then he that brings his thouſands without any thing,
We have preſidents for that amongſt great Ladies.
O. K. Come, come, no Language now ſhall be in faſhion,
But your Love-phraſe the bell to procration. Exeunt.
Enter Sir Ruinous Gentry, Witty-pate, and Priſcian.
Witty. Pax, there's nothing puts me beſides my wits, but this fourth,
This lay illiterate ſhare, there's no conſcience in't.
Ruin. Sir, it has ever been ſo where I have practis'd, and muſt be Sill where I am, nor has it been undeſerv'd at the yeares End, and ſhuffle the Almanack together, vacations and Terme-times one with another, though I ſay't, my wife is a Woman of a good ſpirit, then it is no lay-ſhare.
Priſ. Faith for this five yeare, Ego poſſum probare, I have had
A hungry penurious ſhare with em, and ſhe has had as much As I always.
Witty. Preſent or not preſent?
Priſ. Reſidens aut non reſidens, perfidem.
Witty. And what preſident's this for me? becauſe your Hic & hæc, Turpis and Qui mihi diſcipulus braines (that never got any thing but by accidence and uncertainty) did allow it, therefore I muſt, that have grounded concluſions of wit, hereditary rules for my Father to get by.
Ruin. Sir be compendious, either take or refuſe, I will bate no token of my wives ſhare, make even the laſt reckonings, and either ſo unite or here divide company.
Priſ. A good reſolution, profecto, let every man beg his owne way, and happy man be his dole.
Witty. Well, here's your double ſhare, and ſingle brains Pol, edipol, here's toward, a Caſter ecaſtor for you, I will endure it a fortnight longer, but by theſe ſix five ends——
Priſ. Take heed, five's odde, put both hands together or ſeverally they are all odde unjuſt ends.
Witty. Medius fidius, hold your tongue, I depoſe you from halfe a ſhare preſently elſe, I will make you a participle and decline you, now you underſtand me, be you a quiet conjunction amongſt the undeclined; you and your Latine ends ſhall go ſhift, Solus cum ſolo together elſe, and then if ever they get ends of gold and ſilver enough to ſerve that Gerundine maw of yours, that without Do will end in Di & Dum inſtantly.

Enter Old Knight and Sir Gregory.

Ruin. Inough, ynough, here comes company, we loſe five ſhares in wrangling about one.

Witty. My Father, put on Priſcian, he has Latine fragments too, but I feare him not, ile caſe my face with a little more haire and releive.

O. K. Tuſh Nephew (ile call you ſo) for if there be No other obſtacles then thoſe you ſpeake of
They are but powder charges without pellets,
You may ſafely front 'em and warrant your owne danger.

Sir Greg. No other that I can perceive ifaith Sir, for I put her to't, and felt her as far as I could, and the ſtrongeſt repulſe was, ſhe ſaid, ſhe would have a little Souldier in me, that (if need were) I ſhould defend her reputation.

O. K. And ſurely Sir, that is a principle
Amongſt your principall Ladies, they require
Vallour either in a friend or a husband.

Sir Greg. And I allow their requeſts ifaith, as well as any womans heart can deſire, if I knew where to get valour, I would as willingly entertaine it as any man that blowes.

O. K. Breathes, breathes Sir, that's the ſweeter phraſe.

Sir Greg. Blowes for a Souldier, ifaith Sir, and i'me in Practiſe that way.

O. K. For a Souldier, I grant it.

Sir Greg. Slid ile ſwallow ſome bullets, and good round ones too, but ile have a little Souldier in me.

Ruin. Will you on and beg, or ſteale and be hang'd.

Sir Greg. And ſome Schollar ſhe would have me beſides, Tuſh, that ſhall be no bar, 'tis a quality in a Gentleman, but of the leaſt queſtion.

Priſ. Salvete Domini benigniſſimi, munificentiſſimi.

O. K. Salvete dicis ad nos? jubeo te ſalvere,
Nay Sir, we have Latine and other mettall in us too, Sir, you ſhall ſee me talke with this fellow now.

Sir Greg. I could finde in my heart to talk with him too, If I could underſtand him.

Priſ. Charisſimi, Doctiſſimiq. Domini, ex abundantia, Charitatis veſtræ eſtote propitii in me juvenem, Miſerum, pauperem, & omni conſolatione exulem.

O. K. A pretty Schollar by my faith Sir, but ile to him agen.

Sir Greg. Does he beg or ſteale in this Language can you tell Sir?
He may take away my good name from me, and I ne're
The wiſer.

O. K. He begs, he begs Sir.

Priſ. Ecce, ecce, in oculis lacrymarum fluvius, in ore Fames, ſitiſq; ignis in vultu, pudor & impudentia, In omni parte neceſſitas & indigentia.

O. K. Audi tu bonus ſocius, tu es Scolaſticus, ſic intellige, Ego faciam argumentum, mark now Sir, now I fetch Him up.

Sir Greg. I have been fetcht up a hundred times for this, Yet I could never learne halfe ſo much.

O. K. Audi, & reſponde, hoc eſt Argumentum, nomen eſt Nomen, ergo, quod eſt tibi nomen, Reſponde nunc, Reſponde argumentum meum. Have I not put him to't Sir?

Sir Greg. Yes Sir, I think ſo.

Witty. Step in, the raſcall is put out of his pen'd ſpeech, And he can go no farther.

O. K. Cur non reſpondes?

Priſ. Oh Domine, tanta mea eſt miſeria.

Witty. So he's almoſt in agen.

Priſ. Ut nocte mecum pernoctat egeſtas, luce quotidie Pauperat habitat.

O. K. Sed quod eſt tibi nomen, & quis dedit? Reſponde Argumentum.

Priſ. Hem, hem.

Witty. He's dry, he hems, on quickly.

Ruin. Courteous Gentlemen, if the brow of a Military face may not be offenſive to your generous eye-balls, let his wounds ſpeake better then his words, for ſome branch or ſmall ſprig of charity to be planted upon this poore barren ſoyle of a Souldier.

O. K. How now, what Armes and Arts both go a begging?

Ruin. Such is the poaſt-progreſſe of cold charity now a dayes, who (for heat to her frigid limbs) paſſes in ſo ſwift a motion, that two at the leaſt had need be to ſtay her.

Sir Greg. Sir, let's reward um I pray you and be gone, if any quarrell ſhould ariſe amongſt us, I am able to anſwer neither of them, his Iron and Steele tongue is as hard as the tothers Latine one.

O. K. Stay, ſtay Sir, I will talke a little with him firſt, Let me alone with both, I will try whether they Live by their wits or no; for ſuch a man I love,
And whaſt you both beg together then?

Priſ. Conjunctis manibus, profecto, Domine.

Ruin. With equall fortunes equall diſtribution, there's not the breadth of a ſwords point uneven in our diviſion.

Sir Greg. What two qualities are here caſt away upon two poore fellowes, if a man had um that could maintaine um, what a double man were that, if theſe two Fellowes might be bought and ſodden, and boyl'd to a jelly, and eaten faſting every morning, I do not thinke but a man ſhould finde ſtrange things in his ſtomack.

O. K. Come Sir, joyne your charity with mine, and we'le make up a couple of pence betwixt us.

Sir Greg. If a man could have a penny-worth for his penny, I would beſtow more money with 'em.

Witty. Save you Gentlemen, how now? what are you encountred here? what fellowes are theſe?

O. K. 'Faith Sir, here's Mars and Mercury, a paire of poore Planets it ſeemes, that Jupiter has turn'd out to live by their wits, and we are e'ne about a little ſparke of charity to kindle um a new fire.

Witty. Stay, pray you ſtay Sir, you may abuſe your charity, nay make that goodneſſe in you no better then a vice, ſo many deceivers walke in theſe ſhadowes now a dayes, that certainly your bounties were better ſpilt then reſerv'd to ſo lewd and vicious uſes; which is he that profeſſes the Souldier?

Ruin. He that profeſſes his owne profeſſion Sir, and the dangerous life he hath led in it this paire of halfe ſcore yeares.

Witty. In what ſervices have you been Sir?

Ruin. The firſt that fleſht me a ſouldier Sir, was that great battell at Alcazar in Barbarie, where the noble Engliſh Stukely fell, and where that royall Portugall Sebaſtian ended his untimely dayes.

Witty. Are you ſure Sebaſtian dyed there?

Ruin. Faith Sir, there was ſome other rumour hop't amongſt us, that he wounded eſcap't, and touch't on his Native ſhore agen, where finding his Country at home more diſtreſt by the invaſion of the Spaniard then his loſſe abroad, forſooke it, ſtill ſupporting a miſerable and unfortunate life, which (where he ended) is yet uncertaine.

Witty. By my faith Sir, he ſpeakes the neareſt fame of truth in this.

Ruin.

Ruin. Since Sir, I serv'd in France, the Low Countries, lastly, at that memorable Skirmish at Newport, where the forward and bold Scot there spent his life so freely, that from every single heart that there fell, came home from his resolution a double honour to his country.

Witty. This should be no counterfeit, Sir.

O. K. I do not thinke he is, Sir.

Witty. But Sir, me thinkes you do not shew the markes of a Souldier, could you so freely scape, that you brought home no scarres to be your chronicle?

Ruin. Sir, I have wounds and many, but in those parts where nature and humanity bids me shame to publish.

Witty. A good Souldier cannot want those badges.

Sir Greg. Now am not I of your minde in that, for I hold him the best souldier that scapes best, alwaies at a Cocke-fencing I give him the best that has the fewest knocks.

Witty. Nay ile have a bout with your Schollar too,
To aske you why you should be poore (yet richly learn'd)
Were no question, at least you can easily
Answer it; but whether you have learning enough,
To deserve to be poore or no (since poverty is Commonly the meed of Learning) is yet to be tryed;
You have the Languages, I meane the chiefe,
As the Hebrew, Syriack, Greeke, Latine, &c.

Pris. Aliquantulum, non totaliter, Domine.

O.K. The Latine I have sufficiently tryed him in,
And I promise you Sir he is very well grounded.

Witty. I will prove him in some of the rest.
Tois miois fatherois iste Cock-scomboy?

Pris. Kay yonkeron niggitton oy fouleroi Asinisoy.

Witty. Cheateron ton biton?

Pris. Tous pollous strikerous, Angelo to peeso. (Greeke.

Witty. Certainely Sir, a very excellent Schollar in the O. K. I do note a wonderous readinesse in him.

Sir Greg. I do wonder how the Trojans could hold out ten yeares Seige (as 'tis reported) against the Greekes, if Achilles spoke but this Tongue? I do not thinke but he might have shaken downe the walls in a seventh night, and ne're troubled the wooden horse.

Witty. I will try him so far as I can in the Syriack.
Kircom bragmen, shag a dou ma dell maibou.

Pris. Hashagath rabgabash shobos oneriadka.

Witty. Colpack Rubasca, gnaverthem shigshag.
Napshamothem Rihshe hengomosh lashemech nagothi.

Witty. Gentlemen I have done, any man that can, go further, I confesse my selfe at a Nonplus.

Sir Greg. Faith not I Sir, I was at my farthest in my naturall Language, I was never double-tongu'd I thanke my hard fortune.

Witty. Well Gentlemen, 'tis pitty (walke further off a little my friends) I say, 'tis pitty such fellowes so endow'd, so qualified with the gifts of Nature and Arts, yet should have such a scarcity of fortunes benefits, we must blame our stern-hearted age for it.

O. K. 'Tis pitty indeed, and our pitty shall speake a little: Come Sir, here's my Groat.

Witty. A Groat Sir? oh fie, give nothing rather, 'twere better you rayl'd on um for begging and so quit your selfe, I am a poore Gentleman, that have little but my wits to live on.

O. K. Troth and I love you the better, Sir.

Witty. Yet ile begin a better example then so, here fellowes, there's between you, take Purse and all, and I would it were heavier for your sakes; there's a paire of Angells to guide you to your lodgings, a poore Gentlemans good will.

Pris. Gratias, maximas gratias, benignissime Domine.

O. K. This is an ill example for us, Sir, I would this bountifull Gentleman had not come this way to day.

Sir Greg. Pox, we must not shame our selves now, Sir, ile give as much as that Gentleman, though I never be Souldier or Schollar while I live; here friends, there's a piece, that if he were divided would make a paire of Angells for me too, in the love I beare to the Sword and the Tongues.

O. K. My largesse shall be equall too, and much good doe you, this bounty is a little abatement of my wit though, I feele that.

Ruin. May souldiers ever defend such charities.

Pris. And Schollars pray for their encrease.

O. K. Fare you well Sir, these fellowes may pray for you, you have made the Schollars commons exceed to day, and a word with you, Sir, you said you liv'd by your wits, if you use this bounty you'le begger your wits beleeve it.

Witty. Oh Sir, I hope to encrease 'em by it, this seed never wants his harvest, fare you well, Sir. Exit

Sir Greg. I thinke a man were as good meet with a reasonable Thiefe, as an unreasonable Begger sometimes, I could finde in my heart to beg halfe mine back agen, can you change my piece my friends?

Pris. Tempora mutantur, & nos mutamur in illis.

Sir Greg. My Gold is turn'd into Latine,

Enter Witty-pate.

Looke you good fellowes, here's one round Shilling more that lay conceal'd.

O. K. Sir, away, we shall be drawn farther into damage elle.

Sir Greg. A pox of the Foole, he live by his wits? if his wits leave him any money but what he beggs or steales very shortly, ile be hang'd for him.

Exeunt the two Knights.

Ruin. This breakfast parcell was well fetcht of ifaith.

Witty. Tush, a by-blow for mirth, we must have better purchase, we want a fourth for another project that I have ripen'd.

Ruin. My wife, she shares, and can deserve it.

Witty. She can change her shape, and be masculine.

Ruin. 'Tis one of the free'st conditions, she feares not the crack of a Pistoll, she dares say stand to a Grazier.

Pris. Probatum fuit, profecto, Domine.

Witty. Good, then you Sir Bacchus, Appollo shall be dispatcht with her share, and some contents to meete us to morrow (at a certaine place and time appointed) in the masculine Gender, my Father has a Nephew, and I an owne Cousen comming up from the University, whom he loves most indulgently, easie Master Credulous Olderasi, (for you know what your meere Academique is) your Carrier never misses his houre, he must not be rob'd (because he has but little to lose) but he must joyne with us in a devise that I have, that shall rob my Father of a hundred pieces, and thanke me to be rid on't, for there's the ambition of my wit to live upon his profest wit, that has turn'd me out to live by my wits.

Pris. Cum hirundine abi tibi regrandet.

Witty. A male habit, a bag of a hunder'd weight, though it be counters (for my Alchimy shall turne 'em into Gold of my Father's) the houre, the place, the action, shall be at large set downe, and Father, you shall know, that I put my portion to use, that you have given me to live by;
And to confirme your selfe in me renate,
I hope you'le finde my wits legitimate. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Lady, Gentry, and Servants.

Serv. NAy Lady.

Lady. Put me not in minde on't prethee,
You cannot do a greater wrong to women,
For in our wants, 'tis the most chiefe affliction
To have that name remembred; 'tis a title
That misery workes us by, and the worlds malice,
Scorne and contempt has not where with to work
On humble Callings; they are safe, and lye
Levell with pitty still, and pale distresse
Is no great stranger to 'em; but when fortune
Lookes with a stormy face on our conditions,
We finde affliction worke, and envie pastime,
And our worst enemy then that most abuses us,
Is that we are call'd by, Lady, O my spirit,
Will nothing make thee humble? I am well methinkes,
And can live quiet with my fate sometimes,
Untill I looke into the world agen,
Then I begin to rave at my stars bitternesse,
To see how many muckhills plac'd above me;
Peasants and Droyles, Caroches full of Dunghills,
Whose very birth stinkes in a generous nostrill,
Glistring by night like Glow-wormes through the High-Hurried by Torch-light in the Foot-mans hands (streets,
That shew like running Fire-drakes through the City,
And I put to my shifts and wits to live,
Nay sometimes danger too; on Foot, on Horse-back,
And earne my supper manfully ere I get it,
Many a meale I have purchas'd at that rate,

Enter Priscian.

Fed with a wound upon me, stampt at midnight.
Hah, what are you?

Pris. Now you may tell your selfe Lady. Pulls off's beard.

Lady. Oh Mr. Priscian, what's the project,
For you ne're come without one.

Pris. First, your Husband,
Sir Ruinous Gentry greetes you with best wishes,
And here has sent you your full share by me
In five Cheates, and two Robberies.

Lady. And what comes it too?

Pris. Neare upon thirteene pound.

Lady. A goodly share,
'Twill put a Lady scarce in Philip and Cheyney,
With three small Bugle Laces, like a Chamber-maid,
Here's prerious lifting.

Pris. 'Lasse you must consider, Lady,
'Tis but young Tearm, Attornies ha small doings yet,
Then High-way Lawyers, they must needs ha little,
Wee'he had no great good luck to speake troth Beauty,
Since your stout Lady-ship parted from's at Hye-gate,
But there's a faire hope now for a present hunder'd,
Here's mans Apparrell, your Horse stands at doore.

Lady. And what's the vertuous plot now?

Pris. Marry Lady,
You like a brave young Gallant must be rob'd.

Lady. I rob'd?

Pris. Nay then——

Lady. Well, well, go on, let's heare Sir.

Pris. Here's a seal'd bag of a Hunder'd, which indeed
Are Counters all, only some fifteen Groates
Of white money i'the mouth on't.

Lady. So, what Saddle have I?

Pris. Mounsieur Lavoon's the French-mans.

Lady. That agen,
You know so well it is not for my stride,
How oft have I complain'd on't?

Pris. You may have Jockey's then, the little Scotch one,
You must dispatch. Exit Pris.

Lady. Ile soone by ready Sir,
Before you ha shifted Saddles, many women
Have their wealth flow to 'em, I was made I see
To help my fortune, not my fortune me. Exit.

Enter Cuningame.

Cun. My wayes are Goblin-led, and the night Elfe
Still drawes me from my home, yet I follow,
Sure 'tis not altogether fabulous,
Such Haggs do get dominion of our tongues
So soone as we speake, the Inchantment binder;
I have dissembled such a trouble on me,
As my best wits can hardly cleare agen;
Piping through this old Reede, the Gardianesse,
With purpose that my harmony shall reach
And please the Ladies eare, she stops below,
And ecchoes back my love unto my lips,
Perswaded by most violent argumenes
Of selfe-love in her selfe; I am so selfe-foole,
To doat upon her hunder'd-wrinckl'd face;
I could begger her to accept the gifts
She would throw upon me; 'twere charity,
But for pitties sake I will be a niggard
And undo her, refusing to take from her;
I'me haunted agen, if it take not now
I'le breake the Spell.

Enter Gardianesse.

Gard. Sweet Cuningame, welcome;
What? a whole day absent? Birds that build Nests
Have care to keep 'em.

Cun. That's granted,
But not continually to sit upon 'em;
Lesse in the youngling season, else they desire
To fly abroad, and recreate their labours,
Then they returne with fresher appetite
To worke agen.

Gard. Well, well, you have built a nest
That will stand all stormes, you need not mistrust
A weather-wracke, and one day it may be
The youngling season too, then I hope
You'le ne're fly out of sight.

Cun. There will be paines,
I see to shake this Bur off, and sweetest,
Prethee how fares thy charge? has my good friend
Sir Gregory the countenance of a Lover?

Gard. No by my troth, not in my minde, me thinkes (Setting his Worship aside) he lookes like a foole.

Cun. Nay ifaith, ne're divide his Worship from him for Small matter; Fools and Worship are no such (that Strangers now adaies, but my meaning is,
Has he thy Ladies countenance of love?
Lookes she like a welcome on him? plainely,
Have they as good hope of one another,
As Cupid blesse us, we have?

Gard. Troth I know not,
I can perceive no forwardnesse in my charge,
But I protest I wish the Knight better
For your sake, Bird.

Cun. Why thanks sweet Bird, and with my heart I wish,
That he had as strong and likely hope of her

As

As thou hast of me.
Gard. Well, he's like to speed
Ne're the worse for that good wish, and ile tell you
Bird (for secrets are not to be kept betwixt us two)
My charge thinkes well of you.
Cun. Of me? for what?
Gard. For my sake, I meane so, I have heard her
A hundred times since her Uncle gave her
The first hob about you, that she'de do somewhat
For my sake if things went well together,
We have spoke of doores and bolts, and things and things,
Go too, ile tell you all, but you'le finde
Some advancement for my sake I do believe.
Cun. Faith be not sparing, tell me.
Gard. By my Lady
You shall pardon me for that, 'twere a shame
If men should heare all that women speakes behinde
Their backes sometimes.
Cun. You must give me leave yet,
At least to give her thankes.
Gard. Not that neither,
She must not take a notice of my blabbings
It is sufficient you shall give me thankes,
For 'tis for my sake if she be bountifull,
She loves me, and loves you too for my sake.
Cun. How shall I knowing this but be ingrate,
Not to repay her with my dearest duty.
Gard. I, but you must not know it, if you tell
All that I open to you, you'le shame us both;
A far off you may kisse your hand, blush, or so,
But I'le allow no nearer conference.
Cun. Whoope! you'le be jealous I perceive now.
Gard. Jealous? why there's no true love without it, Bird;
I must be jealous of thee, but for her,
(Were it within my duty to my Master)
I durst trust her with the strongest temper,
And I dare sweare her now as pure a Virgin
As e're was welcom'd to a marriage bed,
If thoughts may be untainted, hers are so.
Cun. And where's the cause of your feare then?
Gard. Well, well;
When things are past, and the wedding Torches
Lighted at matches, to kindle better fire,
Then ile tell you more.
Cun. Come, come, I see further,
That if we were married you'de be jealous.
Gard. I protest I should a little, but not of her,
It is the married woman (if you mark it)
And not the maid that longs, the appetite
Followes the first taste, when we have relisht
We wish cloying, the taste once pleas'd before,
Then our desire is whetted on to more;
But I reveale too much to you, ifaith Bird.
Cun. Not a whit 'faith, Bird, betwixt you and I,
I am beholding for bettering of my knowledge.
Gard. Nay you shall know more of me if you'le be rul'd,
But make not things common.
Cun. Vd' so, your Lady?
Gard. I, 'tis no matter, she'le like well of this,
Our familiarity is her content.

Enter Neece and Clowne.

Nee. This present from Sir Gregory?
Clow. From my Master, the Worshipfull right Sir Gregory Fop.
Nee. A Ruffe? and what might be his high conceit
In sending of a Ruffe? (high too
Clow. I thinke he had two conceits in it forsooth, too Low, Ruffe high, because as the Ruffe does embrace your necke all day, so does he desire to throw his Knightly armes.
Neece. But then I leave him off a nights.
Clow. Why then he is ruffe low, a ruffian, a bold adventerous errant to do any rough service for his Lady.
Nee. A witty and unhappy conceit, do's he meane
As he seemes to say unto that reverence? Toward
He does wooe her sure. Cuning.
Clow. To tell you truth Lady, his conceit was far better then I have blaz'd it yet.
Nee. Do you think so, Sir?
Clow. Nay I know it forsooth, for it was two dayes ere he compass'd it, to finde a fitting present for your Ladyship, he was sending once a very fine Puppy to you.
Nee. And that he would have brought himselfe.
Clow. So he would indeed, but then he alter'd his devise, and sent this Ruffe, requesting withall, that whensoever it is foule, you (with your owne hands) would bestow the starching of it.
Nee. Else she woes him, now his eyes shoots this way;
And what was the reason for that Sir? Toward Cun.
Clow. There lyes his maine conceit, Lady, for sayes he, In so doing she cannot chuse but in the starching to clap it often between her hands, and so she gives a great liking and applause to my present, whereas if I should send a Puppy, she ever calls it to her with hist, hisse, hisse, which is a fearefull disgrace, he drew the devise from a Play, at the Bull tother day.
Nee. I marry Sir, this was a rich conceit indeed.
Clow. And far fetch'd, therefore good for you Lady.
Gard. How now? which way looke you, Bird?
Cun. At the Foole Bird shall I not look at the Foole?
Gard. At the Foole and I here: what need that? pray look (this way.
Nee. Ile fit him aptly, either ile awake
His wits (if he have any) or force him
To appeare (as yet I cannot think him)
Without any, Sir-sir, tell me one thing true
That I shall aske you now, Was this devise
Your Masters owne? I doubt his wit in it;
He's not so ingenious.
Clow. His owne I assure you, Madam.
Nee. Nay, you must not lye.
Clow. Not with a Lady, i'de rather lye with you then lye with my Master, by your leave in such a case as this.
Gard. Yet agen your eye?
Cun. The Foole makes mirth 'faith,
I would heare some.
Gard. Come, you shall heare none but me.
Nee. Come hither friend, nay come nearer me; did
Thy Master send thee to me? he may be wise,
But did not shew it much in that, men sometimes
May wrong themselves unawares, when they least thinke
Was Vulcan ever so unwise, to send Mars (on't;
To be his spokesman when he went a wooing?
Send thee? heigh-ho, a pretty rowling eye.
Clow. I can turne up the white and the black too, and Nee. Why, here's an amorous nose. (need be, forsooth.
Clow. You see the worst of my nose, forsooth.
Nee. A cheek, how I could put it now in dalliance,
A paire of lips, oh that we were once met,
I could suck Sugar from 'em, what a beard's here?
When will the Knight thy Master have such a
Stampe of man-hood on his face? nay, do not blush.
Clow. 'Tis nothing but my flesh and blood that rises so.
Cun. Death, she courts the Foole.
Gard. Away, away, 'tis sport, do not minde it.
Nee. Give me thy hand, come be familiar;
I, here's a promising palme; what a soft

Handfull of pleasure's here, here's Downe compar'd
With Flocks and quilted Straw, thy Knights fingers
Are leane mattrice rubbers to these Feathers,
I prethee let me leane my cheeke upon't,
What a soft pillow's here?

Clow. Hum, umh, hu, hum.

Neece. Why there's a courage in that lively passion,
Measure thee all o're, there's not a limbe
But has his full proportion; it is my voyce,
There's no compare betwixt the Knight and thee,
The goodlier man by halfe, at once now
I see thee all over.

Clow. If you had seen me swim tother day on my back, you would have sed you had seene, there was two Chambermaids that saw me, and my leggs by chance were tangled in the flags, and when they saw how I was hang'd, they cryed out, O help the man for feare he be drown'd.

Neece. They could do no lesse in pitty, come, thine arme, wee'le walke together.

Cun. Blindnesse of Love and Women, why she dotes upon the Foole.

Gard. What's that to you, minde her not.

Cun. Away you Burre.

Gard. How's that?

Cun. Hang of Fleshook, fasten thine itchy claspe
On some dry Toad-stoole that will kindle with thee,
And burne together.

Gard. Oh abominable,
Why do you not love me?

Cun. No, never did?
I tooke thee downe a little way to Enforce a Vomit from my offended stomack,
Now thou'rt up agen I loath thee filthily.

Gard. Oh Villaine.

Cun. Why dost thou not see a sight
Would make a man abjure the sight of women.

Nee. Ha, ha, ha, he's vext; ha, ha, ha,
Ha, ha, ha.

Gard. Why dost thou laugh?
Because thou laugh'st, nothing else ifaith.

Cun. She has but mockt my folly, else she findes not
The bosome of my purpose, some other way
Must make me know; ile try her, and may chance quit
The fine dexterity of her Lady-wit. Exit.

Nee. Yes introth, I laught to think of thy Master,
Now, what he would think if he knew this?

Clow. By my troth I laugh at him too, faith Sirrah, hee's but a foole to say the truth, though I say't that should not say't.

Nee. Yes, thou shouldst say truth, and I beleeve thee;
Well, for this time wee'le part, you perceive something,
Our tongues betray our hearts, there's our weaknesse,
But pray be silent.

Clow. As Mouse in Cheese, or Goose in Hay ifaith.

Neece. Looke, we are cut off, there's my hand where my lips would be.

Clow. Ile wink and think 'em thy lips, farewell. Exit.

Nee. Now Gardioneſſe, I need not aske where you have been.

Gard. O Lady, never was woman so abus'd

Clow. Do't thou heare Lady sweet-heart, I had forgot to tell thee, if you will I will come back in the Evening?

Nee. By no meanes, come not till I send for you.

Clow. If there be any need, you may think of things when I am gone, I may be convey'd into your chamber, ile lye under the bed while midnight, or so, or you shall put me up in one of your little boxes, I can creep in at a small hole.

Nee. These are things I dare not venter, I charge you on my love never come till I send for you.

Clow. Verbum insapienti, 'tis enough to the wise, nor I think it is not fit the Knight should know any thing yet.

Nee. By no meanes, pray you go now, we are suspected.

Clow. For the things that are past, let us use our secrets.

Nee. Now ile make a firme triall of your love,
As you love me, not a word more at this time,
Not a syllable, 'tis the scale of love, take heed.

Clow. Hum, hum, hum, hum — Hum's loath to depart. Exit Clown.

Nee. So, this pleasant trouble's gone, now Gardianesse,
What? your eyes eating your heart, the cause woman?

Gard. The cause is false man, Madam, oh Lady,
I have been gub'd in a shining Carbuncle,
A very Glo-worme, that I thought had fire in't,
And 'tis as cold as Ice.

Neece. And justly serv'd,
Would'st thou once think that such an erring Spring
Would dote upon thine Autumne?

Gard. Oh, had you heard him
But protest.

Nee. I would not have believ'd him,
Thou might'st have perceiv'd how I mockt thy folly,
In wanton imitation with the Foole,
Go weepe the sin of thy credulity,
Not of thy losse, for it was never thine,
And it is gaine to misse it; wert thou so dull?
Nay yet thou'rt stupid and uncapable,
Why thou wert but the bait to fish with, not
The prey, the stale to catch another Bird with.

Gard. Indeed he call'd me Bird.

Nee. Yet thou perceiv'st not,
It is your Neece he loves, would'st thou be made
A stalking Jade? 'tis she, examine it,
Ile hurry all awry, and tread my path
Over unbeaten grounds, go level to the mark;
Not by circuler bouts, rare things are pleasing,
And rare's but seldome in the simple sence,
But has her Emphasis with eminence Exit.

Gard. My Neece? she the rivall of my abuse?
My flesh and blood wrong me? ile Aunt her for't;

Enter Mirabell.

Oh opportunity, thou blessest me
Now Gentlewoman, are you parted so soone?
Where's your friend I pray? your Cuningame?

Mir. What say you Aunt?

Gard. Come, come, your Cuningame?
I am not blinde with age yet, nor deafe.

Mir. Dumbe I am sure you are not, what ayld you Ant?
Are you not well?

Gard. No, nor sick, nor mad, nor in my wits, nor sleeping, nor walking, nor nothing, nor any thing; I know not what I am, nor what I am not.

Mir. Mercy cover us, what do you meane Aunt?

Gard. I meane to be reveng'd.

Mir. On whom?

Gard. On thee, Baggage.

Mir. Revenge should follow injury,
Which never reacht so far as thought in me
Towards you Aunt.

Gard. Your cunning, minion,
Nor your Cuningame can either blinde me,
The gentle Begger loves you.

Mir. Beseech you,
Let me stay your errour, I begin to heare,
And shake off my amazement; if you think
That ever any passage treating love
Hath been betwixt us yet commenc't, any Silent eye-glance that might but sparkle fire,

So much as brother and ſiſter might meet with,
The lip-ſalute, ſo much as ſtrangers might Take a farewell with, the commixed hands,
Nay, but the leaſt thought of the leaſt of theſe;
In troth you wrong your boſome, by that truth
(Which I thinke yet you durſt be bayle for in me,
If it were offered ye) I am as free
As all this proteſtation.

Gard. May I believe this?

Mir. If ever you'l believe truth; why, I thought he had ſpake love to you, and if his heart prompted his tongue, ſure I did heare ſo much.

Gard. Oh falſeſt man, Ixions plague fell on me,
Never by woman (ſuch a maſculine cloud)
So airy and ſo ſubtle was embrac't.

Mir. By no cauſe in me, by my life deere Aunt.

Gard. I believe you, then help in my revenge,
And you ſhall do't, or looſe my love for ever,
Ile have him quitted at his equall weapon,
Thou art young, follow him, bait his deſires
With all the Engines of a womans wit,
Stretch modeſty even to the higheſt pitch;
He cannot freeze at ſuch a flaming beauty;
And when thou haſt him by the amorous gills,
Thinke on my vengeance, choke up his deſires,
Then let his banquettings be Tantaliſme,
Let thy diſdaine ſpurne the diſſembler out;
Oh I ſhould clime my ſtars, and ſit above,
To ſee him burne to aſhes in his love.

Mir. This will be a ſtrange taſte, Aunt, and an Unwilling labour, yet in your injunction
I am a ſervant to't.

Gard. Thou'lt undertak't?

Mir. Yes, let the ſucceſſe commend it ſelfe hereafter.

Gard. Effect it Girle, my ſubſtance is thy ſtore,
Nothing but want of will makes woman poore. Exeunt.

Enter Sir Gregory, and Clowne.

Sir Greg. Why Pompey, thou art not ſtarke mad, art thou?
Wilt thou not tell me how my Lady doe's?

Clow. Your Lady?

Sir Greg. Did ſhe receive the thing that I ſent her kindly, or no?

Clow. The thing that you ſent her, Knight, by the thing that you ſent, was for the things ſake that was ſent to carry the thing that you ſent, very kindly received, firſt, there is your Indenture, now go ſeeke you a ſervant: ſecondly, you are a Knight: thirdly and laſtly, I am mine owne man: and fourthly, fare you well.

Sir Greg. Why Pompey? prethee let me ſpeak with thee, Ile lay my life ſome Haire has croſt him.

Clow. Knight, if you be a Knight, ſo keep you; as for the Lady, who ſhall ſay that ſhe is not a faire Lady, a ſweet Lady, an honeſt and a vertuous Lady, I will ſay he is a baſe fellow, a blab of his tongue, and I will make him eat theſe fingers ends.

Sir Greg. Why here's no body ſaies ſo Pompey.

Clow. Whatſoever things have paſt betweene the Lady and the other party, whom I will not name at this time, I ſay ſhe is vertuous, and honeſt, and I will maintaine it, as long as I can maintaine my ſelfe with bread and water.

Sir Greg. Why I know no body thinks otherwiſe.

Clow. Any man that doe's but thinke it in my hearing, I will make him thinke on't while he has a thought in his Boſome; ſhall we ſay that kindneſſes from Ladies are common? or that favours and proteſtations are things of no moment betwixt parties and parties? I ſay ſtill, whatſoever has been betwixt the Lady and the party which I will not name, that ſhe is honeſt, and ſhall be honeſt, whatſoever ſhe doe's by day or by night, by light or by darkneſſe, with cut and long tale.

Sir Greg. Why I ſay ſhe is honeſt.

Clow. Is ſhe honeſt? in what ſenſe do you ſay ſhe is honeſt, Knight?

Sir Greg. If I could not finde in my heart to throw my Dagger at thy head, hilts and all, I'me an aſſe, and no Gentleman.

Clow. Throw your Dagger at me! do not Knight, I give you faire warning, 'tis but caſt away if you do, for you ſhall have no other words of me, the Lady is an honeſt Lady, whatſoever reports may go of ſports and toyes, and thoughts, and words, and deeds, betwixt her and the party which I will not name; this I give you to underſtand, That another man may have as good an eye, as amorous a noſe, as faire a ſtampt beard, and be as proper a man as a Knight, (I name no parties) a Servingman may be as good as a Sir, a Pompey as a Gregory, a Doodle as a Fop; ſo Servingman Pompey Doodle may be reſpected as well with Ladies (though I name no parties) as Sir Gregory Fop; ſo farewell. Exit.

Sir Greg. If the fellow be not out of his wits, then will I never have any more wit while I live; either the ſight of the Lady has gaſter'd him, or elſe he's drunke, or elſe he walks in his ſleepe, or elſe he's a ſoole, or a knave, or both, one of the three I'me ſure 'tis; yet now I think on't, ſhe has not us'd me ſo kindly as her Uncle promiſ'd me ſhe ſhould, but that's all one, he ſaies I ſhall have her, and I dare take his word for the beſt Horſe I have, and that's a weightier thing then a Lady, I'me ſure on't. Exit.

Enter Lady Ruinous (as a man) Witty Pate, Sir Ruinous, Priſcian, and Maſter Credulous, (binding and robing her, and in Scarfes) Credulous findes the bagge.

Lady Ruin. Nay, I am your owne, 'tis in your pleaſure
How you'l deale with me; yet I would intreat,
You will not make that which is bad enough,
Worſe then it need be, by a ſecond ill,
When it can render you no ſecond profit;
If it be coyne you ſeeke, you have your prey,
All my ſtore, I vow, (and it weighs a hundred)
My life, or any hurt you give my body,
Can inrich you no more.

Witty. You may purſue.

L. Ruin. As I am a Gentlewoman, I never will,
Onely wee'l binde you to quiet behaviour
Till you call out for Bayle, and on th'other
Side of the hedge leave you; but keep the peace
Till we be out of hearing, for by that
We ſhall be out of danger, if we come back,
We come with a miſchiefe.

Lady. You need not feare me.

Priſ. Come, wee'l beſtow you then. Exit Ruin. Priſ. (and Lady.

Wit. Why law you Sir, is not this a ſwifter Revenue then Sic probas ergo's & igitur's can bring in? why is not this one of your Syllogiſmes in Barbara? Omne utile eſt honeſtum.

Cred. Well Sir, a little more of this acquaintance,
Will make me know you fully I proteſt.

Wit. You have (at firſt ſight) made me conſcious
Of ſuch a deed my dreames ne're prompted, yet
I could almoſt have wiſht rather ye'ad rob'd me
Of my Cloake, (for my Purſe 'tis a Schollers)
Then to have made me a robber.

Cred. I had rather have anſwered three difficult queſtions,
Then this one, as eaſie as yet it ſeems.

Witty.

Wit. Tush, you shall never come to further answer for't;
Can you confesse your penurious Uncle,
In his full face of love, to be so strict
A Nigard to your Commons, that you are faine
To lize your belly out with shoulder fees?
With Rumps and Kidneyes, and ones of single Beere,
And yet make Dainy to feed more daintily,
At this easier rate? fie Master Credulous,
I blush for you.

Cred. This is a truth undeniable.

Wit. Why go to then, I hope I know your Uncle,
How doe's he use his Sonne, nearer then you?

Cred. Faith like his Jade, upon the bare Commons,
Turn'd out to pick his living as he can get it;
He would have been glad to have shar'd in such
A purchase, and thankt his good fortune too;

Enter Ruinous, and Prisician.

But mum no more — is all safe, Bullies?
secure? the Gentleman thinks himself most happy in his losse,
With his safe life and limbs, and redoubles
His first vow, as he is a Gentleman,
Never to pursue us.

Wit. Well away then,
Dispersse you with Master Credulous, who still Shall beare the purchase, Prisician and I
Will take some other course: You know our meeting
At the Three Cups in Saint Gyles, with this proviso,
(For 'tis a Law with us) that nothing be open'd
Till all be present, the looser saies a hundred,
And it can weigh no lesse.

Ruin. Come, Sir, wee'l be your guide.

Cred. My honesty, which till now was never forfeited,
All shall be close till our meeting. Exit Cred. and Ruin.

Wit. Tush, I believ't,
And then all shall out; where's the theefe that's rob'd?

Enter Lady Ruinous.

L. Ruin. Here Master Oldcraft, all followes now.

Wit. 'Twas neatly done, wench, now to turne that bag
Of counterfets to current pieces, & actum est.

L. Ruin. You are the Chymist, wee'l blow the fire still,
If you can mingle the ingredients.

Wit. I will not misse a cause, a quantity, a dram,
You know the place.

Prisc. I have told her that, Sir.

Wit. Good, turne Ruinous to be a Constable, I'me sure
We want not beards of all sorts, from the Worshipfull Magistrate to the under Watchman;
Because we must have no danger of life,
But a cleanly cheat, attach Credulous,
The cause is plaine, the theft found about him;
Then fall I in his owne Cozens shape
By meere accident, where finding him distrest,
With some difficulty must fetch him off,
With promise that his Uncle shall shut up all
With double restitution: Master Constable, Ruinous
His mouth shall be stop't; you, Mistris rob theef;
Shall have your share of what we can gull my father of;
Is't plaine enough?

L. Ruin. As plaine a cozenage as can be, faith.

Wit. Father, I come againe, and againe when this is Past too, Father, one will beget another;
I'de be loath to leave your posterity barren,
You were best to come to composition Father,
Two hundred pieces yearly allow me yet,
It will be cheaper (Father) then my wit,
For I will cheate none but you, deare Father.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Old Knight and Sir Gregory.

O. K. WHy now you take the course Sir Gregory
Fut;
I could enforce her and I list, but love
That's gently wonne, is a mans owne for ever,
Have you prepar'd good musick?

Sir Greg. As fine a noyse, Uncle, as heart can wish.

O. K. Why that's done like a Suitor,
They must be, woo'd a hundred severall waies,
Before you obtaine the right way in a woman.
'Tis an odde creature, full of creeks and windings,
The Serpent has not more; for 'tis all his,
And then her owne beside came in by her mother.

Sir Greg. A fore-stall portion for a man to venter on.

O. K. But the way found once, by the wits of men,
There is no creature lyes so tame agen.

Sir Greg. I promise you, not a house-Rabbit, Sir.

O. K. No sucker on ent all.

Sir Greg. What a thing's that?
They're pretty Fooles I warrant, when they're tame
As a man can lay his lips to.

O. K. How were you bred, Sir?
Did you never make a foole of a Tenants daughter?

Sir Greg. Never i faith, they ha' made some fooles for me,
And brought 'em many a time under their aprons.

O. K. They could not shew you the way plainlier, I thinke,
To make a foole againe.

Sir Greg. There's fooles enough, Sir,
Lesse they were wise.

O. K. This is wondrous rare,
Come you to London with a Maiden-head, Knight?
A Gentleman of your ranke ride with a Cloak-bag?
Never an Hostesse by the way to leave it with;
Not Tapsters sister? nor head Ostlers wife?
What no body?

Sir Greg. Well mockt old Wit Monger,
I keep it for your Neece.

O. K. Do not say so for shame, shee'l laugh at thee,
A wife ne're looks for's, 'tis a Batchellors penny,
He may give't to a beggar-wench, i'th progresse time,
And never call'd to account for't. Exit.

Sir Greg. Would I'de knowne so much,
I could ha' stopt a beggars mouth by'th way,

Enter Page.

That rail'd upon me, cause I'de give her nothing —
What, are they come?

Pag. And plac'd directly, Sir,
Under her window.

Sir Greg. What may I call you Gentleman?

Fag. A poore servant to the Violl, I'me the Voyce, Sir.

Sir Greg. In good time Master Voyce.

Boy. Indeed good time doe's get the mastery.

Sir Greg. What Countryman Master Voyce?

Boy. Sir, borne at Ely, we all set up in Ely,
But our house commonly breakes in Rutland Shire.

Sir Greg.

Sir Greg. A ſhrewd place by my faith, it may well break your voyce,
It breaks many a mans back; come, ſet to your buſineſſe.

Song.

Faine would I make you, Sweet, but feare
I ſhould invite you by worſe cheare;
In your dreames you cannot fare
Meaner then Muſick; no compare;
None of your ſlumbers are compil'de
Under the pleaſure makes a childe;
Your day-delights, ſo well compact,
That what you think, turnes all to act:
I'de wiſh my life no better play,
Your dreame by night, your thought by day.
Wake gently, wake,
Part ſoftly from your dreames;
The morning flies
To your faire eyes,
To take her ſpeciall beames.

Sir Greg. I heare her up, here Maſter Voyce, Pay you the Inſtruments, ſave what you can,
Enter Neece above.
To keep you when you're crackt. Exit Boy.
Neece. Who ſhould this be?
That I'me ſo much beholding to, for ſweetneſſe?
Pray Heaven it happens right.
Sir Greg. Good morrow Miſtris.
Neece. An ill day and a thouſand come upon thee.
Sir Greg. 'Light that's five hundred more then any Almanack has,
Neece. Comes it from thee? it is the mangieſt Muſick
That ever woman heard.
Sir Greg. Nay ſay not ſo Lady,
There's not an itch about 'em.
Neece. I could curſe
My attentive powers, for giving entrance to't;
There is no boldneſſe like the impudence
That's lock't in a fooles blood, how durſt you do this?
In conſcience I abus'd you as ſufficiently
As woman could a man; inſatiate Coxcombe,
The mocks, and ſpitefull language I have given thee,
Would a' my life ha' ſerv'd ten reaſonable men,
And riſe contented too, and left enough for their friends.
You glutton at abuſes, never ſatisfied?
I am perſwaded thou devour'ſt more ſcoffs
Then all thy body's worth, and ſtill a hungred!
A miſchiefe of that mawe; prethee ſeeke elſewhere,
Introth I am weary of abuſing thee;
Get thee a freſh Miſtris, thou'lt make worke enough;
I do not thinke there's ſcorne enough in Towne
To ſerve thy turne, take the Court Ladies in,
And all their women to 'em, that exceed 'em.
Sir Greg. Is this in earneſt, Lady?
Neece. Oh unſatiable!
Doſt thou count all this but an earneſt yet?
I'de thought I'de paid thee all the whole ſumme, truſt me;
Thou'lt begger my deriſion utterly
If thou ſtai'ſt longer, I ſhall want a laugh:
If I knew where to borrow a contempt
Would hold thee tack, ſtay and be hang'd thou ſhould'ſt then,
But thou'ſt no conſcience now to extort hate from me,
When one has ſpent all ſhe can make upon thee;
Muſt I begin to pay thee hire againe?
After I have rid thee twice? faith 'tis unreaſonable.
Sir Greg. Say you ſo? I'le know that preſently. Exit.
Neece. Now he runs
To fetch my Uncle to this muſty bargaine,
But I have better ware alwaies at hand.
And lay by this ſtill when he comes to cheapen.

Enter Cuningame.

Cun. I met the Muſick now, yet cannot learne
What entertainment he receiv'd from her.
Nee. There's ſome body ſet already, I muſt to't, I ſee,
Well, well, Sir Gregory.
Cun. Hah, Sir Gregory?
Neece. Where e're you come you may well boaſt your conqueſt.
Cun. She's loſt y'faith, enough, has fortune then Remembred her great boy? ſhe ſeldome failes 'em.
Neece. He was the unlikelieſt man at firſt, me thought,
To have my love, we never met but wrangled,
Cun. A pox upon that wrangling, ſay I ſtill,
I never knew it faile yet, where e'r't came;
It never comes but like a ſtorme of haile,
'Tis ſure to bring fine weather at the tayle on't,
There's not one match 'mongſt twenty made without it,
It fights i'th tongue, but ſure to agree i'th haunches.
Neece. That man that ſhould ha' told me, when time was,
I ſhould ha' had him, had been laught at pitteouſly,
But ſee how things will change?
Cun. Here's a heart feeles it—— O the deceitfull promiſes of love!
What truſt ſhould a man put i'th lip of woman?
She kiſt me with that ſtrength, as if ſh'ad meant
To ha' ſet the faire print of her ſoule upon me.
Neece. I would ha' ſworne 'twould ne're ha' beene a match once.
Cun. Ile heare no more, I'me mad to heare ſo much,
Why ſhould I aime my thoughts at better fortunes
Then younger brothers have? that's a Maid with nothing,
Or ſome old Soap-boylers Widow, without teeth,
There waits my fortune for me, ſeeke no farther.
Exit Cun.

Enter Old Knight, and Sir Gregory.

O. K. You tell me things, Sir Gregory, that cannot be,
She will not, nor ſhe dares not.
Sir Greg. Would I were whipt then.
Neece. Ile make as little ſhow of love, Sir Gregory,
As ever woman did, you ſhall not know
You have my heart a good while.
O. K. Heard you that?
Neece. Man will inſult ſo ſoone, 'tis his condition,
'Tis good to keep him off as long as we can,
I've much a do, I ſweare; and love i'th end
Will have his courſe, let Maids do what they can,
They are but fraile things, till they end in man.
O. K. What ſay you to this, Sir?
Sir Greg. This is ſomewhat handſome.
Neece. And by that little wrangling that I fain'd,
Now I ſhall try how conſtant his love is,
Although't went ſore againſt my heart to chide him.
Sir Greg. Alas poore Gentlewoman.
O. K. Now y'are ſure of truth,
You heare her owne thoughts ſpeak.
Sir Greg. They ſpeake indeed.
O. K. Go, you're a braineleſſe Coxe, a Toy, a Fop,

Ile

Ile go no farther then your name, Sir Gregory,
Ile right my ſelf there; were you from this place,
You ſhould perceive I'me heartily angry with you,
Offer to ſowe ſtrife 'twixt my Neece and I?
Good morrow Neece, good morrow.
Neece. Many faire ones to you, Sir. (morning?
O. K. Go, your'e a Coxcombe. How doſt Neece this
An Idle ſhallow foole: Slep'ſt thou well, Girle?
Fortune may very well provide thee Lordſhips,
For honeſty has left thee little manners.
Sir Greg. How am I bang'd a' both ſides?
O.K. Abuſe kindneſſe? Wil't take the ayre to day Neece?
Neece. When you pleaſe, Sir,
There ſtands the Heyre behinde you I muſt take,
(Which I'de as live take, as take him I ſweare.) (now?
O. K. La' you; do you hear't continued to your teeth
A pox of all ſuch Gregories; what a hand Neece lets
Have I with you? (fall her Scarfe.
Sir Greg. No more y'feck, I ha' done, Sir:
Lady, your Scarfe's falne downe.
Neece. 'Tis but your luck, Sir,
And doe's preſage the Miſtris muſt fall ſhortly,
You may weare it, and you pleaſe.
O. K. There's a trick for you,
You'r parlouſly belov'd, you ſhould complaine.
Sir Greg. Yes, when I complaine, Sir,
Then do your worſt, there Ile deceive you Sir.
O. K. You are a Dolt, and ſo I leave you, Sir. Exit.
Sir Greg. Ah ſirra, Miſtris, were you caught y'faith?
We overheard you all; I muſt not know
I have your heart, take heed a that, I pray,
I knew ſome Scarfe would come.
Neece. He's quite gone, ſure:
Ah you baſe Coxcomb, couldſt thou come againe?
And ſo abus'd as thou waſt?
Sir Greg. How?
Neece. 'Twould ha' kill'd
A ſenſible man, he would ha' gone to his Chamber,
And broke his heart by this time.
Sir Greg. Thank you heartily.
Neece. Or fixt a naked rapier in a wall,
Like him that earn'd his Knighthood e're he had it,
And then refus'd upon't, ran up to'th hilts.
Sir Greg. Yes, let him run for me, I was never brought up
I never profeſt running i' my life. (to't,
Neece. What art thou made on? thou tough villanous
Will nothing deſtroy thee? (vermin,
Sir Greg. Yes, yes, aſſure your ſelfe
Unkinde words may do much.
Neece. Why, doſt thou want 'em?
I've e'ne conſum'd my ſpleene to help thee to 'em,
Tell me what ſort of words they be would ſpeed thee?
Ile ſee what I can do yet.
Sir Greg. I'me much beholding to you,
Your'e willing to beſtow huge paines upon me.
Neece. I ſhould account nothing too much to rid thee.
Sir Greg. I wonder you'd not offer to deſtroy me,
All the while your Uncle was here?
Neece. Why there thou betray'ſt thy houſe, we of the Old-Crafts
Were borne to more wit then ſo.
Sir Greg. I weare your favour here.
Neece. Would it might rot thy arme off: if thou knewſt
With what contempt thou haſt it, what hearts bitterneſſe,
How many cunning curſes came along with it,
Thoud'ſt quake to handle it.
Sir Greg. A pox, tak't againe then;
Who'd be thus plagu'd of all hands?
Nee. No, weare't ſtill,
But long I hope thou ſhalt not, 'tis but caſt
Upon thee, purpoſely to ſerve another
That has more right to't, as in ſome Countries they con-
Their treaſure upon Aſſes to their friends, (vey
If mine be but ſo wiſe and apprehenſive
As my opinion gives him to my heart,
It ſtayes not long on thy deſertleſſe arme;
Ile make thee e're I ha' done not dare to weare
Any thing of mine, although I give't thee freely;
Kiſſe it you may, and make what ſhew you can,
But ſure you carry't to a worthier man,
And ſo good morrow to you.
Sir Greg. Hu hum, ha hum;
I han't the ſpirit now to daſh my braines out,
Nor the audacity to kill my ſelfe,
But I could cry my heart out, that's as good,
For ſo't be out no matter which way it comes,
If I can dye with a fillip, or depart
At hot cockles, what's that to any man?
If there be ſo much death that ſerves my turne there.
Every one knowes the ſtate of his owne body,
No Carrion kills a Kite, but then agen
There's Cheeſe will choak a Daw; time I were dead ifaith,
If I knew which way without hurt or danger.
I am a Maiden-Knight, and cannot looke
Upon a naked weapon with any modeſty,
Elſe 'twould go hard with me, and to complaine
To Sir Perfidious the old Knight agen,
Were to be more abus'd; perhaps he would beat me well,
But ne're beleeve me;
Enter Cuningame.
And few men dye a beating, that were loſt too:
Oh, here's my friend, ile make my moane to him.
Cun. I cannot teare her memory from my heart,
That treads mine downe, was ever man ſo fool'd
That profeſt wit?
Sir Greg. O Cuningame?
Cun. Sir Gregory?
The choyce, the Victor, the Townes happy man?
Sir Greg. Sniggs, what doſt meane? come I to thee for comfort, and doſt abuſe me too?
Cun. Abuſe you? how Sir?
With juſtifying your fortune, and your joyes?
Sir Greg. Pray hold your hand, Sir i've bin bold enough,
You come with a new way now; ſtrike me merrily,
But when a man's ſore beaten a both ſides already,
Then the leaſt tap in jeſt goes to the guts on him;
Wilt ha the truth? i'me made the rankeſt aſſe
That e're was borne to Lordſhips.
Cun. What? no Sir;
Sir Greg. I had not thought my body could a yeelded
All thoſe foule ſcurvie names that ſhe has call'd me,
I wonder whence ſhe fecht 'em?
Cun. Is this credible?
Sir Greg. She pin'd this ſcarfe upon me afore her Uncle,
But his back turn'd, ſhe curſt me ſo for wearing on't,
The very brawne of mine arme has ak'd ever ſince,
Yet in a manner forc't me to weare't ſtill,
But hop't I ſhould not long; if good luck ſerve
I ſhould meet one that has more wit and worth
Should take it from me, 'twas but lent to me,
And ſent to him for a token.
Cun. I conceit it, I know the man
That lyes in wait for't, part with't by all meanes,
In any caſe, you are way-laid about it.
Sir Greg. How Sir? way-laid?
Cun. Pox of a Scarfe ſay I,

I prize my friends life 'bove a million on 'em,
You shall be rul'd, Sir, I know more then you.
Sir Greg. If you know more then I, let me be rid on't,
Lasse 'tis not for my wearing, so she told me.
Cun. No, no, give me't, the knave shall misse his purpose,
And you shall live.
Sir Greg. I would, as long as I could, Sir.
Cun. No more replyes, you shall, Ile prevent this,
Pompey shall march without it.
Sir Greg. What, is't he?
My man that was?
Cun. Call him your deadly Enemy;
You give him too faire a name, you deale too nobly,
He beares a bloody minde, a cruell foe, Sir,
I care not if he heard me.
Sir Greg. But do you heare, Sir?
Can't sound with reason she should affect him?
Cun. Do you talk of reason? I never thought to have heard
Such a word come from you; reason in love?
Would you give that, no Doctor could e're give?
Has not a Deputy married his Cooke-maid?
An Aldermans Widow one that was her turne broach?
Nay, has not a great Lady brought her Stable
Into her Chamber: lay with her Horse-keeper?
Sir Greg. Did ever love play such Jades tricks, Sir?
Cun. Oh thousands, thousands: Beware a sturdy Clown ere while you live, Sir;
'Tis like a huswifery in most Shires about us;
You shall ha' Farmers widowes wed thinne Gentlemen,
Much like your selfe, but put 'em to no streste;
What worke can they do, with small trap-stick leggs?
They keep Clownes to stop gaps, and drive in peggs,
A drudgery fit for Hindes, e'ne back agen, Sir,
You'r safest at returning.
Sir Greg. Thinke you so, Sir?
Cun. But how came this Clowne to be cal'd Pompey first?
Sir Greg. Push, one good man Cæsar, a Pump-maker kersen'd him;
Pompey he writes himselfe, but his right name's Pumpey,
And stunke too when I had him, now he's cranke.
Cun. I'me glad I know so much to quell his pride, Sir,
Walke you still that way, Ile make use of this,
To resolve all my doubts, and place this favour
On some new Mistris, only for a try,
And if it meet my thoughts, Ile sweare 'tis I. Exit.
Sir Greg. Is Pompey growne so malepert? so frampell?
The onely cutter about Ladies honours?
Enter Old Knight.
And his blade soonest out?
O. K. Now, what's the newes, Sir?
Sir Gre. I dare not say but good; oh excellent good, Sir.
O. K. I hope how you'r resolv'd she loves you, Knight?
Sir Gr. Cuds me, what else Sir? that's not to do now.
O. K. You would not think how desperately you anger'd
When you belyed her goodnesse; oh you vext me, (me,
Even to a Palsey.
Sir Greg. What a thing was that, Sir?
Enter Neece. (gone;
Nee. 'Tis, that 'tis; as I have hope of sweetnes, the Scarfe's
Worthy wise friend, I doat upon thy cunning,
We two shall be well matcht, our Issue male, sure
Will be borne Counsellors; is't possible?
Thou shalt have another token out of hand for't;
Nay since the way's found, pitty thou shouldst want, y'faith,
O my best joy, and dearest.
O. K. Well said, Neece,
So violent fore your Uncle? what will you do
In secret then?
Sir Greg. Marry call me slave, and rascall.
Neece. Your Scarfe —— the Scarfe I gave you——
O. K. Masse that's true Neece,
I ne're thought upon that; the Scarfe she gave you- Sir?
What dumbe? no answer from you? the Scarfe?
Sir Greg. I was way-laid about it, my life threatned;
Life's life, Scarfe's but a Scarfe, and so I parted from't.
Neece. Unfortunate woman! my first favour too?
O. K. Will you be still an asse? no reconcilement
Twixt you and wit? are you so far fallen out,
You'l never come together? I tell you true,
I'me very lowsily asham'd on you,
That's the worst shame that can be;
Thus baiting on him; now his heart's hook't in,
Ile make him, e're I ha' done, take her with nothing,
I love a man that lives by his wits alife;
Nay leave, sweet Neece, 'tis but a Scarfe, let it go,
Neece. The going of it never grieves me, Sir.
It is the manner, the manner——
Sir Greg. O dissembling Marmaset! if I durst speake,
Or could be believ'd when I speake,
What a tale could I tell, to make haire stand upright now?
Neece. Nay, Sir, at your request you shall perceive, Uncle,
With what renewing love I forgive this?
Here's a faire Diamond, Sir, Ile try how long
You can keep that?
Sir Greg. Not very long, you know't too,
Like a cunning witch as you are.
Neece. Y'are best let him ha' that too.
Sir Greg. So I were, I think, there were no living else, I thank you, as you have handled the matter.
O. K. Why this is musicall now, and Tuesday next Shall tune your Instruments, that's the day set.
Neece, A match, good Uncle.
O. K. Sir, you heare me too?
Sir Greg. Oh very well, I'me for you.
Neece. What e're you heare, you know my minde.
Exeunt Old Knight, and Neece.
Sir Gre. I, a —— on't, too well, if I do not wonder how we two shall come together, I'me a beare whelpe? he talks of Tuesday next, as familiarly as if we lov'd one another, but 'tis as unlikely to me, as 'twas seven yeare before I saw her; I shall try his cunning, it may be he has a way was never yet thought on, and it had need to be such a one, for all that I can thinke on will never do't; I looke to have this Diamond taken from me very speedily, therefore Ile take it off a my finger, for if it be seene, I shall be way-laid for that too.
Exit.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Old Knight and Witty-Pate.

O. K. OH torture! torture! thou carriest a sting i'thy taile,
Thou never brought'st good news i'thy life yet,
And that's an ill quality, leave it when thou wilt.
Witty. Why you receive a blessing the wrong way, Sir,
Call you not this good newes? to save at once Sir

Your credit and your kinſmans life together;
Would it not vexe your peace, and gaule your worth?
T' have one of your name hang'd?
O. K. Peace, no ſuch words, boy.
Wit. Be thankfull for the bleſſing of prevention then.
O. K. Le' me ſee, there was none hang'd out of our houſe ſince Brute,
I ha' ſearch't both Stowe, and Hollinſhead.
Wit. O Sir.
O. K. He ſee what Polychronicon ſales anon too.
Wit. 'Twas a miraculous fortune that I heard on't.
O. K. I would thou'dſt never heard on't,
Wit. That's true too,
So it had ne're been done; to ſee the luck on't,
He was ev'n brought to Juſtice Aurums threſhold,
There had ſtewen forth a Mittimus ſtraight for Newgate;
And note the fortune too, Seſſions a Thurſday,
Jury cul'd out a Friday, Judgement a Saturday,
Dungeon a Sunday, Tyburne a Munday,
Miſeries quotidian ague, when't begins once,
Every day pulls him, till he pull his laſt.
O. K. No more, I ſay, 'tis an ill theame: where left you him?
Wit. He's i'th Conſtables hands below i'th Hall, Sir,
Poore Gentleman, and his accuſer with him.
O. K. What's he?
Wit. A Judges Sonne, 't's thought ſo much the worſe too,
He'l hang his enemy, an't ſhall coſt him nothing,
That's a great priviledge.
O. K. Within there?

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir?
O. K. Call up the folks i'th Hall. I had ſuch hope on him,
For a Scholler too, a thing thou ne're waſt fit for,
Therefore erected all my joyes in him;
Got a Welch Benefice in reverſion for him,
Deane of Cardigan, has his grace already,
He can marry and bury, yet ne're a haire on's face;
Enter Credulous, Sir Ruinous (as a Conſtable,) and Lady Gentry (as a man.)
Like a French Vicar, and doe's he bring ſuch fruits to Town with him?
A thiefe at his firſt lighting? Oh good den to you.
Wit. Nay, ſweet Sir, you'r ſo vext now, you'l grieve him,
And hurt your ſelfe.
O. K. Away, Ile heare no counſell;
Come you but once in ſeven yeare to your Uncle,
And at that time muſt you be brought home too?
And by a Conſtable?
Wit. Oh ſpeake low, Sir,
Remember your owne credit, you profeſſe
You love a man a' wit, begin at home, Sir,
Expreſſe it i' your ſelfe.
Lady. Nay, Maſter Conſtable,
Shew your ſelf a wiſe man, 'gainſt your nature too.
Ruin. Sir, no Diſh-porridgement, we have brought home
As good men as ye.
O. K. Out, a North-Brittaine Conſtable, that tongue
Will publiſh all, it ſpeaks ſo broad already;
Are you the Gentlewoman?
Lady. The unfortunate one, Sir,
That fell into the power of mercileſſe thieves,
Whereof this fellow, whom I'de call your kinſman,
As little as I could, (for the faire reverence
I owe to fame and yeares) was the prime villaine.
O. K. A wicked prime.
Wit. Nay, not ſo loud, ſweet father.
Lad. The reſt are fled, but I ſhall meet with 'em,
Hang one of 'em I will certaine, I ha' ſwore it,
And 'twas my luck to light upon this firſt.
O. K. A Cambridge man for this? theſe your degrees, Sir?
Nine yeares at Univerſity for this fellowſhip?
Wit. Take your voyce lower, deare Sir.
O. K. What's your loſſe, Sir? (whole, Sir,
Lady. That which offends me to repeat, the Money's
'Tis i' the Conſtables hands there, a ſeal'd hundred,
But I will not receive it.
O. K. No? not the money, Sir,
Having confeſt 'tis all?
Lady. 'Tis all the Money, Sir,
But 'tis not all I loſt, for when they bound me,
They tooke a Diamond hung at my ſhirt ſtring,
Which feare of life made me forget to hide;
It being the ſparkling witneſſe of a Contract
'Twixt a great Lawyers daughter and my ſelfe.
Wit. I told you what he was; what does the Diamond
Concerne my Cozen, Sir?
Lady. No more did the Money,
But he ſhall anſwer all now.
Wit. There's your conſcience,
It ſhewes from whence you ſprung.
Lady. Sprung? I had leapt a thiefe,
Had I leapt ſome of your alliance.
Wit. Slave!
Lady. You prevent me ſtill.
O. K. 'Slid, ſonne are you mad?
Lady. Come, come, Ile take a legall courſe.
O. K. Will you undo us all? what's your demand, Sir?
Now we're in's danger too.
Lady. A hundred Marke, Sir,
I will not bate a doit.
Witty. A hundred raſcals.
Lady. Sir, finde 'em out in your own blood, and take 'em.
Wit. Go take your courſe, follow the Law, and ſpare not.
O. K. Does fury make you drunke? know you what you ſay?
Wit. A hundred dogs dungs, do your worſt.
O. K. You do I'me ſure; whoſe loud now?
Wit. What his owne asking?
O. K. Not in ſuch a caſe?
Wit. You ſhall have but three ſcore pound; ſpite a your teeth,
Ile ſee you hangd firſt.
O. K. And whats ſeven pound more man?
That all this coyle's about? ſtay, I ſay, he ſhall ha't.
Wit. It is your owne, you may do what you pleaſe with it;
Pardon my zeale, I would ha ſav'd you money;
Give him all his owne asking?
O. K. What's that to you, Sir?
Be ſparing of your owne, teach me to pinch
In ſuch a caſe as this? go, go, live by your wits, go.
Wit. I practiſe all I can.
O. K. Follow you me, Sir,
And Maſter Conſtable come from the knave,
And be a witneſſe of a full recompence. (Sir
Wit. Pray ſtop the Conſtables mouth, what ere you do.
O. K. Yet agen? as if I meant not to do that my ſelfe,
Without your counſell? As for you, precious kinſman,
Your firſt years fruits in Wakes ſhall go to rack for this,
You lye not in my houſe, Ile pack you out,
And pay for your lodging rather. Exeunt Knight, (Ruin. and Lady.

Wit

Witty. Oh fie Cozen,
Theſe are ill courſes, you a Scholler too,
Cred. I was drawne into't moſt unfortunately,
By filthy deboyſt company.
Wit. I, I, I,
'Tis even the ſpoile of all our youth in England;
What were they Gentlemen?
Cred. Faith ſo like, ſome on 'em,
They were ev'n the worſe agen.
Wit. Hum.
Cred. Great Tobacco ſwivers,
They would go neere to rob with a pipe in their mouths.
Wit. What, no?
Cred. Faith leave it Cozen, becauſe my raſcals uſe it, Wit. So they do meat and drinke, muſt worthy Gentle- (men
Refraine their food for that? an honeſt man
May eat of the ſame pig ſome Parſon dines with,
A Lawyer and a foole feed of one Woodcock,
Yet one ne're the ſimpler, t'other ne're the wiſer;
'Tis not meat, drinke, or ſmoak, diſh, cup, or pipe,
Co-operates to the making of a knave,
'Tis the condition makes a ſlave, a ſlave,
There's London Philoſophy for you; I tell you cozen,
You cannot be too cautelous, nice, or dainty,
In your ſociety here, eſpecially
When you come raw from the Univerſity,
Before the world has hardned you a little,
For as a butter'd loafe is a Schollers breakfaſt there,
So a poacht Scholler is a cheaters dinner here,
Iha' knowne ſeven of 'em ſupt up at a Meale.
Cred. Why a poacht Scholler?
Wit. Cauſe he powres himſelf forth,
And all his ſecrets, at the firſt acquaintance,
Never ſo crafty to be eaten i'th ſhell,
But is ouſtript of all he has at firſt,
And goes downe glibb, he's ſwallowed with ſharp wit,
Stead of Wine Vinegar.
Cred. I ſhall think, Cozen,
A' your poch't Scholler, while I live.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Maſter Credulous,
Your Uncle wills you to forbeare the Houſe,
You muſt with me, I'me charg'd to ſee you plac'd
In ſome new lodging about Theeving Lane,
What the conceit's, I know not, but commands you
To be ſeene here no more, till you heare further.
Cred. Here's a ſtrange welcome, Sir.
Wit. This is the world, Cozen;
When a mans fame's once poyſon'd, fare thee well Lad.

Exit Cred. and Servant.

This is the happieſt cheat I e're claim'd ſhare in,
It has a two fold fortune, gets me coyne,
And puts him out of grace, that ſtood between me,
My fathers Cambridge Jewell, much ſuſpected
To be his Heyre, now there's a barre in's hopes.

Enter Ruinous, and Lady Gentry.

Ruin. It chinks, make haſte.
Lady. The Goat at Smithfield Pens.

Enter Cunningame (with a Letter.)

Wit. Zo, zo, zufficient. Maſter Cunningame?
I never have ill luck when I meet a wit.
Cun. A wit's better to meet, then to follow then,
For I ha' none ſo good I can commend yet,
But commonly men unfortunate to themſelves,
Are luckieſt to their friends, and ſo may I be.
Wit. I run o're ſo much worth, going but in haſte from you,
All my deliberate friendſhip cannot equall.
Cun. 'Tis but to ſhew that you can place ſometimes,

Enter Mirabell.

Your modeſty a' top of all your vertues. Exit Wit.
This Gentleman may pleaſure me yet agen;
I am ſo haunted with this broad brim'd hat,
Of the laſt progreſſe block, with the young hat-band,
Made for a ſucking Devill of two yeare old,
I know not where to turne my ſelfe.
Mir. Sir?
Cun. More torture?
Mir. 'Tis rumor'd that you love me.
Cun. A my troth Gentlewoman,
Rumour's as falſe a knave as ever piſt then,
Pray tell him ſo from me; I cannot faine
With a ſweet Gentlewoman, I muſt deale downe right.
Mir. I heard, though you diſſembled with my Aunt, Sir,
And that makes me more confident.
Cun. There's no falſhood,
But paies us our owne ſome way, I confeſſe
I fain'd with her, 'twas for a weightier purpoſe,
But not with thee, I ſweare.
Mir. Nor I with you then,
Although my Aunt enjoyn'd me to diſſemble,
To right her ſplene, I love you faithfully.
Cun. Light, this is worſe then 'twas.
Mir. I finde ſuch worth in you,
I cannot, nay I dare not dally with you,
For feare the flame conſume me.
Cun. Here's freſh trouble,
This drives me to my conſcience, for 'tis fowle
To injure one that deales directly with me.
Mir. I crave but ſuch a truth from your love, Sir,
As mine brings you, and that's proportionable.
Cun. A good Geometrician, ſhrew my heart;
Why are you out a' your wits, pretty plumpe Gentle- woman,
You talk ſo deſperately? 'tis a great happineſſe,
Love has made one on's wiſer then another,
We ſhould be both caſt away elſe;
Yet I love gratitude, I muſt requite you,
I ſhall be ſick elſe, but to give you me,
A thing you muſt not take, if you meane to live,
For a' my troth I hardly can my ſelfe;
No wiſe Phyſitian will preſcribe me for you.
Alas your ſtate is weake, you had need of Cordials
Some rich Electuary, made of a Sonne an Heire,
An elder brother in a Cullifle, whole,
'Tmuſt be ſome wealthy Gregory, boyl'd to a Jelly,
That muſt reſtore you to the ſtate of new Gownes,
French Ruffs, and mutable head tires,
Mir. But where is he, Sir?
One that's ſo rich will ne're wed me with nothing.
Cun. Then ſee thy conſcience and thy wit together,
Wouldſt thou have me then, that has nothing neither?
What ſay you to Fop Gregory the firſt yonder?
Will you acknowledge your time amply recompenc'd?
Full ſatisfaction upon loves record?
Without any more ſuit, if I combine you?
Mir. Yes, by this honeſt kiſſe.
Cun. You'r a wiſe Clyent,
To pay your fee before hand, but all do ſo,
You know the worſt already, that's thee beſt too,
Mir. I know he's a foole,
Cun. You'r ſhrewdly hurt then;
This is your comfort, your great wiſeſt women
Pick their firſt husband ſtill out of that houſe,
And ſome will have 'em to chuſe, if they bury 20. (band,
Mir. I'me of their mindes, that like him for a firſt huſ-

To run youths race with him, 'tis very pleaſant,
But when I'me old, I'de alwaies wiſh a wiſer.
You may have me by that time; for this firſt buſineſſe,
Reſt upon my performance.
Mir. With all thankfulneſſe.
Cun. I have a project you muſt aid me in too.
Mir. You binde me to all lawfull action, Sir,
Pray weare this ſcarfe about you;
I conjecture now——
Cun. There's a Court principle for't, one office muſt help another;
As for example, for your caſt a Manchits out a'th Pantry,
Ile allow you a Gooſe out a'th Kitchin.
Mir. 'Tis very ſociably done, Sir, farewell performance,
I ſhall be bold to call you ſo.
Cun. Do, ſweet confidence,
Enter Sir Gregory.
If I can match my two broad brim'd hats;
'Tis he, I know the Maggot by his head;
Now ſhall I learne newes of him, my pretious chiefe.
Sir Greg. I have been ſeeking for you i'th bowling Greene,
Enquir'd at Nettletons, and Anthonies Ordinary,
T'ha's vext me to the heart, looke, I've a Diamond here,
And it cannot finde a Maſter.
Cun. No? That's hard y'faith.
Sir Greg. It does belong to ſome body, a —— on him,
I would he had it, do's but trouble me,
And ſhe that ſent it, is ſo waſpiſh too,
There's no returning to her till 't be gone.
Cun. Oh, ho, ah ſirrah, are you come?
Sir Greg. What's that friend?
Cun. Do you note that corner ſparkle?
Sir Greg. Which? which? which Sir?
Cun. At the Weſt end a'the Coller.
Sir Greg. Oh I ſee't now.
Cun. 'Tis an apparent marke; this is the ſtone, Sir,
That ſo much blood is threatned to be ſhed for.
Sir Greg. I pray?
Cun. A tunne at leaſt.
Sir Greg. They muſt not find't I'me then, they muſt Go where 'tis to be had.
Cun. 'Tis well it came to my hands firſt, Sir Gregory,
I know where this muſt go.
Sir Greg. Am I diſcharg'd on't?
Cun. My life for yours now. Draws.
Sir Greg. What now?
Cun. 'Tis diſcretion, Sir,
Ile ſtand upon my Guard all the while I ha't.
Sir Greg. Troth thou tak'ſt too much danger on thee
To preſerve me alive. (ſtill,
Cun. 'Tis a friends duty, Sir,
Nay, by a toy that I have late thought upon,
Ile undertake to get your Miſtris for you.
Sir Greg. Thou wilt not? wilt?
Cun. Contract her by a trick, Sir,
When ſhe leaſt thinks on't.
Sir Greg. There's the right way to't,
For if ſhe thinke on't once, ſhee'l never do't.
Cun. She doe's abuſe you ſtill then?
Sir Greg. A ——damnably,
Every time worſe then other; yet her Uncle
Thinks the day holds a tueſday; ſay it did, Sir,
She's ſo familiarly us'd to call me raſcall,
She'l quite forget to wed me by my owne name,
And then that marriage cannot hold in Law, you know.
Cun. Will you leave all to me?
Sir Greg. Who ſhould I leave it to?
Cun. 'Tis our luck to love Neeces; I love a Neece too.
Sir Greg. I would you did y'faith.
Cun. But mine's a kinde wretch.
Sir Greg. I marry Sir, I would mine were ſo too.
Cun. No raſcall comes in her mouth.
Sir Greg. Troth, and mine has little elſe in hers.
Cun. Mine ſends me tokens,
All the world knows not on.
Sir Greg. Mine gives me tokens too, very fine tokens,
But I dare not weare 'em.
Cun. Mine's kinde in ſecret.
Sir Greg. And there mine's a hell-cat.
Cun. We have a day ſet too.
Sir Greg. 'Slid, ſo have we man,
But there's no ſigne of ever comming together.
Cun. Tell thee who 'tis, the old womans Neece.
Sir Greg. Is't ſhe?
Cun. I would your luck had been no worſe for mildneſſe;
But mum, no more words on't to your Lady.
Sir Greg. Foh!
Cun. No blabbing as you love me.
Sir Greg. None of our blood
Were ever bablers.
Cun. Prethee convey this Letter to her,
But at any hand let not your Miſtris ſee't.
Sir Greg. Yet agen Sir?
Cun. There's a Jewell in't,
The very art would make her doat upon't.
Sir Greg. Say you ſo?
And ſhe ſhall ſee't for that trick onely.
Cun. Remember but your Miſtris, and all's well.
Sir Greg. Nay if I do not hang me. Exit.
Cun. I believe you;
This is the onely way to returne a token,
I know he will do't now, cauſe he's charg'd to'th contrary.
He's the neareſt kin to a woman, of a thing
Made without ſubſtance, that a man can finde agen,
Some petticoat begot him, Ile be whipt elſe,
Engendring with an old paire of pawnde hoſe,
Lying in ſome hot chamber o're the Kitchin,
Very ſteame bred him,
He never came where Rem in Re e're grew;
The generation of a hundred ſuch
Cannot make a man ſtand in a white ſheet,
For 'tis no act in Law, nor can a Conſtable
Pick out a bawdy buſineſſe for Bridewell in't;
Enter Clowne (as a Gallant.)
A lamentable caſe, he's got with a mans Urine, like a Mandrake.
How now? hah? what prodigious bravery's this?
A moſt prepoſterous Gallant, the Doublet ſits
As if it mockt the breeches.
Clow. Save you, Sir,
Cun. Has put his tongue in the fine ſuit of words too.
Clow. How doe's the party?
Cun. Takes me for a Scrivener. Which of the parties?
Clow. Hum, ſimplicity betide thee——
I would faine heare of the party; I would be loath to go Further with her; honour is not a thing to be dallied withall,
No more is reputation, no nor fame, I take it, I muſt not Have her wrong'd when I'me abroad, my party is not To be compell'd with any party in an oblique way;
'Tis very dangerous to deale with women;
May prove a Lady too, but ſhall be nameleſſe,

Ile

Ile bite my tongue out, e're it prove a Traitor.
Cun. Upon my life I know her.
Clow. Not by me,
Know what you can, talke a whole day with me,
Y'are ne're the wiſer, the comes not from theſe lips.
Cun. The old Knights Neece. (him,
Clow. 'Slid he has got her, pox of his heart that told
Can nothing be kept ſecret? let me entreat you
To uſe her name as little as you can, though.
Cun. 'Twill be ſmall pleaſure, Sir, to uſe her name.
Clow. I had intelligence in my ſolemne walks,
'Twixt Paddington and Pancridge, of a Scarfe,
Sent for a token, and a Jewell follow'd,
But I acknowledge not the receipt of any,
How e're 'tis carried, believe me Sir,
Upon my reputation I received none.
Cun. What, neither Scarfe nor Jewell?
Clow. 'Twould be ſeene
Some where about me, you may well think that,
I have an arme for a Scarfe, as others have,
And dare to hang a Jewell too, and that's more
Then ſome men have, my betters a great deale,
I muſt have reſtitution, where e're it lights.
Cun. And reaſon good.
Clow. For all theſe tokens, Sir,
Paſſe i' my name.
Cun. It cannot otherwiſe be.
Clow. Sent to a worthy friend.
Cun. I, that's to thee.
Clow. I'me wrong'd under that title.
Cun. I dare ſweare thou art,
'Tis nothing but Sir Gregories circumvention,
His envious ſpite, when thou'rt at Paddington,
He meets the gifts at Pancridge.
Clow. Ah falſe Knight?
Falſe both to honour, and the Law of Arms?
Cun. What wilt thou ſay if I be reveng'd for thee?
Thou ſit as witneſſe?
Clow. I ſhould laugh in ſtate then.
Cun. Ile fobb him, here's my hand.
Clow. I ſhould be as glad as any man alive, to ſee him well fob'd, Sir; but now you talk of fobbing, I wonder the Lady ſends not for me according to promiſe? I ha' kept out a Towne theſe two daies, a purpoſe to be ſent for; I am almoſt ſtarv'd with walking.
Cun. Walking gets men a ſtomack.
Clow. 'Tis moſt true, Sir, I may ſpeake it by experience, for I ha' got a ſtomack ſix times, and loſt it agen, as often as a traveller from Chelſy ſhall loſe the ſight of Pauls, and get it agen.
Cun. Go to her, man.
Clow. Not for a Million, enfringe my oath? there's a toy call'd a vowe, has paſt betweene us, a poore trifle, Sir; Pray do me the part and office of a Gentleman, if you chance to meet a Footman by the way, in orange tawny ribbands, running before an empty Coach, with a Buzzard i'th Poope on't, direct him and his horſes toward the new River by Iſlington, there they ſhall have me looking upon the Pipes, and whiſtling. Exit Clow.
Cun. A very good note; this love makes us all Monkeyes,
But to my work: Scarfe firſt? and now a Diamond? theſe
Should be ſure ſignes of her affections truth;
Yet Ile go forward with my ſurer proofe. Exit.

Enter Neece, and Sir Gregory.

Sir Greg. Is't poſſible?
Nay here's his Letter too, there's a fine Jewell in't,
Therefore I brought it to you.
Neece. You tedious Mongrill! Is't not enough
To grace thee, to receive this from thy hand,
A thing which makes me almoſt ſick to do,
But you muſt talke too?
Sir Greg. I ha' done.
Neece. Fall back,
Yet backer, backer yet, you unmannerly puppy,
Do you not ſee I'me going about to reade it?
Sir Greg. Nay theſe are golden daies, now I ſtay by't;
She was wont not to endure me in her ſight at all,
The world mends, I ſee that.
Neece. What an ambiguous Superſcription's here?
To the beſt of Neeces. Why that title may be mine,
And more then her's:
Sure I much wrong the neatneſſe of his art;
'Tis certaine ſent to me, and to requite
My cunning in the carriage of my Tokens, Us'd the ſame Fop for his.
Sir Greg. She nodded now to me, 'twill come in time.
Neece. What's here? an entire Rubye, cut into a heart,
And this the word, Iſtud Amoris opus?
Sir Greg. Yes, yes, I have heard him ſay that love is the beſt ſtone-cutter.
Neece. Why thou ſawcy iſſue of ſome travelling Sow-gelder,
What makes love? thy mouth? is it a thing
That ever will concerne thee? I do wonder
How thou dar'ſt think ont? haſt thou ever hope
To come i' the ſame roome where lovers are;
And ſcape unbrain'd with one of their velvet ſlippers?
Sir Greg. Love tricks breake out I ſee, and you talk of ſlippers once,
'Tis not farre off to bed time.
Neece. Is it poſſible thou canſt laugh yet?
I would ha' undertooke to ha' kill'd a ſpider
With leſſe venome far, then I have ſpit at thee.
Sir Greg. You muſt conceive,
A Knight's another manner a peece of fleſh.
Neece. Back, Owles face.
Within O. K. Do, do.
Neece. 'Tis my Uncles voyce, that:
Why keep you ſo farre off, Sir Gregory?
Are you afraid, Sir, to come neare your Miſtris?
Sir Greg. Is the proud heart come downe? I lookt for this ſtill.
Nee. He comes not this way yet: Away, you dog-whelp;
Would you offer to come neare me, though I ſaid ſo?
Ile make you underſtand my minde in time;
Your running greedily like a hound to his breakfaſt,
That chops in head and all to beguile his fellowes;
I'me to be eaten, Sir, with Grace and leiſure,
Behaviour and diſcourſe, things that ne're trouble you;
After I have pelted you ſufficiently,
I tro you will learne more manners. (together?
Sir Greg. I'me wondring ſtill when we two ſhall come Tueſday's at hand, but I'me as farre off, as I was at firſt,
I ſweare.

Enter Gardianeſſe.

Gard. Now Cuningame, Ile be reveng'd at large:
Lady, what was but all this while ſuſpition,
Is truth, full blowne now, my Neece weares your Scarfe.
Neece. Hah?
Gard. Do but follow me, Ile place you inſtantly
Where you ſhall ſee her courted by Cuningame.
Neece. I go with greedineſſe; we long for things
That break our hearts ſometimes, there's pleaſures miſery.
(Exeunt Neece and Gard.
Sir Greg. Where are thoſe gad-flies going? to ſome Junket now;
That ſome old bumble-bee toles the young one forth
To

To ſweet meats after kinde, let 'em looke to't,
The thing you wot on, be not miſt or gone,
I bring a Maiden-head, and I looke for one. Exit.

Enter Cunningame (in diſcourſe with a Maid's Gentlewoman in a broad hat and ſcarf'd,) Neece at another doore.

Cun. Yes, yes.
Neece. Too manifeſt now, the Scarfe and all.
Cun. It cannot be, you're ſuch a fearefull ſoule.
Neece. Ile give her cauſe of feare e're I part from her.
Cun. Will you ſay ſo? Is't not your Aunts deſire too?
Neece. What a diſſembling groane's that? thee'l forſwear't now.
Cun. I ſee my project takes, yonder's the grace on't.
Neece. Who would put confidence in wit againe,
I'me plagu'd for my ambition, to deſire
A wiſe man for a husband, and I ſee
Fate will not have us go beyond our ſtint,
We are allow'd but one diſh, and that's Woodcock,
It keeps up wit to make us friends and ſervants of,
And thinks any thing's good enough to make us husbands
Oh that whores hat a' thine, a' the riding block,
A ſhade for lecherous kiſſes.
Cun. Make you doubt on't?
Is not my love of force?
Neece. Yes, me it forces
To teare that ſorcerous ſtrumpet from th'imbraces.
Cun. Lady?
Neece. Oh thou haſt wrong'd the exquiſit'ſt love——
Cun. What meane you Lady?
Neece. Mine, you'l anſwer for't.
Cun. Alas, what ſeek you?
Neece. Sir, mine owne with loſſe.
Cun. You ſhall.
Neece. I never made ſo hard a bargaine.
Cun. Sweet Lady?
Neece. Unjuſt man, let my wrath reach her,
As you owe vertue duty; your cauſe trips you,
Now Minion, you ſhall feele what loves rage is,
Before you taſte the pleaſure; ſmile you falſe, Sir?
Cun. How can I chuſe? to ſee what paines you take,
Upon a thing will never thank you for't?
Neece. How?
Cun. See what things you women be, Lady,
When cloathes are taken for the beſt part of you?
This was to ſhow you, when you think I love you not,
How y'are deceiv'd ſtill, there the Morall lyes,
'Twas a trap ſet to catch you, and the only bait
To take a Lady nibling, is fine clothes;
Now I dare boldly thank you for your love,
I'me pretty well reſolv'd in't by this fit,
For a jealous ague alwaies uſhers it.
Neece. Now bleſſings ſtill maintaine this wit of thine,
And I'me an excellent fortune comming in thee,
Bring nothing elſe I charge thee.
Cun. Not a groat I warrant ye.
Neece. Thou ſhalt be worthily welcome, take my faith for't,
Next opportunity ſhall make us.
Cun. The old Gentlewoman has fool'd her revenge ſweetly.
Neece. Laſſe 'tis her part, ſhe knowes her place ſo well yonder;
Alwaies when women jumpe upon three ſcore,
Love ſhoves 'em from the chamber to the doore.
Cun. Thou art a precious ſhe-wit. Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Cunningame (at one doore) Witty Pate, Ruinous, L. Ruinous, and Priſcian (at the other.)

Cun. FRiend, met in the harveſt of our deſignes,
Not a thought but's proſperous.
Wit. I knew it man;
And that made me provide theſe needfull Reapers,
Hooks, Rakers, Gleaners; wee'l ſing it home
With a melodious Horne-pipe; this is the Round,
That as we further in your great affaire,
You'l ſuffer us to gleane, pick up for crums,
And if we ſnatch a handfull from the heafe,
You will not looke a dunce on's.
Cun. Friend, wee'l ſhare
The ſheaves of gold, only the Love Acre
Shall be peculiar.
Wit. Much good do you, Sir,
Away, you know your way, and your ſtay; get you
The Muſick ready, while we prepare the dancers.
Ruin. We are a conſort of our ſelves.
Priſ. And can ſtrike up luſtily.
Wit. You muſt bring Sir Fop.
Cun. That's perfect enough,
Ruin. Bring all the Fops you can, the more the better fare,
So the proverbe runs backwards. Exeunt Ruin. & Priſ.
L. Ruin. Ile bring the Ladies. Exit.
Wit. Do ſo firſt, and then the Fops will follow;
I muſt to my father, he muſt make one. Exit.

Enter two Servants with a Banquet.

Cun. While I diſpatch a buſineſſe with the Knight,
And I go with you. Well ſed, I thank you,
This ſmall Banquet will furniſh our few Gueſts
With taſte and ſtare enough; one reach my Gowne,
The action craves it rather then the weather.
1 Serv. There's one ſtales to ſpeake with you Sir.
Cun. What is he?
1 Serv. Faith I know not what, Sir, a foole I think,
That ſome Brokers ſhop has made half a Gentleman;
Has the name of a Worthy too.
Cun. Pompey? is't not?
1 Serv. That's he, Sir.
Cun. Alas poore fellow, prethee enter him, he will need too,

Enter ſecond Servant with a Gowne,

He ſhall ſerve for a Witneſſe. Oh Gramercy:
If my friend Sir Gregory comes, you know him,

Enter Clowne.

Entertaine him kindly. Oh Maſter Pompey, how is't man?
Clow. 'Snailes, I'me almoſt ſtarv'd with love, and cold, and one thing or other;
Has not my Lady ſent for me yet?
Cun. Not that I heare, ſure ſome unfriendly Meſſenger
Is imployed betwixt you,
Clow. I was ne're ſo cold in my life, in my conſcience I have been ſeven mile in length, along the new River; I have ſeene a hundred fickle bags; I do not thinke but there's gudgeons too; 'twill ne're be a true water.

Cun.

Cun. Why thinke you ſo?

Clow. I warrant you, I could a thouſand Millers thumbs in it, Ile make a little bold with your Sweet-meats. And welcome Pompey.

Clow. 'Tis a ſtrange thing, I have no taſte in any thing.

Cun. Oh, that's Love, that diſtaſts any thing but it ſelfe.

Clow. 'Tis worſe then Cheeſe in that point, may not a man breake his word with a Lady? I could finde in my heart and my hoſe too.

Cun. By no meanes Sir, that breakes all the Lawes of Love.

Clow. Well, Ile ne're paſſe my word without my deed to Lady; while I live agen, I would faine recover my taſte.

Cun. Well, I have newes to tell you.

Clow. Good newes, Sir?

Cun. Happy newes, I help you away with a Rivall your Maſter beſtow'd

Clow. Where for this plumbs ſake ——

Cun. Nay liſten me.

Clow. I warrant you, Sir, I have two eares to one mouth, I heare more then I eat, I'de ne're row by Queen Hive While lived elſe.

Cun. I have a wife for him, and that ſhall witneſſe the Contract.

Clow. The old one I hope, 'tis not the Lady?

Cun. Choak him firſt, 'tis one which thou ſhalt ſee, See him, ſee him deceiv'd, ſee the deceit, only The injunction is, you ſhall ſmile with modeſty.

Clow. Ile ſimper ifaith, as cold as I am yet, the old one I hope.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, here's Sir Gregory.

Cun. Ud' ſo, ſhelter, ſhelter, if you be ſeene All's ravell'd out agen; ſtand there private, And you'le finde the very opportunity To call you forth, and place you at the Table.

Enter Sir Gregory.

You are welcome Sir, this Banquet will ſerve, When it is crown'd with ſuch a dainty as you Expect, and muſt have.

Sir Greg. Tuſh, theſe ſweet-meats are but ſauce to that, Well, if there be any honeſty or true word in a dreame, She's mine owne, nay, and chang'd extreamely, Not the ſame woman.

Cun. Who? not the Lady? (off,

Sir Greg. No, not to me, the edge of her tongue is taken Gives me very good words, turn'd upſide downe to me, And we live as quietly as two Tortuſſes, if ſhe hold on As ſhe began in my dreame. Soft Muſick.

Cun. Nay, if Love ſend forth ſuch Predictions, You are bound to beleeve 'em, there's the watch-word Of her coming, to your practis'd part now, If you hit it, Æquus Cupido nobis.

Both go into the Gowne

Sir Greg. I will warrant you Sir, I will give armes to Your Gentry, looke you forward to your buſineſſe, I am an eye behind you, place her in that Chaire, And let me alone to grope her out.

Enter Mirabell.

Cun. Silence, Lady, your ſweet preſence illuſtrates This homely roofe, and as courſe entertainment; But where affections are both Hoſt and Gueſt, They cannot meet unkindly; pleaſe you ſit, Your ſomething long ſtay made me unmannerly, To place before you, you know this friend here, He's my Gueſt, and more eſpecially,

That this our meeting might not be too ſingle, Without a witneſſe to't.

Mirab. I came not unreſolv'd, Sir, And when our hands are claſp'd in that firme faith Which I expect from you, fame ſhall be bold To ſpeake the lowdeſt on't: oh, you graſpe me. Somewhat too hard friend.

Cun. That's Loves eager will, Ile touch it gentler, Kiſſe her hand.

Mirab. That's too low in you, Leſſe it be doubly recompenc'd in me. She kiſſes his hand.

Clow. Puh, I muſt ſtop my mouth, I ſhall be choakt elſe.

Cun. Come, wee'le not play and trifle with delayes, We met to joyne theſe hands, and willingly I cannot leave it till confirmation.

Mirab. One word firſt, how does your friend, kinde Sir Gregory?

Cun. Why do you mention him? you love him not?

Mir. I ſhall love you the leſſe if you ſay ſo, Sir, In troth I love him, but 'tis you deceive him, This flattering hand of yours does rob him now, Now you ſteale his right from him, and I know I ſhall have hate for't, his hate extreamly.

Cun. Why I thought you had not come ſo weakly arm'd, Upon my life the Knight will love you for't, Exceedingly love you, for ever love you.

Mir. I, you'le perſwade me ſo.

Cun. Why he's my friend, And wiſhes me a fortune equall with him, I know, and dare ſpeake it for him.

Mir. Oh this hand betrayes him, you might remember him in ſome courteſie yet at leaſt.

Cun. I thank your help in't, here's to his health Where e're he be.

Mir. Ile pledge it were it againſt my health.

Clow. Oh, oh, my heart hops after twelve mile a day, upon a good returne, now could I walke three hundred mile a foot, and laugh forwards and backwards.

Mir. You'le take the Knights health Sir,

Clow. Yes, yes forſooth, oh my ſides! ſuch a Banquet once a weeke, would make me grow fat in a fortnight.

Cun. Well, now to cloſe our meeting, with the cloſe Of mutuall hands and hearts, thus I begin, Here in Heavens eye, and all loves ſacred powers, (Which in my prayers ſtand propitious) I knit this holy hand faſt, and with this hand The heart that owes this hand, ever binding By force of this initiating Contract Both heart and hand in love, faith, loyalty, Eſtate, or what to them belongs, in all the dues, Rights and honours of a faithfull husband, And this firme vow henceforth till death to ſtand Irrevocable, ſeal'd both with heart and hand.

Mir. Which thus I ſecond, but oh, Sir Gregory.

Cun. Agen? this interpoſition's ill, beleeve me.

Mir. Here in Heavens eye, and all Loves ſacred powers I knit this holy hand faſt, and with this hand The heart that owes this hand, ever binding Both heart and hand in love, honour, loyalty, Eſtate, or what to them belongs in all the dues, Rights, and duties of a true faithfull wife; And this firme Vow henceforth till death to ſtand, Irrevocable ſeal'd both with heart and hand.

Sir Greg. A full agreement on both parts.

Cun. I, here's witneſſe of that.

Sir Greg. Nay, I have over-reacht you Lady, and that's much,

For

For any Knight in England to over-reach a Lady.
Mir. I rejoyce in my deceit, I am a Lady
Now, I thanke you Sir.
Clow. Good morrow Lady Fop.
Sir Greg. 'Snailes, i'me gull'd, made a worshipfull asse, this is not my Lady.
Cun. But it is Sir, and true as your dreame told you,
That your Lady was become another woman.
Sir Greg. Ile have another Lady Sir, if there were no more Ladies in London, blinde-man buffe is an unlawfull Game.
Cun. Come, downe on your knees first, and thanke your stars.
Sir Greg. A fire of my stars, I may thanke you I think.
Cun. So you may pray for me, and honour me,
That have preserv'd you from a lasting torment,
For a perpetuall comfort; did you call me friend?
Sir Greg. I pray pardon me for that, I did miscall you, I confesse.
Cun. And should I receiving such a thankfull name
Abuse it in the act? should I see my friend
Bafful'd, disgrac'd, without any reverence
To your title to be call'd slave, rascall?
Nay curst to your face, fool'd, scorn'd, beaten downe
With a womans peevish hate, yet I should stand
And suffer you to be lost, cast away?
I would have seene you buried quick first,
Your spurrs of Knight-hood to have wanted rowels,
And to be kickt from your heeles; slave, rascall?
Heare this tongue?
Mir. My dearest Love, sweet Knight, my Lord, my Husband.
Cun. So, this is not slave and rascall then.
Mir. What shall your eye command, but shall be done,
In all the duties of a loyall wife?
Cun. Good, good, are not curses fitter for you? wer't not better
Your head were broke with the handle of a fanne,
Or your nose bor'd with a silver bodkin?
Mir. Why, I will be a servant in your Lady.
Cun. Pox, but you shall not, she's too good for you,
This contract shall be a nullity, ile breake't off,
And see you better bestow'd.
Sir Greg. 'Slid, but you shall not Sir, she's mine owne,
And I am hers, and we are one anothers lawfully, and let me see him that will take her away by the Civill Law, if you be my friend keepe you so, if you have done me a good turne, do not hit me ith' teeth with't, that's not the part of a friend.
Cun. If you be content ——
Sir Greg. Content? I was never in better contention in my life,
Ile not change her for both the Exchanges, New or the Old;
Come, kisse me boldly.
Clow. Give you joy, Sir.
Sir Greg. Oh Sir, I thanke you as much as though I did, you are beloved of Ladies, you see we are glad of under women.
Clow. Ladies? let not Ladies be disgrac'd, you are as it were a married man, and have a Family, and for the parties sake that was unnam'd before, being Pese-cod time, I am appeas'd, yet I would wish you make a ruler of your tongue.
Cun. Nay, no dissention here, I must bar that,
And this (friend) I entreat you, and be advis'd,
Let this private contract be yet conceal'd,
And still support a seeming face of love
Unto the Lady; marke how it availes you,
And quits all her scornes, but Uncle is now hot
In pursuit of the match, and will enforce her
Bend her proud stomack; that she shall proffer
Her selfe to you, which when you have flouted,
And laught your fill at, you shall scorne her off
With all your disgraces trebled upon her,
For there the pride of all her heart will bow,
When you shall foot her from you, not she you.
Sir Greg. Good ifaith; ile continue it, i'de faine laugh at the old fellow too, for he has abus'd me as scurvily as his Neece, my Knight-hood's upon the spur, wee'le go to Bed, and then to Church as fast as we can.
Exit Sir Greg. and Mirab.
Clow. I do wonder I do not heare of the Lady yet.
Cun. The good minute may come sooner then you are aware of,
I do not thinke but 'twill e're night yet as neare as 'tis.
Clow. Well, I will go walke by the new River in that meditation, I am o're shooes i'me sure upon the dry bank, this gullery of my Master will keepe me company this two houres too, if love were not an enemy to laughter I should drive away the time well enough; you know my walke Sir, if she sends, I shall be found angling, for I will try what I can catch for luck sake, I will fish faire for't.
Oh Knight that thou should'st be gull'd so; ha, ha, it does me good at heart,
But oh Lady, thou tak'st downe my merry part. Exit
Enter Witty-pate.
Witty. Friend.
Cun. Here friend.
Witty. All's afoot, and will go smooth away,
The woman has conquer'd the women, they are gone,
Which I have already complain'd to my Father,
Suggesting that Sir Gregory is falne off
From his charge, for neglects and ill usage,
And that he is most violently bent
On Gentries wife (whom I have call'd a widow)
And that without most sudden prevention
He will be married to her.
Cun. Foot, all this is wrong,
This wings his pursuit, and will be before me; I am lost for ever.
Witty. No, stay, you shall not go
But with my Father, on my wit let it lye,
You shall appeare a friendly assistant,
To helpe in all affaires, and in execution
Helpe your selfe only.
Cun. Would my beleefe
Were stronge in this assurance.
Witty. You shall credit it,
And my wit shall be your slave if it deceive you.
Enter Old Knight.
My Father ——
O. K. Oh Sir, you are well met, where's the Knight your friend?
Cun. Sir, I thinke your Sonne has told you.
Witty. Shall I stand to tell't agen? I tell you he loves,
But not my Kins-woman, her base usage,
And your slack performance which he accuses most Indeed, has turn'd the Knights heart upside downe.
O. K. Ile curbe her for't, can he be but recover'd,
He shall have her, and she shall be dutifull,
And loue him as a wife too.
Witty. With that condition Sir,
I dare recall him were he enter'd the Church,
So much interest of love I assure in him.
O. K. Sir, it shall be no losse to you if you do.

Witty.

Witty. I, but theſe are words ſtill, will not the deeds
Be wanting at the recovery, if it ſhould be agen?
O. K. Why here foole, I am provided, five hunder'd in earneſt,
Of the thouſands in her Dower, but were they married once,
I'de cut him ſhort enough, that's my agreement.
Witty. I, now I perceive ſome purpoſe in you, Father.
O. K. But wherefore is ſhe then ſtolne out of doores to him?
Witty. To him? oh fye upon your errour, ſhe has another object, beleeve it Sir.
O. K. I never could perceive it.
Witty. I did Sir, and to her ſhame I ſhould ſpeake it,
To my owne ſorrow I ſaw it, dalliance,
Nay dotage with a very Clowne, a Foole.
O. K. Wit and wantons? nothing elſe? nothing elſe?
She love a Foole? ſhe'le ſooner make a foole
Of a wiſe man.
Cun. I, my friend complaines ſo,
Sir Gregory ſayes flatly ſhe makes a foole of him,
And theſe bold circumſtances are approv'd;
Favours have been ſent by him, yet he ignorant
Whither to carry 'em; they have been underſtood,
And taken from him, certaine Sir, there is
An unſuſpected fellow lyes conceal'd,
What, or where e're he is, theſe ſlight neglects
Could not be of a Knight elſe.
O. K. Well Sir, you have promis'd (if we recover him Unmarried) to ſalve all theſe old bruiſes?
Cun. Ile do my beſt Sir.
O. K. I ſhall thanke you, coſtly Sir, and kindly too.
Witty. Will you talke away the time here Sir, and come behinde all your purpoſes?
O. K. Away good Sir.
Witty. Then ſtay a little good Sir, for my adviſe,
Why Father are you broke? your wit begger'd,
Or are you at your wits end? or out of Love with wit? no trick of wit to ſurprize
Thoſe deſignes, but with open Hue and Cry,
For all the world to talke on? this is ſtrange,
You were not wont to ſhubber a project ſo.
O. K. Can you helpe at a pinch now? ſhew your ſelfe
My ſonne; go too, I leave this to your wit,
Becauſe ile make a proofe on't.
Witty. 'Tis thus then,
Ihave had late intelligence, they are now
Buxſome as Bachus Froes, revelling, dancing,
Telling the Muſicks numbers with their feet,
Awaiting the meeting of premoniſht friends,
That's queſtionleſſe, little dreading you,
Now Sir, with a dexterous trick indeed, ſuddaine
And ſufficient were well, to enter on um
As ſomething like the abſtract of a Maſque;
What though few perſons? if beſt for our purpoſe
That commends the project.
O. K. This takes up time.
Witty. Not at all, I can preſently furniſh
With looſe diſguiſes that ſhall fit that Scene.
O. K. Why what wants then?
Witty. Nothing but charge of Muſick,
That muſt be paid you know.
O. K. That ſhall be my charges, ile pay the Muſick,
What e're it coſt.
Witty. And that ſhall be all your charge,
Now on, I like it, there will be wit in't Father.
Exit O. K. and Witty.
Cun. I will neither diſtruſt his wit nor friendſhip,
Yet if his maſter braine ſhould be o're-throwne
My reſolution now ſhall ſeize mine owne. Exit

Enter Neece, Lady Ruinous, Gardianeſſe, Ruinous, Priſcian, (with inſtrumenes maſqu't.

L. Ruin. Nay, let's have Muſick, let that ſweet breath at leaſt
Give us her ayde welcome, 'twill be the beſt
I feare this ruin'd receptacle will yeeld,
But that moſt freely.
Neece. My welcome followes me,
Elſe I am ill come hither, you aſſure me
Still Mr. Cuningame will be here, and that it was His kinde entreaty that wiſht me meet him.
L. Ruin. Elſe let me be that ſhame unto my Sex,
That all beleeſe may fly um.
Neece. Continue ſtill
The Knights name unto my Gardianeſſe,
She expects no other.
L. Ruin. He will, he will aſſure you
Lady, Sir Gregory will be here, and ſuddainely
This Muſick fore-ran him, is't not ſo conſorts?
Ruin. Yes Lady, he ſtaies on ſome device to bring along
Such a labour he was buſie in, ſome witty device.
Nee. 'Twill be long e're he comes then, for wit's a great Labour to him.
Gard. Well, well, you'le agree better one day.
Nee. Scarce two I think.
Gard. Such a mock-begger ſuit of clothes led me
Into the fooles paire of Dice, with dewze ace,
He that would make me Miſtris Cun, Cun, Cunnie,
He's quite out of my minde, but I ſhall ne're
Forget him while I have a hole in my head,
Such a one I think would pleaſe you better,
Though he did not abuſe you.
Ruin. Fye, ſpeake well of him now,
Your Neece has quitted him.
Gard. I hope ſhe has,
Elſe ſhe looſes me for ever; but for Sir Gregory,
Would he were come. I ſhall ill anſwer this Unto your Unckle elſe.
Nei. You know 'tis his pleaſure
I ſhould keepe him company.
Gard. I, and ſhould be your owne
If you did well too, Lord, I do wonder
At the niceneſſe of you Ladies now a dayes,
They muſt have Husbands with ſo much wit forſooth.
Worſhip and wealth were both unont to be
In better requeſt i'me ſure, I cannot tell,
But they get ne're the wiſer children that I ſee.
L. Ruin. La, la, la, la, Sol, this Muſick breathes in vaine,
Me thinks 'tis dull to let it move alone,
Let's have a female motion, 'tis in private,
And wee'le grace't our ſelves how ever it deſerves.
Nee. What ſay you Gardianeſſe?
Gard. 'Laſſe i'me weary with the walke,
My jaunting dayes are done.
L. Ruin. Come, come, we'le fetch her in by courſe, or elſe
She ſhall pay the Muſick.
Gard. Nay, ile have a little for my money then.

The Dance, a Cornet is winded.

L Ruin. Hark? upon my life the Knight; 'tis your friend,
This was the warning-peece of his approach.

Enter Old Knight, Witty-pate, Cuningame, Maſqu'd, and take them to dance.

L. Ruin. Ha? no words but mum? well then,
We ſhall need no counſell-keeping
Nee. Cuningame?

Cun.

Cun. Yes, feare nothing.
Nee. Feare? why do you tell me of it?
Cun. Your Unckles here.
Nee. Aye me.
Cun. Peace.
O. K. We have caught 'em.
Witty. Thanke my wit Father.
Gard. Which is the Knight thinke you?
Nee. I know not, he will be found when he ſpeakes,
No Maske can diſguiſe his tongue.
Witty. Are you charg'd?
O. K. Are you awake?
Witty. I'me anſwer'd in a queſtion.
Cun. Next change we meet, we looſe our hands no more.
Nee. Are you prepar'd to tye 'em?
Cun. Yes,
You muſt go with me.
Gard. Whether Sir? not from my charge beleeve me.
Cun. She goes a long.
Nee. Will you ventur and my Unckle here?
Cun. His ſtay's prepar'd for. Exeunt they two.
Gard. 'Tis the Knight ſure, ile follow.
Exit Cun. Nee. Gardianeſſe.
O. K. How now, the Muſick tyr'd before us?
Ruin. Yes Sir, we muſt be paid now.
Witty. Oh, that's my charge Father.
O. K. But ſtay, where are our wanton Ladies gone?
Sonne, where are they?
Witty. Onely chang'd the roome in a change, that's all ſure.
O. K. Ile make 'em all ſure elſe, and then returne to you.
Ruin. You muſt pay for your Muſick firſt, Sir.
O. K. Muſt? are there muſty Fidlers? are Beggers chooſers now?
Ha? why Witty-pate, Sonne, where am I?
Witty. You were dancing e'ne now, in good meaſure, Sir,
Is your health miſcarried ſince? what ayle you, Sir?
O. K. Death, I may be gull'd to my face, where's my Neece?
What are you?
L. Ruin. None of your Neece, Sir.
O. K. How now? have you loud Inſtruments too? ile heare
No more I thanke you, what have I done tro
To bring theſe feares about me? Sonne, where am I?
VVitty. Not where you ſhould be, Sir, you ſhould be paying
For your Muſick, and you are in a maze.
O. K. Oh, is't ſo, put up, put up, I pray you,
Here's a crowne for you.
L. Ruin. Piſh, a crowne?
Ru. Priſ. Ha, ha, ha, a crowne?
O. K. Which way do you laugh? I have ſeene a crowne
Has made a Conſort laugh heartily.
VVitty. Father,
To tell you truth, theſe are no ordinary
Muſitians, they expect a bounty
Above their punctuall deſert.
O. K. A ---- on your Puncks, and their deſerts too.
Am I not cheated all this while thinke you?
Is not your pate in this?
VVitty. If you be cheated,
You are not to be Indicted for your owne goods,
Here you trifle time to market your bounty
And make it baſe, when it muſt needs be free
For ought I can perceive.
O. K. Will you know the loweſt price, Sir?
VVitty. That I will Sir, with all my heart.
O. K. Unleſſe I was diſcover'd, and they now fled
Home agen for feare, I am abſolutely beguil'd,
That's the beſt can be hop'd for.
Witty. Faith 'tis ſomewhat too deare yet, Gentlemen.
Ruin. There's not a Denier to be bated, Sir.
O. K. Now Sir, how deare is it?
VVitty. Bate but the tother ten pound?
Priſ. Not a Bawbee, Sir.
O. K. How? bate ten pound? what's the whole ſumme then?
Witty. Faith Sir, a hundred pound, with much a doe,
I got fifty bated, and faith Father, to ſay truth,
'Tis reaſonable for men of their faſhion.
O. K. La, la, la, downe, a hunder'd pound? la, la, la,
You are a Conſort of Theeves, are you not?
Witty. No Muſitians Sir, I told you before.
O. K. Fiddle faddle, is it not a robbery? a plaine robbery?
Witty. No, no, no, by no meanes Father, you have receiv'd
For your money, nay, and that you cannot give back,
'Tis ſomewhat deare I confeſſe, but who can helpe it?
If they had been agreed with before hand,
'Twas ill forgotten.
O. K. And how many ſhares have you in this? I ſee my force, Caſe up your Inſtruments, I yield, here, as rob'd and Taken from me, I deliver it.
VVitty. No Sir, you have perform'd your promiſe now, which was, to pay the charge of Muſick, that's all.
O. K. I have heard no Muſick, I have receiv'd none, Sir,
There's none to be found in me, nor about me.
VVitty. Why Sir, here's witneſſe againſt you, you have danc'd,
And he that dances acknowledges a receit
Of Muſick.
O. K. I deny that Sir, looke you, I can dance without Muſick, do you ſee Sir? and I can ſing without it too; you are a conſort of Theeves, do you heare what I do?
Witty. Pray you take heed Sir, if you do move the Muſick agen, it may coſt you as much more.
O. K. Hold, hold, ile depart quietly, I need not bid you farewell, I think now, ſo long as that hundred pound laſts with you.

Enter Gardianeſſe.

Gard. Ha, ha, am I ſnapt ifaith?
Oh, Sir, Perfidious.
O. K. I, I, ſome howling anotherwhile, Muſick's too damnable deare.
Gard. Oh Sir, my heart-ſtrings are broke, if I can but live to tell you the tale I care not, your Neece my charge is ——
O. K. What, is ſhe ſick?
Gard. No, no Sir, ſhe's luſtily well married.
O. K. To whom?
Gard. Oh, to that cunning diſſembler, Cuningame.
O. K. Ile hang the Prieſt, firſt, what was he?
Gard. Your Kinſman Sir, that has the Welch Benefice.
O. K. I ſav'd him from the Gallowes to that end, good, is there any more?
Garde And Sir Gregory is married too. (her.
O. K. To my Neece too, I hope, and then I may hang Gard. No Sir, to my Neece, thank Cupid; and that's all that's likely to recover me, ſhe's Lady Fop now, and I am One of her Aunts I thanke my promotion.

Enter

Enter Credulous, Cuningame, Neece, Sir Gregory, and Mirabell.

Cred. I have perform'd your beheſt Sir.

O. K. What have you perform'd Sir?

Witty. Faith Sir, I muſt excuſe my Couſen in this act,
If you can excuſe your ſelfe for making him
A Prieſt, there's the moſt difficult anſwer
I put this practiſe on him as from your deſire,
A truth, a truth Father.

Cred. I proteſt Sir, he tells you truth, he mov'd me to't in your name.

O. K. I proteſt Sir, he told you a lye in my name, and were you ſo eaſie Mr. Credulous to beleeve him?

Cred. If a man ſhould not beleeve his Couſen Sir, whom ſhould he beleeve?

O. K. Godden to you good Mr. Couſen Cuningame,
And your faire Bride, my Couſen Cuningame too,
And how do you, Sir Gregory, with your faire Lady?

Sir Greg. A little better then you would have had me, I thanke you Sir, the dayes of Puppy, and Slave, and Raſcall are pretty well blowne over now, I know Crabs from Verjuyce, I have tryed both, and thoud'ſt give me thy Neece for nothing i'de not have her.

Cun. I thinke ſo Sir Gregory, for my ſake you would not.

Sir Greg. I wo'd thou had'ſt ſcap'd her too, and then ſhe had dyed of the greene ſickneſſe, know this, that I did marry in ſpight, and I will kiſſe my Lady in ſpight, and love her in ſpight, and beget children of her in ſpight, and when I dye they ſhall have my Lands in ſpight; this was my reſolution, and now 'tis out.

Neece. How ſpightfull are you now, Sir Gregory?
Why looke you, I can love my deareſt Husband,
With all the honours, duties, ſweet embraces,
That can be throwne upon a loving man.

Sir Greg. —— This is afore your Unckles face, but behinde his back in private you'le ſhew him another tale.

Cun. You ſee Sir, now the irrecoverable ſtate of all theſe things before you, come out of your muſe, they have been but wit weapons, they were wont to love the play.

Enter Clowne.

O. K. Let me alone in my muſe a little Sir, I will wake to you anon.

Cun. U'd ſo, your friend Pompey, how will you anſwer him?

Neece. Very well, if you'le but ſecond it, and help me.

Clow. I do heare ſtrange ſtories, are Ladies things obnoxious?

Neece. Oh, the diſſembling falſeſt wretch is come.

Cun. How now Lady?

Neece. Let me come to him, and in ſtead of love
Let me have revenge.

Witty. Pray you now, will you firſt examine, whither he be guilty or no.

Neece. He cannot be excus'd,
How many Meſſengers (thou perjur'd man)
Haſt thou return'd with Vowes and Oathes? that thou
Wouldſt follow, and never till this unhappy houre
Could I ſet eye of thee, ſince thy falſe dye
Drew my heart to it? oh I could teare thee now,
In ſtead of ſoft embraces, pray give me leave ——

Witty. Faith this was ill done of you Sir, if you promiſ'd otherwiſe.

Clow. By this hand, never any Meſſenger came at me ſince the firſt time I came into her company; that a man ſhould be wrong'd thus?

Neece. Did not I ſend thee Scarfes and Diamonds?
And thou returnd'ſt me letters, one with a falſe heart in't.

Witty. Oh fye! to receive favours, returne falſe-hoods, and hold a Lady in hand ——

Clow. Will you believe me Sir? if ever I receiv'd Diamonds, or Scarfe, or ſent any Letter to her, would this Sword might ne're go through me.

Witty. Some bad Meſſengers have gone betweene you then.

Neece. Take him from my ſight, if I ſhall ſee to morrow.

Witty. Pray you forbeare the place, this diſcontent may impaire her health much.

Clow. Foot, if a man had been in any fault 'twould ne're have griev'd him, Sir, if you'le beleeve.

Witty. Nay, nay, proteſt no more, I do believe you,
But you ſee how the Lady is wrong'd by't;
She has caſt away her ſelfe it is to be fear'd,
Againſt her Unckles will, nay, any conſent,
But out of a meere neglect, and ſpight to her ſelfe,
Married ſuddenly without any advice.

Clow. Why who can helpe it? if ſhe be caſt away ſhe may thanke her ſelfe, ſhe might have gone further and far'd worſe; I could do no more then I could do, 'twas her owne pleaſure to command me that I ſhould not come till I was ſent for, I had been with her every minute of an houre elſe.

Witty. Truly I believe you.

Clow. Night and day ſhe might have commanded me, and that ſhe knew well enough; I ſaid as much to her between her and I, yet I proteſt ſhe's as honeſt a Lady for my part, that i'de ſay if ſhe would ſee me hang'd, if ſhe be caſt away I cannot helpe it, ſhe might have ſtay'd to have ſpoke with a man.

Witty. Well, 'twas a hard miſſe on both parts.

Clow. So 'twas, I was within one of her, for all this croſſe luck, I was ſure I was between the Knight and home.

Neece. Not gone yet? oh my heart! none regard my health?

Witty. Good Sir, forbeare her ſight a while, you heare how ill ſhe brookes it.

Clow. Fooliſh woman, to over-throw her fortunes ſo; I ſhall thinke the worſe of a Ladies wit while I live for't —— I could almoſt cry for anger, if ſhe ſhould miſcarry now, 'twould touch my conſcience a little, and who knowes what love and conceit may do? what would people ſay as I go along? there goes he that the Lady dyed for love on, I am ſure to heare on't ith' ſtreets, I ſhall weepe before hand; fooliſh woman, I do grieve more for thee now then I did love thee before; well, go thy waies, would'ſt thou ſpare thy Husbands head and breake thine owne heart? if thou hadſt any wit, I would ſome other had been the cauſe of thy undoing, I ſhall be twitted i'th teeth with't, i'me ſure of that, fooliſh Lady. Exit.

Neece. So, ſo, this trouble's well ſhooke off, Unckle, how dee? there's a Dowrie due, ſir.

Cun. We have agreed it, ſweeteſt,
And finde your Unckle fully recover'd, kinde to both of us.

Witty. To all the reſt I hope;

O. K. Never to thee, nor thee, eaſie couſen Credulous,
Was your wit ſo raw?

Cred. Faith yours Sir, ſo long ſeaſon'd
Has been faulty too, and very much to blame,
Speaking it with reverence, Unckle.

Sir Greg. Yes faith, Sir, you have paid as deare for your time as any man here.

Witty. I Sir, and ile reckon it to him. Imprimis, The firſt preface cheat of a paire of peeces to the Beggers, you remember remember that I was the example to your bounty there, I ſpake Greeke, and Syriacke, Sir, you underſtand me now. Next, the Robbery put upon your indulgent Couſen, which indeed was no Robbery, no Conſtable, no Juſtice, no Thiefe, but all Cheaters; there was a hunder'd Mark, mark you that. Laſtly, this memorable 100. pounds worth of Muſick, this was but cheats and wit too, and for the aſſiſtance, this Gentleman to my Couſen (for which I am to have a Fee) that was a little practice of my wit too, Father; will you come to compoſition yet, Father?

Cun. Yes faith Sir, do, two hunder'd a yeare will be eaſier then ſo much weekly, I do not think he's barren if he ſhould be put to't agen.

O. K. Why this was the day I look'd for, thou ſhalt have't,
And the next cheat makes it up three hunder'd;
Live thou upon thy ten pound Vicarage,
Thou get'ſt not a penny more, here's thy full Hire now.

Cred. I thanke you Sir.

Witty. Why there was the ſumme of all my wit Father,
To ſhove him out of your favour, which I fear'd
Would have diſ-inherited me.

O. K. Moſt certaine it had,
Had not thy wit recover'd it; is there any here
That had a hand with thee?

Witty. Yes, all theſe Sir.

O. K. Nephew, part a hunder'd pound amongſt 'em,
Ile repay it; wealth love me as I love wit,
When I dye,
Ile build an Almeſ-houſe for decay'd wits.

Sir Greg. Ile entertaine one in my life time; Schollar, you ſhall be my Chaplaine, I have the gift of twenty Benefices, ſimple as I am here.

Priſ. Thankes my great Patron.

Cun. Sir, your Gentry and your name ſhall both be rais'd as high as my fortunes can reach 'em, for your friends ſake.

Witty. Something will be in my preſent power, the future more,
You ſhall ſhare with me.

Ruin. and Wife. Thankes worthy Gentlemen.

Neece. Sir, I would beg one thing of you?

Sir Greg. You can beg nothing of me.

Witty. Oh Sir, if ſhe begs, there's your power over her.

Sir Greg. She has begg'd me for a foole already, but 'tis no matter,
I have begg'd her for a Lady that ſhe might have been,
That's one for another.

Witty. Nay, but if ſhe beg———

Sir Greg. Let her beg agen then.

Nee. That your man Pompeyes Coat may come over his eares backe agen, I would not he ſhould be loſt for my ſake.

Sir Greg. Well, 'tis granted, for mine owne ſake.

Mirab. Ile entreat it Sir.

Sir Greg. Why then 'tis granted for your ſake.

O. K. Come, come, downe with all weapons now, 'tis Muſicke time,
So it be purchas'd at an eaſie rate;
Some have receiv'd the knocks, ſome given the hits,
And all concludes in love, there's happy wits. Exeunt

The Epilogue at the reviving of this Play.

WE need not tell you Gallants, that this night
The VVits have jumpt, or that the Scenes hit right,
'Twould be but labour loſt for to excuſe
VVhat Fletcher had to do in; his brisk Muſe
VVas ſo Mercuriall, that if he but writ
An Act, or two, the whole Play riſe up wit,

Wee'le not appeale unto thoſe Gentlemen
Judge by their Clothes, if they ſit right, nor when
The Ladies ſmile, and with their Fannes delight
To whiſke a clinch aſide, then all goes right;
'Twas well receiv'd before, and we dare ſay,
You now are welcome to no vulgar Play.

Here endeth Wit at ſeverall Weapons.

Valentinean

THE TRAGEDIE OF VALENTINIAN.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Enter Balbus, Proculus, Chilax, Licinius.

Bal. I Never saw the like, shee's no more stirr'd,
No more another woman, no more alter'd,
With any hopes or promises layd to her (Let 'em be nev'r so waighty, nev'r so winning.
Then I am with the motion of my owne legs.
Pro. Chilax.
You are a stranger yet in these designes,
At least in Rome; tell me, and tell me truth,
Did you ere know in all your course of practise,
In all the wayes of woman you have runne through (For I presume you have been brought up Chilax,
As we to fetch and carry.)
Chi. True I have so:
Pro. Did you I say againe in all this progresse,
Ever discover such a peece of beauty,
Ever so rare a Creature, and no doubt
One that must know her worth too, and affect it,
And be flatter'd, else tis none: and honest?
Honest against the tide of all temptations,
Honest to one man, to her husband only,
And yet not eighteene, not of age to know
Why she is honest?
Chi. I confesse it freely,
I never saw her fellow, nor ere shall,
For all our Grecian Dames, all I have tri'd,
(And sure I have tri'd a hunderd, if I say two
I speake within my compasse) all these beauties,
And all the constancy of all these faces,
Mayds, Widdows, Wives, of what degree or calling,
So they be Greekes, and fat, for there's my cunning,
I would undertake and not sweat for't, Proculus,
Were they to try againe, say twice as many,
Under a thousand pound, to lay 'em bedrid;
But this Wench staggers me.
Lyc. Doe you see these Iewells?
You would thinke these pretty baytes; now Ile assure ye
Here's halfe the wealth of Asia,
Bal. These are nothing
To the full honours I propounded to her;
I bid her think, and be, and presently
What ever her ambition, what the Councell
Of others would aside to her, what her dreames
Could more enlarge, what any President
Of any woman rising up to glory,
And standing certaine there, and in the highest,
Could give her more, nay to be Empresse.
Pro. And cold at all these offers?
Bal. Cold as Christall,
Never to be thaw'd again,
Chi. I trid her further,
And so farre, that I think she is no woman,
At least as women goe now,
Lyc. Why what did you?
Chi. I offerd that, that had she been but Mistris
Of as much spleene as Doves have, I had reach'd her,
A safe revenge of all that ever hates her,
The crying down for ever all beauties
That may be thought come neare her.
Pro. That was pretty.
Chi. I never knew that way faile, yet Ile tell ye
I offerd her a gift beyond all yours,
That, that had made a Saiuct start, well considerd,
The Law to be her creature, she to make it,
Her mouth to give it, every creature living
From her aspect, to draw their good or evill
Fixd in'em spight of Fortune; a new Nature
She should be called, and mother of all ages,
Time should be hers, and what she did lame vertue
Should blesse to all posterities: her aire
Should give us life, her earth and water feed us,
And last, to none but to the Emperour,
(And then but when she pleas'd to have it so,)
She should be held for mortall.
Lyc. And she heard you?
Chi. Yes, as a Sick man heares a noise, or he
That stands condemn'd his Iudgment, let me perish,
But if there can be vertue, if that name
Be any thing but name and emptie title,
If it be so as fooles have been pleas'd to faigne it,
A power that can preserve us after ashes,
And make the names of men out-reckon ages,
This Woman has a God of vertue in her.
Bal. I would the Emperor were that God.
Chi. She has in her
All the contempt of glory and vaine seeming
Of all the Stoicks, all the truth of Christians,
And all their Constancy: Modesty was made
When she was first intended: When she blushes
It is the holyest thing to looke upon;
The purest temple of her sect, that ever
Made nature a blest Founder.
Pro. Is there no way
To take this Phenix?
Lyc. None but in her ashes.
Chi. If she were fat, or any way inclining
To ease or pleasure, or affected glory,
Proud to be seene and worship'd, 'were a venture;
But on my soule she is chaster then cold Camphire.
Bal. I thinke so too; for all the wayes of woman,
Like a full saile she bears against: I aske her
After my many offers, walking with her,
And her as many down-denyals, how
If the Emperor grown mad with love should force her;
She pointed to a Lucrece, that hung by,

And with an angry looke, that from her eyes
Shot Veſtall fire againſt me, ſhe departed.
Pro. This is the firſt wench I was ever poſ'd in,
Yet I have brought young loving things together
This two and thirty yeare.
Chi. I find by this wench
The calling of a Bawd to be a ſtrange,
A wiſe, and ſubtile calling; and for none
But ſtaid, diſcreet, and underſtanding people:
And as the Tutor to great Alexander,
Would ſay a young man ſhould not dare to read
His morall books, till after five and twenty;
So muſt that he or ſhe, that will be bawdy,
(I meane diſcreetly bawdy, and be truſted)
If they will riſe, and gaine experience,
Wel ſteept in yeares, and diſcipline, begin it,
I take it tis no boys play.
Bal. Well, what's thought off?
Pro. The Emperour muſt know it.
Lyc. If the women ſhould chance to faile too,
Chi. As tis ten to one, (purchaſe?
Pro. Why what remaines, but new nets for the
Chi. Let's goe conſider then: and if all faile,
This is the firſt quick Eele, that ſav'd her taile. Exeunt.

Scæne 2. Enter Lucina, Ardelia, and Phorba.

Ardelia. You ſtill inſiſt upon that Idoll, Honour,
Can it renue your youth, can it adde wealth,
That takes off wrinkles: can it draw mens eyes,
To gaze upon you in your age? can honour,
That truly is a Saint to none but Souldiers,
And lookd into, beare no reward but danger,
Leave you the moſt reſpected perſon living?
Or can the common kiſſes of a husband,
(Which to a ſprightly Lady is a labour)
Make ye almoſt Immortall? ye are cozend,
The honour of a woman is her praiſes;
The way to get theſe, to be ſeene, and ſought too,
And not to bury ſuch a happy ſweetneſſe
Vnder a ſmoaky roofe.
Luci. Ile heare no more:
Phor. That white, and red, and all that bleſſed beauty,
Kept from the eyes, that make it ſo, is nothing;
Then you are rarely faire, when men proclaime it;
The Phenix, were ſhe never ſeene, were doubted,
That moſt unvalued Horne the Vnicorne
Beares to oppoſe the Huntſman, were it nothing
But tale, and meere tradition, would help no man,
But when the vertue's knowne, the honor's dobled:
Vertue, is either lame, or not at all,
And Love a ſacriledge, and not a Saint,
When it bars up the way to mens Petitions.
Ard. Nay ye ſhal love your husband too; we come not
To make a Monſter of yee;
Luc. Are ye women?
Ard. You'l find us ſo, and women you ſhall think too,
If you have grace to make your uſe.
Luc. Fye on yee,
Phor. Alas poore baſhfull Lady, by my ſoule,
Had ye no other vertue, but your bluſhes,
And I a man, I ſhould run mad for thoſe:
How daintlily they ſet her off, how ſweetly? (earth,
Ard. Come Goddeſſe, come, you move too neer the
It muſt not be, a better orbe ſtaies for you:
Here: be a mayd, and take'en,
Luc. Pray leave me.
Phor. That were a ſin ſweet Lady, and a way
To make us guilty of your melancholly;
You muſt not be alone; In converſation
Doubts are reſolvd, and what ſticks neer the conſcience
Made eaſie, and allowable.
Luc. Ye are Devills,
Ard. That you may one day bleſſe for your damnation.
Luc. I charge ye in the name of Chaſtity,
Tempt me no more; how ugly ye ſeem to me?
There is no wonder men defame our Sex,
And lay the vices of all ages on us,
When ſuch as you ſhall beare the names of women;
If ye had eyes to ſee your ſelves, or ſence
Above the baſe rewards ye play the bawds for:
If ever in your lives ye heard of goodneſſe,
(Though many Regions off, as men heare thunder)
If ever ye had Mothers, and they ſoules:
If ever Fathers, and not ſuch as you are;
If ever any thing were conſtant in you,
Beſide your ſins, or comming but your curſes,
If ever any of your Anceſtors
Dyde worth a noble deed, that would be cheriſhd, Soule-frighted with this black infection,
You would run from one another, to repentance,
And from your guilty eyes drop out thoſe ſins,
That made ye blind, and beaſts.
Phor. Ye ſpeak well Lady;
A ſigne of fruitfull education,
If your religious Zeale had wiſdome with it.
Ard. This Lady was ordain'd to bleſſe the Empire,
And we may all give thanks for't.
Phor. I beleive ye,
Ard. If any thing redeem the Emperour,
From his wild flying courſes, this is ſhe;
She can inſtruct him if ye mark; ſhe is wiſe too.
Phor. Exceeding wiſe, which is a wonder in her,
And ſo religious, that I well believe,
Though ſhe would ſinne ſhe cannot.
Ard. And, beſides
She has the Empires cauſe in hand, not loves;
There lies the maine conſideration,
For which ſhe is chiefly borne.
Phor. She finds that point
Stronger then we can tell her, and believe it
I look by her meanes for a reformation,
And ſuch a one, and ſuch a rare way carried
That all the world ſhall wonder at.
Ard. Tis true;
I never thought the Emperor had wiſdom,
Pittie, or faire affection to his Country,
Till he profeſt this love: gods give'em Children,
Such as her vertues merit, and his zeale.
I looke to ſee a Numa from this Lady,
Or greater then Octavius.
Phor. Do you mark too,
Which is a Noble vertue, how ſhe bluſhes,
And what a flowing modeſty runs through her,
When we but name the Emperour?
Ard. But mark it,
Yes, and admire it too, for ſhe conſiders,
Though ſhe be faire as heaven, and vertuous
As holy truth, yet to the Emperour
She is a kind of nothing but her ſervice,
Which ſhe is bound to offer, and ſhee'l do it,
And when her Countries cauſe commands affection;
She knows obedience is the key of vertues,
Then flye the bluſhes out like Cupids arrowes,
And though the tye of marriage to her Lord,
Would faine cry ſtay Lucina, yet the cauſe

And generall wiſdom of the Princes love,
Makes her find ſurer ends and happier,
And if the firſt were chaſte, this is twice dobled.
Phor. Her tartnes unto us too.
Ard. That's a wiſe one.
Phor. I rarely like, it ſhewes a riſing wiſdom,
That chides all common fooles as dare enquire
What Princes would have private.
Ard. What a Lady
Shall we be bleſt to ſerve?
Luc. Goe get ye from me.
Ye are your purſes Agents, not the Princes:
Is this the vertuous Lore yee traind me out too?
Am I a woman fit to imp your vices?
But that I had a Mother, and a woman
Whoſe ever living fame turnes all it touches,
Into the good it ſelfe is, I ſhould now
Even doubt my ſelfe, I have been ſearch't ſo neere
The very ſoule of honour: why ſhould you two,
That happily have been as chaſt as I am,
Fairer, I think, by much, for yet your faces,
Like ancient well built piles, ſhew worthy ruines,
After that Angell age, turne mortall Devills?
For ſhame, for woman-hood, for what ye have been,
For rotten Cedars have borne goodly branches,
If ye have hope of any Heaven, but Court,
Which like a Dreame, you'l find hereafter vaniſh,
Or at the beſt but ſubject to repentance,
Study no more to be ill ſpoken of;
Let women live themſelves, if they muſt fall,
Their owne deſtruction find 'em, not your ſevours.
Ard. Madam, yee are ſo excellent in all,
And I muſt tell it you with admiration,
So true a joy ye have, ſo ſweet a feare,
And when ye come to anger, tis ſo noble,
That for mine own part, I could ſtill offend,
To heare you angry; women that want that,
And your way guided (elſe I count it nothing)
Are either Fooles, or Cowards.
Phor. She were a Miſtris for no private greatneſſe,
Could ſhe not frowne a raviſhd kiſſe from anger,
And ſuch an anger as this Lady learnes us,
Stuck with ſuch pleaſing dangers. Gods (I aske ye)
Which of ye all could hold from?
Luc. I perceive ye,
Your owne dark ſins dwell with yee, and that price
You ſell the chaſtitie of modeſt wives at Runs to diſeaſes with your bones: I ſcorne ye,
And all the nets ye have pitcht to catch my vertues
Like Spiders Webs, I ſweep away before me.
Goe tell the Emperour, yee have met a woman,
That neither his owne perſon, which is God-like,
The world he rules, nor what that world can purchaſe,
Nor all the glories ſubject to a Ceſar,
The honours that he offers for my body,
The hopes, gifts, everlaſting flatteries,
Nor any thing that's his, and apt to tempt me,
No not to be the Mother of the Empire,
And Queene of all the holy fires he worſhips,
Can make a Whore of.
Ard. You miſtake us Lady.
Luc. Yet tell him this ha's thus much weakend me,
That I have here his knaves, and you his Matrons,
Fit Nurſes for his ſins, which gods forgive me,
But ever to be leaning to his folly,
Or to be brought to love his luſt, aſſure him,
And from her mouth, whoſe life ſhal make it certain
I never can: I have a Noble husband,
Pray tell him that too, yet a noble name,
A Noble Family, and laſt a Conſcience:
Thus much for your anſwer: For your ſelves,
Ye have liv'd the ſhame of women, dye the better, Exit
Phor. What's now to doe? Lucina.
Ard. Ev'n as ſhe ſaid, to dye,
For ther's no living here, and women thus,
I am ſure for us two.
Phor. Nothing ſtick upon her?
Ard. We have loſt a maſſe of mony; wel Dame vertue,
Yet ye may halt if good luck ſerve.
Phor. Wormes take her,
She has almoſt ſpoil'd our trade.
Ard. So godly;
This is ill breeding Phorba.
Phor. If the women
Should have a longing now to ſee this Monſter,
And ſhe convert 'em all,
Ard. That may be Phorba,
But if it be, Ile have the young men gelded:
Come, let's goe think, ſhe muſt not ſcape us thus;
There is a certain ſeaſon, if we hit,
That women may be rid without a bit. Exeunt.

Scæn. 3. Enter Maximus and Ætius.

Max. I cannot blame the Nations noble friend,
That they fall off ſo faſt from this wild man,
When (under our Alle geance be it ſpoken,
And the moſt happy tye of our affections) (vertue,
The worlds weight groanes beneath him; where lives
Honour, diſcrétion, wiſdom? who are cald
And choſen to the ſteering of the Empire
But Baudes, and ſinging Girles? ô my Aetius,
The glory of a Souldier, and the truth
Of men made up for goodneſſe ſake, like ſhells
Grow to the ragged walls for want of action:
Only your happy ſelfe, and I that love ye,
Which is a larger meanes to me then favour. (truths,
Ætius No more my worthy friend, though theſe be
And though theſe truthes would aske a Reformation,
At leaſt a little ſquaring; yet remember,
We are but ſubjects Maximus; obedience
To what is done, and griefe for what is ill done,
Is all we can call ours: the hearts of Princes
Are like the Temples of the gods; pure incenſe, Vntill unhallowed hands defile thoſe offerings,
Burnes ever there; we muſt not put 'em out,
Becauſe the Prieſts that touch thoſe ſweetes are wicked;
We dare not deereſt friend, nay more we cannot,
While we conſider why we are, and how,
To what lawes bound, much more to what Law-giver;
Whileſt majeſtie is made to be obeyed,
And not inquired into, whileſt Gods and Angels
Make but a rule as we do, though a ſtricter;
Like deſperate and unſeaſon'd fooles let fly
Our killing angers, and forſake our honors,
Max. My noble Freind, from whoſe Inſtructions
I never yet tooke furfet, weigh but thus much,
Nor thinke I ſpeake it with ambition,
For by the Gods I do not, why Ætius,
Why are we thus, or how become thus wretched?
Ætius. You'l fall againe into your fit.
Max. I will not.
Or are we now no more the ſons of Romanes,
No more the followers of their happy fortunes,
But conquer'd Gaules, or Quivers for the Parthians?

Why is this Emperor, this man we honor,
This God that ought to be?
Æcius. You are too curious.
Max. Good, give me leave, why is this Author of us?
Æci. I dare not heare ye speake thus.
Max. Ile be modest,
Thus led away, thus vainly led away,
And we beholders, misconceive me not,
I sow no danger in my words; but wherefore
And to what end, are we the sonnes of Fathers
Famous, and fast to Rome? Why are their vertues Stampt in the dangers of a thousand Battailes,
For goodnesse sake, their honors, time out daring,
I thinke for our example.
Æci. Ye speake nobly.
Mac. Why are we seeds of these then, to shake hands
With Bawdes and base Informers, kisse discredit,
And court her like a Mistris? pray, your leave yet;
You'l say the Emperor is young, and apt
To take impression rather from his pleasures
Then any constant worthynesse, it may be.
But why do these, the people call his pleasures,
Exceed the moderation of a man?
Nay to say justly freind, why are they vices
And such as shake our worthes with forraigne Nations?
Æc. You search the soare too deep, and I must tel ye,
In any other man this had been boldnesse,
And so rewarded; pray depresse you spirit,
For though I constantly beleeve ye honest,
Ye were no freind for me else, and what now
Ye freely spake, but good ye owe toth Empire,
Yet take heed worthy Maximus, all eares
Heare not with that distinction mine doe, few You'l find admonishers, but urgers of your actions,
And to the heavi'est (freind;) and pray consider
We are but shadowes, motions others give us,
And though our pitties may become the times,
Iustly our powers cannot; make me worthy
To be your ever freind in faire allegiance,
But not in force: For durst mine own soule urge me
(And by that soule, I speake my just affections)
To turn my hand from truth, which is obedience,
And give the helme my vertue holds, to Anger,
Though I had both the blessings of the Brutij,
And both their Instigations, though my cause
Carried a face of Iustice beyond theirs,
And as I am a servant to my fortunes,
That daring soule, that first taught disobedience,
Should feele the first example: Say the Prince,
As I may well beleeve, seemes vitious,
Who justly knowes tis not to try our honors?
Or say he be an ill Prince, are we therefore Fit fires to purge him? No, my dearest freind
The Elephant is never won with anger,
Nor must that man that would reclaime a Lyon,
Take him by'th teeth.
Max. I pray mistake me not.
Æci. Our honest actions, and the light that breakes
Like morning from our service, chaste and blushing
Is that, that pulls a Prince backe; then he sees,
And not till then truly repents his errors,
When subjects Chrystall soules are glasses to him.
Max. My ever honored freind, Ile take your councel:
The Emperor appeares, Ile leave ye to him,
And as we both affect him, may he flourish. Exit Max.
Empe. Is that the best newes? Enter the Emperor
Chil. Yet the best we know Sir. and Chilax.

Empe. Bid Maximus come to me, and be gone thou:
Mine own head be my helper, these are fooles;
How now Æcius, are the Souldiers quiet?
Æci. Better I hope Sir, then they were.
Empe. They are pleas'd I heare,
To censure me extremely for my pleasures,
Shortly they'l fight against me.
Æci. Gods defend Sir.
And for their censures they are such shrew'd Iudgers;
A donative of ten Sesterties
Ile undertake shall make 'em ring your praises,
More then they sing your pleasures.
Empe. I beleeve thee.
Art thou in love Æcius yet?
Æci. O no Sir.
I am too course for Ladies; my embraces
That only am acquainted with Alarums,
Would break their tender bodies.
Empe. Never feare it,
They are stronger then ye think, they'le hold the hammer
My Empresse sweares thou art a lusty Souldier,
A good one I beleeve thee.
Æci. All that goodnesse
Is but your Graces creature.
Empe. Tell me truly,
For thou darst tell me.
Æci. Any thing concernes ye,
That's fit for me to speake and you to pardon.
Emp. What say the soldiers of me, and the same words,
Mince 'em not good Æcius, but deliver
The very forms and tongues they talke withall,
Æci. Ile tell your Grace, but with this caution
You be not stirr'd, for should the Gods live with us,
Even those we certainly beleeve are righteous,
Give 'em but drinke, they would censure them too.
Empe. Forward,
Æci. Then to begin, they say you sleep too much
By which they judge your Majesty too sensuall,
Apt to decline your strength to ease and pleasures,
And when you do not sleepe, you drink too much,
From which they feare suspitions first, then ruines;
And when ye neither drinke nor sleepe, ye wench much,
Which they affirm first breakes your understanding,
Then takes the edge of honor, makes us seeme,
That are the ribbes, and rampires of the Empire,
Fencers, and beaten Fooles, and so regarded;
But I beleive 'em not; for were these truths,
Your vertue can correct them.
Empe. They speake plainly.
Æc. They say moreover (since your grace will have it,
For they will talke their freedoms, though the sword
Were in their throat) that of late time, like Nero,
And with the same forgetfullnes of glory,
You have got a vaine of filing, so they terme it.
Empe. Some drunken dreames Æcius.
Æci. So I hope Sir.
And that you rather study cruelty,
And to be feared for blood, then lov'd for bounty,
Which makes the Nations, as they say, despite ye,
Telling your yeares and actions by their deathes,
Whose truth, and strength of duty made you Cæsar.
They say besides you nourish strange devourers,
Fed with the fat o'th Empire, they call Bawdes,
Lazie and lustfull creatures that abuse ye,
A people as they terme 'em, made of paper,
In which the secret sins of each mans money
Are sealed and sent a working.

Empe.

Empe. What sin's next?
For I perceive they have no mind to spare me.
Æci. Nor hurt ye ô my soule Sir, but such people
(Nor can the power of man restraine it)
When they are full of meat and ease, must prattle.
Empe. Forward.
Æci. I have spoken too much Sir.
Empe. Ile have all.
Æci. It fits not
Your eares should heare their vanities; no profit
Can justly rise to you from their behaviour,
Vnlesse ye were guilty of those crimes.
Empe. It may be
I am so, therefore forward.
Æci. I have ever
Learn'd to obey, nor shall my life resist it.
Empe. No more Apologies.
Æci. They greive besides Sir,
To see the nations, whom our ancient vertue
With many a weary march and hunger conquer'd;
With losse of many a daring life subdude,
Fall from their faire obedience, and even murmure
To see the warlike Eagles mew their honors
In obscure Townes, that wont to prey on Princes,
They cry for enemies, and tel the Captaines
The fruits of Italy are luscious, give us Ægypt,
Or sandy Affrick to display our valours,
There where our Swords may make us meat, and danger
Digest our well got Vyands: here our weapons
And bodyes that were made for shining brasse,
Are both unedg'd and old with ease, and women;
And then they cry agen, where are the Germaines, Linde with hot Spaine, or Gallia, bring 'em on,
And let the son of war, steel'd Mithridates,
Lead up his winged Parthians like a storme,
Hiding the face of Heaven with showres of arrowes;
Yet we dare fight like Romanes; then as Souldiers
Tyr'd with a weary march, they tell their wounds
Even weeping ripe they were no more nor deeper,
And glory in those scarrs that make 'em lovely,
And sitting where a Campe was, like sad Pilgrims
They reckon up the cities, and living labours
Of Iulius or Germanicus, and wonder
That Rome, whose turrets once were tapt with honours,
Can now forget the Customs of her conquests:
And then they blame your Grace, and say who leads us,
Shall we stand here like Statues? were our Fathers
The Sonnes of lazie Moores, our Princes Persians,
Nothing but silkes, and softnesse? curses on 'em
That first taught Nero wantonnesse, and bloud,
Tiberius doubts, Caligula all vices;
For from the spring of these succeeding Princes
Thus they talke Sir;
Emp. Well,
Why doe you heare these things?
Aet. Why do you do 'em?
I take the gods to witnesse, with more sorrow,
And more vexation, doe I heare these natures,
Then were my life drope from me brough an hour-glasse
Emp. Belike then you could serve 'em, or at least
Are glad they should be so; take heed, you were best
Build your own Tomb, and runne into it living,
Then dare a Princes anger.
Aet. I am old Sir,
And ten yeares more addition, is but nothing:
Now if my life be pleasing to ye, I take it,
Vpon my knees, if ever any service,
As let me brag, some have bin worthy notice,
If ever any worth, or trust ye gave me,
Deserv'd a fairer respect, if all my actions,
The hazards of my youth, colds, burnings, wants,
For you and for the Empire, be not vices;
By that stile ye have stampt upon me, Souldier,
Let me not fall into the hands of wretches.
Emp. I understand ye not.
Aet. Let not this body,
That has lookd bravely in his bloud for Cesar,
And covetous of wounds, and for your safety,
After the scape of Swords, Speares, Slings, and Arrowes, Gainst which my beaten body was mine Armour,
The Seas, and thirstie deserts, now be purchase
For Slaves, and base Informers: I see anger, (slaughter
And death look through your eyes: I am markt for
And know the telling of this truth has made me
A man cleane lost to this world; I embrace it;
Only my last Petition sacred Cesar,
Is, I may dye a Roman.
Emp. Rise my friend still,
And worthy of my love; Reclaime the Souldier,
Ile study to doe so upon my selfe too,
Goe keep your command, and prosper.
Aet. Life to Cesar——Exit Aecius——Enter Chilax.
Chi. Lord Maximus attends your Grace.
Emp. Goe tell him,
Ile meete him in the gallery.
The honesty of this Aecius
Who is indeed the Bull-wark of the Empire,
Has div'd so deep into me, that of all
The sins I covet, but this womans beautie,
With much repentance, now I could be quit of:
But she is such a pleasure, being good,
That though I were a god, she would fire my bloud. Exit

Actus Secundus. Scæna prima.

Enter the Emperour, Maximus, Lycinius, Proculus, Chilax, as at Dice.

Emp. NAy ye shall set my hand out, tis not just
I should neglect my fortune, now tis prosperous.
Lyc. If I have any thing to set your Grace,
But Clothes or good conditions, let me perish,
You have all my mony Sir;
Pro. And mine,
Chi. And mine too.
Max. Vnlesse your Grace will credit us;
Emp. No bare bond,
Lyc. Then at my Garden-House;
Emp. The Orchard too.
Lyc. And't please your Grace,
Emp. Have at 'em,
Pro. They are lost;
Lyc. Why farewell Fig-trees,
Emp. Who sets more?
Chil. At my Horse Sir,
Emp. The dapl'd Spaniard?
Chil. He.
Emp. He's mine,
Chil. He is so;
Max. Your short horse is soone turried;
Chil. So it seemes Sir,
So may your Mare be too, if luck serve.

Max.

Max. Ha?
Ch. Nothing my Lord but grieving at my fortune, (thus
Emp. Come Maximus, you were not wont to flinch
Max. By Heaven Sir, I have loſt all.
Emp. Ther's a ring yet,
Max. This was not made to looſe Sir,
Emp. Some love token;
Set it I ſay;
Max. I do: beſeech your Grace,
Rather name any houſe I have.
Emp. How ſtrange,
And curious you are growne of toyes? redeem't
If ſo I win it, when you pleaſe, to morrow,
Or next day as ye will, I care not,
But only for my luck ſake: Tis not Rings
Can make me richer.
Max. Will you throw Sir? there 'tis:
Emp. Why then have at it fairely: myne.
Max. Your Grace
Is only ever fortunate: to morrow,
An't be your pleaſure Sir, Ile pay the price on't;
Emp. To morrow you ſhall have it without price Sir,
But this day 'tis my victory: good Maximus,
Now I bethink my ſelfe, goe to Ætius,
And bid him muſter all the Cohorts preſently;
They mutiny for pay I heare, and be you
Aſſiſtant to him; when you know their numbers,
Ye ſhall have monyes for 'em, and above
Something to ſtop their tongues withall.
Max. I will Sir,
And gods preſerve you in this mind ſtill.
Emp. Shortly Ile ſee 'em march my ſelfe.
Max. Gods ever keep ye.——Exit Max. (now?
Emp. To what end doe you think this ring ſhall ſerve
For you are fellowes only know by roate,
As birds record their leſſons.
Chil. For the Lady,
Emp. But how for her?
Chil. That I confeſſe I know not, (Eunuch
Emp. Then pray for him that do's: fetch me an
That never ſaw her yet: and you two ſee Exit. Chil.
The Court made like a Paradiſe.
Lyc. We will Sir.
Emp. Full of faire ſhewes and Muſiques; all your arts
(As I ſhall give inſtructions) ſcrew to 'th higheſt,
For my maine peece is now a doing: and for feare
You ſhould not take, Ile have an other engine,
Such as if vertue be not only in her,
She ſhall not chooſe but leane to, let the women
Put on a graver ſhew of welcome.
Pro. Well Sir,
Emp. They are a thought too eager.—— Enter Chilax
Chil. Here's the Eunuch, and Lycias
Eun. Long life to Ceſar. the Eunuch.
Emp. I muſt uſe you Lycias:
Come let's walk in, and then Ile ſhew ye all:
If women may be fraile, this wench ſhall fall. Exeunt.

Scene 2. Enter Claudia, and Marcellina.

Claudia. Sirrha, what ayles my Lady, that of late
She never cares for company?
Mar. I know not,
Vnleſſe it be that company cauſes Cuckolds.
Clau. That were a childiſh feare;
Mar. What were thoſe Ladyes,
Came to her lately,
From the Court?
Clau. The ſame wench.
Some grave Inſtructors on my life, they look
For all the world like old hacthi hilts,
Mar. Tis true wench.
For here and there, and yet they painted well too,
One might diſcover where the gold was worne
Their Iron ages.
Clau. If my judgment faile not,
They have been ſheathed like rotten ſhips,
Mar. It may be.
Clau. For if ye mark their rudders, they hang weakly.
Mar. They have paſt the line belike: wouldſt live Clau.
Till thou wert ſuch as they are?
Clau. Chimney pieces.
Now heaven have mercy on me, and young men,
I had rather make a drallery till thirty,
While I were able to endure a tempeſt,
And beare my ſights out bravely, till my tackle
Whiſtled i'th wind, and held againſt all weathers,
While I were able to beare with my tyres
And ſo diſcharg 'em, I would willingly
Live Marcellina, not till barnacles
Bred in my ſides.
Mar. Thou art i'th right wench.
For who would live, whom pleaſures had forſaken,
To ſtand at marke, and cry a bow ſhort ſigneur?
Were there not men came hither too?
Clau. Brave fellowes.
I feare me Bawdes of five i'th' pound.
Mar. How know you?
Clau. They gave me great lights to it.
Mar. Take heed Claudia.
Clau. Let them take heed, the ſpring comes on.
Mar. To me now,
They ſeem'd as noble viſitants.
Clau. To me now
Nothing leſſe Marcellina, for I marke 'em,
And by this honeſt light, for yet tis morning,
Saving the reverence of their guilded doublets
And Millan ſkins.
Mar. Thou art a ſtrange wench Claudia.
Clau. Ye are deceived, they ſhew'd to me directly Court crabbs that creepe a ſide way for their living
I know 'em by the breeches that they beg'd laſt,
Mar. Peace, my Lady comes; what may that be?
Clau. A Sumner { Enter Lucina, and
That cites her to appeare. { Lycias the Eunuch.
Mar. No more of that wench.
Eun. Madam, what anſwer to your Lord?
Luci. Pray tell him, I am ſubject to his will,
Eun. Why weepe you Madam?
Excellent Lady, there are none will hurt you.
Luci. I do beſeech you tell me Sir.
Eun. What Lady?
Luci. Serve ye the Emperor?
Eun. I do.
Luci. In what place?
Eun. In's chamber Madam.
Luci. Do ye ſerve his will too?
Eun. In faire and juſt commands.
Luci. Are ye a Romane?
Eun. Yes noble Lady, and a Mantuan.
Luci. What office bore your parents?
Eun. One was Pretor.
Luci. Take heed then how you ſtaine his reputation,
Eun. Why worthy Lady?
Luci. If ye know, I charge ye,

Ought

Ought in this Meſſage, but what honeſty,
The truſt and faire obedience of a ſervant,
May well deliver, yet take heed, and help me.
Eun. Madam, I am nō Broker;
Claud. Ile be hangd then.
Eun. Nor baſe procurer of mens luſts; Your husband,
Praid me to doe this office, I have done it,
It reſts in you to come, or no:
Luc. I will Sir;
Eun. If ye miſtruſt me, doe not,
Luc. Ye appeare ſo worthy,
And to all my ſence ſo honeſt,
And this is ſuch a certain ſigne ye have brought me,
That I believe.
Eun. Why ſhould I couzen you?
Or were I brib'd to doe this villany,
Can mony proſper, or the foole that takes it,
When ſuch a vertue falls?
Luc. Ye ſpeake well Sir;
Would all the reſt that ſerve the Emperour,
Had but your way.
Claud. And ſo they have ad unguem:
Luc. Pray tell my Lord, I have receivd his Token,
And will not faile to meete him; yet good Sir, thus much
Before you goe, I doe beſeech ye too,
As little notice as ye can, deliver
Of my appearance there,
Eun. It ſhall be Madam,
And ſo I wiſh you happineſſe.
Luc. I thank you. —— Exeunt.

Scen. 2. Enter Æcius purſuing Pontius the Captaine, and Maximus following. {Tumult & noiſe within.

Max. Temper your ſelfe Æcius,
Pon. Hold my Lord.
I am a Roman, and a Souldier,
Max. Pray Sir;
Æci. Thou art a lying Villaine, and a Traytor;
Give me my ſelfe, or by the Gods my friend
You'l make me dangerous; how darſt thou pluck
The Souldiers to ſedition, and I living,
And ſo Rebellion in 'em, and even then
When I am drawing out to action?
Pon. Heare me,
Max. Are yee a man?
Æci. I am a true hearted Maximus,
And if the Villaine live, we are diſhonourd.
Max. But heare him what he can ſay.
Æci. That's the way,
To pardon him; I am ſo eaſie naturd,
That if he ſpeak but humbly I forgive him.
Pon. I doe beſeech yee Noble Generall,
Æci. Has found the was already, give me roome,
One ſtroake, and if he ſcape me then ha's mercy;
Pon. I doe not call yee Noble, that I feare ye,
I never care'd for death; if ye will kill me,
Conſider firſt for what, not what you can doe;
Tis true, I know ye for my Generall,
And by that great Prerogative may kill:
But doe it juſtly then.
Æci. He argues with me.
By Heaven a made up Rebell.
Max. Pray conſider,
What certaine grounds ye have for this.
Æci. What grounds?
Did I not take him preaching to the Souldiers
How lazily they liv'd, and what diſhonours
It was to ſerve a Prince ſo full of woman,
Thoſe were his very words, friend;
Max. Theſe, Æcius,
Though they were raſhly ſpoke, which was an errour
(A great one Pontius) yet from him that hungers
For warres, and heave imployment, might be pardond.
The heart, and harboured thoughts of ill, make Traytors,
Not ſpleeny ſpeeches.
Æci. Why ſhould you protect him?
Goe too, it ſhewes not honeſt;
Max. Taynt me not,
For that ſhewes worſe Æcius: All your friendſhip
And that pretended love ye lay upon me,
Hold back my honeſty, is like a favour
You doe your ſlave to day, to morrow hang him,
Was I your boſome peece for this?
Æci. Forgive me.
The nature of my zeale, and for my Country,
Makes me ſometimes forgive my ſelfe; for know,
Though I moſt ſtrive to be without my paſſions,
I am no God: For you Sir, whoſe infection
Ha's ſpread it ſelfe like poyſon through the Army,
And caſt a killing fogge on faire Allegiance,
Firſt thank this Noble Gentleman, y'e had dy'de elſe.
Next from your place, and honour of a Souldier,
I here ſeclude you.
Pon. May I ſpeak yet?
Max. Heare him:
Æci. And while Æcius holds a reputation,
At leaſt command, ye beare no Armes for Rome Sir.
Pon. Againſt her I ſhall never: The condemnd man,
Ha's yet that priviledge to ſpeak my Lord;
Law were not equall elſe.
Max. Pray heare Aecius,
For happily the fault he has committed,
Though I believe it mighty, yet conſidered,
If mercy may be thought upon, will prove
Rather a haſtie ſin, then heynous.
Aec. Speake.
Pon. Tis true my Lord, ye took me tir'de with peace,
My words, almoſt as ragged as my fortunes.
Tis true I told the Souldier, whom we ſerv'd,
And then bewaild, we had an Emperour
Led from us by the flouriſhes of Fencers;
I blam'd him too for women.
Aec. To the reſt Sir;
Pon. And like enough I bleſt him then as Souldiers
Will doe ſometimes: Tis true I told 'em too,
We lay at home, to ſhow our Country
We durſt goe naked, durſt want meate, and mony,
And when the Slave drinkes Wine, we durſt be thirſtie:
I told 'em this too, that the Trees and Roots
Were our beſt pay-maſters; the Charity
Of longing women, that had bought our bodies,
Our beds, fires, Taylers, Nurſes, Nay I told 'em,
(For you ſhall heare the greateſt ſin, I ſaid Sir)
By that time there be wars agen, our bodies
Laden with ſcarres, and aches, and ill lodgings,
Heates, and perpetuall wants, were fitter praires,
And certaine graves, then cope the foe on crutches:
Tis likely too, I counſelld 'em to turne
Their Warlike pikes to plough-ſhares, their ſure Targets
And Swords hatcht with the bloud of many Nations,
To Spades, and pruning Knives, for thoſe get mony,
Their warlike Eagles, into Dawes, or Starlings,
To give an Ave Ceſar as he paſſes,
And be rewarded with a thouſand dragma's

For

For thus we get but yeares and beats.
Æci. What think you,
Were theſe words to be ſpoken by a Captain,
One that ſhould give example?
Max. 'Twas too much;
Pon. My Lord, I did not wooe 'em from the Empire,
Nor bid 'em turne their daring ſteele gainſt Cæſar,
The Gods for ever hate me, if that motion
Were part of me: Give me but imployment, Sir;
And way to live, and where you ſhould me vicious,
Bred up in mutiny, my Sword ſhall tell ye,
And if you pleaſe, that place I held, maintaine it,
Gainſt the moſt daring foes of Rome, I am honeſt,
A lover of my Country, one that holds
His life no longer his, then kept for Cæſar.
Weigh not (I thus low on my knee beſeech you)
What my rude tongue diſcovered, t'was my want,
No other part of Pontius: you have ſeen me,
And you my Lord, doe ſomething for my Country,
And both beheld the wounds I gave and took,
Not like a backward Traytor.
Æci. All this language,
Makes but againſt you Pontius, you are caſt,
And by mine honor, and my love to Cæſar,
By me ſhall never be reſtord; In my Campe
I will not have a tongue, though to himſelfe
Dare talke but neere ſedition; as I governe,
All ſhall obey, and when they want, their duty
And ready ſervice ſhall redreſſe their needs,
Not prating what they would be.
Pon. Thus I leave ye,
Yet ſhall my praires ſtill, although my fortunes
Muſt follow you no more, be ſtill about ye,
Gods give ye where ye fight the Victory,
Ye cannot caſt my wiſhes.
Æci. Come my Lord,
Now to the Field agen a
Max. Alas poore Pontius——Exeunt.

Scen. 4. Enter Chilax at one dore, Lycinius, and Balbus at another.

Lyc. How now?
Chi. Shee's come,
Bal. Then Ile to'th Emperor.——Exit Balbus.
Chi. Doe; Is the Muſick placed well?
Lyc. Excellent.
Chil. Lycinius, you and Proclus receive her,
In the great Chamber at her, entrance,
Let me alone; and doe you heare Lycinius,
Pray let the Ladies ply her further off,
And with much more diſcretion: one word more,
Lyc. Well;
Chil. Are the Iewells, and thoſe ropes of Pearle, Layd in the way ſhe paſſes?——Enter Emperor, Balbus and Proclus.
Lyc. Take no care man——Exeunt Lyc.
Emp. What is ſhe come?
Chil. She is Sir; but t'wer beſt;
Your Grace were ſeen laſt to her,
Emp. So I mean;
Keep the Court emptie Proculus,
Pro. Tis done Sir.
Emp. Be not too ſudaine to hir.
Chil. Good your Grace,
Retire and man your ſelfe; let us alone,
We are no children this way: doe you heare Sir?
Tis neceſſary that her waiting women
Be cut off in the Lobby, by ſome Ladies,
The'd break the buſineſſe elſe.
Emp. Tis true, they ſhall.
Chil. Remember your place Proculus,
Pro. I warrant ye.——Exeunt Emperor, Balbus and Pro.
Enter Lucina, Claudia, and Marcellina.
Chi. She enters: who are waytors there? the Emperor
Calls for his Horſe to ayre himſelfe.
Luci. I am glad,
I come ſo happily to take him abſent,
This takes away a little feare; I know him,
Now I begin to feare agen: Oh honour,
If ever thou hadſt temple in weak woman,
And ſacrifice of modeſty burnt to thee,
Hold me faſt now, and help me;
Chil. Noble Madam,
Ye are welcome to the Court, moſt nobly welcome,
Ye are a ſtranger Lady,
Luc. I deſire ſo;
Chil. A wondrous ſtranger here,
Nothing ſo ſtrange:
And therefore need a guide I think,
Luc. I doe Sir,
And that a good one too.
Chil. My ſervice Lady.
Shall be your guard in this place; But pray ye tell me,
Are ye reſolv'd a Courtier?
Luc. No I hope Sir;
Clau. You are Sir.
Chil. Yes my faire one,
Clau. So it ſeemes,
You are ſo ready to beſtow your ſelfe,
Pray what might coſt thoſe Breeches?
Chil. Would you weare 'em,
Madam ye have a witty woman.
Mar. Two Sir,
Or elſe yee underbuy us.
Luc. Leave your talking:
But is my Lord here, I beſeech ye Sir?
Chil. He is ſweet Lady, and muſt take this kindly,
Exceeding kindly of ye, wondrous kindly
Ye come ſo farre to viſit him: Ile guide ye, Luc. Whether?
Chil. Why to your Lord,
Luc. Is it ſo hard Sir,
To find him in this place without a Guide?
For I would willingly not trouble you.
Chil. It will be ſo for you that are a ſtranger;
Nor can it be a trouble to doe ſervice
To ſuch a worthy beauty, and beſides——
Mar. I ſee he will goe with us.
Clau. Let him amble.
Chil. It fits not that a Lady of your reckoning,
Should paſſe without attendants.
Luc. I have two Sir.
Chil. I mean without a man; You'l ſee the Emperor?
Luc. Alas I am not fit Sir,
Chil. You are well enough.
Hee'l take it wondrous kindly: Harke,
Luc. ye flatter,
Good Sir, no more of that.
Chil. Well, I but tell ye;
Luc. Will ye goe forward, ſince I muſt be mand,
Pray take your place.
Claud. Cannot ye man us too Sir?
Chil. Give me but time.
Mar. And you'l try all things:

Chil.

Chil. No?
Hmake ye no such promise,
Claud. If ye doe Sir;
Take heed ye stand to't.
Chil. Wondrous merry Ladies.
——Enter Lycinius, and Proculus, Balbus. (Exit
Luc. The wenches are disposd, pray keep your way Sir.
Lyc. She is comming up the staires; Now the Musick;
And as that stirs her, let's set on: perfumes there.
Pro. Discover all the Iewells:
Lyc. Peace. Musicke.

SONGS.

Now the lusty Spring is seene,
Golden yellow, gaudy Blew,
Daintily invite the view.
Every Where, on every Greene,
Roses blushing as they blow,
And inticing men to pull,
Lillies whiter then the snow
Woodbines of sweet hony full.
All loves Emblems and all cry,
Ladyes, if not pluck't we dye.

Yet the lusty Spring hath stayd,
Blushing red and purest white,
Daintily to love invite,
Every Woman, every Mayd,
Cherries kissing as they grow;
And inviting men to taste,
Apples even ripe below,
Winding gently to the waste,
All loves emblems and all cry,
Ladies, if not plucks we dye.

SECOND.

Heare ye Ladies that despise,
what the mighty love has done,
Feare examples, and be wise,
Faire Calisto was a Nun,
Læda sayling on the streame,
To deceive the hopes of man,
Love accounting but a dream,
Doted on a silver Swan,
Danae in a Brazen Tower,
Where no love was, lov'd a Flowre.

Heare yee Ladyes that are coy,
What the mighty love can doe,
Feare the fiercenesse of the Boy,
The chaste Moon he makes to woe:
Vesta kindling holy fires,
Circled round about with spies,
Never dreaming loose desires,
Doting at the Altar dies.
Ilion in a short Tower higher,
He can build, and once more fire.

Enter Chilax, Lucina, Claudia, and Marcellina.
Luc. Pray Heaven my Lord be here, for now I feare it.
Well Ring, if thou bee'st counterfeit, or stolne,
As by this preparation I suspect it,
Thou hast betraid thy Mistris: pray Sir forward,
I would faine see my Lord.
Chil. But tell me Madam,
How doe ye like the Song?
Luc. I like the ayre well,
But for the words, they are lascivious,
And over-light for Ladies.
Chil. All ours love 'em.
Luc. Tis like enough, for yours are loving Ladies,
Lyc. Madam, ye are welcome to the Court. Who waits?
Attendants for this Lady;
Luc. Ye mistake Sir;
I bring no triumph with me,
Lyc. But much honour.
Pro. Why this was nobly done; and like a neighbour,
So freely of your selfe to be a visitant,
The Emperour shall give ye thanks for this.
Luc. O no Sir;
Ther's nothing to deserve 'em,
Pro. Yes, your presence;
Luc. Good Gentlemen be patient, and believe
I come to see my husband, on command too,
I were no Courtier else.
Lyc. That's all one Lady,
Now ye are here, y'are welcome, and the Emperor
Who loves ye, but too well:
Luc. No more of that Sir.
I came not to be Catechizd,
Pro. Ah Sirah;
And have we got you here, faith Noble Lady,
Wee'l keep you one month Courtier.
Luc. Gods defend Sir,
I never likd a trade worse,
Pro. Harke ye:
Luc. No Sir;
Pro. Ye are grown the strangest Lady,
Luc. How?
Pro. By Heaven,
Tis true I tell ye, and you'l find it.
Luc. I?
Ile rather find my grave, and so informe him.
Pro. Is it not pity Gentlemen, this Lady,
(Nay Ile deale roughly with ye, yet not hurt ye)
Should live alone, and give such heavenly beauty,
Only to walls, and hangings?
Luc. Good Sir, patience:
I am no wonder, neither come to that end,
Ye doe my Lord an injury to stay me,
Who though ye are the Printes, yet dare tell ye
He keeps no wife for your wayes.
Bal. Well, well Lady;
How ever you are pleasd to think of us,
Ye are welcome, and ye shall be welcome;
Luc. Shew it
In that I come for then, in leading me
Where my lov'd Lord is, not in flattery:— Jewells shewd.
Nay ye may draw the Curtain, I have seen 'em
But none worth halfe my honesty.
Claud. Are these Sir,
Layd here to take?
Pro. Yes, for your Ladys Gentlewoman;
Mar. We had been doing else,
Bal. Meaner Iewels
Would fit your worths;
Claud. And meaner clothes your bodies,
Luc. The Gods shall kill me first.
Lyc. Ther's better dying;
I'th Emperors arms goe too, but be not angry——
These are but talkes sweet Lady,
Enter Phorba, and Ardelia.
Phor. Where is this stranger? rushes, Ladyes, rushes,
Rushes as greene as Summer for this stranger;
Pro. Heer's Ladies come to see you,
Luc. You are gone then?

I take it tis your Que,
Pro. Or rather manners,
You are better fitted Madam, we but tire ye,
Therefore wee'l leave you for an houre, and bring Your much lov'd Lord unto you——Exeunt.
Luc. Then Ile thanke ye,
I am betraid for certaine; well Lucina,
If thou do'lt fall from vertue, may the earth
That after death should shout up gardens of thee,
Spreading thy living goodnesse into branches,
Fly from thee, and the hot Sun find thy vices.
Phor. You are a welcom woman;
Ard. Blesse me heaven,
How did you find the way to Court?
Luc. I know not.
Would I had never trod it.
Phor. Pre-thee tell me,
Good Noble Lady, and good sweet heart love us,
For we love thee extreamly; is not this place
A Paradice to live in?
Luc. To those people
That know no other Paradice but pleasure,
That little I enjoy contents me better.
Ard. What heard ye any Musick yet?
Luc. Too much.
Phor. You must not be thus froward; what, this gown
Is one o'th prettiest by my troth Ardelia,
I ever saw yet; t'was not to frowne in Lady,
Ye put this gowne on when ye came.
Ard. How doe ye?
Alas poore wretch how cold it is!
Luc. Content ye;
I am as well as may be, and as temperate,
If ye will let me be so: wher's my Lord?
For ther's the businesse that I came for Ladies:
Phor. Wee'l lead ye to him, hee's i'th Gallery,
Ard. Wee'l shew ye all the Court too.
Luc. Shew me him,
And ye have shewd me all I come to look on,
Phor. Come on, wee'l be your guides, and as ye goe,
We have some pretty tales to tell ye Lady,
Shall make ye merry too; ye come not here,
To be a sad Lucina.
Luc. Would I might not.——Exeunt.—{Enter Chilax
Chil. Now the soft Musick; Balbus run-{and Balbus.
Bal. I flye Boy——Exit Balbus.
Chil. The women by this time are worming of her,——
If she can hold out them, the Emperour Musicke.
Takes her to taske: he h'as her; hark the Musick:
Luc. Good your Grace,
Where are my women Sir?
Emp. They are wise, beholding (bravery:
What you thinke scorne to looke on, the Courts
Would you have run away so slily Lady,
And not have seen me?
Luc. I beseech your Majestie,
Consider what I am, and whose,
Emp. I doe so;
Luc. Believe me, I shall never make a Whore Sir,
Emp. A friend ye may, and to that man that loves ye,
More then you love your vertue.
Luc. Sacred Cesar,
Emp. You shall not kneel to me Sweet,
Luc. Look upon me,
And if ye be so cruell to abuse me,
Think how the Gods will take it; do's this beauty
Affict your soule? Ile hide it from you ever,
Nay more, I will become so leprous,
That ye shall curse me from ye: My deer Lord,
H'as serv'd ye ever truly, fought your Battailes,
As if he daily longd to dye for Cesar,
Was never Traytor Sir, nor never tainted
In all the actions of his life.
Emp. I know it.
Luc. His fame and family have growne together,
And spred together like to sayling Cedars,
Over the Roman Diadem; ô let not,
As ye have any flesh that's humane in you,
The having of a modest wife decline him,
Let not my vertue be the wedge to break him,
I doe not think ye are lascivious,
These wanton men belye ye, you are Cesar,
Which is the Father of the Empires honour,
Ye are too neere the nature of the Gods,
To wrong the weakest of all creatures: Women.
Emp. I dare not do it here, rise faire Lucina,
I did but try your temper, ye are honest,
And with the commendations waite on that
Ile lead ye to your Lord, and ye to him:
Wipe your faire eyes: he that endeavours ill,
May well delay, but never quench his hell.——Exeunt.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter Chilax, Lycinius, Proculus, and Balbus.

Chil. TIs done Lycinius:
Lyc. Ho?
Chil. I shame to tell it,
If there be any justice, we are Villaines,
And must be so rewarded.
Bal. If it be done,
I take it tis no time now to repent it,
Let's make the best o'th trade.
Pro. Now veng'ance take it.
Why should not he have fetled on a beauty,
Whose honesty stuck in a peece of tissue,
Or one a Ring might rule, or such a one
That had an itching husband to be honourable,
And ground to get it: if he must have women,
And no allay without 'em, why not those
That know the misery, and are best able
To play againe with judgment? such as she is,
Grant they be won with long seidge, endlesse travell,
And brought to opportunity with millions,
Yet when they come to motion, their cold vertue
Keeps 'em like cakes of yce; Ile melt a Christall,
And make a dead flint fire himselfe, ere they Give greater heate, then now departing embers
Gives to old men that watch 'em.
Lyc. A good Whore
Had sav'd all this, and happily as wholsome,
I, and the thing once done too, as well thought of,
But this same chastity forsooth,
Pro. A Pox on't,
Why should not women be as free as we are?
They are, but not in open, and far freer,
And the more bold ye beare your selfe, more welcome,
And there is nothing you dare say, but truth,
But they dare heare. ——{Enter Emperor
Chi. The Emperour! away, {and Lucina.
And if we can repent, let's home and pray. Exeunt.
Emp. Your only vertue now is patience,

Take

Take heede, and save your honour; if you talke,
Luc. As long as there is motion in my body,
And life to give me words, Ile cry for justice,
Emp. Iustice shall never heare ye, I am justice,
Luc. Wilt thou not kill me, Monster, Ravisher,
Thou bitter bane o'th Empires look upon me,
And if thy guilty eyes dare see these ruines,
Thy wild lust hath layd levell with dishonour,
The sacrilegious razing of this Temple,
The mother of thy black sins would have blushed at,
Behold and curse thy selfe; the Gods will find thee,
That's all my refuge now, for they are righteous,
Vengeance and horror circle thee; the Empire,
In which thou liv'st a strong continued surfeit,
Like poyson will disgorge thee, good men raze thee
For ever being read again,——but vicious
Women, and fearefull Maids, make vows against thee:
Thy own Slaves, if they heare of this, shall hate thee;
And those thou hast corrupted first fall from thee;
And if thou let'st me live, the Souldier,
Tyrde with thy Tyrannies, break through obedience,
And shake his strong Steele at thee.
Emp. This prevailes not;
Nor any Agony ye utter Lady,
If I have done a sin, curse her that drew me,
Curse the first cause, the witchcraft that abusd me,
Curse those faire eyes, and curse that heavenly beauty,
And curse your being good too.
Luci. Glorious theife,
What restitution canst thou make to save me?
Emp. Ile ever love, and honour you.
Luci. Thou canst not,
For that which was mine honour, thou hast murdred,
And can there be a love in violence?
Emp. You shall be only mine.
Luci. Yet I like better
Thy villany, then flattery, that's thine owne,
The other basely counterfeit; flye from me,
Or for thy safety sake and wisdome kill me,
For I am worse then thou art; thou mayst pray,
And so recover grace; I am lost for ever,
And if thou lets't me live, th'art lost thy selfe too
Emp. I feare no losse but love, I stand above it.
Luci. Call in your Lady Bawdes, and guilded Pander's
And let them triumph too, and sing to Cesar,
Lucina's falne, the chast Lucina's conquerd;
Gods, what a wretched thing has this man made me?
For I am now no wife for Maximus,
No company for women that are vertuous,
No familie I now can claime, nor Country,
Nor name, but Cesars Whore; O sacred Cesar,
(For that should be your title) was your Empire,
Your Rods, and Axes, that are types of Iustice,
Those fires that ever burne, to beg you blessings,
The peoples adoration, feare of Nations,
What victory can bring ye home, what else
The usefull Elements can make your servants,
Even light it selfe, and suns of light, truth, justice,
Mercy, and starlike pietie sent to you,
And from the gods themselves to ravish women?
The curses that I owe to Enemies,
Even those the Sabines sent, when Romulus,
(As thou hast me) ravishd their noble Mayden,
Made more, and heavier, light on thee.
Emp. This helps not.
Luci. The sins of Tarquin be remembred in thee,
And where there has a chast wife been abusde,
Let it be thine, the shame thine, thine the slaughter,
And last for ever, thine, the feard example.
Where shall poore vertue live, now I am falne?
What can your honours now, and Empire make me,
But a more glorious Whore?
Emp. A better woman,
But if ye will be blind, and scorne it, who can help it?
Come leave these lamentations, they doe nothing,
But make a noyse, I am the same man still,
Were it to doe again, therefore be wiser,
By all this holy light, I should attempt it,
Ye are so excellent, and made to ravish,
There were no pleasure in ye else.
Luci. Oh villaine.
Emp. So bred for mans amazement, that my reason
And every help to hold me right has lost me;
The God of love himselfe had been before me,
Had he but power to see ye; tell me justly,
How can I choose but erre then? if ye dare,
Be mine, and only mine, for ye are so pretious,
I envie any other should enjoy ye,
Almost look on ye; and your daring husband
Shall know h'as kept an Offring from the Empire,
Too holy for his Altars; be the mightiest,
More then my selfe Ile make it: if ye will not,
Sit down with this, and silence, for which wisdom,
Ye shall have use of me, and much honour ever,
And be the same you were; if ye divulge it,
Know I am far above the faults I doe,
And those I doe I am able to forgive too;
And where your credit in the knowldge of it,
May be with glosse enough suspected, mine
Is as mine owne command shall make it: (pers,
Princes though they be somtime subject to loose whis-
Yet weare they two edged swords for open censures:
Your husband cannot help ye, nor the Souldier,
Your husband is my creature, they my weapons,
And only where I bid'em, strike; I feed'em,
Nor can the Gods be angry at this action,
For as they make me most, they meane me happiest,
Which I had never bin without this pleasure:
Consider, and farewell: you'l find your women
At home before ye, they have had some sport too,
But are more thankfull for it——Exit Emperor.
Luci. Destruction finde thee.
Now which way must I goe? my honest house
Will shake to shelter me, my husband flye me,
My Family, because they are honest, and desire to be so,
Must not endure me, not a neighbour know me;
What woman now dare see me without blushes,
And pointing as I passe, there, there, behold her,
Look on her little Children, that is she,
That handsome Lady, mark; O my sad fortunes,
Is this the end of goodnesse, this the price
Of all my early praiers to protect me,
Why then I see there is no God but power,
Nor vertue now alive that cares for us,
But what is either lame or sensuall,
How had I bin thus wretched else? Enter Maximus and Æcius
Æci. Let Titus and Æcius
Command the company that Pontius lost,
And see the Fosses deeper.
Max. How now sweet heart,
What make you here, and thus?
Æci: Lucina weeping?
This must be much offence,
Max. Look up and tell me,

Why are you thus? My Ring? ô friend, I have found it,
Ye were at Court, Sweet.
Luc. Yes, this brought me thither.
Max. Rise, and goe home: I have my feares Ætius:
Oh my best friend, I am ruind; goe Lucina,
Already in thy teares, I have read thy wrongs,
Already found a Cesar; go thou Lilly,
Thou sweetly drooping flowre: go silver Swan,
And sing thine owne sad requiem: goe Lucina,
And if thou dar'st, out live this wrong.
Luc. I dare not.
Æt. Is that the Ring ye lost?
Max. That, that, Ætius,
That curst Ring, my selfe, and all my fortunes:
T'has pleasd the Emperor, my Noble master,
For all my services, and dangers for him,
To make me mine owne Pandar, was this justice?
Oh my Ætius, have I liv'd to beare this?
Luc. Farewell for ever Sir.
Max. That's a sad saying,
But such a one becomes ye well Lucina:
And yet me thinkes we should not part so lightly,
Our loves have been of longer growth, more rooted
Then the sharp word of one farewell can scatter.
Kisse me: I find no Cesar here; these lips
Taste not of Ravisher in my opinion.
Was it not so?
Luc. O Yes,
Max. I dare believe thee,
For thou wert ever truth it selfe, and sweetnesse:
Indeed she was Ætius.
Æt. So she is still.
Max. Once more: O my Lucina; ô my comfort,
The blessing of my youth, the life of my life.
Æt. I have seene enough to stagger my obedience:
Hold me ye equall Gods, this is too sinfull.
Max. Why wert thou chosen out to make a whore of?
To me thou wert too chast: fall Christall fountaines,
And ever feed your streames you rising sorrowes,
Till you have dropt your mistris into marble.
Now goe for ever from me.
Luc. Long farewell Sir.
And as I have been loyall, Gods think on me.
Max. Stay, let me once more bid farewell Lucina,
Farewell thou excellent example of us,
Thou starry vertue, farethee-well, seeke heaven,
And there by Cassiopeia shine in glory,
We are too base and dirty to preserve thee.
Æt. Nay, I must kisse too: such a kisse againe,
And from a woman of so ripe a vertue,
Ætius must not take: Farewell thou Phenix,
If thou wilt dye Lucina; which well weighd
If you can cease a while from these strange thoughts,
I wish were rather alterd.
Luc. No.
Æt. Mistake not.
I would not staine your honour for the Empire,
Nor any way decline you to discredit,
Tis not my faire profession, but a Villaines:
I find and feele your losse as deep as you doe,
And am the same Ætius, still as honest,
The same life I have still for Maximus,
The same sword weare for you, where justice wills mee,
And tis no dull one: therefore misconceave not:
Only I would have you live a little longer,
But a short yeare.
Max. She must not.
Luc. Why so long Sir,
Am I not grey enough with griefe already?
Æt. To draw from that wild man a sweet repentance, and goodnesse in his daies to come.
Max. They are so,
And will be ever comming my Ætius.
Æt. For who knowes but the sight of you, presenting
His swolne sins at the full, and your faire vertues,
May like a fearefull vision fright his follies,
And once more bend him right again, which blessing
(If your dark wrongs would give you leave to read)
Is more then death, and the reward more glorious:
Death, only eases you; this, the whole Empire:
Besides compeld, and forced with violence,
To what ye have done, the deed is none of yours,
No nor the justice neither; ye may live,
And still a worthier woman, still more honoured:
For are those trees the worse we teare the fruits from?
Or should the eternall Gods desire to perish,
Because we daily violate their truths,
Which is the chastitie of heaven? No Lady,
If ye dare live, ye may: and as our sins
Makes them more full of equitie and justice,
So this compulsive wrong, makes you more perfect:
The Empire too will blesse ye.
Max. Noble Sir;
If she were any thing to me but honour,
And that that's wedded to me too, layd in
Not to be worne away without my being:
Or could the wrong be hers alone, or mine,
Or both our wrongs, not tide to alter issues,
Not borne a new in all our names and kindreds,
I would desire her live, nay more, compell her:
But since it was not youth, but malice did it,
And not her own, nor mine, but both our losses,
Nor staies it there, but that our names must find it,
Even those to come; and when they read, she liv'd,
Must they not aske how often she was ravishd,
And make a doubt she lov'd that more then Wedlock?
Therefore she must not live.
Æt. Therefore she must live,
To teach the world such deaths are superstitious.
Luc. The tongues of Angels cannot alter me;
For could the world again restore my credit,
As faire and absolute as first I bred it,
That world I should not trust agen. The Empire
By my life can get nothing but my story,
Which whilst I breath must be but his abuses:
And where ye councell me to live, that Cesar
May see his errors, and repent, Ile tell ye,
His penitence is but encrease of pleasures,
His prayers never said but to deceave us,
And when he weeps, as you think for his vices,
Tis but as killing drops from balefull Ewgh trees
That rot their honest neighbour: If he can grieve,
As one that yet desires his free conversion,
And almost glories in his penitence,
Ile leave him robes to mourn in, my sad ashes.
Æt. The farewells then of happy soules be with thee,
And to thy memory be ever sung
The praises of a just and constant Lady,
This sad day whilst I live, a Souldiers teares
Ile offer on thy Monument, and bring
Full of thy noble selfe with teares untold yet,
Many a worthy wife, to weep thy ruine,
Max. All that is chast, upon thy Tomb shal flourish,
All living Epitaphs be thine, Time, Story;

And what is left behind to price our lives,
Shall be no more abus'd with tales and trifles,
But full of thoe, ſtand to eternitie.
Aeci. Once more farewell, go find Elyſium, (ſings,
There where the happy ſoules are crown'd with bleſ-
There where tis ever ſpring, and ever ſummer.
Max. There where no bedrid juſtice comes; truth, honor, are keepers of that bleſſed place; go thither,
For here thou liveſt chaſte fire in rotten timber.
Aeci. And ſo our laſt farewells.
Max. Gods give the juſtice,——Exit Lucina.
Aeci. His thoughts begin to worke; I feare him, yet
He ever was a noble Romane, but I know not what to thinke on't, he hath ſuffered
Beyond a man, if he ſtand this.
Max. Aecius,
Am I a live, or has a dead ſleepe ſeized me?
It was my wife the Emperor abus'd thus;
And I muſt ſay, I am glad I had her for him;
Muſt I not my Aecius?
Aeci. I am ſtricken
With ſuch a ſtiffe amazement, that no anſwer
Can readily come from me, nor no comfort:
Will ye go home, or go to my houſe?
Max. Neither:
I have no home, and you are mad Aecius
To keepe me company, I am a fellow
My own Sword would forſake, not tyed unto me:
A Pandar is a Prince, to what I am falne;
By heaven I dare do nothing.
Aeci. Ye do better.
Max. I am made a branded ſlave Aecius,
And yet I bleſſe the maker;
Death o my ſoule, muſt I endure this tamely?
Muſt Maximus be mention'd for his tales?
I am a child too; what ſhould I do raying?
I cannot mend my ſelfe, tis Caſar did it,
And what am I to him?
Aeci. Tis well conſider'd;
How ever you are tainted, be no Traitor.
Time may out-weare the firſt, the laſt lives ever.
Max. O that thou wert not living, and my freind.
Aeci. Ile beare a wary eye upon your actions,
I feare ye Maximus, nor can I blame thee
If thou breakeſt out, for by the Gods thy wrong
Deſerves a generall ruine: do ye love me?
Max. That's all I have to live on.
Aeci. Then go with me,
Ye ſhall not to your own houſe.
Max. Nor to any,
My greifs are greater far, then walls can compaſſe,
And yet I wonder how it happens with me,
I am not dangerous, and o my conſcience
Should I now ſee the Emperor i'th heat on't,
I ſhould not chide him for't, an awe runs through me,
I feele it inviſibly that blades me to it,
Tis at my heart now, there it ſits and rules,
And me thinkes tis a pleaſure to obey it.
Aeci. This is a maske to cozen me; I know ye,
And how far ye dare do; no Romane further,
Nor with more fearleſſe valour; and ile watch ye:
Keepe that obedience ſtill.
Max. Is a wives loſſe
(For her abuſe much good may do his grace, Ile make as bold with his wife, if I can)
More then the fading of a few freſh colours,
More then a luſty ſpring loſt?
Aeci. No more Maximus,
To one that truly lives.
Max. Why then I care not, I can live wel enough Aecius.
For looke you freind, for vertue, and thoſe triffles,
They may be bought they ſay.
Aeci. He's crax'd a little.
His greife has made him talke things from his nature,
Max. But chaſtitie is not a thing I take it
To get in Rome, unleſſe it be beſpoken
A hundred yeare before; is it Aecius?
by'r lady, and well handled too i'th breeding.
Aeci. Will ye go any way?
Max. Ile tell thee freind.
If my wife for all this ſhould be a whore now,
A kind of kicker out of ſheetes, t'would vex me,
For I am not angry yet; the Emperor
Is young and handſome, and the woman fleſh,
And may not theſe two couple without ſcratching?
Aeci. Alaſſe my noble freind.
Max. Alaſſe not me,
I am not wretched, for ther's no man miſerable
But he that makes himſelfe ſo:
Aeci. Will ye walke yet? (truth on't,
Max. Come, come, ſhe dare not dye freind, that's the
She knowes the inticing ſweets and delicacies
Of a young Princes pleaſures, and I thanke her
She has made a way for Maximus to riſe by?
Wilt not become me bravely? why do you think
She wept, and ſaid ſhe was raviſh'd? keep it here
And Ile diſcover to you.
Aeci. Well.
Max. She knowes
I love no bitten fleſh, and out of that hope
She might be from me, ſhe contriv'd this knavery;
Was it not monſtrous freind?
Aeci. Do's he but ſeeme ſo,
Or is he made indeed?
Max. Oh Gods, my heart!
Aeci. Would it would fairly breake.
Max. Me thinks I am ſomewhat wilder then I was,
And yet I thanke the gods I know my duty. Enter Clau- Claud. Nay ye may ſpare your tears; ſhe's dead. dia.
She is ſo.
Max. Why ſo it ſhould be: how?
Clau. When firſt ſhe enter'd
Into her houſe, after a world of weeping,
And bluſhing like the Sun ſet, as we ſee her;
Dare I ſaid ſhe defile this houſe with whore,
In which his noble family has flouriſh'd?
At which ſhe fel, and ſtird no more; we rubd her. Exit
Max. No more of that: be gon: now my Aecius, Clau.
If thou wilt do me pleaſure, weepe a little,
I am ſo parch'd I cannot: Your example
Has brought the raine down now: now lead me freind,
And as we walke together let's pray together truly
I may not fall from faith.
Aeci. That's nobly ſpoken.
Max. Was I not wilde, Aecius?
Aeci. Somewhat troubled.
Max. I felt no ſorrow then: Now ile goe with ye,
But do not name the woman: fye what foole
Am I to weepe thus? God's Lucina take thee,
For thou wert even the beſt, and worthieſt Lady.
Aeci. Good Sir no more, I ſhall be melted with it.
Max. I have done, and good Sir comfort me;
Would there were ware now.
Aeci. Settle your thoughts, come,

Max.

Max. So I have now friend,
Of my deep lamentations here's an end.——Exeunt.

Enter Pontius, Phidias, and Aretus.

Phidias By my faith Captain Pontius, besides pitie
Of your falne fortunes, what to say I know not,
For tis too true the Emperor desires not
But my best Master, any Souldier neere him:
Are. And when he understands, he cast your fortunes
For disobedience, how can we incline him,
(That are but under persons to his favours)
To any faire opinion? Can ye sing?
Pontius Not to please him Aretus, for my Songs
Goe not to'th Lute, or Violl, but to'th Trumpet,
My tune kept on a Target, and my subject
The well struck wounds of men, not love, or women.
Phi. And those he understands not.
Pont. He should Phidias,
Are. Could you not leave this killing way a little?
You must if here you would plant your selfe, and rather Learne as we doe, to like what those affect
That are above us: weare their actions,
And thinke they keep us warme too: what they say,
Though oftentimes they speake a little foolishly,
Not stay to construe, but prepare to execute,
And think how ever the end falls, the businesse
Cannot run empty handed.
Phid. Can yee flatter,
And if it were put to you, lye a little?
Pont. Yes, if it be a living.
Are. That's well said then:
Pon. But must these lyes and flatteries be beleev'd then?
Phi. Oh yes by any meanes.
Pon. By any meanes then,
I cannot lye, nor flatter.
Are. Ye must sweare too,
If ye be there.
Pon. I can sweare, if they move me.
Phi. Cannot ye forsweare too.
Pont. The Court for ever,
If it be growne so wicked.
Are. You should procure a little too,
Pont. What's that?
Mens honest sayings for my truth?
Are. Oh no Sir:
But womens honest actions for your triall.
Pon. Doe you doe all these things?
Phi. Doe you not like 'em?
Pon. Do ye aske me seriously, or trifle with me?
I am not so low yet, to be your mirth:
Are. You do mistake us Captain, for sincerely,
We aske you how you like 'em.
Pon. Then sincerely
I tell ye I abhor 'em: they are ill wayes,
And I will starve before I fall into 'em.
The doers of 'em wretches, their base hungers
Cares not whose bread they eate, nor how they get it:
Are. What then Sir?
Pon. If you professe this wickednesse:
Because ye have bin Souldiers, and borne Armes,
The servants of the brave Aecius,
And by him put to'th Emperor, give me leave,
Or I must take it else, to say ye are villaines,
For all your Golden Coates, debosht, base villaines,
Yet I doe weare a sword to tell ye so,
Is this the way you mark out for a Souldier,
A man that has commanded for the Empire,
And borne the reputation of a man? (cowards,
Are there not lazie things enough call'd fooles, and
And poore enough to be preferr'd for Banders,
But wanting Souldiers must be knave too? ha:
This the trim course of life: were not ye born Bawdes,
And so inherit but your rights? I am poore
And may expect a worse; yet digging, pruning,
Mending of broken wayes, carrying of water,
Planting of Worts, and Onyons, any thing
That's honest, and a mans, Ile rather choose,
I and live better on it, which is juster,
Drink my well gotten water, with more pleasure,
When my endeavours done, and wages payd me,
Then you doe wine, eate my course bread not curst,
And mend upon't, your diets are diseases,
And sleep as soundly, when my labour bids me,
As any forward Parider of ye all,
And rise a great deale honester; my Garments,
Though not as yours, the soft sins of the Empire,
Yet may be warme, and keep the biting wind out,
When every single breath of poore opinion
Finds you through all your Velvets.
Are. You have hit it,
Nor are we those we seeme, the Lord Aecius
Put us good men to'th Emperor, so we have serv'd him,
Though much neglected for it: So dare be still:
Your curses are not ours: we have seen your fortune,
But yet know no way to redeem it: Meanes,
Such as we have, ye shall not want brave Pontius,
But pray be temperate, if we can wipe out
The way of your offences, we are yours Sir;
And you shall live at Court an honest man too.
Phi. That little meat and means we have, wee'l share it,
Feare not to be as we are; what we told ye,
Were but meere tryalls of your truth: y'are worthie,
And so wee'l ever hold ye; suffer better,
And then ye are a right man Pontius,
If my good Master be not ever angry,
Ye shall command againe.
Pont. I have found two good men: use my life,
For it is yours, and all I have to thank ye——Exiunt.

Scæn. 3. Enter Maximus.

Max. Ther's no way else to doe it, he must die,
This friend must die, this foule of Maximus,
Without whom I am nothing but my shame,
This perfectnesse that keeps me from opinion,
Must dye, or I must live thus branded ever:
A hard choice, and a fatall; God's ye have given me
A way to credit, but the ground to goe on,
Ye have levelld with that pretious life I love most,
Yet I must on, and through; for if I offer
To take my way without him, like a Sea
He bares his high command, twix me and vengeance,
And in my owne road sinkes me, he is honest
Of a most constant loyaltie to Cæsar,
And when he shall but doubt, I dare attempt him,
But make a question of his ill, but say
What is a Cæsar, that he dare doe this,
Dead sure he cuts me off: Aecius dies,
Or I have lost my selfe? why should I kill him?
Why should I kill my selfe, for tis my killing,
Aecius is my roote, and whither him,
Like a decaying branch, I fall to nothing.
Is he not more to me, then wife, then Cæsar?

Though

Though I had now my ſafe revenge upon him,
Is he not more then rumour, and his freindſhip
Sweeter then the love of women? What is honor
We all ſo ſtrangly are bewitch'd withall?
Can it relieve me if I want? he has;
Can honor, twixt the incenſed Prince, and Envy,
Beare up the lives of worthy men? he has;
Can honor pull the wings of fearefull cowards
And make 'em turne againe like Tigers? he has,
And I have liv'd to ſee this, and preſerv'd ſo;
Why ſhould this empty word incite me then
To what is ill, and cruel? let her periſh.
A freind is more then all the world, then honor;
She is a woman and her loſſe the leſſe,
And with her go my greifs: but hark ye Maximus,
Was ſhe not yours? Did ſhe not dye to tell ye
She was a raviſh'd woman? did not juſtice
Nobly begin with her, that not deſerv'd it,
And ſhall ye live that did it? Stay a little,
Can this abuſe dye here? Shall not mens tongues Diſpute it afterward, and ſay I gave (Affecting dul obedience, and tame duty,
And led away with fondnes of a freindſhip)
The only vertue of the world to ſlander?
Is not this certaine, was not ſhe a chaſte one,
And ſuch a one, that no compare dwelt with her,
One of ſo ſweete a vertue, that Aecius,
Even he himſelfe, this freind that holds me from it,
Out of his worthy love to me, and juſtice,
Had it not been on Ceſar, h'ad reveng'd her?
By heaven he told me ſo; what ſhall I do then?—Enter a
Can other men affect it, and I cold? Servant.
I feare he muſt not live.
Serv. My Lord, the Generall
Is come to ſeeke ye.
Max. Go, intreate him to enter:
O brave Aecius, I could wiſh thee now
As far from freindſhip to me, as from feares,
That I might cut thee off, like that I weigh'd not,
Is there no way without him, to come neare it?
For out of honeſty he muſt deſtroy me
If I attempt it, he muſt dye as others,
And I muſt looſe him; tis neceſſity,
Only the time, and meanes is all the difference;
But yet I would not make a murther of him,
Take him directly for my doubts; he ſhall dye,
I have found a way to do it, and a ſafe one,
It ſhall be honor to him too: I know not
What to determine certaine, I am ſo troubled,
And ſuch a deale of conſcience preſſes me;——Enter
Would I were dead my ſelfe. Aecius.
Aeci. You run away well;
How got you from me freind?
Max. That that leads mad men,
A ſtrong *I*magination made me wander.
Aeci. I thought ye had been more ſetled.
Max. I am well,
But you muſt give me leave a little ſometimes
To have a buzzing in my braines.
Aeci. Ye are dangerous,
But Ile prevent it if I can; ye told me
You would go to'th Army.
Max. Why, to have my throat cut,
Muſt he not be the braveſt man Aecius
That ſtrikes me firſt?
Aeci. You promiſed me a freedom
From all theſe thoughts, and why ſhould any ſtrike you?
Max. I am an Enemy, a wicked one,
Worſe then the foes of Rome, I am a Coward,
A Cuckold, and a Coward, that's two cauſes
Why every one ſhould beat me.
Aeci. Ye are neither;
And durſt another tell me ſo, he dyde for't,
For thus far on mine honor, Ile aſſure you
No man more lov'd then you, and for your valour,
And what ye may be, faire; no man more follow'd.
Max. A doughty man indeed: but that's all one,
The Emperor, nor all the Princes living
Shall find a flaw in my coat; I have ſuffer'd,
And can yet; let them find inflictions,
Ile find a body for 'em, or Ile break it.
Tis not a wife can thruſt me out, ſome lookt for't;
But let 'em looke till they are blind with looking,
They are but fooles, yet there is anger in me,
That I would faine diſperſe, and now I think on't,
You told me freind the Provinces are ſtirring,
We ſhall have ſport I hope then, and what's dangerous,
A Battle ſhall beat from me.
Aeci. Why do ye eye me
With ſuch a ſetled looke?
Max. Pray tell me this,
Do we not love extremely? I love you ſo.
Aeci. If I ſhould ſay I lov'd not you as truly,
I ſhould do that I never durſt do, lye.
Max. If I ſhould dye, would it not greive you much?
Aeci. Without all doubt.
Max. And could you live without me?
Aeci. It would much trouble me to live without ye.
Our loves, and loving ſoules have been ſo us'd
But to one houſhold in us: But to dye
Becauſe I could not make you live, were woman
Far much too weake, were it to ſave your worth,
Or to redeeme your name from rooting out,
To quit you bravely fighting from the foe,
Or fetch ye off, where honor had ingag'd ye,
I ought, and would dye for ye.
Max. Truly ſpoken.
What beaſt but I, that muſt, could hurt this man now?
Would he had raviſh'd me, I would have payd him,
I would have taught him ſuch a trick, his Eunuches
Nor all his black-eyd boyes dreamt of yet;
By all the Gods I am mad now; Now were Ceſar
Within my reach, and on his glorious top
The pile of all the world, he went to nothing;
The deſtinies, nor all the dames of hell,
Were I once grappl'd with him, ſhould relieve him,
No not the hope of mankind more; all periſhed;
But this is words, and weakneſſe.
Aeci. Ye looke ſtrangely.
Max. I looke but as I am, I am a ſtranger.
Aeci. To me.
Max. To every one, I am no Romane;
Nor what I am do I know.
Aeci. Then Ile leave ye.
Max. I find I am beſt ſo, if ye meet with Maximus
Pray bid him be an honeſt man for my ſake,
You may do much upon him; for his ſhadow,
Let me alone.
Aeci. Ye were not wont to talke thus,
And to your freind; ye have ſome danger in you,
That willingly would run to action,
Take heed, by all our love take heed,
Max. I danger?
I, willing to do any thing, I dig.

Has

Has not my wife been dead two dayes already?
Are not my mournings by this time moath-eaten?
Are not her sins dispers'd to other women,
And many one ravish'd to relieve her?
Have I shed teares these twelve houres?
Aeci. Now ye weepe.
Max. Some lazie drops that staid behind.
Aeci. Ile tell ye
And I must tell ye truth, were it not hazard,
And almost certaine losse of all the Empire,
I would wyne with ye: were it any mans
But his life, that is life of us, he lost it
For doing of this mischeife: I would take it,
And to your rest give ye a brave revenge:
But as the rule now stands, and as he rules,
And as the Nations hold in disobedience,
One pillar failing, all must fall; I dare not:
Nor is it just you should be suffer'd in it,
Therefore againe take heed: On forraigne foes
We are our own revengers, but at home
On Princes that are eminent and ours,
Tis fit the Gods should judge us: Be not rash,
Nor let your angry steele cut those ye know not,
For by this fatall blow, if ye dare strike it,
As I see great aymes in ye, those unborne yet,
And those to come of them and these succeeding Shall bleed the wrath of Maximus: For me
As ye now beare your selfe, I am your freind still,
If ye fall off I will not flatter ye,
And in my hands, were ye my soule, you perish'd:
Once more be carefull, stand, and still be worthy,
Ile leave ye for this howre.——————Exit.
Max. Pray do, tis done:
And freindship, since thou canst not hold in dangers,
Give me a certaine ruin, I must through it. Exit.

Actus Quartus. Scæna prima.

Enter Emperor, Lycinius, Chilax, and Balbus.

Empe. Dead?
Chil. So tis thought Sir.
Empe. How?
Lyci. Greife, and disgrace,
As people say.
Empe. No more, I have too much on't,
Too much by you, you whetters of my follies,
Ye Angell formers of my sins, but devills;
Where is your cunning now? you would worke wonders,
There was no chastity above your practise,
You would undertake to make her love her wrongs,
And doate upon her rape: mark what I tell ye,
If she be dead——
Chil. Alas Sir.
Empe. Hang ye rascalls,
Ye blasters of my youth, if she be gon,
T'wer better ye had been your fathers Camells,
Ground under dayly waights of wood and water:
Am I not Cæsar?
Lyci. Mighty and our maker:
Empe. Then thus have given my pleasures to destruction.
Looke she be living slaves.
Empe. We are no Gods Sir,
If she be dead, to make her new againe.
Empe. She cannot dye, she must not dye; are those
I plant my love upon but common livers?
Their howses as others, told 'em? can they be ashes?
Why do ye flatter a belieſe into me
That I am all that's, the world's my creature,
The Trees bring forth their fruits when I say Summer,
The Wind, that kdowes no limit but his wildnesse,
At my command moves not a leafe; The sea
With his proud mountaine waters envying heaven,
When I say still, run into christall mirrors,
Can I do this and she dye? Why ye bubbles
That with my least breath break, no more remembred;
Ye moaths that fly about my flame and perish,
Ye golden cancker-wormes, that eate my honors,
Living no longer then my spring of favour:
Why do ye make me God that can do nothing?
Is she not dead?
Chil. All women are not with her.
Empe. A common whore serves you, and far above ye,
The pleasures of a body lam'd with lewdnesse;
A meare perpetuall motion makes ye happy:
Am I a man to traffique with diseases?
Can any but a chastity serve Cæsar?
And such a one the Gods would kneele to purchase?
You think because you have breed me up to pleasures,
And almost run me over all the rare ones,
Your wives will serve the turne: I care not for 'em,
Your wives are Fencers whores, and shall be Footmens,
Though sometimes my nyce will, or rather anger
Have made ye Cuckolds for variety;
I would not have ye hope, nor dreame ye poore ones
Alwaies so great a blessing from me; go
Get your own infamy hereafter rascalls,
I have done too nobly for ye, ye enjoy
Each one an heire, the royall seed of Cæsar,
And I may curse ye for't; your wanton Gennets
That are so proud, the wind get's 'em with fillies,
Taught me this foule intemperance: Thou Lycinius
Hast such a Messalina, such a Lais,
The backs of bulls cannot content, nor Stallions,
The sweate of fifty men a night do's nothing.
Lyci. Your Grace but jests I hope.
Empe. Tis Oracle.
The sins of other women put by hers
Shew off like sanctities: Thin's a foole Chilax,
Yet she can tell to twenty, and all lovers,
And all lien with her too, and all as she is,
Rotten, and ready for an hospitall.
Yours is a holy whore freind Balbus.
Bal. Well Sir.
Empe. One that can pray away the sins she suffers,
But not the punishments: She has had ten bastards,
Five of 'em now are lictors, yet she praies;
She has been the song of Rome, and common Pasquill;
Since I durst see a wench, she was Campe mistris,
And musterd all the cohorts, paid 'em too,
They have it yet to shew, and yet she prayes;
She is now to enter old men that are children,
And have forgot their rudiments: am I
Left for these withered vices? and but one,
But one of all the world that could content me,
And snatch'd away in shewing? If your wives
Be not yet witches, or your selves, now be so
And save your lives, raise me this noble beauty
As when I fore'd her, full of constancy,
Or by the Gods——
Lyci. Most sacred Cæsar.
Empe. Slaves.

Lyci.

Lycias. Good Proculus:
Pro. By heaven you shall not see it,
It may concerne the Empire.
Empr. Ha: what said'st thou?
Is she not dead?
Pro. Not any one I know Sir;
I come to bring your Grace a letter, here
Scatterd belike i'th Court: Tis sent to Maximus,
And bearing danger in it.
Emp. Danger? where?
Double our Guard.
Pro. Nay no where, but i'th letter.
Emp. What an afflicted conscience doe I live with,
And what a beast I am growne? I had forgotten
To aske heaven mercy for my fault, and was now
Even ravishing againe her memory,
I find there must be danger in this deed:
Why doe I stand disputing, then and whining?
For what is not the gods? to give they cannot (chiefe.
Though they would linck their powers in one do mis-
This Letter may betray me, get ye gon ——Exeunt.
And waite me in the Garden, guard the house well,
And keep this from the Empresse; The name Maximus
Runnes through me like a feavour, this may be
Some private Letter upon private businesse,
Nothing concerning me: why should I open't?
I have done him wrong enough already; yet
It may concerne me too, the time so tells me;
The wicked deed I have done, assures me tis so.
Be what it will, ile see it, if that be not Part of my feares, among my other sins,
Ile purge it out in prayers:
How? what's this?
Letter red. Lord Maximus, you love Aecius,
And are his noble friend too; bid him be lesse,
I meane lesse with the people, times are dangerous:
The Army's his, the Emperor in doubts;
And as some will not stick to say, declining,
You stand a constant man in either fortunes;
Perswade him, he is lost else: Though ambition
Be the last sin he touches at, or never;
Yet what the people made with loving him,
And as they willingly desire another
May tempt him too, or rather force his goodnesse,
Is to be doubted mainly: be is all,
(As he stands now) but the meer name of Cæsar,
And should the Emperor inforce him lesser,
Not comming from himselfe, it were more dangerous:
He is honest, and will beare you: doubts are scatterd,
And almost come to growth in every household:
Yet in my foolish judgment, were this mastered;
The people that are now but rage, and his,
Might be againe obedience: you shall know me,
When Rome is faire againe; till when I love you.
No name! this may be cunning, yet it seemes not;
For there is nothing in it but is certain,
Besides my safety.
Had not good Germanicus,
That was as loyall, and as straight as he is,
If not prevented by Tiberius,
Bin by the Souldiers forced their Emperor?
He had, and tis my wisdom to remember it.
And was not Corbulo, even that Corbulo,
That ever fortunate and living Roman,
That broake the heart strings of the Parthians,
And brought Arsaces line upon their knees,
Chaind to the awe of Rome, because he was thought
(And but in wine once) fit to make a Cæsar,
Cut off by Nero? I must seeke my safety:
For tis the same againe, if not beyond it;
I know the Souldier loves him more then heaven,
And will adventure all his gods to raise him;
Me he hates more then peace: what this may breed,
If dull security and confidence
Let him grow up, a fooke may find, and haught at.
But why Lord Maximus I injurd so,
Should be the man to councell him, I know not;
More then he has been friend, and lov'd allegeance:
What now he is I feare, for his abuses
Without the people dare draw bloud; who waits there?
Servant. Your Grace. ——Enter a Servant.
Emp. Call Phidias and Aretus hither:
Ile finde a day for him too; times are dangerous,
The Army his, the Emperor in doubts:
I find it is too true; did he not tell me
1. As if he had intent to make me odious,
2. And to my face; and by a way of terror,
What vices I was grounded in, and almost proclaimd the Souldiers hate against me? is not
The sacred name and dignity of Cæsar
(Were this Aecius more then man) sufficient
To shake off all his honesty? Hee's dangerous
Though he be good, and though a friend, a feard one,
And such I must not sleep by: are they come yet?
I doe beleeve this fellow, and I thank him;
T'was time to look about, if I must perish,
Yet shall my feares goes foremost.
——Enter Phidias, and Aretus.
Phi. Life to Cæsar:
Emp. Is Lord Æcius waiting?
Phi. Not this morning,
I rather think hee's with the Army,
Emp. Army?
I doe not like that Army: goe unto him,
And bid him straight attend me, and doe ye heare,
Come private, without any; I have businesse
Only for him.
Phi. Your Graces pleasure ——Exit Phidias.
Emp. Goe;
What Souldier is the same, I have seene him often,
That keepes you company Aretus?
Are. Me Sir?
Emp. I you Sir.
Are. One they call Pontius,
And't please your Grace.
Emp. A Captaine?
Are. Yes, he was so;
But speaking somthing roughly in his want,
Especially of warres, the noble Generall
Out of a strict allegiance cast his fortunes;
Emp. Ha's been a valiant fellow.
Are. So hee's still.
Emp. Alas, the Generall might have pardond follies,
Souldiers will talke sometimes.
Are. I am glad of this.
Emp. He wants preferment as I take it;
Are. Yes Sir;
And for that noble Grace his life shall serve.
Emp. I have a service for him:
I shame a Souldier should become a Begger;
I like the man Aretus.
Are. Gods protect ye:
Emp. Bid him repaire to Proculus, and there
He shall receive the businesse, and reward for't.

Ile see him setled too, and as a Souldier,
We shall want such.
The sweets of Heaven still crowne yee,
I have a fearefull darkenesse in my soule,
And till I be delivered, still am dying.——Exeunt.

Scæn. 2. Enter Maximus alone.

Max. My way has taken: all the Court's in guard,
And businesse every where, and every corner
Full of strange whispers: I am least in rumour, Enter Aecius and Phidias.
And so Ile keep my selfe. Here comes Aecius
I see the bait is swallow'd: if he be lost
He is my Martyr, and my way stands open,
And honour on thy head, his blood is reckond. (armd:
Aec. Why how now friend, what make ye here unAre ye turnd Merchant?
Max. By your faire perswasions,
And such a Marchant trafficks without danger;
I have forgotten all Aecius,
And which is more, forgiven.
Aec. Now I love ye,
Truly I doe, ye are a worthy Roman.
Max. The faire repentance of my Prince to me
Is more then sacrifice of blood and vengeance,
No eyes shall weep her ruins, but mine owne.
Aec. Still ye take more love from me: vertuous friend
The gods make poore Aecius worthy of thee:
Max. Only in me y'are poore Sir: and I worthy
Only in being yours:
But why your arme thus,
Have ye bin hurt Aecius?
Aec. Bruisd a little:
My horse fell with me friend: which till this morning
I never knew him doe.
Max. Pray gods it boade well;
And now I think on't better, ye shall back,
Let my perswasions rule ye.
Aec. Back, why Maximus?
The Emperor commands me come.
Max. I like not
At this time his command.
Aec. I doe at all times,
And all times will obey it, why not now then?
Max. Ile tell ye why, and as I have bin governd,
Be you so noble Friend: The Courts in Guard,
Armd strongly, for what purpose, let me feare;
I doe not like your going.
Aec. Were it fire;
And that fire certain to consume this body,
If Cæsar sent, I would goe; never feare man,
If he take me, he takes his armes away.
I am too plaine and true to be suspected.
Max. Then I have dealt unwisely,
Aec. If the Emperor,
Because he meerely may, will have my life,
That's all he has to worke on, and all shall have:
Let him, 'a loves me better: here I wither,
And happily may live, till ignorantly
I run into a fault worth death: nay more, dishonour.
Now all my sinnes, I dare say those of duty
Are printed here, and if I fall so happy,
I blesse the grave, I lye in, and the gods
Equall, as dying on the Enemy,
Must take me up a Sacrifice.
Max. Goe on then,
And Ile goe with ye.
Aec. No, ye may not friend.
Max. He cannot be a friend, bars me Aecius,
Shall I forsake ye in my doubts?
Aec. Ye must.
Max. I must not, nor I will not; have I liv'd
Only to be a Carpet friend for pleasure?
I can endure a death as well as Cato.
Aec. There is no death nor danger in my going,
Nor none must goe along.
Max. I have a sword too,
And once I could have us'd it for my friend.
Aec. I need no sword, nor friend in this, pray leave me;
And as ye love me, do not overlove me;
I am commanded none shall come: At supper
Ile meet ye, and weele drink a cup or two,
Ye need good Wine, ye have bin sad: Farwell.
Max. Farwell my noble Friend, let me embrace ye Ere ye depart; it may be one of us
Shall never doe the like agen.
Aec. Yes often:
Max. Farwell good deer Aecius.
Aec. Farwell Maximus
Till night: indeed you doubt too much.—Exit.
Max. I doe not:
Goe worthy innocent, and make the number
Of Cæsars sinnes so great, heaven may want mercy:
Ile hover hereabout to know what passes:
And if he be so divelish to destroy thee,
In thy blood shall begin his Tragedy.——Exit.

Scæn. 3. Enter Proculus, and Pontius.

Pro. Besides this, if you do it, you enjoy
The noble name Patrician: more than that too,
The Friend of Cæsar ye are still: ther's nothing
Within the hopes of Rome, or present being
But you may safely say is yours.
Pon. Pray stay Sir;
What has Aecius done to be destroyd?
At least I would have a colour.
Pro. Ye have more,
Nay all that may be given, he is a Traitor,
One, any man would strike that were a subject,
Pon. Is he so fowle?
Pro. Yes, a most fearefull Traytor.
Pon. A fearefull plague upon thee, for thou lyest;
I ever thought the Souldier would undoe him
With his too much affection.
Pro. Ye have hit it,
They have brought him to ambition.
Pon. Then he is gone:
Pro. The Emperor out of a foolish pitie,
Would save him yet.
Pon. Is he so mad?
Pro. He's madder!
Would goe to'th Army to him.
Pon. Would'a so?
Pro. Yes Pontius; but we consider——
Pon. Wisely;
Pro. How else man, that the state lies in it,
Pon. And your lives too:
Pro. And every mans.
Pon. He did me
All the disgrace he could

Pro.

Pro. And ſcurvily,
Pon. Out of a miſchiefe meerly: did you mark it?
Yes well enough.
Pro. Now ye have meanes to quit it,
The deed done, take his place.
Pon. Pray let me thinke on't,
Tis ten to one I doe it.
Pro. Doe and be happy.——Exit Pro.
Pon. This Emperor is made of naught but miſchiefe,
Sure, Murther was his Mother: none to lop,
But the maine linck he had? upon my conſcience
The man is truly honeſt, and that kills him;
For to live here, and ſtudy to be true,
Is all one to be Traitors: why ſhould he die?
Have they not Slaves and Raſcalls for their Offrings
In full abundance; Bawds more then beaſts for ſlaughter?
Have they not ſinging whores enough, and knaves too,
And millions of ſuch Martyrs to ſink Charon,
But the beſt ſons of Rome muſt faile too? I wil ſhew him (ſince he muſt dye) a way to doe it truly:
And though he beares me hard, yet ſhall he know,
I am born to make him bleſſe me for a blow.——Exit.

Scæn. 2. Enter Phidias, Aretus, and Æcius.

Phi. Yet ye may ſcape to'th Camp, wee'l hazard with ye,
Aretus Looſe not your life ſo baſely Sir: ye are armd,
And many when they ſee your ſword out, and know why
Muſt follow your adventure.
Aec. Get ye from me:
Is not the doom of Ceſar on this body,
Doe not I beare my laſt houre here, now ſent me?
Am I not old Aecius, ever dying?
You think this tenderneſſe and love you bring me,
Tis treaſon, and the ſtrength of diſobedience,
And if ye tempt me further, ye ſhall feele it:
I ſeek the Camp for ſafety, when my death
Ten times more glorious then my life, and laſting
Bids me be happie: Let the foole feare dying,
Or he that weds a woman for his honour,
Dreaming no other life to come but kiſſes;
Æcius is not now to learne to ſuffer:
If ye dare ſhew a juſt affection, kill me,
I ſtay but thoſe that muſt: why do ye weep?
Am I ſo wretched to deſerve mens pities?
Goe give your teares to thoſe that loſe their worths,
Bewaile their miſeries, for me wear Garlands.
Drink wine, and much; ſing Peans to my praiſe,
I am to triumph friends, and more then Ceſar,
For Ceſar feares to die, I love to die.
Phi. O my deare Lord!
Aec. No more, goe, goe I ſay;
Shew me not ſignes of ſorrow, I deſerve none:
Dare any man lament, I ſhould die nobly;
Am I grown old to have ſuch enemies?
When I am dead, ſpeake honourably of me,
That is, preſerve my memory from dying;
There if you needs muſt weep your ruind Maſter,
A teare or two will ſeem well: this I charge ye,
(becauſe ye ſay you yet love old Aecius)
See my poore body burnt, and ſome to ſing
About my Pile, and what I have done and ſuffer'd,
If Ceſar kill not that too: at your banquets
When I am gone, if any chance to number
The times that have been ſad and dangerous,
Say how I fell, and tis ſufficient:
No more I ſay, he that laments my end
By all the gods diſhonours me; be gone
And ſodainly, and wiſely from my dangers,
My death is catching elſe.
Phi. We feare not dying:
Aec. Yet feare a wilfull death, the juſt Gods hate it,
I need no company to that that children
Dare doe alone, and Slaves are proud to purchaſe;
Live till your honeſties, as mine has done,
Make this corrupted age ſicke of your vertues,
Then dye a ſacrifice, and then ye know
The noble uſe of dying well, and Roman.
Are. And muſt we leave ye Sir?
Aec. We muſt all die
All leave our ſelves, it matters not, where, when,
Nor how, ſo we die well: and can that man that does ſo
Need lamentation for him? Children weep
Becauſe they have offended, or for feare,
Women for want of will, and anger; is there
In noble man, that truly feeles both poyſes
Of life and death, ſo much of this wet weakneſſe,
To drown a glorious death in child and woman?
I am a ſhamd to ſee ye; yet ye move me,
And were it not my manhood would accuſe me,
For covetous to live, I ſhould weep with ye.
Phi. O we ſhall never ſee you more:
Aec. Tis true;
Nor I the miſeries that Rome ſhall ſuffer,
Which is a benefit life cannot reckon:
But what I have been, which is juſt, and faithfull;
One that grew old for Rome, when Rome forgot him,
And for he was an honeſt man durſt die,
Ye ſhall have daily with ye: could that dye too,
And I returne no trafficke of my travells,
No pay to have bin Souldier, but this ſilver,
No Annalls of Æcius, but he liv'd,
My friends ye had cauſe to weep, and bitterly;
The common overflowes of tender women,
And children new borne crying, were too little
To ſhew me then moſt wretched: if teares muſt be,
I ſhould in juſtice weep 'em, and for you,
You are to live, and yet behold thoſe ſlaughters
The drie, and witherd bones of death would bleed at:
But ſooner, then I have time to thinke what muſt bee,
I feare you'l find what ſhall be;
If ye love me,
Let that word ſerve for all; be gone and leave me;
I have ſome little practiſe with my ſoule,
And then the ſharpeſt ſword is welcom'ſt; goe,
Pray be gon, ye have obeyd me living,
Be not for ſhame now ſtubborn; ſo I thank ye,
And faryewell, a better fortune guide yee——
Exeunt Phi. and Aretius.
I am a little thirſtie, not for feare,
And yet it is a kind of feare, I ſay ſo;
Is it to be a juſt man now againe,
And leave my fleſh unthought of, tis departed;
I heare 'em come, who ſtrikes firſt?
I ſtay for ye:
——Enter Balbus, Chilax, Lycinius.
Yet I will dye a Souldier, my ſword drawne,
But againſt none:
Why doe ye feare? come forward,
Bal. You were a Souldier Chilax,
Chil. Yes, I muſterd
But never ſaw the Enemy.
Lyc. Hee's drawne,

By heaven I dare not doe it.
Aec. Why doe ye tremble?
I am to die, come ye not now from Cesar,
To that end, speake?
Bal. We doe, and we must kill ye,
Tis Cesars will.
Chil. I charge you put your sword up,
That we may doe it handsomly.
Aec. Ha, ha, ha,
My sword up, handsomly where were ye bred?
Ye are the merriest murderers my masters
I ever met withall; Come forward fooles,
Why doe ye stare? upon mine honour Bawds,
I will not strike ye.
Lyc. Ile not be first,
Bal. Nor I;
Chil. You had best die quietly: the Emperour
Sees how you beare your selfe,
Aec. I would die Rascalls,
If you would kill me quietly,
Bal.——of Proculus,
He promisd us to bring a Captaine hither,
That has been used to kill.
Aec. Ile call the Guard,
Vnlesse you will kill me quickly, and proclaim
What beastly, base, and cowardly companions,
The Emperor has trusted with his safetie:
Nay Ile give out, ye fell of my side, villaines.
Strike home ye bawdy slave.
Chil. By heaven he will kill us,
I markd his hand, he waits but time to reach us,
Now doe you offer.
Aec. If ye doe mangle me,
And kill me not at two blowes, or at three,
Or not so stagger me, my sences faile me,
Look to your selves.
Chil. I told ye,
Aec. Strike me manly,
And take a thousand strokes.——Enter Pontius.
Bal. Heer's Pontius.
Pon. Not kild him yet?
Is this the love ye beare the Emperor? (runs away
Nay then I see yee are Traitors all, have at yee——Lyc.
Chil. Oh I am hurt,
Balb. And I am kild——Exeunt Chil. and Bal.
Pon. Dye Bawdes;
As ye have liv'd and flourish'd.
Aec. Wretched fellow,
What hast thou done?
Pon. Kild them that durst not kill,
And you are next.
Aec. Art thou not Pontius?
Pon. I am the same you cast Aetius,
And in the face of all the Camp disgraced.
Aec. Then so much nobler, as thou wert a Souldier,
Shall my death be: is it revenge provoked thee,
Or art thou hir'd to kill me?
Pon. Both,
Aec. Then doe it.
Pon. Is that all?
Aec. Yes,
Pon. Would you not live?
Aec. Why should I,
To thanke thee for my life?
Pon. Yes, if I spare it,
Aec. Be not deceiv'd, I was not made to thank
For any curtesie, but killing me,
A fellow of thy fortune; doe thy duty.
Pon. Doe not you feare me?
Aec. No.
Pon. Nor love me for it?
Aec. That's as thou dost thy businesse,
Pon. When you are dead,
Your place is mine Aecius.
Aec. Now I feare thee,
And not alone thee Pontius, but the Empire,
Pon. Why, I can governe Sir;
Aec. I would thou couldst,
And first thy selfe: Thou canst fight well, and bravely,
Thou canst endure all dangers, heates, colds, hungers;
Heavens angry flashes are not sodainer,
Then I have seene thee execute; nor more mortall;
The winged feete of flying enemies
I have stood and viewd thee mow away like rushes,
And still kill the killer: were thy minde,
But halfe so sweet in peace, as rough in dangers,
I died to leave a happy heire behind me;
Come strike, and be a Generall.
Pon. Prepare then:
And for I see your honour cannot lessen,
And 'twere a shame for me to strike a dead man,
Fight your short span out.
Aec. No thou knowst I must not,
I dare not give thee so much vantage of me,
As disobedience;
Pon. Dare ye not defend ye,
Against your enemy?
Aec. Not sent from Cesar,
I have no power to make such enemies;
For as I am condemn'd, my naked sword
Stands but a hatchment by me; only held
To shew I was a Souldier; had not Cesar
Chaind all defence in this doom, let him die,
Old as I am, and quenchd with scarres, and sorrowes,
Yet would I make this witherd Arme do wonders,
And open in an enemy such wounds
Mercy would weep to look on.
Pon. Then have at ye,
And look upon me, and be sure ye feare not:
Remember who you are, and why you live,
And what I have been to you: cry not hold,
Nor think it base injustice I should kill ye.
Aec. I am prepard for all,
Pon. For now Aecius,
Thou shalt behold and find I was no traitor, (himselfe
And as I doe it, blesse me; die as I doe.——Pontius kills
Aec. Thou hast deceiv'd me Pontius, and I thank thee;
By all my hopes in heaven, thou art a Roman.
Pon. To shew you what you ought to doe, this is not;
For slanders selfe would shame to find you coward,
Or willing to out-live your honestie:
But noble Sir, ye have been jealous of me,
And held me in the rancks of dangerous persons,
And I must dying say it was but justice,
Ye cast me from my credit; yet believe me,
For there is nothing now but truth to save me,
And your forgivenesse, though ye held me heinous,
And of a troubled spirit, that like fire
Turnes all to flames it meets with, ye mistook me;
If I were foe to any thing, t'was ease,
Want of the Souldiers doe, the Enemy,
The nakednesse we found at home, and scorne,
Children of peace, and pleasure, no regard
Nor comfort for our scarres, but how we got 'em,

To rusty time, that eate our bodies up,
And even began to prey upon our honours,
To wants at home, and more then wants, abuses
To them, that when the Enemy invaded
Made us their Saints, but now the sinnes of Rome;
To silken flattery, and pride plaind over,
Forgetting with what wind their feathers saile,
And under whose protection their soft pleasures
Grow full and numberlesse: to this I am for,
Not to the state, or any point of duty:
And let me speake but what a Souldier may,
Truly I ought to be so; yet I erre,
Because a far more noble sufferer
Shewd me the way to patience, and I lost it:
This is the end I die Sir; to live basely,
And not the follower of him that bred me,
In full account and vertue Ponius dare not,
Much lesse to out-live what is good, and flatter.
Aec. I want a name to give thy vertue Souldier,
For only good is farre below thee Ponius,
The gods shall find thee one; thou hast fashiond death,
In such an excellent, and beauteous manner,
I wonder men can live: Canst thou speake once more,
For thy words are such harmony, a soule
Would choose to flye to heaven in Pon. A farewell:
Good noble Generall your hand, forgive me,
And think what ever was displeasing you,
Was none of mine: ye cannot live.
Aec. I will not:
Yet one word more.
Pon. Dye nobly: Rome farewell:
And Valentinian fall, thou hast broke thy bailes,
In joy ye have given me a quiet death, (he dyes.
I would strike more wounds, if I had more breath——
Aec. Is there an houre of goodnesse beyond this?
Or any man would out-live such a dying
Would Cæsar double all my honours on me,
And stick me ore with favours, like a Mistris;
Yet would I grow to this man: I have loved,
But never doated on a face till now:
O death thou art more than beautie, and thy pleasure
Beyond posterity: Come friends and kill me;
Cæsar be kind, and send a thousand swords,
The more, the greater is my fall: why stay ye?
Come, and Ile kisse your weapons: feare me not,
By all the gods Ile honour ye for killing:
Appeare, or through the Court, and world, Ile search ye:
My sword is gone; ye are Traitors if ye spare me,
And Cæsar must consume ye, all base cowards?
Ile follow ye, and ere I dye proclaime ye,
The weeds of Italy; the drosse of nature ——Exit.
Where are ye, villaines, traytors, slaves.——
Enter Proculus, and 3. others running over the Stage.
Pro. I knew
H'ad killd the Captain,
1. Here's his sword.
Pro. Let it alone, 'twill fight it selfe else; friends,
An hundred men are not enough to doe it,
Ile to the Emperor, and get more ayd.
Aec. None strike a poore condemnd man.
Pro. He is mad:
Shift for your selves my masters.——Exeunt.
Aec. Then Æcius, ——Enter Aecius.
See what thou darst thy selfe; hold my good sword,
Thou hast been kept from bloud too long, Ile kisse thee,
For thou art more then friend now, my preserver,
Shew me the way to happinesse, I seeke it:
And all you great ones, that have falne as I do,
To keep your memories, and honours living,
Be present in your vertues, and assist me,
That like strong Cato, I may put away
All promises, but what shall crown my ashes;
Rome, farthee well: stand long, and know to conquer
Whilst there is people, and ambition:
Now for a stroak shall turne me to a Star:
I come ye blessed spirits, make me room
To live for ever in Elizium:
Doe men feare this? O that posterity
Could learne from him but this, that loves his wound,
There is no paine at all in dying well, (kills himselfe.
Nor none are lost, but those that make their hell——
——Enter Proculus and two others,
1. Within. Hee's dead, draw in the Guard againe,
Pro. Hee's dead indeed,
And I am glad hee's gone; he was a devill:
His body, if his Eunuches come, is theirs;
The Emperor out of his love to vertue, (——Exit.
Has given 'em that: Let no man stop their entrance.
——Enter Phidias and Aretus.
Phi. O my most Noble Lord, look here Aretus, Heer's a sad sight.
Are. O cruelty! O Cæsar,
O times that bring forth nothing but destruction,
And overflowes of bloud: why wa'st thou kild?
Is it to be a just man now againe,
As when Tiberius and wild Nero raignd,
Only assurance of his over-throw?
Phil. It is Aretus: he that would live now,
Must like the Toad, feed only on corruptions,
And grow with those to greatnesse: honest vertue,
And the true Roman honour, faith and valour
That have been all the riches of the Empire,
Now like the fearefull tokens of the Plague,
Are meer fore-runners of their ends that owe'em.
Are. Never enough lamented Lord: deer master—Enter
Of whom now shall we learn to live like men? Maximus.
From whom draw out our actions just, and worthy:
Oh thou art gone, and gone with thee all goodnesse,
The great example of all equitie,
O thou alone a Roman, thou art perisht,
Faith, fortitude, and constant nobleneſſe,
Weep Rome, weep Italy, weep all that knew him,
And you that feard him as a noble Foe,
(If Enemies have hon ourable teares)
Weep this decayd Aecius falne, and scatterd——
By foule, and base suggestion.
Pho. O Lord Maximus,
This was your worthy friend.
Max. The gods forgive me:
Think not the worse my friends, I shed not teares,
Great griefes lament within; yet now I have found'em:
Would I had never knowne the world, not women,
Nor what that curst name of honour was,
So this were once againe Aecius:
But I am destin'd to a mighty action,
And begge my pardon friend, my vengance taken,
I will not be long from thee: ye have a great losse,
But beare it patiently, yet to say truth
In justice tis not sufferable: I am next,
And were it now, I would be glad out: friends,
Who shall preserve you now?
Are. Nay we are lost too.
Max. I feare ye are, for likely such as love

The man that's falne, and have been nouriſhd by him,
Doe not ſtay long behind: Tis held no wiſdom,
I know what I muſt doe ô my Ætius,
Canſt thou thus periſh, pluckt up by the rootes,
And no man feele thy worthineſſe? From boyes
He bred you both I think.
Phi. And from the pooreſt,
Max. And lov'd ye as his owne,
Are. We found it Sir.
Max. Is not this a loſſe then?
Phi. O, a loſſe of loſſes;
Our lives, and ruines of our families,
The utter being nothing of our names,
Were nothing neere it.
Max. As I take it too,
He put ye to the Emperor.
Are. He did ſo,
Max. And kept ye ſtill in credit.
Phi. Tis moſt true Sir;
Max. He fed your Fathers too, and made them meanes,
Your Siſters he preferd to Noble Wedlocks,
Did he not friends?
Are. Oh yes Sir:
Max. As I take it
This worthy man would not be now forgotten,
I tell ye to my griefe, he was baſely murdred;
And ſomething would be done, by thoſe that lov'd him:
And ſomething may be: pray ſtand off a little.
Let me bewaile him private: ô my deareſt.
Phi. Aretus, if we be not ſodaine, he out does us,
I know he points at vengance; we are cold,
And baſe ungratefull wretches, if we ſhun it:
Are we to hope for more rewards, or greatneſſe,
Or any thing but death, now he is dead?
Dar'ſt thou reſolve?
Are. I am perfect.
Phi. Then like flowers
That grew together all wee'l fall together,
And with us that that bore us: when tis done
The world ſhall ſtile us two deſerving ſervants:
I feare he will be before us.
Are. This night Phidias:
Phi. No more.
Max. Now worthy friends I have done my mournings
Let's burn this Noble body: Sweetes as many
As ſun-burnt: Neroe breeds, Ile make a flame of Shall reach his ſoule in heaven: he that ſhall live
Ten ages hence, but to reherſe this ſtory,
Shall with the ſad diſcourſe on't, darken Heaven,
And force the painefull burdens from the wombs
Conceivd a new with ſorrow: even the Grave
Where mighty Sylla ſleeps ſhall rend aſunder
And give her ſhadow up, to come and groane
About our piles, which will be more, and greater
Then greene Olimpus, Ida, or old Latmus
Can feed with Cedar, or the Eaſt with Gums,
Greece with her wines, or Theſſalie with flowers,
Or willing heaven can weep for in her ſhowres. Exeunt.

Actus Quintus. Scæna prima.

Enter Phidias with his dagger in him, and Aretius poyſond.

Are. HE h'as his laſt.
Phi. Then come the worſt of danger;
Ætius to thy ſoule we give a Ceſar,
How long is't ſince ye gave it him?
Are. An houre,
Mine owne two houres before him: how it boyles mee!
Phi. It was not to be cur'd I hope.
Are. No Phidias,
I delt above his Antidotes: Phyſicians
May finde the cauſe, but where the cure?
Phi. Done bravely,
We are got before his Tyrrany Aretus.
Are. We had loſt our worthieſt end els Phidias:
Phi. Canſt thou hold out a while?
Are. To torture him
Anger would give me leave, to live an age yet;
That man is poorely ſpirited, whoſe life
Runs in his bloud alone, and not in's wiſhes.
And yet I ſwell, and burne like flaming Ætna,
A thouſand new found fires are kindled in me,
But yet I muſt not die this foure houres Phidias.
Phi. Remember who dies with thee, and deſpiſe death.
Are. I need no exhortation, the joy in me
Of what I have done, and why, makes poyſon pleaſure,
And my moſt killing torments miſtreſſes.
For how can he have time to dye, or pleaſure
That falls as fooles unſatisfied, and ſimple?
Phi. This that conſumes my life, yet keeps it in me,
Nor doe I feele the danger of a dying,
And if I but endure to heare the curſes
Of this fell Tyrant dead, I have halfe my heaven.
Are. Hold thy ſoule faſt but foure houres Phidias,
And thou ſhalt ſee to wiſhes beyond ours,
Nay more beyond our meanings.
Phi. Thou haſt ſteeld me:
Farwell Aretus, and the ſoules of good men,
That as ours doe, have left their Roman bodies
In brave revenge for vertue, guide our ſhadowes.
I would not faint yet.
Are. Farwell Phidias (ſeverally.
And as we have done nobly, gods look on us.—Exeunt

Scæn. 2. Enter Lycias, and Proculus.

Lycias Sicker, and ſicker Proculus?
Pro. Oh Lycias,
What ſhall become of us? would we had dide
With happy Chilax, or with Balbus, bedrid——Enter
And made too lame for juſtice. Lycinius,
Lycinius. The ſoft Muſick;
And let one ſing to faſten ſleep upon him:
Oh friends, the Emperor.
Pro. What ſay the Doctors?
Lycin. For us a moſt ſad ſaying, he is poyſond,
Beyond all cure too.
Lyc. Who?
Lycin. The wretch Aretus,
That moſt unhappy villaine.
Lyc. How doe you know it?
Lyci. He gave him drink laſt: let's diſperſe and find him;
And ſince he has opend miſery to all,
Let it begin with him firſt: Softly he ſlumbers.

——Enter Emperor ſicke in a Chaire, with Eudoxia, the Empreſſe, and Phyſitians, and Attendants.

Muſick and Song.

Care charming ſleep, thou eaſer of all woes,
Brother to death, ſweetly thy life diſpoſe
On this afflicted Prince, fall like a Cloud
In gentle ſhowres, give nothing that is lowd,

Or.

Or painfull to her slumbers; easie, sweet,
And as a purling stream, thou son of night,
Passe by his troubled senses; sings his paine
Like hollow murmuring Winds, or silver Rayne?
Into this gently, Oh gently slide,
And kisse him into slumbers like a Bride.

Emp. Oh gods, gods: drink, drink, colder, colder
Then snow on Scythian Mountaines: ô my heart strings.
Eudox. How do's your Grace.
Phis. The Empresse speakes Sir;
Emp. Dying,
Dying Eudoxa, dying.
Phys. Good Sir patience;
Eudox. What have ye given him?
Phys. Pretious things deere Lady
We hope shall comfort him.
Emp. O flatterd foole,
See what thy god-heads come to: Oh Eudoxa.
Eudox. O patience, patience Sir. ——Enter Proculus, Licinius with Arotus.
Emp. Danubius,
Ile have brought through my body.
Eudox. Gods give comfort.
Em. And Volga, on whose face the North freezes,
And an hundred hells, an hundred Piles
Already to my Funeralls are flaming,
Shall I not drink?
Phys. You must not Sir.
Emp. By heaven
Ile let my breath out that shall burne ye all
If ye deny me longer: tempests blow me,
And inundations that have drunk up kingdomes
Flow over me, and quench me: wher's the Villaine?
Am I immortall now ye slaves? by Numa
If he doe scape: Oh, oh,
Eudox. Deere Sir;
Emp. Like Nero,
But farre more terrible, and full of slaughter,
I'th midst of all my flames ile fire the Empire:
A thousand fans, a thousand fans to coole me:
Invite the gentle windes Eudoxa.
Eudox. Sir;
Emp. Oh doe not flatter me, I am but flesh,
A man, a mortall man: drink, drink, ye dunces;
What can your doses now doe, and your scrapings,
Your oyles, and Mithridates? if I doe die,
You only words of health, and names of sicknesse
Finding no true disease in man but mony,
That talke your selves into Revenues, oh
And ere ye kill your patients, begger 'em,
Ile have ye flead, and dride.
Pro: The Villaine Sir;
The most accursed wretch,
Emp. Be gon my Queene,
This is no sight for thee: goe to the Vestalls,
Cast holy incense in the fire, and offer
One powerfull sacrifice to free thy Cæsar.
Pro. Goe Goe and be happy. ——Exit Eudoxa.
Aretus. Goe, but give no ease,
The Gods have set thy last houre Valentinian,
Thou art but man, a bad man too, a beast,
And like a sensuall bloudy thing thou diest.
Pro. Oh——Traitor.
Are. Curse your selves ye flatterers,
And howle your miseries to come ye wretches,
You taught him to be poysond,
Emp. Yet no comfort?
Aret. Be not abusd with Priests, nor Pothecaries,
They cannot help thee: Thou hast now to live
A short halfe houre, no more, and I ten minutes;
I gave thee poyson for Aecius sake,
Such a destroying poyson would kill nature;
And for thou shalt not die alone, I took it.
If mankind had bin in thee at this murder,
No more to people earth again, the wings
Of old time clipt for ever, reason lost,
In what I had attempted, yet ô Cæsar
To purchase faire revenge, I had poysond them too.
Emp. Oh villaine: I grow hotter, hotter,
Are. Yes;
But not neere my heate yet; what thou feel'st now,
Marke me with horror Cæsar, are but Embers
Of lust and leachery thou hast committed:
But there be flames of murder.
Emp. Fetch out tortures.
Are. Doe, and-ile flatter thee, nay more ile love thee:
Thy tortures to what now I suffer Cæsar,
At which thou must arrive too, ere thou dy'est,
Are lighter, and more full of mirth then laughter.
Emp. Let 'em alone: I must drink.
Are. Now be mad.
But not neere me yet.
Emp. Hold me, hold me, hold me,
Hold me; or I shall burst else.
Are. See me Cæsar,
And see to what thou must come for thy murder;
Millions of womens labours, all diseases.
Emp. Oh my afflicted soule too,
Are. Womens feares, horrors,
Despaires, and all the Plagues the hot Sunne breeds.——
Emp. Æcius, ô Æcius: ô Lucyna,
Are. Are but my torments shadowes.
Emp. Hide me mountaines;
The gods have found my sinnes:
Now breake.
Are. Not yet Sir;
Thou hast a pull beyond all these.
Emp. Oh hell,
Oh villaine, curled villaine:
Are. O brave villaine,
My poyson dances in me at this deed:
Now Cæsar, now behold me, this is torment,
And this is thine before thou diest, I am wildfire:
The brazen Bull of Phalaris was feigned,
The miseries of soules despising Heaven,
But Emblems of my torments.
Emp. Oh quench me, quench me, quench me.
Are. Fire a flattery;
And all the Poets tales of sad Avernus,
To my paines lesse then fictions: Yet to shew thee
What constant love I bore my murdred master;
Like a Southwind, I have sung through all these tempests
My heart, my withered heart, feare, feare thou Monster, Feare the just gods, I have my peace. ——He dies.
Emp. More drinke,
A thousand Aprill showres fall in my bosom!
How dare ye let me be tormented thus?
Away with that prodigious body, gods;
Gods, let me aske ye what I am, ye lay
All your inflictions on me, hear me, beate me;
I doe confesse I am a ravisher,
A murderer, a hated Cæsar; oh!
Are there not vowes enough, and flaming Altars,
The fat of all the world for sacrifice,

And

And where that failes, the blood of thouland captives
To purge thoſe ſins? but I muſt make the incenſe:
I do deſpiſe ye all, ye have no mercy,
And wanting that, ye are no Gods, your paroale
Is only preach'd abroad to make Fooles fearfull,
And women made of awe, beleeve your heaven:
Oh torments, torments, torments, paines above paines,
If ye be any thing but dreames, and ghoſts,
and truly hold the guidance of things mortall;
Have in your ſelves times paſt, to come, and preſent,
Faſhion the ſoules of men, and make fleſh for 'em,
Waighing our fates, and fortunes beyond reaſon,
Be more then all the Gods, great in forgiveneſſe,
Breake not the goodly frame ye build in anger;
For you are things men teach us, without paſſions,
Give me an howre to know ye in: Oh ſave me
But ſo much perfect time ye make a ſoule in,
Take this deſtruction from me; no ye cannot,
The more I would beleeve ye, more I ſuffer,
My braines are aſhes, now my heart, my eyes freinds;
I go, I goe, more aire, more aire; I am mortall.——He dyes.

Pro. Take in the body: oh Lycinius,
The miſery that we are left to ſuffer;
No pitty ſhall find us,

Licini. Our lives deſerve none:
Would I were chain'd againe to ſlavery,
With any hope of life.

Pro. A quiet grave,
Or a conſumption now Lycinius,
That we might be too poore to kill, were ſomething.

Lycini. Let's make our beſt uſe, we have mony Proculus,
And if that cannot ſave us, we have ſwords.

Pro. Yes, but we dare not dye.

Lyc. I had forgot that:
There's other countries then.

Pro. But the ſame hate ſtill,
Of what we are.

Lyci. Think any thing, Ile follow——Enter a Meſſenger.

Pro. How now what newes?

Meſſ. Shift for your ſelves, ye are loſt elſe:
The Souldier is in armes for great Ætius,
And their Lievtenant generall that ſtopt 'em,
Cut in a thouſand peeces: they march hither:
Beſide, the women of the Towne have murderd
Phorba, and looſe Ardelia, Cæſars ſhe-Bawdes.

Lyci. Then here's no ſtaying Proculus?

Pro. O Cæſar,
That we had never known thy luſts: Lets fly,
And where we find no womans man lets dye.——Exeunt

Scæn. 3. Enter Maximus.

Max. Gods, what a ſluce of blood have I let open!
My happy ends are come to birth, he's dead,
And I reveng'd; the Empires all a fire,
And deſolation everywhere inhabits:
And ſhall I live that am the author of it,
To know Rome from the awe o'th world, the pitty?
My freinds are gone before too of my ſending,
And ſhall I ſtay? is ought elſe to be liv'd for?
Is there an other freind, an other wife,
Or any third holds halfe their worthyneſſe,
To linger here alive for? Is not vertue
In their two everlaſting ſoules departed,
And in their bodies firſt flame fled to heaven?
Can any man diſcover this, and love me?
For though my juſtice were as white as truth,
My way was crooked to it, that condemnes me:
And now Ætius, and my honored Lady,
That were preparers to my reſt and quiet,
The lines to lead me to Elizium:
You that but ſtept before me, on aſſurance
I would not leave your freindſhip unrewarded,
Firſt ſmile upon the ſacrifice I have ſent ye,
Then ſee me comming boldly: ſtay, I am fooliſh,
Somewhat too ſuddaine to mine own deſtruction,
This great end of my vengance may grow greater:
Why may not I be Cæſar? Yet no dying;
Why ſhould not I catch at it? fooles and children
Have had that ſtrength before me, and obtaind it,
And as the danger ſtands, my reaſon bids me,
I will, I dare; my deare freinds pardon me,
I am not fit to dye yet if not Cæſar;
I am ſure the Souldier loves me, and the people,
And I will forward, and as goodly Cedars
Rent from Oeta by a ſweeping tempeſt
Winted againe and made tall maſſes, defie Thoſe angry winds that ſplit 'em, ſo will I new peece againe, above the fate of women,
And made more perfect far, then growing privat,
Stand and defie bad fortunes: If I riſe,
My wife was raviſh'd well; If then I fall,
My great attempt honors my Funerall.——Exit.

Scæn. 4. Enter 3 Senators, and Affranius.

1. Guard all the poſternes to the Camp Affranius,
And ſee 'em faſt, we ſhall be rifled elſe,
Thou art an honeſt, and a worthy Captaine.

2. Promiſe the Souldier any thing,

3. Speake gently,
And tell 'em we are now in councell for 'em.
Labouring to chooſe a Cæſar fit for them,
A Souldier, and a giver.

1. Tell 'em further,
Their free and liberall voices ſhall go with us.

2. Nay more, a negative ſay we allow 'em.

3. And if our choice diſpleaſe 'em, they ſhall name him.

1. Promiſe three donatives, and large, Affranius.

2. And Cæſar once elected, preſent foes,
With diſtribution of all neceſſaries,
Corne, Wine, and Oyle.

3. New garments, and new Armes,
And equall portions of the Provinces
To them, and to their families for ever.

1. And ſee the City ſtrengthned.

Affra. I ſhall do it.——Exit Affranius.

2. Sempronius, theſe are wofull times.

3. O Brutus,
We want thy honeſty againe; theſe Cæſars,
What noble Conſuls got with blood, in blood
Conſume againe, and ſcatter.

1. Which way ſhall we?

2. Not any way of ſafety I can thinke on.

3. Now go our Wives ro ruin, and our daughters,
And wee beholders Fulvius.

1. Every thing
Is every mans that will.

2. The veſtalls now
Muſt only feed the Souldiers fire of luſt,
And ſenſuall Gods be glutted with thoſe Offerings,
Age like the hidden bowels of the earth
Open'd with ſwords for Treaſure.
Gods defend us,

We are chaffe before their fury else.
2. Away,
Let's to the Temples.
1. To the Capitoll,
'Is not a time to pray now, let's be strengthend—Enter
3. How now Affranius: what good news, Affranius.
Affr. A Cesar:
1. Oh who?
Affr. Lord Maximus is with the Souldier,
And all the Camp rings, Cesar, Cesar, Cesar:
He forced the Empresse with him for more honour.
2. A happy choice: let's meet him.
3. Blessed fortune;
1. Away, away, make room there, room there, room.
—Exeunt Senators, Flourish.
Within. Lord Maximus is Cesar, Cesar, Cesar; Haile Cesar Maximus,
Affr. Oh turning people!
Oh people excellent in war, and governd,
In peace more raging then the furious North,
When he ploughes up the Sea, and makes him brine:
Or the lowd falls of Nile; I must give way,
Although I neither love nor hope this. Cesar flourish.
Or like a rotten bridge that dares a current,
When he is sweld and high crackt, and farwell.
Enter Maximus, Eudoxa, Senat. and Souldiers.
Sen. Roome for the Emperor.
Sold. Long life to Cesar:
Affr. Haile Cesar Maximus.
Emp. Max. Your hand Affranius.
Lead to the Pallace, there my thanks in generall,
Ile showre among ye all: gods give me life,
First to defend the Empire, then you Fathers,
And valiant friends, the heires of strength and vertue,
The rampires of old Rome, of us the refuge;
To you I open this day all I have,
Even all the hazard that my youth hath purchasd,
Ye are my children, family, and friends
And ever so respected shall be, forward.
Ther's a Prescription grave Sempronius,
Gainst all the flatterers, and lazie Bawdes
Led loose-liv'd Valentinian to his vices,
See it effected; —Flourish.
Sen. Honour wait on Cesar.
Sold. Make room for Cesar there— Exeunt all but Affr.
Affr. Thou hast my feares,
But Valentinian keeps my vowes: oh gods,
Why doe we like to feed the greedy Raven
Of these blowne men, that must before they stand,
And fixt in eminence, cast life on life,
And trench their safeties in with wounds, and bodies?
Wel froward Rome, thou wilt grow weak with changing
And die without an Heire, that lov'st to breed
Sonnes for the killing hate of sons: for me,
I only live to find an enemy. —Exit.

Scæn. 5. Enter Paulus (a Poet) and Lycippus, (a Gent.)

Pau. When is the Inauguration?
Lyc. Why to morrow.
Paul. T'will be short time.
Lyc. Any devise that's handsom,
A Cupid, or the God o'th place will doe it,
Where he must take the Fasces.
Pau. Or a Grace.
Lyc. A good Grace ha's no fellow.
Pau. Let me see,
Wil not his name yeeld somthing? Maximus
By'th way of Anagram? I have found out Axis,
You know he beares the Empire.
Lyc. Get him wheeles too,
T'will be a cruell carriage else.
Pau. Some songs too.
Lyc. By any meanes some songs: but very short ones,
And honest language Paulus, without bursting,
The ayre will fall the sweeter.
Pau. A Grace must doe it.
Lyc. Why let a Grace then.
Pau. Yes it must be so;
And in a robe of blew too, as I take it.
Lyc. This poet is a little kin to'th Painter
That could paint nothing but a ramping Lion,
So all his learned fancies are blew Graces.
Pau. What think ye of a Sea-nymph, and a heaven?
Lyc. Why what shold she do there man? ther's no water,
Pau. By'th masse that's true, it must be a grace, and yet
Me thinkes a Rain-bow.
Luy. And in blew,
Pau. Oh yes;
Hanging in arch above him, and i'th midle
Lyc. A showre of raine.
Pau. No, no, it must bee a Grace,
Lyc. Why prethee Grace him then.
Pau. Or Orpheus,
Comming from hell.
Lyc. In blew too.
Pau. Tis the better;
And as he rises, full of fires.
Lyc. Now blesse us,
Will not that spoile his Lute strings Paulus?
Pau. Singing,
And crossing of his armes.
Lyc. How can he play then?
Pau. It shall be a Grace, ile doe it:
Lyc. Prethee doe,
And with as good a grace as thou canst possible;
Good fury Paulus, be i'th morning with me,
And pray take measure of his mouth that speaks it. Exeunt

Scæn. 6. Enter Maximus and Eudoxa.

Max. Come my best lov'd Eudoxa: Let the Souldier Want neither Wine nor any thing he calls for,
And when the Senat's ready, give us notice;
In the meane time leave us,
Oh my deere sweet.
Eud. Is't possible your Grace
Should undertake such dangers for my beauty,
If it were excellent?
Max. By heaven tis all
The world has left to bragge of.
Eud. Can a face
Long since bequeath'd to wrinkles with my sorrowes,
Long since razd out o'th book of youth and pleasure,
Have power to make the strongest man o'th Empire,
Nay the most staid, and knowing what is woman:
The greatest aym of perfectnesse men liv'd by,
The most true constant lover of his wedlock,
Such a still blowing beauty, earth was proud of,
Loose such a noble wife, and wilfully;
Himselfe prepare the way, nay make the rape.
Did ye not tell me so?
Max. Tis true Eudoxa.
Eud. Lay desolate his dearest peece of friendship,
Break his strong helme he steerd by, sinke that vertue,
That valour, that even all the gods can give us,

Without whom he was nothing, with whom worthiest,
Nay more arive at Cesar, and kill him too,
And for my sake? either ye love too deerly,
Or deeply ye dissemble Sir?
Max. I doe so;
And till I am more strengthend, so I must doe;
Yet would my joy, and wine had fashiond out
Some safer lye: Can these things be Eudoxa,
And I dissemble? Can there be but goodnesse
And onely thine deer Lady, any end,
Any imagination but a lost one,
Why I should run this hazard? O thou vertuel
Were it to doe againe, and Valentinian
Once more to hold thee sinfull Valentinian,
In whom thou wert set, as pearles are in salt Oysters,
As Roses are in ranck weeds, I would find,
Yet to thy sacred selfe a deerer danger,
The Gods know how I honour thee.
End. What love Sir?
Can I returne for this, but my obedience;
My life, if so you please, and tis too little.
Max. Tis too much to redeem the world.
End. From this houre,
The sorrowes for my dead Lord, farewell,
My living Lord has dride ye; And in token,
As Emperor this day I honor ye,
And the great caster new of all my wishes,
The wreath of living Lawrell, that must compasse
That sacred head, Eudoxa makes for Cesar:
I am me thinkes too much in love with fortune;
But with you ever Royall Sir my maker,
The once more Summer of me, meere in love,
Is poore expression of my doting.
Max. Sweetest,
End. Now of my troth ye have bought me deere Sir;
Max. No,
Had I at losse of mankinde ——Enter a Messenger.
End. Now ye flatter.
Mess. The Senat waites your Grace,
Max. Let 'em come on,
And in a full forme bring the ceremony:
This day I am your servant (deere) and proudly,
Ile weare your honoured favour.
End. May it prove so. ——Exeunt.

Scæn. 7. Enter Paulus, and Lycippus.

Lyc. Is your Grace done?
Pau. Tis done.
Lyc. Who speakes?
Pau. A Boy:
Lyc. A dainty blew Boy Paulus?
Pau. Yes;
Lyc. Have ye viewed
The worke above?
Pau. Yes, and all up, and ready:
Lyc. The Empresse does you simple honour Paulus,
The wreath your blew Grace must present, she made.
But harke ye, for the Souldiers?
Pau. That's done too:
Ile bring 'em in I warrant ye.
Lyc. A Grace too?
Pau. The same Grace serves for both.
Lyc. About it then:
I must to'th Cupbord; and bee sure good Paulus
Your Grace be fasting, that he may hang cleanly:
If there should need an other voice, what then?
Paul. Ile hang an other Grace in,
Lyc. Grace be with ye.——Exeunt.

Scæn. 2. Enter in state Maximus, Eudoxa, with Souldiers and Gentlemen of Rome, the Senators, and Rods and Axes borne before them.

{A Synnet with Trumpets.} {With a Banket prepard, with Hoboies, Musicke, Song, wreath.}

Sen. Semp. 3. Haile to thy imperiall honour sacred Cesar,
And from the old Rome take these wishes;
You holy gods, that hitherto have held
As justice holds her Ballance equall poysd,
This glory of our Nation, this full Roman,
And made him fit for what he is, confirme him:
Looke on this Son ô Iupiter our helper,
And Romulus, thou Father of our honour,
Preserve him like thy selfe, just, valiant, noble,
A lover, and increaser of his people,
Let him begin with Numa, stand with Cato,
The first five yeares of Nero be his wishes,
Give him the age and fortune of Emelius,
And his whole raigne, renew a great Augustus.

SONG.

Honour that is ever living,
Honour that is ever giving,
Honour that sees all and knowes,
Both the ebbs of man and flowes,
Honour that rewards the best,
Sends thee thy rich labours rest;
Thou hast studied still to please her,
Therefore now she calls thee Cesar:
Chorus. Hayle, hayle, Cæsar, hayle and stand,
And thy name out live the Land,
Noble fathers to his browes,
Bind this wreath with thousand vowes.

All. Stand to eternity:
Max. I thank ye fathers,
And as I rule, may it still grow or wither:
Now to the bancket, ye are all my guests,
This day be liberall friends, to wine we give it;
And smiling pleasures: Sit my Queen of beauty;
Fathers your places: These are faire Wars Souldiers,
And thus I give the first charge to ye all;
You are my second (sweet) to every cup,
I adde unto the Senat, a new honour,
And to the sonnes of Mars a donative.

SONG.

God Lizus ever young,
Ever honourd, ever sung;
Stained with blood of lusty Grapes,
In a thousand lusty shapes;
Dance upon the Mazers brim,
In the Crimson liquor Swim
From thy plenteous hand divine,
Let a River runne with Wine;
God of youth, let this day here,
Enter neither care nor feare.

Boy. Bellonia's seed, the glory of old Rome,
Envie of conquerd Nations, nobly come
And to the fulnesse of your warlike noyce,
Let your feete move, make up this houre of joyes;
Come, come I say, range your faire Troop, at large,
And your hy measure turne into a charge.
Semp. The Emperor's growne heavie with his wine,
Affr. The Senat staies Sir for your thanks,

Semp.

Semp. Great Ceſar.
End. I have my wiſh;
Affr. Wilt pleaſe your Grace ſpeake to him.
Eud. Yes, but he will not heare Lords.
Semp. Stir him Lucius; the Senat muſt have thankes.
2. Sen. Luc. Your Grace, Sir Ceſar;
End. Did I not tell you he was well: he's dead,
Semp. Dead? treaſon, guard the Court, let no man paſſe, Souldiers, your Ceſars murdred.
End. Make no tumult,
Nor arme the Court, ye have his killer with ye;
And the juſt cauſe, if ye can ſtay the hearing:
I was his death; That wreath that made him Ceſar,
Has made him earth.
Sold. Cut her in thouſand peeces.
End. Wiſe men would know the reaſon firſt: to die,
Is that I wiſh for Romans, and your ſwords,
The heavieſt way of death: yet Souldiers grant me
That was your Empreſſe once, and honour by ye;
But ſo much time to tell ye why I killd him,
And waigh my reaſons well, if man be in you;
Then if ye dare doe cruelly condemne me.
Affr. Heare her ye noble Romans, 'Tis a woman,
A ſubject not for ſwords, but pitty: Heaven
If ſhe be guilty of malitious murder,
H'as given us lawes to make example of her,
If only of revenge, and bloud hid from us,
Let us conſider firſt, then execute.
Semp. Speake bloudy woman.
End. Yes; This Maximus,
That was your Ceſar, Lords, and noble Souldiers;
(And if I wrong the dead, heaven periſh me;
Or ſpeake to wyn your favours but the truth)
Was to his Country, to his friends, and Ceſar
A moſt malitious Traytor.
Semp. Take heed woman.
End. I ſpeake not for compaſſion. Brave Æcius
(Whoſe bleſſed ſoule if I lye ſhall afflict me,)
The man that all the world lov'd, you adoard,
That was the maſter peece of Armes, and bounty;
Mine own grieſe ſhal come laſt: this friend of his,
This Souldier, this your right Arme noble Romans:
By a baſe letter to the Emperor;
Stuft full of feares, and poore ſuggeſtions,
And by himſelfe, unto himſelfe directed;
Was cut off baſely, baſely, cruelly;
Oh loſſe, ô innocent, can ye now kill me?
And the poore ſtale my Noble Lord, that knew not
More of this villaine, then his forcd feares;
Like one foreſeene to ſatisfie, dy'd for it:
There was a murder too, Rome would have bluſh at;
Was this worth being Ceſar? or my patience? nay his wife
By heaven he told it me in wine, and joy;
And ſwore it deeply, he himſelfe prepard
To be abuſd, how? let me grieve not tell ye;
And weep the ſins that did yet: and his end
Was only me, and Ceſar: But me he lyd in;
Theſe are my reaſons Romans, and my ſoule
Tells me ſufficient; and my deed is juſtice:
Now as I have done well, or ill, look on me. (done, Affr. What leſſe could nature doe, what leſſe had we Had we knowne this before? Romans, ſhe is righteous;
And ſuch a peece of juſtice, heaven muſt ſmile on:
Bend all your ſwords on me, if this diſpleaſe ye,
For I muſt kneele, and on this vertuous hand;
Seale my new joy and thankes, thou haſt done truly.
Semp. Vp with your arms, ye ſtrike a Saint els Romans,
May'ſt thou live ever ſpoken our protector:
Rome yet has many noble heires: Let's in
And pray before we chooſe, then plant a Ceſar
Above the reach of envie, blood, and murder.
Affr. Take up the body, nobly to his urne,
And may our ſinnes, and his together burne.—Exeunt,
A dead March.

Epilogue

EPILOGVE.

We would faine pleaſe yee, and as faine be pleaſd;
Tis but a little liking, both are eaſd:
Wee have your money, and you have our ware,
And to our underſtanding good and faire:
For your owne wiſdomes ſake, be not ſo mad,
To acknowledge ye have bought things deere and bad:
Let not a brack 'th ſtuffe, or here and there,
The fading gloſſe, a generall loſſe appeare:
We know yee take up worſe Commodities,
And deerer pay, yet thinke your bargains wiſe;
Wee know in Meate and Wine, yee fling away
More time and wealth, which is but deerer pay,
And with the Reckoning all the pleaſure loſt.
We bid yee not unto repenting coſt:
The price is eaſie, and ſo light the Play,
That ye may new digeſt it every day.
Then noble friends, as yee would chooſe a Miſtris,
Only to pleaſe the eye a while and kiſſe,
Till a good wife be got: So let this Play
Hold yee a while, untill a better may.

THE FAIRE MAIDE OF THE INNE.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Enter Cæsario, and Clarissa.

Cæsario. INterpret not Clarissa, my true zeale (bounds in giving you councell, to transcend the
That should confine a brother; tis your honour,
And peace of mind (which honour last will leave you)
I labour to preserve, and though you yet are Pure and untainted, and resolve to be so:
Having a Fathers eye, and Mothers care
In all your wayes to keep you faire, and upright.
In which respects my best advices must Appeare superfluous; yet since love deere sister
Will sometimes tender things unnecessary,
Misconster not my purpose.

Clarif. Sir, I dare not:
But still receive it as a large addition,
To the much that I already stand ingagd for,
Yet pardon me, though I professe upon
A true examination of my selfe,
Even to my private thoughts I cannot finde
(Having such strong supporters to uphold me)
On what slight ground the least doubt can be raisd
To render me suspected I can fall,
Or from my fame or vertue.

Cæsar. Far be it from me,
To nourish such a thought; and yet excuse me,
As you would doe a lapidary, whose whole fortunes
Depend upon the safety of one Iewell
If he think no case pretious enough
To keep it in full lustre, nor no locks,
Though lending strength to Iron doores sufficient
To gard it, and secure him; you to me are
A Gemme of more esteeme, and prizd higher
Then Vsurers doe their muck, or great men title.
And any flaw (which heaven avert) in you,
(Whose reputation like a Diamond
Cut newly from the rock, women with envie,
And men with covetous desires look up at)
By prying eyes discovered, in a moment
Would render what the braveries of Florence
For want of counterpoize, forbeare to cheapen,
Of little or no value.

Clarif. I see brother,
The mark you shoot at, and much thank your love;
But for my Virgin Iewell which is brought
In comparison with your Diamond, rest assurd
It shall not fall in such a workmans hands
Whose Ignorance or Malice shall have power
To cast one cloud upon it, but still keep
Her native splendor.

Cæsario. Tis well, I commend you;
And study your advancement with that care
As I would doe a Sisters, whom I love
With more then common order.

Clarif. That from me,
I hope's returnd to you.

Cæsario. I doe confesse it,
Yet let me tell you (but still with that love,
I wish to increase between us) that you are Observd against the gravity long maintaind
In Italy (where to see a mayd unmaskd
Is held a blemish) to be over frequent
In giving or receiving visits.

Clari. How?

Cæsar. Whereas the custome is here to woo by picture,
And never see the substance: you are faire,
And beauty drawes temptations on; You know it,
I would not live to say a willing grant
From you to one unworthy of your birth,
Feature or fortune; yet there have been Ladies
Of ranck, proportion, and of meanes beyond you,
That have prov'd this no miracle.

Clarif. One unworthy?
Why pray you gentle brother, who are they
That I vouchsafe these bounties to? I hope
In your strict Criticisme of me, and my manners,
That you will not deny they are your equalls.

Cæsar. Angry?

Clarif. I have reason, but in cold bloud tell me,
Had we not one Father?

Cæsar. Yes, and Mother to.

Clarif. And hee Souldier.

Cæsar. True;

Clarif. If I then borrow
A little of the boldnesse of his temper,
Imparting it to such as may deserve it;
(How ere indulgent to your selves, you brothers Allow no part of freedome to your sisters)
I hope 'twill not passe for a crime in me,
To grant accesse and speech to noble suitors;
And you escape for innocent, that descend
To a thing so far beneath you. Are you touchd?
Why did you think that you had Gyges ring,
Or the herbe that gives invisibility?
Or that Bianchas name had ne'r bin mentiond;
The faire mayd of the grand Osteria brother,

Cæsario. No more.

Clarif. A little brother. Your pigeon walkes,

And offerd presents; which coy she contemnd,
Your combats in disguises with your rivalls,
Brave Muleteirs. Scullions perfum'd with grease,
And such as cry meat for Cats must be remembrd;
And all this pother for a common trull,
A tempting signe, and curiously set forth,
To draw in riotous guests, a thing exposd
To every Ruffians rude assault; and subject
For a poore salary, to a rich mans lust,
Though made up of diseases.

Cæsar. Will you end yet?

Clarif. And this a Mistris for Albertus sonne,
One that I should call sister?

Cæsar. Part not with Your modesty in this violent heate; the truth is,
(For you shall be my Confessor) I love her,
But vertuously; report that gives her out
Only for faire, and adds not she is chast,
Detracts much from her: for indeed she is,
Though of a low condition; compos'd
Of all those graces, dames of highest birth,
Though rich in natures bounties, should be proud of;
But leave her, and to you my neerest care,
My dearest best Clarissa. Doe not think
(For then you wrong me) I wish you should live
A barren Virgin life; I rather ayme at
A noble husband, that may make you mother
Of many children, one that when I know him
Worth your embraces, I may serve, and sue to:
And therefore scorne not to acquaint me with
That man, that happy man; you please to favour.

Clarif. I ever purpos'd it, for I will like
With your allowance:

Cæsar. As a pawne of this;
Receive this ring, but ere you part with it
On any tearmes, be certaine of your choice;
And make it knowne to me.

Enter Servants with lights, Alberto, Baptista, Mariana, Mentivole.

Clarif. You have my hand for't;

Cæsar. Which were it not my sisters, I should kisse
With too much heate.

Clarif. My Father, and his guests Sir.

Alber. O my old friend, my tryde friend; my Baptista:
These dayes of rest, and feasting, sute not with
Our tougher natures, those were golden ones,
Which were enjoyd at Sea; thats our true Mother:
The Land's to us a stepdame; there we fought
Honour, and wealth through dangers; yet those dangers Delighted more then their rewards, though great ones,
And worth the undertakers: here we study
The Kitchin arts, to sharpen appetite,
Dulde with abundance, and dispute with Heaven;
If that the least puffe of the rough Northwinde,
Blast our times burthen, rendring to our Palats
The charming juice lesse pleasing; whereas there
If we had bisket, powderd flesh, fresh water:
We thought them Persian delicates, and for musicke
If a strong gale but made the maine yard cracke,
We dancde to the lowd minstrell.

Baptist. And feard lesse,
(So far we were in love with noble action)
A tempest then a calme.

Alber. Tis true Baptista;
There, there, from mutuall aydes lent to each other,
And vertuous emulation to exceed
In manly daring, the true schoole of friendship,
We learnt those principles, which confirmd us friends
Never to be forgot.

Baptist. Never I hope. (Cannon,

Alber. We were married there, for bells the roring
A loud proclaimd it lawfull, and a prize
Then newly tane and equally divided,
Serv'd as a dowry to you, then stild my wife;
And did enable me to be a husband,
Fit to encounter so much wealth though got
With bloud and horror.

Maria. If so got, tis fit Sir
Now you possesse it, that you should enjoy it
In peace, and quiet; I, your sonne, and daughter
That reape the harvest of your winters labour,
Though debtors for it yet have often trembled,
When in way of discourse, you have related
How you came by it.

Alber. Trembled? how the softnesse
Of your sex may excuse you, Ile not argue,
But to the world, how ere I hold thee noble
I should proclaime this boy some cowards bastard,
And not the Image of Albertus youth:
If when some wishd occasion calls him forth,
To a brave tryall, one weake artery
Of his should show a feaver, though grim death
Put on a thousand dreadfull shapes to fright him;
The Elements, the sea and all the windes
We number on our compasse, then conspiring
To make the Scæn more ghastly; I must have thee Sirra, I must. If once you grapple with An enemies ship, to boord her, though you see
The desperat Gunner ready to give fire,
And blow the deck up, or like Cæsars Souldiour
Thy hands like his cut off, hang by the teeth,
And die undanted.

Maria. I even dye to heare you:
My sonne, my lov'd Cesario runne such hazards?
Blesd Saints forbid it: you have done enough
Already for one family, that rude way;
Ile keep him safe at home, and traine him up
A compleat Courtier: may I live to see him,
By sweet discourse, and gracious demeanor,
Winne, and bring home a faire wife, and a rich;
Tis all I rest ambitious of.

Alber. A Wife!
As if there were a course to purchase one
Prevailing more then honourable action?
Or any Intercessors move so farre,
To take a Mistris of a noble spirit,
As the true fame of glorious victories,
Achievd by sweat and bloud! o the brave dames
Of warlike Genoa! they had eyes to see
The inward man, and only from his worth,
Courage, and conquests: the blind Archer knew
To head his shafts, or light his quoiue bid torch,
They were proofe against their cliffe.
No Carpet Knight
That spent his youth in groves, or pleasant bowers;
Or stretching on a Couch his lazy limbes,
Sung to his Lute such soft and melting notes
As Ovid, nor Anacreon ever knew,
Could work on them, nor once bewitch their sences,
Though he came so perfumd as he had robbd
Saba, or Arabia, of their wealth,
And stord it in one suite:
I still remember,
And still remember it with joy Baptista,

When

When from the reſcew of the Genoa fleete,
Almoſt ſurprizd by the Venetian Gallies,
Thou didſt returne, and were receivd in triumph.
How lovely in thy honord wounds and ſcars
Thou didſt appeare? what worlds of amorous glances
The beauties of the City (where they ſtood, Fix'd like ſo many of the faireſt ſtarrs)
Shot from their windowes at thee? how it firde
Their bloods to ſee the Enemies captive ſtreames Borne through the ſtreets? nor could chaſt Iuliana (neece
The Dukes faire Neece, though garded with their great-Reſiſt this gallant charge, but laying by Diſparity of fortune from the object,
Yeelded her ſelfe thy priſoner.
Bap. Pray you chuſe ſome other theame.
Mari. Can there be one more pleaſing?
Bap. That triumph drew on me a greater torture,
And tis in the remembrance little leſſe
Then ever Captive ſuffer'd.
Mari. How? to gaine the favour of ſo great a Lady?
Bap. Yes, ſince it prov'd fatall, t'have bin happy Madam
Adds to calamity, and the heavie loſſe
Of her I durſt not hope for once injoyd,
Turnes what you thinke a bleſſing to a curſe,
Which griefe would have forgotten.
Alber. I am ſorry I touchd upon it.
Maria. I burne rather Sir,
With a deſire to heare the ſtory of your loves, and ſhall receave it as a favour,
Which you may grant.
Bap. You muſt not be denyde,
Yet with all brevity I muſt report it;
Tis true faire Iuliana (Genoas pride)
Enamord of my actions, liked my perſon;
Nor could I but with joy meet her affection;
Since it was lawfull, for my firſt wife dead;
We were cloſely married, and for ſome few months
Taſted the fruits of't; but malitious fate,
Envying our too much happineſſe, wrought upon
A faithleſſe ſervant, privie to our plot,
And Cabinet Councellor to Iuliana,
Who either for hope or reward, or feare,
Diſcoverd us to the incenſed Duke:
Whoſe rage made her cloſe priſoner, and pronounced
On me perpetuall baniſhment: ſome three yeares
I wandered on the Seas, ſince entertaind
By the great Duke of Florence; but what fate
Attended her? or Proſpero my friend,
That ſtayd at Genoa, to expect the iſſue,
Is yet uncertaine. Enter a Gentleman.
Alber. From the Duke:
Bap. Hee's welcome, to end my forc'd relation.
Alber. Signior Baptiſta;
The great Dukes will commands your preſent care.
Gent. It points indeed at both of you;
Bap. I wale it,
Alber. In Mariana, to your reſt.
Bap. Nay leave us, we muſt be private.
Maria. Stay not long Ceſario: ——Exeunt. Manet Ceſario, Mentivole.
Mentiva. So theſe old men vaniſhd tis allowd,
That we may ſpeake, and how ſo ere they take Delight in the diſcourſe of former dangers,
It cannot hinder us to treate a little
Of preſent pleaſures.
Ceſario. Which if well injoyd,
Will not alone continue, but increaſe
In us their friendſhip.
Ment. How ſhall we ſpend the night?
To ſnore it out like drunken Dutchmen, would Sort ill with us Italians. We are made
Of other metall, fiery, quick, and active;
Shall we take our fortune? and while our cold fathers
(In whom long ſince our youthfull heates were dead,)
Talke much of Mars, ſerve under Venus Enſignes,
And ſeeke a Miſtris?
Ceſar. Thats a game deere friend,
That does admit no rivald in chaſe of it,
And either to be undertooke alone,
Or not to be attempted.
Ment. I'le not preſſe you:
What other ſports to entertaine the time with
The following morning?
Ceſar. Any that may become us.
Menti. Is the Neapolitan horſe the Vireroy ſent you,
In a fit plight to runne?
Ceſar. So my Groom tells me,
I can boaſt little of my horſmanſhip;
Yet upon his aſſurance, I dare wager
A thouſand Crowns, 'gainſt any horſe in Florence,
For an eight myle courſe.
Menti. I would not win of you,
In reſpect you are impatient of loſſe:
Elſe I durſt match him with my Barbary
For twice the ſumme. (beaten.
Ceſar. You doe well to excuſe it, being certain to be Menti. Tuſh. You know the contrary.
Ceſar. To end the controverſie.
Put it to tryall, by my life ile meete you Enter Clariſſa.
With the next riſing ſunne.
Menti. A match. But here
Appeares a Cynthian, that ſcornes to borrow
A beame of light from the great eye of Heaven:
She being her ſelfe all brightneſſe; how I envie
Thoſe amorous ſmiles, thoſe kiſſes, but ſure chaſt ones
Which ſhe vouchſafes her brother?
Clariſ. You are wanton:
Pray you think me not Biancha, leave I pray you;
My Mother will not ſleep before ſhe ſee you,
And ſince you know her tenderneſſe, nay fondneſſe;
In every circumſtance that concernes your ſafety,
You are not equall to her.
Ceſar. I muſt leave you, but will not faile to meet you.
Menti. Soft ſleepes to you.
Within Mariana: Ceſario.
Clariſ. You are calld againe.
Ceſar. Some ſonnes
Complaine of too much rigor in their Mothers;
I of too much indulgence; you will follow.——Exit.
Clariſ. You are her firſt care, therefore leade the way.
Ment. She ſtaies: bleſt opportunity, ſhe ſtaies?
As ſhe invited conference, ſhe was ever
Noble, and free; but thus to tempt my frailty,
Argues a yeelding in her; or contempt
Of all that I dare offer; ſtand I now
Conſulting? No, ile put it home.
Clariſ. Who waites there? more lights.
Menti. You need them not, they are as uſeleſſe,
As at noone-day; can there be darkneſſe, where Nature then wiſely liberall, vouchſafd
To lend two Sunnes.
Clariſ. Hyperbole?
Menti. No, truths.

Truths beauteous virgin, ſo my loveſicke heart
Aſſures me, and my underſtanding tells me
I muſt approach them wiſely, ſhould I raſhly (me
Preſſe neare their ſcorching beams, they would conſume
And on the contrary ſhould your diſdaine
Keepe me at too much diſtance, and I want
Their comfortable heate, the froſt of death
Would ſeiſe on all my faculties.
Cla. Pray you pauſe ſir.
This vehemency of diſcourſe muſt elſe needs tire you.
Theſe gay words take not me, tis ſimple faith
Honeſt integrity, and lawfull flames
I am delighted with:
Ment. Such I bring with me, and therefore Lady,
Cla. But that you tooke me off
Ere I came to a period. I had added
A long experience muſt bee requird
Both of his faith and truſt with whom a virgin
Trafficks for whats deareſt in this life,
Her libertie, and honor; I confeſſe
I oft have viewd you with an eye of favour,
And with your generous parts the many tenders
Of doing me all faire offices, have woone
A good opinion from me.
Ment. Oh ſpeake ever, I never heard ſuch muſick;
Cla, a Playne tune ſir:
But tis a hearty one; when I perceive
By evident prooſes, your aimes are truly noble,
And that you bring the Engines of faire love,
Not of foule luſt, to ſhake and undermine
My maiden fortreſſe: I may then make good
What now I dare not promiſe.
Ment. You already
In taking notice of my poore deſervings,
Have beene magnificent, and twill appeare
A frontleſſe Impudence to aske beyond this;
Yet qualifie, though not excuſe my error,
Though now I am ambitious to deſire
A confirmation of it.
Cla. So it wrong not my modeſty to grant it;
Ment. Tis far from me,
I only am a ſutor, you would grace me
With ſome toy, but made rich in that you wore it,
To warrant to the world that I uſurp not
When I preſume to ſtile my ſelfe your ſervant,
A riband from your ſhooe,
Cla. You are too humble,
Ile think upon't; and ſomething of more value
Shall witneſſe how I prize you, it growes late,
Ile bring you to the doore,
Ment. You ſtill more binde me, ——Exeunt

Ent. Duke of Florence, Alberto: Baptiſta: Magiſtrates, And Attendants.

Duke. You finde by this aſſur'd Intelligence
The preparation of the Turke againſt us.
We have met him oft and beate him; now to feare him
Would argue want of courage, and I hold it
A ſafer policie for us and our ſignories
To charge him in his paſſage ore the ſea'
Then to expect him here.
Alb. May it pleaſe your highneſſe
Since you vouchſafe to thinke me worthy of
This great imployment, if I may deliver
My judgment freely, tis not flattery
Though I ſay my opinion waits on you,
Nor would I give my ſuffrage and conſent
To what you have propos'd, but that I know it Worth the great ſpeaker, though that the deniall
Cald on your heavie anger. For my ſelfe
I do profeſſe thus much, if a blunt Soldier,
May borrow ſo much from the old tongu'd Courtier, (That ecchoes what ſo ere the Prince allowes of)
All that my long experience hath taught me
That have ſpent three parts of my life at ſea,
(Let it not taſt of arrogance that I ſay it)
Could not have added reaſons of more waite
To fortifie your affections, then ſuch
As your grace out of obſervation meerly
Already have propounded.
Bap. With the honor to give the daring enemy an affront
In being the firſt oppoſer it will teach
Your Soldiers boldneſſe: and ſtrike feare in them
That durſt attempt you.
1. Magi. Victualls and ammunition,
And mony too the ſinewes of the war, are ſtor'd up in the Magazine.
2. Magi. And the gallies new rigd and traind up.
And at two dayes waruing fit for the ſervice.
Duke. We commend your care,
Nor will we ere be wanting in Our counſailes,
As we doubt not your action; you Baptiſta
Shall ſtay with us; that Merchant is not wiſe
That ventures his whole fortunes in one bottome.
Albert. Be our Admirall, ſpare your thankes,
His merit in you that invites this honor,
Preſerve it ſuch; ere long you ſhall heare more,
Things raſhly undertaken end as ill,
But great acts thrive when reaſon guides the will.
—— Exeunt Enter 3. Gentlemen.
1. No queſtion twas not well done in Caſario
To croſſe the horſe of younge Mentivole.
In the middeſt of this courſe.
2. That was not all, the ſwitching him duld him,
3. Would that both the jades
Had broke their necks, when they firſt ſtarted; light,
We ſtand here prateing, give them leave to whiſper.
And when they have cut one anothers throats
Enter Mentivole, and Caſario.
Make in to part em.
2. There is no ſuch hazard,
Their fathers freindſhip, and their love forbid it;
See where they come!
1. With fury in their loookes.
Ment. You have the wages, with what fowle play got Ile not diſpute:
Caſar. Fowle play,
Ment. I cannot ſpeak it
In a fairer language, and if ſome reſpects
Familiar to my ſelfe chaind not my tongue,
I ſhould ſay no more. I ſhould, but Ile ſit down,
With this diſgrace; how ere preſſe me no farther.
For if once more provokd, you'l underſtand
I dare no more ſuffer an Injury
Then I dare doe one,
Caſar. Why ſir are you injur'd
In that I take my right which I would force,
Should you detaine it?
Ment. Put it to judgement.
Caſar. No my will in this ſhall carrie it,
Ment. Your will? nay farwell ſoftnes then. { they ſodainly drawe
3. This I foreſaw,
2. Hold hold,
Caſar: I am hurt

2. Shift for your ſelfe, tis death.
Ment. As you reſpect me, beare him off with care,
If he miſcarry ſince he did the wrong,
Ile ſtand the ſhock of't.
2. Gently, he will faint elſe——Exeunt. Gent. with Ment. And ſpeedily I beſeech you; my rage over (Caſario
That pourd upon my reaſon clouds of error,
I ſee my folly, and at what deare loſſe
I have exchangd a reall innocence
To gaine a meere fantaſticall report,
Tranſported only by vaine popular wind,
To bee a daring nay foole hardie man. Ent. Baptiſta.
But could I ſatisfie my ſelfe within here,
How ſhould I beare my fathers frowne? They meet me,
My guilt conjures him hither.
Bap. Sirra:
Mentiv. Sir:
Bap. I have met the trophies of your ruffian ſword:
Was there no other Anvile to make triall
How far thou durſt be wicked, but the boſome
Of him which under the adulterate name
Of friendſhip thou haſt murder?
Ment. Murderd ſir?
My dreams abhor ſo baſe a fact; true valor
Imployd to keepe my reputation faire from the auſtereſt judge, can never merit
To be branded with that title; you begot me
A man, no coward; and but call your youth
To memory, when injur'd you could never Boaſt of the Aſſes fortitude, ſlavelike patience:
And you might juſtly doubt I were your ſonne,
If I ſhould entertaine it; if Caſario
Recover, as I hope his wound's not mortall,
A ſecond tryall of what I dare doe
In a juſt cauſe, ſhall give ſtrong witneſſe for me
I am the true heire to Baptiſtas courage
As to his other fortunes.
Baptiſt. Boy, to neither:
But on this ſtrict condition, which intreaties
From Saints, nay Angels, ſhall not make me alter.
A friendſhip ſo began, and ſo continu'd
Betweene me and Alberto my beſt friend,
Your brawles ſhall not diſſolve; it is my will
And as I am thy father, I command thee,
That inſtantly on any tearms how poor e
So ere it skils not, thou deſire his pardon
And bring aſſurance to me has ſign'd it,
Or by my fathers ſoule ile never know thee:
But as a ſtranger to my blood; performe it,
And ſuddainly without reply, I have ſaid it.
Ment. And in it given a heavier ſentence on me
Then the moſt cruell death; you are my father
And your will to be ſerv'd, and not diſputed
By me that am your ſonne: but ile obey,
And though my heart ſtrings crack for't, make it known,
When you command, my faculties are your own. Exeunt

Actus ſecundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Alberto, Phyſition, and a Chirurgion.

Phyſ HAve patience, Noble Sir; your ſonne Caſario
Will recover without queſtion.
Surgeon. A ſlight wound.
Though it peire't his body, it hath miſs'd the vitals.
Phyſ. My life for't, he ſhall take the aire againe within (theſe 10. daies.
Alber. O but from a friend,
To receive this bloody meaſure from a friend!
If that a man ſhould unrepented violent death
In a place where he had taken ſanctuary,
Would it not grieve him? ſuch all Florence held
Their friendſhip, and tis that which multiplyes
The injury.
Phyſ. Have patience worthy Signior.
Alber. I doe proteſt as I am man and ſoldier,
If I had buried him in a wave at ſea,
(Loſt in ſome honorable action)
I would not to the ſaltneſſe of his grave
Have added the leaſt teare; but theſe quarrels
Enter Mariana, and Clariſſa.
Bred out of game and wine, I had as lief
He ſhould have died of a ſurfeit.
Maria. Oh what comfort? How is it with our ſon Sir?
Alber. His Work-maſters
Beare in my hand here as my Lawyer does,
When I have a crackt title, or bad ſute in Law,
All ſhall goe well.
Maria. I pray you Gentl. what think you of his wound
Phyſ. Tis but a ſcratch, nothing to danger.
Clariſ. But he receiv'd it from a friend,
And the unkindneſſe tane at that, may kill him.
Mari. Let me ſee him:
Phyſ. By no meanes, he ſlumbers.
Mari. Then I cannot beleive you,
When you tell me ther's hope of him.
Alber. Yet many Ladyes
Doe give him more faith to their Phyſition
Then to their Confeſſor.
Clariſ. O my poore loſt brother,
And friend more deere then brother.
Alber. More loud inſtruments
To diſturbe his ſlumbers! goe, goe, take Caroch:
And as you love me, you and the Girle retire
To our Summer houſe, 'th Country; ile be with you Within theſe two dayes.
Maria. I am yours in all things,
Though with much ſorrow to leave him. Exeunt Maria.
Alber. I pray you Gentlemen, Clariſ.
With beſt obſervance tend your Patient;
The loſſe of my heire Male, lies now a bleeding.
Enter Mentivole.
And think what payment his recovery. Exeunt Phyſi-
Shall ſhowre upon you. tion Chirur.
Of all men breathing,
Wherefore doe you arrive here? are you mad?
My injury begins to bleed a freſh
At ſight of you; why this affront of your
I receive more malitious then the other.
Your hurt was only danger to my ſonne:
But your ſight to mee is death; why come you hither?
Do you come to view the wounds, w^ch you have made?
And glory in them?
Menti. Rather worthy Sir, to powre oyle into them.
Alber. I am a Souldier Sir,
Leaſt part of Courtier, and underſtand
By your ſmooth oyle
Your preſent flattery.
Menti. Sir, for my Fathers ſake acknowledge me
To be borne a Gentleman, no ſlave; I ever Held flatterers of that breed; do not miſconſtrue
In your diſtaſte of me, the true intent
Of my comming hither, for I doe proteſt
I doe not come to tell you I am ſorry
For your ſonnes hurt.

Alber.

Albert. Not sorry?
Menti. No not sorry, I have to the lowest ebbe lost all
But I must not lose my honesty; twas he Gave heate unto the injury, which returnd
(Like a Petar ill lighted into'th bosome
Of him gave fire to't) yet I hope his hurt,
Is not so dangerous, but he may recover:
When if it please him, call me to account,
For the losse of so much bloud, I shall be ready
To doe him noble reason. (dence.
Albert. You are arm'd me thinks with wondrous confi-Menti. O with the best Sir;
For I bring penitence, and satisfaction.
Albert. Satisfaction? Why I heard you say but now,
You were not sorry for his wounds. (to you;
Menti. Nor am I: the satisfaction which I bring Sir, is
You are a Gentleman ne'r injurd me;
One ever lov'd my Father, the right way,
And most approv'd of noble amity.
Yet I have runne my sword quite through your heart,
And slightly hurt your sonne; for't may be feard,
A griefe tane at these yeares for your sonnes losse,
May hazard yours: And therefore I am sent
By him that has most interest in your sorrow;
Who having chid me almost to the ruin
Of a disheritance, for violating
So continued and so sacred a friendship
Of 50. winters standing: such a friendship,
That ever did continue like the spring;
Ne'r saw the fall o'th leafe; by him I am sent
To say the wrong I have done Sir, is to you:
And that I have quite lost him for a Father,
Vntill I finde your pardon; nay there followes
A waightier deprivation; his estate
I could with a lesse number of sighes part with.
Fortune might attend my youth, and my deservings
In any Climate: but a Fathers blessing,
To settle and confirme that fortune, no where;
But only here. Your pardon, give me that;
And when you have done, kill me; for tis that Takes from me the effect of excommunication;
A Fathers heavie curse.
Albert. Nay, may that curse
Light on himselfe, for sending thee in this minute:
When I am grown as deafe to all compassion,
As the cruellest Sea fight, or most horrid tempest.
That I had drownd i'th Sea a thousand duckets,
Thou hadst not made this visit: rash young man,
Thou tak'st me in an ill Planet, and hast cause
To curse thy Father; for I doe protest,
If I had met thee in any part o'th world,
But under my own roofe, I would have killd thee.

Within there.——Enter Physitian, Chirurgion, and Servants.

Looke you! (Master.
Here's a triumph sent for the death of your young Serv. Shall we kill him?
Albert. No, Ile not be so unhospitable; but Sir,
By my life, I vow to take assurance from you,
That right hand never more shall strike my sonne.
Menti. That will be easily protested. (seale to't.
Albert. Not easily, when it must be exacted, and a bloudy
Bind him, and cut off's right hand presently:
Faire words shall never satisfie foule deeds.
Chop's hand off. (nour.
Menti. You cannot be so unrighteous, to your own ho-
Phy. O sir, collect your selfe;
And recall your bloody purpose.
Albert. My intents of this nature, do ever come to action Chirur. Then I must fetch another stickler.——Exit.
Albert. Yet I doe grieve at heart;
And I doe curse thy Father heartily,
That's the cause of my dishonour; sending thee
In such an houre, when I am apt for mischiefe:
Apt as a Dutch man after a Sea-fight,
When his Enemy kneeles afore him; come dispatch.
Phys. Intreate him Noble Sir;
Menti. You shall excuse me;
Whatsoever he dares doe, that I dare suffer.

Enter Cesario, and Chirurgion.

Cesar. Oh sir, for honours sake stay your foule purpose,
For if you do proceed thus cruelly,
There is no question in the wound you give him,
I shall bleed to death for't.
Albert. Thou art not of my temper,
What I purpose, cannot be altered.
Serv. Sir; the Duke
With all speed expects you. You must instantly
Ship all your followers, and to sea.
Albert. My blessing stay with thee upon this condition,
Take away his use of fighting; as thou hop'st
To be accounted for my son, perform't.——Exit.
Cesar. You heare what I am injoynd too.
Menti. Pray thee take it,
Only this ring, this best esteemed Iewell;
I will not give't to'th hangman chops it off;
It is to deare a relique. Ile remove it nearer my heart.
Cesar. Ha, that ring's my sisters.
The ring I injoynd her never part withall
Without my knowledge; come sir, we are friends:
Pardon my fathers heate, and melancholy;
Two violent Feavers which he caught at Sea,
And cannot yet shake off: only one promise
I must injoyne you to, and seriously.
Hereafter you shall never draw a sword
To the prejudice of my life.
Menti. By my best hopes I shall not.
Cesar. I pray deliver me your sword
On that condition.
Menti. I shall Sir, may it hereafter
Ever fight on your part.
Cesar. Noble Sir, I thank you;
But for performance of your vow, I intreat
Some gage from you.
Menti. Any Sir.
Cesar. Deliver me that ring.
Menti. Ha, this ring? indeed this Iewell bindes me.
If you knew the vertue of it, never more
To draw my sword against you.
Cesar. Therefore I will have it.
Menti. You may not.
Cesar. Come: you must.
I that by violence could take your hand,
Can inforce this from you; this is a token Sir,
That we may prove friends hereafter. Fare you wel.
Phys. Why did you cease his sword Sir?
Cesar. To perform what my Father bade me,
I have for the present tane away his Vse of fighting.
Phys. Better so,
Then take that which your Father meant.

Exeunt. Manet Mentivole.

Menti. Was ever the like usage? O that ring!

Dearer

Dearer then life, whether is honour fled
Cesario? Thou art unmanly in each part,
To seize my sword first and then split my heart. Exit.

Enter Host, and Clowne.

Host. Thy Master that lodges here in my Hosteria,
Is a rare man of art, they say hee's a Witch.

Clow. A witch? Nay hee's one step of the Ladder to preferment higher, he is a Conjurer?

Host. Is that his higher title.

Clow. Yes, I assure you, for a Conjurer is the Devills Master, and commands him; whereas a witch is the Devills Prentice and obeys him.

Host. Bound Prentice to the Devill!

Clow. Bound and inrolld I assure you, he cannot start; and therefore I would never wish any Gentleman to turne Witch.

Host: Why man.

Clow: Oh he looses his gentility by it, the Devill in this case cannot helpe him, he must go to the Herald for new armes beleeve it.

Host. As I am true Inkeper, yet a Gentleman borne, Ile ne'r turne witch for that trick,
And thou hast bin a great Traveller.

Clow. No indeed, not I Sir;

Host. Come you are modest.

Clow. No I am not modest, for I told you a lye, that you might the better understand I have bin a traveller.

Host. So sir, they say your Master is a great Physitian too

Clow. He was no foole told you that, I assure you.

Host. And you have beene in England, but they say Ladies in England take a great deale of Physick.

Clow. Both wayes on my reputation.

Host. So tis to be underitood:
But they say Ladyes there take Physick for fashion.

Clow. Yes sir, and many times dye to keep fashion.

Host. How? dye to keep fashion!

Clow. Yes, I have knowne a Lady sicke of the small Pockets, onely to keepe her face from Pitholes, take cold, strike them in againe, kick up the heeles and vanish.

Host. There was kicking up the heeles with a witnesse.

Clow. No Sir, I confesse a good face has many times bin the motive to the kicking up of the heeles with a witnesse: but this was not.

Enter Hostesse, and Bianca.

Host. Here comes my wife and daughter.

Clow. You have a prety commodity of this night worme?

Host. Why man? (ordinary.

Clow. She is a pretty lure to draw custome to your Host. Dost think I keep her to that purpole?

Clow. When a Dove-house is empty, there is cunninsed used to purloine from the rest of the neighbours; In England you have severall Adamants, to draw in Sparres and rapiers; one keeps silk-worms in a Gallery: A Milliner has choice of Monkies, and Paraketoes; another shewes bawdy East Indian Pictures, worse than ever were Aretines, a Goldsmith keeps his wife wedged into his shop like a Mermaide, nothing of her to bee seene (thats woman) but her upper part.

Host. Nothing but her upper part?

Clow. Nothing but her upper bodies, and he lives at the more hearts ease.

Host. Whats the reason?

Clow. Because her neather part can give no temptation; by your leave sir, ile tend my Master, and instantly bee with you for a cup of Chereily this hot weather.

Host. A nimble pated rascall, come hither daughter, when was Cesario here?

Bian. Sir not this fortnight.

Host. I doe not like his visits, commonly
He comes by Owle-light, both the time and manner
Is suspitious; I doe not like it.

Bian. Sir, the Gentleman
Is every way so noble, that you need not
Question his intent of comming, though you did;
Pray Sir preserve that good opinion of me,
That though the custome of the place I was borne in Makes me familiar to every guest,
I shall in all things keep my selfe a stranger
To the vices they bring with them.

Hostis. Right my daughter?
She has the right straine of her mother.

Host. Of her mother?
And I would speake, I know from whence she took it;
When I was as young I was as honest.

Hostis. Leave your prating, (over,
And study to be drunk; and abuse your guests over, and Enter Foreboseo, and Clowne.

Host Peace wife. My honourable guest,

Fore. My indeard Landlord?
And the rest o'th complements o'th house.

Host. Breakfast is ready Sir;
It waites only the tide of your stomack.

Clow. And mine gapes for't like a stale Oyster.
Ere you goe to bed, faile not of that I pray.

—Exeunt all but Foreboseo, and Clowne.

Fore. We will instantly be with you;
Now we are all fellowes.
Nine a clock, and no clyents come
Yet, sure thou dost not set up bills enough.

Clow. I have set up bills in abundance,

Fore. What bills?

Clow. Marry for curing of all diseases,
Recovery of stolne goods,
And a thousand such impossibilities.

Fore. The place is unlucky,

Clow. No certaine, tis scarcity of mony; doe not you here the Lawyers complain of it? men have as much malice as ever they had to wrangle, but they have no mony: whether should this mony be trallanct?

Fore. To the Devill I think.

Clow. Tis with his cofferer I am certaine, that's the Vsurer.

Fore. Our cheating does not prosper so well as it was wont to doe.

Clow. No sure, why in England we coo'd cozen 'em as familiarly, as if we had travaild with a Bricle, or a Lotterie.

Fore. I'th Low-countries we did prety well.

Clow. So so, as long as we kept the Mop-headed Gutter-boxes sober; marry when they were drunke, then they grew buzards: You should have them reel their heads together, and deliberate; your Dutchman indeed when he is foxt, is like a Fox; for when hee's funke in drink, quite earth to a mans thinking, tis full Exchange time with him, then hee's subtlest; but your Switzert, was nothing to cheate him.

Fore. Nothing?

Clow. No not conscience to bee made of it: for since nature afore-hand cozend him of his wit, twas the lesse sinne for us to cozen him of his mony.

Fore. But these Italians are more nimble-pated, wee must have some new trick for them, I protest but that our Hostisse daughter is a sweet lasse, and drawes great resort to'th house, we were as good draw teeth a horseback.

Clow.

Clow. I told 'em in the Market place you could conjure, and no body would beleeve me: but ere long I will make 'em beleeve you can conjure with such a figuary.

Fore. What language shal's conjure in? high Dutch I thinke, that's full i'th mouth.

Clow. No, no; Spanish, that roares best; and will appeare more dreadfull.

Fore. Prethee tell me thy conceit thou hast to gull them.

Clow. No, no, I will not steale it; but my dear Iewstrump, for thou art but my instrument, I am the plotter, and when we have cozen'd 'em most titely, thou shalt steale away the Inn-keepers daughter, I'le provide my selfe of another moveable: and wee will most purely retire our selues to Geneva.

Fore. Thou art the compasse I saile by.

Enter Baptista and Mentivole.

Ment. Was ever expectation of so Noble
A requitall answered with such contumely!
A wild Numidian that had suck't a Tigresse,
Would not have bin so barbarous; did he threat
To cut thy hand off?

Ment. Yes Sir, and his slaves were ready to perform't.

Bapt. What hindred it?

Ment. Onely his sonnes intreaty.

Bapt. Noble youth,
I wish thou wert not of his blood; thy pitty
Gives me a hope thou art not.

Ment. You mistake Sir,
The injury that followed from the sonne,
Was worse then the fathers; he did first disarme and tooke from me a Iewell which I prize above my hand or life.

Bap. Take thy sword from thee?
He stole it like a thiefe rather, he could not
I'th field deprive thee of it.

Ment He tooke it from me,
And sent me forth so thinne, and so unmade up,
As if I had bin a Foote-boy.

Bap. O my fury!
I must now aske thee forgiveneſſe, that my rashneſſe
Bred out of too much friendship, did expose thee
To so eminent a danger; which I vowe
I will revenge on the whole Family:
All the calamities of my whole life,
My banishment from Genoa, my wifes losse
Compar'd to this indignity is nothing;
Their Family shall repair't; it shall be to them
Like a plague, when the Dog-star reignes most hot:
An Italians revenge may pause, but's ne're forgot. Exit.

Ment. I would I had conceal'd this from my father,
For my interest in Clarissa; my care now
Must be to untangle this division,
That our most equall flames may be united;
And from these various and perturbed streames
Rise like a sweet morne after terrible dreames.—— Exit

Enter Clarissa and Caesario.

Cæsar. I am happy in your recovery,
And I Sister, am ever best pleased in your happineſſe:
But I wish a toy should be on your finger.

Clar. My Ring this morning when I wash't
I put it off, ti's in my windowe.

Cæs. Wher's your Looking-glasse?

Clar. Here Sir.

Cæs. 'Tis a faire one.

Clar. 'Tis pure Chrystall.

Cæs. Can a Diamond cut in Crystall? let me see,
I'le grave my name in't.

Clar. Oh, you'l spoyl my glasse.
Would you not have your brother in your eye?

Cæs. I had thought he had bin Planted in your heart,
Looke you, the Diamond cuts quaintly, you are cozen'd,
Your Crystall is too britle.

Clar. 'Tis the Ring
I gave unto Mentivole, sure the same.
You put me to amazement Sir, and horror;
How came you by that ring?

Cæs. Does the blood rise?

Clar. Pray Sir resolve me, ô for pitty doe;
And take from me a trembling at the heart,
That else will kill me: for I too much feare
Nothing but Death could ravish it from his hand
That wore it.

Cæsar. Was it given to Mentivole on that condition?

Clar. Tell me of his health first.
And then I'le tell you any thing.

Cæsar. By my life he's well,
In better health then I am.

Clar. Then it was Sir.

Cæsar. Then shall I ever hate thee, oh thou falſe one;
Hast thou a Faith to give unto a friend,
And breake it to a brother? did I not
By all the tyes of blood importune thee
Never to part with it without my knowledge?
Thou might'st have given it to a Muliter,
And made a contract with him in a stable
At as cheap a price of my vengeance: never more Shall a Womans trust beguile me; You are all
Like Reliques: you may well be look't upon,
But come a man to'th handling of you once,
You fall in peeces.

Clar. Dear Sir, I have no way
Look't either beneath reason or my selfe
In my election; there's parity in our blood,
And in our fortunes, ancient amity
Betwixt our parents: to which wants nothing,
But the fruit of blest marriage between us,
To add to their posterities: nor does now
Any impeachment rise, except the sad
And unexpected quarrell which divided
So noble and so excellent a friendship,
Which as I ne're had Magick to foresee
So I could not prevent.

Cæsar. Well you must give me leave
To have a hand in your disposing, I shall
In the absence of my father be your Guardian;
His Suit must passe through my office. Mentivole,
He has too much of my blood already; he has,
And he gets no more o't.——
Wherefore weep you mother?

Enter Mariana and a Sailer.

Marian. 'Tis occasion'd by a sorrow,
Wherein you have a childs part; and the maineſt,
Your Father's dead.

Cæsar. Dead?

Marian. There's one can relate the reſt.

Sailer. I can Sir, your Father's drown'd,
Most unfortunately drownd.

Cæsar. How? in a tempest?

Sailer. No Sir, in a calme, calme as this evening; the Gunner being drunk,
Forgot to fasten the Ordnance to their ports,
When came a sudden gust which tumbled them
All to the starboord side, o'returnd the ship,

And

And funck her in moment, ſome ſix men
That were upon the deck were ſaved, the reſt
Periſh't with your Father.
Clar. O my deareſt Father —— Ceſar. I pray thee leave us. (former.
Maria. I have a ſorrow of another nature, equall to the Ceſar. And moſt commonly they come together.
Maria. The Family of the Baptiſti
Are growne to faction, and upon diſtaſt
Of the injury late offerd in my houſe,
Have vowd a moſt ſevere, and fell revenge
'Gainſt all our family, but eſpecially
'Gainſt you my deere Ceſario.
Ceſar. Let them threat, I am prepard to oppoſe them.
Maria. And is your loſſe then
Of ſo eaſie an eſtimation, what comfort
Have I but in your life, and your late danger
Preſents afore me what I am to ſuffer,
Should you miſcarry, therefore ile adviſe you
When the Funerall is over, you would travaile,
Both to prevent their fury, and weare out the injury.
Ceſar. No Mother, I will not travaile,
So in my abſence he may marry my Siſter,
I will not travaile certaine.
Maria. O my Ceſario,
Whom I reſpect and love above my owne life,
Indeed with a kind of dotage, he ſhall never Goe forth a doores, but the contrary faction
Will indanger's life, and then am I moſt wretched.
I am thinking of a ſtrange prevention,
Which I ſhall witneſſe with a bleeding eye,
Fondneſſe ſometimes is worſe then cruelty.——Exeunt.

Actus tertius Scena prima.

Enter Hoſt, Hoſteſſe, and Bianca.

Hoſt. HAunted, my houſe is haunted with goblins. I ſhal be frighted out of my wits, and ſet up a ſigne only to invite carriers and Foot-poſts; ſcar-crows to keep off the Cavelrie, and Gentry of the beſt rank. I will nailе up my doors, and wall up my girle (wife) like an Anchoreſſe; or ſhe will be raviſht before our faces, by raſcalls and cacafugo's (wife) cacafugo's.

Hoſteſſe. Theſe are your In-comes, remember your own proverb, the ſavour of every gaine ſmelt ſweet; thank nobody but your ſelfe for this trouble.

Hoſt. No gaulling (deere Spouſe) no gaulling, every dayes new vexation abates mee two inches in the waſt. terrible pennance for an Hoſt, Girle, girle, girle, which of all this gally-maufry of mans fleſh appears tolerable to thy choice; ſpeak ſhortly, and ſpeak truly: I muſt and will know, muſt and will; here ye that?

Bian. Sir, be not jealous of my care and duty;
I am ſo far from entertaining thoughts
Of liberty, that much more excellent objects
Then any of ſuch courſe contents as theſe are,
Could not betray mine eye to force my heart;
Conceive a wiſh of any deerer happineſſe
Then your direction warrants. I am yours ſir. (at 13.

Hoſteſſe What thinks the man now? is not this ſtrange

Hoſt. Very good words, ther's a tang in 'em, and a ſweet one, tis muſicke (wife) and now I come t'ee. Let us a little examine the ſeverall conditions of our Paragraphiſticall ſuitors. The firſt, a travailing Tailor, who by the miſtery of his needle and thimble, hath ſurveyd the faſhions of the French, and Engliſh; this Signior Gingerbread ſtitcht up in the ſhreds of a gaudy outſide, lowes linings with his croſſe legd complements, like an Ape doing tricks over a ſtaffe, cringes, and crouches, and kiſſes his fore-finger.

Hoſteſſe. Out upon him.

Hoſt. A ſecond, a lavolteteere, a ſaltatory, a dancer with a Kit at his bum, one that by teaching great Madonnas to foot it, has miraculouſly purchaſt a ſhanded waſtcoate, and foure cleane paire of ſocks; a fellow that skips as hee walkes, and inſtead of ſenſible diſcourſe vents the curious conceit of ſome new tune ſtolne from a Maske, or a bawdie dittie elevated for the Pole Artick of a Ladies chamber, in that ſyle ſtands another of your Inamoratoes Hoſteſſe. Hang him and his fiddle together, hee never fidles any child of ours.

Hoſt. The third, a Mongrell, got by a Switzer on an Italian, this puppy, being left well eſtated, comes to Florence, that the world may take notice, how impoſſible it is for experience to alter the courſe of nature, a foole (wife) and indeed a Clown turnd gallant, ſeldom or never proves other then a gallant foole, this toy prates to little purpoſe other then what's a clock, ſhall's go drink, de'e forſooth, and thank ye heartily; I feare no art in him to catch thee, and yet wee muſt bee tormented with this buzzard amongſt the reſt.

Hoſteſſe. Tis your owne folly, forbid him the houſe.

Hoſt. The 4th, a Mule-driver, a ſtubborn & a harſh knave: the fifth a School-Maſter, a very amorous Pedant, run almoſt mad with ſtudy of Sonnets and Complements out of old play-ends, the laſt an Advocates clerk, that ſpeaks pure Fuſtion in Law termes, excellent Courtiers all, and all as neate as a Magnifico's poſt new painted at his entrance to an office; thou ſhalt have none of 'em. Laugh at 'em doe. I ſay thou ſhalt have none of 'em.

Bian. Still your command to me ſhall ſtand a Law.

Hoſt. Now they throng like ſo many horſe-courſers at a faire, in cluſters about the man of art, for love powders, ingredients, potions, counſailes, poſtures, complements, philters: the devill and the——how now? tumults? batteries, noiſe? ha, get from my ſight. Clown cries within

Enter Foroboſco and Clowne, his head bloody.

Clow. Murther me, do, pound me to Mummye, doe; ſee what will come on't.

Foro. Dog, leave thy ſnarling, or i'le cut thy tongue out,
Thou unlikt beare, darſt thou yet ſtand my fury,
My generous rage? yet! by the ſulpherous damps
That feed the hungry and inceſſant darkneſſe,
Which curles round the grim Alaſtors back,
Mutter againe, and with one powerfull word,
Ile call an Hoſt up from the Stygian lakes,
Shall waſt thee to the Acherontick ſennes;
Where choak't with miſts as black as thy impoſtors,
Thou ſhalt live ſtill a dying.

Clow. Conjure mee to the devill and you can. I live in hell upon earth 'em already, and you had any mercy, you would not practiſe upon a kind heart thus.

Hoſt. You have drawne blood from him Signior, Is his offence unpardonable?

Foro. A lump of ignorance, pray ſpeak not for him,
A drowſie groſſeneſſe, in all chriſtian kingdomes,
The mention of my art, my name, my practiſe
Merit and glory hath begot at once
Delight and wonder; ile not be entreated;
Spare interceſſion for him,——o thou ſcorne
Of learning, ſhame of duty; muſt thy ſloth
Draw my juſt fame in queſtion? I diſcharge thee
From my ſervice; ſee me no more henceforth.

Clow. Discharge me, is that my yeares wages! Ile not be so answerd.

Foro. Not Camell, sirra I am liberall to thee; Thou hast thy life, begon.

Clow. Vengeance, sweet vengeance.

Foro. De'e mumble!

Clow. Ile be revengd, monstrously, sudainly, and insatiably; my bulke begins to swell.

Foro. Hamatolentan, Fragmitephoros, Heliostyceran.

Clow. Call up your spirits, I defie 'em; well have law for my broken pate, twelve ounces of pure bloud; Troy-weight. In despight of thee my Master, and thy Master the grand devill himselfe, vindicta, vindicta.——Exit.

Host. Signior you are exceeding mov'd.

Hostes. Mercy upon us, what terrible words thou talk't?

Foro. A slave, a curre——but be not you affrighted Young Virgin, 'twere an injury to sweetnesse: Should any rough sound draw from your cheekes, The pretious tincture which makes nature proud Of her own workmanship.

Host. Wife. Marke, mark that wife.

Bian. Shake then your anger off Sir;

Foro. You command it Faire one, mine Host and Hostesse, with your leaves I have a motion joyntly to you all.

Hostesse. An honest one I hope.

Host. Well put in wife.

Foro. A very necessary one, the Messe Stooles out. And halfe of suiters, that attend toush her Their loves sir reverence to your daughter, waite With one consent, which can best please her eye; In offering at a dance, I have provided Musick. And 'twill be something I dare promise Worthy your laughter, shal they have admittance? (be so

H. By any means, for I am perswaded the manner will Ridiculous, that it will confirm the assurance of their Miserable fooleries, but no longer trouble with 'em here, Then they are in these May-games.

Foro. So I am resolvd.

Hostesse. Nor any wise word of senceless love.

Foro. Not any; I have charm'd them, did you see How they prepared themselves, how they stroak up Their foretops, how they justle for the Looking-glasse, To set their Faces by it; (See they muster. You would look for some most impossible antick.

Enter Tailor, Dancer, Mute Driver, Schoole-Master, Clarke: (all with severall papers, and present 'em to Forobosco.)

Host. So, so, so, so, here flutter the nest of hornets, the hotch-potch of rascallity, now, now, now, now, the dung-hill of corruption hath yawnd forth the burthen of abhomination. I am vext, vext to the soule, will rid my house of this unchristend fry, and never open my doores again.

Foro. Some other time, ile give no answer now, But have preferred your suits, here shew your cunning. First every one in order do his honour To the faire mark you shoot at; courtly, courtly, Convay your severall loves in lively measure: Come, let us take our seates, some sprightly musick.

Host. Dance all and part, tis a very necessary farewell.

Enter Cæsario, They all make ridiculous tongs, to Bianca: vaunt themselves, and dance in severall postures: during the dance.

Enter Cæsario, and stands off.

Host. Well done my lusty blouds, preciously well done, One lusty rouse of wine, and take leave on all sides.

Cæsar. Thanks for your revells Gentlemen; accept This Gold, and drink as freely as you danc'd.

Host. My noble Lord Cæsario, cleer the rooms firs.

Foro. Away. Attend your answers.

——Exeunt Foro. and those that Danc'd.

Cæsar. With your favour Rolando, I would change a word or two with your faire daughter.

Host. At your Lordships pleasure, come wife, no muttering, have a care girle, my love, service, and duty to your good Lordship. ——Exeunt and Wife.

Cæsar. My often visits (sweet Bianca) cannot But constantly inform thy judgment, wherein Thy happinesse consists, for to steale minutes From great imployments, to converse with beauty, Lodg'd in so meane a fortune, to lay by Consideration of the unequall distance Between my blood and thine, to shun occasions Of courtship with the Ladies of the time: Noble, and faire, only for love to thee, Must of necessity invite a tenderneſſe; As low as nature could have stampt a bond woman. To entertaine quick motions of rare gratitude For my uncommon favours. (mee, Bian. Deed my Lord, as far as my simplicity can leade I freely thank your curtesies.

Cæsar. To thank them, is to reward them pretty one.

Bian. Then teach me How I may give them back again; in truth I never yet receiv'd a paire of Gloves: A trifling ring from any that expected An equall satisfaction, but as willingly I parted with the gift unto the owner, as he bestowd it.

Cæsar. But I pow're before thee Such plenties, as it lyes not in the ability Of thy whole kindred to returne proportionable One for a thousand.

Bian. You my Lord conclude For my instruction, to ingage a debt Beyond a possibilitie of paiment, I ever thought a sinne; and therefore justly Without conceit of scorne or curious rudenesse, I must refuse your bounty.

Cæsar. Canst thou love?

Bian. Love! is there such a word in any language That carries honest sence?

Cæsar. Never dwelt ignorance In so sweet-shap't a building, love Bianca, Is that firme knot which tyes two hearts in one, Shall ours be tyed so?

Bian. Vse a plainer word, My Lord. Instead of tyes, say marries hearts, Then I may understand.

Cæsar. Their hearts are married Whose enterchange of pleasures and embraces, Soft kisses, and the privacies of sweetes, Keeps constant league together, when temptation Of great mens oathes and gifts shall urge contempt, Rather then batter resolution, novelty Of sights, or taste of new delights in wantonnesse, Breeds surfeit more then appetite in any Reserv'd to noble vowes; my excellent maide Live thou but true to me, and my contents, Mine only, that no partner may pertake The treasure of those sweets thy youth yet glories in And I will raise thy lowneſſe to abundance Of all varieties, and more triumph In such a mistris, then great Princes doating On truth-betraying wives.

Bian. Thus to yeeld up then The cottage of my vertue to be swallow'd By some hard-neighboring landlord such as you are Is in effect to love, a Lord so vicious!

O where shall innocence find some poore dwelling
Free from temptations tirranny.
Cesar. Nay prethee;
Byan. Gay clothes, high feeding, easie beds of lust,
Change of unseemly sights; with base discourse,
Draw curses on your Pallaces; for my part
This I will be confirmd in, I will eate
The bread of labour, know no other rest
Then what is earnd from honest paines, ere once more Lend care to your vild toyles; Sir, would you were
As noble in desires, as I could be in knowing vertue.
Pray doe not afflict a poore soule thus.
Cæsar. I sweare.——to me?——Bianca steales off.
Gen. The Duke my Lord commands your speedy presence
For answering agreivances late urg'd
Against you by your Mother.
Cæsar. By my Mother.
Gent. The Court is neere on sitting.
Cæsar. I waite on it Sir,——Exeunt.
Enter Duke, Magistrate, Secretary, Baptista, Attendants, Mentivole: (they sit) Mentivole stands by.
Duke. What wast of bloud, what tumults, what divisions,
What outrages, what uprores in a state,
Factions though issuing from meane springs at first
Have (not restraind) flowed to, the sad example
At Rome betweene the Ursins and Columnias, Nay here at home in Florence, twixt the Neris
And the Bianchi can too mainly witnesse.
I sit not at the helme (my Lords) of soveraignty
Deputed Pilot for the Common-wealth,
To sleep whiles others steere (as their wild fancies Shall councell) by the compasse of disorders.
Baptista, This short Preface is directed
Chiefly to you, the petty brawles and quarrels
Late urg'd betwixt th' Alberti and your family
Must, yes and shall like tender unknit joynts
Fasten againe together of themselves:
Or like an angry Chyrurgion, we will use
The roughnesse of our justice, to cut off
The stubborne rancour of the limbes offending.
Bap. Most gracious Florence.
Duke. Our command was signified,
That neither of the followers of each party
Should appeare here with weapons.
Bap. Tis obeyd Sir, on my side.
Duke. We must leave the generall cause
Of State employments to give care to brawles
Of some particular grudges, pollitick government
For tutord Princes, but no more henceforth.
Ent. Mariana, and Clarissa, at one door Cesario at the other.
Our frowne shall check presumption, not our clemency,
Mari. All blessings due to impartiall Princes,
Crowne Florence with eternity of happinesse.
Cæsar. If double praiers can double blessings (great Sir)
Mine joyne for your prosperity with my mothers.
Duke. Rise both; now briefly (Lady) without circumstance Deliver those agrievances which lately
Your importunity possest our counsaile
Were fit for audience, wherein you petitiond,
You might be heard without an Advocate
Which boone you find is granted.
Mari. Though divided
I stand between the lawes of truth and modesty,
Yet let my griefes have vent: Yet the clearnesse
Of strange necessity requires obedience
To nature and your mercy, in my weeds
Of mourning, emblems of too deer misfortunes,
Badges of griefes, and Widdowhood, the burthen
Of my charg'd soule must be layd downe before you;
Wherein if strict opinion cancell shame,
My frailty is my plea;
Stand forth young man,
And heare a story that will strike all reason
Into amasement.
Cæsar. I attend.
Mar. Alberto (peace dwell upon his ashes) still the band
Of my remembrance and unchanging vowes,
Has by his death left to his heire possession
Of faire revenew, which this young man claymes
As his inheritance. I urgd him gently,
Friendly, and privately to grant a partage
Of this estate to her who owns it all
This his supposed Sister.
Bap. How supposed?
Cæsar. Pray Madam recollect your selfe.
Mar. The relish
Of a strange truth begins to work like Physick
Already: I have bitternesse to mingle
With these preparatives, so deadly loathsome;
It will quite choake digestion; shortly heare it
Cesario, for I dare not rob unjustly
The poore soule of his name; this, this Cesario
Neither for Father had Alberto, me
For Mother, nor Clarissa for his Sister.
Clarif. Mother, ô Mother.
Ment. I am in a Dream sure.
Duke. No interruptions. Lady on,
Maria. How ever
Bap. A Faulkners sonne:
Mari. Mistake not Great Duke of Tuscany or the beginning
Or processe of this novelty; my husband
The now deceasd Alberto, from his youth
In-urd to an impatiency, and roughnesse
Of disposition, when not many monthes
After our marriage were worne out, repin'd
At the unfruitfull barrennesse of youth,
Which as he pleasd to terme it, cut our hops off
From blessing of some issue, to prevent it;
I grew ambitious of no fairer honor
Then to preserve her love, and as occasions
Still call'd him from me, studied in his absence
How I might frame his welcome home with comfort,
At last I layd my selfe with child; the Message
Of freedome or release to one halfe starvd
In prison is not utterd with such greedinesse;
Of expectation and delight as this was
To my much affected Lord; his care, his goodnesse;
(Pardon me that I use the word) exceeded
All former feares, the houre of my deliverance
As I pretended drawing neer, I fashiond
My birth-rights at a Country Garden house,
Where then my Faulkners wife was brought a bed
Of this Cesario; him I owne for mine;
Presented him unto a joyfull Father.
Duke. Can you prove this true?
Mari. Proofes I have most evident;
But O the curse of my impatiency; shortly
Ere three new Moones had spent their borrowed lights,
I grew with child indeed, so just is Heaven,
The issue of which burthen was this daughter;
Iudge now most gracious Prince my Lords and you,
What combats then and since I have indur'd
Between a mothers pitty and weakenesse
Of a Soul trembling wife; to have reveal'd

This secret to Alberto, had bin danger
Of ruine to my fame, besides the conflict
Of his distractious; now to have suppresst it,
Were to defeate my child, my only child,
Of her most lawfull honors, and inheritance.
Cæsario, th'art a man still, Education
Hath moulded thee a Gentleman, continue so;
Let not this fall from greatnesse, sinke thee lower
Then worthy thoughts may warrant, yet disclaime
All interest in Albertos blood, thou hast not
One drop of his or mine.
Duke Produce your witnesse.
Marian. The Faulconers wife his mother,
And such women as waited then upon me,
Sworne to the privacy of this great secret.
Duke. Give them all their oathes.
Cæsar. O let me crave forberance, gracious Sir,
Vouchsafe me hearing.
Duke Speake Cæsario.
Cæsar. Thus long
I have stood silent, and with no unwillingnesse,
Attended the relation of my fall,
From a fair expectation; what I fear'd
(Sinc the first syllable this Lady utter'd
Of my not being hers) benevolent Fates
Have eas'd me off; for to be basely born,
If not base-born, detracts not from the bounty
Of natures freedom or an honest birth.
Nobilitie claym'd by the right of blood,
Shewes chiefly that our Ancestors desir'd
What we inherit; but that man whose actions
Purchase a reall merit to himselfe,
And rancks him in the file of of prayse and honour,
Creates his own advancement; let me want
The fuell which best feedes the fires of greatnesse,
Lordly possessions, yet shall still my gratitude
By some attempts of mention not unworthy
Indeavour to returne a fit acquittance
To that large debt I owe your favours (Madam)
And great Albertos memory and goodnesse;
O that I could as gently shake off passion
For the losse of what great braue man as I can shake off
Remembrance of that once I was reputed;
I have not much to say, this Princely presence
Needs not too strictly to examine farther
The truth of this acknowlegment; a mother
Dares never disavowe her only sonne,
And any woman must come short of Piety,
That can or dis-inherit her own issue,
Or scarces the voice of rumor for a stranger.
Madam, you have confest, my Father was
A servant to your Lord and you; by interest
Of being his sonne, I cannot but claime justly
The honour of continuing still my service
To you and yours; which granted, I beg leave
I may for this time be dismist.
Duke Bold spirit.
Bap. I love thee now with pitty;
Duke Goe not yet——
A suddain tempest that might shake a rock,
Yet he stands firm against it; much it moves me.
He not Alberto's sonne, and she a widdow,
And she a widdow,—— Lords your care.
Omnes. Your pleasure,—— Whispers.
Duke. So, Lady, what you heard avouch't is truth.
Mari. Truth only, gracious Sir.
Duke. Heare then our Sentence,
Since from his cradle you have fed and fostered
Cæsario as your sonne, and train'd him up
To hopes of greatnesse; which now in a moment
You utterly againe have ruin'd, this way
We with our Councell are resolv'd, you being
A widdow shall accept him for a husband.
Maria. Husband to me Sir?
Duke. T'is in us to raise him
To honours, and his vertues will deserve 'em.
Maria. But Sir, 'tis in no Prince nor his prerogative,
To force a womans choice against her heart.
Duke. True, if then you appeale to higher justice,
Our doome includes this clause upon refusall
Out of your Lords revenues shall Cæsario
Assure to any whom he takes for wife
The inheritance of three parts; the lesse remainer
Is dowry large enough to marry a daughter;
And we by our prerogative which you question
Will publiquely adopt him into'th name
Of your deceas'd Alberto, that the memory
Of so approv'd a Peer may live in him
That can preserve his memory lesse you find out
Some other meanes which may as amply satisfie
His wrong, our Sentence stands irrevocable:
What think you Lords?
Omnes. The Duke is just and honorable.
Bap. Let me embrace Cæsario, henceforth ever
I vow a constant friendship.
Mentivole, I remit all former difference.
Cæsar. I am too poore
In words to thanke this Iustice. Madam always
My studies shall be love to you, and duty.
Duke Replyes we admit none. Cæsario waite on us.
Exeunt. Manent Mentivole, Bap. Mari. Clariss.
Bap. Mentivole.
Menti. My Lord.
Bap. Looke on Clarissa, shee's noble, rich, young, faire.
Mentivole. My Lord, and vertuous.
Bap. Mentivole and vertuous.——Madam.
Maria. Tyranny of justice, I shall live reports derision,
That am compeld to exchange a gracefull widdow-hood
For a continuall Martyrdome in marriage,
With one so much beneath me.
Bap. I'le plead for ye
Boldly and constantly, let your daughter only
Admit my sonne her servant, at next visit
Madam ile be a messenger of comfort.
Mentivole, be confident and carefull. Exit.
Maria. Married again, to him too! better t'had been
The young man should have still retain'd the honors
Of old Albertos son, then I the shame
Of making him successor of his bed; I was too blam, Ment. Indeed without offence,
Madame I thinke you were,
Claris. You urge it fairely, and like a worthy friend.
Maria. can you say any thing
In commendation of a Mushroome withered
Assoone as started up?
Ment. You scorne an Innocent
Of noble growth, for whiles your husband liv'd
I have heard you boast Cæsario in all actions
Gave matter of report of Imitation,
Wonder and envy; let not discontinuance
Of some few dayes estrange a sweet opinion
Of vertue, cheifely when in such extremity,
Your pitty not contempt will argue goodnesse.
Maria. O Sir,

Cla. If you would use a thriving courtship,
You cannot utter a more powerfull language
That I shall listen to with greater greedinesse
Then th'argument you prosecute; this speakes you
A man compleat and excellent;
Ment. I speake not, they are his owne deserts.
Maria. Good Sir forbeare,
Iam now fully sensible of running
Into a violent Lethargy, whose deadlinesse
Locks up all reason, I shall never henceforth Remember my past happinesse.
Ment. These clouds may be dispersst,
Maria. I feare continuall night
Will over-shrood me, yet poore youth his trespasse
Lies in his fortune, not the cruelty
Of the Dukes sentence.
Cla. I dare thinke it does,
Maria. If all faile I will learne thee to conquer Adversity with sufferance.
Ment. You resolve Nobly. Exeunt.

Actus quartus Scena prima.

Enter Cesario and a Servant.

Cesar. Let any freind have entrance,
Servant. Sir a'shall.
Cesar. Any, I except none,
Serv. Wee know your minde Sir—Exit.
Cesar. Pleasures admit no bounds.
I am pitcht so high
To such a growth of full prosperities
That to conceale my fortunes were an injury?
To gratfulnesse and those more liberall favours
By whom my glories prosper. He that flowes
In gracious and swolne tydes of best abundance,
Yet will be Ignorant of his owne fortunes,
Deserves to live contemn'd, and dye forgotten;
The harvest of my hopes is now already
Ripen'd and gather'd, I can fatten youth
With choice of plenty, and supplies of comforts,
My fate springs in my owne hand, and Ile use it.

Enter 2 Servants and Bianca.

1 Tis my place,
2 Yours- here faire one, Ile aquaint my Lord,
1 He's here, go to him boldly.
2 Please you to let him understand how readily
I waited on your errand?
1 Saucy fellow, you must excuse his breeding,
Cesar. Whats the matter
Biancha, my Biancha, to your offices. Exit Ser.
This visit (Sweet) from thee (my pretty deere)
By how much more t'was unexpected, comes
So much the more timely: witnes this free welcome;
What ere occasion led thee?
Bian. You may guesse Sir,
Yet indeed tis a rare one,
Ces. Prethee speake it, my honest vertuous maide,
Bian. Sir I have heard
Of your misfortunes, and I cannot tell you
Whether I have more cause of joy or sorrow,
To know this are a truth.
Ces. What truth Bianca? misfortunes, how, wherein?
Bian. You are disclaim'd
For being the Lord Alberts sonne, and publickly Acknowledg'd of as meane a birth as mine is,
It cannot chuse but greive thee
Ces. Greive me, ha ha ha ha? is this all?
Bian. This all.
Ces. Thou art sorry for't
I warrant thee, alas good soule, Bianca,
That which thou call'st misfortune is my happines,
my happines Bianca.
Bian. If you love me, it may prove mine too;
May it, I will love thee.
Ces. My good good maid,
If that can make thee happy,
Better and better love thee,
Bian. Without breach then
Of modesty I come to claime the Interest
Your protestations both by vowes and letters
Have made me owner of, from the first houre
I saw you, I confesse I wisht I had beene
Or not so much below your ranke and greatnesse,
Or not so much above those humble flames
That should have warm'd my bosome with a temperate Equality of desires in equall fortunes.
Still as you utter'd Language of affection,
I courted time to passe more slowly on
That I might turne more food to lend attention
To what I durst not credit nor yet hope for;
Yet still as more I heard, I wisht to heare more,
Ces. Didst thou introth wench
Bian. Willingly betraid
My selfe to hopelesse bondage.
Ces. A good girle,
I thought I should not misse
What eare thy answer was.
Bianch. But as I am a maid Sir, and I'faith
You may beleeve me, for I am a maid,
So deerely I respected both your fame
And quality, that I would first have perisht
In my sicke thoughts then ere have given consent
To have undone your fortunes by inviting
A marriage with so meane a one as I am,
I should have dyed fare, and no creature knowne
The sickenesse that had kill'd me.
Ces. Pretty heart, good soule, alas. alas.
Bian. Now since I know
There is no difference twixt your birth and mine,
Not much twixt our estates, if any bee,
The advantage is on my side, I come willingly
To tender you the first fruits of my heart,
And am content t'accept you for my husband,
Now when you are at lowest.
Ces. For a husband?
Speake sadly, dost thou meane so?
Bian. In good deed Sir,
Tis pure love makes this proffer,
Ces I believe thee,
What counsaile urg'd thee on, tell me, thy Father
My worshipfull sirrug Host? wast not he wench?
Or mother Hostesse? ha?
Bian. D'ee mock my parentage?
I doe not scorne yours.
Meane folkes are as worthy
To be well spoken of if they deserve well,
As some whose only fame lies in their blood.
O y'are a proud poore man: all your oathes falsehood,
your vowe deceite, your letters forg'd, and wicked,
Ces. Thou'dst be my wife, I dare sweare,
Bian. Had your heart,
Your hand and tongue been twins, you had reputed

This

This courtesy a benefit,
Ces. Simplicity,
How prettily thou mov'st me? why Biancha
Report has cozned thee, I am not fallen
From my expected honors, or possessions.
Though from the hope of birthright.
Bian. Are you not?
Then I am lost againe, I have a suit too;
Youle grant it if you be a good man.
Ces. Any thing,
Bian. Pray doe not talke of ought what I have said tee.
Ces. As I wish health I will not.
Bian. Pitty me, but never love me more.
Ces. Nay now y'are cruell,
Why all these teares? ——Thou shalt not goe.
Bian. Ile pray for yee
That you may have a vertuous wife, a faire one,
And when I am dead——
Ces. Fy, fy,
Bian. Thinke on me sometimes,
With mercy so this trespasse.
Ces. Let us kisse
At parting as at comming.
Bian. This I have
As a free dower to a virgins grave,
All goodnesse dwell with yee.——Exit.
Ces. Harmelesse Biancha? unskild,
What handsome toyes are maids to play with?
Enter Mariana and Clarissa.
How innocent. but I have other thoughts
Of nobler meditation.——my felicity,
Thou sommest as I could wish, lend me a lip
Soft, as melting as when old Alberto
After his first nights triall taking farewell
Of thy youthes conquest tasted.
Maria. You are uncivill.
Ces. I will be Lord of my owne pleasures, Madame Y'are mine, mine freely,
Come, no whimpering henceforth
New con the lessons of loves best experienced,
That our delights may meet in equal measure
Of resolutions and desires; this sullenes
Is scurvy, I like it not,
Mar. Be modest.
And doe not learne Cesario how to prostitute
The riot of thy hopes to common folly;
Take a sad womans word, how ere thou doatest
Vpon the present graces of thy greatnes,
Yet I am not falne so belowe my constancy
To vertue, nor the care which I once tendred
For thy behoof that I prefer a sentence
Of cruelty before my honor.
Ces. Honor!
Maria. Hear me, thou seest this girle! now the comfort
Of my last dayes. She is the onely pledge
Of a bed truly noble, shee had a father
(I need not speake him more then thou remembrest,)
Whom to dishonor by a meaner choice,
Were injury and infamy,
Clarif. to goodnes,
To time and vertuous mention.
Mar. I have vow'd,
Observe me now Cesario, that how ere
I may be forc't to marry, yet no tyranny,
Perswasions, flattery, guifts, intreats, or tortures,
Shall draw me to a second bed.
Clar. 'Tis Iust too
Maria. Yes and tis Iust Clarissa. I allow
The Dukes late sentence, am resolv'd young man
To be thy wife, but when the ceremony
Of marriage is perform'd, in life I wil bee
Though not in name a widdow.
Ces. Pray a word Tee,
Shall I in earnest never be your bedfellow?
Maria. Never, ô never; and tis for your good too.
Ces. Prove that.
Mar. Alas too many yeares are numbred
In my account to entertaine the benefit
Which youth in thee Cesario and ability Might hope for and require, it were Injustice
To rob a gentleman deserving memory
Of Issue to preserve it.
Ces. No more herein,
You are an excellent patterne of true piety,
Let me now turne your advocate. Pray looke into
The order of the Duke. I injoynd, admit
I satisfie the sentence without mariage with you, how then?
Mar. Cesario.
Ces. If I know
How to acquit your feares, yet keepe th'injunction
In every clause whole and entire, your charity
Will call me still your servant.
Mar. Still my son.
Ces. Right Madam, now you have it, still your son.
The Genius of your blessings hath instructed
Your tongue oraculously, wee wil forget
How once I and Clarissa enterchangd
The tyes of brother and of sister, henceforth
New stile us man and wife.
Cla. By what authority
Ces. Heavens great appointment, yet in all my dotage
On thy perfections, when I thought Clarissa
Wee had beene pledges of one wombe, no loose
No wanton heat of youth, desir'd to claime
Priority in thy affections, other
Then nature might commend, Chastly I tendred
Thy farewell as a brother ought; but since
Our bloods are strangers, let our hearts contract
A long life-lasting unity, for this way
The sentence is to be observd or no way.
Mar. Then no way.
Ces. I expected other answer Madam from you.
Mar. No, every age shall curse me,
The monster, and the prodigie of nature,
Horrors beyond extremity.
Cla. Pray mother confine the violence of greife
Ces. Yes mother, pray do.
Mar. Thus some catch at a matrons honor
By flying lust to plot Incestuous witchcrafts,
More terrible then whoredomes, cruell mercy
When to preserve the body from a death
The soule is strangled.
Ces. This is more then passion.
It comes neere to distraction.
Mar. I am quieted.
Cesario, thou maist tell the Duke secretely
Alberts titles, honors and revenues,
The Duke may give away, Injoy them thou,
Clarissas birthright, Mariana's dower
Thou shalt be Lord of; turne us to the world
Vnpitied and unfreinded, yet my bed
Thou never steep'st in; as for her, she heares me,
If she as much as in a thought a consent,

That

That thou may'st call her wife, a Mothers curse
Shall never leave her.
Clar. As a brother once
I lov'd you, as a noble freind yet honor ye,
But for a husband sir, I dare not owne you,
My faith is given already.
Cef. To a Villaine, Ile cut his throat.
Mar. Why this is more then passion?
It comes neere a distraction.
Clar. Call to minde Sir.
How much you have abated of that goodnesse
Which once raign'd in ye, they appear'd so lovely
That such as freindship led to observation
Enter Baptista and Mentivole.
Courted the great example.
Cef. Left and flatter'd into a broad derision
Mar. Why dee thinke so?
My Lord Baptista, is your sonne growne cold
In hasting on the marriage, which his vowes
Have seald to my wrongd daughter?
Bap. Wee come Lady, to consummate the contract.
Cef. With Mentivole? is he the man?
Ment. Clarissa, troth and mine,
Cesario are recorded in a character
So plaine and certaine, that except the hand
Of heaven which writ it first, would blot it out againe,
No human power can raze it.
Cef. But say you so too? young Lady,
Cla. I should els betray
My heart to falshood, and my tongue to perjury.
Cef. Madam, you know the sentence.
Bap. From the Duke,
I have particular comforts which require
A private eare.
Mar. I shall approve it gladly,
Wee are resolvd Cesario.
Bap. Be not insolent upon a Princes favour.
Cla. Loose no glory,
Your younger yeares have purchast.
Ment. And deservd too y'have many worthy freinds.
Bap. Preserve and use them. Exeunt: Manet Cesar.
Cef. Good, very good, why heres a complement
Of mirth in desperation, I could curse
My fate. ô with what speed men tumble downe
From hopes that soare to high. Biancha now
May scorne me justly too, Clarissa married,
Albertos widdow resolute, Biancha
Refusd, and I forsaken, let me study,
I can but dye a Batchelor thats the worst on't. Exit.
Enter Host, Taylor, Mulster, Dancer, Pedant, Cantemba.
Host. Come Gent'lmen,
This is the day that our great artist hath Promist to give all your severall suites satisfaction.
Dancer. Is he stirring?
Host. He hath beene at his booke these two houres.
Pedant. Heres a rare Physitian.
Host. Why Ile tell you,
Were Paracelsus the German now Living, heed take up his single rapier against his Terrible long sword, he makes it a matter of nothing
To cure the goute, fore eyes he takes out as familiarly,
Washes them, and puts them in againe,
As yours blanch almonds.
Tay. They say he can make gold.
Host. I, I, he learnt it of Kelly in Germany.
Theres not a Chimist
In christendome can goe beyond him for multiplying.
Pedant. Take heed then,
He get not up your daughters belly my Host.
Host. You are a merry Gentleman
And the man of art will love you the better.
Dancer. Does he love mirth and crotchets?
Host. O hees the most courteous Physitian,
You may drink or drab in's company freely,
The better he knowes how your disease growes,
The better he knowes how to cure it.
Danc. But I wonder my Host
He has no more resort of Ladyes to him.
Host. Why Sir?
Dan. O divers of them have great beleife in conjurers
Lechery is a great helpe to the quality.
Host. Hee's scarce knowne to be in towne yet,
Ere long we shall have em come hurrying hither in Fetherbeds,
Dan. How? bedridden.
Host. No sir, in fetherbeds that move upon 4 wheeles in Spanish caroches.
Ped. Pray acquaint him we give attendance.
Host, I shall gentlemen. I would faine be rid
Of these rascalls, but that they raise profit
To my wine-seller;
When I have made use of them sufficiently,
I will intreat the conjurer to tye crackers to their tailes,
And send them packing.
Enter Foroboſco as in his Study. (A paper)
Foro. Come hither mine Host looke here.
Host. Whats that?
Foro. A challenge from my man.
Host. For breakings pate?
Foro. He writes here if I meet him not Ith Feild within this halfe houre,
I shall heare more from him.
Host. O sir, minde your profit,
Nere thinke of the rascall, here are the gentlemen.
Foro. Morrow my worthy clients,
What are you all prepard of your questions?
That I may give my resolution upon them,
Omnes. We are sir.
Pedant. And have brought our mony.
Foro Each then in order,
And differ not for precedency.
Dan. I am buying of an office sir,
And to that purpose I would faine learne to dissemble cunningly.
Foro. Doe you come to me for that? you should rather Have gone to a cunning woman.
Danc. I sir but their Instructions are but like women,
Pretty well but not to the depth, as I'de have it,
You are a conjurer, the devils master,
And I would learn it from you so exactly,
Foro. That the divill himselfe
Might not go beyond you,
Danc. You are ith right sir.
Foro. And so your mony for your purchase
Might come in againe within a 12 month.
Danc. I would be a Graduate sir, no freshman.
Foro. Heres my hand sir,
I will make you dissemble so methodically,
As if the divell should be sent from the great Turke,
In the shape of an Embassador
To set all the christian princes at variance.
Danc. I cannot with any modesty desire any more,
Theres your mony sir,
Foco. For the art of dissembling.

Cox. My ſuite ſir will be newes to you when I tell it, Foro. Pray on.
Cox. I would ſet up a preſſe here in Italy,
To write all the Caranta for Chriſtendome.
Foro. Thats newes indeed,
And how would you imploy me in't?
Cox. Marry ſir, from you
I would gaine my intell'gence.
Foro. I conceave you, you would have me furniſh you
With a ſpirit to informe you.
Cox. But as quiet a Divell is the woman,
The firſt day and a halfe after ſhe's married,
I can by no meanes indure a tervible one.
Foro. No, no, Ile qualifie him,
He ſhall not fright you,
It ſhall be the ghoſt of ſome lying Stationer,
A Spirit ſhall looke as if butter would not melt in his mouth, A new Mercurius Gallobelgicus.
Cox. O there was a captaine was rare at it,
Foro. Nere thinke of him,
Though that captaine writ a faſt hand gallop,
And waſted indeed more harmleſſe paper then
Ever did laxative Phyſick,
Yet wil I make you to out-ſcribble him,
And ſet downe what you pleaſe,
The world ſhall better beleeve you.
Cox. Worthy ſir I thanke you, there's mony.
Foro. A new office
For writing pragmaticall Curranto's
Pedant. I am a ſchoole-maſter ſir,
And would faine conferre with you
About erecting 4 new ſects of religion at Amſterdam.
Foro. What the Divell ſhould
New ſects of religion doe there?
Pedant. I aſſure you I would get
A great deale of mony by it.
Foro. And what are the 4 new ſects
Of religion you would plant there?
Ped. Why thats it I come about ſir,
Tis a Divel of your raiſing muſt invent 'em,
I confeſſe I am too weake to compaſſe it.
Foro. So ſir, then you make it a matter of no difficulty
To have them tolerated.
Pedant. Trouble not your ſelfe for that,
Let but your Divel ſet them a foot once,
I have Weavers, and Ginger-bread makers,
And mighty Aquavitæ-men, ſhall ſet them a going.
Foro. This is ſomewhat difficult,
And will aske ſome conference with the divell.
Ped. Take your owne leaſure ſir,
I have another buſines too, becauſe I meane
To leave Italy, and bury my ſelfe in thoſe neather parts Of the low countries.
Foro. Whats that ſir.
Ped. Marry I would faine make 9 dayes to the weeke, for the more ample benefit of the captaine.
Foro. You have a ſhrewd pate ſir.
Ped. But how this might be compaſſ'd?
Foro. Compaſſ eaſily; tis but making
A new Almanacke, and dividing the compaſſe
Of the yeare into larger penny-worths,
As a Chandler with his compaſſe makes
A Geometrick proportion of the Holland cheeſe
He retailes by ſtivers.
But for getting of it licenc'd.
Ped. Trouble not your ſelfe with that ſir,
Theres your mony,
Foro. For foure new ſects of religions,
And 9 dayes to the weeke.
Ped. To be brought in at generall pay-dayes,
Write I beſeech you.
Foro. At generall pay-dayes.
Taylor. I am by profeſſion a taylor,
You have heard of me.
Foro. Yes ſir, and will not ſteale from you
The leaſt part of that commendation I have heard utterd.
Taylor. I take meaſure of your worth ſir,
And becauſe I will not afflict you with any large bill
Of circumſtances, I will ſnip off particulars,
I would faine invent ſome ſtrange
And exquiſite new faſhions.
Foro. Are you not travel'd ſir.
Tay. Yes ſir, but have obſerv'd all we can ſee
Or invent are but old ones with new names to'em,
Now I would ſome way or other grow more curious.
Foro. Let me ſee to deviſe new faſhions.
Were you never in the Moone?
Tay. In the Moone tavern! yes ſir often.
Foro. No, I do meane in the new world,
In the world thats in the Moone yonder.
Tay. How? a new world ith moone?
Foro. Yes I aſſure you.
Tay. And peopled?
Foro. O moſt fantaſtically peopled.
Tay. Nay certaine then ther's worke for taylors?
Foro. That there is I aſſure you.
Tay. Yet I have talked with a Scotch taylor
That never diſcover'd ſo much to me,
Though he has travail'd far, and was a pedlar in Poland.
Foro. That was out of his way,
This lies beyond China,
You would ſtudy new faſhions you ſay?
Take my councell, make a voyage,
And diſcover that new world.
Tay. Shall I be a moon-man?
Foro. I am of opinion, the people of that world
(If they be like the nature of that climate they live in)
Do vary the faſhion of their cloathes ofther then any Quick-ſilver'd nation in Europe.
Tay. Not unlikely, but what ſhould that be we call
The man in the moone then?
Foro. Why tis nothing but an Engliſhman
That ſtands there ſtarke naked,
With a paire of ſheires in one hand,
And a great bundle of broad cloath in the other
(Which reſembles the buſh of thornes)
Cutting out of new faſhions.
Taylor I have heard ſomewhat like this,
But how ſhall I get thither?
Foro. Ile make a new compaſſe ſhall direct you.
Tay. Certaine?
Foro. Count me elſe for no man of direction.
Tay. Theres 20 duckats in hand, at my returne
Ile give you a 100.
Foro. A new voyage to diſcover new faſhions.
Mul. I have been a travailer too ſir,
That have ſhewed ſtrange beaſts in Chriſtendome,
And got mony by them, but I finde the trade to decay.
Your Camelion, or Eaſt-Indian hedg-hog
Gets very little mony, and your Elephant devoures
So much bread, brings in ſo little profit,
His keeper were better every morning
Cram 15 Taylors with white manchet,
I would have ſome new ſpectacle,

And one that might be more attractive.

Foro. Let me see, were you ever in Spaine?

Mule. Not yet Sir.

Foro. I would have you go to Madrill, and against some great festivall, when the court lies there, provide a great and spacious Englisb Oxe, and roste him whole, with a pudding in's belly; that would be the eight wonder of the world in those parts I assure you.

Mule. A rare project without question.

Foro. Goe beyond all their garlike olla Podrithoes, though you sod one in Garquentuas cauldron, bring in more mony, then all the monsters of Affrick.

Host. Good Sir do your best for him; he's of my acquaintance, and one if ye knew him——

Foro. What is he?

Host. He was once a man of infinite letters.

Foro. A Scholler?

Host. No sir, a packet carrier, which is alwaies a man of many letters, you know: then he was Mule-driver, now hee's a gentleman, and feedes monsters.

Foro. A most ungratefull calling.

Mule. Ther's mony for your direction; the price of the Oxe Sir.

Foro. A hundred French crownes, for it must be a Linsoine shire Oxe, and a prime one:

For a rare and monstrous spectacle, to be seen at Madrill.

Enter Clown, Hostesse, and Bianca.

Hostes. Pray forbeare sir, we shall have a new quarrell.

Clow. You durst not meet me ith' field, I am therefore come to spoyle your market.

Foro. Whats the newes with you sir.

Clow. Gentlemen, you that come hither to be most abominably cheated, listen, and be as wise as your planet will suffer you, keep your mony, be not guld, be not laught at.

Pedant. What meanes this? would I had my mony againe in my pocket.

Host. The fellow is full of malice, do not mind him.

Clow. This professt cheating rogue was my master, and I confesse my selfe a more preternotorious rogue then himselfe, in so long keeping his villainous counsell.

Foro. Come, come, I will not heare you.

Clow. No couzner, thou wouldest not heare me, I do but dare thee to suffer me to speake, and then thou and all thy divells spit fire, and spoute Aqua fortis.

Foro. Speake on, I freely permit thee.

Clow. Why then know all you simple animals, you whose purses are ready to cast the calfe, if they have not cast it already, if you give any credit this jugling rascal, you are worse then simple widgins, and will be drawne into the net by this decoy ducke, this tame cheater.

Foro. Ha, ha, ha, pray marke him.

Clow. He does professe Physicke, and counjuring; for his Physicke; he has but two medicins for all manner of diseases; when he was i'th low countryes, he us'd nothing but butterd beere, colourd with Allegant, for all kind of maladies, and that he called his catholick medicine; sure the ducth smelt out it was butterd beere, else they would never have endur'd it for the names sake: then does he ministera grated dogs turd instead of Rubarbe, many times of Vnicornes horne, which working strongly with the conceit of the Patient, would make them becummer to the height of a mighty purgation.

Foro. The rogue has studied this invective.

Clow. Now for his conjuring, the witches of Lapland are the divells chaire-women to him, for they will sell a man a winde to some purpose; he sells winde, and tells you fortye lyes over and over.

Hostes. I thought what we should find of him.

Host. Hold your prating, be not you an hereticke.

Clow. Conjure! Ile tell you, all the divells names he calls upon, are but sustian names, gathered out of welch heraldry; in breife, he is a rogue of six reprieves, foure pardones of course, thrice pilloried, twince sung Lacrymæ to the Virginalls of a carts taile, h'as five times been in the Gallies, and will never truly run himselfe out of breath, till he comes to the gallowes.

Foro. You have heard worthy gentlemen, what this lying detracting rascall has vomited.

Tay. Yes certaine, but we have a better trust in you, for you have taine our mony.

Foro. I have so, truth is he was my servant, and for some chastisement I gave him, he does practise thus upon me; speake truly sirra, are you certaine I cannot conjure?

Clow. Conjure! ha, ha, ha.

Foro. Nay, nay, but be very sure of it.

Clow. Sure of it? why Ile make a bargaine with thee, before all these gentlemen, use all thy art, all thy roguery, and make me do any thing before al this company I have not a mind to, Ile first give thee leave to claime me for thy bond slave, and when thou hast done hang me.

Foro, Tis a match, sirra, Ile make you caper ith' aire presently.

Clow. I have too solid a body, and my beleife is like a Puritans on Good-Friday, too high fed with capon.

Foro. I will first send thee to Greeke land for a haunch of venison, just of the thickneese of thine own tallow.

Clow. Ha, ha, ha; Ile not stir an inch for thee.

Foro. Thence to Amboyna ith' East-Indies, for pepper to Clow. To Amboyna? so I might be pepperd. (bake it.

Foro. Then will I conveigh thee stark naked to Deveeling to beg a paire of brogs, to hide thy mountainous buttocks.

Clow. And no doublet to 'em?

Foro. No sir, I intend to send you of a sleeveleese errand; but before you vanish, in regard you say I cannot conjure, and ar so stupid, and opinionated a slave, that neither I, nor my art can compell you to do any thing thats beyond your own pleasure, the gentlemen shall have some sport; you cannot endure a cat sirra?

Clow. Whats that to thee Iugler?

Foro. Nor you'l do nothing at my entreaty?

Clow. Ile be hang'd first. (frighted,

Foro. Sit Gentlemen, and whatsoever you see, be not Hostesse: Alas I can endure no coniuring.

Host: Stir not wise.

Bian: Pray let me go sir, I am not fit for these fooleryes.

Host: Move not daughter.

For: I wil make you dance a new dance calld leap-frog.

Clow: Ha, ha, ha.

Fro: And as naked as a frog.

Clow: Ha, ha, ha, I defye thee.

Foro. looker in a booke, strikes with his wand, Musick playes.

Enter 4. Boyes shap't like Frogs, and dance.

Pedant: Spirits of the water in the likenes of frogs.

Tay: he has silent faire beleeve me.

Mule: See, see, he sweats and trembles.

Foro: Are you come to your quavers?

Clow. Oh, oh, oh.

Foro. Ile make you run division on that o's ere I leave you; looke you, here are the playfellowes that are so indeerd to you; come sir, first unease, and then dance, nay Ile make him daunce stark naked.

Host. Oh let him have his shirt on, and his Mogols breeches, here are women ith' house.

Foro. Well for their sakes he shall.

Clown teares off his doublet, making strange faces as if compeld to it, falls into the Daunce.

Tay. He dannces, what a lying rogue was this to say the gentleman could not conjure?

Foro. He does prettily well, but tis voluntary, I assure you, I have no hand in't.

Clow. As you are a Conjurer, and a rare Artist, free me from these couplets; of all creatures I cannot endure a Frog.

Foro. But your dancing is voluntary, I can compell you to nothing.

Hostes. O me, daughter, lets take heed of this fellow, he'le make us dance naked, an' we vex him.

Exeunt Hostesse and Bianca.

Foro. Now cut capers sirra, I le plague that chin of yours.

Clow. Oh, oh, oh, my kidneys are rosted, I drop away like a pound of butter rosted.

Tayl. He will daunce himselfe to death.

Foro. No matter Ile sell his fat to the Pothecaries, and repaire my injury that way.

Host. Enough in conscience.

Foro. Well, at your entreaty vanish. And now I wil only make him breake his neck in doing a sommerser, and thats all the revenge I meane to take of him.

Clow. O gentlemen, what a rogue was I to belye so an approved Master in the noble dark science? you can witnesse, this I did only to spoyle his practise and deprive you of the happynesse of injoying his worthy labours; rogue that I was to do it, pray sir forgive me.

Foro. With what face canst thou ask it?

Clow. With such a face as I deserve, with a hanging looke, as all here can testifie.

Foro. Well gentlemen, that you may perceive the goodnes of my temper, I will entertain this rogue again in hope of amendment, for should I turn him off, he would be hanged.

Clow. You may read that in this foule coppy.

Foro. Only with this promise, you shall never cozen any of my patients.

Clow. Never.

Foro. And remember hence forward, that though I cannot counjure, I can make you daunce sirra, go get your selfe into the cottage againe. ——Enter Cæsario.

Clow. I will never more daunce leape Frog: now I have got you into credit, hold it up, and cozen them in abundance.

Foro. Oh rare rascall. ——Exit Clown.

Cesar. How now, a Frankford mart here, a Mountebanke, and his worshipfull auditory.

Host. They are my ghuests Sir.

Cesar. A——upon them, shew your jugling tricks in some other roome.

Host, And why not here Sir?

Cesar. Hence, or sirra I shall spoile your figure slinging, and all their radicall questions.

Omnes Sir we vanish.——Exeunt. Manet Host. & Cæsar.

Host. Signior Cæsario, you make bold with me,
And somewhat I must tell you to a degree of ill manners, they are my ghuests, and men I live by,
And I would know by what authority
You command thus far.

Cesar. By my interest in your daughter.

Host. Interest do you call't? as I remember I never put her out to Vsury on that condition.

Cesar. Pray thee be not angry.

Enter Bianca and Hostesse.

Hostes. I am come to make thee happy, and her happy:
Shee's here; alas my pretty soule, I am come
To give assurance thats beyond thy hope,
Or thy beleife, I bring repentance 'bout me,
And satisfaction, I will marry thee.

Bianca. Ha?

Cæsar. As I live I will, but do not entertain't
With too quick an apprehension of joy,
For that may hurt thee, I have heard some dye of't,

Bian. Do not feare me.

Cæsar Then thou think'st I faigne
This protestation, I will instantly
Before this testimony, my new alliance,
Contract my selfe unto thee, then I hope
We may be more private.

Host. But thou shalt not sir, (bastard gotten,
For so has many a maiden-head been lost, and many a

Ces. Then to give you the best of any assurance in the Entreat thy father to goe fetch a Preist (world,
Wee will instantly to bed, and there be married.

Bian. Pride hath not yet forsaken you I see,
Though prosperity has.

Host. Sir you are too confident
To fashion to your selfe a dreame of purchase
When you are a begger,

Ces. you are bold with me.

Hostes. Doe we not know your value is cried downe Fourescore i'th hundred.

Bian Oh sir I did love you
With such a fixed heart, that in that minute
Wherein you slighted, or contemn'd me rather,
I tooke a vow to obey your last decree,
And never more looke up at any hope
Should bring me comfort that way, and though since
Your Foster-mother, and the faire Clarissa
Have in the way of marriage despis'd you,
That hath not any way bred my revenge,
But compassion rather. I have found
So much sorrow in the way to a chaste wedlock
That here I will set downe, and never wish
To come to'th journies end. Your suite to mee Henceforth be ever silence't.

Cesar. My Bianca.

Hostes. Henceforward pray forbeare her and my house:
She's a poore vertuous wench, yet her estate
May weigh with yours in a gold balance.

Host. Yes, and her birth in any Heralds office in Christendome.

Hostes. It may prove so:
When you'l say, you have leapt a Whiteing. Exit.

Enter Baptista and Mentivole.

Ces, How far am I growne behind hand with fortune?

Bap. Here's Cesario!
My son sir is to morrow to be married
Vnto the faire Clarissa,

Ces. So.

Ment. Wee hope youle be a gueste there?

Ces. No I will not grace your triumph so much.

Bap. I'le will not tax your breeding.
But it alters not your birth sir, fare you well.

Ment. Oh sir doe not greive him,
He has to much affliction already. Exeunt.

Enter a Sailor.

Ces. Every way scorn'd and left,
Shame follow you
For I am growne most miserable.

Sail.

Sail. Sir doe you know a Ladies son in towne here
They cal Cesario?
Cesar. Ther's none such I assure thee;
Sail. I was told you were the man.
Cesar. Whats that to thee? Sir?
Sail. A——on't. You are melancholy, will you drink Cesar. With whom?
Sail. With mee Sir; despise not this pitcht Canvas; the time was wee have knowne them lined with Spanish Duckets; I have news for you:
Cesar. For me!
Sail. Not unlesse you'l drink;
We are like our Sea provision, once out of pickle,
We require abundance of drink; I have news to tell you
That were you Prince,
Would make you send your mandate
To have a thousand bonfires made 'ith City,
And pist out agen with nothing but Greek wine.
Cesar. Come, I wil drink with thee howsoever, (Exeunt.
Sail. And upon these terms I wil utter my mind to you.

Actus Quintus Scena prima.

Enter Alberoio, Prospero, Juliana, and Saylors.

Sail. SHall we bring your necessaries ashore my Lord?
Alb. Do what you please, I am land-sicke, worse by far
Then ere I was at sea.
Pros. Collect your selfe
Albert. O my most worthy Prospero, my best friend,
The noble favor I receivd from thee
In freeing me from the Turks I now accompt
Worse than my death; for I shall never live
To make requitall; what doe you attend for?
Sail. To understand your pleasure.
Albert. They doe mock me;
I doe protest I have no kind of pleasure
In any thing i'th world, but in thy friendship,
I must ever except that.
Pros. Pray leave him, leave him.——Exeunt Sailors.
Albert. The newes I heard related since my landing
Of the division of my Family,
How is it possible for any man
To bear't with a set patience?
Pros. You have suffer'd
Since your imprisonment more waighty sorrowes.
Albert. I, then I was a mass of flesh and bloud,
Now I am made up of fire, to the full height
Of a deadly Calenture; ô these vild women
That are so ill preservers of mens honors,
They cannot governe their own honesties,
That I should thirty and odde winters feed
My expectation of a noble heire,
And by a womans falshood finde him now
A fiction, a meare dreame of what he was;
And yet I love him still.
Pros. In my opinion
The sentence (on this tryall) from the Duke
Was noble, to repaire Cesarios losse
With the marriage of your wife, had you been dead,
Albert. By your favor but it was not, I conceive T'was disparagment to my name, to have my widdow
Match with a Faulkners son, and yet beleev't
I love the youth still, and much pitty him.
I doe remember at my going to Sea,
Vpon a quarrell, and a hurt receiv'd
From young Montivole, my rage so farre
Oretopt my nobler temper, I gave charge
To have his hand cut off, which since I heard,
And to my comfort, brave Cesario,
Worthyly prevented.
Pros. And 'twas nobly done.
Albert. Yet the revenge, for this intent of mine
Hath bred much slaughter in our families,
And yet my wife (which infinitly moanes me)
Intends to marry my sole heire Clarissa
To the head branch of the other faction.
Pros. Tis the meane to work reconcilement, Albert. Betweene whom?
Pros. Your selfe, and the worthy Baptista.
Albert. Never. (ship,
Pros. O you have been of a noble and remarkable freind-
And by this match tis generally in Florence
Hop'd, twill fully be reconcild; to me
'Twould be absolute content.
Iulia. And to my selfe, I have maine interest in it.
Alb. Noble Sir, you may command my heart to breake
But never to bend that way; poore Cesario, (for you
When thou put'st on thy mournfull willow garland,
Thy enemy shall be suted (I do vow)
In the same livery, my Cesario
Loved as my foster child, though not my sonne,
Which in some countryes formerly were barbarous,
Was a name held most affectionate; thou art lost,
Vnfortunate young man, not only slighted
Where thou receiv'st thy breeding, but since scorn'd
Ith' way of marriage, by the poore Bianca
The In-keepers daughter.
Pros. I have heard of that too,
But let not that afflict you; for this Lady
May happily deliver at more leasure
A circumstance may draw a faire event,
Better then you can hope for.
For this present we must leave you,
And shall visit you againe within these two houres.
——Enter Cesario.
Albert. Ever to me most welcome,——O my Cesario.
Cesar. I am none of yours Sir, so tis protested;
And I humbly beg,
Since tis not in your power to preserve me
Any longer in a noble course of life,
Give me a worthy death.
Albert. The youth is mad.
Cesar. Nay Sir, I will instruct you in a way
To kill me honorably.
Albert. That were most strange.
Cesar. I am turning Pirate, You may be imployed
By the Duke to fetch me in; and in a sea-fight
Give me a noble grave.
Albert. Questionlesse he's mad; I would give any Doctor
A thousand crownes to free him from this sorrow.
Cesar. Here's the Physitian.——Shewes a Pocket.
Albert. Hold Sir, I did say
To free you from the sorrow, not from life.
Cesar. Why life and sorrow are unseparable.
Albert. Be comforted Cesario, Montivole
Shall not marry Clarissa.
Cesar. No Sir, ere he shall, Ile kill him.
Albert. But you forfeit your own life then.
Cesar. Thats worth nothing.
Albert. Cesario, be thy selfe, be mine Cesario,
Make not thy selfe uncapable of that portion
I have full purpose to confer upon thee;

By falling into madneſſe, beare thy wrongs
With noble patience, the afflicted freind
Which ever in all actions crownes the end.
Ceſ. You well awake me, nay recover'd me
Both to ſence and full life, ô moſt noble ſir,
Though I have loſt my fortune, and loſt you
For a worthy Father; yet I will not looſe
My former vertue, my integrity
Shall not yet forſake me; but as the wilde Ivy,
Spredds and thrives better in ſome pittious ruin
Of tower, or defac'd Temple, then it does Planted by a new building: ſo ſhall I
Make my adverſity my inſtrument
To winde me up into a full content.
Mber. Tis worthily reſolv'd; our firſt adventure
Is to ſtop the marriage; for thy other loſſes,
Practis'd by a womans malice, but account them
Like conjurers windes rais'd to a fearefull blaſt,
And doe ſome miſcheife, but do never laſt. Exeunt.

Enter Foreboſco and Clowne.

Clow. Now ſir, will you not acknowledge that I have mightily advanced your practice?
Foreboſ. Tis confeſt, and I will make thee a great man for't.
Clow. I take a courſe to do that my ſelfe, for I drinke ſack in abundance.
Fore. O my rare raſcall. We muſt remove.
Clow. Whither?
Fore. Any whither: Europe is to little to be cozned by us, I am ambitious to goe to the Eaſt-Indies, thou and I to ride on one brace of Elephants.
Clow. And for my part I long to be in England agen; you wil never get ſo much as in England, we have ſhifted many countryes, and many names: but traunce the world over you ſhall never purſe up ſo much gold as when you were in Englan d, and call'd your ſelfe Doctor Lambeſtones.
Fore. Twas an attractive name I confeſſe, women were then my only admirers.
Clow. And all their viſits was either to further their luſt, or revenge injuries.
Fore. You ſhould have forty in a morning beleager my cloſett, and ſtrive who ſhould be cozend firſt, amongſt fourefcore love-ſick waighting women that has come to me in a morning to learne what fortune ſhould betide them in their firſt marriage, I have found above 94 to have loſt their maidenheads.
Clow. By their owne confeſſion, but I was faine to be your male midwife, and worke it out of them by circumſtance.
Fore. Thou waſt, and yet for all this frequent reſort of women and thy handling of their urinalls and their caſes, thou art not given to lechery, what ſhould be the reaſon of it? thou haſt wholſome fleſh enough about thee; me thinkes the divell ſhould tempt thee too't.
Clow. What need he do that, when he makes me his inſtrument to tempt others.
Fore. Thou canſt not chuſe but utter thy rare good parts; thou waſt an excellent baude I acknowledge.
Clow. Well, and what I have done that way I will ſpare to ſpeake of all yoh and I have done ſir, and though we ſhould——
Fore. We will for England, thats for certaine.
Clow. We ſhall never want there.
Fore. Want? the Court of Wards ſhall want monny firſt, for I profeſſe my ſelfe Lord Paramount over fooles and madfolkes.
Clow. Do but ſtore your ſelfe with lyes enough againſt you come thither,
Fore. VVhy thats all the familiarity I ever had with the Divell, my guift of lying, they ſay hees the Father of lyes, and though I cannot conjure, yet I profeſſe my ſelfe to be one of his poore goſſips. I will now reveale to thee a rare peece of ſervice.
Clow. VVhat is it my moſt worſhipful Doctor Lambſtones.
Fore. There is a Captaine come lately from Sea, They call Proſper I ſaw him this morning Through a chincke of wainſcote that divides my lodging And the Hoſt of the houſe, withdraw my Hoſt, and Hoſteſſe, the faire Bianche, and an antient gentlewoman into their bedchamber; I could not overheare their conference, but I ſaw ſuch a maſſe of gold & Iewels, & when he had done he lock't it up into a casket; great joy there was amongſt them & forth they are gone into the city, and my Hoſt told me at his going forth he thought he ſhould not returne till after ſupper: now ſir, in their abſence will we fall to our picklocks, enter the chamber, ſeize the Iewels, make an eſcape from Florence, and wee are made for ever.
Clow. But if they ſhould goe to a true conjurer, and fetch us back in a whirlewinde?
Fore. Doe not beleeve there is any ſuch fetch in Aſtrology, and this may be a meanes to make us live honeſt hereafter.
Clow. Tis but an ill road too't that lyes through the high way of theeving.
Fore. For indeed I am weary of this trade of fortune-telling, and meane to give all over, when I come into England, for it is a very ticklish quality.
Clow. And ith end will hang by a twine thred.
Fore. Beſides the Iſland has too many of the profeſſion, they hinder one anothers market.
Clow. No, no, the pillory hinders their market.
Fore. You know there the jugling captaine.
Clow. I theres a fine carde.
Fore. Onely the fore-man of their jury is dead, but he dyed like a Roman.
Clow. Elſe tis thought he had made worke for the hangman.
Fore. And the very Ball of your falſe prophets, hee's quaſht too.
Clow. He did meaſure the ſtarres with a falſe yard, and may now travaile to Rome with a morter on's head to ſee if he can recover his mony that way.
Fore. Come, come, lets fiſh for this casket, and to Sea preſently.
Clow. We ſhall never reach London I feare;
My minde runs ſo much of hanging landing at wapping.

Enter Mariana. Exeunt.

This well may be a day of joy long wiſh'd for
To my Clariſſa, ſhee is innocent.
Nor can her youth but within open beſome
Meet Himens pleaſing bounties, but to me
That am invirond with black guilt and horror
It does appeare a funerall though promiſing much
In the conception were hard to manage
But fad in the event, it was not hate
But fond indulgence in me to preſerve
Ceſarios threatned life in open court
That forc'd me to diſclaime him, chooſing rather
To rob him of his birth-right and honor
Then ſuffer him to run the hazard of Inrag'de Baptiſtas fury, while he lives;

I know I have a ſonne, and the Dukes ſentence
A while deluded, and this tempeſt over,
When he aſſures himſelfe deſpaire hath ſeiz'd him.
Knock within. Enter Baptiſta.
I can relieve and raiſe him——ſpeake, who is it
That preſſes on my privacies? Sir your pardon.
You cannot come unwelcome, though it were
To reade my ſecret thoughts.
Bap. Lady to you
Mine ſhall be ever open; Lady ſaid I,
That name keeps too much diſtance, ſiſter rather
I ſhould have ſtilde you, and I now may claime it,
Since our divided families are made one
By this bleſſed marriage; to whoſe honor comes
The Duke in perſon, waited on by all
The braveries of his Court, to witneſſe it,
And then to be our gheſts, is the bride ready
To meet and entertaine him?
Maria. She attends the comming of your ſonne.
Bap. Pray you bring her forth.
The Dukes at hand——Muſick in her loud voyce,
Speakes his arrivall.
Maria. Shee's prepard to meet it. ——Exit.

Enter Mariana, Clariſſa led by two Maides: at the other doore, Baptiſta meetes with Mentivole, led by two Courtiers, the Duke, Biſhop, diverſe Attendants: (A Song) whilſt they ſalute.

Duke It were impertinent to wiſh you joy,
Since all joyes dwell about you, Himens torch
Was never ſlighted with a luckier omen,
Nor burnt with ſo much ſplendor, to defer
With fruitleſſe complement, the meanes to make
Your certain pleaſures lawfull to the world;
Since in the union of your hearts they are Confirmd already: would but argue us
A boaſter of our favours; to the Temple
And there the ſacred knot once tyde, all t'riumphs
Our Dukedome can afford, ſhall grace your nuptialls.
Enter Alberto and Caſario.
Bap. On there.
Ment. I hope it is not in the power
Of any to croſſe us now.
Alber. But in the breath
Of a wrongd Father I forbid the bands.
Ceſar. What, doe you ſtand at gaze?
Bap. Riſen from the dead?
Maria. Although the ſea had vomitted up the figure,
In which thy better part lived long imprifond,
True love deſpiſing feare, runs thus to meete it.
Clariſ. In duty I kneele to it.
Alber. Hence vile wretches,
To you I am a ſubſtance incorporeall,
And not to be prophand, with your vile touch?
That could ſo ſcorne forget me, but ſuch things
Are neither worth my anger, nor reproofe.
To you great ſir, I turne my ſelfe and theſe
Immediate Miniſters of your government,
And if in my rude language I tranſgreſſe,
Aſcribe it to the cold remembrance of
My ſervices, and not my ragged temper.
Duke. Speake freely, be thy language ne're ſo bitter,
To ſee thee ſafe Alberto, ſignes thy pardon.
Alber. My pardon? I can need none, if it be not Receivd for an offence. I tamely beare Wrongs, which a ſlave-born Muſcovite would check at.
Why if for treaſon I had beene delivard
Vp to the hangmans Axe, and this dead trunck
Vnworthy of a Chriſtian Sepulcher,
Expoſd a prey to the ravenous vulture,
The memory of the much I oft did for you,
Had you but any touch of gratitude,
Or thought of my deſervings, would have ſtopd you
From theſe unjuſt proceedings.
Duke. Heare the motives that did induce us.
Alber. I have heard them all,
Your highneſſe ſentence, the whole Court abuſd,
By the perjuries, and practiſe of this woman.
(Wee peſt thou Crocodile) my hopefull ſon,
Whom I dare ſweare mine owne, degraded of
The honors that deſcend to him from me;
And from that in his love found by a creature
Whoſe baſe birth though made eminent by her beauty,
Might well have markd her out Caſarios ſervant,
All this I could have pardond and forgot;
But that my daughter with my whole eſtate
So hardly purchaſd, is aſſigned a dower;
To one whoſe Father, and whole family
I ſo deteſt; that I would looſe my eſſence
And be transformed to a Baſiliske
To look them dead, to me's an injury,
Admits no ſatisfaction.
Bap. Ther's none offerd.
Alber. Nor would not be accepted,
Though upon thy knees t'were tendered.
Maria. Now the ſtorme grows high.
Bap. But that I thought thee dead; and in thy death
The brinie Ocean had entombd thy name;
I would have ſought a wife in a Bordello
For my Mentivole, and gladly hugd
Her ſpurious Iſſue as my lawfull Nephewes,
Before his blood ſhould ere have mixd with thine;
So much I ſcorne it. (contract.
Alber. I'll not bandy words, but thus diſſolve the Bap. There I meet thee, and ſeize on whats mine owne.
Alber. For all my ſervice,
Great Sir grant me the combat with this wretch,
That I may ſcourge his inſolence.
Baptiſt. I kneele for it.
Ceſar. And to approve my ſelfe Albertos ſonne,
I'le be his ſecond upon any odds,
Gainſt him that dare moſt of Baptiſtas race.
Ment. Already upon honorable termes,
In me thou haſt met thy better, for her ſake
I'le adde no more.
Alber. Sir, let our ſwords decide it.
Maria. O ſtay Sir, and as you would hold the title
Of a juſt Prince, ere you grant licence to Theſe mad-mens fury, lend your private eare
To the moſt diſtres'd of women.
Duke. Speake, tis granted. He takes Mariana aſide.
Clar. In the meane time, let not Clariſſa be
A patient looker on, though as yet doubtfull,
To whom to bend her knee firſt, yet to all
I ſtoop thus low in duty, and would waſh
The duſt of fury with my Virgin teares,
From his bleſſd feete, and make them beautifull,
That would move to conditions of peace,
Though with a ſnaile like pace, they all are wingd
To beare you to deſtruction: reverend ſirs,
Think on your ancient friendſhip cimented
With ſo much bloud, but ſhed in noble action,
Divided now in paſſion for a brawle;

The makers blush to own, much lov'd Caſario,
Brother, or friend, (each title may prevaile,)
Remember with what tenderneſſe from our child-hood
Wee lov'd together, you preferring me
Before your ſelfe, and I ſo fond of you
That it begot ſuſpition in ill mindes
That our affection was inceſtuous.
Thinke of that happy time, in which I know
That with your deereſt blood you had prevented
This ſhowre of teares from me Mentivole,
My husband, regiſtred in that bright ſtar-chamber,
Though now on earth made ſtrangers, be the example
And offer in one hande the peacefull Olive
Of concord, or if that can be denyed
By powerfull interceſſion in the other
Carry the Hermian rod and force atonement,
Now we will not bee all marble, Deaths the worſt then
And hee ſhall be my bridegroome, offers to kill her ſelfe
Ment. Hold Clariſſa, his loving violence needs muſt Offer in ſpite of honor—he ſnatches away her knife and ſets it to his owne breaſt, ſhe ſtayes his hand.
Duke. Was it to that end then on your religion?
Mar. And my hope in heaven Sir.
Duke. Wee then will leave entreaties, and make uſe
Of our authority, muſt I cry ai-me
To this unheard of inſolence? in my preſence
To draw your ſwords, and as all reverence
Thats due to majeſty were forfeited, cheriſh this wildentſſe! ſheath them inſtantly, and ſhew an alteration in your lookes, or by my power Alber, Cut of my head (bad man.
Bapt. And mine, rather then heare of peace with this I'le not alone give up my throat, but ſuffer
Your rage to reach my family.

Enter Proſpero, Iuliana, Biancha.

Alb. And my name to be no more remembred.
Duke. What are theſe?
Caſ. Biancha, tis Bianeha, ſtill Biancha: but ſtrangely alter'd.
Bapt. If that thirteene yeares
Of abſence could raze from my memory
The figure of my freind, I might forget thee;
But if thy Image be graven on my heart,
Thou art my Proſpero.
Proſ. Thou my Baptiſta?
Duke. A ſuddaine change!
Bap. I dare not aske deere freind
If Juliana live! for thats a bleſſing
I am unworthy of, but yet deny not
To let me know the place ſhe hath made happy
By having there her ſepulcher.
Proſ. If your highneſſe pleaſe to vouchſafe a patient
Eare wee ſhall make a true relation of a ſtory
That ſhall call on your wonder.
Duke. Speake, wee heare you.
Proſ. Baptiſtas Fortune in the Genoa court,
His baniſhment, with his faire wifes reſtraint
You are acquainted with; what ſince hath follow'd
I faithfully will deliver, ere eight moones
After Baptiſtas abſence were compleate,
Faire Juliana founde the pleaſures that
They had injoy'd together were not barren,
And bluſhing at the burthen of her wombe,
No father neere to owne it, it drew on
A violent ſickneſſe, which call'd downe compaſſion
From the angry Duke, then carefull of her health.
Phyſitians were enquir'd of, and their judgment
Preſcrib'd the Bathes of Luca as a meanes
For her recovery; to my charge it pleas'd her
To be committed; but as on the way
Wee journy'd, thoſe throwes only knowne to women
Came thick upon her, in a private village.
Bap. Shee died?
Proſ. Have patience, ſhe brought to the world
A hopefull daughter; for her bodies ſickneſſe
It ſoone deca i'd, but the greife of her minde
Hourely increas'd, and life grew tedious to her,
And deſperate ere to ſee you; ſhe injoyn'd me
To place her in a Greekiſh Monaſtery,
And to my care gave up her pretty daughter.
Bapt. What monaſtery? as a Pilgrim bare-foot,
Ile ſearch it out.
Proſ. Pray you interrupt me not,
Now to my fortunes; the girle well diſpos'd off
With a faithfull freind of mine, my cruell fate
Made me a priſoner to the Turkiſh gallies,
Where for 12 yeares, theſe hands tugd at the oare,
But fortune tyr'd at length with my afflictions,
Some ſhips of Malta mett the Ottaman fleete,
Charg'd them and boorded them, and gave me freedome
With my deliverers I ſerv'd, and gott
Such reputation with the great Maſter
That he gave me command over a tall
And luſty ſhip, where my firſt happy ſervice
Was to redeeme Alberto rumor'd dead,
But was like me ſurpris'd by Cortugogly.
Alber. I would I had dyed there.
Proſ. And from him learning
Baptiſta liv'd, and their diſſolved freindſhip,
I hois'd up ſailes for Greece, found Iuliana
A votary at her beades; having made knowne
Both that you liv'd, and where you were, ſhe borrow'd
So much from her devotion as to wiſh me
To bring her to you; if the object pleaſe you,
With joy receave her.
Bapt. Rage and fury leave me—throwes away his ſword
I am ſo full of happines, theres no room left
To entertaine you, O my long loſt Iewell,
Light of mine eyes, my ſoules ſtrength.
Julia. My beſt Lord, having Embrac'd you thus,
Death cannot fright me.
Bapt. Live long to do ſo though I ſhould fix here.
Pardon me Proſpero though I enquire my daughters fortune.
Proſ. That your happineſſe
May be at all parts perfect, here ſhe is!
Caſ. Biancha daughter to a princeſſe.
Proſ. True with my faithfull Hoſt I left her,
And with him till now ſhe hath reſided,
Ignorant both of her birth and greatneſſe.
Bap. O my bleſt one. Ioy upon joy over-whelmes me.
Duke. Above wonder.
Alb. I doe begin to melt too, this ſtrange ſtory
Workes much upon me.
Duke Since it hath pleas'd heaven
To grace us with this miracle, I that am
Heavens inſtrument here, determine thus; Alberto
Be not unthankefull for the bleſſings ſhowne you,
Nor you Baptiſta; diſcord was yet never
A welcome ſacrifice; therefore rage layd by,
Embrace as freinds, and let paſs'd difference
Be as a dreame forgotten.
Bap. Tis to me.

Alber.

Alber. And me, and thus confirme it.
Duke. And to tye it
In bonds not to be broken, with the marriage
Of young Mentivole, and faire Clariſſa,
So you conſent great Lady, your Biancha
Shall call Cæſario Husband.
Iulia. Tis a motion I gladly yeeld too.
Cæſar. One in which you make a ſaint can happy. Offers to kneele.
Bian. Kneele not, all forgiven.
Duke. With the Duke your Vnkle I will make attonement, and will have no denyall.

Enter Hoſt, Foreboſco, Clowne and Officers.

Mar. Let this day be ſtill held ſacred.
Hoſt. Now if you can conjure, let the Divell unbind you,
Fore. Wee are both undone.
Clow. Already wee feele it.
Hoſt. Iuſtice ſir,
Duke. What are they?
Proſ. I can reſolve you, ſlaves freed from the Gallyes By the Viceroy of Sicilia.
Duke. Whats their offence?
Hoſt. The robbing me of all my plate and Jewels. I meane the attempting of it.
Clow. Pleaſe your grace I will now diſcover this ſecret, let in earneſt, this honeſt peſtilent rogue, profeſt the art of conjuring, but all the skill that ever he had in the black art was in making a ſeacole fire; only with wearing ſtrange ſhapes he begot admiration amongſt fooles and women.
Fore. Will thou preach thou varlet?
Duke. Why does he gogle with his eyes, and ſtauke ſo?
Clow. This is one of his Magicall raptures.
Fore. I doe vilifie your cenſure, you demand if I am guilty, whir ſayes my cloake by a tricke of legerdemaine, now I am not guilty. I am guarded with innocence, pure ſilver lace I aſſure you.
Clow. Thus have I read to you your vertues, which notwithſtanding I would not have you proud of.
Fore. Out thou concealement of tallow, and counterfeit Mummia.
Duke. To the Gallyes with them both.
Clow. The onely ſea phyſick for a knave is to be baſted in a gally with the oyle of a Bulls peeſell.
Fore. And will not you make a ſoure face at the ſame ſauce, ſirra? I hope to finde thee ſo leane, in one fortnight thou mayeſt be drawne by the eares through the hoop of a firkin.
Duke. Divide them and away with them them to'th Gallyes.
Clow. This will take downe your pride Iugler.
Duke. This day that hath given birth to bleſſings; beyond hope, admits no criminall ſentence, to the Temple and there with humbleneſſe praiſe heavens bounties; For bleſſings here diſcend from thence, but when A ſacrifice in thankes aſcends from men. Exeunt omnes.

FINIS.

Prologue.

THE PROLOGVE.

Playes have their fates, not as in their true ſence
They're underſtood, but as the influence
Of idle cuſtome madly workes upon
The droſſe of many-tongu'd opinion.
A worthy ſtory, how ſoever writ
For language, modeſt mirth, conceite or witt,
Meetes often times with the ſweett commendation
Of hang't, tis ſcurvy, when for approbation
A ligg ſhall be clapt at, and every rime
Prais'd and applauded by a clamorous chime.
Let Ignorance and laughter dwell together,
They are beneath the Muſes pitty. Hether
Come nobler Iudgements, and to thoſe the ſtraine
Of our invention is not bent in vaine.
The faire Maide of the Inne to you commends
Her hopes and welcomes, and withall intends
In th' Entertaines to which ſhe doth invite ye,
All things to pleaſe, and ſome things to delight yee.

LOVES PILGRIMAGE.

Actus Primus. Scæna Prima.

Enter Incubo the Bayliff, Diego the Hoſt.

Inc. SIgnior Don Diego, and mine Hoſt, ſave thee.
Die. I thank you Mr Bayly.
Inc. O the block.
Die. Why, how ſhould I have anſwered?
Inc. Not with that
Negligent rudeneſs: But I kiſs your hands
Signior Don Incubo de Hambre, and then
My titles; Maſter Bayly of Caſtil-blanco:
Thou nere wilt have the elegancy of an Hoſt;
I ſorrow for thee, as my friend and goſſip:
No ſmoak, nor ſteam out-breathing from the kitchen?
There's litle life i'th harth then.
Die. I, there, there,
That is his friendſhip, hearkning for the ſpit,
And ſorrow that he cannot ſmel the pot boil.
Inc. Strange
An Inne ſhould be ſo curſt, and not the ſign
Blaſted, nor withered; very ſtrange, three days now,
And not an egg eat in it, or an onyon. (traps, I,
Die. I think they ha' ſtrew'd the high-wayes with cal-
No horſe dares paſs 'em; I did never know
A week of ſo ſad doings, ſince I firſt
Stood to my ſign-poſt.
Inc. Goſſip, I have found
The root of all; kneel, pray, it is thy ſelf
Art cauſe thereof: each perſon is the founder
Of his own fortune, good; or bad; bnt mend it,
Call for thy cloak, and rapier.
Die. How?
Inc. Do, call,
And put 'em on in haſte: Alter thy fortune,
By appearing worthy of her: Doſt thou think
Her good face ere wil know a man in cuerpo?
In ſingle body, thus? in hoſe, and doblet?
The horſe boyes garb? baſe blank, and half blank cuerpo?
Did I, or Mr Dean of Civil our neighbor
Ere reach our dignities in cuerpo, thinkſt thou,
In ſquirting hoſe, and doublet? Signior, no,
There went more to't: there were cloaks, gowns, caſſocks
And other paramentos; Call, I ſay,
His cloak, and rapier here. Enter Hoſteſſe.
Hoſteſ. What means your worſhip?
Inc. Bring forth thy husbands Sword: ſo hang it on,
And now his cloak, here, caſt it up; I mean
Goſſip, to change your luck, and bring you gueſts.
Hoſteſ. Why? is there charm in this?
Inc. Expect; now walk,
But not the pace of one that runs on errands;
For want of gravity in an Hoſt, is odious:
You may remember Goſſip, if you pleaſe,
(Your wife being then th' Infanta of the Gipſies,
And your ſelf governing a great mans Mules then)
Me a poor Squire at Madrid attending
A Maſter of Ceremonies; But a man, beleeve it,
That knew his place to the gold weight, and ſuch
Have I heard him oft ſay, ought every Hoſt
Within the Catholique' kings dominions
Be in his own houſe.
Die. How?
Inc. A Maſter of Ceremonies:
At leaſt vice-maſter, and to do nought in cuerpo,
That was his maxime; I wil tell thee of him:
He would not ſpeak with an Ambaſſadors Cook,
See a cold bake-meat from a forreign part
In cuerpo: had a dog but ſtaid without,
Or beaſt of quality, as an Engliſh cow,
But to preſent it ſelf, he would put on
His Savoy chain about his neck, the ruff
And cuffs of Holland, then the Naples hat
With the Rome hat-band, and the Florentine agat,
The Millain Sword, the Cloak of Genua, ſet
With Flemiſh buttons, all his given peeces
To entertain 'em in, and complement Knock within.
With a tame Coney, as with the Prince that ſent it.
Die. Liſt, who is there?
Inc. A gueſt and 't be thy wil.
Die. Look Spowſe, cry luck, and we be encounter'd: ha?
Hoſt. Luck then, and good, for 'tis a fine brave gueſt,
With a brave horſe.
Inc. Why now, beleeve of cuerpo Enter Theodoſia.
As you ſhal ſee occaſion: go, and meet him.
Theo. Look to my horſe, I pray you, wel.
Die. He ſhal Sir.
Inc. Oh how beneath his rank and call was that now?
Your horſe ſhal be entreated as becomes
A horſe of faſhion, and his inches.
Theo. O.
Inc. Look to the Cavalier: what ailes he? ſtay
If it concern his horſe, let it not trouble him,
He ſhal have all reſpect the place can yeeld him
Either of barley, or freſh ſtraw.
Die. Good Sir
Look up.
Inc. He ſincks, ſomewhat to caſt upon him,
Hee'l go away in cuerpo elſe.
Die. What, wife!
O your hot waters quickly, and ſome cold
To caſt in his ſweet face.
Hoſt. Alas, fair flowre?
Die. Do'ſtany body entertain his horſe?
Hoſt. Yes, Lazaro has him.
Enter Hoſteſſe with a glaſſe of water.
Inc. Go you ſee him in perſon.
Hoſt. Sir, taſte a litle of this, of mine own water,
I did diſtil't my ſelf; ſweet Lilly look upon me,
You are but newly blown, my pretty Tulip.

Faint not upon your ſtalk, 'tis firme and freſh
Stand up, ſo, bolt upright, you are yet in growing.
Theo. Pray you let me have a chamber.
Hoſt. That you ſhall Sir.
Theo. And where I may be private, I intreat you.
Hoſt. For that introth Sir, we ha' no choice: our houſe
Is but a vent of need, that now and then
Receives a gueſt, between the greater towns
As they come late; onely one room,
Inc. She means Sir, it is none
Of thoſe wild, ſcatter'd heaps, call'd Innes, where ſcarce
The Hoſt is heard, though he wind his horn t'his people,
Here is a competent pile, wherein the man,
Wife, Servants, all doe live within the whiſtle
Hoſt. Onely one room.
Inc. A pretty modeſt quadrangle
She will deſcribe to you.
Hoſt. Wherein ſtands two Beds Sir

Enter Diego.

We have, and where, if any gueſt do come,
He muſt of force be lodg'd, that is the truth Sir.
Theo. But if I pay you for both your beds, methinks
That ſhould alike content you.
Hoſt. That it ſhall Sir.
If I be paid, I am praid.
Theo. Why, ther's a Ducket
Will that make your content?
Hoſt. O the ſweet face on you:
A Ducket? yes, and there were three beds Sir,
And twice ſo many rooms, which is one more,
You ſhould be private in'em all, in all Sir,
No one ſhould have a peece of a bed with you
Not Maſter Deane of Civill himſelf, I ſweare
Though he came naked hither, as once he did
When I had like t'have been tane a bed with the Moore
And guelt by her Maſter: you ſhall be as private,
As if you lay in's owne great houſe, that's haunted,
Where no body comes, they ſay:
Theo. I thank you Hoſteſſe.
Pray you will you ſhew me in.
Hoſt. Yes marry will I Sir,
And pray that not a flea, or a chink vex you

Exit Hoſt. and Theo.

Inc. You forget ſupper: Goſſip: move for ſupper
Dio. 'Tis ſtrange what love to a beaſt may do, his Horſe
Threw him into this fit.
Inc. You ſhall excuſe me
It was his being in Cuerpo, meerly caus'd it.
Dio. Do you think ſo Sir?
Inc. Moſt unlucky Cuerpo,
Naught els, he looks as he would eat porridge,
This gueſt; ha' you ent ready in the houſe?
And a fine peece of kid now? and freſh garlick,

Enter Hoſteſſe.

With a Sardina, and Zant oile? how now?
Has he beſpoke? what will he have a brace,
Or but one partridge, or a ſhort leg'd hen,
Daintyly carbonado'd?
Hoſt. 'Laſſe the dead
May be as ready for a Supper as he.
Inc. Ha?
Hoſt. He has no mind to eat, more then his ſhadow:
Inc. Say you.
Dieg. How do's your worſhip
Inc. I put on
My left ſhoo firſt to day, now I perceive it,
And ſkipt a beed in ſaying 'encore; els
I could not be thus croſs'd: He cannot be Above ſeventeen; one of his years, and have
No better a ſtomach?
Hoſt. And in ſuch good clothes too
Dieg. Nay, thoſe do often make the ſtomach worſe, wife,
That is no reaſon.
Inc. I could at his years Goſſips
(As temperate as you ſee me now) have eaten
My brace of ducks, with my half gooſe, my cony,
And drink my whole twelve Marvedis in wine
As eaſie as I now get down three olyffs.
Dieg. And with your temperance-favour, yet I think Your worſhip would put to't at ſix and thirty
For a good wager; and the meal in too.
Inc. I do not know what mine old mouth can do,
I ha not prov'd it lately
Dieg. That's the grief Sir
Inc. But is he without hope then gone to bed?
Hoſt. I feat ſo Sir, has lock'd the door cloſe to him
Sure he is very ill.
Inc. That is with faſting,
You ſhould ha told him Goſſip, what you had had,
Given him the inventory of your kitchen,
It is the pickelock in an Inne, and often
Opens a cloſe barr'd ſtomach: what may he be troth?
Has he ſo good a Horſe?
Dieg. Oh a brave Jennet,
As ere your worſhip ſaw.
Inc. And he eats
Dieg. Strongly,
Inc. A mighty ſolaſciſme, heaven give me patience,
What creatures has he?
Hoſt. None.
Inc. And ſo well clooth'd,
And ſo well mounted?
Dieg. That's all my wonder Sir,
Who he ſhould be; he is attir'd and hors'd
For the Conſtables ſon of Spaine.
Inc. My wonders more
He ſhould want appetite: well a good night
To both my Goſſips: I will for this time
Put off the thought of ſupping; In the morning
Remember him of breakfaſt pray you,
Hoſt. 'T ſhall Sir,
Dieg. A hungry time Sir.
Inc. We that live like myce
On others meat, muſt watch when we can get it
Hoſt. Yes, but I would not tell him: Our fair gueſt Says, though he eat no ſupper, he will pay for one.
Dieg. Good news: we'l eat it ſpouſe, t'his health,
'Twas politickly done t'admit no ſharers.

Enter Philippo.

Phil. Look to the Mules there, wher's mine Hoſt?
Dieg. Here Sir.
Another Fayerie.
Hoſt. Bleſſe me.
Phil. From what ſweet Hoſteſſe?
Are you affraid o' your gueſts?
Hoſt. From Angels Sir,
I think ther's none but ſuch come here to night,
My houſe had never ſo good luck afore
For brave fine gueſts; and yet the ill luck on't is
I cannot bid you welcome.
Phil. No?
Hoſt. Not lodge you Sir.
Phil. Not, Hoſteſſe?
Hoſt. No in troth Sir, I do tell you

Becauſe

Becauſe you may provide in time: my beds
Are both tane up by a yong Cavalier
That wil, and muſt be private.
Die. He has paid Sir
For all our Chambers.
Hoſt. Which is one: and Beds
Which I already ha' told you are two: But Sir,
So ſweet a creature, I am very ſorry
I cannot lodge you by him; you look ſo like him
Yo'are both the loveliеſt peeces.
Phil. What train has he?
Die. None but himſelf.
Phil. And wil no leſs then both deds
Serve him?
Hoſt. H'as given me a ducket for 'em.
Phil. O.
You give me reaſon Hoſteſſe: Is he handſome,
And yong do you ſay?
Hoſt. O Sir, the delicat'ſt fleſh
And fineſt clothes withall, and ſuch a horſe,
With ſuch a Sadle.
Phil. Shee's in love with all.
The horſe, and him, and Sadle, and clothes: good woman,
Thou juſtifieſt thy Sex; lov'ſt all that's brave:

Enter Incubo.

Sure though I lye o'th ground, ile ſtay here now
And have a ſight of him: you'l give me houſe-room,
Fire, and freſh meat for money: gentle Hoſteſſe
And make me a pallat?
Inc. Sir ſhee ſhal do reaſon:
I underſtood you had another gueſt: Goſſips
Pray you let his Mule be lookt too: have good ſtraw,
And ſtore of bran: And Goſſip do you hear,
Let him not ſtay for ſupper: what good fowle ha' you?
This gentleman would eat a pheaſant.
Hoſt. 'Laſs Sir;
We ha' no ſuch.
Inc. I kiſs your hands fair Sir.
What ha' you then? ſpeak what you have? I'me one Sir
Here for the Catholique King, an Officer
T' enquire what gueſts come to theſe places; you Sir
Appear a perſon of quality, and 'tis fit
You be accommodated: why ſpeak you not,
What ha' you woman? are you afraid to vent
That which you have?
Phil. This is a moſt ſtrange man;
T'appoint my meat.
Hoſt. The half of a cold hen Sir,
And a boil'd quarter of kid, is all i'th houſe.
Inc. Why all's but cold; let him ſee it fourth,
Cover, and give the eye ſome ſatisfaction,
A Travellers ſtomach muſt ſee bread and ſalt,
His belly is nearer to him, then his kindred:
Cold hen 's a pretty meat Sir.
Phil. What you pleaſe;
I am reſolv'd t' obey.
Inc. So is your kid,
With pepper, garlick, and the juice of an Orenge,
She ſhal with ſallads help it, and cleane lynnen;
Diſpatch: what news at Court Sir?
Phil. Faith new tires
Moſt of the Ladies have: the men old Suits,
Only the Kings foel has a new coat
To ſerve you.
Inc. I did gheſs you came from thence Sir.
Phil. But I do know I did not.
Inc. I miſtook Sir.
What hear you of the Archdukes?
Phil. Troth your queſtion.

Enter Hoſteſſe and Servants with Table.

Inc. Of the French buſineſs, What?
Phil. As much.
Inc. No more?
They ſay the French: O that's wel: come I'le help you:
Have you no jibblets now? or a broild raſher
Or ſome ſuch preſent diſh t'aſſiſt?
Hoſt. Not any Sir.
Inc. The more your fault: you nev't ſhould be without Such aydes: what cottage would ha' lackt a pheaſant
At ſuch a time as this? wel, bring yoür hen,
And kid forth quickly.
Phil. That ſhould be my prayer
To ſcape his inquiſition.
Inc. Sir, the French,
They ſay are divided 'bout their match with us,
What think you of it.
Phil. As of naught to me Sir.
Inc. Nay it's as litle to me too: but I love
To ask after theſe things, to know the affections
Of States, and Princes, now and then for bettring.
Phil. Of your own ignorance.
Inc. Yes Sir:
Phil. Many do ſo.
Inc. I cannot live without it: what do you heat
Of our Indian Fleet; they ſay they are well return'd.
Phil. I had no venture with 'em Sir; had you?

Enter Hoſteſſe and Servants with meat.

Inc. Why do you ask Sir?
Phil. 'Cauſe it might concern you,
It do's not me.
Inc. O here's your meat come.
Phil. Thanks,
I welcome it at any price.
Inc. Some ſtools here,
And bid mine Hoſt bring Wine, ile try your kid,
If he be ſweet: he looks wel: yes, he is good;
Ile carve you ſir.
Phil. You uſe me too too princely:
Taſt, and carve too.
Inc. I love to do theſe offices.
Phil. I think you do: for whoſe ſake?
Inc. For themſelves ſir,
The very doing of them is reward.
Phil. Had little faith would not beleeve you Sir.
Inc. Goſſip ſome wine. Enter Diego with Wine.
Die. Here 'tis: and right St Martyn.
Inc. Meaſure me out a glaſs.
Phil. I love the humanity
Us'd in this place:
Inc. Sir, I ſalute you here.
Phil. I kiſs your hands Sir.
Inc. Good wine; it wil beget an appetite:
Fil him; and ſit down, Goſſip, entertain
Your noble gueſt here, as becomes your title.
Die. Pleaſe you to like this wine Sir?
Phil. I diſlike
Nothing mine Hoſt, but that I may not ſee
Your conceal'd gueſt: here's to you.
Die. In good faith Sir,
I wiſh you as wel as him: would you might ſee him.
Inc. And wherefore may he not:
Die. 'Has lock'd himſelf Sir
Up, and has hir'd both the beds o' my wife
At extraordinarie rate.

Phil. Ile give as much
If that will do't, for one, as he for both;-
What say you mine Hoſt, the door once open
Ile fling my ſelf upon the next bed to him
And there's an end of me till morning; noiſe
I will make none.
Dic. I wiſh your worſhip well —but
Inc. His honour is engag'd: And my ſhe Goſſip
Hath paſt her promiſe, hath ſhe not?
Dic. Yes truely:
Inc. That toucheth to the credit of the houſe:
Well, I will eate a little, and think: how ſay you ſir
Unto this brawn o'th hen?
Phil. I ha' more minde
To get this bed ſir.
Inc. Say you ſo: Why then
Giv't me agen, and drink to me: mine Hoſt
Fill him his wine: thou'rt dull, and do'ſt not praiſe it,
I eate but to teach you the way Sir.
Phil. Sir;
Find but the way to lodge me in this chamber
Ile give mine Hoſt two duckets for his bed,
And you ſir two realls: here's to you
Inc. Excuſe me,
I am not mercenary: Goſſip pledge him for me,
Ile think a little more; but ev'n one bit
And then talke on: you cannot interrupt me.
Dic. This peece of wine ſir coſt me
Inc. Stay! I have found:
This little morcell: and then; here's excellent garlick:
Have you not a bunch of grapes now: or ſome Bacon
To give the mouth a reliſh?
Dic. Wife, do you hear?
Inc. It is no matter: Sir, give mine Hoſt your duckets.
Dic. How Sir?
Inc. Do you receive 'em: I will ſave
The honeſty of your houſe: and yours too Goſſip,
And I will lodge the Gentleman: ſhew the Chamber.
Dic. Good Sir do you hear.
Inc. Shew me the Chamber.
Dic. Pray you Sir,
Do not diſturb my gueſts.
Inc. Diſturb? I hope
The Catholique King ſir, may command a lodging
Without diſturbing in his vaſſails houſe,
For any Miniſter of his, emploid
In buſineſs of the State. Where is the door?
Open the door, who are you there? within?
In the Kings name. Theodoſia within.
Theod. What would you have?
Inc. Your key ſir,
And your door open: I have here command
To lodge a Gentleman, from the Juſtice, ſent
Upon the Kings affairs.
Theod. Kings and neceſſities
Muſt be obey'd: the key is under the door.
Inc. How now ſir, are you fitted? you ſeem'd?
Phi. Your two reals are grown a peece of eight.
Inc. Excuſe me Sir.
Phil. 'Twill buy a hen; and wine
Sir, for to morrow. Exit. Phil.
Inc. I do kiſſe your hands Sir
Well this will bear my charge yet to the Gallies
Where I am owing a ducket: whither this night
By the Moons leave Ile march: for in the morning Early they put from Port S. Maries. Exeunt but Diego.
Dic. Lazaro Enter Lazaro.

How do the horſes?
Laz. Would you would go and ſee Sir,
A —— of all Jades, what a clap h'as given me:
As ſure as you live maſter he knew perfectly
I couzend him on's Oats: he lookt upon me
And then he ſneerd, as who ſhould ſay take heed ſirrah:
And when he ſaw our half peck, which you know
Was but an old Court diſh: lord how he ſtampt:
I thought 't had been for joy, when ſuddenly
He cuts me a back caper with his heels
And takes me juſt o'th' crupper: down came I
And all my ounce of Oates: Then he neigh'd out
As though he had had a Mare by'th taile.
Dic. Faith Lazaro
We are to blame to uſe the poor dumb ſerviters
So cruelly.
Laz. Yonder's this other gentlemans horſe
Keeping our Lady eve: the devill a bit
Has got ſince he came in yet: there he ſtands
And looks, and looks, but 'tis your pleaſure ſir
He ſhall look lean enough: has hay before him
But 'tis as big as hemp, and will as ſoon choak him,
Unleſs he eate it butter'd: he had four ſhoos
And good ones when he came: 'tis a ſtrange wonder
With ſtanding ſtill he ſhould caſt three.
Dic. O Lazaro
The devils in this trade: truth never knew it
And to the devill we ſhall travell Lazaro
Unleſs we mend our manners: once every week
I meet with ſuch a knock to moleſte me
Sometimes a dozen to awake my conſcience
Yet ſtill I ſleep ſecurely.
Laz. Certain Maſter
We muſt uſe better dealing.
Dic. 'Faith for mine own part
Not to give ill example to our iſſues,
I could be well content to ſteal but two girths,
And now and then a ſaddle cloth: change a bridle
Onely for exercife.
Laz. If we could ſtay there
There were ſome hope on's Maſter: but the devill is
We are drunk ſo early we miſtake whole Saddles
Sometimes a horſe; and then it ſeems to us too
Every poore Jade has his whole peck, and tumbles
Up to his ears in clean ſtraw, and every bottle
Shews at the leaſt a dozen; when the truth is Sir
Ther's no ſuch matter, not a ſmell of provinder,
Not ſo much ſtraw, as would tye up a horſe mil,
Nor any thing ith' rack, but two old cobwebs
And ſo much rotten hay as had been a hens neſt.
Dic. Well, theſe miſtakings muſt be mended Lazaro,
Theſe apparitions, that abuſe our ſences,
And make us ever apt to ſweep the manger
But put in nothing; theſe fancies muſt be forgot
And we muſt pray it may be reveal'd to us
Whoſe horſe we ought in conſcience to couzen,
And how, and when: A Parſons horſe may ſuffer
A little greazing in his teeth, 'tis wholſome;
And keeps him in a ſober ſhuffle; and his Saddle
May want a ſtirrop; and it may be ſworn
His learning lay on one ſide, and ſo brok it:
Has ever Oates in's cloak-bag to prevent us
And therefore 'tis a meritorious office
To tythe him ſoundly.
Laz. And a Grazier may
For thoſe are pinching ſuckſoyſts, and ſuſpitious;
Suffer a myſt before his eyes ſometimes too.

And think hee ſees his horſe eat half a buſhel:
When the truth is, rubbing his gums with ſalt,
Till all the skin come off: he ſhal but mumble
Like an old woman, that were chewing brawn,
And drop 'em out again.
Die. That may do wel too,
And no doubt 'tis but venial: But good Lazaro
Have you a care of underſtanding horſes,
Horſes with angry heels, gentlemens horſes,
Horſes that know the world; let them have meat
Till their teeth ake; and rubbing till their ribbs
Shine like a wenches forehead; they are devils
Laz. And look into our dealings: as ſure as we live
Theſe Courtiers horſes are a kind of Welſh prophets,
Nothing can be hid from 'em: For mine own part
The next I cozen of that kind, ſhal be founderd,
And of all four too: Ile no more ſuch complements
Upon my crupper.
Die. Steal but a litle longer
Till I am lam'd too, and wee'l repent together,
It wil not be above two daies.
Laz. By that time
I ſhal be wel again, and all forgot Sir.
Dieg. Why then ile ſtay for thee. Exit.

Scæna ſecunda.

Enter Theodoſia, and Phillipo in ſeverall Beds.

Theo. Oh,—ho? oh—ho?
Phil. Ha?
Theo. Oh—oh? heart—heart—heart—heart?
Phil. What's that?
Theo. When wilt thou break?— break, break, break?
Phil. Ha?
I would the voice were ſtrong, or I neerer,
Theo. Shame, ſhame, eternal ſhame? what have I done?
Phil. Done?
Theo. And to no end: what a wild Jorney
Have I more wildly undertaken?
Phil. Jorney?
Theo. How without counſel? care? reaſon? or fear?
Phil. Whither wil this fit carry?
Theo. O my folly:
Phil. This is no common ſickneſs.
Theo. How have I left
All I ſhould love, or keep? O heaven.
Phil. Sir.
Theo. Ha?
Phil. How do you gentle Sir?
Theo. Alas my fortune
Phil. It ſeems your ſorrow oppreſſes: pleaſe your goodneſs
Let me bear half Sir: a divided burthen
Is ſo made lighter.
Theo. Oh,
Phil. That ſigh betrayes
The fulneſs of your grief:
Theo. I, if that grief
Had not bereft me of my underſtanding,
I ſhould have wel remembred where I was,
And in what company; and clapt a lock
Upon this tongue for talking.
Phil. Worthy Sir
Let it not add to your grief, that I have heard
A ſigh, or groan come from you: That is all Sir:
Theo. Good Sir no more: you have heard too much I fear,
Would I had taken poppy when I ſpake it.
Phil. It ſeems you have an ill belief of me
And would have heard much more, had you ſpoke ought
I could interpret. But beleeve it Sir,
Had I had means to look into your breaſt,
And tane you ſleeping here, that ſo ſecurely
I might have read, all that your woe would hide
I would not have betrayd you.
Theo. Sir that ſpeech
Is very noble, and almoſt would tempt
My need to truſt you.
Phil. At your own election,
I dare not make my faith ſo much ſuſpected
As to proteſt again: nor am I curious
To know more then is fit.
Theo. Sir I wil truſt you
But you ſhal promiſe Sir to keep your bed,
And whatſoe'er you hear, not to importune
More I beſeech you from me.
Phil. Sir I wil not.
Theo. Then I am proan to utter.
Phil. My faith for it.
Theo. If I were wiſe, I yet ſhould hold my peace
You wil be noble.
Phil. You ſhal make me ſo
If you'l but think me ſuch.
Theo. I do: then know
You are deceiv'd with whom you have talk ſo long.
I am a moſt unfortunate loſt woman.
Phil. Ha?
Theo. Do not ſtir Sir: I have here a Sword.
Phil. Not I ſweet Lady: of what blood, or name.
Theo. You'l keep your faith.
Phil. Ile periſh elſe.
Theo. Beleeve then
Of birth too noble for me, ſo deſcended—
I am aſhamd, no leſs then I am affrighted.
Phil. Fear not: by all good things, I will not wrong you.
Theo. I am the daughter of a noble Gendeman
Born in this part of Spain: my fathers name Sir?
But why ſhould I abuſe that reverence
When a childs duty has forſaken me.
Phil. All may be mended: in fit time too: ſpeak it
Theo. Alphonſo, ſir.
Phil. Alphonſo? what's your own name?
Theo. Any baſe thing you can invent.
Phil. Deal truely.
Theo. They call me Theodoſia
Phil. Ha? and love
Is that that hath chang'd you thus?
Theo. Ye have obſerv'd me
Too neerly Sir, 'tis that indeed: 'tis love Sir:
And love of him (oh heavens) why ſhould men deal thus?
Why ſhould they uſe their arts to cozen us?
That have no cunning, but our fears about us?
And ever that too late to; no diſſembling
Or double way but doating: too much loving?
Why ſhould they find new oaths, to make more wretches?
Phil. What may his name be?
Theo. Sir a name that promiſes
Me thinks no ſuch ill uſage: Mark-antonio
A noble neighbours Son: Now I muſt deſire ye
To ſtay a while: elſe my weak eyes muſt anſwer.
Phil. I will: —Are ye yet ready? what is his quality?
Theo. His beſt a theef Sir: that he would be known by;
Is, heir to Leonardo, a rich Gendeman;
Next, of a handſome body, had heaven made him
A minde fit to it. To this man, my fortune,
(My more then purblind fortune) grave my faith
Drawn to it by as many ſhews of ſervice
And ſigns of truth, as ever falſe tongue utter'd;

Heaven pardon all.
Phil. Tis wel said: forward Lady.
Theo. Contracted Sir, and by exchange of rings
Our souls deliver'd: nothing left unfinish'd
But the last work, enjoying me, and Ceremony.
For that I must confess was the first wise doubt
I ever made: yet after all this love sir,
All this profession of his faith; when dayly
And hourly I expected the blest priest
Hee left me like a dream, as all this story
Had never been, nor thought of, why I know not;
Yet I have called my conscience to confession,
And every sillable that might offend
I have had in shtift: yet neither loves law Signiour,
Nor ty of maidens duty, but desiring
Have I transgrest in: left his father too,
Nor whither he is gone, or why departed
Can any tongue resolve mee: All my hope (Which keeps mee yet alive, and would perswade mee
I may be once more happy, and thus shapes mee
A shame to all my modest sex) is this Sir,
I have a Brother and his old Companion,
Studient in Sallimanca, there my last hope
If hee bee yet alive, and can be loving
Is left mee to recover him: For which travel
In this Sute left at home of that dear Brothers
Thus as you find mee, without fear, or wisdom,
I have wander'd from my father, fled my friends,
And now am only child of hope and danger:
You are now silent Sir: this tedious story
(That ever keeps mee waking) makes you heavy:
'Tis fit it should do so: for that, and I
Can be but troubles.
Phil. No, I sleep not Lady:
I would I could: oh heaven is this my comfort.
Theo. What aile you gentle Sir?
Phil. Oh.
Theo. Why do you groan so?
Phil. I must, I must; oh misery.
Theo. But now Sir
You were my comfort: if any thing afflict yee
Am not I fit to bear a part on't? and by your own rule.
Phil. No; if you could heal, as you have wounded me,
But 'tis not in your power.
Theo. I fear intemperance.
Phil. Nay do not seek to shun mee: I must see you:
By heaven I must: hoa, there mine Host: a Candle:
Strive not, I wil not stir ye.
Theo. Noble Sir
This is a breach of promise.
Phil. Tender Lady
It shal be none but necessary: hoa, there,
Some light, some light for heavens sake.
Theo. Wil ye betray mee?
Are ye a gentleman?
Phil. Good woman:
Theo. Sir. Enter Diego with a light.
Phil. If I be prejudicial to you, curse mee.
Dieg. Ye are early stirring sir.
Phil. Give mee your Candle
And so good morrow for a while.
Dieg. Good morrow Sir. Exit.
Theo. My Brother Don Philippo: nay Sir, kil mee
I ask no mercy Sir, for none dare know me,
I can deserve none: As ye look upon me
Behold in infinite these foul dishonors
My noble father, then your self: last all
That bear the name of kindred, suffer in mee:
I have forgot whose child I am, whose Sister:
Do you forget the pity tyed to that:
Let not compassion sway you: you wil be then
As foul as I, and bear the same brond with me,
A favourer of my fault: ye have a sword sir,
And such a cause to kil me in.
Phil. Rise Sister:
I wear no sword for women: nor no anger
While your fair chastity is yet untouch'd.
Theo. By those bright starrs, it is Sir.
Phil. For my Sister
I do beleeve ye: and so neer blood has made us
With the dear love I ever bore your vertues
That I wil be a Brother to your griefs too:
Be comforted, 'tis no dishonor Sister
To love, nor to love him you do: he is a gentleman
Of as sweet hopes, as years, as many promises,
As there be growing truths, and great ones.
Theo. O sir!
Phil. Do not despair.
Theo. Can ye forgive?
Phil. Yes Sister,
Though this be no smal error, a far greater.
Theo. And think me stil your Sister?
Phil. My dear Sister.
Theo. And wil you counsel mee?
Phil. To your own peace too:
Ye shal love stil.
Theo. How good ye are?
Phil. My business,
And duty to my father, which now drew mee
From Salimanca, I wil lay aside
And only be your Agent to perswade ye
To leave both love, and him, and wel retyre ye.
Theo. Oh gentle Brother.
Phil. I perceive 'tis folly:
Delayes in love, more dangerous.
Theo. Noble Brother.
Phil. Fear not, ile run your own way: and to help you,
Love having rackt your passions beyond counsel:
Ile hazard mine own fame: whither shal we venture?
Theo. Alas, I know not Sir.
Phil. Come, 'tis bright morning
Let's walk out, and consider: you'l keep this habit.
Theo. I would sir.
Phil. Then it shal be: what must I cal ye?
Come, do not blush: pray speak, I may spoil all elfe.
Theo. Pray cal me Theodoro. Enter Diego.
Dieg. Are ye ready?
The day draws on a pace: once more good morrow.
Theo. Good morrow gentle Host: now I must thank ye Phil. Who do'st thou think this is?
Die. Were you a wench Sir
I think you would know before me.
Phi. Mine own Brother.
Dieg. By th Masse your noses are a kin: should I then
Have been so barbarous to have parted Brothers?
Phi. You knew it then.
Dieg. I knew 'twas necessary
You should be both together: Instinct Signior
Is a great matter in an Host.
Theo. I am satisfied. Enter Pedro.
Ped. Is not mine Host up yet?
Phil. Who's that?
Die. Ile see.
Phil. Sister, withdraw your self.

Pedr.

Pedr. Signiour Philippo
Phil. Noble Don Pedro, where have you been this way?
Pedr I came from Port S^t Maries, whence the Gallyes
Put this last tide, and bound for Barcellona,
I brought Mark-antonie upon his way.
Phil Marc-antonie?
Pedr Who is turn'd Soldier
And entertain'd in the new Regiment,
For Naples.
Phil. Is it possible?
Pedr. I assure you.
Phil. And put they in at Barcellona?
Pedr. So
One of the Masters told me.
Phil. Which way go you Sir?
Pedr. Home;
Phil. And I for Civill: pray you Sir, say not
That you saw me, if you shall meet the question,
I have some little businesse
Pedr. Were it lesse Sir.
It shall not become me, to loose the caution:
Shall we break-fast together?
Phil. Ile come to you Sir:
Sister you hear this: I believe your fortune
Begins to be propitious to you: we will hire
Mules of mine host here: if we can himself
To be our guid, and streight to Barcellona,
This was as happy news, as unexpected
Stay you, till I rid him away.
Theo. I will. Exeunt.

Act. II, Scæna I.

Enter Alphonso and a Servant.

Alph. KNock at the doore.
Ser. Tis open Sir.
Alph. That's all one
Knock when I bid you.
Ser. Will not your worship enter.
Alph. Will not you learn more manners Sir, and do that Your Master bids ye; knock ye knave, or ile knock
Such a round peal about your pate: I enter
Under his roofe, or come to say god save ye
To him, the Son of whose best dealings has undone me.
Knock lowder, lowder yet: ile starve, and not first,
This open ayr is every mans.
2. Ser. within. Come in Sir.

Enter two Servants, Rabl. Alphon.

Alph. No, no Sir, I am none of these come in Sirs
None of those visitants: bid your wise Master
Come out, I have to talk unto him: go Sir
2. Ser. Your worship may be welcome.
Alph. Sir, I will not,
I come not to be welcome: good my three duckets
My pickell'd sprat a day, and no oyl to't,
And once a yeat a cotten coat, leave prating
And tell your Master, I am here.
2. Ser. I will Sir.
This is a strange old man. Exit.
Alph. I welcome to him!
Ile be first welcome to a Pesthouse: Sirrah
Lets have your tongue now civile up, and quiet
When occasion calls, 'tis wisdom in ye,
A Servingman discretion: if you do draw

Enter Leonardo, and Don Zanchio (carried by two Servants in a chair.)

Draw but according to your entertainment;
Five nobles worth of fury.
Leo. Signiour Alphonso.
I hope no discontent from my will given,
Has made ye shun my house: I ever lov'd ye,
An credit me amongst my fears 'tis greatest
To minister offences.
Alph O good Signiour
I know ye for Italian breed, fair tongu'd,
Spare your Appologies, I care not for 'em,
As little for your love Sir; I can live
Without your knowledge, eat mine own, and sleep
Without dependances, or hopes upon ye.
I come to aske my daughter.
Leo. Gentle Sir.
Alph. I am not gentle Sir, nor gentle will be Till I have justice, my poor child restor'd
Your caper-cutting boy has run away with Yong Signior-smooth-face, he that takes up wenches
With smiles, and sweet behaviours, songs, and sonnets,
Your high fed Jennet, that no hedge can hold
They say you bred him for a Stallion.
Zanch. Fie Signiour, there be times, and terms of honour
To argue these things in, descidements able
To speak ye noble gentlemen, ways punctuall
And to the life of credit, ye are too rugged.
Alph. I am too tame Sir.
Leo. Will ye hear but reason?
Alph. No, I will hear no reason: I come not hither
To be pept off with reason: reason then.
Zanch. Why Signior, in all things there must be method
Ye choak the child of honour els, discretion.
Do you conceive an injury?
Alph. What then Sir?
Zanch. Then follow it in fair terms, let your sword bite
When time calls, not your tongue.
Alph. I know Sir
Both when and what to do without directions,
And where, and how, I come not to be tutur'd,
My cause is no mans but mine own: you Signior
Will ye restore my daughter?
Leo. Who detains her?
Alph. No more of these sleight shifts
Leo. Ye urge me Signior
With strange injustice: because my Son has err'd Zanch. Mark him.
Leo. Out of the heat of youth: do'st follow
I must be father of his crimes.
Alph. I say still
Leave off your rhetorick, and restore my daughter.
And sodainly: bring in your rebell too,
Mountdragon, he that mounts without commission
That I may see him punished, and severely,
Or by that holy heaven, ile fire your house,
And ther's my way of honour.
Zanch. Pray give me leave
Was not man made the noblest creature
Alph. Well Sir.
Zanch. Should not his mind then answer to his making,
And to his mind his actions, if this ought to be,
Why do we run a blind way from our worths,
And cancell our discretions, doing those things
To sure offences, are the most offences?
We have rules of justice in us; to those rules
Let us apply our angers: you can consider

The

The want in others of theſe terminations,
And how unfurniſh'd they appear.
Alph. Hang others,
And where the wrongs are open, hang reſpects,
I come not to conſider.
Leo. Noble Sir,
Let us argue cooly, and conſider like men.
Alph. Like men!
Leo. Ye are too ſodain ſtill.
Alph. Like men Sir?
Zanch It is fair language, and ally'd to honour.
Alph. Why, what ſtrange beaſt would your grave reverence
Make me appear? like men!
Zanch. Taſte but that point Sir,
And ye recover all.
Alph. I tell thy wiſdome
I am as much a man, and as good a man.
Leo. All this is granted Sir.
Alph. As wiſe a man.
Zanch. Ye are not tainted that way.
Alph. And a man
Dares make thee no man; or at beſt, a baſe man.
Zanch. Fy, Fy, here wants much carriage.
Alph. Hang much carriage.
Leo. Give me good language ſirrah Signiour.
Alph. Give me my daughter.
Leo. I am as gentle as your ſelf, as free born.
Zanch. Obſerve his way.
Leo. As much reſpect ow'd to me.
Zanch. This hangs together nobly.
Leo. And for Civill
A great deal more it ſeems: go look your daughter.
Zanch. There ye went well off Signiour.
Leo. That rough tongue
You underſtand at firſt: you never think Sir
Out of your mightineſſe, of my loſſe: here I ſtand
A patient anvill, to your burning angers
Made ſubject to your dangers; yet my loſſe equall:
Who ſhall bring home my ſon?
Alph. A whipping Beadle.
Leo. Why, is your daughter whoriſh?
Alph. Ha, thou dar'ſt not,
By heaven I know thou dar'ſt not.
Leo. I dare more Sir
If you dare be uncivill.
Alph. Laugh too, Pidgeon.
Zanch. A fitter time for fames ſake: two weak Nurſes
Would laugh at this; are there no more days coming,
No ground but this to argue on? no ſwords left
Nor friends to carry this, but your own furies?
Alas! it ſhows too weakly.
Alph. Let it ſhow,
I come not here for ſhews: laugh at me ſirrah?
Ile give ye cauſe to laugh.
Leo. Ye are as like Sir
As any man in Spaine.
Alph. By heaven I will,
I will brave Leonardo.
Leo. Brave Alphonſo,
I will expect it then.
Zanch. Hold ye there both,
Theſe terms are noble.
Alph. Ye ſhall hear ſhortly from me.
Leo. Now diſcreetly.
Alph. Aſſure your ſelf ye ſhall: do ye ſee this ſword Sir?
He has not caſt his teeth yet.
Zanch. Rarely carried.
Alph. He bites deep: moſt times mortall: Signiour
Ile hound him at the fair and home.
Zanch. Still nobly.
Alph. And at all thoſe that dare maintain ye.
Zanch. Excellent.
Leo. How you ſhall pleaſe Sir, ſo it be fair, though certain,
I had rather give you reaſon.
Zanch. Fairly urg'd too.
Alph. This is no age for reaſon, prick your reaſon
Upon your ſwords point.
Zanch. Admirably follow'd.
Alph. And there ile hear it: ſo till I pleaſe, live Sir. Exit
Leo. And ſo farewell, you're welcome.
Zanch. The end crowns all things
Signiour, ſome little buſineſſe paſt, this cauſe ile argue
And be a peace between ye, if't ſo pleaſe ye,
And by the ſquare of honour to the utmoſt:
I feel the old man's maſter'd by much paſſion,
And too high rackt, which makes him overſhoot all.
His valour ſhould direct at, and hurt thoſe
That ſtand but by as blenchers: this he muſt know too,
As neceſſary to his judgement, doting women
Are neither ſafe nor wiſe adventures: conceive me,
If once their wills have wander'd; nor is't then
A time to uſe our rages: for why ſhould I
Bite at the ſtone, when he that throws it wrongs me?
Do not we know that women are moſt wooers
Though cloſeſt in their carriage? Do not all men know, Scarce all the compaſſe of the globe can hold 'em
If their affections be afoot? ſhall I then covet
The follys of a ſhe-fool, that by nature
Muſt ſeek her like, by reaſon be a woman,
Sink a tal ſhip becauſe the ſales defie me?
No, I diſdain that folly; he that ventures
Whilſt they are fit to put him on, has found out
The everlaſting motion in his ſcabbard.
I doubt not to make peace: and ſo for this time
My beſt love, and remembrance.
Leo. Your poor Servant. Exeunt.

Scena ſecunda.

Enter Diego Hoſt, Philippo, and Theodoſia.
Phil. Where will our Horſes meet us?
Hoſt Dieg. Fear not you Sir,
Some half mile hence, my worſhips man will ſtay us,
How is it with my young bloods? come, be joviall,
Let's travell like a merry flock of wild geeſe,
Every tongue talking.
Phil. We are very merry;
But do you know this way Sir?
Theo. Is't not dangerous?
Methinks theſe woody thickets ſhould harbour knaves.
Hoſt Die. I fear none but fair wenches: thoſe are theeves
May quickly rob me of my good conditions
If they cry ſtand once: but the beſt is Signiours
They cannot bind my hands; for any elſe,
They meet an equall knave, and there's my paſport:
I have ſeen fine ſport in this place, had theſe trees tongues,
They would tell ye pretty matters: do not you fear though
They are not every days delights.
Phil. What ſport Sir?
Hoſt. Why to ſay true, the ſport of all ſports,
Phil. What was't?
Hoſt. Such turning up of taffatees; and you know
To what rare whiſtling tunes they go, far beyond
A ſoft wind in the ſhrowds: ſuch ſtand there,

And

And down ith thother place; ſuch ſupplications
And ſubdiviſions for thoſe toys their honours,
One, as ye are a gentleman in this buſh,
And oh ſweet Sir, what mean ye? there's a bracelet,
And uſe me I beſeech ye like a woman,
And her petition's heard: another ſcratches,
And crys ſhe will die firſt, and then ſwones: but certain
She is brought to life again, and does well after.
Another ſave mine honour, oh mine honour,
My husband ſerves the Duke, Sir, in his kitchen;
I have a cold pie for ye; fy, fy, fy gentlemen,
Will nothing ſatisfie ye, where's my husband?
Another crys, do ye ſee Sir how they uſe me,
Is there no law for theſe things?

Theo. And good mine Hoſt,
Do you call theſe fine ſports?

Hoſt. What ſhould I call 'em,
They have been ſo call'd theſe thouſand years & upwards.

Phil. But what becomes o'th' men?

Hoſt. They are ſtript and bound,
Like ſo many Adams, with fig leafs afore 'em,
And there's their innocence!

Theo. Would we had known this?
Before we reacht this place.

Phil. Come, there's no danger,
Theſe are but ſometimes chances.

Enter Bayliffe.

Hoſt. Now we muſt through.

Theo. Who's that?

Hoſt. Stand to it Signiors.

Phil. No it needs not,
I know the face; 'tis honeſt.

Bayl. What mine Hoſt:
Mine everlaſting honeſt Hoſt.

Hoſt. Maſſe Bayly;
Now in the name of an ill reckoning
What make you walking this round?

Bayl. A —— of this round,
And of all buſineſſe too, through woods, and raſcalls,
They have rounded me away a dozen duckets,
Beſides a fair round cloke: Some of 'em knew me,
Els they had caſed me like a cony too,
As they have done the reſt, and I think roſted me,
For they began to baſte me ſoundly: my young Signiors,
You may thank heaven, and heartily, and hourly,
You ſet not out ſo early; ye had been ſmoak'd els
By this true hand ye had Sirs, finely ſmoakt,
Had ye been women, ſmockt too.

Theo. Heaven defend us.

Bayl. Nay, that had been no prayer; there were thoſe
That run that prayer out of breath, yet fail'd too:
There was a Fryer, now ye talk of prayer,
With a huge bunch of beads, like a rope of onyons;
I am ſure as big, that out of fear and prayer,
In half an houre wore 'em as ſmall as bugles,
Yet he was flea'd too.

Phil. At what houre was this?

Bayl. Some two houres ſince.

Theo. Do you think the paſſage ſure now.

Bayl. Yes, a rope take 'em, as it will, and bleſſe 'em,
They have done for this day ſure.

Phil. Are many riffled?

Bayl. At the leaſt a dozen,
And there left bound.

Theo. How came you free?

Bayl. A curteſie
They uſe out of their rogueſhips, to bequeath
To one, that when they give a ſigne from far
Which is from out of danger; he may preſently
Releaſe the reſt, as I met you, I was going,
Having the ſigne from yonder hill to do it.

Theo. Alas poor men.

Phil. Mine Hoſt, pray go untie 'em.

Hoſt. Let me alone for cancelling: where are they?

Bayl. In every buſh like black birds, you cannot miſſe ('em

Hoſt. I need not ſtalk unto 'em. Exit.

Bayl. No, they'l ſtand ye,
My buſy life for yours Sir: you would wonder
To ſee the ſeverall tricks, and ſtrange behaviors
Of the poor raſcals in their miſeries,
One weeps, another laughs at him for weeping,
A third is monſtrous angry he can laugh
And crys, go too, this is no time; he laughs ſtill,
A fourth exhorts to patience: him a fift man
Curſes for tamenеſſe; him a Fryer ſchools,
All hoot the Fryer: here one ſings a Ballad,
And there a little Curat confutes him,
And in this linſey woolſey way, that would make a dog
Forget his dinner, or an old man fire
They rub out for their ranſoms: Amongſt the reſt,
There is a little Boy rob'd, a fine child,
It ſeems a Page: I muſt confeſſe my pitty
(As 'tis a hard thing in a man of my place)
To ſhew compaſſion, ſtir'd at him; ſo finely
And without noyſe he carrys his afflictions,
And looks as if he had but dreamt of looſing.

Enter Hoſt and Leocadia, and others as rob'd.

This boy's the glory of this robbery,
The reſt but ſhame the action: now ye may hear 'em.

Hoſt. Come lads, 'tis holy-day: hang clothes, 'tis hot,
And ſweating agues are abroad.

1. It ſeems ſo;
For we have met with rare Phiſitians
To cure us of that malladу.

Hoſt. Fine footing,
Light and deliver: now my boys: Maſter Fryer,
How do's your holineſſe, bear up man; what
A cup of neat ſack now and a toaſt: ha, Fryer,
A warm plaiſter to your belly Father,
There were a bleſſing now.

Fryer. Ye ſay your mind Sir.

Hoſt. Where my fine Boy: my poynter.—

Bayl. Ther's the wonder.

Hoſt. A rank whore ſcratch their ſides till the pox follow
For robbing thee, thou haſt a thouſand ways
To rob thy ſelf boy, dyce, and a chamber devill.

Leoc. Ye are deceiv'd Sir.

Hoſt. And thy Maſter too Boy. (theſe?

Phil. A ſweet fac'd Boy indeed: what rogues were
What barbarous brutiſh ſlaves to ſtrip this beauty?

Theo. Come hither my boy: alas! he's cold, mine Hoſt,
We muſt intreat your Cloak.

Hoſt. Can ye intreat it. (ments.

Phil. We do preſume ſo much, you have other gar-

Hoſt. Will you intreat thoſe too?

Theo. Your Mule muſt too,
To the next town, you ſay 'tis neer; in pity
You cannot ſee this poor Boy periſh.
I know ye have a better ſoul, we'l ſatisfie ye. (help it,

Hoſt. 'Tis a ſtrange fooliſh trick I have, but I cannot
I am ever cozen'd with mine own commendations;
It is determin'd then I ſhall be robb'd too.
To make up vantage to this dozen: here Sir,

Heaven has provided ye a ſimple garment
To ſet ye off: pray keep it handſomer
Then you kept your own, and let me have it render'd, Bruſh'd, and diſcreetly folded.
Leoc. I thank ye Sir.
Hoſt. Who wants a doblet?
2. I.
Hoſt. Where will you have it?
2. From you Sir, if you pleaſe.
Hoſt. Oh, there's the payment Sir.
Phil. My honeſt friends, I am ſorry for your fortunes,
But that's but poor relief: here are ten Duckets,
And to your diſtribution holy Sir,
I render 'em: and let it be your care
To ſe 'em, as your wants are, well divided.
Hoſt. Plain dealing now my friends: and Father Fryer,
Set me the faſte right; no wringing Fryer,
Nor tithing to the Church, theſe are no duties:
Scowre me your conſcience, if the Devill tempt ye
Off with your cord, and ſwing him.
Fry. Ye ſay well Sir.
All. Heaven keep your goodneſſe.
Theo. Peace keep you, farewell friends.
Hoſt. Farewell light-horſe-men. Exit the rob'd.
Phil. Which way travell you Sir?
Bayl. To the next town.
Theo. Do you want any thing.
Bayl. Only diſcretion to travell at good houres,
And ſome warm meat to moderate this matter,
For I am moſt outragious cruell hungry.
Hoſt. I have a ſtomach too ſuch as it is,
Would poſe a right good paſty, I thank heaven for't.
Bayl. Chaf that would break the teeth of ſteven bands
I could endure now like an Eaſtrich, or ſalt beefe
That Ceſar left in pickell.
Phil. Take no care,
We'l have meat for you and enough: I'th mean time
Keep you the horſe way leſt the fellow miſſe us,
We'l meet ye at the end o'th wood.
Hoſt. Make haſt then.
Exit Hoſt, &c. Bayl.
Theo. My poore Sir, till your neceſſities
Be full ſupplied, ſo pleaſe you truſt our friendſhips,
We muſt not part.
Leo. Ye have pull'd a charge upon ye,
Yet ſuch a one, as ever ſhall be thankfull.
Phil. Ye have ſaid enough: may I be bold to ask ye,
What Province you were bred in? and of what parents?
Leo. Ye may Sir; I was born in Andaluzia,
My name Francisco, ſon to Don Henriques
De Cardinas.
Theo. Our noble neighbour.
Phil. Son to Don Henriques.
I know the gentleman: and by your leave Sir,
I know he has no ſon.
Leo. None of his own Sir,
Which makes him put that right upon his brother
Don Zanchio's children: one of which I am,
And therefore do not much err.
Phil. Still ye do Sir,
For neither has Don Zanchio any ſon;
A daughter, and a rare one is heire,
Which though I never was ſo bleſt to ſee,
Yet I have heard great good of.
Theo. Urge no further,
He is aſhamed, and bluſhes.
Phil. Sir,
If it might import you to conceal your ſelf,
I aſk your mercy, I have been ſo curious:
Leo. Alas! I muſt ask yours Sir: for theſe lies,
Yet they were uſefull ones; for by the claiming
Such noble parents, I beleev'd your bounties
Would ſhew more gracious. The plain truth is gentlemen,
I am Don Sanchios ſtrwards ſon, a wild boy,
That for the fruits of his unhappineſſe,
Is faigne to ſeek the warr.
Theo. This is a lie too.
If I have any eare.
Phil. Why?
Theo. Mark his language,
And ye ſhall find it of too ſweet a reliſh
For one of ſuch a breed: ile pawn my hand,
This is no boy.
Phil. No boy? what would you have him?
Theo. I know, no boy: I watcht how fearfully,
And yet how ſodainly he cur'd his lies,
The right wit of a woman: Now I am ſure.
Phil. What are ye ſure?
Theo. That 'tis no boy: ile born in't.
Phil. Now I conſider better, and take councell,
Methinks he ſhows more ſweetneſſe in that face,
Then his fears dare deliver.
Theo. No more talk one,
There hangs ſome great waight by it: ſoon at night
Ile tell ye more.
Phil. Come Sir, what ere you are
With us, embrace your liberty, and our helps
In any need you have.
Leo. All my poor ſervice
Shall be at your command Sir, and my prayers.
Phil. Let's walke a pace; hunger will eat their throats cles. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Roderigo, Markantonio, and a Ship-maſter.
two Chairs for em.

Rod. Call up the Maſter.
Maſt. Here Sir. within.
Rod. Honeſt Maſter,
Give order all the Gallys with this tyde
Fall round, and neer upon us; that the next wind
We may unaigh off together, and recover
The Port of Barcelona, without parting.
Maſt. Your pleaſures done Sir. within.
Rod. Signior Markantonio,
Till meat be ready, let's ſit here and prepare
Our ſtomachs with diſcourſes.
Marc. What you pleaſe Sir.
Rod. Pray ye anſwer me to this doubt.
Marc. If I can Sir.
Rod. Why ſhould ſuch plants as you are, pleaſures children
That ow their bluſhing years to gentle objects,
Tenderly bred, and brought up in all fidelity,
Deſire the ſtubborn wars?
Marc. In thoſe 'tis wonder,
That make their eaſe their god, and not their honour:
But noble Generall, my end is other,
Deſire of knowledge Sir, and hope of tying Diſcretion to my time, which only ſhewes me,
And not my years, a man, and makes that more
Which we call handſome, the reſt is but boyes beauty,
And with the boy conſum'd.
Rod. Ye argue well Sir.

Mar.

Mar. Nor do I wear my youth, as they were breeches
For object, but for uſe: my ſtrength for danger,
Which is the liberal part of man, not dalliance,
The wars muſt be my Miſtreſs Sir.
Rod. O Signiour,
You'l find her a rough wench.
Mar. When ſhe is won once,
She'l ſhow the ſweeter Sir.
Rod. You can be pleas'd, though
Sometimes to take a tamer?
Mar. 'Tis a truth Sir,
So ſhe be handſom, and not ill condition'd.
Rod. A Soldier ſhould not be ſo curious.
Mar. I can make ſhift with any for a heat Sir.
Rod. Nay, there you wrong your youth too: and however
You are pleas'd to appear to me, which ſhews wel Signior,
A tougher ſoul then your few years can teſtifie;
Yet my yong Sir, out of mine own experience
When my ſpring was, I am able to confute ye,
And ſay, y' had rather come to th' ſhock of eys,
And boldly march up to your Miſtriſs mouth,
Then to the Cannons.
Mar. That's as their lading is Sir.
Rod. There be Trenches
Fitter, and warmer for your years, and ſafer
Then where the bullet plays.
Mar. Ther's it I doubt Sir.
Rod. You'l eaſily find that faith: But come, be liberal,
What kind of woman could you make beſt wars with?
Mar. They are all but heavy marches.
Rod. Fy Marckantonio,
Beauty in ſo more reverence?
Mar. In the Sex Sir,
I honor it, and next to honor, love it,
For there is only beauty; and that ſweetneſs
That was firſt meant for modeſty: ſever it
And put it in one woman, it appears not.
'Tis of too rare a nature, ſhe too groſs
To mingle with it.
Rod. This is a meer hereſie.
Marc. Which makes 'em ever mending; for that gloſs
That coſens us for beauty, is but bravery,
An outward ſhew of things well ſet, no more,
For heavenly beauty, is as heaven it ſelf Sir,
Too excellent for object, and what is ſeen
Is but the vail then, airy clouds; grant this
It may be ſeen, 'tis but like ſtars in twinklings.
Rod. 'Twas no ſmall ſtudy in their Libraries
Brought you to this experience: But what think ye
Of that fair red and white, which we call beauty?
Mar. Why? 'tis our creature Sir, we give it 'em,
Becauſe we like thoſe colours, elſe 'tis certain
A blew face with a motley noſe would do it,
And be as great a beauty, ſo we lov'd it,
That we cannot give, which is only beauty,
Is a fair Mind.
Rod. By this rule, all our choices
Are to no ends.
Marc. Except the dull end, Doing.
Rod. Then all to you ſeem equal?
Marc. Very true Sir,
And that makes equal dealing: I love any
That's worth love.
Rod. How long love ye Signiour?
Marc. Till I have other buſineſs.
Rod. Do you never
Love ſtedfaſtly one woman?
Mar. 'Tis a toyl Sir
Like riding in one rode perpetually,
It offers no variety.
Rod. Right youth,
He muſt needs make a Soldier; nor do you think
One woman, can love one man.
Mar. Yes that may be,
Though it appear not often; they are things ignorant,
And therefore apted to that ſuperſtition
Of doting fondneſs; yet of late years Signior,
That worlds well mended with 'em, fewer are found now
That love at length, and to the right mark, all
Stir now as the time ſtirs; fame and faſhion
Are ends they aim at now, and to make that love
That wiſer ages held ambition;
They that cannot reach this, may love by Index;
By every days ſurveying who beſt promiſes,
Who has done beſt, who may do, and who mended
May come to do again; who appears neateſt
Either in new ſtampt cloths, or curteſies, (things
Done but from hand to mouth neither; nor love they theſe
Longer then new are making, nor that neceſſities
Beyond the next fair feather: Take the City,
There they go to't by gold waight, no gain from 'em
All they can work by fire and water to 'em,
Profit is all they point at: if there be love
'Tis ſhew'd ye by ſo dark a light, to beat out
The bracks, and old ſtains in it, that ye may purchaſe
French velvet better cheap: all loves are endleſs.
Rod. Faith, if ye have a Miſtreſs, would ſhe heard you.
Mar. Twere but the venturing of my place, or ſwearing
I meant it but for argument, as Schoolmen
Diſpute high queſtions.
Rod. What a world is this
When young men dare determine what thoſe are?
Age and the beſt experience ne't could aim at. (bigger,
Marc. They were thick ey'd then Sir; now the print is
And they may read their fortunes without ſpectacles.
Rod. Did you ne't love?
Mar. Faith yes, once after ſupper,
And the fit held till midnight.
Rod. Hot, or ſhaking.
Mar. To ſay true, both.
Rod. How did ye rid it?
Mar. Thus Sir,
I laid my hand upon my heart, and bleſt me,
And then ſaid over certain charms I had learn'd Againſt mad dogs, for love, and they are all one;
Laſt thought upon a windmill, and ſo ſlept,
And was well ever after.
Rod. A rare Phyſitian,
What would your practiſe gain ye?
Mar. The wars ended,
I mean to uſe my heart, and have theſe fools
Cut in the head like Cats, to ſave the Kingdom,
Another Inquiſition.
Rod. So old a Soldier.
Out of the wars, I never knew yet practiſed.
Mar. I ſhall mend every day; But noble General,
Believe this, but as this you nam'd diſcourſes.
Rod. O ye are a cunning Gamſter.
Mar. Mirths and toys
To coſen time withall, for O my troth Sir,
I can love; I think, well too; well enough
And think as wel of women as they are,
Pretty fantaſtick things, ſome more regardful,
And ſome few worth a ſervice: I am ſo honeſt,

I with 'em all in heaven, and you know hard Sir
Twill be to get in there with their great farthingalls.
Rod. Well Marckantonio, I would not looſe thy company
For the beſt Galley I command.
Marc. Faith Generall,
If theſe diſcourſes pleaſe ye, I ſhall fit ye
Once every day. knock within.
Rod. Thou canſt not pleaſe me better: hark, they call
Below to Didner: ye are my Cabbin gueſt,
My boſom's, ſo you pleaſe Sir.
Marc. Your poor Servant. Exeunt.

Scena quarta.

Enter Philipo, and ſecond Hoſt.

Hoſt. Let 'em have meat enough woman, half a hen;
There be old rotten pilchers, put 'em off too,
'Tis but a little new anoynting of 'em,
And a ſtrong onyon, that confounds the ſtink.
Hoſteſſ. They call for more Sir.
Hoſt. Knock a dozen eggs down,
But then beware your wenches.
Hoſteſſ. More then this too?
Hoſt. Worts, worts, and make 'em porridg: pop 'em up
But they ſhall pay for Cullyſes.
Hoſteſſ. All this is nothing;
They call for kid and partridg.
Hoſt. Well remembred,
Where's the half Falconers dog he left?
Hoſteſſ. It ſtinks Sir,
Paſt all hope that way.
Hoſt. Run it o're with garlick,
And make a Roman diſh on't.
Hoſteſſ. Pray ye be patient,
And get proviſion in; theſe are fine Gentlemen,
And liberal Gentlemen; they have unde quare
No mangey Muleters, nor pinching Poſts
That feed upon the parings of muſk-millions
And radiſhes, as big and tough as rafters:
Will ye be ſtirring in this buſineſs? here's your brother
Mine old Hoſt of Oſſuva, as wiſe as you are,
That is, as knaviſh; if ye put a trick,
Take heed he do not find it.
Hoſt. Ile be wagging.
Hoſteſſ. 'Tis for your own commodity: why wenches.
Anon forſooth. within.
Hoſteſſ. Who makes a fire there? and who gets in water?
Let Oliver go to the Juſtice, and beſeech his worſhip
We may have two ſpits going; and do you here Druee,
Let him invite his worſhip, and his wives worſhip,
To the left meat to morrow. Enter Bayliff.
Bayl. Where's the Kitchen?
Hoſteſſ. Even at the next door Signior: what old Don?
We meet but ſeldom.
Bayl. Prethee be patient Hoſteſs,
And tell me where the meat is.
Hoſteſſ. Faith Maſter Bayly,
How have ye done? and how man?
Bayl. Good ſweet Hoſteſs,
What ſhall we have to dinner?
Hoſteſſ. How do's your woman,
And a fine woman ſhe is, and a good woman,
Lord, how you bear your years?
Bayl. Is't veal, or mutton,
Beef, bacon, pork, kid, pheaſant, or all theſe,
And are they ready all?
Hoſteſſ. The hours that have been
Between us two, the merry hours: Lord!
Bayl. Hoſteſs,
Dear Hoſteſs do but hear; I am hungry.
Hoſteſſ. Ye are merrily diſpos'd Sir.
Bayl. Monſtrous hungry,
And hungry after much meat, I have brought hither
Right worſhipful to pay the reckoning,
Money enough too with 'em, deſire enough
To have the beſt meat, and of that enough too:
Come to the point ſweet wench, and ſo I kiſs thee.
Hoſteſſ. Ye ſhall have any thing, and inſtantly
Ere you can lick your ears, Sir.
Bayl. Portly meat,
Bearing ſubſtantial ſtuff, and fit for hunger:
I do beſeech ye Heſteſs firſt, then ſome light garniſh,
Two pheaſants in a diſh, if ye have leverits,
Rather for way of ornament, then appetite
They may be look'd upon, or larks: for fiſh,
As there is no great need, ſo I would not wiſh ye
To ſerve above four diſhes, but thoſe full ones;
Ye have no cheeſe of Parma?
Hoſteſſ. Very old Sir.
Bayl. The leſs will ſerve us, ſome ten pound,
Hoſteſſ. Alas Sir,
We have not half theſe dainties.
Bayl. Peace good Hoſteſs,
And make us hope ye have.
Hoſteſſ. Ye ſhall have all Sir,
Bayl. That may be got for money.

Enter Diego the Hoſt, and a Boy.

1. Hoſt. Diego. Where's your Maſter?
Bring me your Maſter boy: I muſt have liquor
Fit for the Mermedons; no daſhing now child,
No conjurings by candle light, I know all;
Strike me the oldeſt Sack, a piece that carries
Point blank to this place boy, and batters; Hoſteſs,
I kiſs thy hands through which many a round reckoning
And things of moment have had motion.
Hoſteſſ. Still mind old Brother.
1. Hoſt Dei. Set thy Seller open,
For I muſt enter, and advance my colours (cets,
I have brought the Dons indeed wench, Dons with duck-
And thoſe Dons muſt have dainty wine, pure Bacchus
That bleeds the life blood: what is your cure ended?
Bayl. We ſhall have meat man.
1. Hoſt Dei. Then we ſhall have wine man,
And wine upon wine, cut and drawn with wine.
Hoſteſſ. Ye ſhall have all, and more then all.
Bayl. All, well then.
1. Hoſt Dei. Away, about your buſineſs, you with her
For old acquaintance ſake, to ſtay your ſtomach } Exit Ho-
And Boy, be you my guide ad inferos, } ſteſſe and
For I will make a full deſcent in equipage. } Bayliffe.
Boy. Ile ſhew you rare wine.
1. Hoſt Dei. Stinging geer.
Boy. Divine Sir. (wine boy.
1. Hoſt Dei. O divine boy, march, march my child, rare
Boy. As in Spain Sir.
1. Hoſt Dei. Old, and ſtrong too,
O my fine Boy, clear too?
Boy. As chriſtal Sir, and ſtrong as truth.
1. Hoſt Dei. Away boy,
I am enamour'd, and I long for Dalligance,
Stay no where child, not for thy fathers bleſſing,
I charge thee not to ſave thy ſiſters honour,
Nor to cloſe thy dams eys were ſhe a dying,
Till we arrive; and for thy recompence
I will remember thee in my Will.
Boy. Ye have ſaid Sir. Exeunt.

Act.

Act. III. Scaena I.

Enter Philippo and 2. Hoſt.

Phil. MIne Hoſt, is that apperrel got ye ſpoke of? Ye ſhall have ready money.

2. Hoſt. 'Tis come in Sir, he has it on Sir,
And I think't will be fit, and o' my credit
'Twas never worn but once Sir, and for neceſſity Pawnd to the man I told ye of.

Phil. Pray bargain for it,
And I will be the pay-maſter.

2. Hoſt. I will Sir.

Phil. And let our meat be ready when you pleaſe,
I mean as ſoon.

2. Hoſt. It ſhall be preſently.

Phil. How far ſtands Barcellona?

2. Hoſt. But two leagues off Sir,
You may be there by three a clock.

Phil. I am glad on't. Exeunt.

Scena ſecunda.

Enter Theodoſia, and Leocadia.

Theo. Signior Franciſco why I draw you hither
To this remote place, marvel not, for truſt me
My innocence yet never knew ill dealing,
And as ye have a noble temper, ſtart not
Into offence, at any thing my knowledg,
And for your ſpecial good, would be inform'd of,
Nor think me vainly curious.

Leoc. Worthy Sir,
The courteſies you and your noble Brother
Even then when few men find the way to do 'em,
I mean in want, ſo freely ſhowrd upon me,
So truly and ſo timely miniſter'd,
Muſt if I ſhould ſuſpect thoſe minds that made 'em,
Either proclaim me an unworthy taker,
Or worſe, a baſe believer; Speak your mind Sir
Freely, and what you pleaſe, I am your Servant.

The. Then my yong Sir, know ſince our firſt acquaintance Induc'd by circumſtances that deceive not
To clear ſome doubts I have; nay bluſh not Signior,
I have beheld ye narrowly; more bluſhes!
Sir, ye give me ſo much light, I find ye
A thing confeſt already; yet more bluſhes?
You would ill cover an offence might ſink ye
That cannot hide your ſelf; why do ye ſhake ſo?
I mean no trouble to ye; this fair hand
Was never made for hardneſs, nor thoſe eys.
Come do not hide 'em, for rough objects, hark ye,
Ye have betrayd your ſelf, that ſigh confirms me;
An other? and a third too? then I ſee
Theſe Boys clothes do but pinch ye, come be liberal,
Ye have found a friend that has found you, diſguiſe not
That loaden ſoul that labors to be open:
Now you muſt weep, I know it, for I ſee
Your eys down laden to the lids, another
Manifeſt token that my doubts are perfect;
Yet I have found a greater; till me this
Why were theſe holes left open, there was an error,
A foul one my Franciſco, have I caught ye?
O pretty Sir, the cuſtom of our Country
Allows men none in this place: Now the ſhowr comes.

Leoc. O Signior Theodoro.

Theo. This ſorrow ſhews ſo ſweetly
I cannot chuſe but keep it company:
Take truce and ſpeak Sir: and I charge your goodneſs
by all thoſe perfect hopes that point at vertue
By that remembrance theſe fair tears are ſhed for,
If any ſad miſ-fortune have thus form'd ye,
That either care or counſel may redeem,
Pain, purſe, or any thing within the power
And honor of free Gentlemen, reveal it,
And have our labors.

Leoc. I have found ye noble
And ye ſhall find me true; your doubts are certain,
Nor dare I more diſſemble; I am a woman,
The great example of a wretched woman;
Here you muſt give me leave to ſhew my Sex;
And now to make ye know how much your credit
Has won upon my ſoul, ſo it pleaſe your patience,
Ile tell you my unfortunate ſad ſtory.

Theo. Sit down and ſay on Lady.

Leoc. I am born Sir
Of good and honeſt parents, rich, and noble,
And not to lye, the daughter of Don Zanchio,
If my unhappy fortune have not loſt me:
My name cal'd Leocadia, even the ſame
Your worthy brother did the ſpecial honor
To name for beautiful; and without pride
I have been often made believe ſo Signior;
But thats impertinent: Now to my ſorrows;
Not far from us a Gentleman of worth,
A neighbor and a noble viſitor,
Had his aboad; who often met my Father
In gentle ſports of chaſe, and river hawking,
In courſe and riding, and with him often brought
A Son of his, a young and hopeful Gentleman,
Nobly train'd up, in years fit for affection,
A ſprighly man, of underſtanding excellent,
Of ſpeech, and civill 'havior, no leſs powerful;
And of all parts, elſe my eys lyed, abundant:
We grew acquainted, and from that acquaintance
Neerer into affection; from affection
Into belief.

Theo. Well.

Leoc. Then we durſt kiſs.

Theo. Go forward.

Leoc. But O man, man, unconſtant, careleſs man,
O ſubtile man, how many are thy miſchiefs?
O Marck-antonio, I may curſe thoſe kiſſes.

Theo. What did you call him Lady?

Leoc. Mark-antonio,
The name to me of miſery.

Theo. Pray forward.

Leoc. From theſe we bred deſires Sir: but loſe me heaven
If mine were luſtful.

Theo. I believe.

Leoc. This neerneſs
Made him importunate: When to ſave mine honor
Love having full poſſeſſion of my powers,
I got a contract from him.

Theo. Sealed?

Leoc. And ſwern too:
Which ſince for ſome offence heaven laid upon me
I loſt among my moneys in the robbery,
The loſs that makes me pooreſt: this won from him
Fool that I was, and too too credulous,
I pointed him a by-way to my chamber
The next night at an hour.

Theo. Pray ſtay there Lady:
And when the night came, came he, kept he touch with ye?
Be not ſo ſhamefaſt: had he both your wiſhes?

Tell me, and tell me true, did he injoy ye,
Were ye in one anothers arms, abed? the Contract
Confirm'd in full joys there? did he lie with ye?
Answer to that; ha? did your father know this,
The good old man, or kindred privy to't?
And had ye their consents? did that nights promise
Make ye a Mother?
Leoc. Why do you ask so neerly?
Good Sir, do's it concern you any thing?
Theo. No Lady,
Only the pitty why you should be used so,
A little stirs me, but did he keep his promise?
Leoc. No, no Signior,
Alas he never came nor never meant it,
My love was fool'd, time numbred to no end,
My expectation flouted, and ghess you Sir,
What dor unto a doating Maid this was,
What a base breaking off.
Theo. All's well then Lady;
Go forward in your Story.
Leoc. Not only fail'd Sir
Which is a curse in love, and may he find it
When his affections are full wing'd, and ready
To stoop upon the quarry, then when all
His full hopes are in's arms: not only thus Sir
But more injurious, faithless, treacherous,
Within two days fame gave him far remov'd
With a new love, which much against my conscience
But more against my cause, which is my hell
I must confess a fair one, a right fair one,
Indeed of admirable sweetness, Daughter
Unto another of our noble neighbors
The thief cal'd Theodosia; whose perfections
I am bound to ban for ever, curse to wrinckles,
As heaven I hope will make 'em soon; and aches,
For they have rob'd me poor unhappy wench
Of all, of all Sir, all that was my glory
And left me nothing but these tears, and travel:
Upon this certain news, I quit my Father
And if you be not milder in construction
I fear mine honor too; and like a Page
Stole to Ossuna: from that place to Civill,
From thence to Barcellona I was travelling
When you o'er-took my misery, in hope to hear of Gallies bound up for Italy; for never
Will I leave off the search of this bad man
This filcher of affections, this love Pedler,
Nor shall my curses cease to blast her beauties
And make her name as wandring as her nature
Till standing face to face before their lusts
I call heavens justice down.
Theo. This shows too angry
Nor can it be her fault she is belov'd,
If I give meat, must they that eat it surfeit?
Leoc. She loves again Sir, there's the mischief of it
And in despight of me to drown my blessings
Which she shall dearly know.
Theo. Ye are too violent.
Leoc. She has Devils in her eys, to whose devotion
He offers all his service.
Theo. Who can say
But she may be forsaken too? he that once wanders
From such a perfect sweetness, as you promise
Has he not still the same rule to deceive?
Leoc. No, no they are together, love together
Past all deceipt of that side; sleep together,
Live, and delight together, and such deceipt
Give me in a wild desert.
Theo. By your leave Lady
I see no honor in this cunning.
Leoc. Honor?
True, none of her part, honor, she deserves none,
'Tis ceas'd with wandering Ladies such as she is,
So bold and impudent.
Theo. I could be angry
Extreamly angry now beyond my nature
And 'twere not for my pitty; what a man is this to do these wrongs; believe me Lady
I know the maid, and know she is not with him.
Leoc. I would you knew she were in heaven.
Theo. And so well know her
That I think you are cozend.
Leoc. So I say Sir.
Theo. I mean in her behaviour
For trust my faith so much I dare adventure for her credit
She never yet delighted to do wrong:
Leoc. How can she then delight in him; dare she think
Be what she will, as excellent as Angels
My love so fond, my wishes so indulgent
That I must take her prewnings; stoop at that
She has tyr'd upon: No Sir, I hold my beauty
Wash but these sorrows from it; of a sparkle
As right and rich as hers, my means as equal,
My youth as much unblown: and for our worths
And waight of vertue.
Theo. Do not task her so far. (por
Leo. By heaven she is cork, and clouds, light light sir, va-
But I shall find her out, with all her witchcrafts,
Her paintings, and her powncings: for 'tis art
And only art preserves her, and meer spels
That work upon his powers: let her but shew me
A ruin'd cheek like mine, that holds his colour
And writes but sixteen years in spight of sorrows
An unbathed body, smiles, that give but shadows
And wrinckle not the face: besides she is little
A demy dame that, that makes no object.
Theo. Nay,
Then I must say you err: for credit me
I think she is taller then your self.
Leoc. Why let her
It is not that shall mate me: I but ask
My hands may reach unto her.
Theo. Gentle Lady
'Tis now ill time of further argument,
For I perceive your anger voyd of councel,
Which I could wish more temperate.
Leoc. Pray forgive me
If I have spoken uncivilly: they that look on See more than we that play: and I beseech ye
Impute it loves offence, not mine; whose torments,
If you have ever lov'd, and found my crosses
You must confesse are seldom ty'd to patience,
Yet I could wish I had said lesse.
Theo. No harm then;
Ye have made a full amends; our Company
You may command, so please you in your travels
With all our faith and furtherance; let it be so.
Leoc. Ye make too great an offer.
Theo. Then it shal be
Go in and rest your self, our wholsom dyet
Will be made ready straight: But hark ye Lady
One thing I must entreat, your leave, and sufferance
That these things may be open to my Brother
For more respect and honour.

Leoc.

Leoc. Do your pleasure.
Theo. And do not change this habit by no means Unless ye change your self.
Leoc. Which must not yet be.
Theo. It carries ye concealed and safe.
Leoc. I am counsel'd. Exit.

Enter Philippo.

Phil. What's done?
Theo. Why all we doubted; 'tis a woman,
And of a noble strain too, gheste.
Phil. I cannot.
Theo. You have heard often of her.
Phil. Stay I think not.
Theo. Indeed ye have; 'tis the fair Leocadia Daughter unto Don Zanchio, our noble neighbor.
Phil. Nay?
Theo. 'Tis she Sir o' my credit.
Phil. Leocadia,
Pish Leocadia, it must not be.
Theo. It must be, or be nothing.
Phil. Pray give me leave to wonder, Leocadia?
Theo. The very same.
Phil. The damsel Leocadia
I gheste it was a woman, and a fair one
I see it through her shape, transparant plain
But that it should be she; tell me directly.
Theo. By heavens 'tis shee.
Phil. By heaven then 'tis a sweet one.
Theo. That's granted too.
Phil. But hearke ye, hearke ye Sister,
How came she thus disguis'd?
Theo. Ile tell you that too
As I came on the self-same ground, so us'd too.
Phil. By the same man?
Theo. The same too.
Phil. As I live
You lovers have fine fancies,
Wonderous fine ones.
Theo. Pray heaven you never make one.
Phil. Faith I know not,
But in that mind I am, I had rather cobble
'Tis a more Christian trade; pray tell me one thing
Are not you two now monstrous jealous
Of one another?
Theo. She is much of me
And has rayl'd at me most unheartily
And to my face, and o' my conscience
Had she but known me, either she or I
Or both, had parted with strange faces
She was in such a fury.
Phil. Leocadia?
Do's she speak handsomly?
Theo. Wondrous wel Sir
And all she does becomes her, even her anger.
Phil. How seem'd she when you found her?
Theo. Had you seen
How sweetly fearfull her pretty self
Betray'd her self, how neat her sorrow show'd,
And in what handsom phrase shee put her story,
And as occasion stir'd her how she started
Though roughly, yet most aptly into anger
You would have wonder'd.
Phil. Do's she know yet?
Theo. No,
Nor must not by no means.
Phil. How stands your difference?
Theo. Ile tell ye that some fitter time, but trust me
My Marck-antonio has too much to answer.
Phil. May I take knowledge of her?
Theo. Yes she is willing.
Phil. Pray use her as she is, with all respects then,
For she is a woman of a noble breeding.
Theo. Ye shal not find me wanting.
Phil. Which way bears she?
Theo. Our way, and to our end.
Phil. I am glad on't; hearke ye,
She keeps her shape?

Enter Leocadia.

Theo. Yes, and I think by this time
Has mew'd her old.
Phil. She is here: by heaven a rare one,
An admirable sweet one, what an eye
Of what a full command she bears, how gracious
All her aspect shows; bless me from a feaver
I am not well o'th sodain.
Leoc. Noble friends
Your meat and all my service waits upon ye:
Phil. Ye teach us manners Lady; all which service
Must now be mine to you, and all too poor too;
Blush not, we know ye; for by all our faiths
With us your honor is in sanctuary
And ever shall be.
Leoc. I do well beleeve it,
Will ye walk neerer Sir. Exit.
Theo She shows still fairer,
Yonger in every change, and clearer, neater;
I know not, I may fool my self, and finely
Nourish a wolfe to eat my heart out: Certain
As she appears now, she appears a wonder.
A thing amazes me; what would she do then
In womans helps, in ornaments apt for her
And deckings to her delicacy? without all doubt
She would be held a miracle; nor can I think
He has forsaken her: Say what shee please,
I know his curious eye, or say he had,
Put case he could be so boy-blind and foolish
Yet still I fear she keeps the Contract with her
Not stolne as she affirms, nor lost by negligence,
She would loose her self first, 'tis her life, and there
All my hopes are dispatch'd; O noble love
That thou couldst be without this jealousie,
Without this passion of the heart, how heavenly
Would thou appear upon us? Come what may come Ile see the end on't: and since chance has cast her Naked into my refuge, all I can
She freely shal command, except the man. Exit.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Leonardo, and Don Pedro.

Leon. Don Pedro, do you think assuredly
The Gallyes will come round to Barcellona
Within these two dayes?
Ped. Without doubt.
Leo. And think ye
He will be with 'em certainly?
Ped. He is sir
I saw him at their setting off.
Leo. Must they needs
Touch there for water as you say?
Ped. They must sir
And for fresh meat too: few or none go by it
Beside so great a Fleet must needs want trimming
If they have met with fowle seas, and no harbour
On this side Spain, is able without danger

To moore 'em, but that haven.
Leo. Are the warrs
His only end?
Ped. So he profesſes.
Leo. Bears he
Any command amongſt 'em?
Ped. Good regard
With all; which quickly will prefer him.
Leo. Pray Sir tell me,
And as you are a gentleman be liberal.
Ped. I will Sir, and moſt true.
Leo. Who ſaw ye with him?
Ped. None but things like himſelf; yong ſoldiers
And gentlemen deſirous to ſeek honor.
Leo. Was there no woman there, nor none diſguis'd
That might be thought a woman in his language?
Did he not let ſlip ſomething of ſuſpition
Touching that wanton way.
Ped. Beleeve me Sir
I neither ſaw, nor could ſuſpect that face
That might be doubted womans, yet I am ſure
Aboard him I ſee all that paſt, and 'tis impoſſible
Among ſo many high fet bloods there ſhould be
A woman, let her cloſe her ſelf within a cockle,
But they would open her, he muſt not love
Within that place alone, and therefore ſurely
He would not be ſo fooliſh, had he any,
To truſt her there; for his diſcourſe, 'twas ever
About his buſineſs, war, or mirth to make us Reliſh a Can of wine wel; when he ſpoke private
'Twas only the remembrance of his ſervice,
And hope of your good prayers for his health Sir,
And ſo I gave him to the ſeas.
Leo. I thank ye,
And now am ſatisfied, and to prevent
Suſpitions that may nourith dangers Signior,
For I have told you how the mad Alphenſo
Chafes like a Stag i'th toyl, and bends his fury
'Gainſt all, but his own ignorance; I am determin'd
For peace ſake and the preſervation
Of my yet untouch'd honor, and his cure
My ſelf to ſeek him there, and bring him back
As teſtimony of an unſought injurie
By either of our actions; That the world
And he if he have reaſon, may ſee plainly
Opinion is no perfect guide; nor all fames
Founders of truths: In the mean time this courteſie
I muſt entreat of you Sir, Be my ſelf here
And as my ſelf command my family.
Ped. Ye lay too much truſt on me.
Leo. 'Tis my love Sir,
I wil not be long from ye; if this queſtion
Chance to be call'd upon ere my return
I leave your care to anſwer; So farewell Sir.
Ped. Ye take a wiſe way; All my beſt endeavors Shal labor in your abſence; peace go with ye. Exit Leo.
A noble honeſt gentleman, free hearted
And of an open faith, much loving, and much loved,
And father of that goodneſſe only malice
Can truly ſtir againſt; what dare befall
Till his return Ile anſwer. Exit Ped.

Enter Alphonſo, and Servant.

Alph. Walk off Sirha
But keep your ſelf within my call?
Serv. I will Sir.
Alp. And ſtir my horſe for taking cold: within there,
Hoa people; you that dwel there, my brave Sigtior

What are ye all a ſleep? is't that time with ye?
Ile ring a little lowder.

Enter Pedro.

Ped. Sir who ſeek ye?
Alph. Not you Sir; Where's your Maſter?
Ped. I ſerve no man
In way of pay ſir.
Alph. Where's the man o'th houſe then?
Ped. What would you have with him Sir?
Alph. Do you ſtand here Sir
To ask men queſtions when they come?
Ped. I would ſir
Being his friend, and hearing ſuch allarums
Know how men come to viſit him.
Alph. Ye ſhall ſir,
Pray tell his mightineſs here is a gentleman
By name Alphonſo, would entreat his conference
About affairs of ſtate ſir, are ye anſwer'd?

Enter Sanchio carried.

Ped. I muſt be ſir.
Sanch. Stay, ſet me down, ſtay Signior,
You muſt ſtay, and ye ſhall ſtay.
Alph. Meaning me ſir?
Sanch. Yes you Sir, you I mean, I mean you.
Alph. Well Sir,
Why ſhould I ſtay?
Sanch. There's reaſon.
Alph. Reaſon Sir?
Sanch. I reaſon ſir
My wrong is greateſt, and I will be ſerv'd firſt.
Call out the man of fame?
Alph. How ſerv'd ſir?
Sanch. Thus ſir.
Alph. But not before me.
Sanch. Before all the world ſir
As my caſe ſtands.
Alph. I have loſt a daughter ſir.
Sanch. I have loſt another worth five ſcore of her ſir.
Alph. Ye muſt not tel me ſo.
Sanch. I have, and heark ye?
Make it up five ſcore more: Call out the fellow,
And ſtand you by ſir.
Ped. This is the mad morriſſe.
Alph. And I ſtand by?
Sanch. I ſay ſtand by, and do it.
Alph. Stand by among thy lungs.
Sanch. Turn preſently
And ſay thy prayers, thou art dead.
Alph. I ſcorn thee
And ſcorn to ſay my prayers more then thou do'ſt,
Mine is the moſt wrong, and my daughter deereſt
And mine ſhal firſt be righted.
Sanch. Shal be righted.
Ped. A third may live I ſee, pray hear me gentlemen.
Sanch. Shal be.
Alph. I, ſhal be righted.
Sanch. Now?
Alph. Now.
Sanch. Inſtantly.
Alph. Before I ſtir.
Sanch. Before me.
Alph. Before any.
Sanch. Doſt thou conſider what thou ſay'ſt? haſt thou friends here
Able to quench my anger, or perſwade me
After I have beaten thee into one main bruiſe
And made thee ſpend thy ſtate in rotten apples,
Thou canſt at length be quiet, ſhal I lal thee

Divide

Divide thee like a rotten Pumpion,
And leave thee ſtincking to poſterity,
Ther's not the leaſt blow I ſhall give; but do's this Urge me no further: I am firſt.
Alph. Ile hang firſt.
No goodman glory, 'tis not your bravado's,
Your punctuall honor, nor ſoldadoſhip.
Sanch. Set me a little neerer.
Alph. Let him ſally.
S. Lin'd with your quirck's of carriage and diſcretion
Can blow me off my purpoſe. Wher's your credit
With all your ſchool points now? your decorst arguing
And apt time for performing: where are theſe toys,
Theſe wiſe ways, and moſt honourable courſes,
To take revenge? how dar'ſt thou talk of killing,
Or think of drawing any thing but ſquirts,
When letchery has dry foundred thee?
Sanch. Neerer yet,
That I may ſpit him down: thou look'ſt like a man.
Ped. I would be thought ſo Sir.
Sanch. Prethee do but take me,
And fling me upon that Puppy.
Alph. Do for heavens ſake,
And ſee but how ile hug him.
Sanch. Yet take warning.
Ped. Faith gentlemen, this is a needleſſe quarrell.
Sanch. And do you deſire to make one?
Ped. As a friend Sir,
To tell you all this anger is but loſt Sir,
For Leonardo is from home.
Alph. No, no Sir.
Ped. Indeed he is.
Sanch. Where dare he be, but here Sir,
When men are wrong'd, and come for ſatisfaction.
Ped. It ſeems he has done none Sir, for his buſineſſe
Cleer of thoſe cares, hath carried him for ſometime
To Barcelona; if he had been guilty,
I know he would have ſtaid, and cleer'd all differences
Either by free confeſſion, or his ſword.
Sanch. This muſt not be.
Ped. Sure, as I live, it is Sir.
Alph. Sure, as we all live,
He's run away for ever: Barcelona,
Why? 'tis the key for Italy, from whence
He ſtole firſt hither.
Sanch. And having found his knaveries
Too groſſe to be forgiven, and too open,
He has found the ſame way back again: I beleeve too
The good graſſe gentleman, for his own eaſe,
Has taken one oth' Pillyes: Is not his ſtuffe ſold.
Alph. I fear his worſhips ſhoos too; to eſcape us,
I do not think he has a diſh within doores,
A louſe left of his linnage.
Ped. Ye are too wide Sir.
Alph. Or one poor wooden ſpoon.
Ped Come in and ſee Sir.
Alph. Ile ſee his houſe on fire firſt.
Ped. Then be pleas'd Sir
To give better cenſure.
Sanch. I will after him,
And ſearch him like conceal'd land; but ile have him,
And though I find him in his ſhrift, ile kill him.
Alph. Ile bear ye company.
Sanch. Pray have a care then,
A moſt eſpeciall care, indeed a fear,
Ye do not anger me.
Alph. I will obſerve ye,
And if I light upon him handſomly.
Sanch. Kill but a peece of him, leave ſome Alphonſo
For your poor friends.
Ped. I fear him not for all this.
Alph. Shall we firſt go home,
For it may prove a voyage, and diſpoſe
Of things there; heaven knows what may follow.
Sanch. No,
Ile kill him in this ſhirt I have on: let things
Govern themſelves, I am maſter of my honor
At this time, and no more; let wife, and land,
Lie lay till I return.
Alph. I ſay amen to't:
But what care for our monies?
Sanch I will not ſpend
Above three ſhillings, till his head be here,
Foure is too great a ſum for all his forſaures,
Come take me up inſtantly.
Alph. Farewell to you Sir,
And if your friend be in a featherbed,
Sow'd up to ſhrowd his fears, tell him 'tis folly,
For no courſe but his voluntary hanging
Can get our pardons.
Ped Theſe I think would be
Offence enough, if their own miſdirections
Would ſuffer 'em: two of the old ſedicions,
When they want enemies, they are their own foes:
Were they a little wiſer, I ſhould doubt 'em;
Till when ile ne'r break ſleep, nor ſuffer hunger
For any harm he ſhall receive: For 'tis as eaſie
If he be guilty, to turn theſe two old men
Upon their own throats, and look on, and live ſtill,
As 'tis to tell five pound: a great deal ſooner
And ſo ile to my meat, and then to hawking.
Exit.

ACT. IV. SCAENA 1.

Enter Markantonio, and a Gentleman.

Marc. Sir, this is complement; I pray you leave me.
Gent. Sir, is it not?
Marc. Why? I would only ſee the Town.
Gent. And only that I come to ſhew you.
Marc. Which I can ſee without you.
Gent. So you may
Plainly, not ſafely: For ſuch difference
As you have ſeen betwixt the ſea and earth
When waves riſe high, and land would beat 'em back
As fearfull of Invaſion; ſuch we find
When we land here at Barcelona.
Marc. Sir.
Gent. Beſides our Generall of the Gallyes, fearing
Your haſty nature, charg'd me not return
Without you ſafe.
Marc. O Sir, that Rodorigo
Is noble, and he do's miſtake my temper.
There is not in the world, a mind leſſe apt
To conceive wrongs, or do 'em; as he ſeen me
In all this voyage, in the which he pleaſes
To call me friend, let ſlip a haſty word?
Enter Eugenia, with divers Attendants.
'S'light Sir: yonder is a Lady vaild,
For properneſſe, beyond compariſon,
And ſure her face is like the reſt; we'l ſee't.
Gent. Why? you are haſty Sir already: know you

What 'tis you go about.
Marc. Yes, I would see
The womans face.
Gent. By heaven you shall not do't:
You do not know the custome of the place:
To draw that curtain here, though she were mean,
Is mortall.
Marc. Is it? earth must come to earth
At last, and by my troth, Ile try it Sir.
Gent. Then I must hold you fast. By all the faith
That can be plac'd in man, 'tis an attempt
More dangerous then death: 'tis death and shame:
I know the Lady well.
Marc. Is she a Lady?
I shall the more desire to see her Sir.
Gent. She is Alanso's wife, the Governor,
A noble gentleman.
Marc. Then let me go,
If I can win her, you and I will govern
This Town Sir, fear it not, and we will alter
These barbarous customes then; for every Lady
Shall be seen daily, and seen over too.
Gent. Come, do not jest, nor let your passions bear you
To such wild enterprises; hold you still,
For as I have a soul, you shall not do't.
Rod. She is a Lady of unblemish'd fame, above
And here to offer that affront, were base:
Hold on your way, and we will see the Town,
And overlook the Ladyes.
Marc. I am schoold by you, and promise you I will: but, good Sir, tell
She will passe by us now, I hope I may Salute her thus far off.
Gent. 'S foot, are you mad?
I will be as ill as th'other.
1. Attend. What's the matter?
What would that fellow have?
Gent. Good Sir forbear.
1. Atte. It seems you are new landed: would you beg
Any thing here?
Marc. Yes Sir, all happinesse
To that fair Lady, as I hope.
Gent. Marckantonio.
Marc. Her face, which needs no hiding: I would beg
A sight of.
Gent. Now go on, for 'tis too late
To keep this from a tumult.
1. Attend. Sirrah, you
Shall see a fitter object for your eyes,
Then a fair Ladies face.
Eug. For heavens sake, raise not
A quarrell in the streets for me.
1. Attend. Slip in then;
This is your door.
Eug. Will you needs quarrell then?
1. Attend. We must, or suffer
This outrage: is't not all your minds Sirs, speak?
all. Yes.
Eug. Then I do beseech ye, let my Lord
Enter three of your Soldiers.
Not think the quarrell about mee; for 'tis not. Exit.
Gent. See, happily some of our Galley Soldiers
Are come a shore.
1. Attend. Come on Sir, you shall see Faces enough.
Gent. Some one of you call to Enter certain Townsmen.
Our Generall, the whole rore of the Town
Comes in upon us.
Marc. I have seen Sir better
Perhaps, then that was cover'd; and will yet
Enter Philippo, Theodosia, and Leocadia.
See that, or spoil yours. fight.
Phil. On: why start you back?
Theo. Alas Sir, they are fighting.
Leoc. Let's begon,
See, see, a handsome man strook down.
Gent. Ho Generall,
Look out, Antonio is in distresse.
Enter Roderigo above.
Theo. Antonio?
Leoc. Antonio! 'tis he.
Rod. within. Ho, Governor make a shot into the Town,
Ile part you: bring away Antonio a shot.
Into my Cabben. Exit Attendents
Gent. I will do that office. and Townsmen.
I fear It is the last, that I shall do him.
Exit Soldiers and Gentlemen with Marckantonio.
Theo. The last, why will he die?
Leoc. Since I have found him happinesse leave me,
When I leave him. Exit.
Phil. Why Theodosia?
My Sister, wake: alas, I griev'd but now
To see the streets so full, and now I grieve
To see 'em left so empty: I could wish,
Tumult himself were here, that yet at least
Amongst the band, I might espie some face
So pale and fearfull, that would willingly
Embrace an arrand for a Cordiall,
Or Aquavitæ, or a cup of Sack,
Or a Physitian: But to talk of these
She breaths: stand up, O Theodosia,
Speak but as thou wert wont, give but a sigh,
Which is but the most unhappy peece of life;
And I will ever after worship Sighes,
Apply my self to grief; prepare and build Altars to sorrow.
Theo. O Philippo, help me.
Phil. I do; these are my arms; Philippo's arms,
Thy Brothers arms that hold thee up.
Theo. You help me
To life: but I would see Antonio
That's dead.
Phil. Thou shalt see any thing; how dost thou?
Theo. Better, I thank you.
Phil. Why that's well: call up
Thy senses, and unclowd thy cover'd spirits.
How now?
Theo. Recover'd: but Antonio,
Where is he?
Phil. We will find him: art thou well?
Theo. Perfectly well, having the misse of him;
And I do charge you here, by our allyance,
And by the love which would have been betwixt us,
Knew we no kindred; by that killing fear,
Mingled with twenty thousand hopes and doubts,
Which you may think, plac'd in a Lovers heart,
And in a Virgins too, when she wants help,
To grant me your assistance, to find out
This man alive, or dead; and I will pay you
In service, tears, or prayers, a world of wealth:
But other treasure, I have none: alas!
You men have strong hearts; but we feeble maids
Have tender eyes, which only given be

To

Yo blind themſelves, crying for what they ſee.
Phil. Why do'ſt thou charge me thus? have I been found
Slow to perform, what I could but imagine
Thy wiſhes were; have I at any time
Tender'd a buſineſſe of mine own, beyond
A vanity of thine? have I not been
As if I were a ſenſleſſe creature, made
To ſerve thee without pow'r of queſtioning,
If ſo, why fear'ſt thou?
Theo. I am ſatisfied.
Phil. Come, then let's go: wher's Leocadia?
Theo. I know not Sir.
Phil. Wher's Leocadia?
Theo. I do not know.
Phil. Leocadia,
This Tumult made the ſtreets as dead as night,
A man may talk as freely: what's become
Of Leocadia? Theo. She's run away.
Phil. Begone, and let us never more behold
Each others face, till we may both together
Faſten our eyes on her: accurſed be
Thoſe tender cozening names of charity,
And naturall affection, they have loſt
Me only by obſerving them, what coſt
Travell, and fruitleſſe wiſhes may in vain
Search through the world, but never find again.
Theo. Good Sir be patient, I have done no fault Worthy this baniſhment.
Phil. Yes, Leocadia,
The Lady ſo diſtreſs'd, who was content
To lay her ſtory, and to lay her heart
As open as her ſtory to your ſelf,
Who was content, that I ſhould know her Sex,
Before diſſembl'd, and to put her ſelf
Into my conduct, when I undertook
Safely to guard, is in this Tumult loſt.
Theo. And can I help it Sir?
Phil. No, would thou couldſt,
You might have done, but for that ſcale religion
You woman bear to ſwownings, you do pick
Your times to faint, when ſome body is by:
Bound or by nature, or by love, or ſervice
To raiſe you from that well diſſembled death;
Inform me but of one that has been found
Dead in her private chamber by her ſelf,
Where ſickneſſe would no more forbear, then here,
And I will quit the reſt for her.
Theo. I know not
What they may do, and how they may diſſemble;
But by my troth, I did not.
Phil. By my troth,
Would I had try'd; would I had let thee layen,
And followed her.
Theo. I would you had done ſo
Rather, then been ſo angry: wher's Antonio?
Phil. Why do'ſt thou vex me with theſe queſtions?
Ile tell thee where, he's carried to the Gallyes,
There to be chain'd, and row, and beat, and row
With knotted ropes, and pizzels; if he ſwound,
He has a dotes of biſket.
Theo. I am glad
He is alive.
Phil. Was ever man thus troubled,
Tell me where Leocadia is?
Theo. Good brother be not ſo haſty, and I think I can:
You found no error in me, when I firſt
Told you ſhe was a woman, and believe me
Something I have found out, which makes me think,
Nay, almoſt know ſo well, that I durſt ſwear
She follow'd hurt Antonio.
Phil. What do we
Enter the Governor, two Attendents, and the Townſmen.
Then lingring here; we will aboard the Gallyes
And find her.
Gov. Made he a ſhot into the Town?
1. Attend. He did Sir.
Gov. Call back thoſe Gentlemen.
1. Attend. The Governour commands you back.
Phil. We will obey him Sir.
Gov. You gave him cauſe to ſhoot, I know; he is
So far from raſh offence, and holds with me
Such curious friendſhip: could not one of you
Have call'd me while 'twas doing, ſuch an uproar,
Before my dore too? (publick cauſe, of our own
1. Townſm. By my troth Sir, we were ſo buſy in the Private falling out, that we forgot it; at home we ſee now
You were not, but as ſoon as the ſhot made us fly, we ran Away as faſt as we could to ſeek your honour.
Gov. 'Twas gravely done; but no man tels the cauſe
Or chance, or what it was that made you differ.
1. Townſ. For my part Sir, if there were any that I knew
Of, the ſhot drove it out of my head: do you know any
all. Not we, not we. (neighbours.
Gov. Not we! nor can you tell.
1. Attend. No other cauſe,
But the old quarrell betwixt the Town and the Gallyes.
Gov. Come neerer Gentlemen: what are your names?
Phil. My name Philippo.
Theo. And mine Theodoro.
Gov. Strangers you are it ſeems.
Phil. Newly ariv'd.
Gov. Then you are they begun this Tumult.
Phil. No Sir.
Gov. Speak one of you.
1. Attend. They are not, I can quiet 'em.
Theo. Yet we ſaw part, and an unhappy part
Of this debate, a long ſought friend of ours
Strook down for dead, and borne unto the Gallyes,
His name is Markantonio.
Phil. And another
Of our own company, a Gentleman
Of noble birth, beſides accompanied
With all the gifts of nature, raviſh'd hence!
We know not how, in this diſtention.
Gov. Get you home all, and work; and when I hear
You meddle with a weapon any more
But thoſe belonging to your Trades, ile lay you
Where your beſt Cuſtomers ſhall hardly find you. Exit
I am ſorry gentlemen, I troubled you, Townſ.
Being both ſtrangers, by your tongues, and looks, manet.
Of worth: To make ye ſome part of amends
If there be any thing in this poor Town
Of Barcelona that you would command,
Command me.
Theo. Sir, this wounded Gentleman,
If it might pleaſe you, if your pow'r and love
Extend ſo far, I would be glad to wiſh
Might be remov'd into the Town for cure:
The Gallyes ſtay not, and his wound I know
Cannot endure a voyage.
Gov. Sir, he ſhall,
I warrant you: Go call me hither Sirrah,
One of my other Servants. Exit 1. attendent.
Phil. And beſides.

The gentleman we loft, Signior Francisco,
Shall he be rerider'd too.

Enter a Servant, Rowl: Antion.

Gover. And he Sir too: Go sirrah, bear this ring
To Rodorigo, my most noble friend,
The Generall of the Gallys: Tell him this. Exit servant.
Theo. Now we shall have 'em both.
Phil. Blest be thy thoughts
For apprehending this: blest be thy breath
For utring it.
Gover. Come gentlemen, you shall Enter my roof: and I will send for Surgeons,
And you shall see your friends here presently.
Theo. His name was Markantonio.
Gover. I know it,
And have sent word so.
Phil. Did you not forget
Francisco's name?
Gover. Nor his: you ar truly welcome,
To talk about it more, were but to say
The same word often over: you are welcome. Exeunt.

SCÆNA SECUNDA.

Enter Markantonio, carried. Leocadia following, and the Servant, 2 Soldiers carrying him.

Serv. This is the house Sir.
Mar. Enter it, I pray you,
For I am faint, although I think my wound
Be nothing. Soldiers, leave us now: I thank you.
1. Sold. Heaven send you health Sir.
Serv. Let me lead you in.
Mark. My wounds not in my feet, I shall entreat 'em
I hope to bear me so far, Exit. (herall made a
2. Sold. How seriously these land men fed, when our Ge-Shot, as if he had been a warning to cal 'em to their Hall.
1. Sold. I cannot blame 'em: What a man have they now (in the Town, able to maintain a Tumult, or uphold a matter out
Of square if need be: O the quiet hurley burleys that I Have seen in this Town, when we have fought four hours
Together, and not a man amongst us so impertinent or Modest to ask why? but now the pillars that bare
Up this blessed Town in that regular debate, and Scambling, are dead, the more's the pity.
2. Sold. Old Ignatio lives still. (mans liver:
1. Sold. Yes, I know him: he will do pretily well at a
But where is there a man now living in the Town
That hath a steady hand, and understands Anotomy
Well? if it come to a particular matter of the lungs,
Or the spleen, why? alas Ignatio is to seek: are There any such men left as I have known, that
Would say they would hit you in this place? is there Ever a good heartist, or a member percer, or a Small-gut man left in the Town, answer
Me that.
2. Sold. Masse, I think there be not.
1. Sold. No, I warrant thee. Come, come, 'tis time
We were at the Gallys. Exeunt.

Enter Governour, Eugenia, Markantonio, Philippo, Theodosia, Leocadia, Attendants.

Gover. Sir, you may know by what I said already,
You may command my house; but I must beg
Pardon to leave you, if the publique business
Forc'd me not from you:, I my self should call it
Unmannerly: but good Sir, do you give it
A milder name: it shall not be an houre
Ere I return.
Marc. Sir, I was nere so poor:
In my own thoughts, as that I want a means
To requite this with.
Gover. Sir, within this houre. Exit.
Marc. This the Lady that I quarrell'd for:
O lust, if wounds cannot restrain thy power,
Let shame: nor do I feel my hurt at all,
Nor is it ought, only I was well beaten:
If I pursue it, all the civill world
That ever did imagine the content
Found in the band of man and wife in bruise,
The reverence due to housholds, or the blemish
That may be stuck upon posterity
Will catch me, bind me, burn upon my forehand,
This is the wounded stranger, that receiv'd
For charity into a house, attempted:
I will not do it.
Eug. Sir, how do you now?
That you walk off.
Marc. Worse Madam, then I was;
But it will over.
Eug. Sit, and rest a while.
Marc. Where are the Surgeons?
Eug. Sir, it is their manner,
When they have seen the wound especially,
The patient being of worth, to go certain,
Which they are now at in another room,
About the dressing.
Marc. Madam, I do feel
My self not well.
Theo. Alas!
Leoc. How do you Sir.
Eug. Will you drink waters?
Marc. No good Madam, 'tis not
So violent upon me; for I think Any thing dangerous: But yet there are
Some things that sit so heavy on my conscience
That will perplex my mind, and stop my cure,
So that unlesse I utter 'em. A scratch
Here on my thumb will kill me: Gentlemen,
I pray you leave the room, and come not in Your selves, or any other till I have Open'd my self to this most honour'd Lady.
Phil. We will not.
Theo. O blest! he will discover now
His love to me.
Leoc. Now he will tell the Lady
Our Contract. Exeunt.
Eug. I do beleeve he will confesse to me
The wrong he did a Lady in the streets;
But I forgive him.
Marc. Madam, I perceive
My self grow worse and worse.
Eug. Shall I call back your friends?
Marc. O no; but ere I do impart
What burthens me so sore, let me entreat you,
(For there is no trust in these Surgeons)
To look upon my wound; it is perhaps
My last request: But tell me truly too,
That must be it: how far you do imagine
Ir will have pow'r upon me.
Eug. Sir, I will.
Marc. For heavens sake, softly: oh, I must needs lay
My head down easily, whilst you do it.
Eug. Do Sir,
'Tis but an ordinary blow; a child
Of mine has had a greater, and been well;
Are you faint hearted?

Marc.

Mar. Oh.
Eug. Why do you figh?
There is no danger in the world in this;
I wonder it ſhould make a man ſit down;
What do you mean, why do you kiſſe my breaſts?
Lift up your head, your wound may well endure it.
Mar. O Madam, may I not expreſſe affection,
Dying-affection too I fear, to thoſe
That do me favors, ſuch as this of yours.
Eug. If you mean ſo, 'tis well; but what's the buſines
Lies on your conſcience?
Mar. I will tell you Madam.
Eug. Tel me, and laugh?
Mar. But I will tel you true
Though I do laugh, I know as well as you
My wound is nothing, nor the power of earth
Could lay a wound upon me, in your preſence,
That I could feel; But I do laugh to think
How covertly, how far beyond the reach
Of men, and wiſemen too, we ſhall deceive em,
Whilſt they imagine I am talking here
With that ſhort breath I have, ready to ſwound
At every full point; you my ghoſtly Mother
To hear my ſad confeſſion, you and I
Will on that bed within, prepar'd for me,
Debate the matter privately.
Eug. Forbear,
Thou were but now as welcome to this houſe
As certain cures to ſick men, and juſt now
This ſodain alteration makes thee look
Like plagues come to infect it; if thou knewſt
How loathſom thou wilt be, thou wouldſt intreat
Theſe walls, or poſtes to help thee to a hurt,
Paſt thy diſſimulation.
Mar. Gentle Madam
Cal 'em not in?
Eug. I will not yee, this place
I know to be within the reach of tongue,
And ears, thou canſt not force me; therefore hear me
What I will tell thee quickly, thou art born
To end ſome way more vnfeterm'd then this,
Or which is worſe, to dye of this hurt yet,
Come gentlemen.

Enter Leocadia.

Mar. Good Modam.
Eug. Gentlemen.
Leoc. Madam how is't? is Mark-antonio well?
Methinks your looks are alter'd, and I ſee
A ſtrange diſtemper in you.
Eug. I am wrought
By that diſſembling man, that fellow worth
Nothing but kicking.

Enter Philippo, and Theodoſia.

Leo. Gentle Madam ſpeak
To me alone, let not them underſtand
His fault, he wil repent it I dare ſwear.
Eug. Ile tell it you in privace.
Phil. Mark-antonio,
How do you?
Mar. Stand farther off I pray you
Give me ſome ayre.
Theo. Good Brother, wil he ſcape,
The Surgeons ſay there is no danger.
Phil. Scape?
No doubt he wil.
Leo. Alas will he not leave
This trying all; Madam, I do beſeech you
Let me but ſpeak to him, you and theſe by,
And I dare almoſt promiſe you to make him
Shew himſelf truly ſorrowful to you, beſides a ſtory I ſhall
Not put in ſo good words but in it ſelf (open to you,
So full of chance, that you wil eaſily
Forgive my tediouſneſſe, and be wel pleas'd
With that ſo much afflicts me.
Eug. Good Sir do.
Leo. And I deſire no interruption
Of ſpeech may trouble me, till I have ſaid
What I wil quickly do.
Theo. What wil ſhe ſay?
Eug. Come gentlemen, I pray you lend your ears,
And keep your voyces.
Leo. Sigñior Mark-antonio
How do you?
Mar. Oh the Surgeons.
Leoc. Let me tel you
Who know as wel as you, you do diſſemble,
It is no time to do ſo; leave the thoughts
Of this vain world, forget your fleſh and blood,
And make your ſpirit an untroubled way
To paſſe to what it ought.
Mar. Your not in earneſt?
Why I can walk Sir, and am wel
Leoc. 'Tis true
That you can walk, and do beleeve you're wel:
It is the nature, as your Surgeons ſay
Of theſe wounds, for a man to go, and talk,
Nay merrily, till his laſt hour, his minute;
For heaven ſake ſir, ſit down again.
Mar. Alas
Where are the Surgeons?
Leoc. Sir, they will not come,
If they ſhould dreſſe you, you would dye they ſay
Ere one told twenty; trouble not your mind,
Keep your head warm, and do not ſtir your body,
And you may live an hour.
Mar. Oh heavens, an hour?
Alas, it is to little to remember
But half the wrongs that I have done; how ſhort
Then for contrition, and how leaſt of all
For ſatisfaction?
Leo. But you deſire
To ſatisfie.
Mar. Heaven knows I do.
Leo. Then know
That I am he, or ſhe, or what you will Moſt wrong'd by you; your Leocadia,
I know you muſt remember me.
Mar. Oh heaven!
Leo. That loſt her friends, that loſt her fathers houſe,
That loſt her fame, in looſing of her Sex,
With theſe ſtrange garments, there is no excuſe
To hinder me, it is within your power
To give me ſatisfaction; you have time
Left in this little peece of life to do it:
Therefore I charge you for your conſcience ſake,
And for our fame, which I would fain have live
When both of us are dead; to celebrate
That Contract, which you have both ſeal'd and ſworn
Yet ere you dye, which muſt be haſtily
Heaven knows.
Mar. Alas, the ſting of conſcience
To death-ward for our faults; draw neerer all
And hear what I unhappy man ſhal ſay;
Firſt Madam I deſire your pardon; next

(I feel my ſpirits fail me) Gentlemen
Let me ſhake hands with you, and let's be friends,
For I have done wrong upon wrong ſo thick
I know not where, that every man methinks ſhould be mine enemy; Forgive me both.
Laſtly 'tis true (oh I do feel the power Of death ſeize on me) that I was contracted
By ſeal and oath to Leocadia;
(I muſt ſpeak faſt, becauſe I fear my life Will elſe be ſhorter then my ſpeech would be)
But 'tis impoſſible to ſatisfie
You Leocadia, but by repentance,
Though I can dyingly, and boldly ſay
I know not your diſhonor, yet that was
Your vertue, and not mine, you know it wel;
But herein lies th' impoſſibility,
O Theodoſia, Theodoſia
I was betroth'd to Theodoſia
Before I ever ſaw thee; heaven forgive me
She is my wife this half hour whilſt I live.

Theo. That's I, that's I, I 'me Theodoſia,
Hear me a litle now, who have not ſuffer'd
Diſgrace at all methinks, ſince you confeſs
What I ſo long have ſought for, here is with me
Philippo too, my Brother.

Mar. I am glad;
All happineſs to him; Come let me kiſs thee
Beg pardon of that Maid for my offence,
And let me further, with a dying breath
Tell in thine ear, the reſt of my deſires.

Eug. I am afraid they wil all four turn women
If we hold longer talk.

Leoc. Alas there is
No hope for me; that's Theodoſia
And that her Brother, I am only ſorry
I was beholding to 'em; I will ſearch
Over the world, as careleſſe of my fortunes,
As they of me, till I can meet a curſe
To make theſe almoſt-killing ſorrows worſe. Exit.

Theo. Sir, as I live ſhe ly'd, only to draw
A juſt confeſſion from you, which ſhe hath
A happy one for me, ask of this Lady,
Ask of my Brother.

Eug. Sir, ſhe did diſſemble,
Your wound is nothing.

Phil. Leocadia's gone. Exit.

Theo. Riſe up, and ſtir your ſelf, 'tis but amazement
And your imagination that afflicts you,
Look you Sir now.

Mar. I think 'tis ſo indeed.

Theo. The Surgeons do not come, becauſe they ſwear
It needs no dreſſing.

Eug. You ſhal talk with 'em
Within, for your own fancy.

Mar. Where's your Brother And Leocadia?

Eug. Within Belike.

Mar. I feel my ſelf methinks as well as ever.

Eug. Keep then your mind ſo too; I do forgive
The fault you did to me; But here is one
Muſt not be wrong'd hereafter.

Mar. Neither ſhall ſhee
When I make jeſts of oathes again, or make
My luſt play with religion, when I leave
To keep true joyes for her, and yet within
My ſelf true ſorrow for my paſſed deeds
May I want grace, when I would fain repent,
And find a great and ſodain puniſhment. Exeunt.

ACT. V. SCAENA I.

Enter Philippo, Diego, and Incubo.

Phil. WHere is mine Hoſt, did not he ſee him neither?

Die. Not I, y' faith Sir.

Phil. Nor the muleter?

Inc. Nay he is paſt ſeeing, unleſſe it be in's ſleep,
By this time; all his viſions were the pots,
Three hours ſince Sir.

Phil. Which way ſhould ſhe take?
Nay, look you now; do you all ſtand ſtil? good god
You might have lighted on him, now, this inſtant?
For loves ſake ſeek him out, who ever find him
I will reward his fortune as his diligence;
Get all the Town to help, that will behir'd,
Their pains ile turn to an annall holiday,
If it ſhal chance, but one bring word of her,
Pray you about it.

Inc. Her ſir? who do you mean?

Phil. (I had forgot my ſelf) the Page I meant
That came along with us.

Die. He you give the clothes too?

Phil. I ga' the clothes to; Raſcal.

Die. Nay good Sir.

Phi. Why do'ſt thou mention, or upbraid my courteſies Slave?

Die. For your honor Sir,

Phil. Wretch; I was honor'd,
That ſhe would wear 'em (he, I would ſay) a death?
Go, get, and find him out, or never ſee me,
I ſhal betray my love ere I poſſeſs it,
Some ſtar direct me, or ill planet ſtrike me. Exit Phil.

Inc. Beſt to divide.

Die. Ile this way.

Inc. And I this.

Dieg. I, as you, find him for a real.

Inc. 'Tis done.

Die. My courſe is now directly to ſome pichouſe
I know the Pages compaſſe.

Inc. I think rather
The ſmock ſide o' the Town, the ſurer harbor
At his years to put in.

Die. If I do find
The hungry haunt, I take him by the teeth now.

Inc. I by the tail, yet I as you.

Die. No more. Exeunt.

SCAENA SECUNDA.

Enter Philippo.

Phil. Dear Leocadia, where canſt thou be fled
Thus like a ſpirit hence? and in a moment?
What cloud can hide thee from my following ſearch
If yet thou art a body? ſure ſhe hath not Tane any houſe? ſhe did too late leave one
Where all humanity of a place receiv'd her,
And would (if ſhe had ſtayd) have help'd to right
The wrong her fortune did her; yet ſhe muſt
Be inter'd ſomewhere, or be found, no ſtreet,
Lane, paſſage, corner, turn, hath ſcap'd enquiry:
If her diſpair had ravish'd her to ayre
Shee could not yet be rarefied ſo Enter Incubo.
But ſome of us ſhould meet her? though their eyes
Perhaps be leaden, and might turn; mine would Strike out a lightning for her, and divide

A miſt as thick as ever darkneſſe was,
Nay ſee her through a quarry; they do lye,
Lye groſly that ſay love is blind; by him,
And heaven they lye; he has a ſight can pierce
Through Ivory as clear as it were horn,
And reach his object.
Inc. Sir hee's found, hee's found.
Phil. Ha? where? But reach that happy note again
And let it reliſh truth, thou art an Angel.
Inc. Hee's here; faſt by ſir, calling for a Boat
To go aboard the Gallies.
Phil. Where, where; hold thee. Exit.
Inc. He might ha' kept this now, I had nought to ſhew
If he had had the wit t' have gone from 's word, (for 't
Theſe direct men, they are no men of faſhion,
Talk what you will, this is a very ſmelt. Exit.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Leonardo with a Surgeon.

Leon. Upon your art Sir, and your faith to aſſiſt it
Shal I beleeve you then his wounds not mortal?
Surg. Sir 'tis not worth your queſtion; leſſe your fear.
Leon. You do reſtore me Sir, I pray you accept
This ſmal remembrance of a fathers thanks
For ſo aſſur'd a benefit.
Surg. Excuſe me.
Leon. Sir I can ſpare it, and muſt not beleeve
But that your fortune may receive't, except
You 'ld (as' tis) think you live not by your practiſe.
Surg. I crave your pardon Sir; you teach me manners.
Leon. I crave your love and friendſhip, and require
As I have made now, both my ſelf and buſineſſe
A portion of your care, you wil but bring me
Under the perſon of a call'd aſſiſtant
To his next opening, where I may but ſee him,
And utter a few words to him in private,
And you will merit me; For I am loth
Since here I have not to appear my ſelf,
Or to be known unto the Governor,
Or make a tumult of my purpoſe.
Surg. Neither
I hope wil be your need Sir; I ſhal bring you
Both there, and off again without the hazard. Exeunt.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Philippo, and Leocadia.

Phil. Wil you not heat me?
Leoc. I have heard ſo much
Wil keep me deaf for ever; No, Mark-antonie
After thy ſentence, I may hear no more,
Thou haſt pronoune'd me dead.
Phil. Appeal to reaſon,
She will reprieve you from the power of grief,
Which rules but in her abſence; Hear me ſay
A ſoveraign meſſage from her, which in duty,
And love to your own ſafety, you ought hear:
Why do you ſtrive ſo? whither would you fly?
You cannot wreſt your ſelf away from fate
You may from counſel; you may ſhift your place
But not your perſon; and another Clyme
Makes you no other.
Leoc. Oh.
Phil. For paſſions ſake,
(Which I do ſerve, honor, and love in you)
If you will ſigh, ſigh here; If you would vary
A ſigh to tears, or out-cry, do it here.
No ſhade, no deſart, darkneſſe, nor the grave
Shal be more equal to your thoughts then I,
Only but hear me ſpeak.
Leoc. What would you ſay? (mine,
Phil. That which ſhall raiſe your heart, or pul down
Quiet your paſſion, or provoke mine own;
We muſt have both one balſame, or one wound,
For know (lov'd fair) ſince the firſt providence
Made me your reſcew, I have read you through,
And with a wondring pity, look'd on you,
I have obſerv'd the method of your blood,
And waited on it even with ſympathy
Of a like red, and paleneſſe in mine own;
I knew which bluſh was angers, which was loves,
Which was the eye of ſorrow, which of truth;
And could diſtinguiſh honor from diſdain
In every change; And you are worth my ſtudy:
I ſaw your voluntary miſery
Suſtain'd in travel: A diſguiſed Maid
Wearied with ſeeking: and with finding loſt,
Neglected, where you hop'd moſt; or put by;
I ſaw it, and have laid it to my heart,
And though it were my Siſter, which was righted,
Yet being by your wrong, I put off nature,
Could not be glad, where I was bound to triumph,
My care for you, ſo drown'd reſpect of her,
Nor did I only apprehend your bonds,
But ſtudyed your releaſe: and for that day
Have I made up a ranſom, brought you health
Preſervative 'gainſt chance, or injury
Pleaſe you apply it to the grief; my ſelf.
Leoc. Humh.
Phil. Nay do not think me leſſe then ſuch a care,
Antonio was not; And 'tis poſſible
Philippo may ſucceed: My blood and houſe
Are as deep rooted: and as fairly ſpread,
As Mark-antonio's, and in that, all ſeek,
Fortune hath given him no precedency:
As for our thanks to Nature I may burn
Incenſe as much as he; I ever durſt
Walk with Antonio by the ſelf-ſame light
At any feaſt, or triumph, and nev'r car'd
Which ſide my Lady or her woman took
In their ſurvey; I durſt have told my tale too
Though his diſcourſe new ended.
Leoc. My repulſe.
Phil. Let not that torture you, which makes me happy
Nor think that conſcience (fair) which is no ſhame
'Twas no repulſe, I was your dowry rather:
For then methought a thouſand graces met
To make you lovely, and ten thouſand ſtories
Of conſtant vertue, which you then out-reach'd,
In one example, did proclaim you rich
Nor do I think you wretched, or diſgrac'd
After this ſuffring, and do therefore take Advantage of your need; but rather know
You are the charge and buſineſſe of thoſe powers,
Who, like beſt Tutors, do inflict hard taſks
Upon great Natures, and of nobleſt hopes,
Read trivial leſſons, and half lines to huggs;
They that live long and never feel miſchance,
Spend more then half their age in ignorance.
Leoc. 'Tis wel you think ſo.
Phil. You ſhal think ſo too,
You ſhal ſweet Leocadia, and do ſo.
Leoc. Good Sir no more; you have too fair a ſhape
To play ſo foul a part in, as the Tempter:

Say

Say that I could make peace with fortune, who,
Who ſhould abſolve me of my vow yet; ha?
My Contract made?
Phil. Your Contract?
Leoc. Yes, my Contract,
Am I not his? his wife?
Phil. Sweet, nothing leſſe.
Leoc. I have no name then?
Phil. Truly then you have not;
How can you be his wife, who was before
Anothers husband?
Leoc. Oh, though he diſpence
With his faith given, I cannot with mine.
Phil. You do miſtake (cleer ſoul) his precontract
Doth annul yours, and you have giv'n no faith
That ties you in religion, or humanity,
You rather ſin againſt that greater precept,
To covet what's anothers; Sweet, you do
Beleeve me, who dare not urge diſhoneſt things,
Remove that ſcruple therefore, and but take
Your dangers now, into your judgements skale
And weigh them with your ſafeties: Think but whither
Now you can go: what you can do to live?
How neer you ha' barr'd all Ports to your own ſuccor,
Except this one that I here open: Love
Should you be left alone, you were a prey
To the wild luſt of any, who would look Upon this ſhape like a temptation
And think you want the man you perſonate
Would not regard this ſhift, which love put on
As vertue forc'd but covet it like vice;
So ſhould you live the ſlander of each Sex,
And be the child of error, and of ſhame,
And which is worſe, even Mark-antonie
Would be cal'd juſt, to turn a wanderer off,
And Fame report you worthy his contempt;
Where if you make new choyce, and ſetle here
There is no further tumult in this flood·
Each currant keeps his courſe, and all ſuſpitions
Shal return honors: Came you forth a Maid?
Go home a Wife? alone? and in diſguiſe?
Go home a waited Leocadia:
Go home, and by the vertue of that Charm
Transform all miſchiefs, as you are transform'd;
Turn your offended Fathers wrath to wonder,
And all his loud grief to a ſilent welcome:
Unfold the Riddles you have made, what ſay you?

Enter Sanchio carried. Alphonſo, and Servants.

Now is the time; delay is but deſpair,
If you be chang'd, let a kiſſe tell me ſo.
Leoc. I am: but how, I rather feel then know.
Sanc. Come Sir; you are welcome now to Barcellona,
Take off my hood.
Phil. Who be theſe? ſtay, let's view 'em?
Alph. 'Twas a long journey: are you not weary Sir?
Sanc. Weary? I could have rid it in mine Armour.
Leoc. Alas!
Phil. What ayl you deer?
Leoc. It is my Father.
Phil. Your Father: which?
Leoc. He that is carried: oh
Let us make hence.
Phil. For loves ſake: good my heart.
Leoc. Into ſome houſe before he ſee me.
Phil. Deer,
Be not thus frighted.
Leoc. O his wrath is tempeſt.
Phil. Sweet, take your ſpirit to you, and ſtay bee't he,
He cannot know you in this habit, and me
I'me ſure he leſſe knows, for he never ſaw me.
Alph. Ha? who is that? my Son Philippo?
Phil. Sir.
Alp. Why, what make you here? Is this Salamanca?
And that your ſtudy? ha? nay ſtay him too,
Wee'l ſee him by his leave.
Serv. You muſt not ſtrive Sir.
Alph. No, no, come neer.
Sanc. My daughter: Leocadia?
Alph. How Sir: your daughter?
Sanc. Yes Sir, and as ſure
As that's your Son: Come hither: what now? run
Out o' your ſex? breech'd? was't not enough
At once to leave thy Father, and thine honor,
Unleſſe th' hadſt quit thy ſelf too.
Phil. Sir what fault
She can be urg'd off, I muſt take on me
The guilt, and punihment.
Sanc. You muſt Sir: how
If you ſhal not, though you muſt? I deal not
With boys Sir; I, you have a Father here
Shal do me right.
Alp. Thou art not mad Philippo?
Art thou Mark-antonie? Son to Leonardo?
Our buſineſſe is to them.
Sanc. No, no, no, no,
Ile ha' the buſineſſe now: with you, none elſe,
Pray you let's ſpeak, in private: (carry me to him)
Your Son's the raviſher Sir, and here I find him:
I hope you'l give me cauſe to think you noble,
And do me right, with your ſword ſir, as becomes
One gentleman of honor to another;
All this is fair Sir: here's the ſea faſt by,
Upon the ſands, we will determine
'Tis that I call you too; let's make no days on't,
Ile lead your way; to the ſeaſide Raſcals.
Phil. Sir
I would beſeech your ſtay; he may not follow you.
San. No, turn ile kill him here then: Slaves, Rogues, Blocks
Why do you not bear me to him? ha' you been Acquainted with my motions, loggs, ſo long
And yet not know to time 'em.
Phil. Were you Sir
Not impotent.
Alph. Hold you your peace Boy.
Sanc. Impotent
'Death ile cut his throat firſt, and then his Fathers.
Alph. You muſt provide you then a ſharper razor
Then is your tongue, for I not fear your ſword.
Sanc. 'Heart bear mee to either of 'em.
Phil. Pray Sir your patience.

Enter Governor and Attendants.

Alph. My curſe light on thee if thou ſtay him.
Phil. Hold.
Gov. Why, what's the matter, Gentlemen, what tumult
Is this you raiſe i'th ſtreet? before my door?
Know you what 'tis to draw a weapon here.
Sanc. Yes, and to uſe it (bear me up to him, Rogues)
Thus, at a Traytors heart.
Alph. Truer then thine.
Gov. Strike, ſtrike; Some of the people diſarm 'em,
Kil 'em if they reſiſt.
Phil. Nay generous ſir
Let not your courteſie turn fury now.

Gov.

Gover. Lay hold upon 'em, take away their weapons,
I wil be worth an anſwer, ere we part.
Phil. Tis the Governour ſir.
Alph. I yield my ſelfe. (tell me.
Sanch. My Sword? what thinkſt thou of me? pray thee
1 Attend. As of a Gentleman.
Sanch. No more.
1 Attend. Of worth,
And quality.
Sanch. And I ſhould quit my Sword
There were ſmall worth or quality in that friend;
Pray thee learn thou more worth and quality
Then to demand it.
Gov. Force it I ſay.
1 Atten. The Governour
You heare, commands.
Sanch. The Governour ſhall pardon me.
Phil. How, Leocadia gone again? Exit Phil.
Sanch. He ſhall friend
I'th point of honour; by his leave, ſo tell him,
His perſon and authority I acknowledge,
And do ſubmit me to it; but my Sword,
He ſhal excuſe me, were he fifteen Governours;
That and I dwell together, and muſt yet
Till my hands part, aſſure him.
Gov. I ſay force it.
Sanch. Stay, heare me. Haſt thou ever read Curanza?
Underſtandſt thou honour, Noble Governour?
Gov. For that we'l have more fit diſpute.
Sanch. Your name ſir.
Gov. You ſhall know that too: But on colder termes,
Your blood and brain are now too hot to take it.
Sanch. Force my Sword from me? this is an affront.
Gov. Bring 'em away.
Sanch. You'l do me reparation. Exeunt.

Enter Philippo.

Phil. I have for ever loſt her, and am loſt,
And worthily: my tameneſſe hath undone me;
She's gone hence, aſham'd of me: yet I ſeek her.
Will ſhe be ever found to me again,
Whom ſhe ſaw ſtand ſo poorly, and dare nothing
In her defence, here, when I ſhould have drawn
This Sword out like a meteor, and have ſhot it
In both our parents eyes, and left 'em blind Unto their impotent angers? O I am worthy
On whom this loſſe and ſcorn ſhould light to death
Without the pity that ſhould wiſh me better,
Either alive, or in my Epitaph.

Enter Leonardo, Marc-Antonio.

Leon. Well ſon, your father is too neere himſelfe
And hath too much of nature to put off
Any affection that belongs to you.
I could have onely wiſhd you had acquainted
Her father, whom it equally concerns,
Though y'had preſum'd on me: it might have open'd
An eaſier gate, and path to both our joyes:
For though I am none of thoſe flinty Fathers
That when their children do but naturall things,
Turn rock and offence ſtreight: yet Marc-antonio,
All are not of my quarry.
Mar. Tis my feare ſir;
And if hereafter I ſhould ere abuſe
So great a piety, it were my malice.

Enter Attendants.

Atten. We muſt intreat you Gentlemen to take Another room, the Governour is comming
Here, on ſome buſineſſe.

Enter Governour, Sanchio, Alphonſo, Attendants.

Mar. We will give him way.
Sanch. I will have right ſir on you; that believe,
If there be any Marſhals Court in Spaine.
Gov. For that ſir we ſhall talke.
Sanch. —— doe not ſlight me,
Though I am without a Sword.
Gov. Keep to your chaire ſir. (him.
Sanch. —— Let me fall, and hurle my chaire! (ſlaves) at
Gov. You are the more temperd man ſir: let me intreat
Of you the manner how this brawle fell out.
Alph Fell out? I know not how: nor do I care much:
But here we came ſir to this Town together,
Both in one buſineſſe and one wrong, engag'd
To ſeeke one Leonardo an old Genoeſe,
I ha' ſaid enough there; would you more? falſe father
Of a falſe ſonne, cal'd Marc-antonio,
Who had ſtole both our daughters; and which father
Conſpiring with his ſonne in treachery,
It ſeemd, to fly our ſatisfaction,
Was, as we heard, come private to this Town
Here to take ſhip for Italy.
Leon. You heard
More then was true then: by the feare, or falſhood,
And though I thought not to reveale my ſelfe
(Pardon my manners in't to you) for ſome
Important reaſons; yet being thus character'd
And challeng'd, know I dare appeare, and doe
To who dares threaten.
Mar. I ſay he is not worthy
The name of man, or any honeſt preface,
That dares report or credit ſuch a ſlander.
Doe you ſir ſay it?
Alph. Sir, I doe ſay it.
Gov. Hold,
Is this your father Signior Marc-antonio?
You have ill requited me thus to conceale him
From him would honour him, and do him ſervice.

Enter Eugenia.

Leon. Twas not his fault ſir.
Eug. Where's my Lord.
Gov. Sweet heart.
Eug. Know you theſe Gentlemen? they are all the fa-Unto our friends. (thers
Gov. So it appeares my Dove.
Sanch. Sir I ſay nothing: I doe want a Sword,
And till I have a Sword I will ſay nothing.
Eug. Good ſir command theſe Gentlemen their Armes;
Entreat 'em as your friends, not as your priſoners.
Where be their Swords?
Gov. Reſtore each man his weapon.
Sanch. It ſeems thou haſt not read Curanza, fellow
I muſt have reparation of honour,
As well as this: I finde that wounded.
Gov. Sir,
I did not know your quality, if I had
Tis like I ſhould have done you more reſpects.
Sanch. It is ſufficient, by Curanza's rule.
Eug. I know it is ſir.
Sanch. Have you read Curanza Lady?
Eug. If you mean him that writ upon the duell,
He was my kinſman.
Sanch. Lady, then you know
By the right noble writings of your kinſman,
My honour is as deere to me, as the Kings.
Eug. Tis very true ſir.
Sanch. Therefore I muſt crave
Leave to goe on now with my firſt dependance.

Eug. What ha you more?
Gov. None here good Signior.
Sanch. I will, refer me to Curanzo still.
Eug. Nay love, I prethee let me mannage this.
With whom is't sir?
Sanch. With that false man Alphonso.
Eug. Why he has th' advantage sir in legs.
Sanch. But I
In truth, and hand and heart, and a good Sword.
Eug. But how if he will not stand you Sir.
Alph. For that,
Make it no question Lady, I will sticke
My feet in earth down by him, where he dare.
Sanch. O would thou wouldst.
Alph. Ile do't.
Sanch. Let me kisse him.
I feare thou wilt not yet.
Eug. Why Gentlemen,
If you'l proceed according to Curanzo,
Me thinks an easier way, were too good chaires,
So you would be content sir to be bound,
'Cause he is lame, ile fit you with like weapons,
Pistols and Ponyards, and ev'n end it. If
The difference between you be so mortall.
It cannot be tane up.
Sanch. Tane up? take off
This head first.
Alph. Come bind me in a chaire.
Eug. Yes, do.
Gov. What mean you, Dove.
Eug. Let me alone,
And let 'em at their distance: when you ha' done
Lend me two Ponyards; ile have Pistols ready Quickly. Exit.

Enter Philippo.

Phil. She is not here Mare-antonio.
Saw you not Leocadia?
Mar. Not I brother. (her.
Phil. Brother let's speak with you; you were false unto Mar. I was, but have ask'd pardon: why do you urge Phil. You were not worthy of her. (it?
Mar. May be I was not;
But tis not well, you tell me so.
Phil. My sister
Is not so faire.
Mar. It skils not.
Phil. Nor so vertuous.
Mar. Yes, she must be as vertuous.
Phil. I would faine——
Mar. What brother?
Phil. Strike you.
Mar. I shall not beare strokes,
Though I do these strange words.
Phil. Will you not kill me?
Mar. For what good brother?
Phil. Why, for speaking well
Of Leocadia.
Mar. No indeed.
Phil. Nor ill
Of Theodosia?

Enter Eugenia, Leocadia, Theodosia, and one with two Pistols.

Mar. Neither.
Phil. Fare you well then.
Eug. Nay you shall have as Noble seconds too
As ever duellists had; give 'em their weapons:
Now S^t Iago.
Sanch. Are they charg'd?
Eug. Charg'd sir,
I warrant you.
Alph. Would they were well discharg'd.
Sanch. I like a Sword much better I confesse.
Eug. Nay wherefore stay you? shal I mend your mark?
Strike one another, thorough these?
Phil. My love.
Alph. My Theodosia.
Sanch. I ha' not the heart.
Alph. Nor I.
Eug. Why here is a dependance ended.
Unbind that Gentleman; come take here to you
Your sonnes and daughters, and be friends. A feast
Waites you within, is better then your fray:
Lovers, take you your own, and all forbeare
Under my roofe, either to blush or feare
My love, what say you; could Curanzo himselfe
Carry a businesse better?
Gov. It is well:
All are content I hope, and we well eas'd,
If they for whom we have done all this be pleas'd.
Exeunt.

PROLOGVE.

TO this place Gentlemen, full many a day
We have bid ye welcome; and to many a Play:
And those whose angry soules were not diseasd
With law, or lending money, we have pleasd;
And make no doubt to do again. This night
No mighty matter, nor no light,
We must intreat you looke for: A good tale
Told in two houres, we will not faile
If we be perfect to rehearse ye: New
I am sure it is, and handsome; but how true
Let them dispute that writ it. Ten to one
We please the women; and I would know that man Follows not their example. If ye mean
To know the Play well, travell with the Scene.
For it lies upon the road; if we chance tire,
As ye are good men leave us not i'th mire,
Another bayt may mend us: If you grow
A litte gald or weary; cry but hoa,
And we'l stay for ye. When our journey ends
Every mans Pot I hope, and all part friends.

THE

THE Maske of the Gentlemen of Grayes-Inne, and the Inner-Temple,

Performed before the King in the Banqueting-house at White-hall, at the marriage of the Illustrious Frederick and Elizabeth, Prince and Princesse Palatine of the Rhene.

Written by FRANCIS BEAMONT Gentleman.

Enter Iris running, Mercury following and catching hold of her.

Mercury.

STay light-foot Iris, for thou striv'st in vain,
My wings are nimbler then thy feet.
Iris. Away,
Dissembling Mercury, my messages
Aske honest haste; not like those wanton ones
Your thundering father sends.
Mer. Stay foolish maid,
Or I will take my rise upon a hill,
When I perceive thee seated in a cloud
In all the painted glory that thou hast,
And never cease to clap my willing wing,
Till I catch hold on thy discolour'd Bow,
And shiver it beyond the angry power
Of your mad mistris to make up again.
Iris. Hermes forbeare, Juno will chide and strike;
Is great Jove jealous that I am imployd
On her love-errands? she did never yet
Clasp weak mortality in her white armes,
As he has often done; I onely come
To celebrate the long wisht Nuptials
Here in Olympia, which are now perform'd
Betwixt two goodly Rivers that have mixt
Their gentle winding waves, and are to grow
Into a thousand streams great as themselves.
I need not name them, for the sound is lowd
In Heaven and earth, and I am sent from her
The Queen of marriage, that was present here,
And smild to see them joyne, and hath not chid
Since it was done. Good Hermes let me goe.
Mer. Nay you must stay; Joves message is the same
Whose eyes are lightning, and whose voyce is thunder,
Whose breath is aiery wind, he will, who knows
How to be first in Earth as well as Heaven.
Iris. But what hath he to doe with Nuptiall rites?
Let him sit pleasd upon his Starry throne,
And fright poore mortals with his Thunder-bolts,
Leaving to us the mutuall darts of eyes.
Mer. Alas, when ever offer'd he t' abridge
Your Ladies power, but onely now, in these,
Whose match concerns the generall government?
Hath not each God a part in these high joyes?
And shall not he the King of Gods presume
Without proud Juno's licence? let her know
That when enamourd Jove first gave her power
To linke soft hearts in undesolving bands,
He then foresaw, and to himselfe reserv'd
The honour of this marriage: thou shalt stand Still as a Rock, while I to blesse this Feast
Will summon up with mine all-charming rod
The Nymphs of Fountaines, from whose watry locks, (Hung with the dew of blessing and increase)
The greedy Rivers take their nourishment.
Yea Nymphs who bathing in your loved Springs,
Beheld these Rivers in their infancy,
And joy'd to see them when their circled heads
Refresht the ayre, and spread the ground with Flowres:
Rise from your Wells, and with your nimble feet
Performe that Office to this happy paire,
Which in these plaines you to Alpheus did,
When passing hence, through many Seas unmixt,
He gaind the favour of his Arethusa.

The Nymphs rise and dance alittle, and then make a stand.

Iris. Is Hermes grown a Lover? by what power
Unknown to us calls he the maides?
Mer. Presumptuous Iris, I could make thee dance
Till thou forgeest thy Ladies messages,
And ranst back crying to her; thou shalt know
My power is more, onely my breath, and this Shall move fixt Stars, and force the Firmament
To yield the Hyades, who govern showers,
And dewy clouds, in whose dispersed drops
Thou formst the shape of thy deceitfull Bow.
You maides who yeerly at appointed times
Advance with kindly teares, the gentle floods
Discend, and poure your blessing on these streams,
Which rolling down from Heaven-aspiring hils,
And now united in the fruitfull vailes,
Beare all before them, ravisht with their joy,
And swell in glory till they know no bounds.

The Cloud discends with the Hyades, at which the maydes seem to be rejoyced; they all dance a while together, then make another stand, as if they wanted something.

Iris. Great wit and power hath Hermes to contrive
A lively dance, which of one sex consists.
Mer. Alas poore Iris, Venus hath in store

A ſecret ambuſh of her winged boyes,
Who lurking long within theſe pleaſant groves
Firſt ſtuck theſe lovers with their equall darts,
Thoſe Cupids ſhall come forth and joyn with theſe,
To honour that which they themſelves began.

The Cupids come forth and dance, they are weary with their blind purſuing the Nymphs, and the Nymphs weary with flying them.

Iris. Behold the Statues which wiſe Vulcan plac'd
Under the Altar of Olympian Jove,
And gave to them an artificiall life:
See how they move, drawn by this heavenly joy,
Like the wild Trees which followed Orpheus Harp.

The Statues come down, and they all dance till the Nymphs out-run them and loſe them, then the Cupids go off, and laſt the Statues.

Merc. And what will Juno's Iris doe for her?

Iris. Juſt match this ſhew, or mine inventions faile,
Had it been worthier, I would have invok'd
The blazing Comets, Clouds and falling Stars,
And all my kindred meteors of the ayre,
To have exceld it; but I now muſt ſtrive
To imitate confuſion; Therefore thou
Delightfull Flora, if thou ever felt'ſt
Increaſe of ſweetneſſe in thoſe blooming Plants,
On which the hornes of my faire Bow decline,
Send hither all that rurall company,
Which deck the Maygames with their clowniſh ſports;
Juno will have it ſo.

The ſecond Antimaſque ruſheth in, they dance their meaſure, and as rudely depart.

Merc. Iris, we ſtrive
Like winds at liberty, who ſhould doe worſt
Ere we returne. If Juno be the Queen
Of mariages, let her give happy way
To what is done in honour of the State
She governs.

Iris. Hermes, ſo it may be done
Meerely in honour of the State, and thoſe
That now have prov'd it; not to ſatisfie
The luſt of Jupiter, in having thanks
More then his Juno, if thy Snaky rod
Have power to ſearch the Heaven, or ſound the Sea,
Or call together all the ends of earth,
To bring thee any thing that may doe grace
To us, amd theſe, do it, we ſhall be pleas'd. (ſelfe,

Merc. Then know that from the mouth of Jove him-
Whoſe words have wings, and need not to be borne,
I tooke a meſſage, and I bore it through
A thouſand yeelding clouds, and never ſtaid
Till his high will was done: The Olympian games
Which long had ſlept, at theſe wiſht nuptials,
He pleaſ'd to have renew'd, and all his Knights
Are gather'd hither, who within their Tents
Reſt on this hill, upon whoſe riſing head

The Altar is diſcovered with the Prieſts about it, and the Statues under it, and the Knights lying in their Tents on each ſide, neere the top of the hill.

Behold Joves Altar, and his bleſſed Prieſts
Moving about it; come you holy men,
And with your voyces draw theſe youths along,
That till Joves Muſicke call them to their games,
Their active ſports may give a bleſt content
To thoſe for whom they are again begun.

The firſt Song, when the Prieſts deſcend, and the Knights follow them.

Shake off your heavy trance,
and leape into a dance,
Such as no mortals uſe to tread, fit onely for Apollo
To play to, for the Moon to lead,
And all the Stars to follow.

The ſecond Song at the end of the firſt dance.

On bleſſed youths, for Jove doth paſſe,
Laying aſide his graver Lawes
For this device:
And at the wedding ſuch a paire,
Each dance is taken for a prayer,
Each Song a Sacrifice.

The third Song after their many dances, when they are to take out the Ladies.

Single.

More pleaſing were theſe ſweet delights,
If Ladies mov'd as well as Knights;
Run every one of you and catch
A Nymph, in honour of this match;
And whiſper boldly in her eare,
Jove will but laugh if you forſweare.

All.

And this daies ſins he doth reſolve,
That we his Prieſts ſhould all abſolve.

The fourth Song, when they have parted with the Ladies, a ſhrill Muſique ſounds, ſuppoſed to be that which calls them to the Olympian games, at which they all make a ſeeming preparation to depart.

You ſhould ſtay longer if we durſt
Away, alas that he that firſt
Gave time wild wings to fly away,
Ha's now no power to make him ſtay.
And though theſe games muſt needs be plaid,
I would theſe paire when they are layd,
And not a creature nigh 'em,
Might catch his ſithe as he doth paſſe,
And clip his wings, and break his glaſſe,
And keep him ever by 'em.

The fifth Song, when all is done, as they aſcend.

Peace and ſilence be the guide
To the man, and to the Bride:
If there be a joy yet new
In marriage, let it fall on you,
That all the World may wonder:
If we ſhould ſtay, we ſhould do worſe,
And turn our bleſſings to a curſe,
By keeping you aſunder.

FINIS.

FOVR PLAYES,
OR Morall Repreſentations,
IN ONE.

Enter Don Frigoza.

Frig. Noiſe within. Away with thoſe bald pated Raſcals there, their wits are bound up in vellam, they are not currant here. Down with thoſe City-Gentlemen, &c. Out with thoſe ——— I ſay, and in with their wives at the back-door. Worſhip and place, I am weary of ye, yee lie on my ſhoulders like a load of gold on an Aſſes back. A man in Authoritie is but as a candle in the winde, ſooner waſted or blown out then under a buſhel. How now, what's the matter? Enter Who are you, Sir? Rinaldo.

Rin. Who am I, Sir? why, do'y' not know me?

Frig. No by my —— do I not.

Rin. I am ſure we din'd together to day.

Frig. That's all one: as I din'd with you in the City, and as you paid for my dinner there, I do know you, and am beholding to you: But as my mind is ſince tranſmigrated into my office, and as you come to Court to have me pay you again, and be beholding to me, I know you not, I know you not.

Rin. Nay, but look ye Sir.

Frig. Pardon me: If you had been my bed-fellow theſe ſeven yeers, and lent me money to buy my place, I muſt not tranſgreſſe principles: This very talking with you is an ill example.

Rin. Pith, you are too punctual a Courtier, Sir: why, I am a Courtier too, yet never underſtood the place or name to be ſo infectious to humanitie and manners, as to caſt a man into a burning pride and arrogance, for which there is no cure. I am a Courtier, and yet I will know my friends, I tell you.

Frig. And I tell you, you will thrive accordingly, I warrant you.

Rin. But heark ye, Seignior Frigoza, you ſhall firſt underſtand, I have no friends with me to trouble you.

Frig. Humh: That's a good motive.

Rin. Nor to borrow money of you.

Frig. That's an excellent motive.

Rin. No my ſweet Don, nor to ask what you owe me.

Frig. Why, that is the very motive of motives: why I ought and will know thee: and if I had not wound thee up to this promiſe, I would not have known thee theſe fifteen yeers, no more then the errantſt or moſt foul-ſtu Caſtillian that followed our new Qu carriages afoot.

Rin. Nor for any thing, deer Don, but that you would place me conveniently to ſee the Play to night.

Frig. That ſhall I, Seignior Rinaldo: but would you had come ſooner: you ſee how full the Scaffolds are, there is ſcant room for a Lovers thought here. Gentlewomen, ſit cloſe for ſhame: Has none of ye a little corner for this Gentleman? I'll place ye, fear not. And how did our brave King of Portugal, Emanuel, bear himſelf to day? You ſaw the ſolemnitie of the marriage.

Rin. Why, like a fit Husband for ſo gracious and excellent a Princeſſe, as his worthie mate Iſabella, the King of Caſtiles Daughter doth in her very external lineaments, mixture of colours, and joyning Dove-like behaviour aſſure her ſelf to be. And I proteſt (my deer Don) ſeriouſly, I can ſing prophetically nothing but bleſſed hymns, and happie occaſions to this ſacred union of Portugal and Caſtile, which have ſo wiſely and mutually conjoyned two ſuch vertuous and beautifull Princes as theſe are; and in all opinion like to multiplie to their very laſt minute.

Frig. The King is entring: Seignior hover here about, and as ſoon as the Train is ſet, clap into me, wee'll ſtand neer the State. If you have any Creditors here, they ſhall renew bonds a Twelvemonth on ſuch a ſight: but to touch the pomell of the Kings chair in the ſight of a Citizen, is better ſecurity for 10 ● double duckets, then three of the beſt Merchants in Lisbon. Beſides, Seignior, wee will cenſure not onely the King in the Play here, that reigns his two hours; but the King himſelf, that is to rule his life time: Take my counſell: I have one word to ſay to this noble aſſembly, and I am for you.

Rin. Your method ſhall govern me.

Frig. Prologues are Hinſhers bare before the wiſe;
Why may not then an Hinſher Prologize?

Here's a fair sight, and were ye oftner seen
Thus gather'd here, 'twould please our King and Queen.
Upon my conscience, ye are welcome all
To Lisbon, and the Court of Portugall;
Where your fair eyes shall feed on no worse sights
Then preparations made for Kings delights.
We wish to men content, the manliest treasure,
And to the Women their own wish'd for pleasure.
Flourish.

Enter King and Queen, Emanuel and Isabella, Lords and attendants.

Em. Fair fountain of my life, from whose pure streams the propagation of two Kingdoms flowes, never contention rise in eithers brest,
but contestation whose love shall be best.

Isab. Majestick Ocean, that with plenty feeds me thy poor tributary Rivolet,
Sun of my beauty, that with radiant beams
dost gild, and dance upon these humble streams, curst be my birth-hour, and my ending day,
when back your love-floods I forget to pay:
or if this brest of mine your crystall brook ever take other form in, other look but yours, or ere produce unto your grace a strange reflection, or anothers face, but be your love-book clasp'd, open'd to none
but you, nor hold a storie but your own;
a water fix'd, that ebbs nor floods pursue,
frozen to all, onely dissolv'd to you.

Em. O, who shall tel the sweenesse of our love to future times, and not be thought to lye?
I look through this hour like a perspective, and far off see millions of prosperous seeds that our reciprocall affection breeds.
Thus my white rib, close in my brest with me,
which nought shall tear hence but mortalitie. Flourish.

Lords. Be Kingdoms blest in you, you blest in them.

Frig. Whist, Seignior; my strong imagination shews me Love (me thinks) bathing in milk, and wine in her cheeks: O how she clips him like a plant of Ivie.

Rin. I; Could not you be content to be an owl in such an ivie-bush, or one of the oaks of the City to be so clipt?

Frig. Equivocal Don, though I like the clipping well, I could not be content either to be your owl, or your ox of the Citie. The Play begins. Flourish.

Enter a Poet with a garland.

Poet Prologue. Low at your sacred feet our poor Muse lays
Her, and her thunder-fearlesse virdant Bayes.
Four severall Triumphs to your Princely eyes
Of Honour, Love, Death, and Time do rise
From our approaching subject, which we move
Towards you with fear, since that a sweeter Love,
A brighter Honour, purer Chastitie
March in your brests this day triumphantly,
Then our weak Scenes can show: then how dare we Present like Apes and Zanies, things that be Exemplifi'd in you, but that we know,
We ne'r crav'd grace, which you did not bestow?

Enter in triumph with Drums, Trumpets, Colours, Martius, Valerius, Sophocles bound, Nicodemus, Cornelius, Captains and Souldiers.

Mar. What means proud Sophocles?

Soph. To go even with Martius, and not to follow him like his Officer:
I never waited yet on any man.

Mar. Why poor Athenian Duke, thou art my slave, my blows have conquerd thee.

Soph. Thy slave? proud Martius, Cato thy country-man (whose constancie of all the Romans I did honour most) rip'd himself twice to avoid slavery, making himself his own Anatomie.
But looke thee Martius, not a veine runs here from head to foote, but Sophocles would unseame, and like a spring garden shoote his scornfull blood into their eyes durst come to tread on him.
As for thy blowes, they did not conquer me:
Seven Battailes have I met thee face to face,
and given thee blow for blow, and wound for wound,
and till thou taught'st me, knew not to retire;
thy sword was then as bold, thy arm as strong;
thy blows then Martius, cannot conquer me.

Val. What is it then?

Soph. Fortune.

Val. Why, yet in that thou art the worse man, and must follow him.

Soph. Young Sir, you erre: If Fortune could be call'd or his, or yours, or mine, in good or evill for any certain space, thou hadst spoke truth:
But she but jests with man, and in mischance abhors all constancie, flowting him still with some small touch of good, or seeming good midst of his mischiefe: which vicissitude makes him strait doff his armour and his fence
he had prepar'd before, to break her strokes.
So from the very Zenith of her wheel,
when she has dandled some choice favorite,
given him his boons in women, honour, wealth,
and all the various delicies of earth.
that the fool scorns the gods in his excesse,
she whirls, and leaves him at th' Antipodes.

Mar. Art sure we have taken him? Is this Sophocles?
his fettred arms say no; his free soul, I.
This Athens nurseth Arts, as well as Arms.

Soph. Nor glory Martius, in this day of thine,
'tis behind yesterday, but before to morrow:
Who knows what Fortune then will do with thee?
She never yet could make the better man the better chance she has: the man that's best she still contends with, and doth favour least.

Mar. Me thinks a graver thunder then she skies breaks from his lips; I am amaz'd to hear, and Athens words more then her swords doe fear.

Soph. Martius, slave Sophocles, couldst thou acquire (and did thy Roman gods so love thy prayers, and solemn sacrifice, to grant thy suit)
to gather all the valour of the Cæsars
thy Predecessors, and what is to come,
and by their influence fling it on thee now, thou couldst not make my mind go lesse, not pare with all their swords one vertue from my soul:
how am I vassall'd then? Make such thy slaves as dare not keep their goodnesse past their graves.
Know Generall, we two are chances on the die of Fate; now thrown, thy six is up, and my poor one beneath thee; next thy throw may set me upmost, and cast thee below.

Mar. Yet will I trie thee more: Calamitie is mans true touchstone: Listen insolent Prince, that darst contemn the Master of thy life, which I will force here 'fore thy City walls with barbarous crueltie, and call thy wife

to

to see it, and then after send her——
Soph. Ha, ha, ha.
Mar. And then demolish Athens to the ground, depopulate her, fright away her fame,
and leave succession neither stone nor name.
Soph. Ha, ha, ha.
Mar. Dost thou deride me?
Val. Kneel, ask Martius for mercy, Sophocles, and live happie still.
Soph. Kneel and ask mercie? (Roman) art a god?
I never kneel'd, or begg'd of any else.
Thou art a foole, and I will loose no more instructions on thee: now I finde thy eares Solemn Musick.
Enter Dorigen, Ladies bearing a sword. are foolish, like thy tongue. My Dorigen?
oh, must thee see me bound?
1. Cap. There's the first sigh
he breath'd since he was born, I think.
2. Cap. Forbear,
all but the Ladie his wife.
Soph. How my heart chides the manacles of my hands, that let them not embrace my Dorigen.
Val. Turn but thy face, and ask thy life of Martius thus, and thou (with thy fair wife) shalt live; Athens shall stand, and all her priviledges augmented be.
Soph. 'Twere better Athens perish'd, and my wife which (Romans) I do know a worthie one, then Sophocles should shrink of Sophocles, commit profane Idolatry, by giving the reverence due to gods to thee blown man;
Mar. Rough, stubborn Cynick, Soph. Thou art rougher far,
and of a coarser wale, fuller of pride,
lesse temperate to bear prosperity.
Thou seest my meer neglect hath raisd in thee
a storm more boystrous then the Oceans, my vertue Patience makes thee vitious.
Mar. Why, fair-ey'd Ladie, do you kneel?
Dor. Great Generall, victorious, godlike Martius, your poor handmaid kneels, for her husband will not, cannot: speaks thus humbly, that he may not. Listen Roman, thou whose advanced front doth speak thee Roman to every Nation, and whose deeds assure't; Behold a Princesse (whose declining head like to a drooping lily after storms bowes to thy feet) and playing here the slave, to keep her husbands greatnesse unabated:
all which doth make thy Conquest greater: For,
if he be base in ought whom thou hast taken,
then Martius hath but taken a base prize.
But if this Jewell hold lustre and value,
Martius is richer then in that he hath won.
O make him such a Captive as thy self unto another wouldst, great Captain, be;
till then; he is no prisoner fit for thee.
Mar. Valerius, here is harmonie would have brought old crabbed Saturn to sweet sleep when Jove did first incense him with Rebellion:
Athens doth make women Philosophers,
and sure their children chat the talk of gods.
Val. Rise beauteous Dorigen.
Dor. Not untill I know
the Generals resolution,
Val. One soft word from Sophocles would calm him into teers, like gentle showrs after tempestuous winds.
Dor. To buy the world, he will not give a word,
a look, a tear, a knee, 'gainst his own judgement,
and the divine composure of his minde:
all which I therefore doe, and here present
this Victors wreathe, this rich Athenian sword, Trophies of Conquest, which, great Martius, wear, and be appeas'd: Let Sophocles still live.
Mar. He would not live.
Dor. He would not beg to live.
When he shall so forget, then I begin to command, Martius; and when he kneels,
Dorigen stands; when he lets fall a tear,
I dry mine eyes, and scorn him.
Mar. Scorn him now then,
here in the face of Athens, and thy friends.
Self-will'd, stiffe Sophocles, prepare to die,
and by that sword thy Lady honour'd me,
with which her self shall follow. Romans, Friends, who dares but strike this stroke, shall part with me half Athens, and my half of Victorie.
Cap. By——not we.
Nic. Cor. We two will do it, Sir.
Soph. Away, ye fish-fac'd Rascals.
Val. Martius,
to eclipse this great Eclipse labours thy fame;
Valerius thy Brother shall for once turn Executioner: Give me the sword.
Now Sophocles, I'll strike as suddenly as thou dar'st die.
Soph. Thou canst not. And Valerius,
'tis lesse dishonour to thee thus to kill me,
then bid me kneel to Martius: 'tis to murther
the fame of living men, which great ones do;
their studies strangle, poyson makes away,
the wretched hangman only ends the Play.
Val. Art thou prepar'd?
Soph. Yes.
Val. Bid thy wife farewell.
Soph. No, I will take no leave: My Dorigen, yonder above, 'bout Ariadnes Crown
my spirit shall hover for thee; prethee haste.
Dor. Stay Sophocles, with this tie up my sight, let not soft nature so transformed be (and lose her gentler sex'd humanitie)
to make me see my lord bleed. So, 'tis well:
never one object underneath the Sun will I behold before my Sophocles.
Farewell: now teach the Romans how to die.
Mar. Dost know what 'tis to die?
Soph. Thou dost not, Martius, and therefore not what 'tis to live; to die is to begin to live: It is to end an old stale weary work, and to commence a newer and a better. 'Tis to leave deceitfull knaves for the societie of gods and goodnesse. Thou thy self must part at last from all thy garlands, pleasures, Triumphs, and prove thy fortitude, what then 'twill do.
Val. But art not griev'd nor vex'd to leave life thus?
Soph. Why should I grieve, or vex for being sent to them I ever lov'd best? now I'll kneel, but with my back toward thee; 'tis the last duty

this trunk can doe the gods.
Mar. Strike, ſtrike, Valerius, or Martius heart will leap out at his mouth.
This is a man, a woman! Kiſſe thy lord, and live with all the freedome you were wont.
O Love, thou doubly haſt afflicted me, with vertue, and with beauty. Treacherous heart, my hand ſhall caſt thee quick into my urne,
ere thou tranſgreſſe this knot of pietie.
Val. What ails my Brother?
Soph. Martius, oh Martius, thou now haſt found a way to conquer me.
Dor. O ſtar of Rome, what gratitude can ſpeak fit words to follow ſuch a deed as this?
Mar. Doth Juno talk, or Dorigen?
Val. You are obſerv'd.
Mar. This admirable Duke (Valerius) with his diſdain of Fortune, and of Death, captiv'd himſelf, hath captivated me:
and though my arm hath ta'ne his body here,
his ſoul hath ſubjugated Martius ſoul:
By Romulus, he is all ſoul, I think;
he hath no fleſh, and ſpirit cannot be gyv'd;
then we have vanquiſh'd nothing; he is free,
and Martius walks now in captivitie.
Soph. How fares the noble Roman?
Mar. Why?
Dor. Your blood is ſunk down to your heart, and your bright eyes have loſt their ſplendor.
Mar. Baſer fires go out when the Sun ſhines on 'em: I am not well, an Apoplectick fit I uſe to have after my heats in war careleſly coold.
Soph. Martius ſhall reſt in Athens with his friends, till this diſtemper leave him: O, great Roman, ſee Sophocles doe that for thee, he could not do for himſelf, weep. Martius, by the ——
it grieves me that ſo brave a ſoul ſhould ſuffer under the bodies weak infirmitie.
Sweet Ladie, take him to thy loving charge,
and let thy care be tender.
Dor. Kingly Sir,
I am your Nurſe and Servant.
Mar. Oh deer Ladie,
my Miſtris, nay my Deity; guide me heaven, ten wreathes triumphant Martius will give to change a Martius for a Sophocles:
Can't not be done (Valerius) with this boot?
Inſeparable affection, ever thus colleague with Athens Rome.
Dor. Beat warlike tunes, whileſt Dorigen thus honours Martius brow with one victorious wreath more.
Soph. And Sophocles
thus girds his Sword of Conqueſt to his thigh, which ne'r be drawn, but cut out Victorie.
Lords. For ever be it thus. Exeunt.

Corn. Corporall Nichodemus, a word with you.
Nic. My worthie Sutler Cornelius, it befits not Nichodemus the Roman Officer to parley with a fellow of thy rank: the affairs of the Empire are to be occupied.
Corn. Let the affaires of the Empire lie a while unoccupied, ſweet Nichodemus; I doe require the money at thy hands, which thou doeſt owe mee; and if faire means cannot attain, force of Armes ſhall accompliſh.
Nic. Put up and live.
Corn. I have put up too much already, thou Corporall of Concupiſcence, for I ſuſpect thou haſt diſhonoured my flock-bed, and with thy fooliſh Eloquence, and that bewitching face of thine drawn my Wife, the young harlotrie baggage to proſecute her ſelf unto thee. Draw therefore, for thou ſhalt find thy ſelf a mortall Corporall.
Nichod. Stay thy dead-doing hand, and heare: I will rather deſcend from my honour, and argue theſe contumelies with thee, then clutch thee (poor flye) in theſe eaglet —— of mine, or draw my ſword of Fate on a Peſant, a Beſognio, a Cocoloch, as thou art. Thou ſhalt firſt underſtand this fooliſh eloquence, and intolerable beauty of mine (both which, I proteſt, are meerly naturall) are the gifts of the gods, with which I have neither ſent bawdy Sonnet, nor amorous glance, or (as the vulgar call it) ſheeps eye to thy betrothed Florence.
Corin. Thou lyeſt.
Nich. O gods of Rome, was Nichodemus born to bear theſe braveries from a poor provant?
yet when dogs bark, or when the aſſes bray,
the lion laughs, not roars, but goes his way.
Cornel. A —— o' your poeticall veine: This verſifying my wife has hornified me. Sweet Corporall codſhead, no more ſtanding on your punctilio's and punketto's of honour, they are not worth a lowſe: the truth is, thou art the Generals Bygamie, that is, his fool, and his knave; thou art miſcreant and recreant, not an horſe-boy in the Legions but has beaten thee; thy beginning was knap-ſack, and thy ending will be halter-ſack.
Nich. Me thinks I an now Sophocles the wiſe, and thou art Martius the mad.
Cornel. No more of your tricks good Corporall Letherchops: I ſay, thou haſt diſhonour'd mee, and ſince honour now adaies is onely repaired by money, pay mee, and I am ſatisfied; Even reckoning keeps long friends.
Nic. Let us continue friends then, for I have been even with thee a long time; and though I have not paid thee, I have paid thy wife.
Corn. Flow forth my tears, thou haſt deflowred her Tarquin, the Garden of my delight, hedg'd about, in which there was but one bowling-Alley for mine owne private procreation, thou haſt, like a thief in the night, leap'd the hedge, entred my Alley, and without my privitie, plaid thine owne rubbers.
Nic. How long ſhall patience thus ſecurely ſnore?
Is it my fault, if theſe attractive eyes,
this budding chin, or roſie-colour'd cheek,
this comely body, and this waxen leg,
have drawn her into a fools paradiſe?
By Cupids —— —— I do ſwear (no other),
ſhe's chaſter far then Lucrece, her grand-mother;
pure as glaſſe-window, ere the rider daſh it,
whiter then Ladies ſmock, when ſhe did waſh it:
for well thou wotſt (though now my hearts Commandreſſe)
I once was free, and ſhe but the Camps Landreſſe.
Corn. I, ſhe then came ſweet to me; no part about her but ſmelt of Soap-ſuds, like a Dryad out of a waſh-bowl. Pray, or pay. Nich.

Nich. Hold.

Corn. Was thy cheeſe mouldy, or thy peny-worths ſmall?
was not thy Ale the mightieſt of the earth in Malt, and thy ſtope fill'd like a tide? was not thy bed ſoft, and thy Bacon fatter then a dropſie? Come, Sir.

Nich. Mars then inſpire me with the fencing skill of our Tragedian Actors. Honour pricks;
and Sutler, now I come with thwacks and thwicks.
Grant us one cruſh, one paſſe, and now a high, Cavalto fall:
then up again, now down again, yet do no harm at all.

Enter Wife.

Wife. O that ever I was born: why Gent.

Corn. Meſſaline of Rome, away, diſloyal Concubine:
I will be deafer to thee, then thou art to others: I will have my hundred drachma's he owes me, thou arrant whore.

Wife. I know he is an hundred drachmaes o' the ſcore; but what o' that? no bloodſhed, ſweet Cornelius. O my heart; o' my conſcience 't is faln thorow the bottom of my bellie. O my ſweet Didimus, if either of ye miskil one another, what will become of poor Florence? Paci-fie your ſelves, I pray.

Corn. Go to, my heart is not ſtone; I am not marble:
drie your eyes, Florence; the ſcurvie apes-face knows my blinde ſide well enough: leave your puling; will this content ye? let him taſte thy nether lip, which in ſigne of amitie I thus take off again: go thy ways, and provide the Cows udder.

Nich. Lilie of Concord. And now, honeſt Sutler, ſince I have had proof as well of thy good nature, as of thy wives before, I will acquaint thee with a project ſhall fully ſatisfie thee for thy debt. Thou ſhalt underſtand
I am ſhortly to be knighted.

Corn. The devil thou art.

Nich. Renounce me elſe: for the ſuſtenance of which Worſhip (which Worſhip many times wants ſuſtenance)
I have here the Generals grant to have the leading of two hundred men.

Corn. You jeſt, you jeſt.

Nich. Refuſe me elſe to the pit.

Corn. Mercie on us: ha' you not forgot your ſelf? by your ſwearing you ſhould be knighted already.

Nich. Damn me, Sir, here's his hand, read it.

Corn. Alas, I cannot.

Nich. I know that.
It has pleas'd the General to look upon my ſervice. Now,
Sir, ſhall you joyn with me in petitioning for fifty men more, in regard of my arrearages to you; which if granted, I will beſtow the whole profit of thoſe fifty men on thee and thine heirs for ever, till Atropos do cut this ſim-ple thred.

Corn. No more, dear Corporal, Sir Nicholemus that ſhall be, I cry your wiſhes mercie: I am your ſervant, body and goods, moveables and immoveables; uſe my houſe, uſe my wife, uſe me, abuſe me, do what you liſt.

Nich. A figment is a candid lye: this is an old Paſſe.
Mark what follows.

Exeunt.

Enter Martius, and two Captains.

Mar. Pray leave me: you are Romanes, honeſt men, keep me not company, I am turn'd knave, have loſt my fame and nature. Athens, Athens, this Dorigen is thy Palladium:
he that will ſack thee, muſt betray her firſt,
whoſe words wound deeper then her husbands ſword;
her eyes make captive ſtill the Conqueror,
and here they keep her onely to that end.
O ſubtil devil, what a golden ball did tempt when thou didſt caſt her in my way!
Why, fooliſh Sophocles, broughtſt thou not to field thy Lady, that thou mightſt have overcome?
Martius had kneel'd, and yeelded all his wreathes that hang like Jewels on the ſeven-fold hill, and bid Rome ſend him out to fight with men,
(for that ſhe knew he durſt) and not 'gainſt Fate or Deities, what mortal conquers them?
Inſatiate Julius, when his Victories had run ore half the world, had he met her,
there he had ſtopt the legend of his deeds,
laid by his Arms, been overcome himſelf, and let her vanquiſh th' other half. And fame made beauteous Dorigen the greater name.
Shall I thus fall? I will not; no, my tears caſt on my heart, ſhall quench theſe lawleſſe fires:
he conquers beſt, conquers his lewd deſires.

Enter Dorigen with Ladies.

Dor. Great Sir, my Lord commands me viſit you, and thinks your retir'd melancholy proceeds from ſome diſtaſte of worthleſſe entertainment.
Will 't pleaſe you take your chamber? how d' ye do,
Sir?

Mar. Loſt, loſt again; the wilde rage of my blood doth Ocean-like oreflow the ſhallow ſhore of my weak vertue: my deſire's a vane that the leaſt breath from her turns every way.

Dor. What ſays my Lord?

Mar. Diſmiſſe your women, pray, and I'll reveal my grief.

Dor. Leave me.

Mar. Long tales of love (whilſt love it ſelf might be enjoyed) are languiſhing delays.
There is a ſecret ſtrange lies in my breſt
I will partake wi' you, which much concerns your Lord, your ſelf, and me. Oh!

Dor. Strange ſecrets, Sir, ſhould not be made ſo cheap to ſtrangers: yet if your ſtrange ſecret do no lower lie then in your breſt, diſcover it.

Mar. I will.
Oh: can you not ſee it, Lady, in my ſighs?

Dor. Sighs none can paint, and therefore who can ſee?

Mar. Scorn me not, Dorigen, with mocks: Alcides, that maſter'd monſters, was by beautie tam'd, Omphale ſmil'd his club out of his hand, and made him ſpin her ſmocks. O ſweet, I love you, and I love Sophocles: I muſt enjoy you,
and yet I would not injure him.

Dor. Let go;
you hurt me, Sir: fare well. Stay, is this Martius?
I will not tell my Lord; he'll ſwear I lye.
doubt my fidelitie, before thy honour.
How haſt thou vex'd the gods, that they would let thee
thus violate friendſhip, hoſpitalitie, and all the bounds of ſacred piete?
Sure thou but tri'ſt me out of love to him,
and wouldſt reject me, if I did conſent.
O Martius, Martius, wouldſt thou in one minute, blaſt all thy Lawrels, which ſo many yeers thou

thou haſt been purchaſing with blood and ſweat?
Hath Dorigen never been written, read,
without the epithet of chaſte, chaſte Dorigen?
and wouldſt thou fall upon her chaſtitie,
like a black drop of ink, to blot it out?
When men ſhall read the records of thy valour,
thy hitherto-brave vertue, and approach (highly content yet) to this foul aſſault included in this leaf, this ominous leaf, they ſhall throw down the Book, and read no more,
though the beſt deeds enſue, and all conclude,
that ravell'd the whole ſtory, whoſe ſound heart (which ſhould have been) prov'd the moſt leprous part.

Mar. O thou confut'ſt divinely, and thy words do fall like rods upon me; but they have ſuch ſilken lines, and ſilver hooks, that I am faſter ſnar'd: my love, h'as ta'en ſuch hold, that (like two wreſtlers) though thou ſtronger be,
and haſt caſt me, I hope to pull thee after.
I muſt, or periſh.

Dor. Periſh, Martius, then;
for I here vow unto the gods, Theſe rocks, theſe rocks we ſee ſo fix'd, ſhall be removed,
made champion field, ere I ſo impious prove,
to ſtain my Lords bed with adulterous love.

Enter Valerius.

Val. The gods protect fair Dorigen.

Dor. Amen,
from all you wolviſh Romans. Exit.

Val. Ha? what's this?
ſtill, brother, in your moods? O then my doubts are truths. Have at it: I muſt try a way to be reſolv'd.

Mar. How ſtrangely doſt thou look? what ailſt thou?

Val. What ailſt thou?

Mar. Why, I am mad.

Val. Why, I am madder. Martius, draw thy ſword, and lop a villain from the earth; for if thou wilt not, on ſome tree about this place
I'll hang my ſelf: Valerius ſhall not live to wound his brothers honour, ſtain his Country, and branded with ingratitude to all times.

Mar. For what can all this be?

Val. I am in love.

Mar. Why ſo am I. With whom? ha?

Val. Dorigen.

Mar. With Dorigen? how doſt thou love her? ſpeak.

Val. Even to the height of luſt; and I muſt have her, or elſe I die.

Mar. Thou ſhalt, thou daring Traitor.
On all the confines I have rid my horſe, was there no other woman for thy choice but Dorigen? Why, villain, ſhe is mine;
ſhe makes me pine thus, ſullen, mad, and fool;
't is I muſt have her, or I die.

Val. O all ye gods, with mercy look on this declining rock of valour, and of vertue; breed not up (from infancie) in honour, to full man, as you have done him, to deſtroy: here, ſtrike;
for I have onely ſearch'd thy wound: diſpatch:
far, far be ſuch love from Valerius, ſo far he ſcorns to live to be call'd brother by him that dares own ſuch folly and ſuch vice.

Mar. 'T is truth thou ſpeak'ſt; but I do hate it: peace,
if heaven will ſnatch my ſword out of my hand,
and put a rattle in it, what can I do?
He that is deſtin'd to be odious in his old age, muſt undergo his fate.

Enter Cornelius and Nichodemus.

Corn. If you do not back me, I ſhall never do't.

Nich. I warrant you.

Corn. Humh, humh: Sir; my Lord, my Lord.

Mart. Hah? what 's the matter?

Corn. Humh; concerning the odde fifty, my Lord, and
't pleaſe your Generality, his Worſhip, Sir Nichodemus.

Mar. What 's here? a Paſſe? you would for Rome?
you lubbers, doth one days lazineſſe make ye covet home?
away, ye boariſh rogues; ye dogs, away.

Enter wife.

Wife. Oh, oh, oh:
how now man, are you ſatisfi'd?

Corn. I, I, I: a——o' your Corporal; I am paid ſoundly,
I was never better paid in all my life.

Wife. Marry the gods bleſſing on his honours heart: you have done a charitable deed, Sir, many more ſuch may you live to do, Sir: the gods keep you, Sir, the gods protect you. Exit.

Mar. Theſe peaſants mock me ſure (Valerius) forgive my dotage, ſee my aſhes turn'd, and tell fair Dorigen (ſhe that but now left me with this harſh vow, Sooner theſe rocks ſhould be remov'd, then ſhe would yeeld) that I was yet ſo loving, on her gaſt to die.

Val. O Jupiter forbid it, Sir, and grant this my device may certifie thy minde:
you are my brother, nor muſt periſh thus:
be comforted: think you fair Dorigen would yeeld your wiſhes, if theſe envious rocks by skill could be remov'd, or fallacie ſhe made believe ſo?

Mar. Why, ſhe could not chuſe;
the Athenians are religious in their vows,
above all nations.

Val. Soft, down yonder hill
the Lady comes this way, once more to trie her, if ſhe perſiſt in obſtinacie: by my skill learn'd from the old Caldean was my Tutor, who train'd me in the Mathematicks, I will ſo dazzle and delude her ſight, that ſhe ſhall think this great impoſſibilitie effected by ſome ſupernatural means.
Be confident, this engine ſhall at leaſt,
till the gods better order, ſtill this breſt.

Exit Valerius.

Mar. O my beſt brother, go; and for reward,
chuſe any part o' th' world, I'll give it thee.
O, little Rome, men ſay thou art a god;
thou mightſt have got a fitter fool then I.

Enter Dorigen.

Dor. Art thou there, Baſiliſk? remove thine eyes, for I am ſick to death with thy infection.

Mar. Yet, yet have mercy on me; ſave him, Lady, whoſe ſingle arm defends all Rome, whoſe mercie hath ſav'd thy husband's and thy life.

Dor. To ſpoil
our fame and honours? no, my vow is fixt, and ſtands as conſtant as theſe ſtones do, ſtill.

Mar. Then pitie me, ye gods; you onely may move her, by tearing theſe firm ſtones away.

Solemn muſick.

A miſt ariſeth, the rocks remove.

Enter

Enter Valerius like Mercury, ſinging.

Val. Martius rejoyce, Jove ſends me from above, his Meſſenger, to cure thy deſperate love;
to ſhew raſh vows cannot binde deſtinie:
Lady, behold, the rocks tranſplanted be.
Hard-hearted Dorigen, yeeld, leſt for contempt,
They fix thee here a rock, whence they're exempt.

Dor. What ſtrange deluſion 's this? what Sorcery affrights me with theſe apparitions? my colder Chaſtity 's nigh turn'd to death. Hence, lewd Magician; dar'ſt thou make the gods bawds to thy luſt? will they do miracles to further evil? or do they love it now? know, if they dare do ſo, I dare hate them, and will no longer ſerve 'em. Jupiter, thy golden ſhowr, nor thy ſnow-white Swan, had I been Leda, or bright Danae, had bought mine honour. Turn me into ſtone for being good, and bluſh when thou haſt done.

Exit Dorigen.

Enter Valerius.

Mar. O my Valerius, all yet will not do; unleſſe I could ſo draw mine honeſtie down to the lees to be a raviſher; ſhe calls me witch, and villain.

Val. Patience, Sir, the gods will puniſh perjury. Let her breathe and ruminate on this ſtrange ſight. Time decays the ſtrongeſt faireſt buildings we can finde; but ſtill Diana fortifie her minde. Exeunt.

Enter Sophocles and Dorigen.

Soph. Weep not, bright Dorigen; for thou haſt ſtood conſtant and chaſte (it ſeems 'gainſt gods and men) when rocks and mountains were remov'd. Theſe wonders do ſtupifie my ſenſes. Martius, this is inhumane: was thy ſickneſſe luſt? yet were this truth, why weeps ſhe? Jealous ſoul, what doſt thou thus ſuggeſt? Vows, Magick, Rocks? fine tales, and tears. She ne'er complain'd before. I bade her viſit him; ſhe often did, had many opportunities. Humh, 'tis naught: O, no way but this. Come, weep no more, I have ponder'd this miracle: the anger of the gods, thy vow, my love to thee, and Martius: he muſt not periſh, nor thou be forſworn, leſt worſe fates follow us, Go, keep thy oath: for chaſte, and whore, are words of equal length: but let not Martius know that I conſent. O, I am pull'd in pieces.

Dor. I? ſay you ſo? I'll meet you in your path. O wretched men, with all your valour and your learning, bubbles. Forgive me, Sophocles. Yet why kneel I for pardon, having been but over-diligent, like an obedient ſervant, antedating my Lords command? Sir, I have often and already given this boſom up to his embraces, and am proud that my dear Lord is pleas'd with it; whoſe gentle honourable minde I ſee participates even all, his wife and all, unto his friend. You are ſad, Sir. Martius loves me, and I love Martius, with ſuch ardencie as never married couple could: I muſt attend him now. My Lord, when you have need to uſe your own wife, pray Sir ſend for me; till then, make uſe of your Philoſophie. Exit.

Soph. Stay, Dorigen: O me, inquiſitive fool! thou that didſt order this congeſted heap when it was Chaos, 'twixt thy ſpacious palms forming it to this vaſt rotundie: diſſolve it now; ſhuffle the elements, that no one proper by it ſelf may ſtand: let the ſea quench the ſun, and in that inſtant the ſun drink up the ſea: day, ne'er come down, to light me to thoſe deeds that muſt be done.

Exit.

Drums and Colours. Enter Martius, Valerius, Captains and ſouldiers, at one door, and Dorigen with Ladies, at another.

Dor. Hail, General of Rome; from Sophocles that honours Martius, Dorigen preſents her ſelf to be diſhonour'd: do thy will; for Sophocles commands me to obey. Come, violate all rules of holineſſe, and rend the conſecrated knot of love.

Mar. Never, Valerius, was I bleſt till now: behold the end of all my weary ſteps, the prize of all my Battels: leave us, all; leave us as quick as thought. Thus joy begin, in zealous love a minutes loſſe is ſin.

Val. Can Martius be ſo vile? or Dorigen?

Dor. Stay, ſtay: and monſter, keep thou further off; I thought thy brave ſoul would have much, much loath'd to have gone on ſtill on ſuch terms as this. See, thou ungrateful, ſince thy deſperate luſt nothing can cure but death, I'll die for thee, whilſt my chaſte name lives to poſterity.

Mar. Live, live, thou Angel of thy ſex: forgive, till by thoſe golden treſſes thou be'ſt ſnatch'd alive to heaven: for thy corruption 's ſo little, that it cannot ſuffer death. Was ever ſuch a woman? O my Mirror, how perfectly thou ſhew'ſt me all my faults, which now I hate! and when I next attempt thee, let all the fires in the Zodiak drop on this curſed head.

All. O bleſt event!

Dor. Riſe like the ſun again in all his glory, after a dark Eclipſe.

Mar. Never without a pardon.

Enter Sophocles, and two or three with him.

Dor. Sir, you have forgiven your ſelf.

Soph. Behold their impudence: are my words juſt? Unthankful man, viper to Arms, and Rome thy natural mother: have I warm'd thee here to corrode ev'n my heart? Martius, prepare to kill me, or be kill'd.

Mar. Why, Sophocles, then prethee kill me; I deſerve it highly; for I have both tranſgreſs'd 'gainſt men, and gods; but am repentant now, and in beſt caſe to uncaſe my ſoul of this oppreſſing fleſh; which, though (Gods witneſſe) nev't was actually injurious to thy wife and thee, yet 't was her goodneſſe that reſtrain'd and held me now: but take my life, dear friend, for my intent, or elſe forgive it.

Val. By the gods of Athens, theſe words are true, and all direct again.

Soph. Pardon me, Dorigen.

Mar. Forgive me, Sophocles,

and

and Dorigen too, and every one that 's good.
Dor. Riſe, noble Romane, belov'd Sophocles, take to thy breſt thy friend.
Mar. And to thy heart thy matchleſſe wife: heaven has not ſtuff enough to make another ſuch: for if it could,
Martius would marry too. For thy bleſt ſake
(O thou infinitie of excellence) henceforth in mens diſcourſe Rome ſhall not take the wall of Athens, as 'tofore. But when in their fair honours we to ſpeak do come, we'll ſay 'T was ſo in Athens, and in Rome.
Exeunt in pomp.

Diana deſcends.

Diana. Honour ſet ope thy gates, and with thee bring my ſervant and thy friend, fair Dorigen:
Let her triumph, with her, her Lord, and friend,
Who, though miſled, ſtill honour was their end.
Flouriſh.

Enter the Shew of Honours Triumph; a great flouriſh of Trumpets and Drums within Then, enter a noiſe of Trumpets ſounding cheerfully. Then follows an armed Knight bearing a Crimſon Banneret in hand, with the inſcription Valour: by his ſide a Lady, bearing a Watchet Banneret, the inſcription Clemencie: next Martius and Sophocles with Coronets. Next, two Ladies, one bearing a white Banneret, the inſcription Chaſtity; the other a black, the inſcription Conſtancie. Then Dorigen crown'd. Laſt, a Charlot drawn by two Moors, in it a Perſon crown'd, with a Scepter: on the top, in an antick Scutcheon, is written Honour. As they paſſe over, Diana aſcends.

Rinald. How like you it?
Frig. Rarely; ſo well, I would they would do it again. How many of our wives now adays would deſerve to triumph in ſuch a Chariot?
Rinald. That 's all one; you ſee they triumph in Caroches.
Frig. That they do, by the maſſe; but not all neither; many of them are content with Carts. But Seignior, I have now found out a great abſurditie ifaith.
Rinald. What was 't?
Frig. The Prologue preſenting four Triumphs, made but three legs to the King: a three-legg'd Prologue, 't was monſtrous.
Rinald. 'T had been more monſtrous to have had a four-legg'd one. Peace, the King ſpeaks.
Em. Here was a woman, Iſabel.
Iſa. I, my Lord,
but that ſhe told a lye to vex her husband;
therein ſhe fail'd.
Em. She ſerv'd him well enough;
he that was ſo much man, yet would be caſt to jealouſie for her integrity.
This teacheth us, the paſſion of love can fight with Souldiers, and with Scholars too.
Iſa. In Martius, clemencie and valour ſhown, in the other, courage and humanitie;
and therefore in the Triumph they were uſher'd by clemencie and valour.
Em. Rightly obſerv'd,
as ſhe by chaſtitie and conſtancie;
what hurt 's now in a Play, againſt which ſome rail ſo vehemently? thou and I, my Love, make excellent uſe methinks: I learn to be a lawful lover void of jealouſie, and thou a conſtant wife. Sweet Poetry 's a flower, where men, like Bees and Spiders, may bear poiſon, or elſe ſweets and Wax away.
Be venom-drawing Spiders they that will;
I'll be the Bee, and ſuck the honey ſtill. Flouriſh.

Cupid deſcends.

Cupid. Stay, clouds, ye rack too faſt: bright Phœbus ſee,
Honour has triumph'd with fair Chaſtity:
Give Love now leave, in purity to ſhow
Unchaſte affections flie not from his bowe.
Produce the ſweet example of your youth.
Whilſt I provide a Triumph for your Truth.
Flouriſh.

Enter Violante (with childe) and Gerrard.
Viol. Why does my Gerrard grieve?
Ger. O my ſweet Miſtris,
't is not life (which by our Milain law my fact hath forfeited) makes me thus penſive;
that I would loſe to ſave the little finger of this your noble burthen, from leaſt hurt, becauſe your blood is in't. But ſince your love made poor incompatible me the parent, (being we are not married) your dear blood falls under the ſame cruel penalty;
and can heaven think fit ye die for me?
for heavens ſake ſay I raviſht you, I'll ſwear it,
to keep your life ſafe, and repute unſtain'd.
Viol. O Gerrard, th' art my life and faculties;
and if I loſe thee, I'll not keep mine own;
the thought of whom, ſweetens all miſeries.
Wouldſt have me murder thee beyond thy death?
unjuſtly ſcandal thee with raviſhment?
It was ſo far from rape, that heaven doth know,
if ever the firſt Lovers, ere they fell,
knew ſimply in the ſtate of innocence,
ſuch was this act, this, that doth ask no bluſh.
Ger. O, but my rareſt Violane, when my Lord Randulpho brother to your father, ſhall underſtand this, how will he exclaim, that my poor Aunt, and me, which his free alms hath nurs'd, ſince Millain by the Duke of Mantua (who now uſurps it) was ſurpriz'd? that time my father and my mother were both ſlain, with my Aunts husband, as ſhe ſays, their ſtates deſpoil'd and ſeiz'd; 'tis paſt my memory, but thus ſhe told me: onely this I know,
ſince I could underſtand, your honour'd Uncle hath given me all the liberal education that his own ſon might look for, had he one;
now will he ſay, Doſt thou requite me thus?
O the thought kills me.
Viol. Gentle, gentle Gerrard, be cheer'd, and hope the beſt. My mother, father,
and uncle love me moſt indulgently,
being the onely branch of all their ſtocks:
but neither they, nor he thou wouldſt not grieve with this unwelcom news, ſhall ever hear
Violane's tongue reveal, much leſſe accuſe

Gerrard to be the father of his own;
I'll rather ſilent die, that thou maiſt live to ſee thy little off-ſpring grow and thrive.

Enter Dorothea.

Dor. Miſtris, away, your Lord and father ſeeks you;
I'll convey Gerrard out at the back door;
he has found a husband for you, and inſults in his invention, little thinking you have made your own choice, and poſſeſt him too.

Viol. A husband? 't muſt be Gerrard, or my death.
Fare well; be onely true unto thy ſelf, and know heavens goodneſſe ſhall prevented be,
ere worthieſt Gerrard ſuffer harm for me.

Ger. Fare well, my life and ſoul. Aunt, to your counſel
I flee for aid. O unexpreſſible love! thou art an undigeſted heap of mixt extremes, whoſe pangs are wakings, and whoſe pleaſures dreams.

Exeunt.

Enter Benvoglio, Angelina, Ferdinand.

Ben. My Angelina, never didſt thou yet ſo pleaſe me, as in this conſent; and yet thou haſt pleas'd me well, I ſwear, old wench: ha, ah.
Ferdinand, ſhe's thine own; thou 't have her, boy,
ask thy good Ladie elſe.

Ferd. Whom ſhall I have, Sir?

Ben. Whom d'ye think, ifaith?

Angel. Gheſſe.

Ferd. Noble Madam,
I may hope (prompted by ſhallow merit)
through your profound grace, for your chamber-maid.

Ben. How 's that? how 's that?

Ferd. Her chamber-maid, my Lord.

Ben. Her chambe-pot, my Lord. You modeſt aſſe, thou never ſhew'dſt thy ſelf an aſſe till now.
'Fore heaven I am angrie with thee. Sirha, ſirha, this whitmeat-ſpirit 's not yours, legitimate,
advance your hope, and 't pleaſe you: gheſſe again.

Ang. And let your thoughts flee higher: aim them right;
Sir, you may hit, you have the faireſt white.

Ferd. If I may be ſo bold then, my good Lord.
your favour doth encourage me to aſpire to catch my Ladies Gentlewoman.

Ben. Where?
where would you catch her?
do you know my daughter Violanta, Sir?

Ang. Well ſaid: no more about the buſh.

Ferd. My good Lord,
I have gaz'd on Violanta, and the ſtars, whoſe heavenly influence I admir'd, not knew, nor ever was ſo ſinful to believe
I might attain 't.

Ben. Now you are an aſſe again;
for if thou ne'er attain'ſt, 't is onely long of that faint heart of thine, which never did it.
She is your Lords heir, mine, Benvoglio 's heir, my brothers too, Randulpho 's; her deſcent not behinde any of the Millanois.
And Ferdinand, although thy parentage be unknown, thou know'ſt that I have bred thee up from five yeers old, and (do not bluſh to hear it) have found thy wiſdom, truſt, and fair ſucceſſe ſo full in all my affairs, that I am fitter to call thee Maſter, then thou me thy Lord.
Thou canſt not be but ſprung of gentleſt blood;
thy minde ſhines thorow thee, like the radiant ſun,
although thy bodie be a beauteous cloud.
Come, ſeriouſly this is no flatterie, and well thou know 'ſt it, though thy modeſt blood
riſe like the morning in thy cheek to blear 't.
Sir, I can ſpeak in earneſt: Vertuous ſervice, ſo meritorious, Ferdinand, as yours,
(yet baſhful ſtill, and ſilent?) ſhould exttract
a fuller price then impudence exact:
and this is now the wages it muſt have;
my daughter is thy wife, my wealth thy ſlave.

Ferd. Good Madam pinch; I ſleep does my Lord meek, and you aſſiſt? Cuſtom 's inverted quite;
for old men now adays do flout the young.

Ben. Fetch Violanta. As I intend this religiouſly, let my ſoul finde joy or pain.

Exit Angelina.

Ferd. My honour'd Lord and Maſter, if I hold that worth could merit ſuch felicitie, you bred it in me, and firſt purchas'd it;
it is your own: and what productions in all my faculties my ſoul begets, your very mark is on 't: you need not adde rewards to him that is in debt to you:
you ſav'd my life, Sir, in the Maſſacre;
there you begot me new, ſince foſter'd me.
O, can I ſerve too much, or pray for you?
alas, 'tis ſlender paiment to your bountie.
Your daughter is a paradice, and I unworthie to be ſet there; you may chuſe
the royalſt ſeeds of Milain.

Ben. Prethee peace,
thy goodneſſe makes me weep; I am reſolv'd:
I am no Lord o' th' time, to tie my blood to ſordid muck; I have enough: my name, my ſtate and honours I will ſtore in thee,
whoſe wiſedom will rule well, keep and increaſe:
a knave or fool that could confer the like,
would bate each hour, diminiſh every day.
Thou art her price-lot then, drawn out by fate;
an honeſt wiſe man is a Princes mate.

Ferd. Sir, heaven and you have over-charg'd my breſt with grace beyond my continence; I ſhall burſt:
the bleſſing you have given me (witneſſe Saints)
I would not change for Millain. But, my Lord, is ſhe prepar'd?

Ben. What needs Preparative, where ſuch a Cordial is preſcrib'd as thou?
thy perſon and thy vertues in one ſcale, ſhall poize hers, with her beautie and her wealth;
if not, I adde my will unto thy weight;
thy mother 's with her now. Son, take my keys, and let this preparation for this Marriage,
(this welcom Marriage) long determin'd here,
be quick, and gorgeous. — Gerrard.

Enter Gerrard.

Ger. My good Lord,
my Lord your brother craves your conference inſtantly, on affairs of high import.

Ben. Why, what news?

Ger. The Tyrant, my good Lord, is ſick to death of his old Apoplexie, whereon the States adviſe that Letters miſſive be ſtraight diſpatcht to all the neighbour-Countreys, and Schedules too divulg'd on every poſt, to enquire the loſt Duke forth: their purpoſe is to re-inſtate him.

Ben. 'Tis a pious deed.

Ferdinand, to my daughter: this delay
(though to so good a purpose) angers me;
but I'll recover it. Be secret, son.
Go woo with truth and expedition. Exit.
Ferd. O my unsounded joy! how fares my Gerrard, my noble twin-friend? fie, thy look is heavie, sullen, and sowre; blanch it: didst thou know my cause of joy, thou 'ldst never sorrow more,
I know thou lov'st me so. How dost thou?
Ger. Well,
too well: my fraught of health my sickness is;
in life, I am dead; by living dying still.
Ferd. What sublunary mischief can predominate a wise man thus? or doth thy friendship play (in this antipathous extreme) with mine, lest gladness suffocate me? I, I, I do feel my spirit's turn'd to fire, my blood to air, and I am like a purifi'd essence tri'd from all drossie parts.
Ger. Were't but my life,
the losse were sacrific'd; but vertue must for me slain, and innocence made dust.
Ferd. Fare well, good Gerrard.
Ger. Dearest friend, stay.
Ferd. Sad thoughts are no companions for me now, much lesse sad words: thy bosom bindes some secret, which do not trust me with; for mine retains another, which I must conceal from thee.
Ger. I would reveal it: 't is a heavie tale:
canst thou be true and secret still?
Ferd. Why, friend,
if you continue true unto your self,
I have no means of falshood. Lock this door:
come, yet your prisoner 's sure.
Ger. Stay, Ferdinand.
Ferd. What is this trouble? Love?
why thou art capable of any woman.
Doth want oppresse thee? I will lighten thee:
hast thou offended law? my Lord and thine, and I, will save thy life. Does servitude upbraid thy freedom, that she suffers it?
have patience but three days, and I will make thee thy Lords companion. Can a friend do more?
Ger. Lend me the means. How can this be?
Ferd. First, let this Cabinet keep your pawn, and I yet for the form of satisfaction, (will trust:
take this my Oath to boot. By my presum'd Gentrie, and sacred known Christianitie,
I'll die ere I reveal thy trust.
Ger. Then hear it.
Your Lords fair daughter Violenta is my betrothed wife, goes great with childe by me;
and by this deed both made a prey to Law.
How may I save her life? advise me, friend.
Ferd. What did he say? Gerrard, whose voice was that?
O death unto my heart, bane to my soul!
my wealth is vanish'd like the rich mans store:
in one poor minute all my daintie fare
but jugling dishes; my fat hope, despair.
Ger. Is this so odious? what 's your mirth?
Ferd. Why thou hast robb'd me of it. Gerrard, draw thy sword;
and if thou lov'st my Mistris chastitie, defend it, else I'll cut it from thy heart,
thy theevish heart that stale it, and restore 't:
do miracles to gain her.
Ger. Was she thine?
Ferd. Never, but in my wish, and her fathers vow, which now he left with me, on such sure terms;
he call'd me son, and will'd me to provide my Wedding-preparation.
Ger. Strange.
Ferd. Come, let 's kill one another quickly.
Ger. Ferdinand, my love is old to her, thine new begot:
I have not wrong'd thee; think upon thine Oath.
Ferd. It manacles me, Gerrard, else this hand should bear thee to the Law. Fare well for ever:
since friendship is so fatal, never more will I have friend: thou hast put so sure a plea, that all my weal 's litigious made by thee.
Ger. I did no crime to you. His love transports him;
and yet I mourn, that cruel destinie should make us two thus one anothers crosse:
we have lov'd since, boys; for the same time cast him on Lord Benvoglio, that my Aunt and I were succour'd by Randulpho: men have call'd us the parallels of Millain; and some said we were not much unlike. O heaven divert that we should (ever since that time) be breeding mutual destruction. Enter Dorothea.
Dor. O where are you? you have made a fair hand. By ——yonder is your Aunt with my Ladie; she came in just as she was wooing your Mistris for another; and what did me she, but out with her purse, and shew'd all the naked truth, i faith. Fie upon you, you should never trust an old woman with a secret; they cannot hold; they cannot hold so well as we, and you 'ld hang 'em. First, there was swearing and staring, then there was howling and weeping, and O my daughter, and O my mother.
Ger. The effect, the effect.
Dor. Marry no way but one with you.
Ger. Why welcom. Shall she scape?
Dor. Nay, she has made her scape already.
Ger. Why, is she gone?
Dor. The scape of her virginitie, I mean.
You men are as dull, you can conceive nothing;
you think it is enough to beget.
Ger. I; but surely, Dorothea, that scap'd not;
her maidenhead suffer'd.
Dor. And you were the Executioner. (Doll!
Ger. But what 's the event? lord, how thou starv'st me,
Dor. Lord how thou starv'st me, Doll? By——I would fain see you crie a little. Do you stand now as if you could get a childe? Come, I'll rack you no more: This is the heart of the businesse: always provided, Seignior, that if it please the Fates to make you a Lord, you be not proud, nor forget your poor handmaid Doll, who was partly accessary to the incision of this Holofernian maidenhead.
Ger. I will forget my name first. Speak.
Dor. Then thus: My Ladie knows all; her sorrow is reasonably well digested; has vow'd to conceal it from my Lord, till delay ripen things better; wills you to attend her this evening at the back gate; I'll let you in; where her own Confessor shall put you together lawfully ere the childe be born; which birth is very neer, I can assure you:
all your charge is your vigilance; and to bring with you some trustie Nurse to convey the infant out of the house.
Ger. O beam of comfort, take 1 go, tell my Ladie
I pray for her as I walk: my joys so flow, that what I speak, or do, I do not know. Exeunt.

Dumb

Dumb Shew.

Enter Violanta at one door, weeping, ſupported by Cornelia and a Frier; at another door, Angelina weeping, attended by Dorothea. Violanta kneels down for pardon. Angelina ſhewing remorſe, takes her up, and cheers her; ſo doth Cornelia. Angelina ſends Dorothea for Gerrard. Enter Gerrard with Dorothea: Angelina and Cornelia ſeem to chide him, ſhewing Violanta's heavie plight: Violanta rejoyceth in him: he makes ſignes of ſorrow, intreating pardon: Angelina brings Gerrard and Violanta to the Frier; he joyns them hand in hand, takes a Ring from Gerrard, puts it on Violanta's finger; bleſſeth them; Gerrard kiſſeth her: the Frier takes his leave. Violanta makes ſhew of great pain, is inſtantly conveyed in by the women. Gerrard is bid ſtay; he walks in meditation, ſeeming to pray. Enter Dorothea, whiſpers him, ſends him out. Enter Gerrard with a Nurſe blindfold; gives her a purſe. To them enter Angelina and Cornelia with an infant; they preſent it to Gerrard; he kiſſeth and bleſſeth it; puts it into the Nurſes arms, kneels, and takes his leave. Exeunt all ſeverally.

Enter Benvoglio and Randulpho.

Ben. He 's dead, you ſay then.
Rand. Certainly: and to hear the people now diſſect him now he 's gone, makes my ears burn, that lov'd him not: ſuch Libels, ſuch Elegies and Epigrams they have made, more odious then he was. Brother, great men had need to live by love, meting their deeds with vertues rule; ſound, with the weight of judgement, their privat'ſt action: for though while they live their power and policie mask their villanies, their bribes, their luſt, pride, and ambition,
and make a many ſlaves to worſhip 'em,
that are their flatterers, and their bawds in theſe:
theſe very ſlaves ſhall when theſe great beaſts die,
publiſh their bowels to the vulgar eye.
Ben. Fore heaven, 't is true. But is Rinaldo (brother)
our good Duke, heard of living?
Rand. Living, Sir, and will be ſhortly with the Senate: has been cloſe conceal'd at Mantua, and reliev'd:
but what 's become of his? no tidings yet?
But brother, till our good Duke ſhall arrive, carry this news, here. Where 's your Ferdinand?
Ben. O buſie, Sir, about this Marriage:
and yet my girl o' th' ſudden is faln ſick:
you 'll ſee her ere you go?
Rand. Yes; well I love her;
and yet I wiſh I had another daughter to gratifie my Gerrard, who (by ——) is all the glory of my family,
but has too much worth to live ſo obſcure;
I'll have him Secretary of Eſtate upon the Dukes return: for credit me,
the value of that Gentleman 's not known;
his ſtrong abilities are fit to guide
the whole Republike: he hath learning, youth, valour, diſcretion, honeſtie of a Saint;
his aunt is wondrous good too.

Enter Violanta in a bed; Angelina and Dorothea ſitting by her.

Ben. You have ſpoke
the very character of Ferdinand:
one is the others mirror. How now, daughter?
Rand. How fares my Neece?
Viol. A little better, Uncle, then I was,
I thank you.
Rand. Brother, a meer cold. (be hanked Angel. It was a cold and heat, I think: but heaven we have broken that away.
n. And yet, Violanta, you 'll lie above ſtill, and you ſee what 's got.
Dor. Sure, Sir, when this was got, ſhe had a bed-fellow.
Rand. What, has her Collick left her in her belly?
Dor. 'T has left her, but ſhe has had a ſore fit.
Rand. I, that ſame Collick and Stone 's inherent to us o' th' womans ſide: our mothers had them both.
Dor. So has ſhe had, Sir. How theſe old fornicators talk? ſhe had more need of Mace-ale, and Reniſh-wine Caudles, heaven knows,
then your aged diſcipline.
Ben. Say?

Enter Ferdinand.

Ang. She will have the man; and on recovery will wholly be diſpos'd by you.
Ben. That 's my wench:
how now? what change is this? why Ferdinand,
are theſe your robes of joy ſhould be indn'd?
doth Hymen wear black? I did ſend for you to have my honourable brother witneſſe
the Contract I will make 'twixt you and her.
Put off all doubt; ſhe loves ye? what d'ye ſay?
Rand. Speak, man. Why look you ſo diſtractedly?
Ferd. There are your keys, Sir: I'll no Contracts, I.
Divineſt Violanta, I will ſerve you thus on my knees, and pray for your Juno Lucina fer opem:
my inequalitie aſcends no higher:
I dare not marry you.
Ben. How 's this?
Ferd. Good night.
I have a friend has almoſt made me mad:
I weep ſometimes, and inſtantly can laugh:
nay, I do dance, and ſing, and ſuddenly roar like a ſtorm. Strange tricks theſe, are they not?
and wherefore all this? ſhall I tell you? no,
thorow mine ears, my heart a plague hath caught, and I have vow'd to keep it cloſe, not ſhew
my grief to any, for it has no cure:
On, wandring ſteps, to ſome remote place move:
I'll keep my vow, though I have loſt my Love.
Exit.
Ben. 'Fore heaven, diſtracted for her! fare you well:
I'll watch his ſteps; for I no joy ſhall finde,
till I have found his cauſe, and calm'd his minde.
Exit.
Rand. He 's overcome with joy.
Angel. 'T is very ſtrange.

Rand. Well, ſiſter, I muſt leave you; the time 's huſie.
Violanta, cheer you up: and I pray heaven
reſtore each to their love, and health again. Exit.

Viol. Amen, great Uncle. Mother, what a chance unluckily is added to my wo, in this young Gentleman?

Angel. True, Violanta:
it grieves me much. Doll. go you inſtantly,
and finde out Gerrard; tell him his friends hap,
and let him uſe beſt means to comfort him;
but as his life preſerve this ſecret ſtill.

Viol. Mother, I 'ld not offend you: might not Gerrard ſteal in, and ſee me in the evening?

Angel. Well, bid him do ſo.

Viol. Heavens bleſſing o' your heart.
Do ye not call Childbearing Travel, mother?

Angel. Yes.

Viol. It well may be. The bare-foot traveller that 's born a Prince, and walks his pilgrimage, whoſe tender feet kiſſe the remorſeleſſe ſtones
onely, ne'er felt a travel like to it.
Alas, dear mother, you groan'd thus for me, and yet how diſobedient have I been?

Angel. Peace, Violanta, thou haſt always been gentle and good.

Viol. Gerrard is better, mother:
O if you knew the implicite innocencie
dwells in his breſt, you 'ld love him like your prayers.
I ſee no reaſon but my father might be told the truth, being pleas'd for Ferdinand to woo himſelf: and Gerrard ever was his full comparative: my Uncle loves him, as he loves Ferdinand.

Angel. No, not for the world, ſince his intent is croſs'd: lov'd Ferdinand thus ruin'd, and a childe got out of Wedlock!
his madneſſe would purſue ye both to death.

Viol. As you pleaſe (mother): I am now, methinks, even in the land of eaſe; I'll ſleep.

Angel. Draw in the bed neerer the fire: ſilken reſt, tie all thy cares up.

Exeunt.

Enter Ferdinand and Benvoglio, privately after him.

Ferd. O bleſſed ſolitude! here my griefs may ſpeak;
and Sorrow, I will argue with thee now:
Nothing will keep me company: the flowers die at my moan; the gliding ſilver ſtreams haſten to flee my lamentations;
the air rolls from 'em; and the golden ſun is ſmother'd pale as Phœbe with my ſighs:
onely the earth is kinde, that ſtays. Then earth, to thee will I complain. Why do the heavens impoſe upon me love, what I can ne'er enjoy?
before fruition was impoſſible,
I did not thirſt it. Gerrard, ſhe is thine, ſeal'd and deliver'd; but 't was ill to ſtain her virgin ſtate ere ye were married.
Poor infant, what 's become of thee? thou know'ſt not the wo thy parents brought thee to. Dear earth, bury this cloſe in thy ſterilitie;
be barren to this ſeed, let it not grow;
for if it do, 't will bud no Violet nor Gilly-flower, but wilde Brier, or rank Rue, unſavoury and hurtful.

Ben. Ferdinand,
thy ſteel hath digg'd the earth, thy words my heart.

Ferd. O, I have violated faith, betraid, my friend and innocencie.

Ben. Deſperate youth, violate not thy ſoul too: I have ſhowres for thee, young man; but Gerrard flames for thee.
Was thy baſe pen made to daſh out mine honour,
and proſtitute my daughter? Baſtard, whore, come, turn thy female tears into revenge, which I will quench my thirſt with, ere I ſee daughter, or wife, or branded family.
By—both die: and for amends, Ferd'nando be my heir. I'll to my brother, firſt tell him all; then to the Duke for juſtice:
this morning he 's receiv'd. Mountains nor ſeas ſhall bar my flight to vengeance: the foul ſtain printed on me, thy blood ſhall rinſe again. Exit.

Ferd. I have tranſgreſs'd all goodneſſe, witleſly rais'd mine own curſes from poſteritie:
I'll follow, to redreſſe in what I may;
if not, your heir can die as well as they.

Exit.

Dumb Shew.

Enter Duke Rinaldo with attendants, at one door; States, Randulpho, and Gerrard, at another: they kneel to the Duke; he accepts their obedience, and raiſes them up: they prefer Gerrard to the Duke, who entertains him: they ſeat the Duke in State. Enter Benvoglio and Ferdinand: Benvoglio kneels for juſtice; Ferd. ſeems to reſtrain him. Benvog. gives the Duke a paper; Duke reads, frowns on Gerr. ſhews the paper to the States, they ſeem ſorry, conſult, cauſe the Guard to apprehend him; they go off with him. Then Rand. and Ben. ſeem to crave juſtice; Duke vows it, and exit with his attendants. Rand. Ben. and Ferd. confer. Enter to them Cornelia with two ſervants; ſhe ſeems to expoſtulate. Rand. in ſcorn cauſeth her to be thruſt out poorly. Exit Rand. Benvog. beckens Ferd. to him (with much ſeeming paſſion) ſwears him; then ſtamps with his foot. Enter Dorothea with a Cup: weeping, ſhe delivers it to Ferd. who with diſcontent exit; and exeunt Benvoglio and Dorothea.

Enter Violanta.

Viol. Gerrard not come? not Dorothie return'd?
what averſe ſtar rul'd my Nativitie?
the time to night hath been as dilatory as languiſhing Conſumptions. But till now
I never durſt ſay my Gerrard was unkinde.
Heaven grant all things go well; and nothing does,
if he be ill, which I much fear: my dreams have been portentous. I did think I ſaw my Love arald for battel with a beaſt, a hideous monſter, arm'd with teeth and claws, grinning, and venomous, that ſought to make both us a prey: on 's tail was laſh'd in blood Law: and his forehead I did plainly ſee held Characters that ſpell'd Authoritie.
This rent my ſlumbers; and my fearful ſoul ran ſearching up and down my diſmaid breſt, to finde a port t' eſcape. Good faith, I am cold;

but

but Gerrard's love is colder: here I'll ſit, and think my ſelf away.

Enter Ferdinand with a Cup and a Letter.

Ferd. The peace of love attend the ſweet Violanta: Read, for the ſad newes I bring I do not know;
onely I am ſworn to give you that, and this.

Viol. Is it from Gerrard? gentle Ferdinand, how glad am I to ſee you thus well reſtor'd?
in troth he never wrong'd you in his life,
nor I, but alwayes held fair thoughts of you,
knew not my Fathers meaning, till of late;
could never have known it ſoon enough: For Sir, Gerrard's and my affection began in infancie: My Uncle brought him oft in long coats hither; you were ſuch another;
the little boy would kiſſe me being a childe,
and ſay, he lov'd me; give me all his toyes,
bracelets, rings, ſweet-meats, all his roſie ſmiles:
I then would ſtand and ſtare upon his eyes,
play with his locks, and ſwear I lov'd him too;
For ſure, me thought, he was a little Love,
he woo'd ſo prettily in innocence, that then he warm'd my fancie; for I felt a glimmering beam of love kindle my blood, both which time ſince hath made a flame and flood.

Fer. O gentle innocent! me thinks it talks like a child ſtill, whoſe white ſimplicitie never arriv'd at ſin. Forgive me, Lady,
I have deſtroyd Gerrard, and thee; rebell'd againſt heavens ordinance; diſ-pair'd two doves, made 'em ſit mourning; ſlaughter'd love, and cleft
the heart of all integritie. This breſt was truſted with the ſecret of your vow by Gerrard, and reveal'd it to your father.

Viol. Hah.

Ferd. Read, and curſe me.

Viol. Neither: I will never nor write, nor read again.

Ferd. My penance be it.

Reads, Your labyrinth is found, your luſt proclaim'd

Viol. Luſt? humh:
my mother ſure felt none when I was got.

Fer. I, and the law implacably offended.
Gerrard's impriſon'd, and to die.

Viol. O heaven!

Ferd. and you to ſuffer with reproach and ſcoffs,
a publick execution; I have ſent you an Antidote 'gainſt ſhame, poyſon; by him you have moſt wrong'd: give him your penitent tears.

Viol. Humh: 'tis not truth.

Ferd. Drink, and farewell for ever:
And though thy whoredome blemiſh thy whole line,
Prevent the Hangmans ſtroak, and die like mine.

Viol. Oh wo is me for Gerrard: I have brought confuſion on the nobleſt Gentleman that ever truely lov'd. But we ſhall meet where our condemners ſhall not, and enjoy a more refin'd affection then here;
no law, nor father hinders marriage there
'twixt ſouls divinely affi'd, as (ſure) ours were:
there we will multiplie, and generate joyes like fruitfull parents. Luckleſſe Ferdinand, Where's the good old Gentlewoman, my husbands Aunt?

Ferd. Thruſt from you Uncle to all povertie.

Viol. Alas the pitie: Reach me, Sir, the cup;
I'll ſay my prayers, and take my fathers phyſick.

Ferd. O villain that I was, I had forgot to ſpill the reſt, and am unable now to ſtir to hinder her.

Viol. What aile you, Sir?

Ferd. Your father is a monſter, I a villain, this tongue has kill'd you: pardon, Violanta,
oh pardon, Gerrard; and for ſacrifice, accept my life, to expiate my fault.
I have drunk up the poyſon.

Viol. Thou art not ſo uncharitable: a better fellow far, thou'lt left me half. Sure death is now adrie, and calls for more blood ſtill to quench his thirſt.
I pledge thee Ferdinand, to Gerrards health:
Deer Gerrard, poor Aunt, and unfortunate friend,
Ay me, that love ſhould breed true Lovers end.

Fer. Stay Madam, ſtay; help hoa, for heavens ſake help;
Improvident man, that good I did intend for ſatisfaction, ſaving of her life, my equall cruell ſtarres made me forget.

Enter Angelina with two ſervants.

Ang. What ſpectacle of death aſſaults me? oh.

Viol. My deereſt mother, I am dead, I leave father, and friends, and life, to follow love.
Good mother, love my child, that did no ill.
Fie, how men lie, that ſay, death is a pain:
or has he chang'd his nature? like ſoft ſleep
he ſeizes me. Your bleſſing. Laſt, I crave, that I may reſt by Gerrard in his grave.

Ferd. There lay me too: O noble Miſtris, I have cauſ'd all this; and theſefore juſtly die.
That key will open all.

Ang. O viperous father!
For heavens ſake bear 'em in: run for Phyſicians, and medicines quickly: Heaven, thou ſhalt not have her yet; 'tis too ſoon: Alas, I have no more,
and taking her away, thou robb'ſt the poor. Exeunt.

Flouriſh.

Enter Duke, States, Randulpho, Benvoglio, Gerrard, Executioner, Guard.

Duke. The Law, as greedy as your red deſire Benvoglio, hath caſt this man: 'Tis pitie ſo many excellent parts are ſwallo'wd up in one fowle wave. Is Violanta ſent for?
Our Juſtice muſt not lop a branch, and let the body grow ſtill.

Ben. Sir, ſhe will be here alive or dead, I am ſure.

Ger. How cheerfully my countenance comments death?
that which makes men ſeem horrid, I will wear like to an ornament. O Violanta, might my life onely ſatisfie the Law,
how jocundly my ſoule would enter heaven?
Why? ſhouldſt thou die, thou wither'ſt in thy bud,
as I have ſeen a Roſe, ere it was blown.
I doe beſeech your Grace, the Statute may (in this caſe made) be read: not that I hope t' extenuate my offence or penaltie, but to ſee whether it lay hold on her.
And ſince my death is more exemplary then juſt, this publick reading will adviſe caution to others.

Duke. Read it.

Ran. Brother, does not your ſoul groan under this ſeverity?

Stat. read.

States read.

A Statute provided in caſe of unequal Matches, Marriages againſt parents conſent, ſtealing of heirs, Rapes, Proſtitutions, and ſuch like: That if any perſon meanly deſcended, or ignorant of his own Parentage, which implies as much, ſhall with a foul intent unlawfully ſollicite the daughter of any Peer of the Dukedom, he ſhall for the ſame offence forfeit his right hand: but if he further proſtitute her to his luſt, he ſhall firſt have his right hand cut off, and then ſuffer death by the common Executioner. After whom, the Lady ſo offending ſhall likewiſe the next day in the ſame manner, die for the fact.

Ger. This Statute has more cruelty then ſenſe:
I ſee no ray of mercie. Muſt the Lady ſuffer death too? ſuppoſe ſhe were inforc'd, by ſome confederates born away, and raviſht;
is ſhe not guiltleſſe?

Duke. Yes, if it be prov'd.

Ger. This caſe is ſo: I raviſht Violanta.

State. Who ever knew a rape produce a childe?

Ben. Piſh, theſe are idle. Will your grace command the Executioner proceed?

Duke. Your Office.

Ger. Fare well to thy inticing vanitie, thou round gilt Box, that doſt deceive mans eye:
the wiſe man knows, when open thou art broke,
the treaſure thou includ'ſt is duſt and ſmoke, even thus I caſt thee by. My Lords, the Law is but the great mans mule; he rides on it, and tramples poorer men under his feet;
yet when they come to knock at yond' bright gate,
ones rags ſhall enter, 'fore the others ſtate.
Peace to ye all: here, ſirha, ſtrike; this hand hath Violanta kiſs'd a thouſand times;
it ſmells ſweet ever ſince: this was the hand plighted my faith to her; do not think thou canſt cut that in ſunder with my hand. My Lord, as free from ſpeck as this arm is, my heart is of foul luſt; and every vein glides here as full of truth. Why does thy hand ſhake ſo?
't is mine muſt be cut off, and that is firm;
for it was ever conſtant.

Enter Cornelia.

Cor. Hold; your Sentence
unjuſtly is pronounced, my Lord; this blowe cuts your hand off; for his is none of yours:
but Violanta's given in holy Marriage before ſhe was delivered, conſummated with the free will of her mother, by her Confeſſor, in Lord Benvoglio's houſe.

Ger. Alas, good Aunt,
that helps us nothing; elſe I had reveal'd it.

Duke. What woman's this?

Ben. A baſe confederate in this proceeding, kept of alms long time
by him; who now expos'd to miſery, talks thus diſtractedly. Attach her, Guard.

Ran. Your cruelty (brother) will have end.

Cor. You'd beſt
let them attach my tongue.

Duke. Good woman, peace:
for were this truth, it doth not help thy nephew;
the Law's infring'd by their diſparitie, that forfeits both their lives.

Cor. Sir, with your pardon, had your Grace ever children?

Duke. Thou haſt put a queſtion whoſe ſharp point toucheth my heart:
I had two little ſons, twins, who were both (with my good Dutcheſſe) ſlain, as I did hear, at that time when my Dukedom was ſurpris'd.

Cor. I have heard many ſay (my gracious Lord) that I was wondrous like her.

All. Ha?

Duke. By all mans joy, it is Cornelia, my deareſt wife.

Cor. To ratifie me her,
come down, Alphonſo, one of thoſe two twins, and take thy fathers bleſſing: thou haſt broke no Law, thy birth being above thy wives:
Aſcanio is the other, nam'd Fernando, who by remote means, to my Lord Benvoglio
I got prefer'd; and in poor habits clad,
(you fled, and th'innovation laid again)
I wrought my ſelf into Randulpho's ſervice, with my eldeſt boy; yet never durſt reveal what they and I were, no, not to themſelves, until the Tyrants death.

Duke. My joy has filled me like a full-winded ſail: I cannot ſpeak.

Ger. Fetch Violanta, and my brother.

Ben. Run,
run like a ſpout, you rogue: a—o' poiſon,
that little whore I truſted, will betray me.
Stay, hang-man, I have work for you; there's gold;
cut off my head, or hang me preſently.

Soft Muſick. Enter Angelina with the bodies of Ferdinand and Violanta on a bier; Dorothea carrying the cup and letter, which ſhe gives to the Duke: he reads; ſeems ſorrowful; ſhews it to Cornelia and Gerrard; they lament over the bier. Randulpho and Benvoglio ſeem fearful, and ſeem to report to Angelina and Dorothea what hath paſſed before.

Ran. This is your raſhneſſe, brother.

Duke. O joy, thou wert too great to laſt;
this was a cruel turning to our hopes,
unnatural father: poor Aſcanio.

Ger. O mother, let me be Gerrard again, and follow Violanta.

Cor. O my ſon——

Duke. Your lives yet, bloodie men, ſhall anſwer this.

Dor. I muſt not ſee 'em longer grieve. My Lord, be comforted; let ſadneſſe generally forſake each eye and boſom; they both live:
for poiſon, I infus'd meer Opium;
holding compulſive perjury leſſe ſin then ſuch a loathed murther would have bin.

All. O

All. oh blessed Maiden.
Dor. Musick, gently creep into their ears, and fright hence lasie sleep.
Morpheus, command thy servant Sleep in leaden chains no longer keep this Prince and Lady: Rise, wake, rise, and round about convey your eyes:
Rise Prince, go greet thy Father and thy Mother;
Rise thou t' imbrace thy Husband and thy Brother.
Du.Cor. Son, Daughter.
Ferd. Father, Mother, Brother.
Ger. Wife,
Viol. Are we not all in heaven?
Ger. Faith, very neer it.
Ferd. How can this be?
Duke. Hear it.
Dor. If I had serv'd you right, I should have seen your old pate off, ere I had reveal'd.
Ben. O wench,
oh honest wench; if my wife die, I'll marry thee:
There's my reward.
Ferd. 'Tis true.
Duke 'Tis very strange.
Ger. Why kneel you, honest Master?
Ferd. My good Lord.
Ger. Deer Mother.
Duke. Rise, rise, all are friends: I owe ye for all their boards: And wench, take thou the man whose life thou sav'dst; lesse cannot pay thy merit.
How shall I part my kisse? I cannot: Let one generally therefore join our cheeks.
A pen of iron, and a leafe of brasse,
to keep this Storie to eternitie:
and a Promethean wit. O sacred Love, nor chance, nor death can thy firme truth remove.
Exeunt.

King. Now Isabella. Flourish.
Isab. This can true love doe.
I joy they all so happily are pleas'd:
the Ladies and the brothers must triumph.
King. They doe:
for Cupid scorns but t' have his triumph too.
Flourish.

The Triumph.

Enter Divers Musicians, Then certaine Singers bearing Banneretts inscribed, Truth, Loyaltie, Patience, Concord: Next Gerrard and Ferdinand with garlands of Roses: Then Violanta: Last a Chariot drawn by two Cupids, and a Cupid sitting in it. Flourish.

Enter Prologus.

Love, and the strength of fair affection
(Most royall Sir) what long time could have won
Their perfect ends, and crown'd those constant hearts
With lasting Triumph, whose most virtuous parts,
Worthie desires, and love, shall never end.
Now turn we round the Scene, and (Great Sir) lend
A sad and serious eye to this of Death,
This black and dismall Triumph; where mans breath,
Desert, and guilty blood afend the Stage,
And view the Tyrant ruin'd in his rage. Exit.
Flourish.

Enter L'avall, Gabriella and Maria.
Gab. No, good my Lord, I am not now to finde your long neglect of me; All those affections you came first clad in to my love, like Summer, lustie and full of life: all those desires that like the painted Spring bloom'd round about ye, giving the happie promise of an harvest,
how have I seen drop off, and fall forgotten?
With the least lustre of anothers beauty,
how oft (forgetfull Lord) have I been blasted?
Was I so eatly won? or did this bodie yeeld to your false embraces with lesse labour then if you had carried some strong towne?
Lav. Good Gabriell.
Gab. Could all your subtilties and sighs betray me, the vows ye shook me with, the tears ye drown'd me,
till I came fairly off with honour'd marriage?
O fie, my Lord.
Lav. Prethee, good Gabriella.
Gab. Would I had never known ye, nor your honours, they are stuck too full of griefs: oh happy women,
that plant your love in equall honest bosoms,
whose sweet desires, like roses set together,
make one another happie in their blushes,
growing and dying without sense of greatnesse, to which I am a slave! and that blest Sacrament that daily makes millions of happie mothers, link'd me to this mans left alone, there left me.
I dare not say I am his wife, 'tis dangerous:
his Love, I cannot say: alas, how many?
Lav. You grow too warm; pray ye be content, you best know the times necessity, and how our marriage being so much unequall to mine honour, while the Duke lives, I standing high in favour,
and whilest I keep that safe, next to the Dukedome, must not be known, without my utter ruine.
Have patience for a while, and doe but dream wench,
the glory of a Dutchesse. How like tires me?
how dull and leaden is my appetite to that stale beautie now? O, I could curse and crucifie my self for childish doating upon a face that feeds out with fresh figures every fresh hour: she is now a surfeit to me.
Enter Gentil.
Who's that? Gentil? I charge ye, no acquaintance you nor your maid with him, nor no discourse till times are riper.
Gent. Fie, my noble Lord, can you be now a stranger to the Court,
when your most vertuous Bride, the beauteous Hadena stands ready like a star to gild your happinesse, when Hymen's lustie fires are now a lighting,
and all the flowre of Anjoy?
Lav. Some few trifles, for matter of adornment, have a little made me so slow, Gentil, which now in readinesse
I am for Court immediately.
Gent. Take heed, Sir,
this is no time for trifling, nor the no Ladie to be now entertain'd with toyes: 'twill cost ye—— Lav. Y' are an old Cock, Gentile.
Gent. By your Lordships favour.

Lav.

Lav. Prethee away; 'twill lose time.
Gent. O my Lord,
pardon me that by all means.
Lav. We have businesse afoot man of more moment.
Gent. Then my manners?
I know none, nor I seek none.
Lav. Take to morrow.
Gent. Even now, by your Lordships leave. Excellent my ever service here I dedicate, (Beautie, in honour of my best friend, your dead Father,
to you his living vertue, and wish heartily,
that firm affection that made us two happie,
may take as deep undying root, and flourish betwixt my daughter Castia, and your goodnesse, who shall be still your servant.
Gab. I much thank ye.
Lav. ——o' this dreaming puppie. Will ye go, Sir?
Gent. A little more, Good Lord.
Lav. Not now, by ——
Come, I must use ye.
Gent. Goodnesse dwell still with you. Exeunt
Gentille & Lavall.

Gab. The sight of this old Gentleman, Maria, puls to mine eyes again the living picture of Perolot his vertuous son, my first Love, that dy'd at Orleance.
Mar. You have felt both fortunes,
and in extreams, poor Lady: for young Perolot, being every way unable to maintain you,
durst not make known his love to friend or father:
My Lord Lavall, being powerfull, and you poor,
will not acknowledge you.
Gab. No more: Lets in wench:
there let my Lute speak my laments; they have tired me.
Exeunt.

Enter two Courtiers.

1. Court. I grant, the Duke is wondrous provident in his now planting for succession,
I know his care as honourable in the choice too,
Marines fair vertuous daughter: but what's all this?
to what end excellent arrives this travell,
when he that bears the main roof is so rotten?
2. Cou. You have hit it now indeed: For if fame lye not,
he is untemperate.
1. Court. You expresse him poorly, too gentle Sir: the most deboist and barbarous;
beleeve it, the most void of all humanitie,
howere his cunning cloake it to his Uncle,
and those his pride depends upon.
2. Cour. I have herad too, given excessively to drink.
1. Court. Most certain,
and in that drink most dangerous: I speak these things to one I know loves truth, and dares not wrong her.
2. Cour. You may speak on.
1. Cour. Uncertain as the sea, Sir, proud and deceitfull as his sins great Master;
his appetite to women, for there he carries his main sail spread so boundlesse and abominably, that but to have her name by that tongue spoken,
poysons the vertue of the purest Virgin.
2. Cour. I am sorry for young Gabriella then,
a maid reputed ever of faire carriage,
for he has been noted visiting.
1. Cour. Shee is gone then,
or any else, that promises or power, gifts, or his guilfull vows can work upon;
but these are but poor parcels.
2. Cour. 'Tis great pitie.
1. Cour. Nor want these sins a chief saint to befriend 'em,
the Divell follows him; and for a truth Sir, appears in visible figure often to him,
at which time he 's possest with sudden trances,
cold deadly sweats, and griping of the conscience,
tormented strangely as they say.
2. Cour. Heaven turn him!
This marriage day maist thou well curse, fair Helen.
But let's go view the Ceremony.
1. Cour. I'll walk with you. Exeunt.

Musick.
Enter Gabriella and Maria above. And Lavall, Bride, States in solemnitie as to marriage; and passe over; viz. Duke, Marine, Longavile.

Mar. I hear 'em come.
Gab. Would I might never hear more.
Mar. I told you still: but you were so incredulous.
See, there they kisse.
Gab. Adders be your embraces.
The poyson of a rotten heart, O Helen,
blast thee as I have been; just such a flattery,
with that same cunning face, that smile upon 't, O mark it Maria, mark it seriously, that master smile caught me.
Mar. There's the old Duke, and Marine her father.
Gab. Oh.
Mar. There Longavile ——
the Ladies now.
Gab. Oh, I am murderd, Maria.
Beast, most inconstant beast.
Mar. There.
Gab. There I am not;
no more I am not there: Hear me oh heaven,
and all you powers of justice bow down to me;
but you of pitie die. I am abus'd,
she that depended on your Providence,
she is abus'd: your honour is abus'd,
that noble peece ye made, and call'd it man,
is turn'd to divell: all the world 's abus'd:
Give me a womans will provok'd to mischiefe,
a two edg'd heart; my suffring thoughts to wild-fires,
and my embraces to a timelesse grave turne.
Mar. Here I'll step in, for 'tis an act of merit.
Gab. I am too big to utter more.
Mar. Take time then.

Enter Gentile and Casta.

Gent. This solitary life at home undoes thee, obscures thy beautie first, which should prefer thee;
next fils thee full of sad thoughts, which thy years must not arrive at yet, they choak thy sweetnesse:
Follow the time, my girl, and it will bring thee
even to the fellowship of the noblest women,
Helen her self, to whom I would prefer thee,
and under whom this poor and private carriage which I am onely able yet to reach at, being cast off, and all thy sweets at lustre,
will take thee as a fair friend, and preferre thee.
Casta. Good Sir, be not so cruell as to seek to kill that sweet content y' have bred me to:
Have I not here enough to thank heaven for?
the free air uncorrupted with new flattery,

the

the water that I touch unbrib'd with odours to make me ſweet to others: the pure fire not ſmotherd up, and choak'd with luſtfull incenſe to make my blood ſweat; but burning cleer and high,
tels me my minde muſt flame up ſo to heaven.
What ſhould I do at Court, wear rich apparell?
me thinks theſe are as warm: And for your ſtate, Sir, wealthie enough; Is it you would have me proud,
and like a pageant, ſtuck up for amazements?
Teach not your child to tread that path, for fear (Sir) your drie bones after death, groan in your grave
the miſeries that follow.

Gent. Excellent Caſta.

Caſta. When ſhall I pray again (a Courtier)?
or when I doe, to what God? what new body and new face muſt I make me, with new manners?
for I muſt be no more my ſelf. Whoſe Miſtris muſt I be firſt? with whoſe ſin-offring ſeaſon'd?
and when I am grown ſo great and glorious with proſtitution of my burning beauties, that great Lords kneel, and Princes beg for favours, do you think I'll be your daughter, a poor Gentlemans, or know you for my Father?

Gent. My beſt Caſta. Enter Laval.
O my moſt vertuous childe, heaven reigns within thee;
take thine own choice, ſweet child, and live a ſaint ſtill.
The Lord Laval; ſtand by, wench.

Lav. Gabriella,
ſhe cannot, nor ſhe dares not make it known,
my greatneſſe cruſhes her, when-ere ſhe offers:
why ſhould I fear her then?

Gent. Come, let's paſſe on wench.

Lav. Gentille, come hither: Who's that Gentlewoman?

Gent. A child of mine, Sir, who obſerving cuſtome, is going to the Monaſterie to her prayers.

Lav. A fair one, a moſt ſweet one; fitter far to beautifie a Court, then make a Votariſt.
Go on, fair Beautie, and in your Orizons remember me: Will ye, fair ſweet?

Caſta. Moſt humbly. Exeunt.

Lav. An admirable Beautie: how it fires me!
Enter a Spirit.
But ſhee's too full of grace, and I too wicked.
I feel my wonted fit: Defend mee, goodneſſe.
O, it growes colder ſtill, and ſtiffer on me,
my hair ſtands up, my ſinews ſhake and ſhrink:
Help me good heaven, and good thoughts dwel within me.
O get thee gone, thou evill evill ſpirit;
haunt me no more, I charge thee.

Spir. Yes Laval:
thou art my vaſſall, and the ſlave to miſchiefe,
I blaſt thee with new ſin: purſue thy pleaſure;
Caſta is rare and ſweet, a blowing Beautie;
ſet thy deſires afire, and never quench 'em till thou enjoy'ſt her; make her all thy heaven, and all thy joy, for ſhee is all true happineſſe:
Thou art powerfull, uſe command; if that prevail not,
force her; I'll be thy friend.

Lav. O help me, help me.

Spir. Her vertue, like a ſpel, ſinks me to darkneſs. Exit.
Enter Gentille and Caſta.

Gent. He's here ſtill. How is't, noble Lord? me thinks, you look a little wildly. Is it that way? (Sir, is't her you ſtare on ſo? I have ſpi'd your fire, Sir, but dare not ſhy the flaming. Come.

Lav. Sweet creature,
excellent Beautie, do me but the happineſſe to be your humbleſt ſervant. O fair eyes,
O bleſſed, bleſſed ſweetneſſe, divine virgin.

Caſta. O good my Lord, retire into your honour;
you're ſpoken good and vertuous, plac'd at helme
to govern others from miſchances: from example of ſuch fair Chronicles as great ones are,
we do, or ſure we ſhould direct our lives.
I know y'are full of worth, a ſchool of vertue daily inſtructing us that live below ye,
I make no doubt, dwels there.

Lav. I cannot anſwer, ſhe has ſtruck me dumb with wonder.

Caſta. Goodneſſe guide ye. Exeunt.

Lav. She's gone, and with her all light, and has left me dark as my black deſires. O divell luſt, how doſt thou hug my blood, and whiſper to me,
there is no day again, no time, no living,
without this luſtie Beautie break upon me?
Let me collect my ſelf, I ſtrive like billows, beaten againſt a rock, and fall a fool ſtill.
I muſt enjoy her, and I will: from this hour my thoughts and all my buſineſſe ſhall be nothing, Enter Maria.
my eating, and my ſleeping, but her beautie,
and how to work it.

Mar. Health to my Lord Laval.
Nay good Sir, do not turn with ſuch diſpleaſure;
I come not to afflict your new born pleaſures;
my honour'd Miſtris, neither let that vex ye,
for nothing is intended but ſafe to you.

Lav. What of your Miſtris? I am full of buſineſſe.

Mar. I will be ſhort, my Lord; ſhe, loving Lady, conſidring the unequall tie between ye,
and how your ruine with the Duke lay on it,
as alſo the moſt noble match now made,
by me ſends back all links of marriage,
all holy vows, and rights of Ceremonie,
all promiſes, oathes, tears, and all ſuch pawnes you left in hoſtage: onely her love ſhee cannot,
for that ſtill follows ye, but not to hurt ye;
and ſtill beholds ye Sir, but not to ſhame ye:
In recompence of which, this is her ſuit, Sir,
her poor and laſt petition, but to grant her,
when weary nights have cloy'd ye up with kiſſes,
(as ſuch muſt come) the honour of a Miſtris,
the honour but to let her ſee thoſe eyes, (thoſe eyes ſhe doats on more then gods do goodneſſe)
and but to kiſſe ye onely: with this prayer, (a prayer onely to awake your pitie)
and on her knees ſhe made it; that this night you 'ld bleſſe her with your company at ſupper.

Lav. I like this well, and now I think on't better,
I'll make a preſent uſe from this occaſion;

Mar. Nay, good my Lord, be not ſo cruell to her becauſe ſhe has been yours.

Lav. and to mine own end
a rare way I will work.

Mar. Can love for ever,
the love of her (my Lord) ſo periſh in ye?
as ye deſire in your deſires to proſper.
What gallant under heaven, but Anjou's heire then can brag ſo fair a wife, and ſweet a Miſtris?
good noble Lord.

Lav. Ye miſapply me, Mary,
nor do I want true pitie to your Ladie:

Pitie and love tell me, too much I have wrong'd her to dare to see her more: yet if her sweetnesse can entertain a mediation, and it must be a great one that can cure me;
my love again, as far as honour bids me,
my service and my self.

Mar. That's nobly spoken.

Lav. Shall hourly see her; want shall never know her;
nor where she has bestow'd her love, repent her.

Mar. Now whither drives he?

Lav. I have heard, Maria, that no two women in the world more lov'd,
then thy good Mistris, and Gentilles fair daughter.

Mar. What may this mean? You have heard a truth, but since the secret love betwixt you two, (my Lord:
my Mistris durst not entertain such friendship;
Casta is quick, and of a piercing judgement,
and quickly will finde out a flaw.

Lav. Hold Marie:
shrink not, 'tis good gold, wench: prepare a Banquet, and get that Casta thither; for she's a creature
so full of forcible divine perswasion, and so unwearied ever with good office,
and she shall cure my ill cause to my Mistris,
and make all errours up.

Mar. I'll doe my best Sir:
But shee's too fearfull, coy, and scrupulous, to leave her fathers house so late; and bashfull at any mans appearance, that I fear Sir,
'twill prove impossible.

Lav. There's more gold, Marie, and fain thy Mistris wondrous sick to death, wench.

Mar. I have ye in the wind now, and I'll pay ye.

Lav. Shee cannot chuse but come; 'tis charitie, the chief of her profession: undertake this,
and I am there at night; if not, I leave ye.

Mar. I will not loose this offer, though it fall out clean crosse to that we cast. I'll undertake it,
I will, my Lord; she shall be there.

Lav. By ——— ?

Mar. By ——— she shall.

Lav. Let it be something late then, for being seen. Now force or favour wins her.
My spirits are grown dull, strong wine, and store, shall set 'em up again, and make mee fit to draw home at the enterprise I aime at. Exit.

Ma. Go thy waies, false Lord, if thou hold'st, thou pai'st the price of all thy lusts. Thou shalt be three, thou modest maid, if I have any working,
and yet thy honour safe; for which this thief
I know has set this meeting: but I'll watch him.

Enter Perolot.

Per. Maria.

Mar. Are mine eyes mine own? or blesse me, am I deluded with a flying shadow?

Per. Why do your start so from me?

Mar. It speaks sensibly, and shews a living body: yet I am fearfull.

Per. Give me your hand, good Maria.

Mar. He feels warm too.

Per. And next your lips.

Mar. He kisses perfectly.
Nay, and the divell be no worse: you are Perolot,

Per. I was, and sure I should be: Can a small distance, and ten short months take from your memory
the figure of your friend, that you stand wondring?
Be not amaz'd, I am the self-same Perolot, living, and well; Son to Gentille, and Brother to vertuous Casta; to your beauteous Mistris, the long since poor betroth'd, and still vow'd servant.

Mar. Nay, sure he lives. My Lord Lavall, your Master, brought news long since to your much mourning Mistris, ye dy'd at Orleance; bound her with an oath too,
to keep it secret from your aged Father, lest it should rack his heart.

Per. A pretty secret to trie my Mistris love, and make my welcome from travel of more worth; from whence, heaven thanked, my businesse for the Duke dispatch'd to th' purpose,
and all my money spent, I am come home, wench.
How does my Mistris? for I have not yet seen any, nor will I, till I doe her service.

Mar. But did the Lord Lavall know of your love, Sir, before ye went?

Per. Yes: by much force he got it, but none else knew; upon his promise too and honour to conceal it faithfully till my return; to further which, he told me, my businesse being ended, from the Duke
he would procure a pension for my service, able to make my Mistris a fit husband.

Mar. But are you sure of this?

Per. Sure as my sight, wench.

Mar. Then is your Lord a base dissembling villain, a divell Lord, the damn'd Lord of all lewdnesse,
and has betraid ye' and undone my Mistris,
my poor sweet Mistris: Oh that leacher Lord, who, poor soul, since was married.

Per. To whom, Maria?

Maria. To that unluckie Lord, a ———upon him; whose hot horse-appetite being allaid once with her chaste joyes, married again, scarce cool'd, the torches yet not out the yellow Hymen lighted about the bed, the songs yet sounding, Marine's young noble daughter Helena, whose mischief stands at door next. O that Retreant!

Perolot. O villain! O most unmanly falshood!
nay then I see, my letters were betraid too.
O, I am full of this, great with his mischiefs, loaden and burst: Come lead me to my Lady.

Mar. I cannot, Sir, Lavall keeps her conceal'd.
Besides, her griefs are such, shee will see no man.

Per. I must and will goe to her: I will see her:
there be my friend, or this shall be thy furthest.

Mar. Hold, and I'll help ye: But first ye shall swear to as you are true and gentle, as ye hate (me, this beastly and base Lord, where I shall place ye,
(which shall be within sight) till I discharge ye,
what-ere you see or hear, to make no motion.

Per. I doe by ———

Mar. Stay here about the house then, till it be later; yet the time's not perfect:
there at the back-door I'll attend you truly.

Per. O monstrous, monstrous, beastly villain.

Exit.

Mar. How crosse this falls, and from all expectation?
and what the end shall be, heaven onely yet knows:
onely I wish, and hope. But I forget still,
Casta must be the bait, or all miscarries.

Exeunt.

Enter Gentille with a torch: Shalon above.

Gent. Holla, Shalon.

Shal.

Shal. Who's there?
Gen. A word from the Duke, Sir.
Sha. Your pleasure.
Gen. Tell your Lord he must to Court strait.
Sha. He is ill at ease, and prayes he may be pardon'd the occasions of this night.
Gen. Belike, he is drunk then:
he must away; the Duke, and his fair Ladie,
the beauteous Helena, are now at Cent;
of whom she has such fortune in her carding,
the Duke has lost a thousand Crowns, and sweares, hee will not goe to bed, till by Lavall
the tide of losse be turn'd again. Awake him, for 'tis the pleasure of the Duke he must rise.
Sha. Having so strict command (Sir) to the contrary,
I dare not do it: I beseech your pardon.
Gent. Are you sure he is there?
Sha. Yes.
Gen. And sleep?
Sha. I think so.
Gen. And are you sure you wil not tell him, Shalon?
Sha. Yes, very sure.
Gent. Then I am sure, I will.
Open, or I must force.
Sha. Pray ye stay: he is not,
nor will not be this night. You may excuse it.
Gent. I knew he was gone about some womans labour.
As good a neighbour, though I say it, and as comfortable:
many such more we need Shaloon. Alas, poor Ladie, thou art like to lie crosse legg'd to night. Good Monsieur,
I will excuse your Master for this once, Sir,
because sometimes I have lov'd a wench my self too.
Sha. 'Tis a good hearing Sir.
Gent. But for your lye, Shaloon, if I had you here, it should be no good hearing,
for your pate I would pummell.
Sha. A fair good night, Sir.
Gent. Good night, thou noble Knight, Sir Pandarus.
My heart is cold o'th sudden, and a strange dulnesse possesses all my bodie: thy will be done heaven.
Exit.

Enter Gabriella and Casta: and Maria with a Taper.

Casta. Faith friend, I was even going to my bed, when your maid told me of your sudden sicknesse:
but from my grave (so truly I loue you)
I think your name would raise me: ye looke ill
since last I saw ye, much decai'd in colour:
yet I thanck heaven, I finde no such great danger as your maid frighted me withall: take courage and give your sicknesse course: some griefe you have got that feeds within upon your tender spirits, and wanting open way to vent it selfe murders your mind, and choakes up all your sweetnesse.
Gab. It was my maids fault; worthy friend to trouble ye, so late, upon so light a cause: yet sure I have ye
O my deare Casta.
Casta. Out with it Gods name.
Gab. The closset of my heart, I will lock here, wench, Lavall knocks within.
and things shal make ye tremble. Who's that knocks there?
Mar. 'Tis Lavall.
Gab. Sit you still. Let him in.
In am resolv'd, and all you wronged women,
you noble spirits, that as I have sufferd:
under this glorious beast-insulting man,
lend me your causes, then your cruelties,
for I must put on madnesse above women.
Casta. Why do you looke so ghastly?
Gab. Peace; no harm, Deer. Enter Lavall.
Lav. There, take my cloak and sword: Where is this Mar. In the next room, (Banquet?
Casta. How came he here? Heaven blesse me.
La. Give me some wine wench; fill it ful, and sprightly.
Gab. Sit still, and be not fearfull.
Lav. Till my veins swell, and my strong sinews stretch like that brave Centaur.
that at the table snatch'd the Bride away in spight of Hercules.
Casta. I am betraid.
Lav. Nay start not Ladie; 'tis for you that I come,
and for your beautie: 'tis for you, Lavall
honours this night; to you, the sacred shrine
I humbly bow, offring my vows and prayers;
to you I live.
Gab. In with the powder quickly:
so, that and the wine will rock ye.
Lav. Here, to the health of the most beauteous and divine, fair Casta,
the star of sweetnesse.
Gab. Fear him not, I'l die first.
And who shall pledge ye?
Lav. Thou shalt, thou tann'd Gipsey:
and worship to that brightnesse give, cold Tartar.
By ——— ye shall not stir; ye are my Mistris,
the glory of my love, the great adventure,
the Mistris of my heart, and shee my whore.
Gab. Thou lyst, base, beastly Lord; drunker then anger;
thou sowsed Lord, got by a surfeit, thou lyest basely.
Nay, stir not; I dare tell thee so. Sit you still.
If I be whore, it is in marrying thee,
that art so absolute and full a villain,
no Sacrament can save that piece tied to thee.
How often hast thou woo'd in those flatteries, almost those very words, my constancie?
what goddesse have I not been, or what goodnesse?
what star that is of any name in heaven,
or brightnesse? which of all the vertues
(but drunkennesse, and drabbing; thy two morals) have not I reach'd to? what Spring was ever sweeter?
what Scythian snow so white? what crystal chaster?
Is not thy new wife now the same too? Hang thee, base Bigamist, thou honour of ill women.
Casta. How's this? O heaven defend me.
Gab. Thou salt-itch, for whom no cure but ever burning brimstone can be imagin'd.
Lav. Ha, ha, ha.
Gab. Dost thou laugh, thou breaker of all law, all religion, of all faith thou foul contemner?
Lav. Peace, thou paltry woman:
and sit by me, Sweet.
Gab. By the Divel?
Lav. Come,
and lull me with delights.
Gab. It works amain now.
Lav. Give me such kisses as the Queen of shadows gave to the sleeping boy she stole on Latmus, lock round about in snakie wreathes close folded, those rosie arms about my neck, O Venus.
Gab. Peace, not, I shy—

Lav. Thou admirable ſweetneſſe, diſtill thy bleſſings like thoſe ſilver drops,
that falling on fair grounds, riſe all in roſes:
Shoot me a thouſand darts from thoſe fair eyes,
and through my heart transfix 'em all, I'll ſtand 'em.
Send me a thouſand ſmiles, and preſently
I'll catch 'em in mine eyes, and by Love's power turn 'em to Cupids all, and fling 'em on thee.
How high ſhe looks, and heavenly! More wine for me.
Ga. Give him more wine, and good friend be not fearful.
Lav. Here on my knee, thou goddeſſe of delights, this luſtie grape I offer to thy Beauties;
ſee how it leaps to view that perfect redneſſe that dwels upon thy lips: now, how it bluſhes to be outbluſh'd. Oh let me feed my fancie, and as I hold the purple god in one hand dancing about the brim and proudly ſwelling, deck'd in the pride of nature young, and blowing;
ſo let me take fair Semele in the other,
and ſing the loves of gods, then drink, their Nectar's not yet deſir'd.
Caſta. Oh.
Lav. Then like luſtie Tarquin
turn'd into flames with Lucrece coy denyals, his blood and ſpirit equally ambitious,
I force thee for mine own.
Caſta. O help me, Juſtice:
help me, my Chaſtitie.
Lav. Now I am bravely quarried. Perolet above.
Per. 'Tis my Siſter.
Gab. No, bawdy ſlave, no Treacher, ſhe is not carried.
Per. She's looſe again, and gone. I'll keep my place ſtill.
Mar. Now it works bravely: ſtand, he cannot hurt ye.
Lav. O my ſweet Love, my life. Hee falls downe, and ſleeps.
Mar. He ſinks.
Lav. My bleſſing!
Mar. So, now he is ſafe a while.
Gab. Lock all the doors, wench, then for my wrongs.
Per. Now I'll appear to know all.
Gab. Be quick, quick, good Marie, ſure and ſudden.
Per. Stay, I muſt in firſt.
Gab. O my conſcience
it is young Perolet: O my ſtung conſcience!
it is my firſt and nobleſt Love.
Mar. Leave wondring, and recollect your ſelf: the man is living,
equally wrong'd as you, and by that divell.
Per. 'Tis moſt true, Ladie: your unhappie fortune
I grieve for as mine own, your fault forgive too, if it be one. This is no time for kiſſes:
I have heard all, and known all, which mine eares are crack'd a pieces with, and my heart periſh'd.
I ſaw him in your chamber, ſaw his fury,
and am afire till I have found his heart out.
What do you mean to doe? for I'll make one.
Gab. To make his death more horrid (for he ſhall die)
Per. He muſt, he muſt.
Gab. wee'll watch him till he wakes,
then bind him, and then torture him.
Per. 'Tis nothing.
No, take him dead drunk now without repentance,
his leacherie inſeam'd upon him.
Gab. Excellent.
Per. I'll do it my ſelf; and when 'tis done, provide ye, for wee'll away for Italie this night.
Gab. Wee'll follow thorow all hazards.
Per. O falſe Lord,
unmanly, miſchievous; how I could curſe thee.
But that but blaſts thy fame; have at thy heart, fool:
loop-holes I'll make enough to let thy life out.
Lav. Oh, does the divell ride me?
Per. Nay then.
Lav. Murder.
Nay, then take my ſhare too.
Per. Help; Oh, he has ſlain me.
Bloody intentions muſt have blood.
Lav. Hah?
Per. Heaven.
Gab. He ſinks, he ſinks, for ever ſinks: O fortune!
O ſorrow, how like ſeas thou floweſt upon me!
Here will I dwell for ever. Weep, Maria, weep this young mans misfortune: O thou truſt,
Enter Spirit.
Lav. What have I done?
Spir. That that has mark'd thy ſoul man.
Lav. And art thou come again, thou diſmall ſpirit?
Spir. Yes, to devour thy laſt.
Lav. Mercie upon me.
Spir. Thy hour is come: Succeſſion, honour, pleaſure, and all the luſtre thou ſo long haſt look'd for muſt here have end: Summon thy ſins before thee.
Lav. O my affrighted ſoul!
Spir. There lies a black one;
thy owne beſt ſervant by thy own hand ſlain,
thy drunkenneſſe procur'd it: There's another, think of fair Gabriella, there ſhe weeps;
and ſuch tears are not loſt.
Lav. O miſerable!
Spir. Thy ſoul intention to the vertuous Caſta,
Lav. No more, no more, thou wild-fire.
Spir. Laſt, thy laſt wife, think on the wrong ſhe ſuffers.
Lav. O my miſerie,
oh, whither ſhall I flie?
Spir. Thou haſt no faith, fool.
Heark to thy knell. Sings, and vaniſhes.
Lav. Millions of ſins muſter about mine eyes now:
murders, ambitions, luſt, falſe faiths; O horror,
in what a ſtormie form of death thou rid'ſt now!
Me thinks I ſee all tortures, fires, and frofts,
deep ſinking caves, where nothing but deſpair dwels,
the balefull birds of night hovering about 'em,
a grave, me thinks, now opens, and a herſe hung with my Arms tumbles into it: oh, oh, my afflicted ſoule: I cannot pray;
and the leaſt childe that has but goodneſſe in him may ſtrike my head off; ſo ſtupid are my powers:
I'll lift mine eyes up though.
Mar. Ceaſe theſe laments,
they are too poor for vengeance: Laval lives yet.
Gab. Then thus I drie all ſorrows from theſe eyes, fury and rage poſſeſſe 'em now: damn'd divell.
Lav. Hah?
Gab. This for young Perolet.
Lav. O mercy, mercy.
Gab. This for my wrongs.
Lav. But one ſhort hour to cure mee.
Knock within.
oh be not cruell: Oh, oh.
Mar. Heark, they knock.

make

make haste for heavens sake, Mistris.

Gab. This for Casta. He dies.

Lav. Oh, O, O, O.

Mar. He 's dead: come quickly, let 's away with him, 't will be too late else.

Gab. Help, help up to th' chamber.

Exeunt with Lavalls body.

Enter Duke, Hellena, Gentile, Casta, and attendants, with lights.

Duke. What frights are these?

Gent. I am sure here 's one past frighting. Bring the lights neerer: I have enough already. Out, out, mine eyes. Look, Casta.

Lord. 'T is young Perolot.

Duke. When came he over? Hold the Gentlewoman, she sinks; and bear her off.

Cast. O my dear brother! Exit.

Gent. There is a time for all; for me, I hope, too, and very shortly. Murdred?

Gabriella, Maria, with Lavalls body, above.

Duke. Who 's above there?

Gab. Look up, and see.

Duke. What may this mean?

Gab. Behold it; behold the drunken murderer of that young Gentleman; behold the rankest, the vilest, basest slave that ever flourish'd.

Duke. Who kill'd him?

Gab. I; and there 's the cause I did it: read, if your eyes will give you leave.

Hell. Oh monstrous.

Gab. Nay, out it shall: there, take this false heart to ye, the base dishonour of a thousand women: keep it in gold, Duke, 't is a precious jewel. Now to my self; for I have liv'd a fair age, longer by some moneths then I had a minde to.

Duke. Hold.

Gab. Here, young Perolot; my first contracted true love shall never go alone.

Duke. Hold, Gabriella, I do forgive all.

Gab. I shall die the better. Thus let me seek my grave, and my shames with me.

Mar. Nor shalt thou go alone, my noble Mistris: why should I live, and thou dead?

Lord. Save the wench there.

Mar. She is; I hope; and all my sins here written.

Duke. This was a fatal night.

Gent. Heaven has his working, which we cannot contend against.

Duke. Alas.

Gent. Your Grace has your alas too.

Duke. Would 't were equal; for thou hast lost an honest noble childe.

Gent. 'T is heir enough has lost a good remembrance.

Duke. See all their bodies buried decently, though some deserv'd it not. How do you, Ladie?

Hell. Even with your Graces leave, ripe for a Monasterie; there will I wed my life to tears and prayers, and never know what man is more.

Duke. Your pleasures. how does the maid within?

Lord. She is gone before, Sir, the same course that my Ladie takes.

Gent. And my course shall be my Beads at home; so please your Grace to give me leave to leave the Court.

Duke. In peace, Sir, and take my love along.

Gent. I shall pray for ye.

Duke. Now to our selves retire we, and begin by this example to correct each sin. Exeunt; Flourish.

King. Em. By this we plainly view the two impostumes that choke a kingdoms welfare; Ease, and Wantonnesse; in both of which Lavall was capital: for first, Ease stole away his minde from honour, that active noble thoughts had kept still working, and then deliver'd him to drink and women, luft and outragious riot; and what their ends are, how infamous and foul, we see example. Therefore, that great man that will keep his name, and gain his merit out of Vertues schools, must make the pleasures of the world his fools. Flourish.

The Triumph.

Enter Musicians: next them, Perolot with the wound he died with. Then Gabriella and Maria, with their wounds: after them, four Furies with Banners inscrib'd Revenge, Murder, Lust and Drunkennesse, singing. Next them, Lavall wounded. Then a Chariot with Death, drawn by the Destinies. Flourish.

Enter Prologus.

From this sad sight ascend your noble eye,
And see old Time helping triumphantly helping his Master Man: view here his vanities, and see his false friends like those glazed flyes, that when they 've sucke their fill, fall off, and fade from all remembrance of him, like a shade.
And last, view who relieves him; and that gone,
We hope your favour, and our Play is done.

Flourish.

Enter Anthropos, Desire, and Vain Delight; Beauty.

Ant. What hast thou done, Desire, and how imployd the charge I gave thee, about levying wealth for our supplies?

Desire. I have done all, yet nothing: tri'd all, and all my ways, yet all miscarried; there dwells a sordid dulnesse in their mindes. Thou son of earth, colder then that thou art made of, I came to Scraf, found all his hooks about him, and all his nets baited and set; his slie self and greedie Lucre at a serious conference which way to tie the world within their statutes: businesse in all sides and of all sorts swarming like Bees broke loose in summer: I declared your will and wants together, both inforcing with all the power and paine I had, to reach him; yet all fell short.

Anth. His answer.

Desire. This he gave me. Your wants are never ending; and those supplies that came to stop those breaches, are ever lavisht before they reach the main, in toys and trifles, gew-gaws, and gilded puppets: Vain delight he says has ruin'd ye, with clapping all that comes in for supplies, on clothes, and Coaches, perfumes.

perfumes, and powder'd pates; and that your Mistris, the Ladie Pleasure, like a sea devours at length both you and him too. If you have houses, or land, or jewels, for good pawn, he'll hear you,
and will be readie to supplie occasions;
if not, he locks his ears up, and grows stupid.
From him, I went to Vanity. whom I found attended by an endlesse troop of Tailors, Mercers, Embroiderers, Feather-makers, Fumers, all Occupations opening like a Mart,
that serve to rig the bodie out with braverie;
and th'row the room new fashions flew like flyes,
in thousand gaudie shapes; Pride waiting on her,
and busily surveying all the breaches
Time and delaying Nature had wrought in her,
which still with art she piec'd again, and strengthened:
I told your wants; she shew'd me gowns and head-tires,
imbroider'd wastcoats, smocks seam'd thorow with cut-worke, scarfs, mantles, petticoats, muffs, powders, paintings, dogs, monkeys, parrots, which all seemed to shew me
the way her money went. From her to Pleasure
I took my journey.

Anth. And what says our best Mistris?

Desire. She danc'd me out this answer presently:
Revels and Masques had drawn her drie alreadie,
I met old Time too, mowing mankinde down,
who says you are too hot, and he must purge ye.

Anth. A cold quietus. Miserable creatures, born to support and beautifie your master,
the godlike man, sent here to do me service,
the children of my will; why, or how dare ye,
created to my use alone, disgrace me?
Beasts have more courtesie; they live about me, offering their warm wooll to the shearers hand,
to clothe me with their bodies to my labours;
nay, even their lives they daily sacrifice,
and proudly presse with garlands to the altars,
to fill the gods oblations. Birds bow to me, striking their downie sails to do me service,
their sweet airs ever ecchoing to mine honour,
and to my rest their plumie softs they send me.
Fishes, and plants, and all where life inhabits,
but mine own curled kinde, obey their ruler;
mine have forgot me, miserable mine,
into whose stonie hearts, neglect of dutie, squint-ey'd deceit, and self-love, are crept closely:
none feel my wants, not one mend with me.

Desire. None, Sir?

Ant. Thou hast forgot (Desire) thy best friend, Flatterie;
he cannot fail me.

Delight. Fail? he will sell himself, and all within his power, close to his skin first.

Desire. I thought so too, and made him my first venture, but found him in a young Lords ear so busie,
so like a smiling showr pouring his soul in at his portals, his face in thousand figures catching the vain minde of the man: I pull'd him, but still he hung like birdlime; spoke unto him,
his answer still was, By the Lord, sweet Lord,
and By my soul, thou master-piece of honour;
nothing could stave him off he has heard your flood's gone;
and on decaying things he seldom smiles, Sir.

Anth. Then here I break up state, and free my followers, putting my fortune now to Time, and Justice:
go seek new masters now; for Anthropos neglected by his friends, must seek new fortunes.
Desire, to Avarice I here commend thee,
where thou may'st live at full bent of thy wishes;
and Vain Delight, thou feeder of my follies with light fantasticknesse, be thou in favour.
To leave thee, Bountie, my most worthie servant,
troubles me more then mine own misery;
but we must part: go plant thy self, my best friend,
in honourable hearts that truely know thee,
and there live ever like thy self, a vertue:
but leave this place, and seek the Countrey for Law; and lust like fire lick all up here.
Now none but Poverty must follow me,
despis'd patch'd Poverty; and we two married, will seek Simplicity, Content and Peace out,

Enter Poverty.

and live with them in exile. How uncall'd on my true friend comes!

Poverty. Here, bold thee, Anthropos, thou art almost arm'd at rest; put this on,
a penitential robe, to purge thy pleasures:
off with that vanitie.

Anth. Here, Vain Delight, and with this all my part, to thee again of thee I freely render.

Pov. Take this staff now, and be more constant to your steps hereafter:
the staff is Staidnesse of affections.
Away, you painted flyes, that with mans summer take life and heat buzzing abou: his blossoms;
when growing full, ye turn to Caterpillers, gnawing the root that gave you life. Fly shadows.

Exeunt Desire and Delight.

Now to Content I'll give thee, Anthropos, to Rest and Peace; no vanitie dwells there;
Desire nor Pleasure, to delude thy minde more;
no Flatteries smooth-fil'd tongue shall poison thee.

Anth. O Jupiter, if I have ever offer'd upon thy burning Altars but one Sacrifice thou and thy fair-ey'd Juno smil'd upon;
if ever, to thine honour, bounteous feasts,
where all thy statues sweat with wine and incense, have by the son of earth been celebrated:
hear me (the childe of shame now) hear, thou helper,
and take my wrongs into thy hands, thou justice,
done by unmindful man, unmerciful,
against his master done, against thy order;
and raise again, thou father of all honour,
the poor despis'd, but yet thy noblest creature.
Raise from his ruines once more this sunk Cedar,
that all may fear thy power, and I proclaim it.

Exeunt.

Jupiter and Mercury descend severally. Tarabopete small above.

Jup. Hoa; Mercury, my winged son.

Mer. Your servant.

Jup. Whose powerful prayers were those that reach'd arm'd in such spells of pitie now? (our ears,

Mer. The sad petitions of the scorn'd son of earth, the godlike Anthropos, he that has swell'd your sacred fires with incense,
and pil'd upon your altars thousand heifers;
he that (beguil'd by Vanity and Pleasure, Desire, Craft, Flattery, and smooth Hypocrisie) stands now despis'd and ruin'd, left to Poverty.

Jup. It must not be; he was not rais'd for ruine;

nor

nor ſhall thoſe hands heav'd at mine altars periſh:
he is our nobleſt creature. Flee to Time, and charge him preſently releaſe the bands of Poverty and Want this ſuiter ſinks in:
tell him, among the ſun-burnt Indians,
that know no other wealth but peace and pleaſure, ſhe ſhall finde golden Plutus, god of riches, who idly is ador'd, the innocent people not knowing yet what power and weight he carries:
bid him compel him to his right uſe, honour,
and preſently to live with Anthropos.
It is our will. Away.

Mer. I do obey it.

Jupiter and Mercury aſcend again.

Muſick. Enter Plutus, with a troop of Indians ſinging and dancing wildly about him, and bowing to him: which ended, enter Time.

Time. Riſe, and away; 't is Joves command.

Plut. I will not:
ye have ſome fool to furniſh now; ſome Midas that to no purpoſe I muſt choke with riches.
Who muſt I go to?

Time. To the ſon of earth;
he wants the god of wealth.

Plut. Let him want ſtill:
I was too lately with him, almoſt torn into ten thouſand pieces by his followers;
I could not ſleep, but Craft or Vanity were filing off my fingers; not eat, for fear Pleaſure would caſt her ſelf into my belly, and there ſurpriſe my heart.

Time. Theſe have forſaken him:
make haſte then; thou muſt with me: be not angrie,
for fear a greater anger light upon thee.

Plut. I do obey then: but change my figure;
for when I willingly befriend a creature,
goodly and full of glory I ſhew to him;
but when I am compell'd, old, and decrepit,
I halt, and hang upon my ſtaff. Fare well, friends,
I will not be long from ye; all my ſervants
I leave among ye ſtill, and my chief riches.

Exeunt Indians with a dance.

O Time, what innocence dwells here, what goodneſſe!
they know me not, nor hurt me not, yet hug me.
Away, I'll follow thee: but not too faſt, Time.

Exeunt Plutus and Time.

Enter Anthropos, Honeſtie, Simplicitie, Humilitie, Povertie.

Humil. Man, be not ſad, nor let this divorce from Mundus, and his many ways of pleaſure, affict thy ſpirits; which conſider'd rightly with inward eyes, makes thee arrive at happie.

Pov. For now what danger or deceit can reach thee?
what matter left for Craft or Covetize
to plot againſt thee? what Deſire to burn thee?

Honeſt. O ſon of earth, let Honeſtie poſſeſſe thee;
be as thou waſt intended, like thy Maker;
ſee thorow thoſe gawdie ſhadows, that like dreams have dwelt upon thee long: call up thy goodneſſe, thy minde and man within thee, that lie ſhipwrack'd,
and then how thin and vain theſe fond affections, how lame this worldly love, how lumplike raw and ill-digeſted all theſe vanities will ſhew, let Reaſon tell thee,

Simpl. Crown thy minde with that above the worlds wealth, joyful ſuffring, and truely be the maſter of thy ſelf,
which is the nobleſt Empire; and there ſtand
the thing thou wert ordain'd, and ſet to govern.

Pov. Come, let us ſing the worlds ſhame: hear us, Anthropos.

Song: and then enter Time and Plutus.

Hon. Away; we are betray'd.

Exeunt all but Poverty.

Time. Get thou too after, thou needie bare companion; go for ever,
for ever, I conjure thee: make no anſwer.

Exit Poverty.

Anth. What mak'ſt thou here, Time? thou that to this minute never ſtood'ſt ſtill by me?

Time. I have brought thee ſuccour;
and now catch hold, I am thine: The god of riches (compell'd by him that ſaw thy miſeries, the ever juſt and wakeful Jove, at length) is come unto thee: uſe him as thine own;
for 't is the doom of heaven: he muſt obey thee.

Anth. Have I found pitie then?

Time. Thou haſt; and Juſtice againſt thoſe falſe ſeducers of thine honour:
Come, give him preſent helps.

Exit Time.

Induſtry and the Arts diſcovered.

Plut. Come, Induſtrie,
thou friend of life: and next to thee, riſe Labour;

Plutus ſtamps. Labour riſes.

riſe preſently: and now to your employments;
but firſt conduct this mortal to the rock.

They carry Anthropos to a rock, and fall a digging.

What ſeeſt thou now?

Plutus ſtrikes the rock, and flames flie out.

Anth. A glorious mine of metal.
O Jupiter, my thanks.

Plut. To me a little.

Anth. And to the god of wealth my Sacrifice.

Plut. Nay, then I am rewarded. Take heed now, ſon, you are afloat again, leſt Mundus catch ye.

Anth. Never betray me more.

Plut. I muſt to India,
from whence I came, where my main wealth lies buried,
and theſe muſt with me. Take that book and mattock, and by thoſe know to live again.

Exeunt Plutus, Indians, Labour, &c.

Anth. I ſhall do.

Enter Fame ſounding.

Fame. Thorow all the world the fortune of great Anthr.
be known and wonder'd at; his riches envi'd
as far as Sun or Time is; his power fear'd too.

Exeunt.

Muſick. Enter Delight, Pleaſure, Craft, Lucre, Vanitie, &c. dancing (and maſk'd) towards the Rock, offering ſervice to Anthropos. Mercury from above. Muſick heard. One half of a cloud drawn. Singers are diſcovered: then the other half drawn. Jupiter ſeen in glory.

Mer. Take heed, weak man, thoſe are the ſins that ſunk thee:
truſt 'em no more: kneel, and give thanks to Jupiter.

Anth.

Anth. O mighty power!

Jup. Unmask, ye gilded poisons!
now look upon 'em, son of Leech, and shame 'em;
now see the faces of thy evil angels,
lead 'em to Time, and let 'em fill his Triumph:
their memories be here forgot for ever.

Anth. O just great god! how many lives of service, what ages onely given to thine honour,
what infinites of vows and holy prayers,
can pay my thanks?

Jup. Rise up; and to assure thee that never more thou shalt feel want, strike, Mercury, strike him; and by that stroke he shall for ever live in that rock of gold, and still enjoy it.
Be done, I say. Now sing in honour of him.

Song.

Enter the Triumph.

First the Musicians: Then Vain Delight, Pleasure, Craft, Lucre, Vanity, and other of the Vices: Then a Chariot with the person of Time sitting in it; drawn by four persons representing Hours, singing.

Exeunt. Flourish.

King. Em. By this we note (sweet heart) in Kings and a weaknesse, even in spite of all their wisdoms, (Princes and often to be master'd by abuses:
Our natures here describ'd too, and what humours prevail above our Reasons to undo us.
But this the last and best, When no friend stands,
The gods are merciful, and lend their hands.

Flourish.

EPILOGUE.

Now as the Husbandman, whose Costs and Pain,
Whose Hopes and Helps lie buried in his Grain,
Waiting a happie Spring, to ripen full
His long'd-for Harvest to the Reapers pull;
Stand we expecting, having sown our Ground with so much charge (the fruitfulnesse not found) the Harvest of our Labours: For we know
You are our Spring; and when you smile, we grow.
Nor Charge nor Pain shall binde us from your Pleasures,
So you but lend your hands to fill our Measures.

THE DEDICATION.

To the Honour'd, Few, Lovers of Drammatick Poeſie.

Noble Spirits!

IT will ſeem ſtrange to you that we ſhould beg a Pardon from you before you know a Crime committed; But ſuch is our harſh Fate, that we ſhall want as much of your Mercie to the forgiving of this ſad preſumption of offering to your view theſe few poor ſheets, the Rich Remains of our too-long-ſince loſt Friend, MR. FLETCHER, as we ſhall your favourable Acceptance, and Incouragement in it. The Play was of ſo Generall a receiv'd Acceptance, that (he Himſelf a Spectator) we have known him un-concern'd, and to have wiſht it had been none of His; He, as well as the throng'd Theatre (in deſpight of his innate Modeſty) Applauding this rare iſſue of his Brain. His Complacencie in his own Work, may be, perhaps no Argument to you of the Goodneſs of the Play, any more than our Confidence of it; and we do not expect our Encomium can do any thing with you, when the Play it ſelf is ſo near: That will commend it ſelf unto you. And now Farewell our Glory! Farewell your Choice Delight, moſt noble Gentlemen! Farewell th' Grand Wheel that ſet Us ſmaller Motions in Action! Farewell the Pride and Life o'th' Stage! Nor can we (though in our Ruin) much repine that we are ſo little, ſince He that gave us being is no more.

Generous Soules!

'Tis not unknown unto you All, how by a cruell Deſtinie we have a long time been Mutes and Bound, although our Miſeries have been ſufficiently Clamorous and Expanded, yet till this happy opportunitie, never durſt vex your open Ears and Hands: But this we're confident of will be the ſureſt Argument for your Nobleſſes. What an Ingenious Perſon of Qualitie once ſpake of his Amours, we apply to our neceſſities,

Silence in Love betrays more Wo
Than Words, though ne'r ſo Wittie:
The Beggar that is DUMB, you know,
Deſerves a DOUBLE PITTIE.

But be the Comœdie at your Mercy as We are. Onely we wiſh, that you may have the ſame kind Joy in Peruſing of it, as we had in the Acting.

So Exeunt

Your Gratefull Servants,

JOHN LOWIN,
JOSEPH TAYLOR.

On the beſt, laſt, and only remaining Comædy of Mr. FLETCHER.

I'Mun-o'reclowded too! Clear from the Miſt!

Your Bliſs is Endles as you fear'd your Woe!
What Fort'nate Flood is this? what ſtorm of Witt?
Oh who would live and not orewhelm'd in it?
No more a Fatall Diluge ſhall be hurl'd,
This Inundation hath ſav'd the World.
Once more the Mighty FLETCHER doth ariſe
Roab'd in a Veſt, Studded with Starrs and Eyes
Of all his former Glories; His laſt Worth
Imbroydered with what yet Light e're brought forth.
See! in this glad Farewell he doth appeare
Stuck with the Conſtellations of his Sphere,
Fearing we num'd fear'd no Flagration
Hath curled all his Fyres in this one ONE,
Which (as they guard his hallowed Chaſt Vrn)
The dull approaching Hereticks do burn.
FLETCHER at his Adieu Carouſes thus

On

ON Mr. FLETCHERS excellent Play, THE WILD-GOOSE CHASE.

ME thinkes I see thy angred ashes rise
FLETCHER; I feel them smarting in my eyes.
Methinks thou sayst what would this sinner have
He raised me, yet gives my fame a grave?
Me thinkes (like that old Moralist's Complaint
What ill of mine has gain'd this ill mans prayse?)
I hear thee say, sure this Play has some taint
That this ill Poet gives his withered bayes.
Perhaps this good Philosophers life began
To make the ill man good; As in a man
To love the good's a step to being so,
Love to thy Muse may be to me so too;
Then I shall know how to commend thy Muse
When her own self the prayses shall infuse;
Till then I must sit down, confess the wonder,
'Bove which I cannot go, and, won't go under.
But where's the prayse (you'l say) to FLETCHERS wit,
I would ha giv'n, but had no Offering fit.
Then let these lines be thought to FLETCHERS Muse
Not an Encomium, but an Excuse.

NORREYS JEPHSON.

An Epigram upon the long lost and fortunately recovered WILD-GOOSE CHASE, and as seasonably bestowed on Mr. JOHN LOWEN and Mr. JOSEPH TAYLOR, for their best advantage.

IN this late dearth of vvit, vvhen Jose and Jack
Were hunger-bit for vvant of fovvl and Sack,
His nobleness found out this happy meanes
To mend their dyet vvith these WILD-GOOSE scenes,
By vvhich he hath revived in a day
Tvvo Poets, and tvvo Actors vvith one Play.

W. E.

To the incomparable Mr. FLETCHER, upon his excellent Play, The WILD-GOOSE CHASE.

SOle Soul of Drammas, thou who only art
Whole in the whole, and whole in ev'ry Part.
Thy fury every scene with spirit warmes,
And that same spirit every line informes,
No Commas ly intrane'd, and rise up sense
Three, four lines off, such is thy influence.
Thy woords are all alive; and thou ne're vvrit
Things to come to themselves, nor Types of Wit,
All lives, and in full Age. And for thy Plot
Where ev'ry scene is all, have, and have it not,
And glad to be deceiv'd, finding thy Drift
T'excell our guess at every turn, and shift.
Some new Wonders still do put us out,
Yet find that neatest vvhat vve thought about.
Through all Extrav'gancies vve are securely led,
And all the vvay vve pass vv'ave hold 'oth' thread,
Which a long vvhile vve feel not, till thy Close Winding the Bottom up the Bottom showes.

H. HARINGTON.

On Mr. FLETCHER'S Wild Goose Chase not covered.

HIs sprightly Posthume, vvhom our pious fear
Bevvail'd as if it an abortive were,
And out of sense of that, no generous breast
But a forsaken lover's grief expresst
Hath forc'd his vvay thorough the pangs of Fate,
And in his first issue's it most fast.
Thus that Fam'd flood that's plung'd into a grave
For many leagues, at length exalts his vvave,
Leapes from his Sepulcher, and proudly slides
Through's banks in deeper, more extended tides:
Till to his vvatry Center he hath got
By vvrigling tvvines, subtile as FLETCHER'S plot.
That 'tis a sacred birth from hence vve knovv,
It doth by buriall, more glorious grovv:
For Saints by persecution thrive; and none
Is Martyr'd, but 's oppresst into a throne.
There reign he to Time's end! vvhile vve from this Doe calculate his Apotheosis.

Boy. I am sure I have run hard,
Would some body would walk me, & see me Litterd;
For I think my fellow-Horse, cannot in reason
Desire more rest, nor take up his Chamber before me,
But we are the Beasts now, and the Beasts are out Masters.

de Gard. When you have don, step to the Ten-Crown Ordinary.

Boy. With all my heart, Sir, For I have Twenty Crown-stomachs!

de Ga. And there bespeak a dinner.

Boy. Yes Sir, presently.

de Ga. For whom, I beseech you, Sir?

Boy. For my self, I take it Sir.

de Ga. In truth ye shall not take it, 'tis not meant for you,
Ther's for your Provender: Bespeak a Dinner
For Mounsieur Mirabell, and his Companions,
They'll be in Town within this houre. When you have don, Sirha,
Make ready all things at my Lodging, for me,
And wait me there.

Boy. The Ten-Crown Ordinary?

de Ga. Yes Sir, if you have not forgot it.

Boy. I'll forget my feet first,
'Tis the best part of a Foot-mans faith; Exit Boy

de Ga. These youths
For all they have been in Italy, to learn thrift,
And seem to wonder at mens lavish waies,
Yet they cannot rub off old friends, their French ytches;
They must meet sometimes to disport their Bodies
With good Wine, and good Women; and good store too.
Let 'em be what they will, they are Armd at all points
And then hang saving. Let the Sea grow high,

This Ordinarie can fit 'em of all Sizes
They must salute their Country with old customes.
Or. Brother,
de Ga. My dearest sister.
Or. Welcom, welcom;
Indeed ye are welcom home, most welcom.
de G. Thank ye,
You are grown a handsome woman Oriana,
(Blush at your faults) I am wondrous glad to see ye.
Monsieur La-Castre: Let not my Affection
To my fair Sister, make me held unmannerly:
I am glad to see ye well, to see ye lustie,
Good health about ye, and in fair company,
Believe me, I am proud---
La Ca. Fair Sir, I thank ye;
Mounsieur de Gard, you are welcom from your journey,
Good men, have still good welcom: give me your hand, Sir.
Once more, you are welcom home: you look still younger.
de G. Time has no leasure to look after us,
We wander, every where: Age cannot find us.
La C. And how does all?
de G. All well, Sir; and all lustie.
La Ca. I hope my Son be so, I doubt not Sir,
But you have often seen him in your journeis,
And bring me some fair Newes.
de G. Your Son is well, Sir,
And grown a proper Gentleman: he is well, and lustie,
Within this eight houres, I took leave of him,
And over-eyd him, having some slight busines
That forc'd me out o'th' way: I can assure you
He will be here to night.
La Ca. Ye make me glad Sir,
For o' my faith, I almost long to see him,
Me thinks he has been away --- de G. 'Tis but your tenderness;
What are three yeares? a love-sick wench will allow it?
His friends that went out with him are come back too,
Beleure, and young Pinac: he bid me say little,
Because he meanes to be his own glad Messenger.
La C. I thank ye for this newes, Sir, he shalbe welcom,
And his friends too: Indeed I thank you heartily.
And how (for I dare say, you will not flatter him)
Has Italy wrought on him? ha's he mew'd yet
His wild fantastick Toyes? they say that Climate
Is a great purger of those humorous Fluxes.
How is he improved, I pray ye?
de G. No doubt Sir, well.
H'as born himself a full, and noble Gentleman,
To speak him farther, is beyond my Charter,
La C. I am glad to hear so much good: Come, I see
You long to enjoy your Sister: yet I must intreat ye
Before I go, to sup with me to night

Enter La-Castre & Oriana

And

And must not be deni'd.
de Ga. I am your servant.
La.C. Where you shall meet fair, merry, and noble Company.
My neighbour Natolet, and his two fair daughters.
de G. Your supper's season'd well, Sir. I shall wait upon ye.
La Ca. Till then I'll leave ye: and y' are once more welcom.
de G. I thank ye, noble Sir. Now Oriana, (Exit.
How have ye done since I went? Have ye had your health well?
And your mind free?
Or. You see I am not bated;
Merry, and eat my meat.
de G. A good preservative.
And how have you been us'd? You know Oriana,
Upon my going out, at your request,
I left your Portion in La-Castres hands,
(The main Means you must stick to) for that reason
(And 'tis no little one) I ask ye, Sister,
With what humanitie he entertains ye,
And how ye find his curtesie?
Or. Most ready.
I can assure you, Sir, I am us'd most nobly.
de G. I am glad to hear it: But I pre'thee tell me,
(And tell me true) what end had you Oriana,
In trusting your money here? He is no Kinsman,
Nor any tie upon him of a Guardian;
Nor dare I think ye doubt my prodigality.
Or. No, certain, Sir, none of all this provoked me;
Another private reason.
de G. 'Tis not private,
Nor carryed so: 'tis common (my fair Sister)
Your love to Mirabell; your blushes tell it:
'Tis too much known, and spoken of too largely;
And with no little shame I wonder at it.
Or. Is it a shame to love?
de G. To Love undiscreetly:
A Virgin should be tender of her honour,
Close, and secure.
Or. I am as close as can be,
And stand upon as strong and honest guards too,
Unless this Warlike Age need a Port-cullis:
Yet I confess, I love him.
de G. Hear the people.
Or. Now I say hang the people: He that dares Believe what they say, dares be mad, and give His Mother, nay his own Wife up to Rumor;
All grounds of truth they build on, is a Tavern,
And their best censure's Sack, Sack in abundance:
For as they drink, they think: they ne'r speak modestly
Unless the wine be poor, or they want money.
Beleeve them? beleeve Amadis de Gaul,
The Knight o'th' Sun, or Palmerin of England;
For these, to them, are modest, and true stories.

Pray

Pray understand me; if their tongues be truth,
And if in Vino veritas be an Oracle,
What woman is, or has been ever honest?
Give 'em but ten round cups, they'll swear Lucretia
Dy'd not for want of power to resist Tarquine,
But want of Pleasure, that he stayd no longer:
And Portia, that was famous for her Pietie
To her lov'd Lord, they'll face ye out, dy'd o'th' pox.

de G. Well, there is something, Sister.

Or. If there be, Brother,
'Tis none of their things, 'tis not yet so monstrous;
My thing is Mariage: And at his return
I hope to put their squint-eyes right again.

de G. Mariage? 'tis true: his father is a rich man;
Rich both in land and money: he his heir,
A young and handsom man, I must confess too;
But of such qualities, and such wild flings,
Such admirable imperfections, Sister,
(For all his travaile, and bought experience)
I should be loth to own him for my brother:
Me thinks a rich mind in a state indifferent
Would prove the better fortune.

Or. If he be wild,
The reclaming him to good, and honest (brother)
Will make much for my honor; which, if I prosper, Shall be the study of my love, and life too.

de G. Ye say well; would he thought as well, and loved too.
He mary? he'll be hang'd first: he knows no more
What the conditions and the ties of Love are,
The honest purposes and grounds of Mariage,
Nor will know, nor be ever brought t' endeavour,
Than I do how to build a Church; he was ever
A loose and strong defier of all order,
His Loves are wanderers, they knock at each door,
And tast each dish, but are no residents:
Or say he may be brought to think of Mariage
(As 't will be no small labour) thy hopes are strangers.
I know there is a labour'd match, now follow'd,
(Now at this time, for which he was sent for home too)
Be not abus'd, Natolet has two fair daughters,
And he must take his choice.

Or. Let him take freely;
For all this I despair not: my mind tells me
That I, and onely I, must make him perfect;
And in that hope I rest.

de G. Since y' are so confident Prosper your hope: I'll be no adversary:
Keep your self fair and right, he shall not wrong ye.

Or. When I forget my vertue, no man know me. Exeunt.

Scen.

SCENA SECUNDA.

Enter Mirabell, Pinac, Belleure, and Servants.

Mir. Welcom to Paris once more, Gentlemen:
We have had a merry, and a lusty Ord'nary,
And wine, and good meat, and a bounsing Reckning;
And let it go for once; 'Tis a good physick:
Only the wenches are not for my dyet,
They are too lean and thin; their embraces brawn-fall'n.
Give me the plump Venetian, fat, and lusty,
That meets me soft and supple; smiles upon me,
As if a cup of full wine leap'd to kiss me;
These slight things I affect not.

Pi. They are ill built;
Pin-buttockt, like your dainty Barbaries,
And weak i'th pasterns; they'l endure no hardness.

Mir. There's nothing good, or handsom, bred amongst us;
Till we are travail'd, and live abroad, we are coxcombs:
Ye talk of France, a slight, unseason'd Country;
Abundance of gross food, which makes us block-heads:
We are fair set-out indeed, and so are fore-horses.
Men say we are great Courtiers, men abuse us:
We are wise, and valiant too; non credo Signior:
Our women the best Linguists, they are Parrats;
O' this side the Alpes they are nothing but meer Drollaries:
Ha Roma la Santa, Italie for my money:
Their policies, their customs, their frugalities,
Their curtesies so open, yet so reserved too,
As when ye think y' are known best, ye are a stranger;
Their very pick-teeth speak more man than we do,
And season of more salt.

Pi. 'Tis a brave Country;
Not pester'd with your stubborn precise puppies,
That turn all useful, and allow'd contentments
To scabs and scruples; hang 'em Capon-worshippers.

Bel. I like that freedom well, and like their women too,
And would fain do as others do; but I am so bashfull,
So naturally an Ass: Look ye, I can look upon 'em,
And very willingly I go to see 'em,
(There's no man willinger) and I can kiss 'em,
And make a shift ——

Mir. But if they chance to flout ye,
Or say ye are too bold; fie Sir remember;
I pray sit farther off; ——

Bel. 'Tis true, I am humbled,
I am gone, I confess ingenuously I am silenced,
The spirit of Amber cannot force me answer.

Pi. Then would I sing and dance.

Bel. You have wherewithall, Sir.

Pi. And charge her up again.

Bel. I can be hang'd first:
Yet where I fasten well, I am a tyrant.

Mir. Why, thou darſt fight?
Bel. Yes, certainly, I dare fight;
And fight with any man, at any weapon,
Would th' other were no more; but, a pox on't;
When I am ſometimes in my height of hope,
And reaſonable valiant that way, my heart harden'd,
Some ſcornfull jeſt or other, chops between me
And my deſire: What would ye have me to do then, Gentlemen?
Mir. Belvere, ye muſt be bolder; Travell three years,
And bring home ſuch a baby to betray ye
As baſhfulneſs? a great fellow, and a ſouldier?
Bel. You have the gift of impudence, be thankful;
Every man has not the like talent: I will ſtudy
And if it may be reveal'd to me.
Mir. Learn of me,
And of Pinac: no doubt you'll find imployment;
Ladies will look for Courtſhip.
Pi. 'Tis but fleſhing, riage?
But ſtanding one good brunt or two; ha'ſt thou any mind to ma-
Wee'll provide thee ſome ſoft-natur'd wench, that's dumb too.
Mir. Or an old woman that cannot refuſe thee in charity.
Bel. A dumb woman, or an old woman, that were eager,
And car'd not for diſcourſe, I were excellent at.
Mir. You muſt now put on boldneſs, there's no avoyding it;
And ſtand all hazards; fly at all games bravely;
They'll ſay you went out like an Ox, and return'd like an Aſs elſe.
Bel. I ſhall make danger ſure.
Mir. I am ſent for home now,
I know it is to marry, but my father ſhall pardon me,
Although it be a witty ceremony,
And may concern me hereafter in my gravitie;
I will not loſe the freedom of a Traveller;
A new ſtrong luſty Bark cannot ride at one anchor;
Shall I make divers ſuits to ſhew to the ſame eyes?
'Tis dull, and home-ſpun: Study ſeverall pleaſures,
And want employments for 'em? I'll be hang'd firſt;
Tie me to one ſmock? make my travels fruitleſs?
I'll none of that: For every freſh behaviour,
By your leave, father, I muſt have a freſh Miſtris,
And a freſh favour too.
Bel. I like that paſſingly;
As many as you will, ſo they be willing;
Willing, and gentle, gentle.
Pi. There's no reaſon
A Gentleman, and a Traveller, ſhould be clapt up,
For 'tis a kind of Bæboes to be maryed
Before he manifeſt to the world his good parts:
Tug ever like at a raſcall at one oar?
Give me the Italian liberty.
Mir. That I ſtudy;
And that I will enjoy: Come, go in Gentlemen,
There mark how I behave my ſelf, and follow. Exeunt.

SCENA TERTIA.

Enter La-Castre, Natolet, Lugien, Rosa Lieura, Lylie-Bianca.

La C. You and your beauteous daughters are most welcom, Beshrew my blood they are fair ones; welcom Beauties, Welcom sweet birds.

Na. They are bound much to your curtesies.

La Ca. I hope we shall be nearer acquainted.

Na. That's my hope too.

Na. For certain, Sir, I much desire your Alliance.
You see 'em, they are no Gipseies; for their breeding,
It has not been so coarse, but they are able
To rank themselves with women of fair fashion;
Indeed they have been trained well.

Lug. Thank me.

Na. Fit for the heirs of that state I shall leave 'em;
To say more, is to sell 'em. They say your son
Now he has travail'd must be wondrous curious,
And choice in what he takes: These are no coarse ones;
Sir, here's a merry wench, let him look to himself,
(All heart, y'faith) may chance to startle him;
For all his care, and travail'd caution,
May creep into his eye; if he love Gravitie,
Affect a solemn face, there's one will fit him.

La C. So young, and so demure?

Na. She is my daughter,
Else I would tell you, Sir, she is a Mistris
Both of those manners, and that modesty,
You would wonder at: She is no often speaker,
But when she does, she speaks well; Nor no Reveller,
Yet she can dance, and has studied the Court Elements,
And sings, as some say, handsomly; if a woman,
With the decencie of her sex, may be a Scholar,
I can assure ye, Sir, she understands too.

La C. These are fit Garments, Sir.

Lug. Thank them that cut 'em:
Yet, they are handsom women; they have handsom parts too;
Pretie becoming parts.

La C. 'Tis like they have, Sir.

Lug. Yes, yes, and handsom Education they have had too:
Had it abundantly; they need not blush at it;
I taught it, I'll avouch it.

La C. Ye say well, Sir.

Lug. I know what I say, Sir, and I say but right, Sir,
I am no trumpet of their commendations
Before their father; else I should say farther.

La C. Pray ye, what's this Gentleman?

Na. One that lives with me, Sir;
A man well bred and learn'd, but blunt and bitter,
Yet it offends no wise man; I take pleasure in't:
Many fair gifts he has, in some of which
That lie most easie to their understandings,
Has handsomly bred up my girls, I thank him.

I have put it to 'em, that's my part, I have urg'd it,
It ſeems they are of years now to take hold on't.
Na. He's wondrous blunt.
La C. By my faith I was afraid of him;
Does he not fall out with the Gentlewomen ſometimes?
Na. No, no; he's that way moderate, and diſcreet, Sir.
Roſ. If he did, we ſhould be too hard for him.
Lug. Well ſaid Sulphur;
Too hard for thy huſbands head, if he wear not armour.
Na. Many of theſe bickrings, Sir. Enter Mirabell, Pinac, de Gard, and Oriana.
La C. I am glad they are no Oracles:
Sure, as I live, he beats them, he's ſo puiſant.
Or. Well, if ye do forget——
Mir. Pre'thee hold thy peace;
I know thou art a prettie wench; I know thou lov'ſt me,
Preſerve it till we have a fit time to diſcourſe on't,
And a fit place: I'll eaſe thy heart, I warrant thee:
Thou ſeeſt I have much to do now.
Or. I am anſwer'd, Sir:
With me ye ſhall have nothing on theſe conditions.
de G. Your father, and your friends.
La C. You are welcom home, Sir;
'Bleſs ye, ye are very welcom.
'Pray know this Gentleman,
And theſe fair Ladies.
Na. Monſieur Mirabell,
I am much affected with your fair return, Sir:
You bring a generall joy.
Mir. I bring you ſervice,
And theſe bright beauties, Sir.
Na. Welcom home, Gentlemen,
VVelcom, with all my heart.
Bel. Pi. VVe thank ye, Sir.
La C. Your friends will have their ſhare too.
Bel. Sir, we hope
They'll look upon us, though we ſhew like ſtrangers.
Na. Monſieur de-Gard, I muſt ſalute you alſo, (too.
And this fair Gentlewoman: you are welcom from your Travell
All welcom, all.
de G. VVe render ye our loves, Sir;
The beſt wealth we bring home: By your favours, Beauties,
One of theſe two: you know my meaning.
Or. VVell Sir;
They are fair and handſom, I muſt needs confeſs it;
And let it prove the worſt, I ſhall live after it,
Whilſt I have meat & drink, Love can not ſtarve me;
For if I dye o'th' firſt fit, I am unhappy,
And worthy to be buried with my heels upward.
Mir. To mary, Sir?
La C. You know I am an old man,
And every hour declining to my grave,
One foot already in, more ſons I have not,

Nor

Nor more I dare not ſeek whilſt you are worthy,
In you lies all my hope, and all my name,
The making good or wretched of my memory,
The ſafety of my ſtate.
Mir. And you have provided
Out of this tenderneſs this handſom Gentlewoman, Daughters to this rich man, to take my choice of?
La. C. I have, dear ſon.
Mir. 'Tis true, ye are old, and feebled;
Would ye were young again, and in full vigor;
I love a bounteous fathers life, a long one,
I am none of thoſe that when they ſhoot to ripeneſs,
Do what they can to break the boughs they grew on:
I wiſh ye many years, and many riches,
And pleaſures to enjoy 'em: But for Mariage,
I neither yet beleeve in't, nor affect it,
Nor think it fit.
La. C. You will render me your reaſons?
Mir. Yes, Sir, both ſhort and pithy; and theſe they are:
You would have me mary a Mayd?
La. C. A Mayd? what elſe?
Mir. Yes, there be things called Widdows, dead-mens Wills,
I never lov'd to prove thoſe; nor never long'd yet
To be buried alive in anothers mans cold Monument.
And there be Maids appearing, and Maids being in I
The appearing, are fantaſtick things, meer ſhadows;
And if you mark 'em well, they want their heads too;
Onely the world, to coſen myſtie eyes,
Has clapt 'em on new faces. The Mayds being,
A man may venture on, if he be ſo mad to mary;
If he have neither fear before his eyes, nor fortune;
And let him take heed how he gather theſe too;
For look ye, father, they are juſt like Melons,
Muſk-Melons are the Emblems of theſe Mayds;
Now they are ripe, now cut 'em, they taſte pleaſantly,
And are a dainty fruit, digeſted eaſily:
Neglect this preſent time, and come to morrow,
They are ſo ripe they are rotten gon, their ſweetneſs
Run into humour, and their taſte to ſurfeit.
La. C. Why theſe are now ripe ſon.
Mir. I'll try them preſently,
And if I like their taſte——
La. C. 'Pray ye pleaſe your ſelf, Sir.
Mir. That liberty is my due, and I'll maintain it.
Lady, what think you of a handſom man now?
Roſ. A wholſom too, Sir.
Mir. That's as you make your bargain.
A handſom, wholſom man then, and a kind man,
To chear your heart up, to rejoyce ye, Lady?
Roſ. Yes, Sir, I love rejoycing. Mir. To ly cloſe to ye?
Cloſe as a cockle? keep the cold nights from ye?
Roſ. That will be lookt for too, our bodies aſk it.

Mir. And get two Boyes at every birth?
Ros. That's nothing,
I have known a Cobler do it, a poor thin Cobler;
A Cobler out of mouldy cheese perform it,
Cabbage, and coarse black bread: me thinks a Gentleman
Should take foul scorn to have a Nawl out-name him.
Two at a birth? why every House-dove has it:
That man that feeds well, promises as well too,
I should expect indeed something of worth from.
Ye talk of two?
Mir. She would have me get two dozen,
Like Buttons, at a birth.
Ros. You love to brag, Sir.
If you proclame these offers at your Mariage,
Ye are a pretty timber'd man, take heed,
They may be taken hold of, and expected,
Yes, if not hoped for at a higher rate too.
Mir. I will take heed, and thank ye for your counsell:
Father, what think ye?
La C. 'Tis a merry Gentlewoman;
Will make, no doubt, a good wife.
Mir. Not for me:
I mary her, and happily get nothing;
In what a state am I then? Father, I shall suffer
For any thing I hear to the contrary, more majorum,
I were as sure to be a Cuckold, Father,
A Gentleman of Antlet.
La C. Away, away fool.
Mir. As I am sure to fail her expectation,
I had rather get the pox than get her babies.
La C. Ye are much too blame; if this do not affect ye,
Pray try the other; she is of a more demure way.
Bel. That I had but the audacitie to talk thus!
I love that plain-spoken Gentlewoman admirably,
And certain I could go as near to please her,
If down-right doing--- she has a perfidious countenance,
If I could meet one that would beleeve me,
And take my honest meaning without circumstance.
Mir. You shall have your will, Sir, I will try the other,
But 'twill be to small use. I hope, fair Lady
(For methinks in your eyes I see more mercy)
You will enjoyn your Lover a less penance;
And though I'll promise much, as men are liberall,
And vow an ample sacrifice of service,
Yet your discretion, and your tenderness,
And thriftiness in Love, good housewives carefulnes
To keep the stock entire----
Lyl. Good Sir, speak louder,
That these may witness too ye talk of nothing,
I should be loth alone to bear the burthen
Of so much indiscretion.
Mir. Heark ye, heark ye;

Od's-

Od's-bobs, you are angry, Lady.
Lyl. Angry? no, Sir;
I never own'd an anger to loſe poorly.
Mir. But you can love, for all this, and delight too,
For all your ſet-auſteritie, to hear
Of a good huſband, Lady?
Lyl. You ſay true, Sir:
For by my troth, I have heard of none theſe ten year,
They are ſo rare, and there are ſo many, Sir,
So many longing-women on their knees too,
That pray the droping down of theſe good huſbands,
The droping down from heaven: for they are not bred here,
That you may gheſs at all my hope, but hearing——
Mir. Why may not I be one?
Lyl. You were near 'em once, Sir,
When ye came o're the Alps; thoſe are near heaven:
But ſince ye miſt that happineſs, there's no hope of ye.
Mir. Can ye love a man?
Lyl. Yes, if the man be lovely;
That is, be honeſt, modeſt: I would have him valiant,
His anger ſlow, but certain for his honor;
Travail'd he ſhould be, but through himſelf chiefly;
For 'tis fairer to know manners well, than Countries;
He muſt be no vain talker, nor no Lover
To hear himſelf talk, they are brags of a wanderer,
Of one finds no retreict for fair behaviour;
Would ye learn more?
Mir. Yes.
Lyl. Learn to hold your peace then,
Fond girls are got with tongues, women with tempers.
Mir. Women, with I know what; but let that vaniſh:
Go thy way good wife Eve; ſure thy husband
Muſt have a ſtrong Philoſophers ſtone, he will ne'r pleaſe thee elſe.
Heer's a ſtarcht peece of Auſteritie: do you hear, father?
Do you hear this morall Lecture?
La C. Yes, and like it.
Mir. Why there's your judgment now; there's an old bolt ſhot:
This Thing muſt have the ſtrangeſt obſervation,
Do you mark me (father?) when ſhe is married once,
The ſtrangeſt cuſtom too of admiration
On all ſhe do's and ſpeaks, 'twill be paſt ſufferance;
I muſt not lie with her in common language,
Nor cry, have at thee Kate, I ſhall be hiſt then;
Nor eat my meat without the ſawce of Sentences,
Your powder'd beef, and probleme, a rare dyet;
My firſt ſon, Monſieur Ariſtotle, I know it,
Great Maſter of the Metaphyſicks, or ſo;
The ſecond Solon, and the beſt Law-ſetter;
And I muſt look Egyptian God-fathers,
Which will be no ſmall trouble: My eldeſt daughter
Sapho, or ſuch a fidling kind of Poeteſs,
And brought up, invita Minerva, at her needle.

My

My dogs must look their names too, and all Spartan,
Lelaps, Ma[illegible] no more Fox and Bandiface.
I maryed t[illegible]len set of Sentences?
To one that weighs her words and her behaviours
In the Gold-weights of discretion? I'll be hang'd first.
La C. 'Pre'thee reclame thy self.
Mir. 'Pray ye give me time then;
If they can set me any thing to play at,
That seems fit for a Gamester, have at the fairest
Till I see more, and try more.
L. C. Take your time then,
I'll bar ye no fair liberty: Come Gentlemen,
And Ladies, come, to all once more a welcom,
And now let's in to supper.
Mir. How do'st like 'em?
Pi. They are fair enough, but of so strange behaviors.
Mir Too strange for me; I must have those have mettle,
And mettle to my mind: Come lets be merry.
Bel. 'Bless me from this woman: I would stand the Cannon
Before ten words of hers.
de Ga. Do you find him now?
Do you think he will be ever firm?
Or. I fear not. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Mirabell, Pinac, Bellure.

Mir. NEver tel me of this happiness, 'tis nothing;
The state they bring with being sought to scurvey,
I had rather make mine own play, and I will do.
My happiness is in mine own content,
And the despising of such glorious trifles,
As I have done a thousand more. For my humour
Give me a good free fellow, that sticks to me,
A joviall fair companion; there's a Beauty:
For women, I can have too many of them;
Good women too, as the Age reckons 'em,
More than I have employment for.
Pi. You are happy.
Mir. My only fear is, that I must be forced Against my nature, to conceal my self.
Health, and an able body are two jewels.
Pi. If either of these two women were offer'd to me now,
I would think otherwise, and do accordingly:
Yes, and recant my heresies, I would Sir;
And be more tender of opinion,
And put a little off my travail'd Libertie
Out of the way, and look upon 'em seriously.
Me-thinks this grave-carried wench.
Bel. Me-thinks the other;

The home-ſpoken Gentle-woman, that deſires to be fruitfull,
That treats of the full mannage of the matter,
For there lies all my aim; that wench, me-thinks
If I were but well ſet-on; for ſhe is a fable,
If I were but hounded right, and one to teach me;
She ſpeaks to th' matter, and comes home to th' point:
Now do I know I have ſuch a body to pleaſe her,
As all the kingdom cannot fit her with, I am ſure on't,
If I could but talk my ſelf into her favour.

Mir. That's eaſily done.

Bel. That's eaſily ſaid, would 'twere done;
You ſhould ſee then how I would lay about me;
If I were vertuous, it would never grieve me,
Or any thing that might juſtifie my modeſty,
But when my nature is prone to do a charitie,
And my calfs-tongue will not help me.

Mir. Will ye go to 'em?
They cannot but take it curteouſly.

Pi. I'll do my part,
Though I am ſure 'twil be the hardeſt I e'r plaid yet,
A way I never try'd too, which will ſtagger me,
And if it do not ſhame me, I am happy.

Mir. Win 'em, and wear 'em, I give up my intereſt.

Pi. What ſay ye, Monſieur Bellure?

Bel. Would I could ſay,
Or ſing, or any thing that were but handſom,
I would be with her preſently.

Pi. Yours is no venture;
A merry ready wench.

Bel. A vengeance ſquibber;
She'll fleer me out of faith too.

Mir. I'll be near thee;
Pluck up thy heart, I'll ſecond thee at all brunts;
Be angry if ſhe abuſe thee, and beat her a little,
Some women are won that way.

Bel. Pray be quiet,
And let me think: I am reſolv'd to go on;
But how I ſhall get off again——

Mir. I am perſwaded
Thou wilt ſo pleaſe her, ſhe will go neer to ravish thee.

Bel. I would 'twere come to that once: Let me pray a little.

Mir. Now for thine honor Venus, board me this modeſty,
Warm but this frozen ſnow-ball, 'twill be a conqueſt (Although I know thou art a fortunate Wencher,
And haſt done rarely in thy daies) above all thy ventures.

Bel. You will be ever neer?

Mir. At all neceſſities,
And take thee off, and ſet thee on again, Boy;
And cheriſh thee, and ſtroak thee.

Bel. Help me out too?
For I know I ſhall ſtick 'ith' mire: if ye ſee us cloſe once,
Be gone, and leave me to my fortune, ſuddainly,

For I am then determin'd to do wonders.
Farewell, and fling an old shooe: how my heart throbs?
Would I were drunk: Farewell Pinac; heaven send us
A joyfull and a merry meeting, man.
Pi. Farewell,
And chear thy heart up; and remember Bellure
They are but women.
Bel. I had rather they were Lyons.
Mir. About it; I'll be with you instantly. Exeunt.
Shall I ne'r be at rest? no peace of conscience? Enter Orinda.
No quiet for these creatures? Am I ordain'd
To be devour'd quick by these she-Canibals?
Here's another they call handsom, I care not for her.
I ne'r look after her: When I am half tipled
It may be I should turn her, and peruse her,
Or in my want of women, I might call for her;
But to be haunted when I have no fancie,
No maw to th' matter — Now, why do you follow me?
Or. I hope, Sir, 'tis no blemish to my vertue,
Nor need you (out of scruple) ask that question,
If you remember ye, before your Travell
The contract you ty'd to me: 'tis my love, Sir,
That makes me seek ye, to confirm your memory,
And that being fair and good, I cannot suffer;
I come to give ye thanks too.
Mir. For what 'prethee?
Or. For that fair peece of honesty ye shew'd, Sir,
That constant nobleness.
Mir. How? for I am short headed.
Or. I'll tell ye then; for refusing that free offer
Of Monsieur Nantolets; those handsom Beauties,
Those two prime Ladies, that might well have prest ye,
If not to have broken, yet to have bow'd your promise.
I know it was for my sake, for your faith sake,
You slipt 'em off: your honesty compell'd ye,
And let me tell ye, Sir, it shew'd most handsomly.
Mir. And let me tell thee, there was no such matter;
Nothing intended that way of that nature;
I have more to do with my honesty than to fool it,
Or venture it in such leak-barks as women;
I put 'em off, because I lov'd 'em not,
Because they are too queazie for my temper,
And not for thy sake, nor the Contract sake,
Nor vows, nor oathes; I have made a thousand of 'em,
They are things indifferent, whether kept or broken;
Meer veniall slips, that grow not near the Conscience;
Nothing concerns those tender parts; they are trifles;
For, as I think, there was never man yet hop'd for Either constancie, or secrecie, from a woman,
Unless it were an Ass ordain'd for sufferance;
Nor to contract with such can be a Tiall;
So let them know again; for 'tis a Justice,

And a main point of civill policie,
Whate're we ſay or ſwear, they being Reprobates,
Out of the ſtate of faith, we are clear of all ſides,
And 'tis a curious blindneſs to beleeve us.
Or. You do not mean this ſure?
Mir. Yes ſure, and certain,
And hold it poſitively, as a Principle,
As ye are ſtrange things, and made of ſtrange fires and fluxes,
So we are allow'd as ſtrange wayes to obtain ye,
But not to hold; we are all created Errant.
Or. You told me other tales.
Mir. I not deny it;
I have tales of all ſorts for all ſorts of women,
And proteſtations likewiſe of all ſizes,
As they have vanities to make us coxcombs;
If I obtain a good turn, ſo it is,
I am thankfull for it: if I be made an Aſs,
The mends are in mine own hands, or the Surgeons,
And there's an end on't.
Or. Do not you love me then?
Mir. As I love others, heartily I love thee,
When I am high and luſty, I love thee cruelly,
After I have made a plenteous meal, and ſatisfi'd
My ſenſes with all delicates, come come,
And thou ſhalt ſee how I love thee.
Or. Will not you mary me?
Mir. No, certain, no, for any thing I know yet;
I muſt not loſe my liberty, dear Lady,
And like a wanton ſlave cry for more ſhackles.
What ſhould I mary for? Do I want any thing?
Am I an inch the farther from my pleaſure?
Why ſhould I be at charge to keep a wife of mine own,
When other honeſt maryed men will eaſe me?
And thank me too, and be beholding to me?
Thou think'ſt I am mad for a Maiden-head, thou art cozen'd,
Or if I were addicted to that diet
Can you tell me where I ſhould have one? thou art eighteen now,
And if thou haſt thy Maiden-head yet intant,
Sure 'tis as big as Gods-head: and thoſe grave diſhes
I never love to deal with all: Do'ſt thou ſee this book here?
Look over all theſe ranks; all theſe are Women,
Mayds, and pretenders to Maiden-heads; theſe are my conqueſts,
All theſe I ſwore to mary, as I ſwore to thee,
With the ſame reſervation, and moſt righteouſly,
Which I need not have done neither, for alas they made no ſcruple,
And I enjoy'd 'em at my will, and left 'em:
Some of 'em are maried ſince, and were as pure mayds again,
Nay o' my conſcience better than they were bred for;
The reſt fine ſober women.
Or. Are ye not aſham'd, Sir?
Mir. No by my troth, Sir; there's no ſhame belongs to it;
I hold it as commendable to be wealthy in pleaſure,

As others do in rotten sheep, and pasture. Enter
Or. Are all my hopes come to this? is their no faith? de Gard.
No troth? nor modesty in men?
de Ga. How now Sister,
Why weeping thus? did I not prophesie?
Come tell me why——
Or. I am not well; 'pray ye pardon me. Exit.
de Ga. Now Monsieur Mirabell, what ails my Sister?
You have been playing the wag with her.
Mir. As I take it,
She is crying for a cod-peece; is she gone?
Lord, what an Age is this? I was calling for ye,
For as I live I thought she would have ravish'd me.
de Ga. Ye are merry Sir.
Mir. Thou know'st this book, de Gard, this Inventory.
de Ga. The Debt-book of your Mistrisses, I remember it.
Mir. Why this was it that anger'd her; she was stark mad
She found not her name here, and cry'd down-right,
Because I would not pitty her immediately,
And put her in my list.
de G. Sure she had more modesty.
Mir. Their modesty is anger to be over-done;
They'll quarrell sooner for precedence here,
And take it in more dudgen to be slighted,
Than they will in publique meetings; 'tis their natures:
And alass I have so many to dispatch yet,
And to provide my self for my affairs too,
That in good faith——
de G. Be not too glorious foolish;
Summe not your Travails up with vanities,
It ill becomes your expectation:
Temper your speech, Sir; whether your loose story
Be true, or false (for you are so free, I fear it)
Name not my Sister in't; I must not hear it;
Upon your danger name her not: I hold her
A Gentlewoman of those happy parts and carriage,
A good mans tongue may be right proud to speak her.
Mir. Your Sister, Sir? d'ye blench at that? d'ye cavill?
Do you hold her such a peece, she may not be play'd withall?
I have had an hundred handsomer and nobler,
Has su'd to me too for such a curtesie:
Your Sister comes i'th' rear: since ye are so angry,
And hold your Sister such a strong Recusant,
I tell ye I may do it, and it may be will too,
It may be have too; there's my free confession;
Work upon that now.
de G. If I thought ye had, I would work,
And work such stubborn work, should make your heart ake;
But I beleeve ye, as I ever knew ye,
A glorious talker, and a Legend maker
Of idle tales, and trifles; a depraver
Of your own truth; their honours fly about ye;

And ſo I take my leave, but with this caution,
Your ſword be ſurer than your tongue, you'll ſmart elſe.
Mir. I laugh at thee, ſo little I reſpect thee;
And I'll talk louder, and deſpiſe thy Siſter;
Set up a Chamber-maid that ſhall out-ſhine her,
And carry her in my Coach too, and that will kill her.
Go get thy Rents up, go.
de Ga. Ye are a fine Gentleman. Exit.
Mir. Now have at my two youths, I'll ſee how they do,
How they behave themſelves, and then I'll ſtudy
What wench ſhall love me next, and when I'll looſe her. Exit.

SCENA SECUNDA.

Enter Pinac and a Servant.

Pi. Art thou her ſervant, ſaiſt thou?
Ser. Her poor creature,
But ſervant to her horſe, Sir.
Pi. Canſt thou ſhew me
The way to her chamber? or where I may conveniently
See her, or come to talk to her?
Ser. That I can, Sir;
But the queſtion is whether I will or no.
Pi. Why I'll content thee.
Ser. Why I'll content thee then; now ye come to me.
Pi. There's for your diligence.
Ser. There's her chamber, Sir;
And this way ſhe comes out; ſtand ye but here, Sir,
You have her at your proſpect, or your pleaſure.
Pi. Is ſhe not very angry?
Ser. You'll find that quickly:
'May be ſhe'll call ye ſawcy ſcurvey fellow,
Or ſome ſuch familiar name: 'may be ſhe knows ye,
And will fling a Piſs-pot at ye, or a Pantofle,
According as ye are in acquaintance: if ſhe like ye,
'May be ſhe'll look upon ye, 'may be no,
And two moneths hence call for ye.
Pi. This is fine.
She is monſtrous proud then?
Ser. She is a little haughtie,
Of a ſmall body, ſhe has a mind well mounted.
Can ye ſpeak Greek?
Pi. No certain.
Ser. Get ye gon then;
And talk of ſtars, and firmaments, and fire-drakes,
Do you remember who was Adams School-maſter,
And who taught Eve to ſpin? ſhe knowes all theſe,
And will run ye over the beginning o'th' world
As familiar as a Fidler.
Can ye ſit ſeven hours together, and ſay nothing?
Which ſhe will do, and when ſhe ſpeaks ſpeak Oracles;
Speak things that no man underſtands, nor her ſelf neither.
Pi. Thou mak'ſt me wonder.

Ser. Can ye ſmile?
Pi. Yes willingly:
For naturally I bear a mirth about me.
Ser. She'll ne'r endure ye then; ſhe is never merry;
If ſhe ſee one laugh, ſhe'll ſwound paſt Aquavitæ;
Never come near her, Sir; if ye chance to venture,
And talk not like a Doctor, you are damn'd too;
I have told ye enough for your Crown, and ſo good ſpeed ye. Ex.
Pi. I have a pretty taſk, if ſhe be thus curious,
As ſure it ſeems ſhe is; if I fall off now,
I ſhall be laugh'd at fearfully; if I go forward,
I can but be abus'd, and that I look for,
And yet I may hit right, but 'tis unlikely.
Stay, in what mood and figure ſhall I attempt her?
A careleſs way? no, no, that will not waken her;
Beſides, her gravity will give me line ſtill,
And let me loſe my ſelf; yet this way often
Has hit, and handſomly. A wanton method?
I, if ſhe give it leave to ſink into her conſideration;
But there's the doubt: if it but ſtir her blood once,
And creep in to the crannies of her phanſie,
Set her a gog: but if ſhe chance to ſlight it,
And by the pow'r of her modeſty fling it back,
I ſhall appear the arrantſt Raſcal to her,
The moſt licentious knave, for I ſhall talk lewdly.
To bear my ſelf auſterely? rate my words,
And fling a generall gravitie about me,
As if I meant to give Laws? but this I cannot do,
This is a way above my underſtanding;
Or if I could, 'tis ods ſhe'll think I mock her;
For ſerious and ſad things are ever ſtill ſuſpicious.
Well, I'll ſay ſomething;
But learning I have none, and leſs good manners,
Eſpecially for Ladies; well, I'll ſet my beſt face; Enter
I hear ſome coming; this is the firſt woman Lilia, Petella.
I ever fear'd yet, the firſt face that ſhakes me.
Li. Give me my hat Petella, take this veil off,
This ſullen cloud, it darkens my delights;
Come wench be free, and let the Muſick warble,
Play me ſome luſty meaſure.
Pi. This is ſhe ſure,
The very ſame I ſaw, the very woman,
The Gravitie I wonder'd at: Stay, ſtay,
Let me be ſure; ne'r truſt me, but ſhe danceth,
Summer is in her face now, and ſhe ſkippeth;
I'll go a little nearer.
Lil. Quicker time fellows, Enter Mirabell
I cannot find my legs yet, now Petella.
Pi. I am amaz'd, I am founder'd in my fancie.
Mir. Hah, ſay ye ſo; is this your gravitie?
This the auſteritie ye put upon ye?
I'll ſee more o'this ſport.

Lil. A Song now;
Call in for a merry, and a light Song,
And ſing it with a liberall ſpirit. Enter a man.
Man. Yes, Madam.
Lil. And be not amaz'd ſirha, but take us for your own company.
Let's walk our ſelves; come wench, would we had a man or two.
Pi. Sure ſhe has ſpi'd me, and will abuſe me dreadfully,
She has put on this for the purpoſe; yet I will try her.
Madam, I would be loth my rude intruſion,
Which I muſt crave a pardon for——
Lil. O ye are welcom,
Ye are very welcom, Sir, we want ſuch a one;
Strike up again: I dare preſume ye dance well:
Quick, quick, Sir, quick, the time ſteals on.
Pi. I would talk with ye.
Lil. Talk as ye dance.
Mir. She'll beat him off his legs firſt.
This is the fineſt Maſque.
Lil. Now how do ye, Sir?
Pi. You have given me a ſhrew'd heat.
Lil. I'll give ye a hundred.
Come ſing now, ſing, for I know ye ſing well.
I ſee ye have a ſinging face.
Pi. A fine Modeſty!
If I could ſhe'd never give me breath,
Madam would I might ſit and recover.
Lil. Sit here, and ſing now,
Let's do things quickly, Sir, and handſomly,
Sit cloſe wench, cloſe, begin, begin. Song.
Pi. I am leſſon'd.
Lil. 'Tis very pretty y'faith, give me ſome wine now.
Pi. I would fain ſpeak to ye.
Lil. You ſhall drink firſt, believe me;
Here's to ye a luſty health.
Pi. I thank ye Lady.
Would I were off again; I ſmell my miſery;
I was never put to this rack; I ſhall be drunk too.
Mir. If thou be'ſt not a right one, I have loſt mine aim much,
I thank heaven that I have ſcap'd thee: To her Pinac;
For thou art as ſure to have her, and to groan for her——
I'll ſee how my other youth does; this ſpeeds trimly:
A fine grave Gentlewoman, and worth much honour. Exit.
Lil. Now, how do ye like me, Sir?
Pi. I like ye rarely.
Lil. Ye ſee, Sir, though ſometimes we are grave and ſilent,
And put on ſadder diſpoſitions,
Yet we are compounded of free parts, and ſometimes too
Our lighter, airie, and our fierie mettles
Break out, and ſhew themſelves; and what think you of that Sir?
Pi. Good Lady ſit, for I am very weary;
And then I'll tell ye.
Lil. Fie, a young man idle:
Up, and walk; be ſtill in action. The

The motions of the body are fair beauties,
Beſides 'tis cold; ods-me Sir, let's walk faſter.
What think ye now of the Lady Felicia?
And Bella-fronte the Dukes fair daughter? ha?
Are they not handſom things? there is Duarta,
And brown Olivia.

Pi. I know none of 'em.

Lil. But brown muſt not be caſt away, Sir; if young Lelia
Had kept her ſelf till this day from a huſband,
Why what a Beauty, Sir? you know Iſmena
The fair Jem of Saint Germins?

Pi. By my troth I do not.

Lil. And then I know you muſt hear of Briſac,
How unlike a Gentleman——

Pi. As I live I have heard nothing.

Lil. Strike me another Galliard.

Pi. By this light I cannot;
In troth I have ſprain'd my leg, Madam.

Lil. Now ſit ye down, Sir,
And tell me why ye came hither, why ye choſe me out?
What is your buſineſs? your errant? diſpatch, diſpatch;
'May be ye are ſome Gentlemans man, and I miſtook ye,
That have brought me a Letter, or a haunch of Veniſon,
Sent me from ſome friend of mine.

Pi. Do I look like a Carrier?
You might allow me what I am, a Gentleman.

Lil. Cry 'ye mercie, Sir, I ſaw ye yeſterday,
You are new come out of Travail, I miſtook ye;
And how do's all our impudent friends in Italie?

Pi. Madam, I came with duty, and fair curteſie,
Service, and honour to ye.

Lil. Ye came to jeer me:
Yee ſee I am merry, Sir, I have chang'd my coppy:
None of the Sages now, and 'pray ye proclame it,
Fling on me what aſperſion you ſhall pleaſe, Sir,
Of wantonneſs, or wildneſs, I look for it;
And tell the world I am an hypocrite
Maſk in a forc'd and borrow'd ſhape, I expect it;
But not to have you beleev'd; for mark ye, Sir,
I have won a nobler eſtimation,
A ſtronger tie by my diſcretion
Upon opinion (how ere you think I forced it)
Than either tongue or art of yours can ſlubber,
And when I pleaſe I will be what I pleaſe, Sir,
So I exceed not Mean; and none ſhall brand it Either with ſcorn or ſhame, but ſhall be ſlighted.

Pi. Lady, I come to love ye.

Lil. Love your ſelf, Sir.
And when I want obſervers, I'll ſend for ye:
Heigh, ho; my fit's almoſt off, for we do all by fits, Sir:
If ye be weary, ſit till I come again to ye. Exit.

Pi. This

Pi. This is a wench of a dainty ſpirit; but hang me if I know yet
Either what to think, or make of her; She had her will of me,
And baited me abundantly, I thank her.
And I confeſs I never was ſo blurted,
Nor never ſo abus'd; I muſt bear mine own ſins;
Ye talk of Travails, here's a curious Country,
Yet I will find her out, or forſwear my facultie. Exit.

SCENA TERTIA.

Enter Roſaura, and Oriana.

Roſ. Ne'r vex your ſelf, nor grieve; ye are a fool then.
Or. I am ſure I am made ſo: yet before I ſuffer
Thus like a girl, and give him leave to triumph---
Roſ. You ſay right; for as long as he perceives ye Sink under his proud ſcornings, he'll laugh at ye:
For me, ſecure your ſelf; and for my Siſter,
I partly know her mind too: howſoever
To obey my Father we have made a tender
Of our poor beauties to the travail'd Monſieur;
Yet two words to a bargain; he ſlights us
As ſkittiſh things, and we ſhun him as curious.
May be my free behaviour turns his ſtomach,
And makes him ſeem to doubt a looſe opinion.
I muſt be ſo ſometimes, though all the world ſaw it.
Or. Why ſhould not ye? Are our minds only meaſur'd?
As long as here ye ſtand ſecure.
Roſ. Ye ſay true;
As long as mine own conſcience makes no queſtion,
What care I for Report: That woman's miſerable
That's good or bad for their tongues ſake: Come let's retire.
And get my veil wench: By my troth your ſorrow,
And the conſideration of mens humorous maddings,
Have put me into a ſerious contemplation. Enter Mirabell
Or. Come faith, let's ſit and think. and Bellure.
Roſ. That's all my buſineſs.
Mir. Why ſtandſt thou peeping here? thou great ſlug, forward.
Bel. She is there, peace.
Mir. Why ſtandſt thou here then,
Sneaking, and peaking, as thou would'ſt ſheal linnen?
Haſt thou not place and time?
Bel. I had a rare ſpeech
Studied, and almoſt ready, and your violence
Has beat it out of my brains.
Mir. Hang your rare ſpeeches,
Go me on like a man.
Bel. Let me ſet my Beard up.
How has Pinac performed?
Mir. He has won already:
He ſtands not thrumming of caps thus.
Bel. Lord, what ſhould I ail?
What a cold I have over my ſtomack; would I had ſome Hum,
Certain I have a great mind to be at her:

A mighty mind.

Mir. On fool.

Bel. Good words, I beſeech ye;
For I will not be abuſed by both.

Mir. Adieu, then,
I will not trouble you, I ſee you are valiant,
And work your own way.

Bel. Hiſt, hiſt, I will be rul'd
I will y'faith, I will go preſently:
Will ye forſake me now and leave me i'th' ſuds:
You know I am falſe-hearted this way; I beſeech ye,
Good ſweet Mirabell; I'll cut your throat if ye leave me,
Indeed I will ſweet heart.

Mir. I will be ready,
Still at thine elbow; take a mans heart to thee,
And ſpeak thy mind: the plainer ſtill the better.
She is a woman of that free behaviour,
Indeed that common curteſie, ſhe cannot deny thee;
Go bravely on.

Bel. Madam—keep cloſe about me,
Still at my back. Madam, ſweet Madam.

Roſ. Ha;
What noiſe is that, what ſaucy ſound to trouble me?

Mir. What ſayd ſhe?

Bel. I am ſaucy.

Mir. 'Tis the better.

Bel. She comes; muſt I be ſaucie ſtill?

Mir. More ſaucie.

Roſ. Still troubled with theſe vanities? heaven bleſs us;
What are we born to? would ye ſpeak with any of my people?
Go in, Sir, I am buſie.

Bel. This is not the ſure:
Is this two children at a Birth? I'll be hang'd then:
Mine was a merry Gentlewoman, talkt daintily,
Talkt of thoſe matters that befitted women;
This is a parcell-pray'r-book; I'm ſerv'd ſweetly;
And now I am to look too; I was prepar'd for th' other way.

Roſ. Do you know that man?

Or. Sure I have ſeen him, Lady.

Roſ. Me-thinks 'tis pitty ſuch a luſty fellow
Should wander up and down and want employment.

Bel. She takes me for a Rogue: you may do well Madam,
To ſtay this wanderer, and ſet him a work, forſooth,
He can do ſomething that may pleaſe your Ladiſhip.
I have heard of women that deſire good breedings,
Two at a birth, or ſo.

Roſ. The fellow's impudent.

Or. Sure he is crazed.

Roſ. I have heard of men too that have had good manners;
Sure this is want of grace; indeed 'tis great pitty;
The young man has been bred ſo ill; but this lewd Age
Is full of ſuch examples.

Bel. I am founder'd,
And some shall rue the setting of me on.
Mir. Ha? so bookish, Lady, is it possible?
Turn'd holy at the heart too? I'll be hang'd then:
Why this is such a feat, such an activitie,
Such fast and loose: a veyl too for your knavery?
O dio, dio!
Ros. What do you take me for, Sir?
Mir. An hypocrite, a wanton, a dissembler,
How e're ye seem, and thus ye are to be handled.
Mark me Bellure, and this you love, I know it.
Ros. Stand off, bold Sir.
Mir. You wear good clothes to this end,
Jewels, love Feasts, and Masques.
Ros. Ye are monstrous saucie.
Mir. All this to draw on fools? and thus, thus Lady,
Ye are to be lull'd.
Bel. Let her alone, I'll swinge ye else,
I will y'faith; for though I cannot skill o'this matter
My self, I will not see another do it before me,
And do it worse.
Ros. Away, ye are a vain thing;
You have travail'd far Sir, to return again
A windy and poor Bladder: you talk of women,
That are not worth the favour of a common one;
The grace of her grew in an Hospitall:
Against a thousand such blown fooleries
I am able to maintain good womens honours,
Their freedoms, and their fames, and I will do it.
Mir. She has almost struck me dumb too.
Ros. And declame
Against your base malicious tongues; your noyses;
For they are nothing else: You teach behaviours?
Or touch us for our freedoms? teach your selves manners,
Truth and sobriety, and live so clearly
That our lives may shine in ye; and then task us:
It seems ye are hot, the suburbs will supply ye,
Good women scorn such Gamesters; so I'll leave ye.
I am sorry to see this; 'faith Sir live fairly. Exit.
Mir. This woman, if she hold on, may be vertuous,
'Tis almost possible: we'll have a new day.
Bel. Ye brought me on, ye forced me to this foolery;
I am sham'd, I am scorn'd, I am flurted; yes, I am so:
Though I cannot talk to a woman like your worship,
And use my phrases, and my learned figures,
Yet I can fight with any man.
Mir. Fie.
Bel. I can, Sir,
And I will fight.
Mir. With whom?
Bel. With you, with any man;
For all men now will laugh at me.

Mir.

Mir. Pre'thee be moderate.
Bel. And I'll beat all men. Come.
Mir. I love thee dearly.
Bel. I beat all that love, Love has undone me;
Never tell me, I will not be a Hiſtory.
Mir. Thou art not.
Bel. 'Sfoot I will not; give me room,
And let me ſee the proudeſt of ye jeer me,
And I'll begin with you firſt.
Mir. Pre'thee Bellure;
If I do not ſatisfie thee ——
Bel. Well, look ye do:
But now I think on't better, 'tis impoſſible;
I muſt beat ſome body, I am maul'd my ſelf,
And I ought in Juſtice--- Mir. No, no, no, ye are couzen'd;
But walk, and let me talk to thee.
Bel. Talk wiſely,
And ſee that no man laugh upon no occaſion;
For I ſhall think then 'tis at me.
Mir. I warrant thee.
Bel. Nor no more talk of this.
Mir. Do'ſt think I am maddiſh?
Bel. I muſt needs fight yet; for I find it concerns me,
A pox on't, I muſt fight.
Mir. Y'faith thou ſhalt not. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter De Gard, and Leverdure, alias, Lugier.

de Ga. I Know ye are a Scholar, and can do wonders.
Lug. There's no great Scholarſhip belongs to this, Sir;
What I am, I am; I pitty your poor Siſter,
And heartily I hate theſe Travellers,
Theſe Gim-cracks, made of Mops, and Motions:
There's nothing in their houſes here but humings;
A Bee has more brains. I grieve, and vex too
The inſolent licentious carriage
Of this out-facing fellow, Mirabell,
And I am mad to ſee him prick his plumes up.
de Ga. His wrongs you partly know.
Lug. Do not you ſtir, Sir,
Since he has begun with wit, let wit revenge it;
Keep your ſword cloſe, wee'll cut his throat a new way.
I am aſham'd the Gentlewoman ſhould ſuffer
Such baſe lewd wrongs.
de Ga. I will be rul'd, he ſhall live,
And left to your revenge.
Lug. I, I, I'll fit him:
He makes a common ſcorn of handſom women;
Modeſty, and good manners are his May-games:

He,

He takes up Maidenheads with a new Commiſſion;
The Church, warrant's out of date: follow my Counſell
For I am zealous in the Cauſe.
de Gr. I will, Sir;
And will be ſtill directed: for the truth is
My Sword will make my ſiſter ſeem more monſtrous;
Beſides there is no honor won on Reprobates.
Leug. You are ith' right: The ſlight he has ſhew'd my Pupills Setts me a fire too: goe Ile prepare your Siſter,
And as I told ye.
de Gr. Yes all ſhalbe fit, Sir.
Leug. And ſeriouſly, and handſomely.
de Gr. I warrant ye.
Leug. A little councell more.
de Gr. 'Tis well.
Leug. Moſt ſtately.
See that obſerv'd; and then.
de Gr. I have ye every way.
Leug. Away then and be ready.
de Gr. With all ſpeed Sir. ——Exit.

Enter Lelia, Roſalice, Oriana.

Leug. Wee'll learne to travell too, may be beyond him
Good day, Faire beauties.
Lel. You have beautified us.
We thank ye Sir, ye have ſet us off moſt gallantly
With your grave precepts.
Roſ. We expected Husbands
Out of your Documents, and taught behaviours;
Excellent Husbands, thought men would run ſtarck mad on us
Men of all Ages, and all States: we expected
An Inundation of deſires, and Offers,
A Torrent of trym Suitors: all we did,
Or ſaid, or purpos'd to be Spels about us,
Spells to provoake.
Lel. Ye have provoak'd us finely,
We follow'd your directions, we did rarely,
We were Stately, Coy, Demure, Careleſs, Light, Giddy,
And plai'd at all points: This you ſwore would Carry.
Roſ. We made Love, and Contemn'd Love. Now ſeemd holy
With ſuch a reverent put-on Reſervation
Which could not miſſe according to your Principles,
Now gave more hope again. Now cloſe, Now publick,
Still up and down, we beate it like a Billowe;
And ever thoſe Behaviours you read to us,
Subtile, and new. But all this will not help us.
Lel. They help to hinder us of all Acquaintance,
They have frighted off all Friends: what am I better
For all my Learning, if I love a Dunce,
A handſome dunce? to what uſe ſerves my Reading,
You ſhould have taught me what belongs to Horſes,
Doggs, dice, Hawkes, Banketts, maſks, free and faire Meetings
To have ſtudied Gownes and Dreſſings.
Leug. Ye are not mad ſure,

Ros. We shalbe if we follow your encouragements;
I'le take mine own way now:
Lel. And I my Fortune.
We may live Maids else till the Moon drop Milstones;
I see your modest Women are tak'en for Monsters,
A Dowry of good breeding is worth nothing.
Leng. Since ye take it so toth' heart, pray'ye give me leave yet
And ye shall see how I'le convert this Heretique;
Mark how this Mirabel—
Lel. Name him no more:
For, though I long for a husband, I hate him,
And would be married sooner to a Monkey,
Or to a Jack of Straw, then such a Juggler.
Ros. I am of that minde too; he is too nimble,
And plays at fast and loose too learnedly
For a plain-meaning Woman; thats the truth on't.
Here's one too, that we love well, would be angry,
And reason why: No, no, we will not trouble ye,
Nor him, at this time: may he make you happy.
We'll turn our selves loose now, to our faire Fortunes,
And the down-right way.
Lel. The winning-way wee'll follow,
Wee'll bait, that men may bite fair, and not be frighted;
Yet wee'll not be carryed so cheap neither: wee'll have som sport,
Some mad-Morrysse or other for our money (I utor).
Leng. 'Tis like enough: prosper your own Devices;
Ye are old enough to Choose: But for this Gentlewomen
So please her, give me leave.
Ori. I shall be glad Sir,
To finde a Friend, whose pity may direct me.
Leng. Ile doe my best, and faithfully deale for ye;
But then ye must be ruled.
Ori. In all, I vow to ye.
Ros. Doe, doe: he has a lucky hand somtimes, Ile assure ye:
And hunts the recovery of a lost Lover deadly.
Leng. You must away straight.
Ori. Yes.
Leng. And Ile instruct ye:
Here ye are [illegible]
Ori. By your leave, Sweet Ladies,
And all our Fortunes, arrive at our own wishes.
Lel. Amen, Amen.
Leng. I must borrow your man.
Lel. 'Pray take him;
He is within: to doe her good, take any thing,
Take us, and all.
Leng. No doubt ye may finde Takers;
And so wee'll leave ye to your own disposes. Exit.
Lel. Now which way, Wench.
Ros. Wee'll goe a brave way; fear not:
A safe, and sure way too; and yet a by-way,
I must confess I have a great minde to be married.

Lel. So have I too, a grudging of good-will that way;
And would as fain be dispatch'd. But this Monsieur Quicksilver.
Ros. No, no: we'll bar him, by, and Mayne: Let him trample;
There is no safety in his Surquedrie:
An Army-Roiall of Women, are too few for him,
He keeps a Journall of his Gentleness,
And will go near to print his fair Dispatches,
And call it his Triumph over Time and Women:
Let him pass out of memory: what think ye
Of his two Companions?
Lel. Pinac methinks is reasonable;
A little Modestie he has brought home with him,
And might be taught in time some handsome duty.
Ros. They say he is a Wencher too.
Lel. I like him better:
A free light Touch or two becomes a Gentleman,
And sets him seemly off: so he exceed not,
But keep his Compass, clear he may be lookt at;
I would not marry a man that must be taught,
And conjur'd up with Kisses; the best Game
Is plaid still by the best Gamesters.
Ros. Fie upon thee
What talk hast thou!
Lel. Are not we alone, and merry?
Why should we be asham'd to speak what we think? thy Gentleman
The tall fat Fellow, he that came to see thee.
Ros. Is't not a goodly man?
Lel. A wondrous goodly!
'Has weight enough I warrant thee: Mercy upon me;
What a Serpent wilt thou seem under such a Sir George.
Ros. Thou art a Fool; give me a man brings Mettle,
Brings substance with him; needs no Brothes to Lure him:
These little Fellows shew like Fleas in boxes,
Hop up and down, and keep a stir to vex us;
Give me the puissant Pike, take you the small Shot.
Lel. Of a great thing I have not seen a Duller,
Therefore methinks, sweet Sister-
Ros. Peace; he's modest:
A bashfulness, which is a point of grace, Wench:
But when these Fellows come to moulding, Sister,
To heat, and handling; as I live, I like him;
And methinks I could form him.
Lel. Peace: the Fire-drake.
Enter Mirabell.
Mir. 'Bless ye sweet Beauties: sweet incomparable Ladies:
Sweet wits: sweet humours: 'Bless you, Learned Lady,
And you, most holy Nun; 'Bless your Devotions,
Lel. And 'bless your brains, Sir, your most pregnant brains, Sir,
They are in Travail, may they be delivered
Of a most hopefull Wild-Goose.
Ros. 'Bless your manhood:
They say ye are a Gentleman of Action,
A fare accomplish'd man; and a rare Engineer,

You have a trick to blow up Maidenheads,
A ſubtle trick, they ſay abroad.
Mir. I have Lady.
Roſ. And often glory in their Ruines.
Mir. Yes forſooth;
I have a ſpeedy trick: pleaſe you to try it?
My Engine will diſpatch ye inſtantly.
Roſ. I would I were a Woman, Sir, fit for ye,
As there be ſuch, no doubt, may Engine you too;
May with a Counter-mine blow up your valour:
But in good faith, Sir, we are both too honeſt,
And the plague is, we cannot be perſwaded:
For, look ye: if we thought it were a glory
To be the laſt of all your lovely Ladies.
Mir. Come, come; leave prating: this has ſpoil'd your Market;
This pride, and puffe-up heart, will make ye faſt (Ladies)
Faſt, when ye are hungry too.
Roſ. The more our pain, Sir.
Lel. The more our health, I hope too.
Mir. Your behaviours
Have made men ſtand amaz'd; thoſe men that lov'd ye;
Men of fair States and parts; your ſtrange conventions
Into I know not what, nor how, nor wherefore;
Your ſcorns of thoſe that came to viſit ye;
Your ſtudied Whim-whams; and your fine ſet Faces:
What have theſe got ye? proud, and harſh opinions:
A Travail'd-Monſieur, was the ſtrangeſt Creature,
The wildeſt Monſter to be wondred at:
His Perſon made a publique Scoff, his Knowledge,
(As if he had been bred 'mongſt Bears or Bandoggs) Shunn'd and avoided: his converſation ſnuft at.
What Harveſt brings all this?
Roſ. I pray ye proceed, Sir.
Mir. Now ye ſhall ſee in what eſteem a Travailer,
An under ſtanding Gentleman, and a Monſieur
Is to be held, and to your greifes confeſs it,
Both to your greifes, and gaules.
Lel. In what I pray ye, Sir?
We would be glad to underſtand your Excellence
Mir. Goe on, (ſweet Ladies) it becomes ye rarely
For me, I have bleſt me from ye, ſcoff on, ſeriouſly,
And note the Man ye mock'd: you, (Lady Learning)
Note the poore Traveller, that came to viſit ye,
That flat unfurniſh'd Fellow: note him throughly;
You may chance to ſee him anon.
Lel. 'Tis very likely
Mir. And ſee him Courted, by a Travell'd Lady,
Held deer, and honour'd by a vertuous virgin,
May be a Beautie, not far ſhort of yours, a either
It may be, cleerer.
Lel. Not unlikely
Mir. Younger:

As killing eyes as yours: a wit as poynant
May be, a State to that may top your Fortune;
Enquire how she thinks of him, how she holds him;
His good parts; in what precious prices ready;
Being a stranger to him, how she courts him;
A stranger to his Nation too, how she dotes on him:
Enquire of this; be sick to know: Curse, Lady,
And keep your Chamber: cry, and curse, sweet one,
A thousand in yearly land; nobl'd, well friended:
Travell'd, and highly followed for her fashions.

Lel. 'Bless his good Fortune, Sir.

Mir. This scurvy fellow;
I think they call his name Pinac; this serving-man
That brought ye Venison, as I take it, Madam,
Note but this Scab; 'tis strange that this course creature,
That has no more set off, but his jugglings,
His travell'd tricks.

Lel. Good, sir, I grieve not at him,
Nor envy not his Fortune: yet I wonder,
He's handsom; yet I see no such perfection.

Mir. Would I had his Fortune: for 'tis a woman
Of that sweet temper'd nature, and that judgment,
Besides her state, that care, clear understanding,
And such a wife to bless him.

Ros. Pray ye whence is she?

Mir. Of England and a most accomplish'd Lady,
So modest that mens eies are fixed at her, Enter a Boy.
And such a noble carriage. How now Sirrah?

Boy. Sir, the great English Lady.

Mir. What of her, sir?

Boy. Has newly left her Coach, and coming this way,
Where you may see her plain: Monsieur Pinac,
The onely man that leades her.

Enter Pinac, Mariana, and Attendants.

Mir. He is much honored;
Would I had such a favour: now vex Ladies,
Envy, and vex, and raile.

Ros. Ye are short of us, Sir.

Mir. 'Bless your fair Fortune, sir.

Pi. I Nobly thank ye.

Mir. Is she married, friend?

Pi. No, no.

Mir. A goodly Lady;
A sweet and delicate Aspect: mark, mark, and wonder!
Hast thou any hope of her?

Pi. A little.

Mir. Follow close then:
Loose not that hope.

Pi. To you, Sir.

Mir. Gentle Lady,

Ros. She is fair indeed.

Lel. I have seen a fairer, yet
She is well.

Ros. Her clothes fit handsome too.
Lel. She dresses prettily.
Ros. And by my faith she is rich, she looks stil sweeter.
A well-bred woman, I warrant her.
Lel. Do you hear, Sir;
May I crave this Gentlewomans name?
Pi. Mariana, Lady.
Lel. I will not say how ye a quarel Monsieur
For making me your Stale: a noble Gentleman
Would have had more curtesie; at least, more faith,
Then to turn of his mistris at first trial:
You know not what respect I might have shew'd ye;
I finde ye have worth.
Pi. I cannot stay to answer ye;
Ye see my charge: I am beholding to ye
For all your merry tricks ye put upon me,
Your bobs, and base accounts: I came to love ye,
To woo ye, and to serve ye; I am much endebted to ye
For dancing me off my legs, and then for walking me;
For telling me strange tales I never heard of,
More to abuse me; for mistaking me,
When ye both knew I was a Gentleman,
And one deserv'd as rich a match as you are.
Lel. Be not so bitter, Sir.
Pi. You see this Lady:
She is young enough, and fair enough to please me,
A woman of a loving minde, a quiet,
And one that weighs the worth of him that loves her,
I am content with this, and bless my Fortune,
Your curious Wits, and Beauties.
Lel. Faith see me once more.
Pi. I dare not trouble ye.
Lel. May I speak to your Lady?
Pi. I pray ye content your self: I know ye are bitter,
And in your bitterness, ye may abuse her;
Which if she comes to know, (for she understands ye not)
It may breed such a quarrel to your kindred,
And such an indiscretion fling on you too;
For she is Nobly friended.
Lel. I could eat her.
Pi. Rest as ye are, a modest noble Gentlewoman,
And afford your honest neighbours som of your prayers. Exit.
Mir. What think you now?
Lel. Faith she's a pretty Whiting;
She has got a pretty catch too.
Mir. You are angry;
Monstrous angry now; grievously angry;
And the pretty heart does swell now.
Lel. No in troth, sir.
Mir. And it will cry anon; a pox upon it;
And it will curse it self: and eat no meat, Lady;
And it will fight.

Lel. Indeed you are miſtaken;
It will be very merry.
Roſ. Why, ſir, do you think
There are no more men living, nor no handſomer
Then he, or you; By this light there be ten thouſand
Ten thouſand thouſand: comfort your ſelf, dear Monſieur,
Faces, and Bodies, Wits, and all Abilliments
There are ſo many we regard 'em not.
Enter Bellure, and two Gentlemen.
Mir. That ſuch a noble Lady, I could burſt now.
So far above ſuch trifles?
Bel. You did laugh at me,
And I know why ye laughed.
1. Gen. I pray ye be ſatisfied;
If we did laugh, we had ſome private reaſon,
And not at you.
2. Gen. Alas, we know you not, ſir.
Bel. I'll make you know me; ſet your faces ſoberly;
Stand this way, and look ſad; I'll be no May-game;
Sadder; demurer yet.
Roſ. What's the matter?
What ailes this Gentleman?
Bel. go off now backward, that I may behold ye;
And not a ſimper on you lives.
Lel. He's mad ſure.
Bel. Do you obſerve me too?
Mir. I may look on ye.
Bel. Why do you grin? I know your minde.
Mir. You do not.
You are ſtrangely humorous: Is there no mirth, nor pleaſure,
But you muſt be the object?
Bel. Mark, and obſerve me;
Where ever I am nam'd; I
The very word ſhall raiſe a general ſadneſs,
For the diſgrace this ſcurvy woman did me;
This proud pert thing; take heed ye laugh not at me;
Provoke me not, take heed.
Roſ. I would fain pleaſe ye;
Do any thing to keep ye quiet.
Bel. Hear me,
Till I receive a ſatisfaction
Equal to the diſgrace, and ſcorn ye gave me;
Ye are a wreatched woman; till thou woo'ſt me,
And I ſcorn thee aſmuch, as, ſeriouſly,
Gear, and abuſe thee; ask what Gill thou art;
Or any baſer name; I will proclaim thee;
I will ſo ſing thy vertue; ſo be-paint thee,
Roſ. Nay, good ſir, be more modeſt.
Bel. Do you laugh again?
Becauſe ye are a woman ye are lawleſs,
And out of compaſs of an honeſt anger.
Roſ. Good ſir, have a better belief of me.

Lel. Away deare ſiſter. Exit.
Mir. Is not this better now, this ſeeming madneſs,
Then falling out with your friends.
Bel. Have I not ſought her?
Mir. Into her sight twice, I warrant thee: follow this humor,
And thou ſhalt ſee her proſperouſly 'twil guide thee.
Bel. I am glad I have found a way to woo yet, I was afraid once
I never ſhould have made a civill Suiter.
Well, I'le about it ſtill. Exit.
Mir. Doe, doe, and proſper.
What ſport do I make with theſe fools? What pleaſure Feeds me, and fats my ſides at their poor innocence? Enter Lover.
Wooing and wiving, hang it: give me mirth, Amor, des Langues.
Witty and dainty mirth: I ſhall grow in love ſure Mr. Illiard.
With mine own happy head. Who's this? To me, Sir?
What youth is this?
Les. Yes, Sir, I would ſpeak with you,
If your name be Monſieur Mirabel.
Mir. Ye have hit it.
Your buſineſſe, I beſeech yee.
Les. This it is, Sir.
There is a Gentlewoman hath long time affected yee,
And lov'd ye dearly.
Mir. Turn over, and end that ſtory,
'Tis long enough: I have no faith in women, Sir.
Les. It ſeems ſo, Sir: I do not come to woo for her,
Or ſing her praiſes, though ſhe well deſerve 'em.
I come to tell ye, ye have been cruel to her,
Unkind and cruell, falſer of faith, and careleſſe,
Taking more pleaſure in abuſing her,
Wreſting her honour to your wild diſpoſes,
Then noble in requiting her affection:
Which, as ye are a man, I muſt deſire ye
(A Gentleman of rank) not to perſiſt in,
No more to load her fair name with your injuries.
Mir. Why, I beſeech ye, Sir?
Les. Good Sir, I'le tell ye.
And I'le be ſhort: I'le tell yee, becauſe I love ye,
Becauſe I would have you ſhun the ſhame may follow it:
There is a noble man, new come to Town, Sir,
A noble and a great man that affects her,
A Countreyman of mine, a brave Lorayan,
Nephew to th'Duke and ſo much honours her,
That 'twill be dangerous to purſue your old way,
To touch at any thing concerns her honour,
Believe, moſt dangerous; her name is Orlans,
And this great man will marry her: take heed, Sir;
For howſoev'r her bro'her, a ſtaid Gentleman,
Lets things paſſe upon better hopes, this Lord, Sir,
Is of that fiery, and that poynant metall,
(Eſpecially provok'd on by affection)
That 'twill be hard: but you are wiſe.

Mir.

Mir. A Lord, sir?
Lev. Yes, and a noble Lord.
Mir. 'Send her good fortune.
This will not stir her Lord; a Barronnesse,
Say ye so; say ye so: by'r Lady, a brave title;
Top, and top gallant now; 'save her great Ladiship.
I was a poor servant of hers, I must confess, Sir;
And in those daies, I thought I might be jovy,
And make a little bold to call into her:
But Basto, now; I know my rules and distance;
Yet, if she want an Usher; such an implement;
One that is throughly pac'd, a clean made gentleman;
Can hold a hanging up; with approbation
Plant his Hat formally, and wait with patience
I do beseech you, sir.
Lug. Sir, leave your scoffing;
And as ye are a Gentleman, deal fairly:
I have given ye a friends councel, so I'll leave ye.
Mir. But hark ye, hark ye, sir; is't possible
I may beleeve what you say?
Lug. You may chuse, sir.
Mir. No Baites? No Fish-hooks, sir? No Gins? No Nooses?
No Pitfals to catch Puppies?
Lug. I tell ye certain;
You may beleeve; if not, stand to the danger. Exit.
Mir. A Lord of Sewy (sirs he) The Dukes Nephew?
A man so mighty? By Lady a fair marriage;
By my faith, a handsom Fortune: I must leave prating;
For to confess the truth, I have abused her,
For which I should be sorry; but that will seem scurvy;
I must confess, she was ever since I knew her
As modest, as she was fair: I am sure she lov'd me;
Her means good; and her breeding excellent;
And for my sake she has refus'd fair matches:
I may play the fool finely. Stay who are these? Enter De-Gard,
'Tis she, I am sure; and that the lord it should seem, Oriana, and
He carries a fair Port; is a handsom man too: Attendants.
I do begin to feel, I am a Coxcomb.
Or. Good my Lord, chuse a nobler: for I know
I am so far below your rank and Honor,
That what ye can say this way, I must credit,
But spoken to beget your self sport: Alas, Sir,
I am so far off, from deserving you,
My Beauty so unfit for your Affection,
That I am grown the scorn of common Railers,
Of such injurious Things, that when they cannot Reach at my person, lie with my reputation:
I am poor besides.
De-G. Ye are all wealth and goodness;
And none but such as are the scum of men,
The Ulcers of an honest State, Spight-weavers,
That live on poyson onely, like swoln Spiders,

Dare once profane ſuch excellence, ſuch ſweetneſs.
Mir. This man ſpeaks loud indeed.
De-G. Name but the men, Lady;
Let me but know theſe poor, and baſe depravers;
Lay but to my revenge their perſons open,
And you ſhall ſee how ſuddenly, how fully
For your moſt Beautious ſake, how direfully
I'll handle their deſpights. Is this thing one?
Be what he will.
Mir. Sir.
De-G. Dare your malicious tongue, ſir?
Mir. I know you not; nor what ye mean.
Or. Good my Lord.
De-G. If he, or any he.
Or. I beſeech your Honor.
This Gentleman's a ſtranger to my knowledge,
And no doubt, ſir, a worthy man.
De-G. Your mercy;
But had ye been attaint of your Honor;
A blaſter of thoſe beauties raign within ye;
But we ſhall finde a fitter time: dear Lady,
As ſoon as I have freed ye from your Guardian,
And done ſome honour'd offices unto ye,
I'll take ye with thoſe faults the world flings on ye;
And dearer then the whole world I'll eſteem ye.
Mir. This is a thundring Lord; I am glad I ſcap'd him:
How lovingly the wench diſclaim'd my villany?
I am vext now heartily that he ſhall have her;
Not that I care to marry, or to loſe her;
But that this Bilbo-Lord ſhall reap that Maiden-head
That was my due; that he ſhall rig and top her;
Ide give a thouſand Crowns now, he might miſs her.

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Nay, if I bear your blowes, and keep your councel,
You have good luck, Sir; I'll teach ye to ſtrike lighter.
Mir. Come hether, honeſt Fellow; canſt thou tell me
Where this great Lord lies? This Savoy Lord? Thou met'ſt him;
He now went by thee certain.
Ser. Yes, he did, Sir;
I know him; and I know you are fool'd.
Mir. Come hether.
Here's all this, give me truth.
Ser. Not for your money;
(And yet that may do much) but I have been beaten:
And by the worſhipful Contrivers beaten, and I'll tel ye;
This is no Lord, no Savoy Lord.
Mir. Go forward.
Ser. This is a Trick, and put upon ye groſly
By one Lugier; the Lord is Monſieur De-Gard, Sir;
An honeſt Gentleman, and a neighbour here;
Their ends you underſtand better then I, ſure.
Mir. Now I know him.

Know him now plain.
Ser. I have discharg'd my Colours; so God by ye, sir. Exit.
Mir. What a purblinde Puppy was I; now I remember him.
All the whole cast on's face, though 'twere umber'd,
And mask'd with patches: what a dunder-whelp
To let him domineer thus: how he strutted,
And what a load of Lord he clapt upon him?
Would I had him here again, I would so bounce him,
I would so thank his Lordship for his lewd plot:
Do they think to carry it away, with a great band made of bird-spots.
And a pair of pin-buttockt breeches? Ha! 'Tis he again.
He comes, he comes, he comes; have at him. Enter De-Gard, Sings. My Savoy Lord, why dost thou frown on me? Oriana, &c.
And will that favour never sweeter be?
Wilt thou I say, for ever play the fool?
De-Gard, be wise, and Savoy go to School.
My Lord De-Gard, I thank ye for your Antick,
My Lady bright, that will be sometime Frantick;
You worthy Train, that wait upon this Pair,
'Send you more wit, and they a bouncing Baire;
And so I take my humble leave of your honors. Exit.
De-G. We are discover'd, there's no remedy;
Lelia, Biancha's man upon my life,
In stubbornness, because Lugier corrected him.
(A shameless Slaves-plague on him for a Rascal.)
Or. I was in a perfect hope; the bane on't is now;
He will make mirth on mirth, to persecute us.
De-G. We must be patient, I am vext to the proof too.
I'll try once more; then if I fail: Hear's one speaks.
Or. Let me be lost, and scorn'd first.
De-G. Well, we'll consider.
Away, and let me shift, I shall be hooted else. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus, Scæn. 1.

Enter Lugier, Lelia, Servants.

Lug. FAint not; but do as I direct ye, trust me;
Beleeve me too, for what I have told ye, (Lady)
As true as you are Lelia, is Authentick;
I know it; I have found it; 'tis a poor courage
Flies off for one repulse; these Travellers
Shall finde before we have done, a home-spun wit,
A plain French understanding may cope with 'em;
They have had the better yet, thank your sweet Squire, here;
And let 'em brag: You would be reveng'd?
Lel. Yes surely.
Lug. And married too?
Lel. I think so.

Leag. Then be Counsel'd;
You know how to proceed: I have other Irons
Heating as well as yours: and I will strike
Three blowes with one Stone home, be rul'd, and hapie,
And so I leave yee. Now is the time.
Lel. I am ready.
If he doe come to do me.
Ser. Will ye stand here,
And let the people think, ye are God knows what, Mistris,
Let Boyes, and Prentizes presume upon ye.
Lel. Pre'thee hold thy peace.
Ser. Stand at his dore, that hates ye?
Lel. Pre'thee leave prating.
Ser. 'Pray ye goe to th' Tavern. Ile give ye a Pint of wine there;
If any of the Mad-cap Gentlemen should come by
That take up women upon speciall warrant,
You were in a wise case now.

Enter, Mirabell, Pinac, Mariana, Priest, Attendants.

Lel. Give me the Garland,
And wait you here.
Mir. She is here to seeke thee, Sirrah.
I told thee what would follow; she is mad, for thee;
Shew, and advance. So early stirring Lady,
It shewes a busie mind, a fancie troubled:
A willowgh Garland too. Is't possible,
'Tis pitty so much Beautie should lie mustie,
But 'tis not to be help'd now.
Lel. The more's my Miserie
Good fortune to ye (Ladie) you deserve it:
To me: too late Repentance; I have sought it;
I doe not envy, though I greive a little,
You are Mistris of that happines, those Joyes
That might have bin, had I bin wise: but fortune.
Pi. She understands ye not, 'pray ye doe not trouble her;
And do not crosse me like a Hare thus, 'tis as ominous.
Lel. I come not to upbraid, your Lavitie
Though ye made shew of Love, and though I lik'd ye
To claime an Interest; we are yet both Strangers,
But what we might have bin, had you persever'd, Sir,
To be an eye-sore to your loving Lady;
This garland shewes, I give my self forsaken;
(Yet She must pardon me, 'tis most unwillingly:)
And all the power and interest I had in ye?
As I perswade my self, somewhat ye Lov'd me;
Thus patiently I render up, I offer
To her that must enjoy ye: and so blesse ye;
Onely, I heartily desire this Courtesie,
And would not be denide: to wait upon ye
This day, to see ye tide, then no more trouble ye.
Pi. It need not, Ladie.
Lel. Good, Sir, grant me so much.
Pi. 'Tis privat, and we make no Invitation.

Lel. My presence, sir, shall not proclaim it publick.
Pi. May be 'tis not in Town.
Lel. I have a Coach, sir.
And a most ready will to do you service.
Mir. Strike now or never; make it sure: I tell thee,
She will hang her self, if she have thee not.
Pi. 'Pray ye, sir,
Entertain my noble mistris: onely a word or two
With this importunate woman, and I'll relieve ye.
Now ye see what your flings are, and your fancies,
Your States, and your wild stubbornes, now ye finde
What 'tis to gird and kick at mens fair services,
To raise your pride to such a pitch, and glory
That goodness shews like Gnats, scorn'd under ye,
'Tis ugly, naught, a self-will in a woman,
Chain'd to an over-weening thought, is Pestilent,
Murthers fair Fortune first, Then fair opinion?
There stands a Patern, a true patient Patern,
Humble, and sweet.
Lel. I can but grieve my ignorance.
Repentance some say too, is the best Sacrifice;
For sure, Sir, if my chance had been so happy,
(As I confess I was mine own destroyer)
As to have arrived at you; I will not prophesie,
But certain, as I think, I should have pleas'd ye;
Have made ye as much wonder at my curtesie,
My love, and duty; as I have disheartned ye,
Some hours we have of youth, and some of folly;
And being free-born Maides, we take a liberty,
And to maintain that, sometimes we strain highly.
Pi. Now ye talk reason.
Lel. But being yoak'd, and govern'd,
Married, and those light vanities purg'd from us;
How fair we grow, how gentle, and how tender
We twine about those loves that shoot up with us?
A sullen woman fear, that talks not to ye,
She has a sad and darken'd soul, loves dully;
A merry and a free wench, give her liberty;
Beleeve her in the lightest form she appears to ye;
Beleeve her excellent, though she dis-please ye;
Let but those fits and flashes pass, she will shew to ye,
As Jewels rub'd from dust, or Gold new burnish'd:
Such had I been, had you beleev'd.
Pho Is't possible.
Lel. And to your happiness, I dare assure ye
If True love be accounted so; your pleasure,
Your will, and your command had eyed my Motions:
But that hopes gone; I know you are young, and giddy,
And till you have a Wife can govern with ye,
You saile upon this world Sea, light and empty;
Your Bark in danger daily; 'tis not the name neither
Of Wife can steer ye; but the noble nature,

The dilligence, the Care, the Love, the Patience,
She makes the Pilat, and preſerves the Husband,
That knowes, and reckons every Ribb, he is built on,
But this I tell ye, to my ſhame.

Pi. I admire ye,
And now am ſorry, that I ayme beyond ye.

Mir. So, ſo, ſo: faire and ſoftly. She is thine own (Boy)
She comes now, without Lure.

Pi. But that it muſt needes
Be reckon'd to me as a wantonneſſe,
Or worſſe, a Madneſſe, to forſake a Bleſſing,
A Bleſſing of that hope.

Lel. I dare not urge ye;
And yet deare, Sir.

Pi. 'Tis moſt certain, I had rather,
If 'twere in mine owne Choice, for you are my Country-woman,
A Neighbour here borne by me, She a Stranger;
And who knowes how her Friends?

Lel. Doe as you pleaſe, Sir,
If ye be faſt: not all the world: I love ye,
'Tis moſt true: and cleer, I would perſwade ye,
And I ſhall love ye ſtill.

Pi. Goe get before me:
So much ye have won upon me: doe it preſently:
Here's a Preiſt ready: Ile have you.

Lel. not now, Sir,
No, you ſhall pardon me: advance your Lady,
I dare not hinder your moſt high preferment,
'Tis honor enough for me, I have unmask'd ye.

Pi. How's that.

Lel. I have caught ye, Sir; alas, I am no States-woman,
Nor no great Traveller, yet I have found ye,
I have found your Lady too: your beauteous Lady;
I have found her Birth, and Breeding too: her diſciplin:
Who brought her over, and who kept your Lady:
And when he laid her by, what vertuous Nunnery
Received her in: I have found all theſe: are ye blanck now, Methinks ſuch travel'd wiſdomes ſhould not foole thus:
Such excellent Indiſcretions.

Mir. How could ſhe know this?

Lel. 'Tis true ſhe is Engliſh borne: but moſt part French now,
And ſo I hope you will find her, to your comfort,
Alas, I am ignorant of what, She coſt ye:
The price of theſe hired Clothes I doe not know Gentlemen;
Thoſe Jewells are the Broakers, how ye ſtand bound for 'em.

Pi. Will you make this good?

Lel. Yes, yes, and to her face, Sir,
That ſhe is an Engliſh whore, a kind of fling duſt
One of your London Light o'Lovers: a right one,
Came over in thin Pumps, and half a Petticoat;
One faith, and one Smock, with a broken Haberdaſher;
I know all this, without a Conjurer:
Her name is Jumping-Jone, an ancient Sin-Weaver;

She

She was first a Ladies Chamber-maid, there slip'd
And broke her leg above the knee: departed
And set up shop her self. Stood the fierce Conflicts
Of many a furious Tearme; there lost her Colours,
And last shipt over hither.
Mir. We are betray'd.
Lel. Doe you come to fright me with this Misterie?
To stirre me with a stink none can endure, Sir?
I pray ye proceed, the Wedding will becom ye,
Who gives the Lady? you? an excellent Father:
A carefull man, and one that knows a Beautie,
'Send ye faire shipping, Sir, and so Ile leave ye;
Be wise and manly, then I may chance to love ye. ——Exit.
Mir. As I live I am asham'd, this wench has reach'd me,
Monstrous asham'd, but there's no remedie,
This skew'd-eyde Carren.
Pi. This I suspected ever,
Come, Come, uncase, we have no more use of ye;
Your Clothes, must back againe.
Maria. Sir, ye shall pardon me:
'Tis not our English use to be degraded:
If you will visit me and take your venture,
You shall have pleasure for your properties;
And so sweet heart.
Mir. Let her goe, and the Devill goe with her;
We have never better luck with these preludiums:
Come, be not daunted: think she is but a woman,
And let her have the devills witt, wee'll reach her. ——Exit.

Scæn 2.

Enter Rosalure, and Lugier.

Ros. Ye have now redeem'd my good opinion (Tutor,)
And ye stand faire again.
Lug. I can but labour,
And sweat in your Affaires: I am sure Bellure
Wilbe here instantly, and use his Anger
His wonted harshnes.
Ros. I hope he will not beate me.
Lug. No sure; he has more manners. Be you ready.
Ros. Yes, yes, I am: and am resolv'd to fit him,
With patience to out-doe all he can offer;
But how do's Orlana?
Lug. Worse, and worse still:
There is a sad house for her: she is now
Poore Ladie, utterly distracted.
Ros. Pittie:
Infinite pittie: 'tis a handsom Ladie,
That Mirabel's a Beast, worse then a Monster.
If this affliction work not.

Enter Lelia, Bianche.

Lel. Are ye readie?
Bellure is comming on, here, hard behind me,
I have no leysure to relate my Fortune.

Onely

Onely I wish you may come off as handsomely,
Upon the sign you know what. Exit.
Enter Bellure.
Ros. Well, well, leave me,
Bel. How now?
Ros. Ye are welcome, sir.
Bel. 'Tis well ye have manners:
That Curt sy again, and hold your Countenance staidly;
That looks too light; take heed: so, sit ye down now,
And to confirm me that your gall is gone,
Your bitterness dispers'd, for so I'll have it;
Look on me stedfastly; and whatsoe'er I say to ye,
Move not, nor alter in your face, ye are gon then;
For if you do express the least distaste,
Or shew an angry wrinkle; mark me, woman,
We are now alone, I will so conjure thee:
The third part of my Execution
Cannot be spoke.
Ros. I am at your dispose, sir.
Bel. Now rise, and woo me a little, let me hear that faculty;
But touch me not; nor do not lie, I charge ye.
Begin now.
Ros. If so mean and poor a Beauty
May ever hope the grace.
Bel. Ye Cog, ye flatter
Like a lew'd thing, ye lie: may hope that grace?
Why, what grace canst thou hope for? Answer not,
For if thou dost, and lyest again, I'll swindge thee;
Do not I know thee, for a pestilent woman?
A proud at both ends? Be not angry;
Nor stir not o' your life?
Ros. I am counseld, sir.
Bel. Art thou not now, (confess, for I'll have the truth out)
As much unworthy of a man of merit,
Or any of ye all? Nay of meer man?
Though he were crooked, cold, all wants upon him;
Nay of any dishonest thing, that bears that figure,
As Devils are of mercy?
Ros. We are unworthy.
Bel. Stick to that truth, and it may chance to save thee;
And is it not our bounty that we take ye?
That we are troubled, vex'd, or tortur'd with ye?
Our meer, and special bounty?
Ros. Yes.
Bel. Our pitty,
That for your wickedness we swindge ye soundly;
Your stubbornness and stout hearts, we belabour ye?
Answer, to that?
Ros. I do confess your pitty.
Bel. And dost not thou deserve in thine own person?
(Thou Impudent, thou Pert; do not change countenance;)
Ros. I dare not, sir.
Bel. For if ye do.

Ros.

Ros. I am ſetled.
Bel. Thou Wag-tail, Peacock, Puppy; look on me:
I am a Gentleman.
Ros. It ſeems no leſs, ſir.
Bel. And dareſt thou in thy Surquedry?
Ros. I beſeech ye.
It was my weakneſs, ſir; I did not view ye;
I took not notice of your noble parts;
Nor call'd your perſon, nor your proper faſhion.
Bel. This is ſome amendes yet.
Ros. I ſhall mend, ſir, daily.
And ſtudy to deſerve.
Bel. Come a little neerer:
Canſt thou repent thy Villany?
Ros. Moſt ſeriouſly.
Bel. And be aſham'd?
Ros. I am aſham'd.
Bel. Cry.
Ros. It will be hard to do, ſir.
Bel. Cry now inſtantly;
Cry monſtrouſly, that all the Town may hear thee;
Cry ſeriouſly; as if thou hadſt loſt thy Monkey;
And as I like thy Tears. Enter Lilia and four women laughing.
Ros. Now.
Bel. How? How? do ye jear me?
Have ye broke your bounds again Dame?
Ros. Yes, and laugh at ye;
And laugh moſt heartily.
Bel. What are theſe, Whirl-winds?
Is Hell broke looſe, and all the Furies flutter'd?
Am I greas'd once again?
Ros. Yes indeed are ye;
And once again ye ſhall be, if ye quarrel:
Do you come to vent your fury on a Virgin?
Is this your manhood, ſir?
1. Wo. Let him do his beſt:
Let's ſee the utmoſt of his indignation:
I long to ſee him angry: come, proceed, ſir.
Hang him, he dares not ſtir; a man of Timber.
2. Wo. Come hither to fright Maids, with thy Bul-faces?
To threaten Gentlewomen? Thou a man? A May-pole.
A great dry Pudding.
3. Wo. Come, come, do your worſt, ſir;
Be angry if thou dar'ſt.
Bel. The Lord deliver me.
4. Wo. Do but look ſcurvily upon this Lady,
Or give us one foul word. We are all miſtaken;
This is ſome mighty Dairy-Maid in mans clothes.
Lil. I am of that minde too.
Bel. What will they do to me?
Lil. And hired to come and abuſe us; a man has manners;
A Gentleman, Civility, and Breeding:

Some Tinkers Trull with a beard glew'd on.
1. Wo. Let's ſearch him;
And as we finde him.
Bel. Let me but depart from ye,
Sweet Chriſtian women.
Lel. Hear the Thing ſpeak, Neighbours.
Bel. 'Tis but a ſmall requeſt: if ere I trouble ye,
If ere I talk again of beating Women,
Or beating any thing that can but turn to me;
Of ever thinking of a handſom Lady
But vertuouſly and well: of ever ſpeaking
But to her honor: This I'le promiſe ye,
I will take Rhubarb; and purge Choler mainly,
Abundantly Ile purge.
Lel. Ile ſend ye Brothes, Sir.
Bel. I will be laugh'd at, and endure it patiently,
I will doe any thing.
Roſ. Ile be your Bayle then:
When ye com next to woo, pray ye com not boiſtrouſly
And furniſh'd like a Bear-ward.
Bel. No in truth, forſooth.
Roſ. I ſented ye long ſince.
Bel. I was to blame, ſure;
I will appear a Gentleman.
Roſ. 'Tis the beſt for ye,
For a true noble Gentleman's a brave thing;
Upon that hope we quit ye: You fear ſeriouſly?
Bel. Yes truly do I; I confeſs I fear ye,
And honor ye, and any thing.
Roſ. Farewel then.
Wo. And when ye come to woo next bring more mercy. Exeunt.
Bel. A Dary-Maid? A Tinkers-Trull: Heaven bleſs me:
Sure if I had provok'd 'em, they had quarter'd me. Enter two
I am a moſt ridiculous Aſs, now I perceive it: Gentlemen.
A Coward, and a Knave too.
1. Gen. 'Tis the mad Gentleman.
Let's ſet our Faces right.
Bel. No, no, laugh at me;
And laugh aloud.
2. Gen. We are better manner'd, ſir.
Bel. I do deſerve it; call me Patch, and Puppy,
And beat me if you pleaſe.
1. Gen. No indeed: We know ye.
Bel. 'Death, do as I would have ye.
2. Gen. Ye are an Aſs then;
A Coxcomb, and a Calf.
Bel. I am a great Calf:
Kick me a little now: Why, when? Sufficient;
Now laugh aloud, and ſcorn me; ſo good buy'ye;
And ever when ye meet me laugh.
Gen. We will, ſir. Exeunt.

Scæn. 3.

SCEN. 3.

Enter Nantler, le-Caſtre, de-Gard, Lugier, Mirabell.

Mir. Your Patience, Gentlemen; why do ye bait me?
Nan. Is't not a ſhame you are ſo ſtubborn-hearted,
So ſtony and ſo dull to ſuch a Lady,
Of her Perfections, and her Miſery?
Lug. Does ſhe not love ye? does not her diſtraction
For your ſake only, her moſt pityed Lunacie
Of all but you, ſhew ye? does it not compell ye?
Mir. Soft and fair, Gentlemen, pray ye proceed temperately.
Lug. If ye have any feeling, any ſenſe in ye,
The leaſt touch of a noble heart.
le-Caſt. Let him alone;
It is his glory that he can kill Beauty,
Ye bear my Stamp, but not my Tenderneſs;
Your wild unfavoury Courſes ſet that in ye!
For ſhame be ſorry, though ye cannot Cure her,
Shew ſomething of a Man, of a fair Nature.
Mir. Ye make me Mad.
De-G. Let me pronounce this to ye,
You take a ſtrange felicity in ſlighting
And wronging Women; which my poor ſiſter feels now;
Heavens hand be gentle on her: Mark me, Sir,
That very hour ſhe dyes; there's ſmall hope otherwiſe,
That minute you and I muſt grapple for it;
Either your life or mine.
Mir. Be not ſo hot, Sir,
I am not to be wrought on by theſe Policies;
In truth I am not; Nor do I fear the Tricks,
Or the high ſounding Threats of a Savoyen:
I glory not in Cruelty; ye wrong me;
Nor grow up water'd with the Tears of Women;
This let me tell ye, howſoe're I ſhew to ye
Wilde, as you pleaſe to call it, or ſelf-will'd;
When I ſee cauſe, I can both doe, and ſuffer, Freely, and feelingly, as a true Gentleman. Enter Roſaline & Lelia.
Roſ. O pity, pity; thouſand thouſand pities!
Lel. Alas, poor ſoul! ſhe will die; ſhe is grown ſenſleſs;
She will not know, nor ſpeak now.
Roſ. Die for Love,
And Love of ſuch a Youth? I would die for a Dog, firſt,
He that kils me, Ile give him leave to eat me;
Ile know men better ere I ſigh for any of 'em.
Lel. Ye have don a worthy act, Sir, a moſt famous;
Ye have kild a Maid the wrong way; ye are a conqueror.
Roſ. A Conqueror? a Cobler, hang him Sowter;
Goe hid thy ſelf for ſhame; go loſe thy Memory;
Live not 'mongſt Men; thou art a Beaſt, a Monſter;
A Blatant Beaſt.
Lel. If ye have yet any honeſtie,

Or ever heard of any; take my Counsell;
Off with your Garters; and seek out a Bough,
A handsom Bough; (for I would have ye hang like a Gentleman;)
And write some dolefull matter to the world,
A warning to hard-hearted men.
Mir. Out Kitlings:
What Catterwalling's here? what gibbing?
Do you think my heart is softned with a black Santis;
Shew me some Reason. Enter Oriana on a bed.
Ros. Here then, here is a reason.
Nant. Now, if ye be a man, let this sight shake ye.
La C. Alas poor Gentlewoman! do ye know me Lady?
Lug. How she looks up and stares.
Ori. I know ye very well:
You are my Godfather; and that's the Monsieur.
De-G. And who am I?
Ori. You are Amadis de Gaule, Sir.
Oh, oh, my heart! were you never in love, sweet Lady?
And do you never dream of Flowres and Gardens;
I dream of walking Fires: take heed, It comes now,
Who's that? pray stand away, I have seen that face sure;
How light my head is.
Ros. Take some rest.
Ori. I cannot.
For I must be up to morrow, to go to Church:
And I must dress me, put my new Gown on,
And be as fine to meet my Love: Heig ho!
Will not you tell me where my Love lies buried?
Mir. He is not dead: beshrew my heart she stirs me.
Ori. He is dead to me.
Mir. Is't possible my Nature
Should be so dampnable, to let her suffer;
Give me your hand.
Or. How soft you feel; how gentle?
Ile tell ye your fortune, Friend.
Mir. How she stares on me?
Ori. You have a flattring face; but 'tis a fine one;
I warrant you may have a hundred Sweet-hearts:
Will ye pray for me? I shall die to morrow;
And will ye ring the Bells?
Mir. I am most unworthy;
I doe confess unhappy; doe you know me?
Ori. I would I did.
Mir. Oh fair tears, how ye take me.
Ori. Do you weep too? you have not lost your Lover?
You mock me: Ile go home and pray.
Mir. Pray ye pardon me:
Or if it please ye to consider justly,
Scorn me; for I deserve it: Scorn, and shame me:
Sweet Oriana.
Lel. Let her alone; she trembles.
Her fits will grow more strong, if ye provoke her;

Certain

Ca-Laſt. Certain ſhe knowes ye not, yet loves to ſee ye
How ſhe ſmiles now:
Bel. Where are ye? oh, why doe not ye laugh: come laugh at me;
Why, a devill, art thou ſad, and ſuch a ſubject,
Such a ridiculous ſubject, as I am
Before thy face?
Mir. Pre'thee put off this Lightnes,
This is no time for mirth, nor place: I have us'd too much on't:
I have undon my ſelf and a ſweet Ladie,
By being too Indulgent to my Foolery
Which truly I repent: looke here.
Bel. What ayles ſhe.
Mir. Alas ſhe is mad.
Bel. Mad.
Mir. Yes, too ſure for me too.
Bel. Doſt thou wonder at that? by this good light, they are all ſo;
They are coz'ning mad, they are brawling mad, they are proud
They are all, all mad: I came from a world of mad women, (mad.
Mad as march Haires: get 'em in Chaines, then deale with 'em.
There's one that's mad: ſhe ſeemes well, but ſhe is dog mad:
Is ſhe dead, do'ſt think?
Mir. Dead? heaven forbid.
Bel. Heaven further it.
For till they be key-cold dead, there's no truſting of 'em
What ere they ſeeme, or howſoere they carry it,
Till they be chap-falne, and their Tongues at peace,
Nayl'd in their Coffins ſure, Ile ne're beleeve 'em;
Shall I talk with her?
Mir. No, deer friend, be quiet;
And be at peace a while.
Bel. Ile walk a ſide;
And come again anon: But take heed to her
You ſay ſhe is a woman?
Mir. Yes.
Bel. Take great heed:
For if ſhe doe not Cozen thee, then hang me:
Let her be mad, or what ſhe will, ſhee'l cheate thee. Exit
Mir. Away wild Foole: how vild this ſhewes in him now?
Now take my faith, before ye all I ſpeake it,
And with it, my repentant Love.
La-Caſt. This ſeemes well.
Mir. Were but this Lady cleere again, whoſe ſorrowes
My very heart melts for; were ſhe but perfect
(For thus to marry her, would be two Miſeries,)
Before the riſheſt, and the nobleſt Beautie,
France, or the world could ſhew me; I would take her
As ſhe is now, my Teares, and praises ſhall wed her.
La-Caſt. This makes ſome fmall amends.
Roſ. She beckens to ye.
To us too, to goe off.
Nant. Let's draw aſide all.
Orl. Oh my beſt friend: I would faine.

Mir. What? ſhe ſpeakes well,
And with another voice.
Ori. But I am fearfull,
And ſhame a little, ſtops my tongue.
Mir. Speake boldly.
Ori. Tell ye, I am well, I am perfect well. 'pray ye mock not;
And that I did this to provoke your Nature,
Out of my infinite, and reſtles Love,
To win your pitty: pardon me.
Mir. Goe forward;
Who ſet ye on?
Ori. None, as I live, no Creature.
Not any knew, or ever dreamt, what I meant:
Will ye be mine?
Mir. 'Tis true, I pittie ye;
But when I marry ye, ye muſt be wiſer;
Nothing but Tricks? devilles?
Ori. Will ye ſhame me?
Mir. Yes, merry will I: Come neer, Come neer, a Miracle;
The Womans well: ſhe was only mad for Mariage,
Stark mad to be ſton'd to death; give her good Counſel,
Will this world never mend? are ye caught, Damſell?

Enter Bellure, le. Caſtre, Lugier, Nantolet, de. Gard, Roſalvee, Bianib.

Bel. How goes it now?
Mir. Thou art a kind of Prophet,
The woman's well again; and would have gull'd me,
Well, excellent well: and not a Tayt upon her.
Bel. Did not I tell ye? Let'em be what can be;
Saints, Devills, any thing, they will abuſe us,
Thou wert an Aſſe to beleeve her ſo long: a Coxcomb;
Give'em a minute, they'll abuſe whole Millions.
Mir. And am not I a rare Phiſitian, Gentlemen?
That can cure deſperate mad Mindes?
de. Ga. Be not inſolent.
Mir. Well, goe thy waies: from this howre, I diſclame thee,
Unles thou haſt a Trick above this; then lle love thee.
Ye owne me for your Cure; pray have a Care of her,
For fear ſhe fall into Relapſe. Come Bellure
We'll ſet up Bills, to Cure diſeaſed virgins.
Bel. Shall we be merry?
Mir. Yes.
Bel. But lle no more projects;
If we could make 'em mad, it were ſome Maſtery. Exeunt.
Lil. I am glad ſhe is well again.
Roſ. So am I, certain
Be not aſhamed.
Ori. I ſhall never ſee a man more.
de. G. Come ye are a fool: had ye but told me this Trick,
He ſhould not have gloried thus.
Lug. He ſhall not long neither.
le. Caſt. Be rul'd, and be at peace: ye have my Conſent,
And what powre I can work with.

Nam. Come, leave blushing;
We are your Friends; an honest way compell'd ye;
Heaven will not see so true a love unrecompenc'd;
Come in, and slight him too.
Lug. The next shall hit him. Exeunt.

Actus Quintus. Scæn. 1.

Enter De-Gard, and Lugier.

De-G. 'Twill be discover'd.
Lug. That's the worst can happen;
If there be any way, to reach, and work upon him;
Upon his nature suddenly, and catch him: That he loves,
Though he dissemble it, and would shew contrary,
And will at length relent: I'll lay my Fortune,
Nay more, my life.
De G. Is she woo'd?
Lug. Yes, and ready,
And my designments set.
De-G. They are now for Travel,
All for that Game again: they have forgot wooing.
Lug. Let 'em; we'll travel with 'em.
De-G. Where's his Father?
Lug. Within; he knows my minde too, and allows it;
Pitties your Sisters Fortune most sincerely;
And has appointed, for our more assistance,
Some of his secret Friends.
De-G. 'Speed the plowgh.
Lug. Well said;
And be you serious too.
De-G. I shall be diligent.
Lug. Let's break the Ice for one, the rest will drink too (Beleeve me, sir) of the same Cup; my young Gentlewomen
Wait but who sets the Game a foot; though they seem stubborn, Reserv'd, and proud now, yet I know their hearts,
Their pulses, how they beat, and for what cause, Sir;
And how they long to venture their Abilities
In a true Quarrel; Husbands they must, and will have,
Or Nunneries, and thin Collations
To cool their bloods; Let's all about our business,
And if this faile, let Nature work.
De-G. Ye have arm'd me. Exeunt.

Scæn. 2.

Enter Mirabel, Nantolet, La Castre.

La Cast. Will ye be wilful then?
Mir. 'Pray, sir, your pardon,
For I must Travel: lie lazy here;
Bound to a Wife; Chain'd to her subtleties,
Her humors, and her wills, which are meer Fetters;
To have her today pleas'd, to morrow peevish,
The third day mad, the fourth rebellious;
You see, before they are married, what Monsters,

For

What Masques, and Mummeries they put upon us,
To be ty'd here, and suffer their Lavalto's?
Nan. 'Tis your own seeking.
Mir. Yes, to get my freedom;
Were they as I could wish 'em.
La-Cast. Fools, and Meacocks,
To endure what you think fit to put upon 'em:
Come, change your minde.
Mir. Not before I have chang'd air (Father)
When I know women worthy of my company,
I will return again and wait upon 'em;
Till then (dear Sir) I'll amble all the world over,
And run all hazards, misery, and poverty,
So I escape the dangerous Bay of Matrimony. Enter Pinac & Bellure.
Pi. Are ye resolv'd?
Mir. Yes certain; I will out again.
Pi. We are for ye, sir; we are your servants once more;
Once more we'll seek our fortune in strange Countries;
Ours is too scornful for us.
Bel. Is there ne'er a Land
That ye have read, or head of, (for I care not how far it be, Nor under what Pestiferous Star it lies)
A happy Kingdom, where there are no Women?
Nor have been ever? Nor no mention
Of any such lewd Things, with lewder qualities?
For thether would I Travel; where 'tis Fellony
To confess he had a Mother: a Mistris, Treason?
La-Cast. Are you for Travel too?
Bel. For any thing;
For living in the Moon, and stopping hedges,
E'er I stay here to be abus'd, and baffell'd. (daughters;
Nant. Why did ye not break your minds to me? They are my
And sure I think I should have that command over 'em?
To see 'em well bestow'd: I know ye are Gentlemen,
Men of fair Parts and States; I know your Parents;
And had ye told me of your fair Affections:
Make but one Tryal more; and let me second ye.
Bel. No I'll make Hob-nailes first, and mend old Kettles:
Can ye lend me an Armor of high proof, to appear in,
And two or three field pieces to defend me?
The Kings Guard are meer Pigmeys.
Nant. They will not eat ye.
Bel. Yes, and you too, and twenty fatter Monsieurs,
If their high stomacks hold: They came with Chopping-knives,
To cut me into Rands, and Surloyns, and so powder me.
Come, shall we go?
Nant. You cannot be so discurteous
(If ye intend to go) as not to visit 'em,
And take your leaves.
Mir. That we dare do, and civilly,
And thank 'em too.
Pi. Yes, sir, we know that honesty.

Bel. I'll

Bel. I'll come i'th Rear, forty foot off, I'll assure ye,
With a good Gun in my hand; I'll no more Amazons,
I mean, no more of their frights; I'll make my three legs,
Kiss my hand twice; and if I smell no danger;
If the enterview be clear, may be I'll speak to her;
I'll ware a privy coat too; and behind me,
To make those parts secure, a Bandog.
la-Cast. You are a merry Gentleman.
Bel. A wary Gentleman; I do assure ye,
I Have been warn'd, and must be arm'd. la-Cast. Well, Son,
These are your hasty thoughts, when I see you are bent to it,
Then I'll beleeve, and joyn with ye; So we'll leave ye:
There's a Trick will make ye stay.
Nant. I hope so. Exeunt.
Mir. We have won immortal Fame now, if we leave 'em.
Pi. You have, but we have lost.
Mir. Pinac, Thou art cozen'd;
I know they Love ye; and to gain ye handsomly,
Not to be thought to yeeld, they would give millions;
Their Fathers willingness, that must needs shew ye.
Pi. If I thought so.
Mir. Ye shall be hang'd, ye Recreant,
Would ye turn Renegado no?
Bel. No lets away, Boyes,
Out of the Air, and tumult of their Villanies;
Though I were married to that Grashopper,
And had her fast by th' legs I should think she would cozen me.
Fac. Monsieur Mirabel, I take it? Enter a young Factor.
Mir. Y'are ith' right, sir.
Fac. I am come to seek ye, sir; I have been at your Fathers,
And understanding you were here.
Mir. Ye are welcome:
May I crave your name?
Fac. Fosse, Sir, and your servant;
That you may know me better; I am Factor
To your old Merchant, Lowndes.
Mir. How do's he?
Fac. Well, sir, I hope: he is now at Orleance,
About some business.
Mir. You are once more welcom.
Your Master's a right honest man; and one
I am much beholding too, and must very shortly Trouble his love again.
Fac. You may be bold, sir.
Mir. Your business if you please now?
Fac. This it is, sir.
I know ye well remember in your Travel
A Genoa Merchant.
Mir. I remember many.
Fac. But this man, sir, particularly; your own benefit
Must needs imprint him in ye: one Alberto;

A Gentleman you ſav'd from being Murther'd
A little from Bellenia,
I was then myſelf in Italie, and ſupplide ye,
Though happely, you have forgot me now.
Mir. No, I remember ye,
And that Alberto too: a noble Gentleman:
More to remember, were to thanck myſelf, Sir.
What of that Gentleman?
Fac. He is dead:
Mir. I am ſorry.
Fac. But on his death bed, leaving to his Siſter.
All that he had beſide ſome Certaine Jewells,
Which with a Ceremony, he bequeathd to you,
In gratefull memory: he commanded ſtrictly
His Siſter, as ſhe lov'd him and his peace,
To ſee thoſe Jewells ſafe, and true deliverd;
And with them, his laſt Love. She, as tender
To obſerve this wil, not truſting friend, nor Servant,
With ſuch a weight, is come her ſelf to Paris
And at my Maſters Houſe.
Mir. You tell me a wonder.
Fac. I tell ye a truth, Sir: She is young, and handſom,
And well attended: of much State, and Riches;
So loving, and obedient to her Brother,
That on my Conſcience, if he had given her alſo,
She would moſt willingly have made her tender.
Mir. May not I ſee her?
Fac. She deſires it hartily.
Mir. And preſently?
Fac. She is now about ſome Buſineſs, Paſſing Accompts of ſome few debts here owing,
And buying Jewells of a Merchant,
Mir. Is ſhe wealthie.
Fac. I would ye had her, Sir, at all adventure.
Her Brother had, a main State.
Mir. And faire too?
Fac. The prime of all thoſe parts of Italie,
For Beautie, and for Curteſie.
Mir. I muſt needs ſee her.
Fac. 'Tis all her Buſineſs, Sir. Ye may now ſee her,
But to morrow will be fitter for your viſitation;
For ſhe is not yet prepared.
Mir. Onely, her ſight, Sir.
And when you ſhall think fit for further viſit.
Fac. Sir, ye may ſee her; and Ile wayt your Coming.
Mir. And Ile be with ye inſtantly. I know the houſe,
Mean time, my love, and thanks, Sir.
Fac. Your poore Servant. ——Exit.
Pi. Thou haſt the ſtrangeſt Luck: What was that Alberto?
Mir. An honeſt noble Marchant, 'twas my chance
To reſcue from ſome Rogues, hath almoſt ſlain him;
And he in kindneſs to remember this.

Bel. Now we shall have you:
For all your protestations, and your forwardness,
Finde out strange Fortunes in this Ladies eyes,
And new entirements to put off your journey?
And who shall have honor then?
Mir. No, no, never fear it:
I must needs see her, to receive my Legacy.
Bel. If it be tide up in her smock, Heaven help thee:
May not we see too?
Mir. Yes, afore we go:
I must be known my self e'er I be able
To make thou welcom: wouldst thou see more women?
I thought you had been out of love with all:
Bel. I may be,
I finde that with the least encouragement,
Yet I desire to see whether all Countries
Are naturally possess'd with the same spirits;
For if they be, I'll take a Monastery,
And never Travel; for I had rather be a Frier,
And live mewed up, then be a fool, and flouted:
Mir. Well, well, I'll meet ye anon; then tell you more, Boys;
How e'er, stand prepar'd, prest for our journey;
For certain, we shall go, I think, when I have seen her,
And view'd her well.
Pi. Go, go, and we'll wait for ye;
Your fortune directs ours now.
Bel. You shall finde me with Tavern,
Lamenting in Sack and Sugar for our losses;
If she be right Italian, and want servants,
You may prefer the propereſt man,
How I could worry a woman now?
Pi. Come, come, leave prating; Exeunt.
Ye may have enough to do, without this boasting

Scæn. 3.

Enter Lugier, de-Gard, Rosalu. and Lillia.

Lug. This is the last adventure.
de-G. And the happiest,
As we hope too.
Ros. We should be glad to finde it.
Lil. Who shall conduct us thither?
Lug. Your man is ready.
For I must not be seen; no, see this Gentleman;
That may beget suspition; all the rest
Are people of no doubt; I would have ye, Ladies,
Keep your old liberties, and as we instruct ye:
Come, look not pale; you shall not lose your wishes;
Nor beg 'em neither: but be your selves, and happy.
Ros. I tell ye true, I cannot hold off longer,
Nor give no more hard language.
de-G. You shall not need.
Ros. I love the Gentleman, and must now show it;
Shall I beat a propper man out of heart?
Lug. There's none advises ye.
Lil. Faith I repent me too.
Lug. Repent, and spoil all.
Tell what ye know, ye had best.
Lil. I'll tell what I think;
For if he ask me now, if I can love him,
I'll tell him yes, I can: The man's a kinde man;

And

And out of his true honesty affect me;
Although he plaid the fool, which I requited;
Must I still hold him at the staves end?
Lug. You are two strange women.
Ros. We may be, if we fool still.
Lug. Dare ye beleeve me?
Follow but this advice I have set you in now,
And if ye lose: would ye could now so lasely?
Give up without your honors saved?
de-G. Fie, Ladies.
Preserve your freedom still.
Lil. Well, well, for this time.
Lug. And carry that full state.
Ros. That's as the winde stands:
If it begin to chop about, and scant us;
Hang me, but I know what Ile do: come direct me,
I make no doubt, we shall do handsomly.
de-G. Some part o' th' way, we'll wait upon ye, Ladies;
The rest your man supplies:
Lug. Do well, I'll honor ye. Exeunt.

Scæn. 4.

Enter Factor and Mirabel, Orinda and two Merchants.

Fac. Look ye, Sir, there she is, you see how busie;
Methinks you are infinitely bound to her, for her journey.
Mir. How gloriously she shews? She is a tall woman.
Fac: Of a fair Size, sir. My Master not being at home,
I have been so out of my wits, to get her company
I mean, sir, of her own fair Sex, and fashion.
Mir. A far off, she is most fair too.
Fac. Neer, most Excellent.
At length, I have entreated two fair Ladies,
And happily you know 'em: the young daughters
Of Monsieur Nantelet.
Mir. I know 'em well, sir.
What are those? Jewels?
Fac. All.
Mir. They make a rich shew?
Fac: There is a matter of ten thousand pounds too
Was owing here: you see those Merchants with her;
They have brought it in now.
Mir. How handsomly her shape shews?
Fac. Those are still neate: your Italians are most curious.
Now she looks this way.
Mir. She has a gooly presence.
How full of curtesie? Well, sir, I'll leave ye.
And if I may be bold to bring a friend or two;
Good noble Gentlemen.
Fac. No doubt, ye may, sir.
For you have most command.
Mir. I have seen a wonder. Exit.
Or. Is he gon?
Fac. Yes.
Or. How?
Fac. Taken to the utmost.
A wonder dwels about him.
Or. He did not guess at me?
Fac. No, be secure; ye shew another woman.
He is gone to fetch his friends.
Or. Where are the Gentlewomen?

Fac. Here.

Fac. Here, here, now they are come, Enter Roſaline, Lillia, Sit ſtill, and let them ſee ye. Servant.
Roſ. Pray ye, where's my friend, Sir?
Fac. She is within, Ladies, but here's another Gentlewoman,
A ſtranger to this Towne: ſo pleaſe you viſit her,
'Twill be well taken.
Lil. Where is ſhe?
Fac. There, Above; Ladies.
Ser. 'Bleſs me: what Thing is this? two Pinacles,
Upon her pate! Is't not a glode to catch Wood-cocks?
Roſ. Peace, ye rude, knave.
Ser. What a bouncing Bum ſhe has too?
There's Saile enough for a Carteck.
Roſ. What is this Lady?
For as I live, ſhe's a goodly woman.
Fac. Gheſs, gheſs.
Lil. I have not ſeen a nobler Preſence.
Ser. 'Tis a luſtie wench: now could I ſpend my forty-pence,
With all my heart, to have but one fling at her;
To give her but a waſhing blow.
Lil. Ye Raſcall.
Ser. I that's all a man has, for's goodwill: 'twil be long enough,
Before ye cry come Anthonie, and kiſs me.
Lil. Ile have ye whipt.
Roſ. Has my friend ſeen this Lady?
Fac. Yes, yes, and is well known to her.
Roſ. I much admire her Preſence.
Lil. Soe do I too:
For I proteſt, ſhe is the handſomeſt,
The rareſt, and the neweſt to mine eie
That ever, I ſaw yet.
Roſ. I long to know her;
My friend ſhall doe that kindneſs.
Ori. So ſhe ſhall Ladies.
Come, pray ye come up.
Roſ. O, me,
Lil. Hang me if I knew her:
Were I a man my ſelf, I ſhould now love ye;
Nay, I ſhould doate.
Roſ. I dare not, truſt mine eies;
For as I live ye are the ſtrangeſt alter'd
I muſt come up to know the truth.
Ser. So muſt I, Lady;
For I am a kind of unbeleever too.
Lil. Get ye gon, Sirrah;
And what ye have ſeen, be ſecret in: you are paid elſe;
No more of your long tongue.
Fac. Will ye goe in Ladies,
And talke with her. Theſe venturers will come ſtrait:
Away with this fellow.
Lil. There, Sirrah, goe, diſport ye.
Ser. I would the Trunck-hos'd woman, would goe with me. Exit.

Scæn. 5.

Enter Mirabel, Pinac, Bellure.

Pi. Is ſhe ſo glorious handſome?
Mir. You would wonder:
Our Women look like Gipſies, like Gills to her:
Their Clothes and faſhions beggerly, and Bankrupt:
Baſe, old, and ſcurvy.

Bel. How lookes her face?
Mir. Most heavenly:
And the becoming-motion of her Bodie
So fetts her off.
Bel. Why then we shall stay.
Mir. Pardon me:
That's more then I know: if she be that Woman,
She appeares to be.
Bel. As 'tis impossible.
Mir. I shall then tell ye more.
Pi. Did ye speake to her?
Mir. No, no, I onely saw her: She was busie
Now I goe for that end: And mark her (Gentlemen)
If she appear, not to ye, one of the sweetest,
The handsomest: the fayrest, in behaviour,
We shall meet the two wenches there too, they come to visit her,
To wonder, as we doe.
Pi. Then we shall meet 'em.
Bel. I had rather meet two Beares.
Mir. There you may take your leaves, dispatch that business,
And as ye find their humours.
Pi Is your love there too?
Mir. No certain, she has no great heart to set out againe.
This is the house, Ile usher ye?
Bel. Ile bless me,
And take a good heart if I can:
Mir. Come, nobly Exeunt.

Scæn. 6.

Enter Factor, Rosaluce, Lillia, Orinda.

Fac. They are come in: Sit you two off, as Strangers,
There Ladie: where's the Boy? be readie, Sirrha
And cleere your Pipes, the Musick now: they enter. Musick.
Pi. What a State she keepes? how far off they sit, from her? Enter Mirabell,
How rich she is, I marry, this shewes bravely. Pinac and Bellure.
Bel. She is a lusty wench: and may allure a good man,
But if she have a Tongue, Ile not give two pence for her:
There sits my Fury: how I shake to see her.
Fac. Madam this is the Gentleman.
Mir, How sweet she kisses?
She has a Spring dwells on her lipps: a paradize
This is the Legacie. Song.

From the honor'd dead I bring } Take it nobly, 'tis your due,
Thus his love and last offring. } From a friendship ever true.
From a faith &c.

Ori. Most noble, Sir.
This from my now dead Brother, as his love,
And gratefull memory of your great benefit:
From me my thanks, my wishes, and my Service,
Till I am more acquainted I am silent,
Onely I dare say this, you are truly noble.
Mir. What should I think?
Pi. Think ye have a handsome fortune,
Would I had such another.
Ros. Ye are well mett Gentlemen,
We heare ye are for Travell?
Pi. Ye heare true, Ladie,
And come to take our Leaves,
Lil. Wee'll along with ye,
We see you are growne so witty by your Journey,
We cannot choose but step out too: This Lady,

We

We mean to wait upon as far as Italy.
Bel. I'll travel into Wales, amongst the Mountains;
I hope they cannot finde me.
Ref. If you go further;
So good, and fare ſociety we hold ye.
We'll jog along ſee.
Pi. Are ye ſo valiant Lady?
Lil. And we'll be merry, Sir, and laugh.
Pi. It may be
We'll go by Sea.
Lil. Why 'tis the the onely voyage;
I love a Sea voyage, and a bluſtring Tempeſt;
And let all ſplit.
Pi. This is a dainty Damoſel;
I think 'twill tame ye: can ye ride poſt?
Lil. O excellently; I am never weary that way:
A hundred mile a day is nothing with me,
Bel. I'll travel under ground; do you hear (ſweet Lady?)
I finde it will be dangerous for a woman.
Ref. No danger, ſir, I warrant; I love to be under.
Bel. I ſee ſhe will abuſe me all the world over;
But ſay we paſs through Germany, and drink hard?
Ref. We'll learn to drink and ſwagger too.
Bel. She'll beat me.
Lady, I'll live at home.
Ref. And I'll live with thee;
And We'll keep houſe together.
Bel. I'll keep hounds firſt;
And thoſe I hate right hartily.
Pi. I go for Turky,
And ſo it may be up into Perſia.
Lil. We cannot know to much, I'll travel with ye.
Pi. And you'll abuſe me?
Lil. Like enough.
Pi. 'Tis dainty.
Bel. I will live in a bawdy-houſe.
Ref. I dare come to ye.
Bel. Say, I am diſpos'd to hang my ſelf?
Ref. There I'll leave ye:
Bel. I am glad I know how to avoid ye.
Mir. May I ſpeak yet?
Fac. She beckons to ye.
Mir. Lady, I could wiſh, I knew to recompence,
Even with the ſervice of my life, thoſe paines,
And thoſe high favours you have thrown upon me;
Till I be more deſertful in your eye;
And till my duty ſhall make known I honor ye:
Nobleſt of Women, do me but this favour,
To accept this back again, as a poor teſtimony.
Or. I muſt have you too with 'em; elſe the Will,
That ſays they muſt reſt with ye, is miſtring'd, ſir;
Which pardon me, I dare not do.
Mir. Take me then;
And take me with the trueſt love.
Or. 'Tis certain,
My Brother lov'd ye dearly, and I ought
As dearly to preſerve that love. But, Sir;
Though I were willing; theſe are but your Ceremonies.
Mir. As I have life, I ſpeak my ſoul.
Or. I like ye.
But how you can like me, without I have Teſtimony,
A Stranger to ye.

Mir. I'll

Mir. I'll marry ye immediately.
A fair State, I dare promise ye.
Bel. Yet she'll cozen thee.
Or. Would some fair Gentlemen durst promise for ye.
Mir. By all that's good Enter la-Castre Nantolet, Lugier, &c. Guard,
All. And we'll make up the rest, Lady.
Or. Then Oriana takes ye; nay, she has caught ye;
If ye start now let all the World cry shame on ye:
I have out Travell'd ye.
Bel. did not I say she would cheat thee?
Mir. I thank ye, I am pleas'd, ye have deceived me.
And willingly I swallow it, and joy in't;
And yet perhaps I know ye: whose plot was this?
Lug. He is not asham'd that cast it: he that executed Followed your Fathers will.
Mir. What a world's this, nothing but craft, and cozenage?
Or. Who begun, sir.
Mir. Well; I do take thee upon meer Compassion;
And I do think, I shall love thee. As a Testimony,
I'll burn my book, and turn a new leafe over.
But these fine clothes you shall wear still.
Or. I obey you, sir, in all.
Nant. And how! How, daughter! What say you to these Gentlemen?
What say ye, Gentlemen, to the Girles?
Pi. By my troth——if she can love me.
Lil.——How long?
Pi. Nay, if once ye love.
Lil. Then take me,
And take your chance.
Pi. Most willingly, ye are mine, Lady:
And if I use ye not, that ye may love me.
Lil. A Match y' faith.
Pi. Why now ye travel with me.
Ros. How that thing stands?
Bel. It will if ye urge it.
'Bless your five wits:
Ros. Nay, 'prethe stay, I'll have thee.
Bel. You must ask me leave first.
Ros. Wilt thou use me kindly;
And beat me but once a week?
Bel. If ye deserve no more.
Ros. And wilt thou get me with child?
Bel. Dost thou ask me seriously?
Ros. Yes indeed do I.
Bel. Yes, I will get thee with child: Come presently,
And 't be but in revenge, I'll do thee that curtesie.
Well, if thou wilt fear God, and me; have at thee.
Ros. I'll love ye, and I'll honor ye.
Bel. I am pleas'd then.
Mir. This Wild-Goose-Chase is done, we have won o' both sides.
Brother, your love: and now to Church o' all hands;
Let's lose no time.
Pi. Our Travelling, lay by.
Bel. No more for Italy; for the Low-Countries,

Exeunt.

FINIS.
